THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AT THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

The twenty-sixth annual convention of the Free Religious Association will be held in Hall of Washington in the forenoon and in Hall XXVI. in the afternoon.
 Art Palace, World's Fair, Chicago, Ill., on Wednesday, September 30th, 1893.
 WM. J. POTTER, Pres.
 D. G. CRANDON, Sec'y.

THE MORNING SESSION, beginning at 10 o'clock, will be presided over by Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, one of the Vice President and founders of the Association, who will make the introductory address. By request of the Directors, the President, William J. Potter, will then give a written address entitled: "The Free Religious Association,—its Twenty-six Years and their Meaning." Dr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot will follow on "The Scientific Method in the Study of Religion." Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, of Providence, R. I., on "The Free Religious Association as the expounder of the Natural History of Religion," and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, on "Religious Progress." Other speakers have been invited and will be announced later.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION will begin at 2:30 o'clock, and will be devoted to the subject, "Unity in Religion." Minot J. Savage, of Boston, will open the subject, followed by Dr. Edward McGlynn of New York, Mangasar Mangasarian of Chicago, Rabbi Hirsch of Chicago, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney of Boston, and others yet to be announced.

THE FESTIVAL, with supper, speeches, music, and social opportunities, will be held in one of the large hotels of Chicago, or at the Union League Club (the place to be definitely announced in the Chicago daily press). Col. T. W. Higginson will preside and welcome the guests, and Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, M. J. Savage, Francis E. Abbot, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, William J. Potter, Paul K. Frothingham, Mangasar Mangasarian, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. McGlynn, and others are expected to speak. Reception from 6 to 7 o'clock. Supper at 7 o'clock. Tickets for the supper to be procured at the convention, and of Secretary D. G. Crandon.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

Editorial

*Yet I doubt not thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.*

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see, Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be:

*Till the war-drum throbbed no longer,
and the battle-flags were furled

—Tennyson.

It has been suggested that there should be at the World's Fair a rendezvous for the friends of the Liberal faith, that they might be able to see one another and exchange greetings without making special efforts to that end. Mr. John Fretwell, the well-known English Unitarian, now of Providence, R. I., who brought the matter to our attention, makes a point of being at the roof-garden of the California building each day between 3 and 4 p. m., and it is hoped that this time and place will be generally adopted.

OUR friend S. J. Barrows is once more at home in the editorial sanctum of the Christian Register, and in his first number evinces a determination to speedily make up for his year's absence by doing double duty now that he is returned. The vigor and enthusiasm with which he gets to work speaks well for the profitability of his vacation. Rev. Mr. Bush, the veteran editor who so satisfactorily filled Mr. Barrows' chair last year, is now celebrating his release by attending the Parliament of Religions and the World's Fair.

Evidence comes from every side that what is sometimes designated the institutional idea of the church is gaining ground in all directions. Witness, among other things, the departure which Grace church in New York has taken under the lead of its rector, Dr. W. R. Huntington, who has led several rich parishioners to provide the means for erecting on Fourteenth street, between Avenues A and B (a poor neighborhood, not very far from this down-town church), four buildings—Grace Hospital, Grace Parish House, Grace Chapel and Grace Clergy House.

AMONG the many manifestations that America is slowly awakening to a high ministry of art may be mentioned the generosity of some New York people who have been providing for World's Fair scholarships to young women interested in art studies, who could not otherwise attend the Fair. Several thousand dollars have been raised for this purpose, and the girls have been sent in squads of a dozen or fifteen at a time and have been given two weeks' opportunity to study the Fair. And still there are six weeks left. Let those who have not spent all the loose money they have in giving themselves the culture which the World's Fair affords do something towards helping others to know it.

OUR Church-Door Pulpit this week is filled by an abstract of what deserves the title of a sermon for the times. It is the outcome of the application of science to theology. At first glance it may seem cold and uninviting, rather a scientific treatise than a sermon; but its brevity will certainly commend it, and we do not hesitate to say that he who looks to the pulpit not merely for something soothing, on the one hand, or for entertainment and excitement, on the other, but rather for help to lead a true life, will find the path of life opened somewhat by such a discourse, and will therefore feel that it is a true sermon and that he who preached it was a true disciple in the spirit of him whose gospel was love and service.

IN our last issue we criticised an utterance of Dr. Atwood's, and now we would play the pleasanter part of heartily commending these words of his:

Our esteemed contemporary, The Herald and Presbyterian, has the grace to remark, "Christianity is light; Mohammedanism and Mormonism and Unitarianism are darkness." That is an old tune, with variations to suit the mood of the singer. It would be just as sweet and twice as true if it ran, "Christianity is light; Mohammedanism and Mormonism and Presbyterianism are darkness." There is somewhat in Unitarianism that is not in Christianity; but that somewhat is modern and interesting. There is somewhat in Presbyterianism that is not in Christianity; but alas! that somewhat is neither fresh nor diverting.

THE Inter Ocean, in an editorial of last week, had the following appreciative reference to the selected hymns for use in the Parliament of Religions:

The distinct and distinctive recognition of the Universal Father and of all men as brethren finds significant emphasis in hymns selected for parliamentary use, and printed in connection with the general program. They are by writers of widely different theological views, from Harriet Martineau, the Robert Ingersoll of her sex, to Cardinal Newman, the Fenelon of the Catholic Church of England and this century. Bishop Heber and Oliver Wendell Holmes are in parallel columns. Charles Wesley and James Russell Lowell find fit companionship with the great Brahma Samaj, all ending with one of Watts' more familiar hymns, with its apostrophe to "The Eternal Name." Not a note of discord is struck in all those sacred songs.

It is the more to be regretted that in the morning devotional meetings these hymns have, up to the writing of this note, been quite ignored, and the "Gospel Hymns" used instead of those specially arranged under the appointment of the General Committee of the Parliament. It seems hardly courteous, in such a representative meeting, to bring into the common service phraseology and doctrine which is repugnant to the sincere faith and feeling of many of our own countrymen, not to speak of our distinguished guests from the far East. These devotional meetings should be conducted in the same large and considerate spirit that has marked the platform in the Hall of Columbus. So conducted the morning half hour might be one of the most profitable and truly religious experiences of the whole day.

THE CHORUS OF FAITH.

While the great dailies of Chicago are taxed to their utmost limit to give inadequate reports of the great meetings in session at the Art Palace, our readers will understand how hopeless is the task for UNITY to give the merest outline. Happily UNITY falls into the hands of those who read the papers. And most of them will find what we cannot give them. We write at the end of the first week. Our associate, F. L. H., has described the first day. The chords then struck have continued to vibrate in essential harmony with the spirit of the opening. The executive task of handling the immense crowd and keeping the program from hopeless complications and disastrous "telescoping" has been a difficult one. Spacious as are the halls and corridors of the Art Building, they have been continuously overcrowded, and overflow meetings have been a frequent necessity and have been organized at great labor. Every session has had its frequent climaxes of appreciation and applause. The surprise has generally come from the clearness, gentleness and breadth of the representatives of the Orient. To use a word which now, in Chicago at least, is well-nigh emptied of its meaning, the "pagans" have carried the sympathies of the vast audiences. Mozoomdar, with his masterly eloquence; Nagarkar, his scholarly and refined associate in the Brahma-Samaj; the white-robed Dharmapala, who represents the propaganda of Buddhism in its most vital and universal form; Ghandi, with his modest and clear thought, representing the Jain Community; Dvivekanandi, the orange-robed priest of Brahminism; Chakrivarti, the representative of the Indian Theosophists, and others, are all of them university men from India, using elegant English with scarcely a foreigner's accent. They are men versed in modern history and science; far better prepared to understand and appreciate the Occident than we are prepared to enter into the life of the Orient. This picturesque group from India forms the most attractive element in the Parliament.

Scarcely second to this is the interest in the Japanese group, while the representatives of China have always been received with an enthusiasm that attempts to atone for the shameful treatment which that people have received and are receiving at the hands of the United States. These people, in the main, have spoken through interpreters and translations. But they have not been without their orators that have had noble command of English. It was a noble revelation of moral power on the second day when Kinza Ringe Hirai gave his merited rebuke to Western greed and Christian hypocrisy and bigotry. The people received what they did not like to hear with cheers, because they felt it was too true and merited.

Next to these the Archbishop of Zante, representative of the Greek Church, with his gorgeous robes and imposing retinue, attracted attention. The Roman Catholic Church appears in a favorable light on the platform of the Parliament. From the first its ablest and most progressive men have given the undertaking unhesitating support. Bishop Keane, Archbishop Ireland, and Cardinal Gibbons have shown themselves to be men of the nineteenth century. They are trying to keep up with the times and carry their great church along with them. Orthodoxy has been distrustful of the Parliament, and oftentimes has shown itself incapable of appreciating the occasion or understanding its true import. But its scholars and progressive men have been gladly heard, and they have brought vital words.

So absorbing is the interest in the main Congress that it has been difficult to turn aside the enthusiasm to the parallel meetings of the various denominations. We write after the first day of the Unitarian presentation and before the beginning of the Congress proper, and at present writing cannot rise above the depression caused by the non-appearance of so many of the speakers announced, whose presence the public had a reasonable right to expect. Is this laxity of conscience towards a program a special Unitarian weakness? Is a contract with the public, which a place on a printed program implies, a light obligation to be broken with impunity, or to be set aside for personal reasons? Health considerations are imperative and beyond control. We fully realize at what cost of strength and purse engagements are to be kept, but still they are a part of the burdens of conscience. Duty always calls for sacrifices. And there is but an uncertain future for any cause whose representatives hold lightly their public engagements. To our mind, to consider an engagement once made a debatable question is a menace to integrity. It is no longer an open problem. Nothing but "circumstances beyond control" to our mind warrants a disappointment to the public. Our readers must remember with us that many papers at this Parliament will be offered by proxy, according to an understanding at the outset. And we doubt not that before our readers see this protest the Unitarian Congress will have passed into history, a not wholly unworthy section of the altogether triumphant and magnificent Parliament of Religions, the noblest expression of universal religion which the world has seen up to the present time.

ARCADIAN CONDITIONS.

Julian Ralph, in his article upon the "Gentle Side of Chicago," has this paragraph: "I have been present on at least a dozen occasions when the men smoked and drank and the women kept with them, being—otherwise than in the drinking and smoking—in perfect fellowship with them. Such conditions are Arcadian." He mentions one instance where there were glasses of "green mint" for all, and cigars for the men, and I suppose that on that particular occasion the conditions were more Arcadian still. He takes pains to assure us that they were very nice maidens and matrons, in very nice social circles, and that they all "loved smoke," and could not possibly tear themselves away from the men while they indulged in it. It is a good thing that he gives us this assurance, otherwise we might have suspected that he was in the Prince of Wales' set in England, where a few fast people greatly shock the more conservative aristocratic ladies by following the men to the smoking room and insisting upon keeping them company where good usage has said they should be alone. We also hear of these things occasionally in the more rapid social circles of Omaha, Kansas City, and the border towns generally, but this writer has been the first, I believe, to proclaim the new departure in Chicago. I have no doubt that in the social circles of Poker Flat such usage was common,—perhaps, indeed, the fashion originated there,—though I do not remember that Truthful James took note of it. Probably also the aristocratic circles of the Midway Plaisance indulge in this vaunted good camaraderie, as a matter of course; and there are certain social circles in all large cities where it has been very much in vogue from time immemorial. Are the exclusives of Chicago forced into competition with this old-time free-and-easy set, in order to hold the gentlemen of their acquaintance at all, we wonder, for we frequently hear of the difficulty of securing their presence at social functions? And do the men really like these ladies any better for their condescension, and admire their lowering of the standard of dignity and refinement for ladies, we wonder? Do they really fancy having their wives and sisters "adore smoke," or is there still a little shrinking from that in some of the more delicate-minded, who know something about the class of women who usually adore smoke and who are quite familiar with the glasses of green mint which are just beginning to appear upon the tables of extreme fashion? Of course, the time is not far off when the ladies who frequent the smoking rooms will take cigars, too, and be even better boon companions; and will the gentlemen be even better pleased then, and will the conditions be increasingly Arcadian? And when the distinctions between Bohemia and respectability are utterly wiped out, will the loveliness of it all increase in geometrical proportion? Or are the ladies of a certain set making a mistake, and will the delicate and refined and even high-principled women be the ones admired most after all? I venture to predict that they will.

H. T. G.

OPENING OF THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

"And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place." And a day of Pentecost it was, that opening Monday of the Parliament of Religions in the hall of Columbus,—a day memorable to all who were fortunate enough to be present and were able to take in the deep significance of the occasion. That earlier Pentecost, so remembered in Christian story and song, was provincial in representative character as compared with this world-wide gathering. It was a festival commemorative of the great Law of love and brotherhood, the dawn of which in human society antedates all historic faiths,—commemorative of the accumulated spiritual harvest, of the sowing and reaping of the race through uncounted generations. It may be said in all calmness and confidence that never before in the history of the world has a religious gathering of like significance and equal extent been held. Nor was such a meeting possible heretofore. It awaited, in scripture phrase, "the fullness of time." The sword of progress, like the sword of fortune, is two-edged. Our industrial and commercial era is a complex affair in the reach of its activities and influences. It has spread, along with the light and blessing that belong to it, the evils that have sprung up in its path. The earlier slave trade, not yet brought completely to an end, the rum traffic with half civilized lands, the forcing of opium upon markets against the protest of governments too weak to resist the arguments of gun-powder and the law of might, the prostitution of life, body and soul, in the mad service of gain and greed,—these are features of our present civilization which we cannot be blind to, nor confess without humiliation. But the wheat is a thousandfold more than all the tares. Not until this widening commercial and industrial life had tunneled the mountains and bridged the seas, opening land to land and binding the nations in a gradually recognized bond of mutual welfare and a common life, exchanging the products of thought as well as the merchandise of the market, and thus awakening mutual interest and respect in place of the old narrowness and distrust,—not until this preparation had brought "the fullness of time," could such a spectacle as was witnessed in the Hall of Columbus on Monday, Sept. 11, be shown.

And a most impressive spectacle it was. By 10 o'clock, the appointed hour of the opening of the parliament, every seat in the great auditorium was taken, and all standing-room was occupied. As the procession of distinguished speakers and representatives entered the hall, two by two and arm in arm, the applause of the audience was a foretaste of the welcomes that later followed in the addresses from the platform. Seated upon that platform were representatives of all the great ethnic faiths, in their various sub-divisions and sects. There was every shade of complexion, from the ruddy face and blue eyes of the Anglo-Saxon to the black skin of the full-blooded African. The rich robes of the prelates of the Roman and Greek churches, with their decorations of jewels and gold, and the no less rich and more varied and picturesque costumes of the Orientals, found a foil in the black coats of the various representatives of the Protestant communions; and all together presented a brilliant kaleidoscopic picture.

The opening address of Mr. Bonney, President of the World's Congress Auxiliary, showed his own appreciation of the occasion and was dignified and to the point. Dr. Barrows, chairman of the general committee, and to whom with President Bonney the happy outcome of this Parliament of Religions is largely due, gave the principal address of welcome. And an admirable address it was, brotherly and broad, illuminated by the inspiration of the hour, clear and forcible, full of sweetness and light, eloquent throughout and rising at times into poetry and song. As, nearing the end, he pictured the "spirits of just and good men" hovering over that significant assembly,—“of Paul, the zealous missionary of Christ,” “of the wise and humane Buddha,” “of Socrates, the searcher after truth,” “of Jeremy Taylor and John Milton and Roger Williams and Lessing, the great apostles of toleration,”—“of Abraham Lincoln, who sought for a church founded on love to God and man,” “of Tennyson and Whittier and Phillips Brooks, who looked forward to this parliament as the realization of a noble idea,”—the great congregation throbbed as one heart and gazed spell-bound and with moist eyes. Then followed immediately these sentences, and the pent-up emotion of the audience burst forth in long applause. “When, a few days ago, I met for the first time the delegates who have come to us from Japan, and shortly after the delegates who have come to us from India, I felt that the arms of human brotherhood had reached almost around the globe. But there is something stronger than human love and fellowship, and what gives us most hope and happiness to-day is our confidence that

The address of Dr. Barrows struck the keynote of those that followed through the morning and afternoon of this memorable opening day. The note of humanity in them all rang clear above the divisions of creed and sect. Not that the different representative speakers merged their distinctive beliefs in a common vacuum of thought. There was nothing of this sort. There was no intellectual mushiness, not one lapse into mere gush. But standing each for the faith and thought that had been much to him, they all alike seemed to recognize that there is a bond of humanity wider than the bond of race or creed, and that that faith most commends itself which most emphasizes and strengthens this wider bond. The things cherished in common were by all confessed to be larger than the things held apart. The truth-seeking mind, the conscience for right, the devout spirit, the loving heart, these were seen to be central; opinions, creeds, rites, systems of philosophy, to mark the measure of present attainment and growth in the individual or community.

And what will be the outcome of this Parliament? It is at least the greatest single object-lesson the world has yet seen in comparative religion. It must have broadened both the mind and heart of every one who has been a witness of it. The press has carried that lesson in its printed page over the land. Who can measure the influence exerted and yet to go forth? We heartily congratulate all those who have had charge of, or a hand in, this undertaking now crowned with such success. We are sorry for those who looked askance and saw no good to be accomplished by it. The world moves, and no better evidence could there be of the fact than such a parliament. We do not look to see church or synagogue or temple or mosque deserted by former worshippers, or filling with proselytes. But we do look to see the uplift of men, the world over, above the dividing walls of race and creed into a larger and kindlier interpretation of religion, by whatever name they are led to call their faith; and to this consummation, devoutly to be wished by all good and true men, the Parliament of Religions, held in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893, must prove no inconsiderable factor and contribution.

F. L. H.

THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

So much has been said of late of “Proportional Representation” and of what may be considered a rival system of procuring legislation which shall be in accordance with the will of the people, the “Initiative and Referendum” that we have been asked to define these terms. The detail in any given applications of these schemes may vary considerably, and an example of the former system has already been described in UNITY. By the “Initiative” is meant that any considerable percentage of the voting population shall have the right to propose legislation by direct petition to the legislative body, which is bound to embody it in a properly drawn bill to be voted upon by those to whom the law-making power belongs. The Referendum is the referring of proposed legislation to the popular vote for final action.

Of course it will be seen that in certain specified cases most of our States now have the referendum. In some cases by constitutional provision certain acts cannot now be passed unless the question be submitted to the people for their vote; and in other cases our legislatures sometimes make an act conditional upon its acceptance by popular vote. It is also true that a demand for legislation made by petition of a considerable body of voters is pretty likely to be acted upon by our legislative bodies. Nevertheless this is a matter of courtesy or policy. The advocates of the Initiative would fix by law a percentage of the voting population, or a certain number of people who should have the legal right to have their wishes acted upon. Where the Initiative and Referendum are thoroughly carried out, the body which frames the bills has no real legislative power. It simply puts the suggestion of a part of the people into convenient form, and then submits it to the whole people to be enacted or rejected. This is strictly democratic, as distinguished from representative government. Of course it is possible to carry it out in modified form,—giving the “legislative body” power to pass certain ordinary acts without referring them to the people.

The Initiative and Referendum is open to the objection that in a large country, with a high civilization and vast and complex interests, the amount of legislation needed may be so great and some of it may be so abstruse as to swamp the simple-minded and little educated voter and take an undue amount of the time of all; so that if by some such system as that of proportional representation representatives of high ability, and whom their electors could really trust, could be elected, a representative legislature composed of highly educated social scientists might better care for the welfare of the public than the people themselves could by direct vote.

F. W. S.

We need not disavow history in order to rise above history.—W. C. GANNETT.

ONE of the recent devices in electric railway is a lamp which throws light upon the steps of the car, which the conductor can light on touching the button, whenever the car stops in a dark night. How religious a thing that is. That is the kind of an attachment a church ought to have; one that would reveal the presence of the next step. The first concern of religion should be how to get aboard at this end of the line, not how to get off at the other.

ONE LIFE, ONE LAW, ONE LOVE.

Hymn written for the Unitarian Reception, Unity Church, Monday evening, September 18.

O Prophet souls of all the years,
Bend o'er us from above;
Your far-off vision, toils and tears
Now to fulfilment move!

From tropic clime and zones of frost
They come, of every name,—
This, this our day of Pentecost,
The Spirit's tongue of flame!

The ancient barriers disappear:
Down bow the mountains high:
The sea-divided shores draw near
In a world's unity.

One Life together we confess,
One all-indwelling Word,
One holy Call to righteousness
Within the silence heard:

One Law that guides the shining spheres
As on through space they roll,
And speaks in flaming characters
On Sinais of the soul:

One Love, unfathomed, measureless,
An ever-flowing sea,
That holds within its vast embrace
Time and eternity.

THE LOCAL PRESS COMMENTS ON THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

The lesson of tolerance will be taught at this parliament by the masters of all religions. It cannot be but that the seed here sown will find fruitful soil, here and there. We look for great results from this great gathering; not at once; not, perhaps, in the near future. But, in the wisdom of that providence which men of all creeds profess to worship, and whose movements are slow but sure, the energy here concentrated will be felt upon all the world, and its effect will be for the unification and uplifting of mankind.

The parliament of religions now in session as a part of the Columbian Exposition is another concentration of light flashed upon current happenings to reveal the characteristic spirit of the times. To-day, instead of trying to gain possession of an empty tomb, at best only a sacred relic, at the risk of bringing the horrors of war upon the continents, the demand is for a non-controversial gathering of eminent representatives of all religions. Not that there is any thought of obliterating the lines of demarkation, or building a cosmopolitan church as a substitute for the various churches now extant; on the contrary, it is expected that every worshiper will continue his correspondence with heaven on the line of communication already opened up by his faith and approved by his conscience. Nothing disorganizing or proselyting is in contemplation. But it is hoped and expected that bigotry in all its forms will be somewhat lessened.

In the vision of John Bunyan all religions not Protestant were seen as two chained lions, "Pope and Pagan," the ground about them being strewn with the bones of their victims slain before the terrible beasts were caught and tethered. Such a conception is hardly in accord with the spirit of Christianity as now conceived and being illustrated by the mingling of the best representatives of all creeds and faiths. Nor is the liberal and progressive spirit confined to any particular branch of the church universal.

Shall we not learn from this parliament that in religion, as in matter, there is a survival of the fittest? Is it not likely that we shall learn that the cardinal ideas of Christianity, the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, have counterparts in all religions that have endured the stress of centuries? May we not, after reading Vivekananda's reproduction of the Zoroastrian hymn—

As the different streams having their sources in different places all mingle their water in the sea, O Lord, so the different paths which men take through different tendencies, various though they appear, crooked or straight, all lead to thee—

remember Robert Browning's verse:
So many roads lead up to God,
'Twere strange if any soul should miss them all,— and remember also that he who had a vision in Patmos beheld besides and more numerous than the 144,000 of each of the tribes of Israel "an exceeding great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and peoples and tongues," worshipping in heaven?

—The Inter Ocean.

The congress has started out under the most favorable auspices. Intense interest is manifested in its sessions, which will be stimulated by the success of the opening day. It is by far the most noteworthy of the gatherings that have been called together by the Auxiliary Association.

The Orientals have already said enough to show that they are masters of the subtleties of philosophic thought. They will dispel the crude notions that have been formed concerning them in the popular mind by the association of hideous idols with their worship. In this congress the representatives of all religions meet as fellow-seekers after truth, for a calm exposition of their several faiths, and the occasion demands of all forbearance, moderation and universal courtesy.

Another effect of the parliament of religions will be to revive the study of historical criticism as applied to the origin and authenticity of the scriptures, and the chronology of prophecies and traditions which are found in curious complexity in widely different creeds. Historical criticism has generally been considered iconoclastic. Christians of the orthodox schools do not admit, however, that historical criticism is indispensable to the validity of Christian faith, nor have they conceded that the Dutch, French or German skeptical schools, which have been equally active the last hundred years, have impaired in the slightest degree the vitality of Christian faith. It is certain, however, that historical criticism will receive a new impetus from the parliament of religions, and that men occupying advanced places as expounders of their various creeds will be called upon more strenuously than hitherto to defend their positions on the grounds of antiquity and legitimate descent.

For the first time in the history of the world representative men, admitted to be authentic exponents of their various creeds, will assemble together fraternally, not for polemical purposes but to listen each to the other in elucidation of what appears to him religious truth.

It is not likely that the parliament of religions will deeply stir the masses who adhere to the manifold creeds of Christendom, Confucianism, Buddhism, and the various offshoots of Eastern and Western traditions. The first effect of the conference will be, however, to make it more customary for churchmen throughout the world to respect their contradictory beliefs, to attribute sincerity to each other, and to maintain courtesy in dealing with controversial matters which will be a reversal of the acute and too often cruel spirit that animated religious discussions in the past. The controversial writings of the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, even when their authors were men of prodigious learning and of the highest social plane, are marred by coarseness of epithet, ruffianism of temper, and a total lack of that gentleness and sweetness which the founders of the great religions of the world, with rare exceptions, sought diligently to promote.

Crowding the Columbian year with highest glory, realizing beyond its wildest flights the dream of Akbar, the world's parliament of religions convened in the hall of Columbus yesterday morning under circumstances so auspicious as to foretell success—a success which shall leave its mark upon all history and have tremendous influence upon the future of mankind.

Never in history has such an assemblage been drawn together. Never for any purpose have the representative scholars of Europe, Asia, Africa, and of the American conti-ment assembled together in joint convention. Never before has it been deemed possible that the world's theologians, representing the great antagonisms of religion, could be brought together in such an assemblage as yesterday graced Memorial Art Institute. But the spirit which prevailed, its generous fraternity and great kindness, destroyed at once all fears of that sort, and the opening session was a happy augury of that which is to come, and a promise of large-results from this mutual interchange of views concerning religious faith and life.

Princes of the church and political princes in the rich habiliments of their office gave to the distinguished group, who crowded the platform a picturesqueness and a liveliness of color unknown in gatherings of the plain, cold, colorless Anglo-Saxons.

RELIGIOUS RESTRICTIONS.*

The author of the appended communication is a man of liberal views. He is in matters religious and philosophical a sort of free lance. As his sentiments find mild and innocuous expression, they are herewith set forth in full form:

EDITOR JOURNAL: My home being in the country, my opportunities for hearing anything from the pulpit, beyond the ordinary orthodox and sectarian deliverances in religion, are very few. When I get a little famished I fall back on the Reviews, and often turn to Channing and Theodore Parker for refreshment. The latter I find the most deeply religious of them all. Sometimes I am stranded in Peoria of a Sunday, where from time to time I have heard Revs. Howe, Eby, Nesbit and Odell, but I have found Dr. Marsh, now of the People's church, much the most original and thought-inspiring of them all. Holmes says that after centuries of vain repetitions our religious thought and phraseology needs depolarizing. This very necessary work Dr. Marsh accomplishes with ease and completeness.

There is a large element of excellent religion eloquently taught among Protestants and Romanists. The best teachers among the Unitarians and other liberal sects have for many years inculcated a religion worthy of acceptance by wise and cultivated men and women. But the thing most woefully lacking is freedom. There is water enough, but too many dykes. There are too many fences and paddocks, too many petty custom-houses, and too much hugging of priestly privileges by preachers. Their chief aim is to preserve their church organization and prestige. Freedom the sectarians will not allow, or so much as even think of. Their young men and women would cringe with a nameless fear if found (caught?) reading the rich and succulent essays of Parker, Frothingham, Ingersoll or Savage, who teach that God has a better use for his children than to damn them forever.

The saving of souls from a place of torment has been the chief business of the Christian pulpit for 1,500 years. Incidentally it has taught moralities, but the wrath of God and fear of hell have furnished its motive and ground of appeal, and its statistics of success have been gathered, not from upright lives, but from anxious seats and baptisms and death beds. This could not continue, even under the measure of freedom we have already attained, and so the use-worn horror is losing its potency. Lecky has shown, historically, that the belief in magic and witchcraft was not broken down by agreement, but by the liberation of the human mind. In the same way the belief in supernaturalism is certain to disappear. The sticklers for dogma rather than voluntary religion insist on embargoes and restrictions, because they are well aware that with freedom it will soon be seen that this world is as much God-made and God-filled as any heavenly world of the past or future.

I have been led into this train of remarks from having heard Dr. Marsh, of the People's Church, a teacher who, it seems to me, is doing an excellent and necessary "depolarizing" of religious phraseology and the sacred books, and inculcating a religion wholesome, nourishing and absolutely free.

Unity Clubs and a Query.

EDITOR UNITY: I inclose the plan of work for our Unity Club for the coming season. While our work is a success, our ideal keeps hopefully ahead of us, and we would like to know what other Unity Clubs are doing. Is not Mr. Gannett's recent sermon on "Culture Without College" to be printed as a tract? I am sure it would be helpful to many who are deprived of the advantages of the higher education. Sincerely,

AGNES VAN VALKENBURGH.

[As a notice of the Milwaukee Unity Club is printed in "Notes from the Field," we have not here printed the program. As yet we are unable to say whether the work of giving publicity to Mr. Gannett's helpful sermon, which UNITY began, will be carried on by other agencies.—Ed.]

The Study Table

WOMAN, CHURCH AND STATE.

The full title of this book* leads one to take it up with great interest; for the subject is a very important one and one which, so far as the writer knows, has never received the consideration it deserves. But the student who turns to this book will be grievously disappointed, and we fear that the general reader will be wearied by its inartificial form and inordinate repetition. The book is far too long for the amount of matter it contains. But perhaps it will be well, before saying more about it, to hear what the author herself says:

Tired of the obtuseness of church and state; indignant at the injustice

*WOMAN, CHURCH AND STATE: A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages; with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate. By Matilda Joselyn Gage. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, 12mo., pp. 554. $2.00.

of both toward woman; at the wrongs inflicted upon one half of humanity by the other half in the name of religion; finding appeal and argument alike met by the assertion that God designed the subjection of woman, and yet that her position had been higher under Christianity than ever before,—continually hearing these statements, and knowing them to be false, I refuted them in a slight resume of the subject at the Annual Convention of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, Washington, D. C., 1878. A wish to see that speech in print having been expressed, it was allowed to appear in The National Citizen, a woman suffrage paper I then edited, and shortly afterwards in "The History of Woman's Suffrage," of which I was also an editor. The kindly reception given, both in the United States and Europe, to that meager chapter of forty pages, confirmed my purpose of a fuller presentation of the subject in book form; and it now appears, the result of twenty years' investigation, in a volume of over 550 pages.

No candid and observant man or woman but must admit that the author was justified in the feeling here expressed. Church and state have been very unjust to woman, and an almost infinite amount of twaddle has been put forth as to woman's debt to Christianity. It is also doubtless true that woman was in many respects better off in that—generally prehistoric—condition of society in which the mother was the head of the family than she has been under the family headship of the man. And had Mrs. Gage possessed the patience, the judgment, the scholarship necessary for the task, she might have won the everlasting gratitude of mankind by a careful investigation and exposition of woman's status in human history. In itself it is no reproach to her that she has not the qualifications for such a stupendous task; but it is unfortunate that having no one of the qualifications named she should have attempted so much. The great blemish of her book is that it is the brief of an advocate instead of being the inquiry of a truth-seeker. A certain case is to be made out, and everything that can strengthen a point in that case is "swallowed whole," as the boys say, while what makes against it is passed over. Equal dependence is put upon trustworthy and untrustworthy historians. So long as that which is cited answers its immediate purpose, no attention is paid to its consistency with anything else. Within two pages (14 to 16) we are cited to the customs of that low people, the Australian aborigines, as showing the priority of the matriarchate in human society, and also told that "never was justice more perfect, never civilization higher, than under the matriarchate!" Very little is really known as to what was prior, the family headship of man or of woman, or whether different peoples have had a similar history in this respect. If our earnest historians felt reasonably certain of one third of what this writer assumes to be unquestionable fact, their delight would be almost unbounded. The above is but one of numerous instances of the most extravagant assertions, made with the most perfect assurance. On page 542 we are given to understand that injustice to woman is the foundation of all crime and wrong in the world.

It is interesting to learn just what the theory of this writer is. It seems to be this. Goaded by the injustice which holds woman as an inferior, she goes to the opposite extreme, and would have it that woman should be not the equal but the superior of man (see p. 93 and elsewhere), as was the case under that fabulous creation of her imagination, the Golden Age of the Matriarch, when woman ruled and everything was lovely, civilization was at its height, and although monogamy prevailed exclusively (for she tells us [p. 16 and elsewhere] that neither polyandry nor promiscuity had any existence under the "matriarchate," that polygamy is the sign of the patriarchate as monogamy is of the matriarchate!), nevertheless the father was the inferior not only of the mother and of his daughter, but also of his own son, because the latter was nearer of kin than he to the mother. In addition to this, because Christians have appealed to Scripture to prove the inferiority of woman, she would seem to hold that Christianity is the arch-enemy of woman, and that all other religions, with the possible exception of Judaism, are infinitely superior to Christianity in this respect; and that the laws of the state are calculated to keep woman in vile slavery because the Christian Church, which is the master of the state, so wills. The fanatical Christian, who maintains that everything good in our civilization (and even everything good in the civilizations of pre-Christian peoples, that never thought of the Messiah or heard the name of Jesus) is due to Christianity, is no whit more silly and unphilosophical than is our author in her counter-absurdity. The fact is that Christianity has not in history been of such transcendent importance as its fanatical friends and no less fanatical enemies would make it. It has only been one of many factors in the complex whole of human society. A careful study of history will, we are confident, make evident that woman does not owe her emancipation to Christianity, as such. So far we are in agreement with Mrs. Gage. But it is the height of folly to maintain that woman is not better off in Christendom than in Brahmanical, Moslem and other non-Christian lands. Race, climate, material civilization, intellectual progress, all are co-factors with religion in shaping the social condition of a people, and only error can result from closing our eyes to all but one of these, or regarding one as sole cause and all the others as mere results.

But in addition to these faults the book is put together with extreme carelessness. Such errors as citing The Christian Register as an Episcopalian publication are slight, but such gross ignorance of history as is implied in the assertion that a law enacted in the reign of James and subsequently disregarded, was confirmed and re-enacted by Henry VIII., is inexcusable in a book which professes to be an essay in history. Further than this, the same things are repeated over and over again in the different chapters and frequently in the same chapter. The material is roughly thrown together, and there is far too much padding. A statement is made in the text almost in the exact words of the authority, and then repeated in full in the note; and the same note is repeated each time the statement is put in slightly different form. The notes are generally worthless for reference, not being sufficiently specific. The words are often given, but we are not told in what part of the author's works they are found, sometimes so much as the name of the book not being given. The natural conclusion is that the citations are generally made at second hand. Finally, we must complain that the proof-reading is not what it should be; witness the transposition of the references to notes on page 70—not an isolated instance. However, it is but fair to say that not all the chapters are equally bad. The latter are generally much better written than the earlier ones, and among those in the first part of the book that on Canon Law is better than the others.

It should also be said that after all deductions have been made there is a great mass of unquestionable facts presented; and these are not only true but important. It is for this reason that we have devoted so much attention to the book.

The subject matter is interesting and important, and it is greatly to be regretted that those who would be most benefited by a knowledge of these facts will be justified in refusing to read the book, because of its extravagance, or, being unable to separate the true from the false, may reject it all as untrue. THE MAGAZINES.

IN THE PACIFIC UNITARIAN for September perhaps the most noteworthy thing is a ringing word from the editor on the importance of the Sunday school. He strongly urged the church, of whose Sunday school he is Superintendent, to employ an associate minister to be Superintendent of the Sunday school, contending that a business-man like himself could not possibly do justice to the work that should be required of a Sunday-school Superintendent.

The utterances of The Twentieth Century seem to possess in a marked degree the merit of earnestness, and although we oftener disagree than find ourselves in accord with the views of editor and contributors, we do not often feel called upon to criticise its words. The article on College Settlements in the issue of September 7, by Mary F. Hyames, however, so misconceives the subject under discussion that we should like to call the attention of some settler to it, that he or she may send to the journal an explanation of the purpose, methods and personnel of social settlements.

THE LIBERAL CO-WORKER for August comes around a little late, but it is worth waiting for. Having shown our appreciation by generously helping ourselves to much that is in it, it is hardly necessary to say more here. One of the items that we believe will be generally well received by both denominations is its tabular statement of things believed in common by Universalists and Unitarians.

We have been asked by a reader to state where application is to be made for Mr. Morse's new magazine, The Start. He may be addressed at 3939 Langley avenue.

"CAR NO. —, a Romance of the Ferris Wheel," is the title of a clever little advertisement put in circulation by the wheel exhibitor. The plot is sufficient for a very tender story, but the lack of true refinement in the hero is made too evident to permit the story to be really pleasing, as it is told.

TRUTHS ABOUT MAN.

ABSTRACT OF A SERMON BY REV. G. R. DODSON, OF ALAMEDA, CAL.

The metaphysical theory of the soul and its independence of the body, is not only speculatively erroneous, but productive of disastrous moral consequences. The life of man is a complex unity; and an error in thought—that is, a wrong adjustment or attitude of the mind to the truth of things—necessarily produces morbid feelings and works out evil results in the physical and social life. Much of the misery and evil of religious history, Christian and ethnic, has been due to a false theory of the soul.

While a vague idea that there is a very close relation between mind and body in life as we know it is quite general, yet the old metaphysical theory is the one that is still substantially held. Although religion and metaphysics have been supposed to go together, and although it may be unusual to mention physiology in the pulpit, it nevertheless seems to me to be both necessary and expedient to make some attempt to displace error by such truth as we have been able to demonstrate.

All thought and feeling, the finest and most spiritual as well as the coarsest, are accompanied by activity in the brain and nervous system. This activity is not in the brain alone; but in each pulse of feeling the process begun there reverberates throughout the nervous system. Now, each of these nerves is connected at one end with a muscle or gland, and every time they are traversed by currents of nervous energy each muscle or gland is affected; that is, the entire organism in each and all its parts is moved. Except in the case of the facial muscles, these movements are generally so minute as to be usually unnoticed. Thus we think with our bodies. In thought, though the brain is of chief importance, the whole body is involved.

Further, the nervous activity that produces the thought of an action or the desire to perform it is the same as that which produces the action itself, the difference being simply a difference in strength. Many times there is not even this difference, and the thought or desire fails of expression simply because antagonized by other thoughts and desires.

A faint excitation which produces the thought needs only become stronger, or unhindered, to result in the action itself. Indeed, as Prof. James says, it always does produce the movement in a small degree. "Every" mental "representation of a movement awakens in some degree the movement itself; and awakens it in a maximum degree when it is not kept from doing so by an antagonistic representation simultaneously present to the mind."

Thought and feeling are thus actions which do not get beyond the limits of our own bodies. Thought is incipient, nascent action; desire is the doing begun. Anger, for example, is a movement that does not get beyond the clenched fists, red face, set teeth, etc. Thus, we do not with some spiritual something think a thought and then use the body to express it. All feeling is like anger in that it is the conscious accompaniment of a movement already begun.

How this re-enforces the teaching of Jesus that not the overt act alone constitutes the crime but that the sin is committed when the desire is cherished in the heart! Indeed, the desire is the action incomplete, restrained within the limits of the body. In I. John iii. 15, it is said, "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." This is physiologically true; hate is murder on the way. Lust is adultery begun.

Let us consider still other relations between morals and the nervous system. Practice makes perfect; repetition makes the action easy. Why? Simply because the nervous system becomes accustomed to act in that way. The nerve currents meet with considerable resistance at first, but by repeatedly going over the same paths they render them more pervious, "hew out" and "widen" the channels, so to speak, until they become lines of small resistance and the actions become easy.

It is the same way with thoughts: new thoughts are hard, familiar ones easy. The same reason holds good: in the one case we are accustomed to use the nervous system in the required way, in the other we are not. We think on lines—the lines the nerve currents travel through our brains.

A new thought means a new path to be cut through, and the resistance met by the nerve current is felt by us as effort. But constant thinking along certain lines at last renders it easy to think on these lines. This is the reason why the last books in a philosophical series by a profound thinker are, for those who read all, easier to understand than the first.

Put these two facts together and we have a surprising result. We have seen that in the production of an action and the thought of an action the same nerves are used and the nervous activity is the same: and repetition in each case has the same effect, and for the same reason. What is the necessary inference? This, that constant thought or desire makes the action easy. Indeed, to be ever thinking of doing anything is to be always beginning to do it. The continual use of the nervous system in thinking of some evil deed is really practicing the deed itself—is making more pervious to the nerve currents the nerve paths which would be used in the performance of the action.

The result is that some time, when off guard, the temptation (the physiological stimulus) comes, a surplus of nervous energy in the nervous centers is discharged along these lines of least resistance, and the deed is done. In this way many young people who were supposed to be the models of moral perfection have, to their own surprise as well as that of their friends, suddenly fallen. In such cases the expression of the evil desire which had before been kept within the limits of the body is simply continued and completed in the outward world. With what force come to us the words, "Blessed are the pure in heart!"

Physiological psychology, therefore, teaches with terrible force certain old moral precepts. Thought and action are one. Men cannot with impunity dally with evil. It also indicates the proper method of moral culture and conditions of moral safety. What it prescribes has been said before: Whatever things are true, honorable, just, pure, lovely and of good report,—whatever is praiseworthy and virtuous,—think on these things.

This blesses in two ways: First, the nerve paths used in true thinking and noble sentiment become lines of least resistance, while those used in ignoble thought and feeling fall into decay by disuse, become more resistant, become, like unused, neglected roads, difficult to travel. It thus becomes constitutionally easy to live nobly, and organically difficult to do wrong. In the second place, when evil thoughts are aroused they are at once automatically negated (inhibited) by good impulses, and without any action of the will there is an instinctive recoil from the evil suggestion.

World's Fair Notes

ECHOES OF THE PARLIAMENT.

The following passages are clipped from the reports of the local press, which has shown its appreciation of the Parliament of Religions by the large space given to the sessions during the entire opening week. Some of the reports were from manuscript; others were more or less brief abstracts of extemporaneous addresses delivered. But all alike reflect at least the spirit of what was said, and we are sure that these clippings will be of interest to the readers of UNITY. We wish we could reproduce the tones of voice, the play of earnest conviction or kindly humor on the countenances of the speakers, and the response of the large congregation to every expression of high thought and generous sentiment. F. L. H.

In this congress each system of religion stands by itself in its own perfect integrity, uncompromised in any degree by its relation to any other. We seek to unite in this congress all religion against irreligion; to make the golden rule the basis of this union, and to present to the world the substantial unity of many religions in the good deeds of the religious life. Without controversy or any attempt to pronounce judgment upon any matter of faith or worship or religious opinion, we seek a better knowledge of the religious condition of all mankind, with an earnest desire to be useful to each other and to all others who love truth and righteousness.

We are met together to-day as men, children of one God, sharers with all men in weakness and guilt and need, sharers with devout souls everywhere in aspiration and hope and longing. We are met as religious men, believing even here in this capital of material wonders, in the presence of an exposition which displays the unparalleled marvels of steam and electricity, that there is a spiritual root to all human progress. We are met in a school of comparative theology which I hope will prove more spiritual and ethical than theological; we are met, I believe, in the temper of love, determined to bury at least for the time our sharp hostilities, anxious to find out wherein we agree, eager to learn what constitutes the strength of other faiths and the weakness of our own; and we are met as conscientious and truth-seeking men in a council where no one is asked to surrender or abate his individual convictions, and where, I will add, no one would be worthy of a place if he did. We are here as members of a Parliament of Religions over which flies no sectarian flag, which is to be stamped by no sectarian war-cries, but where for the first time in a large council is lifted up the banner of love, fellowship, brotherhood. We all feel that there is a spirit which should always pervade these meetings, and if any one should offend against this spirit let him not be rebuked publicly or personally; your silence will be a graver and severer rebuke.

We admire the wonders of the new city that has sprung up on the southern end of our great Chicago, but when learned men, men representing the thought of the world on religion, come to tell us of God, and of his truth, and of life, of death, of immortality, of the judgment, of justice, of goodness, and of charity, then I listen to what will surpass infinitely what the most learned, aye, the most able, men may tell us of material things.

Those men that have come together will tell of their systems of faith, as has been well said by Dr. Barrows, without one atom of surrender of what each one believes to be the truth for him. No matter how we may differ in feeling or in religion, there is one thing that is common to us all and that is our common humanity; and those men representing the races and the faith of the world, meeting together to talk together and seeing one another, will have for each other in the end a sincere respect and reverence and a cordial and fraternal feeling of friendship.

—Archbishop Feehan (Roman Catholic).

I would be wanting in my duty as a minister of the Catholic church if I did not say that it is our desire to present the claims of the Catholic church to the observation and if possible to the acceptance of every right-minded man that will listen to us, but we appeal only to the tribunal of conscience and intellect.

I feel that in possessing the faith I possess—a treasure compared with which all the treasures of this world are but dross—instead of having those treasures in my own coffers, I would like to share them with others, especially as I am none the poorer in making the others the richer. But, though we do not agree in matters of faith, as the most reverend Archbishop of Chicago has said, there is one platform on which we all stand united. It is the platform of charity, of humanity, and of mutual benevolence. And as ministers of Christ we have him for our great model in this particular. Our blessed Christ came upon this earth to break down the wall or partition that separated race from race, people from people, and tribe from tribe, and as man is one people, one family, we recognize God as our common father, and this Christ as our brother.

—Cardinal Gibbons.

When I read the program of this parliament of religions I saw it was simply the re-echo of the great consummation which the Indian Buddhists held twenty-one centuries ago in the great city of Backnoo. For seven months they held their great meetings, and there were present 1,000 brilliant scholars of India who took part in the deliberations. To the influence of that congress, held twenty-one centuries ago, can be traced that which is to-day a living power, because wherever you go in Buddha's country to-day you will find love, compassion, tolerance. I am sure we shall all take away from this place, from the work of this congress, the thought that this is the grand work at the close of the nineteenth century. Then, friends, if you are serious, if you are altruistic, this program can be carried out, and the twentieth century will see the pages open up upon a new era of gentleness and kindness and which it is my hope may continue for twenty centuries to come.

—H. Dharmapala (Buddhist, Ceylon).

We all have a common Creator, without any distinction between who are great, who are rich or poor, the ruler and the ruled. All men have a common Creator, without any distinction on account of climate or race, without any distinction on account of nationality, descent or ancestry or name or family title. All men have a common Creator, and consequently, a common father in God Almighty.

—Archbishop Dionysios Latas (Greek Church).

The great sage of China believes that duty was summed in reciprocity, and I believe the word "reciprocity" finds a new meaning and glory in the proceedings of this historic parliament. I am glad that the great empire of China accepted the invitation by which she was called to be present, and I am sure that the meeting will be one of friendly lines, in which one will learn from the other lessons of charity and good-will.

—Hon. Pung Kwang Yu (Confucian).

I fervently believe that the bell that tolled this morning in honor of the representatives of the different religions of the earth, in this parliament assembled, is the death knell to all fanaticism; that it is the death knell to all persecution with the sword or the pen, and to all uncharitable feelings between brethren wending their way to the same goal, but through different ways.

—Suan Vivekananda (Brahmin, India).

A pious thought animated Christopher Columbus when he directed the prow of his ship towards this land of his dreams; to convert the natives to the faith of the Roman Catholic Church; a still more pious thought animates you now, noble Americans, because you try to convert the whole of humanity to the dogma of universal toleration and fraternity. Old Armenia blesses this undertaking of young America, and wishes her to succeed in laying on the extinguished volcanoes of religious hatreds the foundation of the temple of peace and concord.

—Prof. Minas Tcheraz (Armenia).

You have convoked here, in that city which is itself a wonder of human industry and, as it were, a modern Phoenix springing again from its ashes, representative men of all great religions of the earth, in order to discuss in courteous and pacific terms the eternal problem of divinity, which is the torment, but also the sign of sovereignty of man over all animate beings. I present you the hearty messages of all friends of religious liberty in France and my best wishes for your success. May God, the Almighty Father, help you in your noble undertaking. May He give us all his spirit of love, of truth, of liberty, of mutual help and unlimited progress, so that we may become pure as he is pure, good as he is good, loving as he is love, perfect as he is perfect, and we shall find in these moral improvements the possession of real liberty, equality, and fraternity.

Of all the studies of the present day the most serious, interesting and important is the study of comparative religion, and I believe that this object lesson, which it is the glory of America to have provided for the world, will do far more than any private study in the seclusion of the student's own home. The reports of our proceedings, which will be telegraphed all over the world, will help men by thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands to realize the truth of those grand old Bible words that God has never left himself without witness. It cannot be,—I say, it cannot be,—that that "new commandment" was inspired when uttered by Christ, and was not inspired when uttered as it was uttered by Confucius and by Hillel. The fact is, all religions are fundamentally more or less true and all religions are superficially more or less false. And I suspect that the creed of the universal religion, the religion of the future, will be summed up pretty much in the words of Tennyson, words which were quoted in that magnificent address which thrilled us this morning: "The whole round world is every way Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

—Prof. Alfred Momerie, D. D. (Anglican Church).

Ideas do not belong to any one country. They are the common property of mankind. —Principal Grant.

I cannot help doing honor to the Congress of Religions held here in Chicago as the result of the patient effort of those philanthropic brothers who have undertaken this, the greatest meeting ever held. It was fourteen years ago that I expressed in my country the hope that there should be a friendly meeting between the world's religionists, and now I realize my hope with great joy. In the history of the past we read of repeated and fierce conflicts between different religious creeds, which sometimes ended in war. But that time has passed away and things have changed with advancing civilization. I trust that these meetings will gradually increase the fraternal relations between the different religionists in investigating the truths of the universe and be instrumental in uniting all religions of the world and in bringing all hostile nations into peaceful relations by leading them to the way of perfect justice.

—Archbishop Shibata (High-priest of Shintoism, Japan).

Our monotheism stands upon all scriptures. That is our theological principle. It was not the Christian missionaries that drew our attention to the Bible; it was not the Mohammedan priests who showed us the excellent passages in the Koran; it was no Zoroastrian who preached to us the greatness of his Zend-Avesta; but there was in our hearts the God of infinite reality, the Source of inspiration of all the books, of the Bible, of the Koran, of the Zend-Avesta, who drew our attention to his excellences as revealed in the record of holy experience everywhere.

—P. C. Mozoomdar (of the Brahmo-Samaj, Calcutta).

I represent the Theistic movement in India, known in my native country as the religion of the Brahmo Samaj. The fundamental principles of the Theistic Church in India are universal love, harmony of faiths, unity of prophets; or rather unity of prophets and harmony of faiths. The reverence that we pay the other prophets and faiths is not mere lip loyalty, but it is the universal love for all the prophets and all forms and shades of truth. We not only try to learn in an intellectual way what those prophets have to teach, but to assimilate and imbibe these truths that are very near our spiritual being.

—B. B. Nagarkar, of the Brahmo-Samaj, Bombay.

To Chicago belongs the credit of having rendered her World's Fair a world's university of arts and industries, of science and letters, of learning and of religions. Humanity, in all its manifestations of life and labor, in all its aspirations and problems, is there exhibited and finds a voice. And the grandest and most inspiring feature of the unique spectacle is the Religious Parliament, which, in trumpet tones, resonant with joy and hope, peals forth the great truth of the brotherhood of man based upon the fatherhood of God.

—K. Kohler, D. D. (Jewish Rabbi, New York).

I welcome you, my sisters, who have come with beating hearts, high hopes, and reverent purposes to this great feast, to participate not only in this parliament but in the great congresses which are associated with it. Isabella of Spain had a prophetic vision. She beheld not only a new world, but beheld a new future and an emancipated and intelligent womanhood and a strengthened religion to bless the world. I welcome you all to the fulfillment of her grand vision.

—Rev. Augusta J. Chapin, D. D. (Universalist).

I have been here for some time, and I have asked the question over and over again: Where is religious America to be found, Christian America? To-day I see it all around me. You have given me a welcome. I will give you a greeting from my country. When we meet one another in my land the first thing we say to each other is "Peace be with you." I say it to you to-day in all sincerity, in all love. I feel to-day that the great banner over us is the banner of love.

—Miss Jeannie Serabji (Parsee convert to Christianity).

I am one of those that have not lost faith in the possibilities of Africa. I know that every foot of land and every drop of water has been appropriated by the governments of Europe and every man's possibility been locked up in their desire for gain. But yet I remember, in the light of history, these same nations parceled out the American continent. America had her Jefferson; Africa in the future will bring forth her Jefferson that will read the Declaration of Independence to Africans. We meet you, sir, at this Parliament of Religions, the first gathering of the races since Noah landed from the ark!

—Bishop Arnett (African Methodist Episcopal).

I speak to such as will understand me when I say that Christ is to be put among the poets—not the singers of rhymes nor the builders of epics, but those who see into the heart of things and feel the breath of the Spirit—such are the poets.

The poets are the defenders of the Faith, the prophets and priests whose succession never fails. Leslie Stephen writes an enticing plea for agnosticism, and seems to sweep the universe clean of faith and God; we read Tennyson's "Higher Pantheism," "The Two Voices," "In Memoriam," or Browning's "Saul," "Death in the Desert," or Wordsworth's odes on Immortality and Duty, or Whittier's "My Psalm," and the plea for agnosticism fades out. In some way it seems truer and better to believe.

—Theodore T. Munger, D. D. (Congregationalist).

The White City at the other end of Chicago is not the parent of architecture; architecture is the parent of the White City. And the temples and priests and rituals that cover this round globe of ours have not made religion; they have been born of the religion that is inherent in our souls. Religion is not the exceptional gift of exceptional geniuses. It is not what men have sometimes thought poetry or art or music to be—the thing that belongs to the few favored great men. It is the universal characteristic of humanity. It belongs to man as man.

—Lyman Abbott, D. D. (Congregationalist).

Back to the primal unity where man appears as a child of God before he is Christian or Jew, Brahmin or Buddhist, Mohammedan or Parsee, Confucian, Taoist, or aught beside—back to this must we go if we will be loyal to our kind, loyal to that imperishable religion that is born of human souls in contact with the spirit. Who will say that any man ever sincerely chose any religion for any other than a good purpose? It is incredible. And before the spectacle of an immortal soul seeking for and communing with its God, all hostilities must pause. No missiles must be discharged. —E. L. Reesford, D. D.

Buddhism teaches that all things are one. This theory seems now to be practically realized. For all the great religions here represented, with their clothes stripped off and their heart laid bare, seem to be thrilling with the same life-blood. The idea of universal brotherhood pervades them all. All religions are one, if they have the honor to be religions at all, and probably, for the first time in authentic history, this parliament will make manifest that glorious fact. —H. Toki (Buddhist, Japan).

The real religion of the twentieth century will inculcate purity of body, that the soul may have fit tool,—men as chaste as women, and the frame of men not drugged, not paralyzed, not poisoned. The real religion of the twentieth century will rule its social administration—from everyone according to his ability to everyone according to his necessity. There is its method. The real religion of the twentieth century will care for the health and strength of all its children. It is to be ruled by faith and hope and love. It is a civilization governed by the Holy Spirit. It is life governed by ideas.

THE UNITARIAN CONGRESS.

Saturday, Sept. 16, was the Columbian day of the Unitarian Congress. The meeting was held in the Hall of Washington. Dr. Edward Everett Hale presided throughout the day. The appointed program was considerably broken by the inability of some speakers to be present; but Rev. S. R. Calthrop's admirable and characteristic paper upon "The Problem of Evil" was brought forward from Wednesday, and most interesting extemporaneous addresses were made by several foreign guests,—Prof. G. Bonet-Maury, of France; Rev. S. A. Stelntal, of England; J. A. S. Grant Bey, of Egypt; Rev. B. B. Nagarkar, of Bombay; Rabbi Gottlieb, of New York; V. R. Ganthi, of India; Mrs. Chant, and others. Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, of Providence, R. I., gave an address upon "The Church of the Spirit," marked throughout by noble thought, in clear and compact speech, a voice from the mount of wide vision. In the absence of Rev. Augustus M. Lord, of Providence, R. I., his forwarded paper was read by Rev. W. W. Fenn, and an excellent paper it was, presenting "The Unitarian Movement in Literature" in a large way, not boastful or self-satisfied, but recognizing the forces at work in our literature of the last half-century. Dr. F. G. Peabody, of Cambridge, presented "The Unitarian Movement in Philanthropy," a very interesting and detailed report of the growth of many present methods and organizations out of seeds earlier sown by men and women of Unitarian sympathies, whose lives were devoted to charity in large and wise ways.

The Unitarian Congress, like all others, has to compete with many rival meetings of great attractiveness, while the Parliament of Religions brings forward each day men and women whom all would like to see and hear. But the attendance on Saturday, while small in comparison with the large hall, was widely representative in space, and the attention and evident interest of those present proved the occasion one of profit to all. It was, moreover, a time of renewed friendships, new acquaintance, and hearty fellowship throughout.

Notice of Fellowship.

THE COMMITTEE ON FELLOWSHIP OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

The Rev. H. Digby Johnston, formerly of the Reformed Episcopal Church, having sustained a thorough examination covering all points bearing upon his qualifications for the work of the Unitarian ministry; and having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship that he is in all respects worthy of their approval, is hereby commended to the fellowship of our ministers and the confidence of our churches.

W. L. CHAFFIN, Chairman.

D. W. MOREHOUSE, Secretary.

New York, Sept. 7, 1893.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Services were resumed here Sept. 3. On account of other urgent duties in the church, Mr. C. E. Crain has resigned as superintendent. He has served faithfully for two years, or since the reorganization of the school. Mr. C. F. Zimmerman, principal of the Seventeenth District school, has been chosen superintendent and he has accepted the position. We look forward to an interesting year. The Woman's Society, The Social Life Club, and The Emerson Guild will begin their meetings at the regular times. The Unity Club begins its year's work the latter part of September and will close the first part of May—a change in the time which will be generally acceptable. The plan of work is somewhat changed. There will be a general meeting on the first Wednesday evening of each month, for which speakers rather than subjects will be chosen. The meeting will be open on Oct. 4th, by Prof. A. J. Rogers, who will speak on "Science and Invention." The other work will consist of two sections, one on "American Literature," and one on "Evolution." The literature section will consider Whittier, Irving, Emerson, Lowell, Hawthorne, Longfellow, Channing and Holmes. The evolution Section will take Darwin's "Descent of Man," Romanes' "Darwin and After Darwin" and other books as a basis. There will also be papers on appropriate subjects and discussions. The section is under the general charge of Miss Hattie Merrill. The Unity Club is open to all. A membership fee of one dollar is charged. The Denominational Committee of the Woman's Society, with the co-operation of Kenosha friends, has arranged for holding services in Kenosha on Sunday evenings for a while. Among the many good things which the Woman's Society is doing is the fitting out of a nurse's room in the new cottage at the Isolation Hospital, and the furnishing of the needed clothing for the hospital.

—Liberal Co-Worker.

Janesville, Wis.—Rev. Sophie Gibb continues her ministerial work in All Souls Church for another year. This result was reached by a unanimous vote at the annual meeting of the All Souls Society, held at the church parlors recently. The meeting was the largest ever held by this society. Every member of the church was well pleased with the work of their pastor during the two years she has labored with the society, and it was but a fitting recognition of this work that the society extended her a unanimous call to remain another year.

Washta, Iowa.—Miss Safford, of Sioux City, has done right royal missionary work during her summer vacation by proclaiming the gospel of reasonableness in a number of neighboring towns, to the inhabitants of whom it has been indeed glad tidings. She gave her second sermon in this place Aug. 27, her subject being, "Why I am a Unitarian." The hall in which the meeting was held—the churches were shut tight, of course—was filled to overflowing with the most intelligent and appreciative audience ever assembled in the town. Miss Safford has an almost faultless manner of speaking and the rare faculty of winning the hearts of all with whom she comes in contact. About twenty-five of the best people of the town and country remained after the meeting and pledged themselves to help support a liberal religious organization in the town. We hope soon, in connection with our county town, Cherokee, to be able to support a minister; and in the meantime we expect to hold lay services, with an occasional sermon from Miss Safford as her own church and strength will permit.

W. B. CHAPMAN.

Everett, Wash.—During his vacation Rev. Wm. E. Copeland, of Stockton, preached twice, with a fortnight's interval, at Everett. At his evening service the first day about three times as many were out as in the morning, and twenty-three of them at once organized the Unity Church of Everett, for the worship of God and the service of man, inviting to their fellowship all who love the right and seek the truth.

Ware, Mass.—Rev. Victor E. Southworth has resigned his pastorate.

A Brain and Nerve Tonic, Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. E. W. ROBERTSON, Cleveland, O., says: "I can cordially recommend it as a brain and nerve tonic, especially in nervous debility, nervous dyspepsia, etc., etc."

TRUE MANHOOD.

It is not always the coat that tells,
Nor the collar your friend may wear;
It is not always the shine of the shoe,
Nor the finished touch of his hair.

It is not all in a silken hat,
Nor the fitting nest of his gloves;
It is not merely his cultured air,
Nor the circle in which he moves.

It is not his temper, his pride nor smile,
Nor yet his worshipful mien;
It is not even the name he bears
In a world that is shallow and mean.

Ah, no, after all, 'tis the man himself,
As he stands with his God alone,
'Tis the heart that beats beneath the coat,
The life that points to the throne.

The eye that cheers with its kindly glance,
'Tis the arm 'round a brother cast;
The hand that points to a hope beyond,
'Tis a love that endures to the last.

UNDER PEACH BOUGHS.

A cold, drifting rain had fallen all the long May day. In the gray twilight I stood under the peach trees, whose blossoming boughs spread above like a sunset cloud astray in the mist. The vivid, pure colors of the blossoms in the dimness and their faint, subtle odor on the damp air seemed the expression of a sentient being. They seemed to be asking the meaning of their existence and of the world, or was it the spirit of the tree speaking through them? Now the September sun is showering the earth with golden light and the air is warm as June. Yet the year is growing old,—old as the white, wraith-like moon far up in the blue tent of the sky, peering down upon the earth.
Grasshoppers are darting through the dry, rustling grass and the masses of golden-rod in the field wave their fragrant plumes.

Clustered over the boughs from which the yellowing leaves are dropping are the peaches, yellow and white, each with a rosy spot on the side as if a pink petal had stained it.

They are the meaning of the blossoms, whose dainty loveliness has been transmuted into those globes of sweetness. They have absorbed the wine of the summer and the hue of the sunshine is in their downy skins.
The miracle was wrought before unheeding eyes. Through Orient noons and dewy midnights the secret process went on. Sunrise and sunset gave their glow to the fruit, all gracious influences combined to its perfection, the great Universe bent to the task of producing a peach. But not simply the thing of beauty that we see and taste. The rough brown seed folded within the tinted flesh is the prize that Nature has striven for.
It is the gardener who lays the emphasis on the outside. Nature cares not for it, but works for her own.

The blossom is the beautiful thought; the fruit, the perfect deed;
the seed the embodied Hope, with limitless possibilities of beauty and use.

ALICE GORDON.

WHY?

There are some very queer sights in this world, and no doubt you would all think it very queer if you had visited a little island not far from New York, and found on it a large cage in which were white rats, kittens and a prairie dog, all living in one family.
In the bottom of the cage was a dish of rich cream, and one side of this was a tortoise-shell kitten taking her breakfast, and on the other a white rat. They gazed at each other with the most friendly expression, indeed almost affectionate.

Later in the day, curled down on the floor, taking a morning nap, was the entire family,—rats, kittens, and prairie dog. No barks, no bites, no scratches—just the best of friends.

After we started on our walk the little boy of the party asked, "Do you know why they live together that way?"

"Why?"

"Because they were born together, and always lived together."

Now, is that really the reason? If it is, how do you account for the saucy words, the quarrels, the little meanesses that make so much trouble for fathers and mothers and nurses in families where little boys and girls always lived together?— little boys and girls who love each other, and love the very ones they trouble by their sad quarrels. I wonder if one reason why the rats, prairie dog, and kittens lived so peacefully together is because they cannot talk. These little tongues, how busy and troublesome they are sometimes!

A very wise and good man has said:
"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

If the rats had insisted on crowding the prairie dog into a corner (as there were six rats and only one dog they could easily do it), probably he would fight back; the kittens would, no doubt, assist one party or the other; and good-by to peace in that cage. Instead of sleek, fat, wholesome-looking pets, there would be just so many snarling, fighting disagreeable animals that must be separated. Now they are a merry, happy crew, fed with dainty bits, and admired by all and really loved by some.

Even such animals make or mar
the happiness of those about them.
How much more little children!

DON'T WATCH THE CLOCK.

There is a deal of common sense in this story lately told of Edison, whether he said it or not. A gentleman went to the great electrician with his son, who was about to begin work as office boy in a well-known business house. The father asked Edison for a motto which the boy might take to heart in his struggle for promotion and success. After a moment's pause, Edison said, laconically: "Never look at the clock!"

Edison meant, we take it, that the man who is constantly afraid he is going to work overtime, or over-hours, doesn't stand a chance of competing with the man who clears up his desk, no matter how long it takes. The carpenter who drops his hammer uplifted above his head, when the whistle blows, is likely to remain a second-class workman all his life. The carpenter who stays fifteen minutes to finish a "job" is working toward a shop of his own.

ORDER is the sanctity of the mind, the church of the body, the peace of the city, the security of the state.
As the beams to a house, as its tones to the microcosm of man, so is order to all things.

STRENGTH grows with burdens;
make an end of sighs.

—T. W. Higginson.

MY LITTLE MAN.

I know a little hero, whose face is brown with tan,
But through it shines the spirit that makes the boy a man;
A spirit strong and sturdy, a will to win its
way,
It does me good to look at him, and watch him day by day.

He tells me that his mother is poor, and sews for bread,
"She's such a dear, good mother!" the little fellow said;
And then his eyes shone brighter—God bless the little man!—
And he added: "'Cause I love her I help her all I can."

Ah! that's the thing to do, boys, to prove the love you bear
To the mother who has kept you in long and loving care.
Make all her burdens lighter; help every way you can,
To pay the debt you owe her, as does my little man.

LESSON III.

THE CHURCH ENVIRONMENT OF JESUS.

Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?

Luke xii. 57.

*Come forth into the light of things,
Let Nature be your teacher.*

* * *

*One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can.*

* * *

*Come forth and bring with you a heart
That watches and receives.*

Wordsworth.

Picture: Christ Disputing with the Doctors. By Heinrich Hofmann (1824—).

Another picture, by Hofmann, of Jesus in the Temple is more familiar than this, but the conceptions of the two are radically different. In the more popular portrait Jesus is pointing to an open book; in this the Scribe alone is referring to the book as authority. The one shows an appeal to the book, the other an appeal from the book. Therefore this picture alone is true to the method and thought of Jesus.

To what did the Jews appeal as final authority?—To the Old Testament substantially as we have it; particularly to its first five books, the Torah, and the explanations which the teachers had given to them.

This picture is true to the fact by showing us the Jews as "the people of the book." While the Jews were in captivity it became clear to them that their God had allowed them to be punished so severely because they had not kept his laws. Consequently they resolved, on their return to Palestine, to keep his laws strictly that similar evil might not befall them again. His laws were contained in the five books of Moses, which became therefore the rule of conduct to be received without question and obeyed to the very letter. Fearing to break the law inadvertently, they "built a hedge" about it by even more rigorous enactments, that they might be on the safe side. If, for instance, the law said that forty stripes and no more might be given a criminal, it was ordained that only thirty-nine should be given, lest one might be missed in the count and so the legal number accidentally exceeded. Thus the Law with the interpretations and refinements put upon it by the scribes became a yoke which, so far from helping men bear their own burdens, was itself too heavy to be borne. The result was "an incredible externalizing of the moral and religious life." The letter killed free, spontaneous thought and conduct, the inner motives of morality were insignificant compared with conformity to an external standard, and the thinking of to-day was stifled by the thought of yesterday.

What education did Jesus have?—In the synagogue and perhaps also in school he had training in the law, but his real education was by observation of nature and human life.

Whether or not Jesus attended what we should call a day school cannot be told for certain. If he did, it was held in the synagogue, and there was no instruction save in the law. Yet in the synagogues he heard the law and the prophets read, and both there and in the streets of Nazareth listened to discussions upon the letter of Scripture. That he studied nature as a sharp, clear-eyed observer, appears from his parables, all of which are realistic in the best sense of the word. Moreover, it was not far to the great caravan road, and he may often have seen and talked with the merchants and travelers from other lands than Palestine. Most important of all, however, were his visits to Jerusalem. At the great festival seasons the city was thronged with visitors from all parts of the world, the atmosphere was electric with patriotic feeling, the habits and thoughts of the East and the West met in Jerusalem at Passover time. We can easily imagine Jesus the young man, with those marvelous perceptive powers and that mental receptivity which from the parables we know were his, moving about among the crowds, almost breathing in ideas. The hills of Galilee, the streets of Nazareth and of Jerusalem (especially at Passover time), were his chief school rooms.

Upon what authority did Jesus rely?

—He trusted Nature, human thoughts and feelings, as revelations of God.

With Jesus, as with every man whose thoughts profoundly affect the world, the method of his thinking is vastly more important than its results. While others distrusted their own intuitions and relied upon "the book," Jesus put confidence in the natural human instincts. "What man of you" —is the argument constantly employed. A good human father will find only pity in his heart when a prodigal child comes home in shame, and the Father in heaven is no less kind and merciful than a father on earth. Human relations reveal divine, and the divine treatment of men must also be human. If God makes his sun to rise upon evil and good alike, a son of God must be kind not only to the kindly but also to the unthankful and the evil. This is the method of Jesus. Even yet some of his followers have not grasped his method for they attribute to God purposes and feelings which they would condemn in a man as unjust and cruel. Whittier's is a fatal principle to much of Christian theology. And still there is the appeal to the book, when men rest upon the Bible as a final court of appeal; yet the spirit that was in Jesus prompts an appeal from the book to the spirit that is in nature and in man. Trust thyself, says Emerson, every heart vibrates to that iron string.

—"Nothing can be good in him Which evil is in me"—

Why did Jesus dare to trust himself?

—Because he felt that he was a child of God.

In the story preserved for us by Luke, which gave the subject of Hofmann's picture, it is related that Jesus spoke of God as his father. We find here, then, the nascent consciousness of that relation between man and God, which is a distinctive trait in the teaching of Jesus. The prophets had spoken of the nation, or the king representing the nation, as Son of God, and teachers before Jesus had declared the personal fatherhood of God, but it was Jesus who made the idea "current coin." And this belief is closely connected with his method. He trusted himself because he felt sure that he and God were kin. In the power of His belief he rose above the mental pettiness and moral fussiness which were all around him, and became an apostle of the free spirit. Because God is the God of nature and man is child of God, nature and man must be trusted as revelations of God.

In teaching this lesson, the attitude of the Jews towards the Law and its results in triviality and casuistry should be dwelt upon. For this purpose the 17th chapter of Geikie's "Life of Christ" is good, but there is nothing so valuable and authoritative as ss. 25—28 in Schuerer's "The Jewish People in the Time of Christ." The apocryphal accounts of Jesus as a schoolboy, which show his quick and thoughtful mind, are worth reading. See, especially, "The Gospel of Thomas." For a later development of the story of Jesus in the Temple, see the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy cc. 50-52. Especial emphasis, however, must be laid in this lesson upon the Method of Jesus, for we shall have no more important subject in the entire course.

Helen H. Gardener's New Book.

In reviewing Helen H. Gardener's first novel, Is This Your Son, My Lord?—Moncure D. Conway said, "Another thinker has been let loose upon the world." Each succeeding year has had its book from the brain and pen of this brilliant and gifted writer, and has shown that Mr. Conway was a clear sighted and correct critic.

Whether her publishers have issued a volume of essays, a book of short stories or a novel, it is equally apparent to her readers that, indeed a "thinker has been let loose upon us"; a bright and logical thinker who has the splendid courage of her convictions and does not fear to so express her thoughts that he who runs may read them.

At the International Congress of Representative Women, held recently in Chicago, the intense desire to hear what Helen Gardener had to say on any topic, resulted in packed halls, whenever she spoke, and in repeated demands for her reappearance. The first night she spoke hundreds had to be kept out of the hall for want of standing room. Hundreds of demands were made that Helen Gardener be urged to repeat the same speech in the same large hall or a larger one if it could be obtained, to enable those who had been shut out to hear her.

The enthusiasm of the men who heard her was quite as sincere and demonstrative as was that of the women, and before she left the city of Chicago she had been urged by a number of publishers to allow them to publish and distribute large numbers of copies of her speeches. Physicians called upon her and urged that this be done immediately, and professors in colleges and teachers did the same.

Steps were at once taken to put her speeches, made at this Congress, together with other of her essays, including "Sex In Brain, into book form to meet, in the readiest and cheapest way, the demand for them.

This book, entitled "Facts And Fictions Of Life," published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Monroe street, Chicago, is now ready.

Already application has been made by accredited representatives of four foreign nations to translate this book into their several languages and the demand for it is sure to be a large and increasing one, as has been for every book she has written.

Helen Gardener is the kind of thinker who does not run to mere fads. One of her reviewers has said of her work, that it is free from all personal color; has no taint of personal prejudice nor of sex bias or narrow one-sidedness. What she writes is the acme of logic glorified by the fire of sincere conviction and the generous warmth of a strong and earnest personality. It is the work of genius made practical by a rare common sense,—a genius so well balanced and so free from all eccentricity that even those who do not agree with all her conclusions are enthusiastic admirers of her and her work. This is evidenced by the fact that though she is known to be a frank and out-spoken Agnostic, yet clergymen, all over the country, urge her to read and speak in their pulpits and they preach upon her works and use her essays and books as texts for sermons to their congregations.

It is a cause of surprise to those who meet her for the first time that she is not large, that she is young and pretty, vivacious, and not at all pessimistic. She writes of the ills of life but she is as optimistic as is the surgeon, who sees the abscess and the ill it can do, and fearlessly puts in the keen cutting scalpel to cut out and to cure.

Persons who do not think very seriously, or who, as Helen Gardener says, only "think they are thinking," at odd and fugitive times, wonder how a woman, and a young woman at that, can write as Helen Gardener does unless she has had a personal experience of the things of which she writes. As if the preacher who depicts the torments of the damned must have had these torments, or that a Shakespeare must have been some thing of all of which he wrote, or that a Thackeray must have either been a Becky Sharp or had one in his family, or Dickens a Uriah Heep or a Pecksniff, or a Fagin. Of course all this is absurd,—when we come to think of it. Helen Gardener's home life with her parents was markedly simple and happy and pure and as free as possible from the troubles and ills of the world. Her married or domestic life is simply ideal. Her husband, who is a college-bred professional gentleman, is in entire harmony with all her work and all she desires to do, as she is with all he thinks and does. She has no more earnest admirer and at the same time no more careful critic. He frequently tells her she needs only to be entirely natural to be entirely irresistible. From a home where unbroken harmony and perfect good fellowship uninterruptedly reigns Helen Gardener looks out upon the world and sees the strifes and struggles and ills of life, and from her own life knows how much better all this can be,—should be and she seeks to make it so.

New Occasions.

EDITED BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

A Western journalist says:—NEW OCCASIONS is the "Arena" for the masses, with articles as able, and at a price which every working man can meet.

BOSTON IDEAS says:—NEW OCCASIONS is a periodical published West of us—Chicago—which deserves wide reading and upholding in the East. It is a journal devoted to the expression of an intelligent opinion on all the problems of the day and is open to all progressive discussion. Social and industrial progress is the aim of its consideration and right thoughtfully are current situations canvassed.

Happiness at a cost of One Cent a Day.

Books are the greatest sources of happiness within universal reach. The AMERICAN COÖPERATIVE LIBRARY now makes the world's best literature all accessible to any one, in city or country, at a rate of cost of one cent a day for a dollar book; vast numbers of books cost only one-half to one-fourth of that price; all best cloth-bound large type editions, no paper covers or small type.

Loaned Any Book you want to read, loaned to you, anywhere in the United States, for long or short time, as you desire. You can order through your county Postmaster, Newsdealer, Bookseller, neighborhood Book Club, or direct from us. You can call for any book you want.

Sold Books Sold at the lowest prices ever known. Any book supplied. A catalogue of 160 pages of choice books sent on receipt of a 2-cent stamp. A book worth reading is worth owning, if you can afford it, but many cannot afford it; and it is worth something to be able to read a book enough to see if it is worth owning, before you buy it.

Ben Hur for only 8 cents. "The Prince of India," for only 14 cents, (a $2.50 book), "David Balfour," 8 cents, "Lorna Doone," 3 cents; all of Scott's, Eliot's, Dickens's, Thackeray's and other standard authors, each 3 cents, if you can read them in seven days; these are examples; all excellent editions, no paper covered trash in small type. All the new books, a special feature.

Little Women for 8 cts., "Tom Brown at Rugby," 3 cents, "Little Lord Fontleroy," 11 cents, are other examples. It is positively cruelty to children not to give them the benefit of these and other measureless sources of happiness and good, when they can be had at such trifling cost.

Send 2 cents for 160-page Catalogue and full particulars. Please mention this paper when you write or call.

THE AMERICAN COÖPERATIVE LIBRARY,
JOHN B. ALDEN, Manager. 57 ROSE ST., NEW YORK.

In fact books cost nothing, if they increase the income of the reader more than their cost. There is not a person alive, who labors with hand or brain, who earns even $2.00 a week, who will not, by the stimulus of good books be helped more than one cent a day in his earning power. Think of that, and test it, parents, employers and workers. It is your own fault if you don't get the best books, instead of trash.

Magazines, all of them, for one cent to three cents a day, or half that after the first month, or a quarter of it after two months. It is worth more than that just to look at the pictures. Think of it, all of them, for less than the cost of one heretofore: Harper, Scribner, Century, St. Nicholas, Forum, North American, Godey, and the rest, and all the books you can read, besides, cost a patron of the AMERICAN COÖPERATIVE LIBRARY less than the subscription price of one magazine.

Hungry Readers and students generally need no longer go without books, all of them they want, and the best books, since now the best cost less than half what trash has cost heretofore.

Clergymen with small incomes, "starving" heretofore for want of access to the world's current literature, now have it all open to them—and not for personal use only, but as a power for good: organize Reading Clubs among your people and guide them in their selections—infinite power here.

Teachers may also receive and confer inestimable pleasure and benefit upon themselves and pupils, by the means now offered. Increase your earning power by reading the best books.

THE Unitarian veteran, Rev. Dr. Fay, of Pasadena, has offered to publish and distribute at his own expense a paper recently read at the Presbyterian Alliance of Southern California, by Rev. R. D. Colmery, in defense of the doctrine of endless punishment. Believing that the paper is its own best refutation, our Pasadena friend wanted to use it as a liberal tract; but his offer had not, at a recent date, been accepted.

IN a recent number of The Fortnightly Review Rev. S. A. Barnett discusses the problem of poverty in India, Japan and the United States, and from his statements it would appear that the poverty problem hardly exists in Japan. If this be so we may well go to school to Japan. He attributes the happy condition of the island empire in this respect, primarily, to the land system, which, he says, has given to every worker a holding; and, in less degree, to the love of nature which checks the tendency of modern peoples to gather in the cities, and to the likeness in the life and manners of rich and poor.

NO VOICE has been heard on the platform of the Parliament of Religions with greater satisfaction than that of Prince Serge Wolkonsky of Russia. He has brought a literary touch that reminds one of Tourgueneff's prose poems. Both the man and his words bespeak a delicate refinement, instinct with the love of man and sensitive to the divine harmony common everywhere. Though a loving child of the Greek church, his words at the Parliament have always breathed the most cosmopolitan spirit, and have shown him to be a member of the church universal. Eight of his short addresses, most of them delivered on various occasions at the Art Palace, have been privately printed by the author in a pretty little book of one hundred and twelve pages. It makes an interesting souvenir of the great Parliament, particularly to those who have been charmed by the voice and manner of this democratic son of aristocracy. The story of the carrot alone ought to make the little book a classic. A limited number of copies of this book can be obtained at UNITY office by those inclosing fifty cents and ordering at once.

THE following extracts from an editorial in the Outlook on John Tyndall well represent the spirit of the Parliament of Religions. They sound like some of the sentences uttered by Professor Momerie at the last Saturday session, which we will publish at length in these columns in due time:

What is religion?

In the realm of conduct it is practical righteousness; in the realm of thought it is perfect truthfulness. As an investigator Professor Tyndall seeks only the truth. As a teacher his sole aim is to impart the truth. As a seeker after truth he is wholly in earnest; as a communicator of truth he is absolutely candid.

* * * * *

If every modern theologian could receive, by a sudden inspiration, Professor Tyndall's openness of mind to all disclosures of truth, his earnestness of purpose in quest of truth, and his candor of statement in teaching truth, there would be an end to heresy trials; and the Church Universal would enjoy an illumination like that which used to make St. Peter's dome on Easter night a blaze of glory.

ALL SOULS CHURCH, Chicago, was the center of an interesting service on Sunday evening, Sept. 24—the ordination of Miss Florence Buck, the junior minister of the church at Cleveland, Ohio. There were present with her and taking part in this impressive service a goodly number of her sister ministers. Antoinette Brown Blackwell, the senior woman minister of the Unitarian denomination, made the opening prayer. Rev. Anna Shaw, of the Methodist church, and Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, the pastor of All Souls, made addresses. Miss Mary Safford read appropriate scripture. Miss Marion Murdoch, the colleague of the candidate, pronounced the ordination prayer; Miss Elinor Gordon gave the "charge;" and Mr. Hosmer extended the right hand of fellowship, telling her that he could speak for no church, neither the Unitarian church nor the Free Church of America, but that he welcomed her to the fellowship of the free Congregational churches and their ministers, and that, judging by the broad utterances of representatives of various religious denominations at the Parliament of Religions, he felt that he might almost venture to welcome her to the fellowship of all the churches.

THE GREAT PARLIAMENT.

Fourteen days have passed of the great conclave, at the time of our present writing, and the immense audiences have shown no perceptible decrease. Never was freer platform; never was the principle of give and take by people of widely differing opinions more freely practiced; and we might add that, in one or two instances, never were the canons of good taste, good manners, good sense and sound criticism more flagrantly violated; and still the spirit of good will, entire cordiality, and hearty hospitality was never better exemplified. The very diversity in the program has secured the delightful harmony. Here at least the great Greek and Roman churches have complimented each other. The Archbishop of Zante has divided his social attentions between Bishop Keane of the Catholic Church and Pung Kwang Yu, the most stately representative of the Empire of China. The polished sentences of Col. Higginson, winning all hearts to the spirit of free religion, were immediately followed by the impassioned periods of Bishop Dudley, of Kentucky, who declared that the "resurrection of Jesus was one of the best accredited facts in the history of humanity." The representatives of the non-Christian religions—we ought rather to say extra-Christian religions—have made most unwelcome statements concerning Christian missions and missionaries, and their words have been graciously received. While, on the other side, Joseph Cook has defiantly demanded of the Pagans to wash clean the "blood-red band of Lady Macbeth," insinuating that Christianity could do it without settling the previous question as to whether that lady deserved such prompt immunity from her crime as he offers her. And a missionary by the name of Post, from the East, undertook to counteract the desire for fair play and just appreciation even of the Mohammedans by reading from the Koran the most unsavory bits he could find,—and nobody retaliated by compiling a scandalous mess, which might easily be done, from the Christian's Bible.

Three days remain of the great parliament at present writing. Perhaps it is well that it is to last no longer, for if physical endurance could hold out we fear that spiritual grace might give way. After a while the earlier Adam might assert itself and controversy might break through harmony. But one thing is sure: the dominant spirit as well as the final lesson of this phenomenal event is fraternity, progress, and unity.

But the editor, in common with everybody in Chicago, is too busy with the Parliament at the present time to attempt to report it, much less to estimate the immeasurable thing.

THE UNITARIAN CONGRESS.

Last week we spoke rather severely of the disappointments in the program caused by the non-appearance of those who through correspondence and publication had given the public a right to expect their attendance. This week it is but just to say that considering the peculiarly distracting circumstances and the extent of the program, the place of meeting, and all, the attendance on the part of the promised speakers was probably as high as such meetings generally yield, perhaps higher. Of some forty-five different persons named in the program who were expected to be present in person, there were but seven absentees, and four of these sent their papers, leaving but three who utterly disappointed. Mr. Williams of New York and Mr. Lord of Providence were both detained by illness, always an uncounted element in every program. Of the meetings themselves it is to be said that, as with all the denominational and attendant congresses, the tremendous attractions at Columbus Hall, where the main Parliament was in session, absorbed most of the attendance and much of the enthusiasm, as it well deserved to do. And Unitarians more than any other denomination can well rejoice over this fact; for in the Parliament they find such a publication of their central principles, such a recognition of their inspiration, as never before was secured.

While the special program was being carried out last week in some of the side halls, the Unitarians themselves were in attendance in large numbers at the Parliament both as listeners and as speakers. Of some two hundred and fifty-eight names which appear in the published program of the Parliament, at least seventeen of them are recognized Unitarians. And ten out of these seventeen speakers were Unitarian women.

Of the Unitarian program itself it is also to be remembered that it was arranged not so much for popular attractiveness at the time as for permanent publication. It was hoped to secure a series of papers that would prove not an inadequate photograph of Unitarianism up to date; and we are glad to be able to report that arrangements have been made for a speedy publication of these papers by George H. Ellis of Boston. It is estimated that it will make a volume of four hundred pages, and it is hoped it can be offered at the low price of one dollar, in paper, so that many may possess themselves of this hand-book which will probably prove the most available exposition of the Unitarian movement for some years to come. The local and advisory committees at their Monday meeting elected Revs. Solon W. Bush of Boston, W. W. Fenn of Chicago, and Celia P. Woolley of Geneva as a committee to edit this volume. And we trust that the volume will be pushed with as much haste as is consistent with good work, and that the studies that were missed from the program will be secured and incorporated in the volume.

But the meetings themselves were far from being unimportant or unfruitful. The attendance at many of the sessions was excellent and the interest admirable. Although it was manifest that Unitarianism was away from home, it was good for our Eastern friends to find themselves for a few days so far away from Boston and to realize what an unimportant and secondary place we occupy in the world of religious thought and feeling outside of New England. It is more and more manifest that Unitarians are often prone to mistake effect for cause, and forget that the forces that gave them being are at work liberalizing and humanizing great masses of people who are not now and never will be known by the Unitarian name. It is indeed true that he is the best Unitarian who is least Unitarian. Unitarians were most concerned at Chicago not with the question of how to magnify the Unitarian name, but how to lose it in that larger thing, the free, liberal church of America and of the world, which alone will do justice to Unitarian thought and embody the true Unitarian spirit.

ONE INFLAMING CAUSE OF EXTRAVAGANCE.

The fabulous prices paid for real estate in fashionable localities, recently cited by Mr. Ward McAllister, is but one of the many items of wild and senseless expenditure indulged in by the American people. The extravagances of the millionaires would not so much concern the nation at large, perhaps, if they were not so widely reported by the newspapers of the country, and did not lead to imitation of their follies by the moderately wealthy, and did not add to the insane desire for money among the younger business men everywhere. These daily reports of fashionable follies, these incessant letters, written for the masses, describing the homes, the equipage, the dress, the jewels, the entertainments of the rich, are demoralizing to the last degree. Any paper desiring the real welfare of the nation should cease their publication at once and forever. They inflame the minds of poor people, they inspire a desire for money in thousands of readers who have been well content with moderate prosperity heretofore, they lead silly women to importune weak husbands for a style of living they cannot afford, they are indirectly the cause of much of the wild speculation, the gambling, the embezzlements of which we hear so much day by day. They may make the groundlings laugh, but they as certainly make the judicious grieve. Let a battle against this pernicious form of American snobbery be instituted at once by every publication of influence, and we shall soon see a change for the better in the tone of general society in the smaller cities and country places. Now every family, almost, is influenced by these accounts of folly and wild expenditure, to a greater or less degree. These fashion letters that crowd every paper read by women, which describe only toilets which can be worn by the very rich and which can be made only by the most expensive dressmakers, tempt thousands of women of moderate means to buy what they cannot afford, to employ modistes whose charges are simply robbery, and to constantly desire what they cannot possibly have, thus bringing domestic discord into homes that might have been peaceful and happy. Contentment of the old-fashioned kind, with simple dress, moderate expenditure in entertaining and a quiet style of living generally, seems to be almost a lost art. Could we blot out at once the fashionable intelligence, and the fashion letters from the public prints, it would be the first step toward a revival of the more sensible ideas of our fathers and mothers. Now there is not one family out of ten that is not extravagant in proportion to its means; and that is why we are in the throes of the present perilous panic.

THE WATER LILY.

O star on the breast of the river,
O marvel of bloom and grace,
Did you fall straight down from heaven,
Out of the sweetest place?
You are white as the thought of an angel,
Your heart is steeped in the sun,
Did you grow in the Golden City,
My pure and shining one?
Nay, nay, I fell not out of heaven,
None gave me my saintly white;
It slowly grew from the blackness
Down in the dreary night.
From the ooze of the silent river
I won my glory and grace.
White souls fall not, O my poet:
They rise to the sweetest place.

DR. CARL PETERS, the eminent African explorer who has done wonders for the opening up of Eastern Africa, has prepared for the October Forum an article on "Prospects of Africa's Settlement by Whites." Dr. Peters is a great friend of Emin Pasha, but not an enthusiastic admirer of Stanley; and he draws a vivid picture of the lately explored regions of the Dark Continent, and predicts that in times not far remote Africa will be honeycombed with European settlements.

Words of Wisdom.

The Unitarians and Universalists are in profound agreement in regard to many vital principles of Christian faith. The purely Theistic and Ethical elements which are basal in all truly Christian convictions have for the years of a generation had substantially the same statement in both of the denominations. It is but fair to say that in the defining and formulating of these principles the work of the Unitarian divines has been very dominant; for their service the Universalists are under a debt of great obligations. To think of suppressing such an acknowledgment would be both ungrateful and futile. It may be added that the New Orthodoxy in these latter days is teaching, and that the Swedenborgians all along have taught, substantially the same fundamental doctrines. Now it is in this general statement that some measure of practical co-operation is inevitable. They who agree must walk together in all the particulars of the agreement. To attempt to belittle or to put barriers to this form or degree of co-operation, is to be factious and self-stultifying.

A SMALL colored girl, a veritable Topsy in originality, abruptly paused one day in her ministrations, dust brush in hand and demanded of her startled mistress: "What did you say was de Lord's las' name?" The bewildered lady, who has never presumed to say anything on that subject, replied that she did not know, but was assured "O, yes; you taught it to me you'se'f; it's in the Bible;" and was further requested to "Jus' say the Lord's Prayer an' I'll show you." She accordingly began the obedient repetition of the Lord's Prayer, and upon reaching the petition: "Hallowed be Thy name," a dusky forefinger was pointed at her in triumph: "Didn't I tell you? Dat's 'Is las' name—'Hallowed.'" "

THE London Inquirer, commenting on an article in the Fortnightly Review, entitled "Missionaries in China," says that candidates for these missionary positions ought to pass, beside their theological examination, a "stiff examination in good sense." "A little of this would be worth a good deal more than bushels of zeal or tons of correct doctrine." "When we find a missionary going to a temple dedicated to Confucius, and bidding the assembly give over 'the folly and sin of worshipping deceased men;' of another stating that 'Confucius is in hell;' of another asking for gun boats to enforce preposterous demands,—we cannot help feeling that the right men have not been sent, and that of these it cannot be said, 'How lovely are the messengers that bring us the gospel of peace.'" IMMANENT PERFECTION.

O God, God!—From a thousand muttered woes
 Man's breath ascends and beats upon the wall
 That faith, betrayed by wingless reason, built Between man's spirit and the soul of all!
 They hide their faces, red with fancied guilt,
 In hands more red with blood of fancied foes,
 While red with blood and fire the altar ceaseless glows.
 The stars gleam on unshaken overhead;
 No shape unearthly on the midnight flood Drops through the prayer-rent ether from the skies;
 Yet ever from our tortured doubt of God
 Pain wrings anew His meed of sacrifice.
 Let be! And in our hearts make shrines instead Where some prophetic ear, perchance, may hear it said:—
 Alas, that men still vainly seek for me
 Who breathe not else but in their common breath;
 Who live not else but in their blood and brain,—
 Draw nearer only in their own fond faith
 That ever prays, nor ever prays in vain,
 And leave them but when unbelief's wild sea Takes them, and drowning hope forgets what God should be!
 They look for me above, but never heed
 The voice that inward whispers, I am nigh:
 As near to you as thought, for I am Thought:
 As near as he you love when eye holds eye,
 For I am Love!—Me, whom their life has brought To life, they put away, and deem they need
 A God between them and their God to intercede.
 Man's eye pursues me, loses me, returns.—
 Discovers faded footprints here and there.
 Lo here, he cries, is order, beauty, love:
 There must be God!—Lo, here is grief and care
 And wrong and death: there must be God above!

In nature's broken mirror he discerns
 My form, and hoards the fragments in his earthen urns.

For me man yearns, and travails to define

The thing he feels when in the night alone

He hears the storm-lashed sea about him break:

When in a dying hand he lays his own:

When after grief he closes eyes that ache

And leans an unresisting breast on mine.

'Tis thus man lends me form, embodying the Divine.

Seek me in soulless matter; there I brood:

Seek me in law, for there 'tis I who move;

Seek me in air, in light, in frost and fire:

In sentient life, for there I breathe, I love:

In man, for there first conscious I aspire!

Seek me in maidenhood and motherhood,—

Nay, in thyself, for there I form the thought of God.

KINDLINGS.

To set about "doing good" in that predetermined, mechanical way which considers only the object and not at all the natures with which one has to deal, is commonly a most discouraging and ineffective method of bringing about the results at which the philanthropic effort is aimed. The would-be benefactor does not see why his benevolent purposes meet with so little acknowledgment and elicit no gratitude. It may never have occurred to him that it is self-love rather than fellow-love which is the mainspring of his charitable endeavor, and that he gets only what he ministers to—his own self-appreciation. After all, it must be love and sympathy for one's kind that teaches him the true thing to do in assistance of his brother in need. There can be no mechanical, loveless discharge of a duty that shall be satisfying and worthy of his powers. To be quick and alive to every claim of humanity will inform a man at every point on the action that is wisest for him to take, and though his measures may seem erring to others his surest guidance must be an unselfish love. And when we talk of love we do not mean that limited affection which regards but one aspect of human welfare, and is blind to those wider bearings which make the individual but a part of the whole. It would modify our notions of right and justice could we see, as the Infinite sees, the universal good which is compassed never in any striving for personal benefit and blessing alone, but only in the broadest seeking of the ends which minister to the highest interests of all.

We are trying to compass the Eternal Plan in too small a space, and we are giving it very human limitations indeed. Impossible as it is for the finite mind to measure the infinite, we may not sketch, with any attempt at completeness, the scheme of our overruling Providence. At the best we catch but fractional glimpses of the stupendous Whole. Why should we spend our power in weaving theological systems, when in living day by day God's clearly revealed laws we may come into a clearer apprehension of the Divine motive of creation? Just the law of love—the Golden Rule fulfilled—would give us closer entrance to heaven than all our fruitless speculations about that place.

It is a mistake to suppose that the subject we contemplate from time to time undergoes, in the process of years, the change which is apparent in our views. The difference is in our standpoint, which is perpetually varying. Nor may we be satisfied with one view. We need the constant shifting of light upon whatever we consider to arrive at any just estimate or ultimate conclusion concerning it. Whether it is worth while to arrive at final conclusions at all in this world is a matter of question. We cannot—many of us at least—see all sides of the sphere at once. It needs great spiritual enlargement and elevation to presume on entire and unqualified judgment of all things.

Some of us go mourning through all our days under the cross of certain personal inheritances or deficiencies for which we reproach Fate or Providence or whatever the Power that we regard as fixed, implacable and final in dealing with us. Our whole life is dwarfed and incapacitated for perfect use by the weak and ignorant submission with which we yield ourselves as hopeless, helpless victims to characteristics that are suffered to tyrannize over us to the end of time. Should we not practically recognize the fact that we are in the world simply to overcome and to convert even our infirmities to spiritual powers? This is our work. Shall we go from youth to old age cowering and shrinking under limitations that were set simply to be broken over? And may we foolishly, even profanely, charge to God's providence the things which we impotently hold up as excuses for our failure to do what our conscience clearly directs?

There is a sadness in the after part of a day which has not fulfilled the promise of the morning. One hates to see it go, for the reason that it takes with it the unfulfilled hope. So many avenues of thought and deed have opened to us that we knew not which was the fairer to take, and languishing between them we have lost the blessing of all. So many delightful things to say have gone by with slighted opportunity; so many promptings to do have touched us and vanished like the forms of clouds which, while we are gazing, change and float away, leaving us staring blankly into vacancy. Even the unattained good vexes and saddens us. But, doubtless, even to have touched the hem of the garment of good is better than not to have perceived it at all. May not the recognition and the longing attest our right to possession? Does the beauty that we love wholly evade us after all?

Do you ever think when you watch the declining sun of human life, and bewail the fast approaching nightfall of death, that you are as much a victim to the deceit of appearances as you are in watching the decline of the natural sun? Evermore we in our orbit are moving toward the east and the morning, and it is this motion that puts the earthly sun behind us, below us. Our lengthening shadows show the way we are going. "Death and the west," says MacDonal "are behind us, ever behind us."

The law which regulates all true endeavor is the law of trust, without which there could be no successful effort. However we may disclaim such trust, in our self-conscious power to will and to do, the bare fact of our attempt is proof of our faith that we shall be blessed in the end for which we strive. And the more utterly we fling ourselves into the current of belief as regards our undertaking, the more certain will be the triumph which must crown our efforts. The very strongest enforcement of our powers comes from faith—in fact, the very inspiration of all honest endeavor is a more or less active state of belief.

A critic needs the finest perception of character and the capacity to enter into the motive of the subject which must be so acutely and subtly analyzed as to reveal the secret, but vaguely understood, perhaps, by the subject himself. An artist rarely represents the truth for which he poses. He aims to show forth some type which he admires and fondly imagines is made manifest in his work; and he wonders that he is so little appreciated, so frequently misapprehended. Viewing himself from his own standpoint, he appears equally deserving with those who are so extravagantly lauded and borne into the temple of Fame on the shoulders of adoring eulogists. It is the true critic's aim to probe through all this unconscious masquerading to the real quality underneath; and his judgment, if of any worth, is founded upon an unprejudiced and perfectly clear estimate of the nature of his subject. No work rises above the level of its master.

CONGRESS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Free Religious Association met in the hall of Washington on Wednesday, September 20, for the twenty-sixth time. Mr. Charles C. Bonney, President of the World's Congress Auxiliary, called upon Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones to open the session with prayer, after which he (President Bonney) welcomed the association in a remarkably happy five-minute address. Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, one of the vice-presidents of the association, and the presiding officer of the morning, responded in his usual happy vein, expressing his great satisfaction that one who had not the privilege of living in Boston, the home of the association, should nevertheless so perfectly express its purpose as Mr. Bonney had done. His address was full of quiet humor, and he touched upon the fact that this Parliament of Religions was in a measure the realization of one of the great ideals of the Free Religious Association. Wm. J. Potter, the president of the association, was then introduced and read an interesting historical sketch of the association, alluding to the fact that Ralph Waldo Emerson's name stood first on the roll of members.

Both the association and the Unitarian Congress were desirous of hearing Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, of Calcutta, the eloquent apostle of the Brahmo-Samaj, and as he had agreed to address the latter body that morning it courteously consented to adjourn to the larger hall of Washington, that both bodies might hear the address. In opening his address Mr. Mozoomdar alluded to the cordial reception he had received from these two organizations during his previous visit to this country, and proceeded to speak of the Brahmo-Samaj, which he conceived to be quite similar to the Free Religious Association. He contended that we must have dogmas in religion, but that while they should be certain and definite, they should be so simple and fundamental that all must agree to them. He protested against the notion that good works alone constituted the whole of religion; and pointed out that one might devote himself to good works from lack of other employment, but that such conduct did not indicate a very high type of life. He thought that, while his countrymen lacked many things that we of the West had, the spirit of devotion was a valuable possession of the Hindu, which seemed to him too largely absent from Occidental religion. Religion, he said, must be spiritual; and he contended for personality as essential to religion and to the development of the highest character. God, said he, is not an idea; God is a great person. His manner, throughout, was so sweet and his language so noble, that the large audience which thronged to hear him could not but be pleased with the man, whether or not they agreed with his thought.

At the conclusion of Mr. Mozoomdar's address, Dr. Francis E. Abbott, of Cambridge, read with great force and effectiveness a paper on "The Scientific Method in the Study of Religion," in which he took occasion to criticize the dogmatism of the Spencerian agnostics, who asserted the unknowability of the Infinite, and the now patent dualism of the Huxleian agnosticism which asserts that ethics leads us not to put ourselves in accord with but to oppose the cosmic order. His criticism of Unitarianism was omitted from the reading in compliment to the presence of the Unitarian Congress during the latter part of the morning session, but it will be printed when the address is published.

The afternoon session was presided over by President Potter, and was addressed by Rev. Manot J. Savage of Boston, Mr. Mangasar M. Mangasarian of the Chicago Ethical Culture Society, Mrs. Edna D. Cheney, Rev. Robert Collyer, who expressed himself as greatly pleased and in hearty accord with the views of Mr. Mangasarian, who dwelt upon the fact that ethics afforded the one possible ground of union for those whose beliefs were more or less different, Rev. Dr. A. A. Miner of Boston, and Rev. Jenkins Lloyd Jones of Chicago, who said that while the Parliament of Religions was in a sense a fulfillment of one of the ideals of the association, he could not but feel that during the twenty-three years in which he had been a member it had accomplished far too little, it lacked working force.

At 6 p. m. a reception was held at the Tremont House, followed by a banquet presided over by Col. Higginson, at the close of which addresses were made by the presiding officer, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Dr. E. L. Rexford, Miss Ida C. Hultin, a young Brahmin who clung to the customs while he disregarded the religious scruples of his people, and Rev. B. B. Nagarkar, of the Brahmo-Samaj, who said a good word for the secular educative work of the Christian ministry. Mrs. Spencer gave a new utterance to her hope that the Free Religious Association might not longer be a voice without hands, warning her hearers that the courteous hearing accorded the non-Christian speakers in the Parliament was no more than ordinary social courtesy, and that the association should not too hastily flatter itself that much had been thereby achieved. She warned them, too, against the tendency to dwell upon the past, intimating that it was a sign of senility which betokened little work in the present and the future. Dr. Rexford made a very happy after-dinner speech, keeping his hearers' faces wreathed in smiles, and responding most felicitously to the interjunctory remarks of the president. Miss Hultin won the hearts of her hearers by the hopefulness of her tone and the sweet charity with which her bit of criticism was clothed. At the close of the fifth speaker's remarks, as the night was well advanced, Col. Higginson repeated his words of thankful praise for those who had done so much to make the Parliament of Religions and the convention of the Free Religious Association a success, particularly mentioning the untiring efforts of their associate, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, the secretary of the general committee of the Parliament, and then declared the meeting at an end. The occasion was a very enjoyable one, although the proposed program could not be fully carried out, as one of the expected speakers of the evening did not appear and another came late. F. W. S.

SYMPOSIUM ON THE PRESENT ORGANIZED FORCES OF UNITARIANISM.

The meeting held Friday morning, September 16th, was probably the most truly representative of all the sessions of the Unitarian Congress; and as UNITY is unable to report them all, it will endeavor to put before its readers a very brief summary of this one, as a sample.

The meeting was presided over by Rev. T. B. Forbush, Western Superintendent for the A. U. A., who deserves to be complimented upon carrying the program through successfully in a single session, although of the twelve speakers mentioned on the program all but Miss Spencer were present in person or by proxy, Rev. E. A. Horton's place being taken by Rev. W. H. Lyon. We can but regret, however, that in order to accomplish this it was thought necessary to stop one of the participants when he had but two more pages to read, instead of allowing him to finish.

Rev. Grindall Reynolds, Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, spoke for that mother of Unitarian organizations, and was followed by Rev. S. C. Steintal, the associate pastor of the Cross Street Chapel, Manchester, England, the Arlington Street Church of the old country, who spoke of the organization and work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and of the questions agitating the English Unitarians, particularly the school board difficulty in the matter of religious instruction in accordance with the teaching of the Established Church. Rev. W. H. Lyon followed with an outline history of the National Conference, which was necessarily very brief. Mr. John Fretwell then spoke for Transylvania, dwelling upon the difficulties the church had to contend with on account of state interference. Rev. Frederick L. Hosmer, the late Secretary, then read a fifteen-minute paper on the Western conference, which, although a very brief sketch, so clearly brought home to the minds of the audience the natural growth of the conference as to awaken their enthusiasm for its high evolution. Mr. Lyon then read a paper showing the growth of the Unitarian Sunday School Society from the smallest of beginnings to a position of wide influence and usefulness. Rev. A. W. Gould, President of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, then spoke for five or ten minutes, saying that the purpose his society represented was to lead all men to the broadest view of truth; and that with that end in view it sought to show them the height and truth and beauty of things on all sides of them, and also of what was not a part of their immediate environment; that, among other means, they sought to inspire a reverence for true religion and morality by pointing out to the youth of our land the noble lives outside our historic bible, and the religious truth outside that historic system of religion within whose pale our lot has fallen.

Rev. B. R. Bulkley, of Concord, Mass., then spoke for Unitarian guilds, making a plea for more devotional service in the church life of our young people. Rev. G. W. Cooke, in speaking of unity clubs, appealed to the fact that religion has to do with all of life; that true religion enters into men's work not less than into their formal worship. This was the basis of the unity clubs; they sought, among other things, to lead us to read a modern English poet with the same earnest reverence as an ancient Jewish psalmist. Rev. D. W. Morehouse, the Middle States superintendent, then spoke of the work of his conference, pointing out the difficulty of spreading the liberal faith in the many old, conservative towns of the Middle States and Canada, where all knew their neighbors personally and all were expected to conform to the conventional religious standards. Mr. Morehouse was followed by the Pacific coast and Southern superintendents; Rev. C. W. Wendte pointing out the peculiar advantages of the liberal faith in his territory, where the conditions were just the opposite of those described in Mr. Morehouse's paper. On the virgin soil of California the liberal faith gained a footing before the orthodox sects had taken possession of the territory; and the marked open-mindedness of the pioneer, characterizing the Pacific coast population, was another thing in favor of the large new faith. In addition to this he called attention to the fact that most of the orthodoxy which was there was peculiarly backward in its theology, and thus drove men away in the search for greater breadth. He showed how, in much less than a decade, Unitarianism had quadrupled in power, wealth, and influence, and predicted for this most American faith a great and speedy triumph in that most American section of our land. Incidentally he offered a warm tribute to the A. U. A. for the part it had played in the spread of Unitarianism on the coast.

Rev. George L. Chaney opened his remarks by saying that there was no Unitarianism in the South to speak of, and proceeded to make a plea for the great need of free religion in the land of the freedmen, carrying with him the sympathy of his audience throughout his brief address. He said that the North in its relations with the South not only had something to forgive but also to be forgiven. Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones then stated that Mrs. Spence was unable to be with them, but had intrusted him with a message of greeting from the Unitarians of Australia. F. W. S.

A STATE CONVENTION OF THE LIBERAL INDEPENDENT RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES OF ILLINOIS.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Directors of the Illinois Conference of Unitarian and other Independent Societies it was voted to hold the annual conference in Chicago, November 7-9, and to make a special effort to assemble all the Independent Societies of the State. There seems no reason why those who have broken the old credal fetters should not unite for conference and mutual help. Our beliefs may not be one, but our purpose is surely the same,—to advance the cause of Liberal Religion in the world and help as many churches and as many individuals as possible to enjoy the larger liberty and the nobler religion which we enjoy. We can accomplish this purpose far better united than individually; and there are enough independent churches in this State to form a strong and effective body. Can we not meet for once in full numbers to talk the matter over?

The following program has been suggested:

Tuesday, Nov. 7, 8 p. m.—Annual Sermon.

Wednesday, Nov. 8, 9:30 a. m.—Devotional Meeting. 10:30 a. m.—Report of State Work. 2 p. m.—Paper on "The Congregational Polity and the Liberal Church." Discussion on the paper. 3 p. m.—Paper on "Methods of Missionary Work in the Liberal Church." Discussion on the paper. 4 p. m.—Paper on "The Liberal Church and the People." Discussion on the paper. 8 p. m.—Platform meeting on "The Larger Religious Horizon." (a) The Larger Horizon of the Universalist Church. (b) The Larger Horizon of the Unitarian Church. (c) The Larger Horizon of the Independent Church. (d) The Larger Horizon of the Ethical Movement. (e) Possibilities of a Liberal Church Organization.

Thursday, Nov. 9, 9:30 a. m.—Devotional Meeting. 10:30 a. m.—Business.

UNITARIANISM AS A PROMISE.*

BY REV. W. C. GANNETT.

It will turn my subject but a little if I call it, not the Promise of Unitarianism but Unitarianism as a Promise. Our Unitarianism, that we love so well, a prophecy of something nobler than itself,—that thought sets bells to ringing in the heart! bells not of pride but of grateful joy. To feel that we are only Unitarians for the nonce because we are born a bit too early, that we are but hint and herald of a truth more true and beautiful and a brotherhood larger than anything that bears our name or is ever likely to,—to see this, and to be glad in seeing it, and to adjust the hope and methods of our Unitarianism to the seeing, is, I think, to be genuinely "Unitarian." But this is saying that he is most the Unitarian who is least one.

I. "And that is but a commonplace among us," some one answers. Not so much a commonplace but that it is worth while to give definite reasons for believing it is true. The reasons, moreover, will show that there is no disloyalty in the belief. Here is one: Who are the four great masters of our faith? Four men who have with difficulty and reluctance borne our name,—Channing, Parker, Emerson and Martineau. None of these have cared for our name or our organism. Channing, although he was protagonist for all the name implied three-quarters of a century ago, when the first debate was forced on the New England liberals, compelling schism, accepted the necessity with heavy heart. His sense of the spiritual realities of religion, lying deep below divergences of doctrine, was shocked at the thought of break; it also made him fear fresh bonds of creed in any new connection. To quote again the well-known words: In 1828 he wrote, "I take cheerfully the name of a Unitarian, because unwearyed efforts are used to raise against it a popular cry. Were the name more honored I should be glad to throw it off. I wish to regard myself as belonging not to a sect, but to the community of free minds, of lovers of truth, of followers of Christ, both on earth and in heaven." Channing died in 1842, when the dreamy-eyed Transcendental child of Unitarianism was being soundly cuffed by the scandalized young mother, already grown conventional, and for the five years before his death the note which ever and anon he sounded was, "I am very little of a Unitarian." "Old Unitarianism must undergo important modification. Though an advance on previous systems, it does not work deeply, it does not strike living springs in the soul. It cannot quicken and regenerate the world. It began as a protest against mental slavery. It pledged itself to progress as its life and end; but it has gradually grown stationary, and now we have a Unitarian Orthodoxy." Martineau, our living Channing with a larger culture, has once and again discomfited his friends with the assurance that, though he was himself a Unitarian, the church of his love ought never to be limited by such a name. "You may devote a church," he told them, "to the enduring life of religion, which persists through changing theologies, or to a given theology, with such religion as in its day it can manage to hold. But you cannot combine both methods, since the trustful piety of the former consists in renouncing the comfortable securities of the latter. My own allegiance is unreservedly given to the former. With a 'Unitarian Church' I can have nothing to do. In the doctrine denoted by the phrase I profoundly believe." His influence once led the British Unitarian Association to decline a sorely needed gift of $60,000, because the gift was conditioned on a trust deed drawn on "Unitarian" instead of free religious lines,—a quite heroic act of faith on a Unitarian Association's part. His hope for England, and the hope took shape in him as plan, was a "Free Christian Union" of her various churches. The plan became a failure,—but remains a prophecy, as good failures often do. On his eightieth birthday, responding to the greeting of the English Unitarians, he said: "The true religious life supplies grounds of sympathy and association deeper and wiser than can be expressed by any doctrinal names or formulas; and free play can never be given to these genuine spiritual affinities till all stipulation, direct or implied, for specified agreement in theological opinion is discarded from the bases of church union." One need not quote from Theodore Parker or from Emerson to hint their view of the insufficiency of Unitarianism. Parker, in spite of Channing's warning and his own tumultuous remonstrance, was virtually banned by the little body; while Emerson, still earlier, sorely found himself outside the name, which held him only long enough to make it possible for later Unitarians to say with pride, "Our Emerson." Now, when we remember that these are the four men whose names make radiant our little history, the four whose faces oftenest look at us from our church walls, the four whose words we oftenest quote if we would teach our faiths,—when we remember this, their indifference to us becomes significant. Significant of what? That Unitarianism prophesies a future nobler than its own.

A stronger reason for believing this is the continuous transfer of emphasis from doctrine to method and spirit and ethics that has marked our history as a church. In other words, most of us, however much we love our ism, at heart are little Channings, Emersons, Martineaus. On doctrine, that is, on views of God and Christ and Bible and human nature and human destiny, the Christian sects have all been built, and by doctrine are they separated from each other. So it was with our church also at the first: our very name bears witness to the greatness of a doctrine, the Unity of God, and our early battle-fields of pamphlet and debate were strewn with Bible-texts to prove our creed. Yet from the first we strongly emphasized three other things,—a certain intellectual method in religion, a certain spirit, and a moral test; the method of free reason instead of authority, the spirit of fellowship and unity instead of sectarianism, the test of character instead of right belief. Our three great Unitarian "principles," we may call them,—if we dare,—to distinguish them from doctrine. Thus at our beginning; and through the years these "principles" of ours have changed only to grow clearer, only to be more thoroughly applied, only to have our emphasis on them increase; while, on the other hand, our "doctrines" have all reshaped themselves, and our general emphasis on them has waned. Very conscious are we of this change in views and this transfer of emphasis. "The Unitarian movement," "the unsectarian sect," "the church of mere morality," have been our larger synonyms,—our glory or reproach, according to the eyes that looked. And how is it to-day? To-day we love our doctrines still in their transfigured shapes, and probably no church is more at one in creed than ours, and yet to-day those principles, and not these doctrines, are hailed by most of us as the supreme things in religion. We keep the name Unitarian, but a new meaning has grown into it. Talk as we may of the claims of etymology and old historic sense to fix a meaning firm, etymology does dim, and historic senses change in words; for history is new as well as old, and words are vital, not mechanic, things; and no words are quite so vital as religious words. The rose in April and the rose in June are very different things to look at, but the June rose does not shed its April name. "Religion" has meant a thousand things, and all "historic." "Christianity" in the nineteenth century means something very unlike what it meant in the ninth century or in the first; but the latest meaning is no less "historic" than the earliest. We need not disown old history to rise above it into new. So, too, "Unitarianism" has changed meaning. To-day the name connotes our method in religion, our spirit and our moral test more than it does our doctrine of the unity of God, although that doctrine never was so grand as now.

But to what an outlook has this change of emphasis and meaning brought us? It has brought us almost to the rims of possible existence as an organized and individual church; for these principles, all three, are universal, not Unitarian; and the church that is truest to them just so far tends to lose its separate body and become what they themselves are, a diffusive spirit. In virtue of them we belong somewhat to every church and inside every company of lovers and truth-seekers. Freedom, Fellowship and Character, we sometimes call this trinity of ours. Liberty, Love and Holiness, we call it. Or, best of all, perhaps, Truth, Love and Righteousness. But such names, such principles, as these are not Unitarian; they are not Christian; they are not even human; they are eternal and divine. Nor were they any discovery of our fathers. Our sole relation as Unitarians to them is that of early enlistment under them, and of growing loyalty to them. We are simply a church of to-day, offering scope for the practice and the teaching of principles that are not of to-day, but of all days,—principles which are not ours, nor any men's, nor man's, but we and man are theirs.

Should we not own, then,—may we not claim, then,—that the faith we love is prophetic of a glory nobler than its own?

The third reason for believing it to be so is that all the larger churches around us are to-day feeling the same uplift as we. I said, call those principles "Unitarian," if we dared. In almost every church there is a Broad Church party, and under the party, wider than the party, a sub-conscious Broad Church tendency; and always "Broad Church" means that blessed trinity, the emphasis on Freedom, Fellowship and Character in religion. Here, there and everywhere among the creed-bound, creed-separated companies of yesterday there are the sounds of falling barriers and glimpses of men straining away from tradition. Ancient churches, rivals from their birth, are exchanging Christian courtesies and lending temples to each other. New attempts at Evangelical Alliance and Christian Union star each decade now. And lo! this miracle of a World's Parliament of Faiths,—its aim "to make the Golden Rule the basis of the union of religions" and "to show their substantial unity in the good deeds of the religious life!" Interdenominational societies of service like the Young Men's Christian Union, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the King's Daughters, the Christian Endeavorers are springing up, a beautiful new flora surprising the ecclesiastic soil. Most of this has come within a generation, and it all means new emphasis on Love as the vital spirit of religion, and on Character as its growing test. Meanwhile, the welcome given so widely in the pew as in the press to heresy in solution, and the heresy trials occurring when the solution begins to precipitate itself in visible crystals of radical criticism or theology,—these mean the new tendency to Free Reason in religion. Nor is it even too much to add that the Broad Church party, the new Orthodoxy, as fast as it adopts this intellectual method of ours, is reaching intellectual results quite similar to ours: more and more its views and ours of God, of Christ, of the Bible, of inspiration, revelation, human nature, human destiny and evolution in religion, are drawing to a touch. Not that the approach is altogether from their side. Nor let us hug the dream that Unitarian "leaven" is the cause of what has happened. We and our larger neighbors are parts of one great wakening. We have marked the movement more than they, because upon its front; but we have marked, not made, it. To the irresistible, irradiating light of the new science, the new readings of history, the new contacts of man with man in brotherhood around the earth, it is due; and to this our little Unitarian light has added what the early house-fires add to dawn. By these signs once more, then, we can say that Unitarianism foretells a glory greater than its own.

II. But why may not this coming glory be our own? It will be ours, for we shall share in it. But why may it not bear our name if we are pioneers of the principles that lead men to it? Partly because we are not the only pioneers of them. Partly because, when these principles shall have gained free course in Christendom, the great churches that adopt them will still be the mass, and we the fraction; and the mass is not likely to rename itself from any fraction. But more than this: these principles may be the things supreme in religion, but it is not they as theories, it is only they at work, only as principles in vital application, that they confer leadership; a fact, by the way, which restores to doctrine no little of its honor and estate. Now I fear the truth about us Unitarians is that the principles in us are theories comparatively unapplied. Do we ever stand for passionate realizations of any truth? Our merit has been breadth, not depth. So far we seem to have thinned the truth in widening it. To protest against unreason in religion was the part assigned us; but unreason is a matter of interpretation, and protest, therefore, is mainly a matter of the surface; and he who gives himself to surface-work may easily forget an underlying firmament,—as the average farmer, re-vising the weeds and thistles, the unreason of his upper soil, thinks little of the geologic miles of rock beneath it. It seems to me that, while we have established our negations and made our superficial protest good, we have not probingly applied our method to the facts and laws of the spirit's life.

To show what I mean, take three great Christian doctrines, the Incarnation, the Vicarious Atonement, Sin. All three as stated in their dogma forms belong to the myths and legends of the spirit; but the truths which the three dogmas aim to state,

—there are no facts more firmamental. As stated, they are the kindergarten object lessons, in which the mind of Christendom has dramatized certain mighty facts of history and consciousness. We have protested against these kindergarten lessons as finalities, but have we realized what the pictures tried to tell? The God incarnate in "the blessed Jew," and him alone, became a thought too narrow; but have we restated Incarnation with equal depth of meaning? What majestic vision rises on the mind to-day when we pronounce that word Incarnation,—vision of Spirit enshrining itself in every human soul, inspiring and revealing and communing there; enshrining itself in every lower, dimmer life than human; and so enshrined in the very substance of the universe that we see "the splendor of the God bursting through each chink and cranny," and canonize the Holy Matter! Now this, which our first principle, reason in religion, has lately given, or restored, to us, is certainly a broader vision of the Incarnation fact. A broader,—but is it yet a deeper vision? When we realize this new thought of ours, when we love it, thrill before it, worship it, as Christians long have loved and worshiped the thought of God incarnate in the single Christ, then shall we be near to knowing how the new religion may be named.

Vicarious Atonement: the blood, the cross, the God dying on it for the love of man,—this is the Christian child-man's object-lesson that has blessed the centuries. To-day, in vistas of heredity and stretching files of fellowship, we begin to see what "vicarious" really means,—that no man liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself; and what "at-one-ment" means,—that by these far-reaching subtleties of partnership, by personally "unearned increments" of joy and pain, our race is slowly rising toward ideals of right and happiness. What are all these widening thoughts of human solidarity,—of "fellow-ship," to name it from our second principle,—what are they but that concrete object lesson written large before the modern mind? Again a broader,—but is it yet a deeper vision? When we realize this broadened thought as passionately, and apply it in love as deeply, as men have realized and applied the doctrine of the single cross, then we may be near to knowing who shall head and name the Church of Man.

And Sin, its retribution, and the joy and peace of its escape: the older churches in their dogmas put all this again in concrete kindergarten forms, but for one I think those friends take deeper note of the actual facts and laws of the soul's experience, are pro-founder naturalists of the spirit, than we are with our broader theories of character and its formation. Yes, our third principle is also right,—the test of religion is in character. And the church of the future needs that test, and needs our broader theory of it; but, then, it needs too, and it needs more, the depth and passion of realization as to what sin and hell and heaven and forgiveness and salvation actually are within the soul. Are Unitarians, as we know them, likely to lead in this realization? I think not. "Unitarianism does not work deeply," Channing said: "it does not strike living springs in the soul; it cannot quicken and regenerate the world." Is not his word still the true one? Our contribution is of breadth, not depth. It is easier to get breadth than depth. And the name goes ever with the depth. We may not hope to christen, then, the coming faith. Unitarianism is prophetic of something nobler than itself!

III. What, then, may Unitarians do to bring this nobler nearer? Two things.

First, be ourselves; true to ourselves. Try for the deep things of the Spirit that we lack; but, if we may only stand for breadth and help by breadth, at least be broad,—be what we claim to be. Be true to those principles of ours. When issues rise involving them, stand always by the principle, and not by policy or the subscription lists. For a little while the year-book may be thinner as a consequence, five wooden chapels less may rise next year, but in spirit-power our Church will gain and be less wooden for it. Remember what the British Unitarian Association did. Take risks for the Spirit! Let our Unitarian motto be, "Spiritualize,"—not "Organize." Our part is to grow inwardly—any way; outwardly, if inward growth allow it. If not, No. If not, No. Organization is well enough and should be seen to, but it is not Jesus' work, or any prophet's work; and the useful scribes and priests always abound to do it. Aim to be a Church Prophetic, a Church of the Holy Spirit. To that end be willing to be small; expect to be small. We love respectability: dread respectability, with its expediencies, its policies, its safeties, its complacencies, and yet its panics, its raised eye-brows toward the uncombed ideals! Dread respectability, lest we cease to be of that which is making the old new, and beginning to be of that which is making the new old! As for names, if it be the destiny of Unitarianism to give up its name to the Church within all Churches, to which the religious man really belongs, rejoice! It would be leze-loyalty to Unitarianism itself to sorrow. Just in proportion as a Church is true either in intellectual method or intellectual result, in that proportion it is the Church Universal; and if Universal, it makes no difference what men call it.

And we can do a second thing,—be ready to join with other liberal faiths in a new organization. Welcome every true-hearted attempt in that direction; but stand back from the small-hearted attempt. Be humble in the matter. Stand not for special recognition. Such new organization to-day would almost surely take a republican, not monarchical, form: would be a "many-in-one." Members would probably not give up old names or associations or separate activities. No need to disown old history in order to make new. There would be functions corresponding to national functions, and Church rights corresponding to State rights. This parliament with its congresses suggests a possible model for beginnings; and let the future shape the future forms. But this century ought not to close without seeing such a federation of the liberal faiths.

IV. Finally, if we try to hint the higher unities of faith in which such a federation would find itself at one, it would be, of course, to outline the ideals that each one cherishes for his special band of comrades and himself. And, therefore, I can hardly vary language I once used before in trying to sketch what then I was calling "the Higher Unitarianism." Let me repeat those hopes. I think the coming glory is to mean:

1. A thought of Religion which shall trace its sources to actual experiences in the consciousness; to gradual dawns of thought, feeling, motive, and ideal there; to sudden shinings sometimes there; to things that happen within us as really as things happen to our bodies on the street. A religion which shall care little to argue arguments for God, or the whys and wherefores of prayer, but shall wake us up from an inward shining to the consciousness, "That was prayer! I did it! And the unknown Face and Force there in the dark within me was thee—God!" and shall make us, remembering that experience, dare and tempt that light again,—until life becomes "communion," a sense of life in common with the One Life and Light in all.

2. I think it means a Theism, which sees Law as Love and Love as Law: which knows no miracle but the infinite miracle of nature, begetting endless awe and endless joy in man; which knows that in the dialect of Heaven are no such words as "accident" or "tragedy," but that what we misname thus is really goodness on the way to vision. And more: a Theism which shall see that all in nature that we call, in our dismembering pronouns, "It," is more truly "He," and all we glorify by nouns and pronouns personal is only that which men so long have deadened into "It"—transfigured! A Theism that shall interpret sunsets and the flowers in terms of spirit, and human nature, with its very mother-heart and cross of Christ, in terms of flower and sunset!

3. I think, for this land of ours, it means a Christianity which shall identify itself with the Holy Spirit manifested anywhere and everywhere; and in that identity shall care nothing for the Christian name as name, and shall care to throw away the name whenever it becomes a bar of separation or a tinkling ritual; a Christianity which shall stand for the life "Christ,"—not Christ the man who once exemplified the life, nor Christ the date, but the impulse "Christ," the movement "Christ," the spirit "Christ," forever and forever shaping history whether under this name or some other; now flowering in sons of carpenters, now naming new spring-seasons in the tree of life, but never begun, and never ended, and never confined to any holy May-hour of history.

4. It shall mean, does mean already, a Bible which shall go on compiling itself inside the temples as inside the world's heart and memory; freshening old reverences with tender new ones, welcoming and canonizing new ideals of truth or life wherever nobly rendered into the perpetuating word,—and not, because the old phrase is a dear phrase, deliberately confining man to it until we become prisoners of its poverty instead of sons of its glory.

5. It will mean a thought of Immortality which shall watch, with eyes undimmed by tears, for any star of sign and beckoning that may break the skies,—skies amid which we breathe and have our being here; but which shall not be one whit afraid to own that to know of the future we must wait our turn; cheering, meanwhile, that sense of deathlessness, which comes whenever we realize ourselves for moments as beings who do not obey, but are, the moral law; the sense of deathlessness, which makes our Easter questions all being in awe and end in smiles.

6. Finally, it is yet to mean a thought of brotherhood; a recognition that we are all members of each other in a sense so real that no parable can hint it, and no science yet describe it; a recognition that this trusteeship for each other applies not only to the outermost we call our "property," but, as really, to the innermost we call our "faculty." A Brotherhood which shall be a realizing that we only attain true selfhood by unselfing processes; and that whatever unrim us into oneness with our fellows in this world, until we share their aches, their poverties, their disinheritance from life's good things,—that this unrim us also into oneness with that which we call, not fellow-man, but "God." So that love to man is love to God, and only in proportion to such love we live.

Are not these the higher unities toward which we, and a far larger host who never bore and never will bear our name, are rising? The unity of God and Nature; the unity of religion with human nature; the unity of Christianity with all movements of the Holy Spirit everywhere; the unity of the Bible with literature; the unity of life hereafter with life here and now; the unity of self with others. These are the great faiths to which the sacred principles of freedom, fellowship and character in religion are leading on the world. Amen, so may it be.

RECENT AMERICAN POETRY IN ITS RELIGIOUS ASPECT.*

The religion of by-gone ages is to-day found imbedded in the poetry of the past. The heart religion of the people breathes in folksong, the higher spiritual in prophetic utterances, and the ceremonial mingles with superstition in the minstrel lays of war and adventure. In ages to come when, as Theodore Parker said, "future discoverers will dig in the ruins of Boston, and, coming upon some remnant of our civilization, will say 'These people were not wholly savage,'" then doubtless our present day poetry will be studied to see what light it throws on our fin de siècle religion. But the religious aspect of recent poetry has an interest for the present as well as futurity, for in it we may see reflected the various phases of a period of thought transition.

In "The Song of the Ancient People," though we find nothing bearing upon religious beliefs of to-day, yet the poem may be said to type the modern spirit, which is more than tolerance and which is willing to search for beauty and truth in all religions, past or present. The poem presents with strength and spirit the traditions of the Moquis and Zunis, the two most important surviving tribes of the Pueblo Indians, and deserves to rank with "Hiawatha" as a truthful mirror of Indian thought and life. As we are to look at the religious aspect we select this passage, which also happens to be one of the most beautiful:

"And still our holy fires we keep,
And the sacred meal we strow,
With many a prayer to the Gods of the air
And the Gods that dwell below,—
The Gods of the Great Six Regions:
The yellow, dreadful North;
The West, with the blue of sea and sky;
The ruddy South, where the corals lie
And the fragrant winds go forth;
The pure white East, whose virgin dawns
Lead up the conquering Sun,
While stars grow pale and shadows fail,
For the shrouding night is done;
The Over-world, where all the hues
In radiant beauty shine;

The Under-world, more black and drear
Than the gloom of the deepest mine;
And the Middle Realm, where the Mother reigns

And binds them all in one;—
Prayers in the words our fathers knew,
And prayers that voiceless steal
To the Holder of the Trails of Life
And thought to thought reveal!
For the clamorous cry unheard will die,
While, swift as light, ascends on high
The silent heart's appeal."

It is to be hoped that this poem will escape the oblivion which commonly overtakes Indian poems; and in this case the book itself, as a work of art in binding, print and illustration, should escape such a fate.

It is somewhat of a strain to turn from Miss Proctor's classic to "The Eloping Angels," yet we cannot help feeling that criticism in this case has been unduly severe. Surely, Mr. Watson has done enough serious work to be permitted a "caprice," and, as he says in the dedication, there is "beneath its somewhat hazardous levity a spirit not wholly flippant." The sensibilities that are shocked by the irreverence of the poem will perhaps be the better for the shock; but in truth has not the time come when the weapon of ridicule may be lawfully used against a "Selfish heaven of unearned joy," marked with

"The dullness of entire felicity?"
The story runs that Faust and Mephisto, seeking variety, pay a visit to heaven, and though they find that —"heaven has hardly changed one bit

Since the old days before the historic split," they chance upon two angels sitting apart who, having been lovers on earth, separated by death, are now reunited in heaven, but who express their dissatisfaction thus:

"We lead a life withdrawn, this maid and I,
Nor love the life by other angels led—
All idle hymns of praise to the Most High.
Our one supreme desire is to be wed,
And we are even now concerting schemes
How to escape and realize our dreams.
For here in heaven no marrying is nor yet Giving in marriage."

A suggestion from Mephisto enabled them to escape to earth, where —"as angels they remained,

Yet more than angels, being lovers,
too;
All their celestial loveliness retained,
And evermore in earthly sweetness grew.
Thus lost they nothing of divine, and gained Everything human."

"Songs of Doubt and Dream" abundantly bears out the promise of its title. The volume is full of radicalism, and though we are only to note the religious phase the social and political heresies are no less interesting. The poems with a religious bearing may be styled self-respecting by agnostics, manifesting the calm spirit which can say,

"I envy not the ethic range
Of him whose virtues would require That wrong and right should interchange

For so much heaven like so much hire."

Yet it is an agnosticism that has not wholly parted company with intuitional philosophy, as we may gather from a bit from "In the Year Ten Thousand," which poem, by the way, excited considerable comment when published in the Arena some three years back:

"'Tis a grand thought, but it is not enough!
In spite of all our world hath been and done,
Its glorious evolution from the low
Sheer to the lofty, I, individual, I,
An entity and a personality, Desire, long, yearn—"

* * *

"What subtler music those winds whisper now!
'Tis even as if they had foresworn to breathe Despair, and dreamed, however dubiously,
Of some faint hope!"

There is no strained or painful consistency in Mr. Fawcett's work, and the reader is left uncertain whether each poem voices a mood or marks a stage of development. In "Jacynth" the feeling of revulsion aroused by the brutality of real orthodoxy finds expression, and the dialogue between Believer and Infidel is quotable for its suggestive bearing on some stock pulpit thunder.

BELIEVER.

This man of reason whom you deem so great,
Who puts out Hell and bars up Heaven's fair gate,
Who flings all creeds terrestrial to one maw,
Huge as the Aztec battle-god's, called Law,—
Who makes the universe to suit his wish,
As eyeless as a subterranean fish,—
Last night this valiant doubter, in his pride, Shrieked for Jehovah's pardon ere he died.

INFIDEL.

With ease the partisan may falsely view
Delirium's rant; yet if indeed 't were true
That some wild fear did seize him at the last,

What matters? Hardest caks are bowed by blast.
 The warrior minds of men drink strength for strife
 Not from death's opiate, but the elixir, life.
 His life being great, who cares if near its close
 He druded what imbecilities death chose?

"An Elegy on the Death of Thomas William Parsons" is the sort of thing that greatness of whatever rank should pray that its memory may be spared. To be sure, it is a labor of love, but so very labored that it dims the genius it fain would honor.

"The fanfare of the trumpets of the sea

Assault the air with jubilant foray;
 The intolerable exigence of glee Shouts to the sun and leaps in radiant spray"— may speak to the souls of some, but we confess it does not appeal to us. It is not all like this, however. One of the stronger verses is this:

His feet are in thy courts, O Lord; his ways

Are in the City of the Living God.
 Beside the eternal sources of the days
 He dwells, his thoughts with timeless lightnings shod.

His hours are exaltations and desires,
 The soul itself its only period,
 And life unmeasured save as it aspires.

"The Winter Hour" contains nothing argumentatively religious, seeming with the other shorter poems to be rather the opening flower of a deeply spiritual nature, with here and there a touch showing breadth of thought as well as depth of feeling, as when the memory of a loving father moves him.

"Great heart of pity! it was then God seemed a father, denizen
 Of His own world, not chained to feet
 Of some far, awful judgment-seat."

But as voicing the vital elements of the "Religion of the Future," love and human brotherhood, this poem seems the most religious:

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.

What is diviner than the peace of foes
 He conquers not who does not conquer hate,

Or thinks the shining wheels of heaven wait
 On his forgiving. Dimmer the laurel shows

On brows that darken; and war-won repose

Is but a truce when heroes abdicate
 To Huns—unfabling those of elder date

Whose every corse a fiercer warrior rose.

O ye that saved the land! Ah, yes, and ye

That mourned its saving! Neither need forget

The price our destiny did of both demand—
 Toil, want, wounds, prison, and the lonely sea
 Of tears at home. Oh, look on these.
 And yet—
 Before the human fail you—quick!
 your hand!

But what is, perhaps, the most interesting of recent poetry comes to us from Canada in a volume of two hundred pages, bearing on its title page the name of John Henry Brown; and as we learn the character of his verse the name seems prophetic and the thought is forced upon us that in this young man we may have Canada's "Poet of Democracy."

The sonnet "To Walt Whitman," beginning,

"Great democrat, great poet, and great man!

Free singer of our sea-rimmed western shore!

True lover of the people 'evermore!
 Exalter! liberator! who dost scan,
 With arrowy vision and strong heart,
 the plan

Of freedom widening 'mid the time's uproar;

Seeing justice rising through injustice hoar,

With Faith and Truth, twin seraphs, in the van"— illustrates fairly well the spirit of Mr. Brown's work; and counting on the genuineness of his democracy we are not disappointed in our expectation of fearless utterance on the subject of religion. In "A Letter" he says:

I said I had no friends, nor have I one In that strange crew the world calls good society,

The self-styled fair and brave. No church I own;

No church owns me, no sect of strait sobriety.

Nor do I lean to any learned school,
 Of philosophic wisdom the monopolist;

I must be free, even if to play the fool.
 I need not say I am no bibliopholist:

A lost sheep am I, unredeemed, given over;

Yet envy not those sleek ones, deep in clover.

But it is in the longer dramatic poem, "A Mad Philosopher," that we find so much quotable that it is difficult to make selection; perhaps the following will be fairly representative:

Like phantoms vast the centuries loom by,

The hurrying generations rise and pass,
 And with their march the spirit waxeth strong,

And ever grows in wisdom, faith and love.

At last conception comes of one sole cause,

Beginningless, eternal, infinite,]

A sea no plummet sounds, one whose confines
 No wing may ever touch, an awful thought—

To call that thought, which thought may nowise reach, Transcending and containing scope of mind.

And again, later in the poem, the same speaker says:

All honor to our brothers of the past,
 Who through the morning mists worked to the light,
 Unconscious that a brighter day would shine.

Heroic were their labors in their time.
 But pusillanimous and most pitiful

The work of current teachers, who would fill

Their places, and would have the world believe

God spake to these alone, to these alone
 Gave knowledge of his attributes and laws,

Or lawlessness, for such the records shew,

Reporting truly their barbaric age.
 And these reactionary modern priests,
 These purblind jailers of the human soul,

These would-be dwellers in the caves of night,

With proud assumption of authority,
 Give forth false dogmas of the unknown God,

Tell tales incongruous of his universe,
 Strain truth to fit their inconsistencies,
 And strike dissentients dumb with solemn phrase—

"For proof repair ye to the sacred books."

As Walter Crane sees in social unrest and growth high hope for Art, may it not be that, nerved by the present stress, Rational Religion is about to burst into song. At least in these five books we have found nothing that would grace an orthodox hymnal.

OUTLINES OF ROMAN HISTORY. By H. F. Pelham, Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. With maps. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Cloth, pp. 572. $1.75.—"This book," says the preface, "is a reprint, with many additions and alterations, of the article 'Roman History,' which appeared in the last edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica." It is a thoroughly scholarly work, though necessarily brief, well suited for a text book and far above the usual compendium for that purpose, because it is written by a scholar. The maps are convenient and the book is admirably printed.

NAPOLEON, WARRIOR AND RULER; AND THE MILITARY SUPREMACY OF REVOLUTIONARY FRANCE. By William O'Connor Morris. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Cloth, pp. 421. $1.50.—This handsome volume

belongs to the series called "Heroes of the Nations," and is an interesting life of an interesting man. The author is a devoted admirer of Napoleon as man, general and statesman; it is on the whole pleasanter to hear of a man from his friends than from his enemies, but we could wish for and perhaps expect a more judicial temper at this distance of time from Napoleon's death. The volume is graced with a dozen or more portraits of the subject and with other interesting pictures and maps. F. G. B.

PAULA FERRIS: By Mary Farley Sanborn. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Cloth, 12mo., pp. 276. $1.25.—Lowell described certain books as literature suited to desolate islands. The records of the love affairs of married women usually belong to that class of literary products. This theme can only be considered tolerable when treated by a really great writer. Since Anna Karenina has been written already, there does not seem to be any call for other writers to handle this unwholesome subject, even though they do it gingerly, as this writer evidently intends to do. She may even think she has written a moral story, but the effect of such writing will always be pernicious while so many young, foolish and romantic people are among the novel readers.

IN THE ARENA for September Hon. W. H. Standish's "Seven Facts About Silver" and the extracts from Albert Brisbane on the currency question are both worthy of careful consideration. Dr. Van Denburg's "Inquiry into the Law of Cure" is noteworthy, as indicating the greater breadth of thought and freedom from dogmatism which is, of late, showing itself in the very honorable and useful but theory-ridden profession of the healing art. Last, but not least, we would commend the editor's admirable and timely presentation of the excellence of "The New Education."

Notes from the Field

Kalamazoo, Mich.—Plans have been accepted for the new Unitarian Church edifice, and work upon the building will begin next spring. It will be built upon the corner of Lovell and Park streets. The material will be of brick, with stone trimmings. C. A. Gombert, Milwaukee, is the architect. The auditorium will seat about 450, which capacity may be much increased by opening the spaces between it and the large parlors. There will be a large open fire-place in the auditorium, two in the parlors, two in the high basement, and one in the minister's study, thus insuring good ventilation and good cheer. Especial care has been bestowed upon the construction and lighting of the basement for club, school and other purposes, and no part of the edifice will be considered too good or too sacred for any use which may promote any good word or work. It is the declared wish and hope of Mr. Hubbard, who has given $20,000 for the building, and of the church, to promote not a merely sectarian work, but to use this building and to allow others to use it for whatever is for the general good, without ever asking or caring whether the opinions of such workers harmonize or conflict with their own.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa.—Rev. Dr. Palmer, of the (Universalist) Church of Our Savior, preached a strong sermon here at the reopening of the church Sept. 3, which was published in full in the Cedar Rapids Gazette. One extract will indicate its spirit:

We do not join the church as a step towards obtaining happiness in some other world, nor do we think that by this act we lead God to love us any better, or care for us one whit more tenderly than he does for a man unchurched, or for a far-away pagan who has never heard of Christianity. We join a church to do good in it, and get good from it, here and now. We join a church that we may concert our efforts for good with others who desire to do good, that our little drop, instead of being lost, may become a part of the fountain of life. It is here that I feel, as the minister of this society, that we do not as yet fully appreciate the high calling that is ours. Our actual enrolled membership is too small in proportion to those who in this city sympathize with us. There is no good reason for it. We could double our strength in all proper lines of work, we should enlarge our own confidence, and feel the ground more certain beneath our feet, if we all stood together, a pledged band of brothers and sisters, to do the same work that now we find a pleasure and often an inspiration, while standing in a measure apart and independently.

Des Moines, Iowa.—IOWA CONFERENCE NOTICE.—The date of the Iowa Conference is changed from October 10 to 12 to November 14 to 16. This change has become necessary because the first date fixed upon followed too closely after the Parliament of Religions.—LEON A. HARVEY, Secretary.

The Minnesota Conference (Unitarian) will hold its next session at Duluth, Oct. 17-19. Rev. S. M. Crothers will give the opening sermon. At the request of his parish Alex. Lundeborg will receive his ordination by the Conference. H. G. PUTNAM, Sec'y.

LITTLE MISS FIDGETTY FUME.

Would you know what we call this girl of ours,
Who keeps us awake through the wee sma' hours?
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!
When I want to rest, she wants to walk,
When a book I take, she wants to talk,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!

To dig in the dirt is her delight,
Whatever she wants must needs be right,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!
She throws her dolly down in the rain,
Then cries until she gets it again,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!

She points with pride to the shining moon,
Would like to ride in an air balloon,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!
Floating through yon fleecy clouds of blue
To distant shores of roseate hue,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!

'Twould take too long to tell of her wiles,
Of her quirks and graces, airs and smiles,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!
Of all that is, or can be to me,
This frolicsome fairy on my knee,
Little Miss Fidgetty Fume!

BEFORE BREAKFAST.

A young mother who was filled with the spirit of the kindergarten, and had wisely guided her own children by the insight obtained from her kindergarten study, was called upon one summer to take charge of a little niece for a few weeks. The first morning after her arrival at her sister's home she heard some angry words in the child's bedroom. On opening the door to inquire what was the matter, the nurse said, "Oh, it is just the usual fuss Miss Anna makes each morning over having to be dressed. I am sometimes an hour at it." Further inquiry showed that various means—such as bribing, coaxing and threatening—had been used; but all to no avail. Even the last device used—that of depriving her of marmalade, her favorite dish, at each breakfast at which she was late—had proved ineffectual. The next morning the aunt went into the room and said quietly, "Anna, you can have Mary for twenty minutes to dress you; after that time I shall need her down stairs." The child looked at her for a moment in astonishment, then went on with her play. In vain poor Mary coaxed and urged. The twenty minutes elapsed; Anna was but half dressed. True to her word, the aunt sent for Mary to come down stairs. "But, Auntie," called the child, "I am not dressed yet." "Is that so?" said Auntie. "I am sorry; jump back into bed and wait till Mary comes again." In about fifteen minutes the child called out petulantly, "Auntie, I want to get dressed, I tell you. Send Mary up to me." "I cannot yet," replied the aunt from below; "she is busy just now. Get into bed again, and she will come as soon as she can." Breakfast was sent up to the child by another servant. At the end of an hour Mary came back, and it is needless to say that little Miss Anna was quickly dressed. The next morning the aunt again gave warning that Mary would be needed down stairs in just twenty minutes. This time the warning took effect, and when Mary was called the child was ready. The following morning the force of habit was too strong, and again came the capricious delay. Again Mary was called, and again the child was detained in her room for an hour. Two or three such experiences, however, were sufficient to break up entirely her habit of dallying. So quickly comes the lesson taught by retributive punishment. Many illustrations of the effectiveness of this method might be given, but surely are not needed by the thinking mind.

THE GALLING YOKE.

A FABLE.

A sturdy young ox, impatient of his yoke, was in the habit of throwing up his head with a jerk and so galling the neck of his companion, who protested in no gentle way. Then there would be a retort, until each became hateful to the other.

One day as they were standing still by the sugar mill, waiting for the cane to be unloaded, the first began to complain of the bondage whereupon his companion replied that if he did not jerk his head so much he would find it easier.

"But," said the first, "it galls my neck on top, just where I can't stand it!"

"And," returned the other, "when you throw up your head, it galls my neck below, just where I can't stand it."

"In future," said the first, "I will try and be more careful."

And, as time passed on, it came to be that, through forbearance, no pair of oxen worked better together than they. And even when the cane grinding was over and they were turned out with the other cattle they would often stand neck to neck in quiet and amicable rumination. Staunch old friends they were, who came to bless the galling yoke that bound them to a companionship so lasting, so harmonious and so satisfactory.

JUSTICE.

TO THE EDITOR: It is stated that after the conclusion of the great address of Annie Besant in the Theosophical Congress on the 15th inst., in Chicago, a Christian visitor murmured: "The gospel of Jesus is easier than that!" The speaker had announced the only safe and logical doctrine—justice. Abraham seemed to hold to the same idea: "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" The doctrine of the atonement has been the cause of the laxity of morals which prevails throughout Christendom, and as the listener to the address of Mrs. Besant observed, it is easier than the inexorable doctrine of unswerving justice. Paul seemed to rely on purity of life and not on the atonement, as he declared, "I keep my body under, lest after preaching to others I may be a castaway." Isaiah, the great Hebrew seer, announced as the declaration of the Almighty: "I, even I, am the Lord; and beside me there is no savior." Also, "Put not your trust in princes, in the son of man in whom there is no salvation." That the doctrine announced by Mrs. Besant is to be the coming religion is evident. Even now nearly nine hundred million people are its adherents, including the great scientists and investigators of the world. It is the safe and salutary faith.

LESSON IV.

THE CRISIS OF CONSECRATION.

*A holy purpose in his heart
Has deepened calm and still;
Now from his childhood's Nazareth,

Picture: The Baptism by John. Paul Gustave Dore (1833-1883).

This picture is the worst of the set, and perhaps should not be used at all. Who was John the Baptist?—A young Jew of priestly family, possibly also a relative of Jesus, who by his preaching brought Jesus out to his life work.

Very little dependence can be placed upon the narrative in Luke about the infancy of John: the statement that Elizabeth, mother of John, and Mary, mother of Jesus, were kinswomen, finds no corroboration elsewhere, but may be true, nevertheless. It is not unlikely that his father was a priest: in that case it is significant that of the three great heroes of early Christianity, John was son of a priest, Jesus was son of a peasant, and Paul was son of a Pharisee. Each of the three great divisions of the people contributed its man.

It may be that John went first to live among the Essenes in the wilderness, but when he first comes prominently to view it is not as an Essene but as prophet and preacher of righteousness. It is not easy for us to judge John's work justly, for we think of him only as the herald of Jesus. Yet Josephus, who has but a single casual reference to Jesus, speaks of John as a good man, whose great influence over the people caused Herod to fear him and finally to put him to death, and says that a great defeat, which Herod met with soon afterward, was regarded by the people as a divine judgment upon his cruel treatment of the Baptizer (Antiq. xviii. 5, 2). In the Acts of the Apostles, also, we learn that over twenty years after his death there were men in Ephesus of Asia Minor who called themselves John's disciples. Clearly, therefore, John's movement was very important and powerful: but, after all, its greatest result was the bringing of Jesus to the front.

What was the substance of John's preaching?—He taught the people not to rely upon being Jews for salvation, still less upon meaningless forms, but to do justly and love mercy, and walk humbly with God.

It is noteworthy that the gist of John's preaching as given by Luke falls under the three heads of the passage quoted from Micah vi. 8, and if the report were perfectly authentic we might infer that the passage had been emphasized in his mind because, like the prophet, he, a priest's son, had turned away from the burnt offerings and rivers of oil which were offered as sacrifices well pleasing to God. He bids the publicans and soldiers do justly, he commands the multitudes to show that they love mercy by giving food and raiment to the poor, he charges those who pride themselves upon being children of Abraham to be rid of their arrogance and walk humbly with God. His preaching was at once ethical and universal. It was ethical because he did not urge the people to offer sacrifices or seek out new scruples of conscience. It was universal because it virtually denied the popular belief that all Jews were to be saved just because they were Jews, children of Abraham. He did not demand that the Roman soldiers should become Jewish proselytes, but only that they should deal justly. And this universality of his preaching seems to be disclosed in the rite with which he was so closely identified that he became known as John the Baptist.

What was the meaning of his baptism?—It was the symbol of personal consecration to a new life of purity and service.

Of course in Eastern countries, where lustrations are of so great religious importance, baptism can have been no novel rite. John, however, employed it as a form pledging the recipient to righteousness of life and promising remission of past sins. There seemed to be, however, an even deeper meaning than this. When proselytes were received into the Jewish community three things were required of them: circumcision, baptism, and a sacrifice. In Jewish thought, therefore, baptism was associated with the reception of proselytes. Can it be, then, that by calling both Jews and Gentiles to his baptism John was placing them on the same level, as being both outside the true Israel whose distinguishing note was righteousness. It may be that Luke, with his Pauline leanings, has described the teaching of John as more universal than it really was; but if we trust the record the natural conclusion would be that John had come to a broader view than Jesus had, at the beginning of his ministry, of the relations between Jew and Gentile, and that his baptism was a symbol of his faith.

To Jesus the preaching of John must have been a glad revelation. He, too, had been thinking that the religious leaders of the people were all astray in their teachings, that God could not care for tithings of anise and cummin, for meats and washings and ordinances so much as for justice and mercy, but there was no one to sympathize with him in Nazareth. But he hears now from human lips the words that have been whispered in his own heart, and he, too, joins the new prophet and by baptism consecrates himself to the work that John is doing.

The spectacular features of the narrative, the visible and audible signs, which, indeed, Luke alone represents as done in sight and hearing of all the people, may be dismissed as unhistorical. Neither is there sufficient ground to warrant us in supposing that John refused to baptize Jesus, recognizing in him a holier than himself, or that he acknowledged the peasant of Nazareth to be the Messiah of whom he was but messenger. It is written that Jesus began his life work by preaching as John had done,—Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

By repentance is meant a change of mind concerning the things that are pleasing to God and are worth striving for. The priest must see that justice is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices, and the Pharisee must postpone his interminable discussions till he has fulfilled plain, straight-away righteousness. The multitudes must believe that mercy is more precious than money, that true hearts are more than sacrifice, and simple faith than Jewish blood. This was what Jesus and John meant by repentance: a re-adjustment of the scale of moral and religious values.

And the motive for this repentance is that "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." With John that meant that the manifestation of God's hate of sin was imminent. In Amos the day of the Lord is represented as a day of darkness in which is no light, a day of wrath and vengeance, and John's figures of the ax lying at the root of the tree and the baptism of fire soon to come in which the chaff should be burned, prove that he urged the wrath to come as the motive for repentance. But from the very beginning of Jesus' ministry he discloses a nature totally unlike John's. He, too, urges repentance, but it is the blessedness of the kingdom of God which he emphasizes. With John, the motive is wrath and terror; with Jesus it is love and opportunity. Precisely what Jesus meant by the kingdom of heaven we shall have to study later on. It is enough now to see that he, as well as John, believes that the fulfillment of Jewish hopes is near, that the Messiah is soon to appear, and that it is his duty to prepare the people by rousing them to lives of justice and mercy and humble walking with God.

It is a grievous descent to speak of the manner of baptism, but since the question may be asked it ought to be said that there is pretty general agreement that the method used was that of total immersion.

World's Fair Notes

I have said nothing heretofore of the art in those State buildings in which natural products of wood and field form the medium of expression. For years Sioux City has been famous for its corn palaces, and now Iowa, Illinois and several other States have shown that the artist can pick up many a thing and turn it into effects pleasing and surprising.

The immense landscape in the Illinois Building, composed of over 150 different cereals, which it is computed would have taken 400 days for its completion had one artist performed the entire work, gives a vivid picture of farm life, the grouping of the animals, human and dumb, showing good knowledge of the art of composing and not a little skill in the essentials of drawing. It gives a suggestion of that use beyond use which may add to farm life from out the wastes of field, aided by the unpromising weeds, touches of the beautiful providers of cheer and content. But that the farmer is always so very busy, or thinks he is, he might eke out his hard lot that brings him only cash returns (in good seasons) by many a sally in this direction—for the genius to do it is with him as with other people.

Kansas invites you into the newness of things in many ways; as in her exhibit of the animals that were once wild and numerous, but are for the most part now of the past, a few of their stuffed hides only remaining to speak of the game or terror that once was. This building has more of the frontier in it than any other. The Kansans in spite of the hard times throng thither, and keep up a pretty lively sort of picnic. Music and recitation and politics mingle, and every brow seems to carry boldly some weighty proposition for the bringing of the year of jubilee. It is the Kansas air you breathe, that has lost none of its vitality by being housed here in the White City. The old-fashioned abolition picnics once so numerous in Massachusetts, where everybody had a good time and "bated no jot of heart or hope" for the speedy and triumphant success of the cause, are revived with if anything an added vigor in this new Massachusetts of the West. In the old anti-slavery days you could raise no question but the finale would be "slavery." So to-day the conversation all tends to the new—something as yet not clearly made visible.

"Art? Yes, art in life, the art of living prosperously, harmoniously,—we'll get that first, and then all the adornments necessary after." His brow was high and shining, he tossed the long, golden locks, turning gray, back with his bronzed hand, as though he would say, "Little care I how they look, so I know something." He was a good specimen of nature's warriors who wield ideas rather than swords. He had scented the battle afar. Twenty years ago he "saw the clans of freedom gathering for one last supreme effort to rid white men as well as black men of the rule of enslaving, oppressing monopolists." He would have explained the whole of the new program, I doubt not, but just then the fine band from Topeka played not "Annie Laurie," but far more inspiring strains. If you wish to wake up go to this one of the State buildings.

How many have seen the section of a road laid by a Roman emperor five years before Christ, which Germany exhibits in the Transportation Building? It is an interesting sight in itself, but the real interest lies in its being a starting point from which Germany leads the visitor along the entire evolution of roads to the present time. Gradually one gets impressed with the fact that all Germany does has been forecast with a view to some educational effect. She seems to be pre-eminently the great educational country; that is, there is where she puts her emphasis in this Fair. Much of her art is good, but the exhibit pales before the glow of the fires she lights at every turn, by which mankind may see its way into a broader education. She has caught completely the idea of evolution, and so all she brings is telling the story of growth and perfection slowly attained.

One thinks this and says it, and then turn in whatever direction you will—north, south, east, west—and it seems as though the whole world was coming up to dispute the claim. The school exhibits in the Liberal Arts give a faint idea of the progress of the whole world in the knowledge that is power. And so it seems as though all would be well some day. Mind and heart and body are forging ahead, but Mind is sum and substance of it all. The world is evolving into Mind, and the expectation is that it will distribute all the goods and glories requisite to universal satisfaction.

The Parliament of Religions is conspicuous principally for illustrating the fact that mankind generally is preparing to shed all these old institutional inanities as a snake does its skin, and go forth once more with front movement to the wisdom and goodness that does not need to be "confessed" or housed for perfunctory prayer or praise. The universal and the private mind are coming to a better understanding. All that the Fair contains shows it; the whole world wittingly or unwittingly confesses it.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

Don't be the Axe! Just keep in mind that the grocer or the peddler has "an axe to grind," when he tells you that he has something "as good as" or "the same as" Pearlina. There can be but one reason—more profit to him by your use of the substitutes.

But how is it with you? What reason can you have for wanting to take the risk? Certainly not economy—Pearlina leads to the greatest economy in every direction—saves the most money, time, clothes and health. If your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

OUR readers will notice that our two longest articles this week, the sermon and the paper on the Quakers, are from the most divergent wings of non-Unitarian liberalism.

THE ADVANCE contains a hint which it would be well for our liberal churches to follow. In these days of Oklahomas and Cherokee Strips would it not be well for us to send out a missionary to organize religious work in the new settlements at their very inception?

PROFESSOR HENRY DRUMOND spoke high and helpful words last Monday night in his Convocation Address at the University of Chicago. His theme was evolution in its relation to human development, and he warned his hearers against the two false schools of evolution, to one of which so many belong: the first being that which carries evolution up to man and there stops, afraid to apply it to humanity and society; and the other being that which regards man as a product of evolution, but does not grasp the whole man, is content to consider only a part of his nature, and conceives of evolution only in terms of lower life, instead of seeking to interpret it in the light of its highest manifestations. By these errors, he declared, religion and science were unrightously divorced, —the one school giving us a religion that was not natural, and the other a science that was not moral or religious.

THE only popular successes in the way of attendant conferences held in connection with the great Parliament were the Theosophical and Christian Science congresses. These meetings were thronged. The crowds overflowed one hall after another. This seems to us to be indicative of the readiness of the human heart to ally itself to the Invisible; to believe in the Imponderable. It shows the pathetic and beautiful desire for communion with the Spirit of the universe, for alliance with the potency that lies back of all potentiality. We who find little place for the miraculous, and but little time to study the marvelous, either ancient or modern, are inclined to believe that these restless people, so anxious to escape the slow inductive methods of science, the hard but high conditions of the flesh, are but half emancipated souls drunk with the exhilaration caused by their escape from ancient dogma; not yet sobered enough to appreciate and to trust the modest though sure foundation which science and experience offer to the spiritual life. But they at least prove this, that the soul can be trusted on its God-ward side if only it is developed on its man-ward side. Give the spirit its freedom, and it will fast enough use its wings. Teach the mind to think, and it will soon discover that it is thinking God's thoughts after Him.

THE moral sentiment cannot afford to be unfair. The one hiss of disapproval during the Parliament of Religions, and the dramatic retirement from the stage by Joseph Cook when Mr. Webb prefaced his address on Mohammedanism with some extemporary remarks concerning polygamy, were apparently based on a misunderstanding of what the gentleman was saying or what those people supposed he was about to say, and the newspaper reports have increased the misunderstanding. It now appears that Mr. Webb was drawn into this statement by a demand from Mr. Cook himself, made through Chairman Barrows; at least this is the claim of Mr. Cook. We are glad to give publicity to these sentences taken from a private letter of Mr. Webb himself:

"I regret very much to say that the newspapers have misrepresented the occurrences at my first speech before the Parliament of Religions. They declared that I attempted to defend polygamy, and that I was hissed and called down by the women of the audience. I had no intention of defending polygamy, and did not expect to say anything about it, because it is not a part of Islam and never has been. I do not see how anyone, reading a shorthand report of my remarks, can accuse me of defending polygamy."

Fair play is a jewel. The large deposit of polygamy in the Old Testament of our own Bible ought to make its defenders sufficiently intelligent to discriminate between excrescences and essences, the transient element and the eternal elements, both of which are to be found in every religious system the world has ever known. Mohammedanism has come into closest contact and competition with Christianity, and consequently violent prejudices have been aroused. Now, let them be just to each other and they will soon find how much of inspiration and of duty they hold in common.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE PARLIAMENT.

When at last the eventful eleventh day of September came, and the great spectacle was witnessed, when representatives of the great religions of the world did actually clasp hands, exchange greetings, and joined in confessions of love and good-will, it seemed too good to be true. The notes struck seemed too pure and high to continue. It was a beatific mount of transfiguration upon which the soul might not tarry long. The present writer, who has not been wanting in faith in the project, found himself almost wishing that some unpremeditated and legitimate cause might intervene and put an end to the proceedings at the close of the first day's exaltation, lest the perversity of the theological mind, the limitations of the human heart, might prove inadequate to the occasion and the sequel prove unworthy the glorious introduction. He felt after that first day's triumph like the venerable Simeon in the Gospel story, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light for revelation to the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." But when the program moved confidently and triumphantly along, accumulating strength and warmth as it proceeded; when, spite of the distraction within and without, the great throngs continued day after day, and at last the seventeenth day was reached and the closing hour proved a worthy climax in the great crescendo movement of the spirit—he was again quite content with a minimum estimate, and could say that at its smallest estimate this Parliament of Religions has been a momentous event in the religious history of the world. We believe that the sacramental season on Wednesday night, Sept. 28, when six thousand souls were lifted into the Pentecostal heights from which they understood the message that seemed to be spoken by many and diverse faiths, is to pass into history as a white pillar, a millennial milestone, the first in the history of the world; the first of many more to come. It was an event which will inspire poetry, kindle eloquence, stimulate study, sustain the reformer, and stay the flagging faiths of prophetic souls. At its minimum, that Parliament has exceeded our fondest hopes, has out-reached our highest expectations. The least that can come out of it will subordinate the greatest ecclesiastical councils of the past. Compared with the far-reaching significance of this Parliament of Faiths in Chicago that lasted seventeen days and closed last Wednesday, the councils of Nice, of Dort, Trent, and all the rest of them are secondary; they were local, this universal; they resulted in schism, this made for unity; they inspired disputes, emphasized differences, this rose above disputes and invited harmony.

If nothing more was to come of all this, should we all settle back promptly into the narrowness, the meanness and the faithlessness in which we were imprisoned before this Parliament, still we could but rejoice that here, for once at least, were gathered representatives of all parts of the globe; Asia, Africa, Australia, as well as Europe and America, had their non-official delegates to this non-political conclave convened to estimate the spiritual wealth of the world and to confer as to how to increase that wealth. India, China, Japan, Ceylon, the islands of the sea, England, France, Germany, Scandinavia, Russia, Turkey, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Brazil, Canada and several more countries were represented at this legislature of love. The geographical and political diversity, of course, necessitated the widest range of races. The black and the yellow, for once at least, locked arms with the white, and, judged by popular applause, the pale faces were at a discount. Ham, Shem, and Japheth sent their descendants here, and the arrogant and aggressive descendants of Japheth were scarcely able to hold the position of pre-eminence which they have won by military prowess and commercial sagacity. The diversity of races was matched with the variety of rank and social position. Princes and Salvation Army men, professors and priests, laymen and ministers, men and women, mingled without sense of incongruity. The theological diversity was more significant than any of these. The most awful wars of history have been religious wars. The antipathies of the centuries have been fostered by theologians. As the words testify, society has been dismembered, dissected by the sects in religion, but for once religion triumphed over theology, and there was a reasonably happy family to be seen any day on the platform. The Archbishop of Zante, in his silken brilliancy, and the plain Quaker were there enjoying each other. There bishops Greek, bishops Roman, bishops Methodist, bishops Pagan commingled without discord. Believers in one God, in three Gods, in many Gods, and in no God were held together by some subtle chord of sympathy, woven like so many threads into a tapestry of beauty and of strength. There was a variety of religions as well as of theology; Buddhism, Brahminism, Confucianism, Shintoism, Mohammedanism, Parseeism, not to name the complexities and the contradictions of Christendom, were all interpreted from the inside; they were measured by their friends, interpreted by their own devotees, and this is the only honest and honorable measure or interpretation possible to any religion.

Spite of diversities of climate, race, social position, creedal commitment, and ancestral faith, there was a real unity running through that Parliament. The fellowship was not feigned; the enthusiasm was not assumed; the applause was not conventional. There was little posturing in the Parliament; not much stage thunder. The divergence was manifest where divergence was felt. There were those who were uneasy in the atmosphere of the Parliament. Its air was not salubrious to some lungs. The something that was the unifying element in that Parliament was hardly acceptable to many. And still there was real unity there. And the bands that bound together that promiscuous crowd blended the colors in that variegated pageant. There the ties of human brotherhood, a common love for the prophetic souls of the race, and a common reverence for the unutterable mystery, the divine reality in all lives, showed themselves the common grounds of universal religion, as good and adequate for a neighborhood as for the world, for a home church as for a Parliament of Religions. Let UNITY take heart and go and do likewise.

A "TOWN MINISTER" OF OLDEN TIME.*

In strong, vital families family letters should be kept, for the day may come when some one—perhaps the shy, unmarried sister—will read them through and write out for the branching grandchildren the story of the homestead. Such a dear, shy sister did this deed of love two years ago for the Allen home in Northborough, and she did it so simply well that others beside Allens may read with pride the story. For it is a typical chronicle—typical, not average—of some of the best things in New England character and life. Many a Westerner looking back across the States and years to an old, plain, white, two-storied homestead under the trees in a New England village may feel, in reading it, "This has a sort of family interest for me." And perhaps some young minister in the West, just lighting like a bird of passage for a year or two before he takes flight back to a comfortable Eastern parish, may like to know what ministry meant seventy years ago only thirty miles from Boston.

A deep-rooted family in place, vitality and character, these Allens. The Joseph of the story was born in 1790 on a farm in Medfield, bought from the Indians in 1649, and still occupied by the descendants. His grandfather at eighty could still "vault over a cow!" His father, "Deacon Phinny" (Phinehas), as the neighbors called him, was a boy-soldier of the Revolution and liked to tell the family traditions of "King Philip's war," a century before. Of his eight children seven reached the four-score mark. The little Joseph felt himself set apart for the pulpit from the day when he was lifted to the master's desk in school to speak his piece, and received, on getting down, the master's accolade and heard the sentence, "You must be a minister, my boy!" So Harvard College naturally followed, and in due time the ordination.

That due time came in 1816, and

* Memorial of Joseph and Lucy Clark Allen. By their children. Boston: George H. Ellis, 141 Franklin street. Price, $1.25.

the place was Northborough. One minister to a town was then the rule in Massachusetts, and his ministry was a life-tenure and a contract: the minister was nominated by the church members, but his appointment was talked over and decided in town meeting, and his salary paid by town appropriation,—in this case, $600. Church-and-state in a nutshell! And a primitive era of both church and state. Over the hills still stretched in some directions unbroken forests, though Boston lay so close; the day's event on the village street was the rattle of the mail-coach on the way to Worcester; salaries were largely paid in cord wood and family supplies; it was eight years before a Sunday school, ten years before the first church stove; a half hour's intermission still sufficed to separate the two Sabbath services; and an ordination was so rare that when one came it made a day of jubilee for the whole country-side. The previous one in Northborough fell fifty years before, and there had been none in the adjoining towns for ten.

The next year saw the young minister building his house, planting his orchard, making the flower-beds,—the memorial tablet set up in the church just seventy years later named him among its other benedictions, "a lover of flowers and of little children,"—setting out the sweet brier and woodbine by the porch, getting all ready for the dark-eyed bride who was waiting for him down in Cambridge. That was the order then,—church, house, home, and then a large family, all with business promptitude. The bride was Lucy Ware, daughter of the honored professor of divinity at Harvard College and of Mary Clark, herself a famous parson's daughter, by whose young ears one of the Lexington bullets had whistled on the great April day in 1775. To make Lucy's title clearer, she was sister of the Henry Ware whom even Unitarians have canonized. This was the couple that drove up in the sleigh from Cambridge to that new porch one rainy February evening in 1818,—a seven hours' wedding journey.

From the outset it was a very busy home. "We gave three parties the week after we came here,—about twenty-five each time. First day the old folks, then the young folks, and then the young married folks;" and within a month "a party of ministers to dine, with their wives; they sent word a week beforehand." Apparently this was the regular way of starting things. On the other side of the account there were teas to take about the parish, and—"people have sent us a great deal this winter; about 225 pounds of beef, besides more than 60 pounds of pork, and turkeys, and several cheeses. We had one day 55 pounds of beef in the house. Great helps. It is not probable that any other people are so remarkable for it as they are here."

What must the young parson do? He must write two solemn sermons for each Sunday, and sometimes add an evening lecture; he must start a Sunday school for "catechism" days were passing, and he must write "Allen's Questions" for it,—in how many old church closets linger still those famous little blue books, the worthy patriarchs of our great family of manuals? He must start libraries, and house some of them in the parsonage; and a Peace Society, and Temperance reform before the day of pledges; a new town cemetery, too; and the improvement of the public roads; and tree planting on the common and along the village streets. And he must know each child in the town schools; for forty-nine out of fifty-one years this man was chairman of the school committee. A "town minister," truly,—that is, the town's chief servant, the town's first citizen, the town's initiator of good works, and a responsible counsellor to every home in the parish bounds. In those simple days it was the minister's aim and his success to "interpenetrate the town with his spirit;" and many a New England village to this day still keeps in its tone and standards the thumb-mark, as it were, of some old minister whose stone was mossy in the burying ground fifty years ago. A town minister and a seven-days minister. In more than six and thirty years only twice did Mr. Allen take so much as a single month's vacation; and when celebrating his fiftieth anniversary of ordination he could say, "During all this time I have not been confined to bed by sickness for a single day."

The children soon began to come—in all "a seven-fold chord;" and as the house was yet to pay for, boys were taken in to fit for college, or a young man for the ministry, and, according to the common fashion then, the country parsonage became the mild Siberia to which suspended Harvard students were sent for penal quiet. It was leisure to the mother when "only two or three young men" were under the father's care. To fill up vacant crannies of the time and space nephews and nieces came to stay for weeks together, orphan cousins were brought up, and some needy outside boy or girl was welcomed. All this besides the "guests for the night," who at any time might drive up to the hospitable door: "Last Saturday and Sunday nights we lodged ten besides ourselves." No wonder that the busy woman writes that her only reading was that which her husband read aloud to her, and that "sometimes it is weeks that Mr. Allen does not get time to read aloud at all." For a period of ten years the family was enlarged to a regular boarding-school; once to nineteen boys in a household of thirty-four. But the strong-hearted mother of "the little nation" could write, "Pray do not pity me for having so much care. * * * My exuberance of spirits has been one of the greatest blessings I could have had. I am at the head of a family of twenty children, and, when with them, I feel sometimes just like one of them." It must have been a home-school in best senses of the word,—one perhaps that gave few accomplishments, but much education. The boys published a paper, the first one in Northborough; they had a family postoffice with important mails; they sung the Sunday hymns together with such heartiness that at a family gathering in after-days sixty-four of the old songs were sung again from memory. In all, during the life-time of these two home-makers, "more than two hundred persons in many varieties of relations, and for periods of months or years," shared the happy life beneath their roof. The influence and protection of their home were all the pair were rich in, and this they gave with royal lack of count. How nobly public such a private home! To some extent it leavened the schools and all the town. The town has been remarkable for the number of teachers it has sent out. An investigation once showed that there is hardly a Western State where the children of Northborough have not carried as teachers the New England habits and principles they obtained in the village homes and schools. And the influence of the Allen homestead had much to do with this wide crop of edelweiss. Conditions now have changed in many ways, but do latter-day ministers and their wives task themselves to do as much as these two did?

We cannot follow the record. Indeed there is none to follow. The book is but a group of sketches hinting at their life together. Common sense, duty, unselfishness, self-respect, and a growing reverence from others,—this sums all up: the years held a thousand details and no events. Mr. Allen, we suspect, had a mind emphatically prose and primness, but tender, just, brave, outspoken,—qualities which made him an early abolitionist. All his life he was an early Unitarian in theology, and this made him at first a radical, at last a conservative, among his pulpit brethren. A Unitarian himself, he "never permitted himself, or another, without protest, to call the Northborough society Unitarian—it was Congregational." The rise of two or three new parishes in the town about 1830, to supply the thirst for purer orthodoxy, hurt him; but he bowed to the inevitable, was open-minded on principle, and no man felt more confidently that the world grew better as the years went by. After forty years of service he deliberately resigned his salary to let in a younger man; and it shows the changes that have come over the ministry, that in his last fifteen years of life three colleagues came and went successively, and the old man, with fifty-six years of office, died still the sole pastor of the church. Not a man of the ten talents, but of the five making more than most men out of ten,—said one who knew him well. And as is common with good men who have done the best they could, he could say of the years from seventy to eighty, "they have been among the happiest of my life." He became "a man to all the country dear;" a quaint figure in the various Conferences, revered as a present past. The close was quiet and sweet and child-like: "Just as you please," "Just as you say," becoming his gentle refrains. She died before him. The long strain in mid-life, when she had that "little nation" to preside over, cost the mother dear at last: for nine years the stricken body inclosed a mind serene and an unerring memory, and then she died just two years too young for the Golden Wedding. "She feared nothing so much as our being tempted to value what was not of intrinsic worth, and never spoke of people except for their personal qualities, not their position, wealth or name, unless incidentally." That is the daughter's tribute to the one,—and here a grandson's anecdote of the other: "The crowning characteristic picture of Grandfather—as real as if I had seen it yesterday—is of him going down town, bending over a stone, and throwing it from the road out of the way. That has been so indelibly impressed upon my memory that, whenever I see an obstruction, I remove it, thinking of him. It is a little thing, but I have done it hundreds of times, thinking of him."

Now, as is fitting, a tablet near the pulpit in the church bears an inscription for the two together, to tell what marble may of well-spent lives. We thank their children, and especially the gentle sister, for telling the inspiring story also in a book.

Men and Things

PROF. EDWARD S. HOLDEN, Director of Lick Observatory, has prepared for the October Forum an absorbing account of the wonderful new star discovered in 1892. This star, which resembles our sun, blazed up to an astonishing brilliancy within a few days of its discovery, then gradually disappeared, and subsequently reappeared as a nebula. The changes of light and heat it developed, if repeated in the case of our own sun, would mean a quick end of the human race and the immediate extinction of all life upon this earth! This is the most uncomfortable suggestion with which astronomers have startled us since the spring comet was expected to hit the earth.

UNDER the heading "More Brains, Less Politics" an exchange tells us how Susan B. Anthony, recently appointed as one of the managers of the New York Industrial School for Girls, found these girls doing the washing of the Institution, leaning over washtubs after the manner of our grandmothers. She succeeded in convincing the authorities that it would be a great saving of time and labor for a few of the girls to take the clothes over to the boys' laundry, where all the modern machinery is. The washing was done there with ease and swiftness, to the great delight of the girls. Six days' work in the old style is easily done in two, and there will be leisure for learning other things.

THE Japanese school system is now one of the best in the world. It aims to provide an education for every child in the country. The Japanese will soon be able to supply all the teachers needed in all their schools and colleges and dispense with foreign teachers.

A PHILISTINE CONFESSION.

Fain would I sing in minor key of woe,
In modern fashion, could I only banish

The sunshine from my heart: 'tis quite de trop;

But it won't vanish!

"Court pessimism," urge my cultured friends:

"Think how brute-force the world
sets spinning blindly;
How to blank misery existence tends!"
(They mean it kindly.)

"Surely," they say, "at least you can despair?"

Condemn to darkness all that once seemed brightest!

Feel you no loathing for the fate you share?"

No—not the slightest!

Yet Fortune, too, has mocked me with her moods;

Her fickle wings, alack! she's lightly shaken;

And left me Care for comrade; while my goods

The jade has taken.

"Well then?"—well then, I smile (and
so 'twere vain

For poor contentment's slave to ape
the poet);

"You think God's balance tilts the loss with gain?"

Nay, friend,—I know it!

"THE SERVICE RENDERED BY THE QUAKERS TO MORAL ADVANCEMENT."*

The subject proposed is so comprehensive that but passing justice can be given to it in a limited time. A study of the history of the people called "Quakers" is fascinating even to a radical member of an Ethical Culture Society. In reviewing their struggles for existence as a society we find them worthy of the highest praise for their humility, their noble steadfastness in time of trial, and above all, for their consistency.

When nations or individuals have endured long years of bondage to religious superstition and creeds of formalism, a reaction to extremes of radicalism and simplicity in religion is very likely to follow. When the temporary calm set in, after the storm raised by the Reformation in England, many plain but rigid sects or religious societies came into life; one called the "Seekers," which, by the way, would be a good name for a more liberal organization, was probably a forerunner of the Quakers.

The Puritans were perhaps the most strict and uncompromising in their views, and while they endured persecution with fortitude, and gave up their homes in England, many of them, to find a greater religious freedom in the United States, they in their turn persecuted with fearful cruelty the Quakers, who made peaceful journeys to our country. One of their favorite methods of punishing a man or woman who was even suspected of being a Quaker was to cut off his or her ears and in many cases people were tortured to death for cherishing the plain and simple doctrines of the Friends.

George Fox, by whom the Society of Friends was founded, was possessed of a deeply religious nature, inheriting on his mother's side the spirit of the martyrs, from whom she was descended, and from his father, who was called "Righteous Christer," his high sense of moral duty. As both parents were members of the Church of England, they tried to influence George to become a good churchman, but he rebelled against the formal services of the church, and much preferred sitting quietly by himself on Sundays to think, and these thoughts of his brought forth much good for humanity. At first he was much troubled in mind, his convictions of duty were so entirely different from those around him. He visited many "priests," or ministers of the Church of England, hoping to get light on the questions which were troubling him. He found them but miserable comforters. One advised him to "take tobacco and sing psalms." As he was no lover of tobacco and not in a state to sing, he thought the priest a very poor adviser. As this was only an illustration of all the help he received from the ministers, he began to suspect that, as a class, they were no more worthy of respect than many other folks. He found them often intemperate in eating and drinking, and otherwise impure in their lives, their religion consisting largely of outward show. About this time he became convinced that intemperance was a great sin, although the drinking habit at that time was so common to all that a total abstainer was almost unheard of. This thoughtful young man of twenty years observed the evil effects of the habit on the lives of those around him, and determined to use his influence against it. He then turned his attention to the extravagance of the times, in dress, and to the servile homage rendered to those in authority. He began preaching these new ideas at meetings called "conferences of professors," where dissenters of different denominations discussed their various opinions. So plain and practical were his views, so entirely divested of the supernatural, he was reviled and imprisoned many times, but he soon gained converts, and a society of Friends was formed. The name "Quaker" was imposed on them in derision. As Fox grew in years, his preaching gained great power. He never deviated from his belief that no other authority should be recognized than the spirit of God within the heart, sometimes called by his followers "the spirit of Love," or "the spirit of Truth." His persecutions were bravely endured, although they did not reach the death limit. His death was perhaps hastened by the dreadful torture and exposure he suffered. Many of his followers endured death rather than give up their honest convictions. These trials developed a people that are to this day noted for their clear sense of moral duty and integrity of character.

William Penn, a gay young courtier, wandered into a meeting of these despised Quakers one evening, to gratify a sense of curiosity, perhaps, or it may be he knew enough of their principles to wish to learn more. While the meeting was in progress, the zealous officers of the law raided the place and arrested William Penn with the rest. When they found he was the son of the great Admiral Penn they let him off, but so impressed was he with the injustice of disturbing such a peaceful meeting, he pursued his investigations as to their belief until he finally renounced his gay life and became a Quaker. This caused his father much distress, as he had high ambitions for his son; but although William suffered much persecution, and remained firm to his new faith, he was so brilliant and so diplomatic that he lived down the feeling of resentment his father bore him and retained also the favor of royalty. He continued to wear his gay uniform for some time after joining the Quakers. Asking George Fox's opinion about it at one time, he said, "Wear it as long as thou canst." Afterwards seeing him in a plain dress, Fox asked him why he had changed his gay apparel. He replied that the time had come when he couldn't wear it; he found his influence greater in a plain dress. He became a minister or speaker, and by his teachings did much toward helping George Fox and others extend the growth of the society. His father, before his death, became so concerned over the wickedness of England, he was heard to exclaim many times, "God will judge thee, O England; great plagues are at thy door, O England. We are infatuated; we will shut our eyes." This feeling no doubt softened him toward William's strict views, and just before his death he said to him, "Son William, if you and your friends keep to your plain way of preaching and your plain way of living, you will make an end of the priests to the end of the world." While he was on his dying bed he desired James, then Duke of York, to protect his son against his enemies. This he promised, and fulfilled so well that it was no doubt due to his influence that the king granted him the great tract of land in America, as payment for the services rendered by his father, the Admiral.

Just before this new land called Pennsylvania was granted to Penn, George Fox wrote a paper to all the rulers and magistrates in England, Scotland, and Ireland, to dissuade them from persecution for religion, which so influenced Parliament that early in the year 1681 the House of Commons resolved:

That it is the opinion of the House that persecution of Protestant dissenters upon the penal laws is at this time grievous to the subjects, a weakening of the Protestant interest, and encouragement to popery, and dangerous to the peace of this kingdom.

Although this resolution did not have its full effect, and persecution continued for about three years longer, things looked brighter for the Quakers, and this had its influence, no doubt, in causing a larger number to follow William Penn to this country. How much we in this community owe these two men, George Fox and William Penn, cannot be estimated. Bancroft, the eminent historian, pays an eloquent tribute to these early Friends which I cannot refrain from quoting as a fit summing up of what I have said about the early Quakers and their influence on humanity:

The rise of the people called Quakers is one of the memorable events in the history of man. It marks the moment when intellectual freedom was claimed unconditionally by the people as an inalienable birthright. To the masses in that age all reflection on politics and morals presented itself under a theological form. The mind of George Fox had the highest systematic sagacity and his doctrine, developed and rendered illustrious by Barclay and Penn, was distinguished by its simplicity and unity. The Quaker has but one word, "the inner light," the voice of God in the soul. That light is a reality, and therefore in its truth the highest revelation of truth; it is kindred with the spirit of God, and therefore merits dominion as a guide to virtue. It shines in every man's breast and therefore joins the whole human race in the unity of equal rights. Intellectual freedom, the supremacy of mind, universal enfranchisement,—these three points include the whole of Quakerism as far as it belongs to civil history.—(History of United States, p. 337.)

The history of the separation of the Friends, which occurred during the year 1827, is full of interest to Liberals, as the influence of the so-called Hicksite branch, which came out from the Orthodox Society, has been felt in all progressive religious bodies. I have heard Unitarian ministers remark that one reason their congregational singing was not quite as good as some churches was because so many of the members had been brought up as Hicksite Friends and had not learned to sing. We find this society keeping pace with Unitarians in their denominational papers, and with few exceptions the articles and editorials would do credit to any radical periodical. One writer in a recent number of the Friends' Intelligencer says:

Science and philosophy are being revised and re-revised to meet the demands of proven facts. Traditions are vanishing as a wreath of mist before the rising sun. Even old theologies are being discussed and modified just in proportion as human souls grow into broader and clearer conceptions of eternal truth. There is universal awakening, as it were, a new morning dawning. That "breath of morn" is felt among Friends as elsewhere. This is the spirit of the present. It means growth, unfoldment, evolution of thought and life, a larger expression of the divine indwelling in which we live and move and have our being. It is the "inner light" of George Fox lighting up the pathway of our future and gilding some of the mountain peaks of that eternal progress which lies before us in the eternity to come.

And still another, in closing a tribute to William Penn, writes:

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the Quakerism of to-day is not quite the same as the Quakerism of Fox and Penn, any more than the Presbyterianism of to-day is identical with that of Calvin and Knox. This is necessarily so, for religious systems, like political systems, either change to meet the changing needs of the passing years, or they wholly pass away and give place to something else.

I quote from these papers simply to emphasize the fact that the Friends are in the line of progress and all moral advancement to-day, just as they have been in the past.

The story of the separation reads strikingly like the story which is filling our papers to-day of a separation which is bound to come in the Presbyterian Church. Elias Hicks, who led the Friends into a larger religious liberty, thereby influencing the whole world, was a character worthy of more than passing notice. Acknowledged first as a minister during the American revolution, he kept up many meetings all through the excitement of war, and passed through the lines of both armies six times without being molested. An old writer describes him at eighty years:

His figure was tall, his proportions muscular and athletic; his face of the Roman cast, intellectual and commanding; his voice deep; his gesture dignified and graceful. He had perhaps as much of what is called presence as any man who could be named. The knowledge that he was to speak had drawn together a large assembly which was sitting, when he entered, in the most profound silence. Statuary could not have been more still. Not a limb stirred, not a garment rustled, not a breath was heard. At length this venerable figure rose like an apparition from another world, and poured forth a strain of natural eloquence that is not often surpassed.

With a clear vision this prophet of the future saw that many Friends were dwelling too much on outward signs, and losing the spirit of truth, which he loved to call the "inner light." He became convinced that radical treatment was needed, and delivered a series of sermons on his travels and in Philadelphia, which, although always delivered in a sweet spirit of love for humanity, stirred the fossilized members of the society; and they roused from their petrified state to bitter and long-continued opposition to Elias Hicks and his teachings. So persistent was this opposition that the Progressive Society withdrew from the Philadelphia yearly meeting in 1827. Hicks died three years after, over eighty years of age. His last years were spent in perhaps the most arduous duties of his life, traveling through Pennsylvania, Ohio and New York, strengthening the new societies and spreading his doctrine of a reasonable religion.

To show more clearly his views on matters considered essential to Christianity, let me quote from his writings about the Bible:

It is my candid belief that those who hold and believe the Scriptures to be the only rule of faith and practice, to these it does much more hurt than good. And has anything tended more to divide Christendom into sects and parties than the Scriptures? and by which so many cruel and bloody wars have been promulgated? And yet at the same time may it not be one of the best books if rightly used under the guidance of the Holy Spirit? But if abused, like every other blessing, it becomes a curse. Therefore, to these it always does more hurt than good, and thou knowest that these comprehend by far the greatest part of Christendom.

And again, in one of his Philadelphia sermons, he said, still speaking of the Bible:

Some are led away to the worship of images by being deceived and turned aside by tradition and books; they worship other gods beside the true God. They have been so bound up in the letter that they think they must attend to it to the exclusion of everything else. Here is an abominable idol worship of a thing without any life at all,—a dead monument. Oh, that our minds might be enlightened; that our hearts might be opened, that we might know the difference between thing and thing. Most of the worship of Christendom is idolatry, dark and blind idolatry; for all outward worship is so; it is a mere worship of images, for if we make an image merely in imagination it is an idol.

Compare this with the "heresy" of Dr. Briggs as expressed in his inaugural address in taking the chair of Biblical theology at Union Theological Seminary, and we find Elias Hicks of 1827 and Dr. Briggs of 1893 thinking along the same lines and rendering the same service to moral advancement. In his Inaugural Address Dr. Briggs says:

There are few who are able to rise by reflection into the higher consciousness of God. These few are of the mystic type of religion; the men who have been the prophets of mankind, the founders of religions, the leaders of Revivals and Reformations, who, conscious of the divine presence within them, and certain of His guidance, lead on confidently in the paths of Divine Providence. Some of them have been the leaders of thought in modern times in Great Britain, Germany and America. * * *

It may be that these modern thinkers have a divine calling to withdraw men from mere priestcraft, ceremonialism, dead orthodoxy and ecclesiasticism, and concentrate their attention on the essentials of the Christian religion.

Martineau could not find divine authority in the Church or the Bible, but he did find God enthroned in his own soul. There are those who would refuse these Rationalists a place in the company of the faithful. But they forget that the essential thing is to find God and divine certainty, and if these men have found God without the mediation of Church and Bible, Church and Bible are means and not ends; they are avenues to God, but are not God.

All this seems but mild heresy to us, but it serves to arouse humanity from the stagnation of superstition and tradition.

The discipline of the Quakers as a guide to a high moral life has almost never been surpassed by any other guide or creed. Their marriage contracts are carefully made under guidance of the society. Much care and thought is given to the education of children. Temperance and purity of life are insisted upon; not only in their discipline, but every year in their annual meetings each member is asked if he has faithfully adhered to the rules and lived a strictly moral life. They also, as a society, generally live up to the principles set down in the discipline, that debts of all kinds are disgraceful. They also declare strongly against gambling, against capital punishment, and war is looked upon by them as utterly wrong and unnecessary. Of course time has made much of the discipline obsolete, where moral principle is not involved; and it is being revised from year to year.

The attitude of the Quakers was from early times against human slavery; and while members of the society at one time held slaves, they were perhaps the first sect to realize the wrong and injustice of the system. Elias Hicks while a young man resented the labors of a committee sent by the Friends to reprove his father for keeping slaves,—as an interference with the rights of property,—but so successfully did the committee labor with him, that he changed his views on the subject so entirely as to become an earnest advocate for the freedom of the slaves, and, after he had influenced his father to liberate the family slaves, he became their guardian, looking after them in their old age and leaving them a bequest at his death. His influence upon the whole society in this direction was incalculable, as he traveled extensively and his persuasive eloquence was highly convincing. Although the society as a whole was a mighty power against this evil, our thoughts turn specially to a few names which have come to us as great leaders in the agitation which accomplished so much for the moral advancement of our country.

Lucretia Mott was always the noble, fearless and eloquent champion of the colored race. To read her life and letters by her granddaughter, Anna Hallowell, is a liberal education. It not only fills one's soul with admiration for such a symmetrical and powerful life, but it gives us an insight into the struggles of the early days of anti-slavery agitation, and also a glimpse of the courage of the Quakers who were standing firm for their convictions after the Separation, which we could perhaps get in no other way.

Isaac T. Hopper, the friend of the weak and oppressed, not only did valiant work against slavery, but in New York City he constantly sought out the poor and tempted, helping them to higher, purer lives. Lydia Maria Child tells many anecdotes in her letters from New York in 1844 of his work for prison reform. He interested himself in individual prisoners, assisting them to get work after leaving the prison, and in every case treating them with fatherly kindness. Hundreds of young men and women were thus led by him to a self-respecting life, and he told Mrs. Child that only two ever disappointed him by returning to unlawful ways. His daughter, Abby Hopper Gibbons, who recently died in New York, inherited his wonderful love for humanity, and her work for prison reform in the State of New York is noted all through our country.

Another Friend prominent in the annals of anti-slavery days was John Woolman, of whom Whittier writes in the introduction to Woolman's Journal, which he compiled:

Sin was not to him an isolated fact, the responsibility of which began and ended with the individual transgressor; he saw it as a part of a vast network and entanglement, and traced the lines of influence converging upon it in the under-world of causation. Hence the wrong and discord which pained him called out pity rather than indignation.

From this pure-souled reformer we turn to Whittier, the ideal Quaker, and with all his modesty the most widely known and altogether the greatest Quaker of the nineteenth century, whose ringing words for moral progress will never grow old, but will ring on, with their simple but telling power, all through the centuries to come. How inspiring to liberal reformers are these words of his:

Oh, sometimes gleams upon our sight,
Through present wrong, the eternal Right;

And step by step, since time began,
We see the steady gain of man,—

That all of good the past hath had Remains to make our own time glad,
Our common, daily life divine,
And every land a Palestine.

Through the harsh noises of our day,
A low, sweet prelude finds its way;

Through clouds of doubt, and creeds of fear,

A light is breaking calm and clear.

These names we have specially noted are only a few taken from a host of other names of worthy souls in this large body of people called Quakers, who carry under their plain coats very large hearts, and under their hats brains teeming with progressive schemes for the uplifting of the human race. While we recognize their limitations, we cannot fail to realize, after a careful study of their past and present history, that their influence is and has been in the past on the side of moral advancement.

DID MOHAMMED DRAW THE SWORD?

It is, to our mind, a sound canon of criticism that every system of thought or religion should be interpreted by its friends. Its meaning can only be fully measured from within. The following letter, received by the editor of UNITY from the editor of the Moslem World, published in New York, is, to the average English student of Mohammedanism, somewhat startling, to say the least. As to the soundness of Mr. Webb's position we can only say his word carries much more weight than ours; he is in a far better condition to judge of this matter than the author of the little pamphlet in question. And if that pamphlet reaches its second edition we will see to it that the great light of the desert shall have the full benefit of the doubt in a supplementary note. Meanwhile, not for controversy but for truth's sake, we will be glad to publish in UNITY any communication, otherwise available, that may throw light upon this interesting subject.

Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones:

MY DEAR SIR—I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled "Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia," and I assure you I am greatly pleased at the manner in which you have treated the subject. It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. I can see plainly how your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher, and I congratulate you sincerely upon having made such a bold and effective stand in favor of truth. This refers to the lecture up to the second paragraph on page 18, and there you fall into the erroneous conception so common among Christians. Mohammed never headed nor countenanced a persecuting movement. If you will read Moulvi Cheragh Ali's excellent work entitled "A Critical Exposition of the Jihad," you will see clearly how unjust it was to accuse our prophet of an aggressive warfare. He was one of the mildest, gentlest and most perfectly non-aggressive men known to history, and always discouraged and condemned acts of violence. This whole idea of aggressiveness that pervades Christian literature relative to Islam is grossly erroneous, and it never developed at all until long after the reign of the third Caliph. Even then it was grossly exaggerated, so far as the Koran is concerned. Let me assure you that there is no translation in English that fairly reflects the character of the original, and when we judge the Koran by the English translation we do an act of injustice. The Koran was not compiled until after Mohammed's death, and he never saw it in its present condition. My estimate of Islam is based upon the true teachings of the prophet, and not upon the theories and conclusions of the modern Mohammedan doctors. This I think is the only fair and just way. I think you will agree with me that the mass of what is known as Church Christianity to-day is not a reflection of the teachings of Jesus at all. When we compare the character of Jesus as we find it reflected in the church literature, we find an almost exact counterpart in characteristics to Mohammed. Renan declares "that Mohammed was timid almost to cowardice and presents a character thoroughly non-aggressive."

Yours sincerely and fraternally,

M'D ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB.

THE THEOLOGICAL EMANCIPATION OF WOMEN.

A SESSION OF THE UNITARIAN CONGRESS HELD FRIDAY, 2:30 P. M.

In spite of the great attractions at the hall of Columbus, a large audience assembled to hear the program presented at the women's meeting on Friday afternoon. Rev. Mrs. Celia P. Woolley, in opening the meeting, said that the Unitarian household, with its basal principles of reason as applied to faith, broad fellowship, and recognition of good in all religions, had long been ready for this Parliament. The present is not only the day of liberty, but is pre-eminently Woman's day with a large W.

Miss Mary Cohen, of Philadelphia, presented the contribution of Judaism to the theological emancipation of women. The law of the Jews in this respect, she said, as recorded in the Pentateuch, contains all the essentials for woman's complete emancipation. In the Decalogue, and more notably in another passage in Leviticus, are injunctions to respect and honor both mother and father. Deborah, with her fine, poetic expression, and Hannah, with her religious devotion, are in their emancipation in striking contrast with Delilah. It is not generally known that the beautiful Magnificat of the Christian ritual owes its origin to the sublime prayer of Hannah. The fine portrait of woman in Proverbs is in many respects one of independence. Milton S. Terry thinks that probably a woman was the author of the Song of Songs, that poem which extols the virtue and changeless devotion of woman. Many examples of women in the Talmudic times were cited. In many of the bodies of Progressive Jews women are received as members entitled to vote on all subjects relating to the management of the society, and women are now entering the ministry and proving themselves a power for good. Judaism allows its women absolute freedom to work with people of all creeds in matters of philanthropy and practical reform.

Mrs. Jane Patteison of Boston treated of Universalism as a profound philosophy of nature and life. It teaches the Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. To the love of women's hearts more than to the preaching of the elders does Christianity owe its progress; and in nothing is their power more seen than in declaring that God is love. The Universalist Church has long stood for complete emancipation of women. Four of its colleges have from their foundation been coeducational, and now Tufts college has opened all its departments, even the theological, to women. The church has long ordained them, and has been the first denomination to confer, through one of its educational institutions, the degree of D. D. upon a woman. Rev. Marion Murdoch, of Cleveland, Ohio, presented the subject from a Unitarian standpoint, in a forcible and attractive paper. She showed the disastrous effect of a division of human interests in the home, the state and the church. For this division women are responsible as well as men; weakness as well as power must be called to account; timidity as well as temerity must receive condemnation. The kingdom of heaven as well as the kingdom of earth has been divided against itself. God to the early Hebrew was a magnified man in armor. But this idea was modified at a later time. Isaiah introduced the element of tenderness, and Jesus gave beautiful recognition to the Fatherhood of God. But it remained for the leaders of liberal thought in our own time,—Bartol, Parker, and the rest,—to declare that motherhood also must typify Divinity. "Release or enlarge God," said Diderot of France. Only with this releasing and enlarging thought of God was the theological emancipation of woman possible. The movement under Hosea Ballou had emphasized the love of God, reaching to the depths of hell and destroying it, and women were at once welcomed to its ministry. The movement under the leadership of Channing and Emerson emphasized the divinity of every soul without regard to place or race or sex; showed that we must acquaint ourselves at first hand with Deity; and declared the unity of the human as well as the Divine nature. Again, as was most fitting, women were gladly received and ordained. Emancipate theology and you emancipate woman. Women and men must work together along all the lines of life. Unity, co-operation, will alone redeem the world. The creators of life must combine to conserve life. Thus only can come spiritual blessedness to the race.

It was on this occasion, as always, a pleasure to hear the word of Mrs.

Ednah D. Cheney, who spoke for the Free Religious Association. She related an incident in which she had received recognition of her rights to preach in a remark made by Whittier: "If that woman had a Quaker bonnet on she would preach within six months." She said further: "I am glad to represent the Free Religious Association here to-day; glad to have it represented in this Parliament. For this meeting together of people of all faiths will free us, will show us the unity deep down in the heart of us. To be in the Free Religious Association is like going out of a stifling hall into the fresh air. Its fundamental principle is that every being has the same right of standing by his own thought, living his own life, determining the relation of self to God and man. Thus is woman completely emancipated in this organization. One of the men who are among us from India was questioned about the women of his country, and replied, 'They are educated enough for us men; we like them as they are.' But it will be well for us to ask of them, 'Are they educated enough for themselves?' You have read in the pretty story by Mary Wilkins, of the woman who looked all her life for a window which would give her an outlook on the main road and the passers-by. Many a woman is longing for a window in her life, to give her a broader outlook. The Free Religious Association gives this outlook; respects the individuality of women, and the integrity of the mind of children."

In a brief closing word, Mrs. Woolley most fittingly called attention to the fact that this meeting had discussed the theological, not the religious emancipation of women. It is well that we should remember the distinction between religion and theology. The former has its roots deep down in human nature; it is related to the ethical consciousness, related to our sense of mystery and aspiration. Theology is only one way of explaining and defining religion. We women must remember that we are not to be emancipated because of some sentiment or insight we have reached. We must think our way through the great problem as men have done. The time has long since come when we may use the same methods; it may be long before we shall reach the same great results. It is as thinkers alone that women may claim and obtain emancipation.

THE CONGRESS OF EVOLUTIONISTS.

Last winter, when Prof. Drummond was delivering his course of lectures on evolution before the Lowell Institute, in Boston, listened to on account of his religious and literary reputation by all the Hub's respectability and best blood, a lady at the close of the one on the Evolution of Man was overheard to say to her daughter as they passed down the stairs: "Oh, my dear, let us hope it isn't true; but, if it is, let us keep mum about it." It was no such feeling that animated the Congress of Evolutionists at their meetings last week in the rooms of the Art Palace. Instead of hoping that their descent from animals was not true, they came together in the certainty that it was, and instead of keeping "mum" about it they gloried in its truth and did all they could to have it believed by all the world.

It was a most appropriate thought in the minds of a few Brooklyn and Chicago gentlemen that, amid all the world's wonders of agriculture, industry, art, science, reform, and religion collected together in its great Fair, the crowning product of the age and the one which will make the nineteenth century forever memorable in history should not be left out; and though the effort to arrange for its exposition was begun at a late hour, too late to get papers and attendance from all its great advocates and friends, it did shape itself finally into a very considerable success. Three days, with three sessions a day, following immediately the close of the Parliament of Religions, were devoted to its gatherings; and the topics taken up included not only its Darwinian department of man's descent from an animal ancestry, but with this the larger ones of Biology, Psychology, Sociology, Political Economy, Ethics, Philosophy, and Religion. An evening, also, was devoted to the heroic discoverers and exponents of its truths. No new and startling discoveries were announced, and no strictly scientific investigations presented, for this was not the purpose of the congress, but its time was used in a general survey of the field, and it was thoroughly representative of what has been accomplished in the past, and of the various classes of mind, their caliber and character, which have come under its influence. Valuable papers were read from Spencer, Haeckel, Wallace, Fiske, and other of its great lights, expressing their sympathy with the gathering and contributing some words of their own to its discussions; and each day had its careful addresses, in which the presence and personality of its lesser advocates added a human interest and charm to their lines of thought. Some of the essays thus delivered were exceedingly brilliant, enchanting the audience alike with the grandeur of their views and the eloquence and picturesqueness of their presentation. Others,—as, for instance, that of Dr. Bayard Holmes on "Evolution as Applied to Disease,"—were listened to with hardly less attention than those by the more theoretical writers, because of their fresh and valuable practical suggestions; and others still awakened enthusiasm because they touched on the great themes in economics, ethics and reform with which the times are alive. Only a small percentage of them were cranky and crude, and it was noticeable that even these were listened to with the same respectful, if not interested, attention as the more brilliant ones, the audience recognizing that, as believers in the origin of our wonderful universe from a nebulous mist, it was only proper that they should tolerate among themselves likewise a little nebulosity of mind. There was also one paper from "Gail Hamilton" on "The Beastliness of Modern Civilization," coming under all of these heads, which convulsed the audience with its wit, pathos, pungent satire, gilt-edged scolding, graphic descriptions, and gleams now of utter nonsense and anon of plain good sense; and an interesting, if not altogether valuable, part of the contributions were a hundred or more letters received from public men in various parts of the world, giving their opinion as to the practical efficacy of evolution in dealing with economic and social problems.

More significant, however, than any opinions were the emphasis and prominence which all of the papers gave, of themselves, unsolicited, to the great humanitarian, ethical and religious aspects of evolution, and the new and helpful light which they threw on the various problems with which our age has to deal. There was hardly a flippant or pessimistic word uttered in all the nine sessions. Very little was said that was merely speculative and metaphysical; and the "moral interregnum" once so loudly prophesied as the immediate result of the new philosophy, did not cast on the gatherings one faintest shadow. Not a professedly religious or ethical meeting held in Chicago this wonderfully be-meetinged autumn has been more profoundly ethical and religious than the Evolution Congress,—all, moreover, spontaneously so. Even Mr. Haeckel's paper was a statement largely of his religious faith. It was all, likewise, not along the old ruts, but in the strict new openings of the new philosophy. Of course the work is promise yet, rather than performance; but there is no mistaking its direction. Evolution is to be no laissez faire doctrine. It is going to work, going to work not against nature but with it and as a part of it, going to study its methods, laws and great onward-sweeping currents, so as to work with them wisely,—a study more needed to-day for success than anything else. The gathering of last week was the first, but it will not be the last of its congresses. It will aim not to build up an organization of its own, or to push aside any existing organization, but to show its new, better, living way to all everywhere who are now at work for human good. And so doing, it will not be strange if the stone rejected at first by the ethical and religious builders should be made at last the corner stone in the great temple of the world's coming civilization.

THE MAGAZINES.

IN THE FORUM for September Dr. McGlynn's article on the Vatican and the United States is especially interesting reading for those who doubt the willingness of the Roman Church to adapt itself to liberal institutions. The number has many interesting articles, but perhaps John G. Brooks' paper on Compulsory State Insurance in Germany and Edward M. Shepard's on the Brooklyn Idea in City Government (the idea of a single responsible executive) are the most attractive in these days of governmental reform. The former paper seems to us suggestive rather than instructive, and we feel that a little more pains (and possibly a little more space) would have made it both. But The Forum under its present editor is so good a magazine that it is almost unfair to mention certain articles to the exclusion of others. Helen Watterson's protest against "Women's Excitement over 'Woman'" (and we think the excitement is not confined to women) is timely.

THE COSMOPOLITAN for September is a World's Fair number, thirteen out of the sixteen prose articles treating of the Exposition, and the new scientific department being chiefly given to World's Fair exhibitions. Those who have not yet visited the fair would do well to read this number before doing so, that they might know what to look for. Howells' "Traveller from Altruria" seems to be near an end, and shows more and more distinctly how widely socialism has gained possession of the public mind.

THE UNITARIAN for September contains a particularly good sermon by the editor—an appeal to the young—and a helpful paper by Dr. Jas. T. Bixby, entitled, "What Can the More Prosperous Do for the Less Prosperous?" the second of a series of articles. The number also contains an interest-arousing notice of Hull House, by Mrs. Sunderland, whose admirable paper on the utility of comparative religion, recently delivered in the Parliament of Religions, received such general appreciation.

THE EVANGEL, Mr. Edgar Leavitt's little monthly, published at Santa Cruz, Cal., is an ably conducted Universalist paper. The criticisms it contains are especially bright and generally well taken,—witness the article "No Creed," in which the dogmatism of the Campbellite "Christian" is shown, and the criticism of certain forms of pantheism. The series in which this latter is found is not, however, as good throughout as it is in parts.

NEW OCCASIONS for September is especially noteworthy for the several discussions of profit-sharing. The editor's article on the Hill banking system is interesting and timely.

Church-Door Pulpit

A PROGRESSIVE CHRISTIANITY.*

BY REV. DAVID SWING.

"I am made all things to all men."—1 COR. ix. 22.

All modern Christianity is progressive. Consciously or unconsciously all the forms of Christian thought and conduct are progressive forms. Even those denominations which most glory in their immutability are the embodiments of great progress, and are not and never again will be what they once were in faith practice. This proposition, so general and so important, could be easily proven from church history were that my present purpose. It is my wish, however, to inquire what is meant by a progressive Christianity, and to inquire into its value and into the agencies which are giving religion new shapes and assigning it new duties.

By a progressive Christianity in the true sense of the words must be meant a religion that is gradually going forward in finding truth and bringing public happiness. There are persons who through ignorance or stubbornness or timidity do not distinguish between progress and novelty or eccentricity. They class the disciples of progress in Christianity along with those who have itching ears for news or for gossip, or with those who are seeking the elixir of life or who are founding colonies for the production of human perfection. They associate progress in Christianity with quackery in medicine, and think both a shameful parody of the grand old truth. And there are reasons why those should be well questioned and cross-questioned who announce themselves as disciples of "progress," for there really is in Christianity a mock progress, an assumed advance, which is as contemptible in religion as such an assumed progress is in medicine or in politics. But the fact of such a false reform does not affect the great proposition that we are all living amid a progressive faith; and that this spiritual advance possesses or may possess many forms of nobleness. The pretenders and the self-deceived in medicine do not prove that that large science and art is not moving constantly away from the first lessons and going on unto perfection. The true progress must be seen over and through all the medical falsehoods and weaknesses which are flamed forth in the prints or emblazoned on all dead-walls and on even Nature's uncomplaining rocks. In politics the mistaken and the false men come along calling Communism or Fourierism a progress, and contending for those ideas as though they were the best realities of all society. Thus on all sides men come with a novelty, and wish us to call it a reform; and to distinguish carefully amid these many phases of life is a confessed duty.

But as there is a true progress in politics, not Socialism nor Communism but a reform called republicanism, or freedom, so in Christianity there may always be a higher advance which shall be far above a mere novelty or eccentricity. And when not an absolute advance this motion will at least be a valuable adaptation to the wants of mankind. That steamboat preaching, where the servant of the gospel makes his truth attractive by a trip down a bay, is not to be supposed any part, however small, of a Christian progress, but it is to be judged the eccentric movement of a single mind, just as there is here and there a mortal who wishes to get married in a mammoth cave or up in a balloon or on the crags of Mont Blanc. It is often difficult to distinguish between man's progress and his absurdity, because we are all lovers of the new and strange as well as of the good. It is possible that our great tabernacle services which have run through the large cities at such great cost of money were a novelty rather than a religious advance, for we are all such mere children that we cannot always distinguish between our wisdom and our amusement. We often think ourselves full of philosophy when we are simply happy over our food and drink.

But after we shall have made all allowance for false reforms and for the eccentricities of individuals, there yet remains to be considered the fact of a progressive Christianity, its nature and worth. Let us define such a religion.

It adapts itself to man. Not to one man, a Cummings or a Moody, or a Spurgeon or a Lorenzo Dow, to a man noble or odd, but to the wants of society, and shapes itself just as a government shapes itself to the advancing people. When the subjects are ignorant slaves, then the king is a despot and passes all laws, or without law or precedent puts to death whom he will; but as rapidly as intelligence rises in the people, power falls in the king. The community drains the man. Thus government adjusts itself to new conditions of the human mind and was one thing yesterday, is another thing to-day. So Christianity becomes all things to all men, and caring little for any one man or any one group of men, adjusts itself to the status of the numberless multitude. It will always be vain for the eccentric to say, "Follow me in my path," or for the hyper-orthodox to say, "Stay with me in my closet;" for unless that path be for all men, unless that closet be as large as the century, the Christianity sweeping by will disregard these voices. It will be all things to all men, and, equally, different things to the different ages. We should all hasten to read these adaptations, should attempt to distinguish between a valuable change and a mere freak of thought, and then to lend our hand and heart to the valuable new. It is a hard lot when one is held as a slave. The beauty and impulse and possibilities and freshness of individualism are thus cut off and life is lived only for an old master. This same hardship may befall those who are only the slaves of a custom, for they may be held back by a form of old thought and thus denied the impulse and usefulness of their times. Their age may have for them a work their hands have not found, a music their ear has not detected.

The church was once the entertainment of the multitude. In this crisis we cannot again wake up a vast debate such as shook empires when Protestantism was being born and Romanism was being dethroned; we cannot find any Luthers or any Wesleys, or any call for them; we cannot infuse life into the inquiry about Jews or Quakers or Baptists or Puritans or witches; we can by no means thus make the people all seek again the church or meeting-house and, to reach it, walk miles in sun or snow. It would seem that the church in all its names must readapt itself, readjust itself, as government changes itself when it beholds the transformation of the people. It may be that it does not lie in human power to lead the multitude back into the church, for man can no more waken a spiritual flame than he can order an earthquake or a tempest, but changes and movements are always waiting the will of man, and he can greatly help the world even if he cannot convulse it. But to do this he must confess that an old custom is often a bondage, and that his Christianity is a religion of almost endless adaptability, and that it may do all things for all men. If, on account of the death of old commotions, the people do not come to the church, the church must go toward the people. The church, in the centers of education and wealth, must build its second house among the poorer masses, and the preacher who has for years spoken to only one group must henceforth speak half of his time to the so-called humbler multitude.

An old custom must pass away with the passing away of the accidents which made it, and a new custom must come with new accidents. A tabernacle built here and there and overloaded with service for a few weeks, or religious excursions in August, for the common people, is only a satire upon a great Christian age. To reach the people, it will be necessary for an iron custom to be changed. The multitude is too large to be left to the care of any spasmodic method, or to three or four men, be they great or only odd; it must pass to the care of the tens of thousands of pastors who can go forth each Sunday evening in the full force of their office. The best portion of their morning audience should go with them, and thus rapidly would they bring about a diffusion of truth and a cementing of friendships. Now, to do this, the church must break the chains of an old custom which has been transformed by time from a friend to a harmful enemy. All other ways of reaching the people will fail, for good as they may be, they are utterly insignificant in the presence of the vast need of the world.

Education does not seek its ends by means of any tabernacle service, nor by any amazing effort of one man; but it plants its schoolhouse everywhere, builds it of logs or of stone, and sends forth thousands of teachers and gathers all the children—gathers them not one day only, but winter after winter and spring after spring; and at last an enlightened race moves where Indians once danced around tortured captives, or moved out like tigers for fresh blood. The old underground railway gave liberty to a few detached slaves. Here and there a lonely black man or a little family would steal over the Ohio and move northward. But how poor was this means to an end where there were four millions under the taskmaster's whip. It was only when the whole nation arose that the movement became large enough to wring out the word liberty from the reluctant master and to write it down upon the African soul.

A progressive Christianity will not only change its place of speech, shifting its pulpit about from avenue to common street, but it will change readily the subject matter of its sermons. Here, too, it will distinguish between a necessity and a custom. It will be confessed that the evangelical pulpit has for time almost immemorial preached what it calls "Christ," or the "Blood," or the "Saving Doctrines," but I do not hesitate to deny that it has done this to the world's advantage, and that it can continue so to preach without working society an injury. To omit the few leading doctrines would ruin church and public, but the moral wants of man are many and large, and the pulpit or church which shall meet these must widen out its domain of thought. Society can learn a Bible statement as easily as it can learn a historic or scientific statement, and hence as the story of Washington need not be proclaimed to the same persons once each week, so no one doctrine of religion need be repeated each Sunday for successive generations. The faithful church will lead the common people in thoughts over industry and economy and domestic kindness.

Once the millions loved philosophical abstractions. Men dinnerless and barefooted would discuss with delight the trinity, the decrees; and would hang over "eternity" and "immutability" with a delicious amazement. To such tastes Plotinus and Abelard and Calvin and Edwards addressed their powerful intellects. But that old taste for the abstract has perished and almost the whole living throng of Europe and America would rather have good food and good clothes and a good bed for self and children than to hear from gifted lips the sweetest kind of metaphysical philosophy. When Pere Hyacinth drew after him the multitude of Paris and won his great Catholic fame he was preaching simple sermons about home and home duties and about the actual relations of religion and life. The Catholic world was amazed to find itself fed upon something else than incense and prayers and masses and vespers.

It is not to be doubted now that those identical clergymen who grew angry over pulpit politics before the fall of slavery, and who contended that the faithful preacher preached only Christ and left to statesmen political ideas, are now happy to attack communism and to find their gospel expanding until it can calmly reason with a disturbed populace. Thus the gospellers who could not mix up slavery and theology can, with perfect ease, mingle theology and a socialist. Thus even from an enemy we may learn that after all the pulpit possesses a breadth of theme, and may, as it is carried along by the ages, feed out the truths which the people most need. As our public men now bless the Catholic church for what words it has spoken against the theories and the acts of communism, so will the world thank, at last, all denominations for all the sermons they shall ever preach to the people upon the practical themes of common life. A new adaptation of themes must come because new wants and new weaknesses and new sorrows and new temptations have come.

A progressive Christianity cannot approach any forms of sensationalism. Progress always leads away from such resort. The Indians and the early Goths and the Negroes demanded colored flags and beads to lead them in worship, but Christianity cannot march through our century if it shall rely much upon a brass band and amazing subjects of discourse. The leader will seem to have a great success, but the multitude repelled will be infinitely larger and better than the multitude that seems charmed by the device. What we are seeking is a form of preaching that will attract not silly men and the children, but that will command the respect of the vast number which make up the republic or the empire. It is my own impression that the simpler and the more applicable to life the pulpit themes shall become the larger and better will be the number who shall on Sunday turn their steps toward the sanctuary. There must not indeed be any contempt for good speech and for a high order of music, but sensationalism is suitable only for the earlier forms of human life when it is emerging from the paint and ornaments of its barbarian epoch.

The themes of each age are in some mysterious manner selected by the age itself. Something has induced the men and women of the present to debate earnestly their temporal welfare. Men and women do not starve or go naked as patiently as they once did. They do not bear well the sufferings of their little children. Hearts which once viewed with indifference the future of their own children now ache with solicitude over the fate of each little one, and hence all these demand of the sacred teachers lessons not in the art of growing rich, but in the noble art of finding the most true happiness in these years. They therefore will listen to the pulpit which shall come not only between them and poverty but between their children and intemperance and idleness and dishonor. New forms of human solicitude have come to demand of all public teachers a new line of argument and eloquence.

The advocates of the most rigid orthodoxy put themselves in the way of a wider moral instruction of the largest possible number by their peculiar repugnance to all changes of custom. They fear all changes and call them "opening wedges" to some dreadful departure from the right. In the change of field or labor they will find impending ill. But their most intense opposition has been, and for a time will be, directed against any modification of pulpit themes. They say to all preachers for a progressive Christianity, "You are forsaking Christ." But they must be met with these rejoinders: That the world is forsaking the church. It is finding elsewhere its entertainment, its education, its useful philosophy. That the Christ of the Gospels taught all useful forms of truth and placed no limit to his sympathy with the people. His light was for all their darkness, his strength for all their weakness, he was a universal, unlimited friend. They must be met with the declaration that the pulpit is not limited to the words of Christ, but possesses the broad warrant of his spirit. What Christ said and did were only a fragment of what he would have said and done had his life passed beyond those three years and with its love overflowed into the nineteenth century.

But the last reply to all those who are so quick to discover a "departure" from Christ must be found in this, that a monotonous repetition of a few principles is always a great injury to the system where they belong. Speaker and hearer alike die in such a treatment of a religion. The method is false as well as impolitic. Under the ideas of common life is the great Christ just as truly as beneath the cross and the final judgment. The Father, Son and the Spirit are beneath all moral truth, beneath all virtue and all charity, as the great earth lies beneath all our varied vegetation of wood or field. When a glass of water is given the thirsty one, the love of God is sparkling within the glass. There may be a class of Christian teachers who are limiting the vegetable kingdom to only one kind of tree. When our artists paint, however great may be their canvas or ambitious their genius, they dare not despise the great primary colors of Nature. These, either in their purity or in combination, can never be absent. And in music, the heart neither of performer nor hearer dares ever break away from the eight notes. These are present perpetually in the great anthem and simple song. So the "progressive Christianity" is not one which is breaking away from Jesus and the Cross, but is one where those primary forms are ever present, the basis of each change, the sublime order for each onward step. The true Christ does not so much prescribe words as inspire the heart. He who lighted up the sun, said: "Shine on all sides, everywhere," and it obeys. So he who lighted up Christianity in the first century seems to have said: "Shine forth on all sides; where darkness and sorrow are, there send thy rays of hope." He who in the spirit of Christ shall ever stand near to mankind, will find that the "saving doctrines" are always in his speech—the great eight notes heard in his loud or gentle utterance. No danger of their being lost. God the Creator, Christ the Mediator, the Holy Spirit, with his influence, instead of being absent, will be the fountains whence will flow this religion, which shall readjust itself to the new wants of the new nations and races of men.

Notes from the Field

Chicago, Ill.—Miss Stafford, of the Chicago Ethical Society, is making preparations to help the suffering poor during the coming winter. Her house, 97 Walton place, is headquarters for a number of workers, and contributions of all kinds of clothing are much desired.

Geneva, Ill.—Sunday mornings during the month of October, the pastor, Mrs. Celia Parker Woolley, will preach as follows: Oct. 1—Our Church; what we mean by it, and what we can do for it. Oct. 8—The World's Religious Debt to America (read before the Parliament of Religions). Oct. 15—Miracle in Religion. 7:30 p. m.—Madonna evening. An exhibition of pictures of the Madonna, in charge of J. D. Harvey. Oct. 22—Harvest Festival. The Sunday-school and congregation will unite in this service. Oct. 29—Caliban; a study from Shakspeare and Browning. 7:30 p. m.—Lecture on Tennyson, by the pastor. Sunday school at 12 m. The annual meeting of the society will be held in the church Oct. 18. Supper will be served at 6:30, followed by reports and the election of officers for the ensuing year. All are cordially invited. Regular meetings of the teachers of the Sunday school are held at the parsonage Thursdays at 7:30 p. m. This is the Religious Study Class, and all interested are earnestly requested to attend. Subject—The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion: a study of the life of Jesus in the New Testament. Arrangements will be made during the month for the reorganization of the Unity Club, with classes for literary study, further information concerning which will be given later.

THE prevalence of crimson colors in certain fishes off our New England coast, on portions of which scarlet and crimson seaweeds abound, is explained by Prof. J. Brown Goode by the red pigment derived by the crustaceans from the seaweeds they devour, and which in turn form the food of the fishes. —The Independent.

Happiness at a cost of One Cent a Day.

Books are the greatest sources of happiness within universal reach. The AMERICAN COÖPERATIVE LIBRARY now makes the world's best literature all accessible to any one, in city or country, at a rate of cost of one cent a day for a dollar book; vast numbers of books cost only one-half to one-fourth of that price; all best cloth-bound large type editions, no paper covers or small type.

Loaned Any Book you want to read, loaned to you, anywhere in the United States, for long or short time, as you desire. You can order through your county Postmaster, Newsdealer, Bookseller, neighborhood Book Club, or direct from us. You can call for any book you want.

Sold Books Sold at the lowest prices ever known. Any book supplied. A catalogue of 160 pages of choice books sent on receipt of a 2-cent stamp. A book worth reading is worth owning, if you can afford it, but many cannot afford it; and it is worth something to be able to read a book enough to see if it is worth owning, before you buy it.

Ben Hur for only 8 cents. "The Prince of India," for only 14 cents, (a $2.50 book), "David Alfouir," 8 cents, "Lorna Doone," 3 cents; all of Scott's, Eliot's, Dickens's, Thackeray's and other standard authors, each 3 cents, if you can read them in seven days; these are examples; all excellent editions, no paper covered trash in small type. All the new books, a special feature.

Little Women for 8 cts., "Tom Brown at Rugby," 3 cents, "Little Lord Fontleroy," 11 cents, are other examples. It is positively cruelty to children not to give them the benefit of these and other measureless sources of happiness and good, when they can be had at such trifling cost.

In fact books cost nothing, if they increase the income of the reader more than their cost. There is not a person alive, who labors with hand or brain, who earns even $2.00 a week, who will not, by the stimulus of good books be helped more than one cent a day in his earning power. Think of that, and test it, parents, employers and workers. It is your own fault if you don't get the best books, instead of trash.

Magazines, all of them, for one cent to three cents a day, or half that after the first month, or a quarter of it after two months. It is worth more than that just to look at the pictures. Think of it, all of them, for less than the cost of one heretofore: Harper, Scribner, Century, St. Nicholas, Forum, North American, Godey, and the rest, and all the books you can read, besides, cost a patron of the AMERICAN COÖPERATIVE LIBRARY less than the subscription price of one magazine.

Hungry Readers and students generally need no longer go without books, all of them they want, and the best books, since now the best cost less than half what trash has cost heretofore.

Clergymen with small incomes, "starving" heretofore for want of access to the world's current literature, now have it all open to them—and not for personal use only, but as a power for good: organize Reading Clubs among your people and guide them in their selections—infinite power here.

Teachers may also receive and confer inestimable pleasure and benefit upon themselves and pupils, by the means now offered. Increase your earning power by reading the best books.

Send 2 cents for 160-page Catalogue and full particulars. Please mention this paper when you write or call.

TWO IDYLS.

FROM THE FRENCH OF HENRI GREVILLE.

I. Noon.

The sun is high in the sky, so high that the great hedges cast no shadow. The panting flocks are lying upon the grass in the midst of the field, and in the burning heat they doze in a dull, leaden sleep. The birds under the leaves wait the passing of the hot noon. As far as the eye can reach, the harvests sleep; hardly a breath of wind moves the surface of the dull, gold wheat.

It is the hour of rest for those who have worked from the early morning, the sweat mounting to their foreheads as the sun rose higher and higher in the sky. They are resting now, and everything seems to rest with them. Only the grasshoppers and the larks spread their indefatigable wings, and, the former in the furrows, the latter in the sky, during these close hours of life, of life which never sleeps. The sea is at rest below, soft, blue, without a wave; a sail is seen, but so far distant it seems hardly to move. The great white-winged seagulls sleep in the hollows of the rocks. The sandy cliffs, with here and there a tuft of wild grass, sparkle in the bright sunlight like an immense armor of gold studded with huge emeralds. A cry is heard, then the silence begins again, even the echoes are too listless to respond.

Wearied under the penetrating heat, the harvesters have fallen asleep in the shade of the high rick; their slow breathings lend a rhythmic movement to their great strong chests. Not far off, under the shelter of a young ash-tree, the women have gathered, and they are resting in a less heavy slumber. One of them, a little aside, her head thrown back and supported by a low, green mound, seems to dream, with closed eyes, of some impossible happiness which hovers like a spirit in the gilded air, between the earth and the sky.

A sound, hardly a breath, is heard at the gate in the hedge near by. The dreamer half opens her eyes, without stirring, and looks about. She knows well the face which is turned towards her from the other side of the wild roses. She knows well those blue eyes which rule her heart, her soul, her will, herself; they are the eyes of her lover.

They look at each other without moving, and their whole being is stirred by an intensity of joy equal to the intensity of the light with which the earth is inundated; then slowly the woman rises and goes toward him, he opens the gate noiselessly, she passes through, he closes it; nothing has been troubled in the peaceful field and none of the sleepers have been awakened.

After the burning immensity of the wheat field, how narrow and somber seems the path which leads between the high overshadowing hedge-rows on either side! They pass down into a little valley where there is heard the sweet, cooling murmur of a silvery stream; and then they ascend the opposite slope. Going up or down, which matters to them? Are they not together? Will they not go thus together until the end of their lives? The roads will be sometimes smooth and overgrown with moss, sometimes rough and rocky like the path which they are now climbing; but they will always go on as now, hand in hand, exchanging glances which penetrate into their very souls. They have waited for a long time; the first flower of youth has passed for both; but love has remained with them through every struggle and defeat of hope. What does the memory of past sorrow matter to them to-day, in the presence of this happiness which holds them speechless!

"To-morrow!" he says, as he folds her hand, which does not tremble, more closely in his own.

"To-morrow!" she replies.

They have reached the top of the steep hillside, and they stand again in the bright sunshine. They are at the side of their own wheat field, where the sickle has not yet entered. The gilded plain extends almost out of sight; in the far distance is the limitless blue sea and above is the cloudless blue sky.

They look upon their possessions; henceforth, they will sow together, and together they will reap this field of their fathers, which is now their own; and from all this field the rich, pleasant odor of the ripe wheat goes up to heaven.

Life still is theirs. Without empty dreams and foolish hopes for the future, they turn away slowly, happy and thoughtful, under the midday sun.

AUTUMN.

Ripe, ripe, ripe, the crimson apples fall,
The yellow corn through dead, dry husk is thrust,
The ash-tree drops its early purpled leaves,
The beech grows sweet. The children through the grass Drag bags of nuts; and squirrels fret, and haste,
With household cares, among the twisted roots.
The ripening grapes, o'er-surfeted with work,
Stop clambering through the friendly arms of elms.
'Tis play, 'tis prayer, 'tis joy, 'tis peace and love!
God shakes the nuts to hear His children shout.
He asks no worship but the happy heart,
The glad, sweet prayer of joyous hands and eyes,
Brimful of peace and love and of surprise.

TRUE HEROES.

Oh, seeker for some worthy deed to do,
Withdraw thy gaze from searching in the sky;
Recall thy hopes from out the by and by,
And heed the path thy feet are passing through.
Great deeds are not those men endow with grace—
A daring feat, a mighty game of skill—
True heroes find their chances, when they will,
Amid to-day's vexatious commonplace.
L. E. BROWN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.

OUR little Louise, a five-year-old lassie, has thus early begun to put much trust and faith in God. Her brother Ralph, aged seven, also trusts in the Good Father. The children look upon Him as an intimate friend; they have none closer. At breakfast the children are seated vis-a-vis. Louise opens the conversation with the frequent theme: "I know who I love better than anybody else in the world. I love Monnie (mother) and God best of all." Little Ralph, at the opposite side of the table, somewhat frightened and ashamed of his own heresy: "Well, I love Monnie better than God." Louise, shocked at his temerity, and with a gesture of horror: "Walf! Walf! gone back on God!"

A LITTLE girl had some new shoes which were stiff and hard, after the manner of new shoes. When the little maiden drew them off at night, she exclaimed with a sigh of relief, "Oh, how good new shoes feel when they're off!"

EIGHT-YEAR-OLD IDA, in search of a book to read, attracted by its bright binding, selected Pope's "Essay on Man." After vainly trying to read and comprehend it she laid it aside, saying, with a sigh: "It may be easy on man, but it's hard on children."

Augmented in a ratio grand,
It lives to-day and wanders through the world.

LESSON V.

THE TEMPTATION.

(MATT. IV. 1-11)

What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?
Mark viii. 36 (A. V.).

He serves all who dares be true.*

Picture: The Temptation of Jesus by Cornicellus (1825-?)

How are we to understand this story of the temptation?—It is a parable in which Jesus made known to his disciples the decisive struggles of his spiritual life.

There was a tradition in the church that immediately after the baptism Jesus fled into the wilderness and there passed through a critical spiritual experience, which is called a temptation by Satan. That after such a consecration of himself as is implied by the baptism he should have chosen solitude is not unlikely; both John the Baptist and Paul had it out with themselves in the wilderness, the Buddha won his battle alone, and Mahomet was called to be a prophet during his lonely meditations on Mt. Hira. Besides, the lack of sympathy among his own people had driven Jesus back upon himself, and, even in the Gospels, we learn that he was in the habit of spending whole nights in prayer alone, upon the mountains or on the lake shore, a habit which he must have formed in young manhood. In the words of Gibbon, solitude is the school of genius. It is probable, too, that toward the close of his stay in the wilderness, or uninhabited region, of Judea, there came a revulsion from the intense spiritual excitement into which he had been thrown by the scenes about Jordan. If Jesus was like other men, and of course he was, the clear certainties and high resolves of the "valley of decision" must have been succeeded by a period of depression and irresolution. That mental strain should have made him insensible to bodily needs is psychologically likely, and that, as relaxation came, the idea of proving his prophetic mission by turning the stones of the wilderness, whose very shape suggested loaves, into bread to satisfy his hunger, should have presented itself as a temptation of Satan, is not incredible. Yet mention of the pinnacle and the temple, of the exceeding high mountain from which all the kingdoms of the world are visible, and perhaps also of Satan (although Jesus evidently believed in a personal devil as stoutly as Luther, who even thought that he saw him at Wartburg), seems to lift the narrative incontestably out of the realm of actual fact. Shall we say, then, that this story is merely a fancy of the disciples of Jesus? Hardly that: for, in the first place, as the tendency was to exalt Jesus out of the ranks of manhood, there would be increasing dislike to the very idea that he could be tempted at all, and we see that in the Fourth Gospel every trace of human weakness and liability to error has been rubbed out of the picture given by the Synoptists; and, in the second place, the account itself has too much psychologic truth and corresponds too closely to what we know of the growing life-experience of Jesus to warrant us in regarding it as a pure creation of his disciples' fancy. It is better, therefore, to regard it as one of the parables of Jesus, a personal parable, in which he tried to tell his disciples something of the conflict of his inner life. There are other instances in the Gospel story where an unmistakable parable of Jesus has been translated by his followers into an event.

What is the meaning of the first temptation?—Jesus was tempted to give his physical needs the first place and to use his powers for his own advantage.

The life of Jesus has been sometimes divided into four periods: The early years of poverty in Nazareth, the year of obscurity as a preacher of righteousness, the year of popular favor, and, finally, the year of conflict ending on Calvary. Singularly, the three temptations, as given by Matthew, correspond precisely to the first three of these life-periods. What must have been his chief temptation during those years of poverty and toil in his village home? Times were hard in Galilee, there was a large family to support, Joseph was dead and Jesus, the oldest son, bore the heaviest responsibility for the support of all, and there can be no doubt that now and then even Mary was troubled because Jesus was such a dreamer and perhaps because his strict sense of honor would not allow him to do what other workmen did for larger gains. But Jesus knew that there is something in man which bread cannot satisfy, and was resolved that all his thought and energy should not be absorbed in bread-winning and money-making. The three Old Testament passages with which Jesus is related to have met the solicitations of the tempter represent three thoughts which dominated and saved him in three successive epochs of his life. From the peril of the workman who is tempted to make his physical needs of first concern and to lose himself in the absorbing routine of daily toil, using all his powers for himself alone, Jesus was delivered by a profound conviction of the truth that "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

What is the meaning of the second temptation? Jesus was tempted to reassure himself and to hasten the success of his mission by an appeal to miracles.

The best illustration of this temptation is given by the following passage from Mark (viii. 11, 12):

An the Pharisees came forth, and began to question with him, seeking of him a sign from heaven, tempting him. And he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek a sign? Verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation.

To be sure, according to the chronology of the evangelists, this incident must be placed in the period of popular favor, but the temptation which it describes must have been present to Jesus in even greater force during the period of obscurity. He had not the dramatic personality of John, his words were not ablaze with the terrors of imminent judgment, and he attracted at first comparatively little attention. "The Jews require a sign," said Paul. What dost thou work? is the question put to Jesus himself, according to the Fourth Gospel. Jesus must have been sorely tempted—many preachers even nowadays know the same trial—to resort to spectacular methods, to win notice by recourse to the unusual, the unexpected. And it must be remembered, also, that Jesus, having no conception, as we have, of the orderliness of nature in natural law, actually believed that if God were with a prophet His presence would be manifested by wonderful, miraculous works. Why, then, should not he, who had no doubt that he was a servant of God preaching his truth, appeal to miracle as an effectual indorsement of his mission? And it may well be that in his darker hours he himself needed the reassurance which his inherited feelings might have found in a miracle. This is the purport of the second temptation: Cast thyself down from the pinnacle of the temple, if thou art the son of God. His angels will bear thee up, and then thou and the gaping crowd below shall be henceforth free from all doubt as to thy divine mission; for your own sake and for theirs, appeal to miracle and end this period of obscurity and occasional uncertainty. It is a signal mark of the greatness of Jesus that he positively refused to give a sign and even, with prophetic instinct for natural law, told his questioners that the only signs of God were in the regular, orderly processes of nature (Mt. xvi. 1-4).

"And so no more our hearts shall plead
For miracle and sign;
Thy order and thy faithfulness
Are all in all divine.
There are thy revelations vast
From earliest days of yore;
These are our confidence and peace:
We cannot wish for more."

And yet in spite of this refusal, which its originality and difference from current opinion prove to be authentic, his disciples and the majority of the church to-day ascribe miracles to Jesus and even, falling in with the suggestion of the tempter, seek to prove by them that he was true son of God and preacher of truth.

What is the meaning of the third temptation?—Jesus was tempted to gain a position of great usefulness by the sacrifice of personal integrity.

The period of popular favor succeeded to that of obscurity; the multitudes were thronging about Jesus and hints of Messiahship were heard. It is reported that once the people were on the point of taking Jesus by force to make him king, but he hid himself from them (John vi. 15). It was easy just then in Palestine for any one to rouse the people to frenzied desperation by proclaiming himself the Messiah for whom all were looking. Towards every conspicuous man the people turned, eagerly questioning "Art thou he that should come?" What might not a great leader do with such a people! Why might not the triumphs of the Maccabean days be repeated? So the people thought, and Jesus must in some measure at least have shared their belief. Conscious that he was a man sent from God, anticipating the coming of some leader to organize victory, sensible of the popular hope and dawning confidence in him, realizing also the immense good that might be accomplished were he in a position of authority and influence, it is only natural that Jesus should have been tempted to accept the Messiahship and avow himself king of the Jews. One thing stood in the way: beside the ordinary Jewish ideals he had higher conceptions of the kingdom of God and deep seated in his heart was the belief that the seed and not the sword was the emblem of its increase. He felt also that he was to be a teacher of truth and nothing else. To proclaim himself king of the Jews would do violence to his highest ideals and his most intimate convictions of duty. But how much more good he could do as king than as humble preacher!

This is the moment of temptation which, with deep insight into the story, our artist has chosen as the subject of his picture. The face shows that Jesus has put Satan behind his back. It is the face of a man who is tempted, not by evil but by goodness, on his highest, not his lowest levels. There are no temptations so subtle as the temptations of power and usefulness. Why keep your ideal so high as to be practically useless? Say "Thou art worthy" to some lower ideal, and then from the vantage ground which that worship will give you men may be helped to some purpose. That was the deep significance of this third temptation, and by conquering it Jesus both saved his own soul and served all men, because he dared to be true. "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

In teaching this lesson the story of spiritual crises in the case of other heroes should be read, e. g., the temptation of the Buddha (most conveniently in "The Light of Asia") and the choice of Hercules in Xenophon's Memorabilia. See, also, Clarke's Legend of Thomas Didymus, pp. 209-220, and Martineau's sermon on Temptations of Power (Hours of Thought, 2d series, pp. 39-49).

*For this is Love's nobility,—

And with hand and body and blood,

A THRILL of anxiety has passed through the Baptist fellowship in this city and elsewhere because Prof. Henry Drummond, in a University Extension lecture course, under the auspices of the Chicago University, is teaching evolution and applying the same to the History and Development of Man. We expected this. There will be many Baptists who, sooner or later, will call the University to account for its teachings. But we believe that the University authorities will continue to reply in substance: "It is our mission to seek the truth, not to promulgate Baptist doctrines. Our object is to increase the intelligence of the world, not to propagate a sect or promulgate a dogma."

PROF. CARL VON BERGEN, of Stockholm, Sweden, who came to this country as a delegate to the Unitarian Congress and the Parliament, will be glad to lecture on a variety of themes,—philosophical, psychological, or literary. He is a distinguished lecturer in his own country, and during his previous visit to this country made many friends in the East. His address for the present is care of Dr. Stockham, Evanston, Ill., or he may be reached through UNITY office.

THIS week the Humane Congress is in session, and the cause of the mute sufferers who have no tongue to plead their own case is being pleaded by many representatives, among whom none speak with better right than the representatives of non-Christian religions, who, in this particular at least, shame the thought and practice of Christians. The higher Oriental religions have, with scarcely an exception, and with great emphasis, taught the sanctity of all life and the sacredness of the life principle wherever revealed; while Christianity in its attempt to magnify man has dug a great ditch between him and what it has called the brute creation. This has naturally brought mountainous abuse to the lower animals.

IN the recent death of Miss Anna Huidekoper, of Meadville, the Theological School and the Unitarian Church of that place, as well as the cause of education and philanthropy, have lost a faithful and efficient friend. It is not often that a woman so young in years has risen into so large a place of trust and usefulness. As the daughter of the lamented Prof. Frederic Huidekoper, and one of his executors, she entered into his work as trustee of the Brooks Fund and a member of the Board of Directors of the Theological School with consecrated intelligence. She was carrying on most diligently and successfully the work her father so loved and honored. UNITY joins with the large circle of loving friends in sympathy to the bereaved family, and in affectionate remembrance of a gentle, loving soul.

ONE of the most pathetically interesting figures at the Parliament of Religions was that of Christophore Jibara, with his long hair and silken robe; a pilgrim from far off Damascus, once an active prelate of the Greek church, an author and scholar, an adept in French, Russian, Arabic, as well as the local tongue, but not familiar with the English. By a course of study he has come essentially to the conclusion occupied by our Unitarian fathers of fifty years ago, viz: for textual reasons he discards the dogma of the Trinity. By similar study he has come to recognize the Old Testament, the New Testament and the Koran as a trilogy of revelation fitting into each other, complementing each other, and forming together a body of revealed truth competent to save the world. These views he has set forth in a pamphlet entitled, "Unity in Faiths, and Harmony in Religions." This pamphlet, translated into English, was obtainable at the Parliament, and can now be ordered from UNITY office for 25 cents. This pamphlet will be noticed more at length in these columns. This lonely truth-seeker, a scholar still in exile for want of English speech, has issued an appeal for help which, coming as it does, as we believe, from a sincere heart and a mind single in the pursuit of truth, deserves our notice, and we print it entire in our Correspondence column.

THERE is a well-justified desire on the part of many of our parishes to hear and see some of the Orientals who have been in attendance at the Parliament of Religions. To such we are very glad to say that the Rev. B. B. Nagarkar, of the Brahmo-Somaj of Bombay, and Rev. Kinza Riuga Hirai, representative of the Buddhist faith of Japan, are both willing to tarry a while if sufficient engagements can be made to justify their stay. Both these gentlemen have traveled far at their own expense, and it is but just that their further stay should bring some compensation. Mr. Nagarkar has already been heard at Moline, Davenport and Sioux City, greatly to the delight of these audiences. Concerning his stay at Sioux City Miss Gordon writes: "He has had four enthusiastic meetings. The strange face, the feeling of reverence that his voice and manner so clearly express, all tend to make his words impressive." This week this gentleman is giving a series of four Conversational Lectures on Religious and Social Life in India, at All Souls Church, Chicago, viz: 1. Our Social and Domestic Manners and Customs; 2. The Position of Women in India; 3. The Indian Schools of Philosophy; 4. The Development of Religious Thought. Questions will be solicited at the end of each lecture. We hope that many of our parishes will avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing the same course of lectures. What Mr. Nagarkar can do for India, Mr. Hirai is prepared to do for Japan. His address on "The Attitude of Japan Towards Christianity" was one of the most manly and commanding deliverances of the whole Parliament. At home he has been a teacher of Philosophy and Political Economy. He talks good English, is an intelligent and loving student of Buddhism, and is in touch with modern thought. Both of these gentlemen are unacquainted with the country, and are unprepared, without help, to master the intricacies of the American railroad system. Will not the ministers in different localities take hold of this matter and arrange among themselves for itineraries, reducing the expense of travel to the minimum and thus bring these educative voices within the reach of as many American ears as possible? We need the enlightenment that comes from these sources. The newly appointed Secretary of the W. U. C. will be glad to help in this work of making arrangements for these gentlemen. Address, Rev. A. W. Gould, 185 Dearborn street, Chicago.

THE NEW SECRETARY.

As will be seen from our news columns, Mr. Judy, from a creditable sense of loyalty to his parish at Davenport, declined the election to the secretaryship of the Western Unitarian Conference. The directors lost no time, but turned at once to the next unanimous choice, that of A. W. Gould, of Hinsdale, who has accepted. Mr. Gould has not the long experience and wide acquaintance with the field which made the choice of Mr. Judy so fitting, but he brings to the high and difficult task ripe culture, a clear mind, an attractive address, and an earnest purpose. His record as student and teacher in Harvard College, as a professor at Olivet College, and as pastor of the Unitarian societies at Manistee and Hinsdale, prove his ripeness for the position, and prophesy his usefulness. To our mind the field was never more in need of a shaping hand, and the opportunity of doing inaugurative and formulative work never so great. The Parliament of Religions and the thirst for unity, the search for the fundamental basis of union that will unite those actuated by like purposes and pressed by common need, that springs from this same Parliament, seem to be a fruition, to an unexpected extent, of the dreams of the Western Conference. To this end has it struggled, and it, more than any organization that we know of in the world, is best prepared to avail itself of this unexpected gift, to accept this contribution, to conserve this impulse. Just what the next thing to do is, may be difficult to ascertain. But to find this out is the privilege of the Western Conference, and, having found out, to do it is its duty. Mr. Gould was already honored with the office of the presidency of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society and of the Illinois State Conference. Fortunately the former position will not conflict with his new duties. The Conference has given him his time and carte blanche to do what he can, in any way he can, to advance the cause of fraternity in religion; to increase that piety that rests in an ethical purpose, that combines in cooperative work those who seek to advance Truth, Righteousness, and Love. Let our societies take heart and resolve to hold up the hands of our new secretary, await his deliberate judgments, and follow his kindly leading.

THE JAPANESE OUR TEACHERS.

We wonder if Americans and Europeans appreciate that there is in the far East a great people, who can not only teach us how to make curious lacquer work and other comparatively trivial things, but whose social life, according to the practically unanimous reports of competent observers, is such as to mark their ethical rank as distinctly higher than that of the American or any European people? The Occident does not seem to realize this, yet we trust the day will soon come when with sincere humility we shall turn to this people that we have so long been disposed to patronize, and seek to learn from them how to live the life of which Jesus dreamed when he bade us do unto others as we would that they should do unto us. The Japanese are a wonderful people. In material progress they have accomplished in a few years what it took the West centuries to attain. Why have they been able so rapidly to assimilate so much of what is best in our civilization? Is it philosophical to attribute their remarkable progress to non-moral causes, to an ape-like imitativeness? Should we not rather ask ourselves if its previous high moral character had not most to do with the success of this nation? The son of China is reported to be as apt at imitation as his island neighbor, but has China made the progress of Japan? How prone we are to regard those willing to give up their own way for another's as weak,—goody-goody individuals, to be sure, but lacking in the stamina, the force, that makes for sturdy manhood. Yet how unwise, how indiscriminating is such a thought! He who yields right to wrong, gives up the better for the worse, is weak. But he who has the courage to substitute for the old way he has learned to love the new and better way, whencesoever it comes, thereby shows both mental and moral strength. "Except ye become as one of these little ones ye shall not enter into the kingdom." The willingness to give up is a high moral trait. Perhaps Jesus was right in regarding it as the highest. The Chinese is a moral people, but the morality of the Chinese is inferior to that of the Japanese—as is, we think, that of the Occident—in just this particular, that they have not the yielding disposition, the spirit of true humility, which characterizes the individual and national, the social and political life of the Japanese. Despite their many virtues, the Chinese are proud and stubborn. Their pride in themselves and their past prevents them from gaining the good they might from other peoples. The politeness of the Japanese springs from the heart, and so their social life is the sweetest known to civilization. Thanks to the child-like and God-like open-mindedness, which has its source in true humility, altruism, or love of others, they have learned and are learning the lessons of life far more rapidly than others. Great things may reasonably be expected from them in the future. Let us study the life of this people.

Men and Things

THE Examiner tells of a colored preacher who saw in a vision the golden letters "G. P. C." in the sky, which he interpreted to mean "Go preach Christ." One of his brethren said that he had no doubt of the vision of his brother, but he thought it would be more correctly interpreted, "Go pick cotton." Probably a good many who are sure which way destiny calls them would do well to call in some impartial interpreter of their visions.

In a recent sermon Dr. Lyman Abbott said: "I am very glad the Woman's Temperance Union is fighting the temperance battle, but I do not think it is very creditable to us men that we leave it to be fought by the women. In the old legend, St. George fought the battle for the deliverance of the woman; in modern life, the woman fights the battle, and St. George sits on the fence to see how it is going on."

A REMARKABLE new Medusa, or jellyfish, has been found to occur in Lake Tanganyika, Africa, a "fresh-water" lake, though, we believe, the water is slightly brackish. It is entirely different from the jellyfish found living a few years ago in the Victoria Lily-tank of the Kew Gardens, at London, and represents a distinct family, whose exact position is unknown. —Independent.

It is said that Dr. Nansen and Lieut. Peary, Arctic explorers, have both excluded alcoholic drinks from their list of supplies, as not only unnecessary but harmful in the polar regions. Mr. F. C. Selous, for twenty years an African explorer, abstains not only from alcoholic drinks but tobacco.

LAW AND LIBERTY.

If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.—JOHN VIII. 31, 32.

Be sure Caprice could never make a bird,
And keep its wing aflight, its song
athrill; Attempted so, confusion dire would fill Its wing, and discord for a song be heard.
Deep, lawful purpose in creation stirred,
And kept its path of duty firm and true
Until at fullest flight where skies are blue
There flies a free, a golden music-word;
And sings its lesson true in listening ears,
Between its thrilling rondeaus making pause,—
No freedom anywhere creation cheers,
But that the deep, the necessary cause,
By which some happy being, it appears,
Is that it faithful keeps well-being's holy laws.

The thought of liberty makes us glad, the realization of liberty makes us great. Amid all the mysteries of life, the penalties and imprisonments of nature and human nature, the wrongs and injustices prevailing, we have yet the fact of moral freedom,—realizing that there is a right and a wrong, that we should do the right avoiding the wrong, that we can fashion ourselves in our moral natures fair or foul, that we are a divinity that shapes our ends rough-hew them as Earth may. Freedom of moral choice is a dear liberty, but yet only the truth can make us free. Only righteousness is liberty. In true relationships with the universe is fullness of joy. Becoming true man, living a true man's life, this only is to be master of events and of life, making everything yield an everlasting richness unto being. Love of the evil is imprisonment. To do the wrong is to enter into bondage. Life expressing itself in a perfect body, obedient to all its will, is a liberty that sings. But life in a body disobedient, abused by excesses, dishonored by sin, is bondage that moans. Liberty is the right Thou hast given us to become and be a perfected being in which Thy life lives out in fullness its intent of blessing. Becoming and being less is bondage. For its full joy and service to the body the eye must be itself, fulfill perfectly the divine intent, keep all the laws of its well-being. Then by the perfect vision man knows the sweets of liberty. So in the moral nature, so in every part of man's being and life. Each thought true to itself, to all its relationships, is the joy of liberty. Each emotion pure, faithful to every affection in the righteousness of life, is freedom drinking from the streams of God's bliss. Truth of thought, truth of affection, truth of purpose, truth of life, is freedom like that in which God has his eternal being. To grow into such liberty is life's whole meaning and worth. Falsehood invading any of these is tyranny inflicting hurt upon the man, cheating him out of his own. To invade the body with a wound is to enchain it. Crowding it with sickness is to destroy it. So any infringement upon the moral nature is moral bondage, is the awful reality of moral tyranny. Therefore from the invasion of others man must be free to think his thought. He must be free to live his life without any hindrance save only what is demanded by the general weal, by the rights of his brothers to every liberty needed for society fulfilling its obligations, living its life. We want in human life a liberty like Thy ample winds wherein the growing things of nature fulfill. We want a freedom like Thy large suns wherein every growing thing of nature may unfold its blossom and its fruit. We want a largeness of choice like Thy soils give, that in them each thing may feed and unfold after its kind. Help us for ourselves and others to achieve this and maintain it in all the ways of social and civic life. We need as well that other freedom in the truth of being, in which the rose keeping the laws of its well-being is a rose and nothing else; the oak an oak, and nothing else; the horse a horse, and nothing else; each thing itself becoming, and no confusion anywhere upon the growing fields. So may we learn and keep all the laws of our well-being that so we may be in life a true humanity, so that in being we become a true child of Thine own great heart; no confusion in all the life Thou art living in Thy race of men, that in Thee they may live out a high and holy destiny in the everlasting liberty of the truth.

I found a moment-living gnat; and everything,
From microscopic foot to gauzy wing,
In perfect order placed; each atom kept
The laws that through its tiny being swept:
And so it lived its happy little day,
A note of law in Freedom's holy lay.
From wing of taniger a scarlet feather came To burn upon my hand its hurtless flame;
Each bit of down in its own work and place Made possible the singer's flight of grace:
So read I in this feather scarlet-bright,
That law is only Freedom at its flight.
I saw the clover and its bee in meadows deep
Their life-essential trysting faithful keep;
In perfect fitness each with each agrees,
And so their races live such dear
eternities;
The clover's honey wells and bee that drinks
But Freedom's thought, that law in beauty thinks.

I found within the brook swift-swimming mountain trout,
Well fitted for their home, that sparkled all about ;
Each swiftest motion free from trampling or pain,
Because a life where law is at its perfect reign ;
Their swimming but the truth, how free are they
Who their well-being's laws do perfectly obey.
And not a thing I found in water or in air
But law had wrought it out a creature fair,
So working that each bit of being be
A freedom smiling out each lawless tyranny :
So everywhere beneath the changing skies
From lips of Law the hymns of Freedom rise.
O gnat and wing of bird, O clover, trout and bee,
And every bit of life that anywhere I see,
You live me out a lesson forever true,
Well-being is a deed that only law can do ;
My duties done becoming my being's voice
Wherethrough the hymns of Freedom eternally rejoice.

ETHICAL CONGRESS AND CONVENTION OF ETHICAL SOCIETIES.

Like the other congresses of the summer, this was held in the Art Institute, and, because of this public place, it was more a congress than it was a convention.

Mr. Weston, of Philadelphia, formally opened it on the evening of September 28th, and was followed by Mr. Mangasarian, with his address of welcome from the Chicago Society. Owing to a necessary change of program, Prof. Adler continued, and closed the evening by a lecture upon "The Progress of the Ethical Movement," which had a practical and hopeful tone.

After Mr. Bonney's opening address, the following day was largely given to reports from the various societies, the most interesting part of which was that describing practical work, other than the lectures.

Mr. E. N. Plank, of St. Louis, told of the "Self-Culture Clubs," saying they were not the product of one mind, but of many. Their object is the elevation and enlightenment of working men and women. They observe strict neutrality in religious, political, and social questions, and their various branches do varying work. The Self-Culture Club has a building of its own, with free reading-rooms and a good library of 1,200 volumes,—which I understand is not in one place, but in several. The Club has a lecture course for seven months in the year, and is in every way independent and self-supporting, although the "child" of the Ethical Society. The two clubs for young women have a membership of two hundred, and meet weekly.

Mr. Rosenblatt, of the New York society, told of the Workingman's School, which he said was "progressive, experimental, radical and rational; not impulsive." Its principle: "Learning by doing." He quoted Dr. Coit, who once said that the old motto, "Deed, not creed," should be replaced by "Deed, and a new creed: the creed of right deed."

Following him came Dr. Coit, with his account of the "Neighborhood Guild," so practical and interesting that I wish I could report it in full; but can only give his brief statement of its object,—"the moral training of the people of the neighborhood, and to be a center of moral life."

From the Chicago society came Mr. Errant's paper on "The Bureau of Justice," the great, good work that emanated from that society a few years ago and which is respected by all who know it.

In spite of the storm on Friday evening there was a goodly gathering to hear Miss Addams' simple, effective talk upon "Ethics and Philanthropy;" Mr. Salter's clear, high, inspiring lecture upon "Ethics and Religion;" and Prof. Adler's masterly address upon "The Ethical Movement and the Labor Question."

Saturday morning brought a discussion of this latter question, opened by Dr. Coit and participated in by the other lecturers, who held somewhat differing opinions as to the position which the ethical societies should take in regard to the labor movement, ending with Mr. Salter's, "A fair field and no favors in an ethical society, for all reform questions." Prof. Adler's final suggestion was for "a 'Union' of non-laborers who are interested in the labor question and will give it moral support, well organized and with dues."

Altogether, the Ethical Congress was practical, helpful, and hopeful; and those who attended went away ready to follow Mr. Sheldon's suggestion to "work for the stepping stones to ideal conditions."

CHRISTIAN LOVE vs. RACE PRIDE.

We indicated last week what are the troubles which a church must undergo in the South which desires moderately to do what is right to the Negro, but desires also to keep on good terms with its neighboring white churches. We told how Dr. Sherrill and the board of officers of the Church of the Redeemer, in Atlanta, the leading white Congregational church in Georgia, had repelled the slander that they were affiliating with Negroes. They denied that Dr.

Sherrill had ever exchanged with a Negro preacher, or invited one to his pulpit; or that Dr. Sherrill had in any way sought to annex the Negro church in Atlanta to the white district conference; and they positively declared, as to the treatment of the Negro:

It is not true that the policy of this church in these matters differs from that of other churches in the city or State.

We expressed the hope that this wide disclaimer would suffice to allay the public suspicion that this Church of the Redeemer desired to treat the neighboring colored churches of its denomination in a fraternal Christian way. But we are disappointed. The Rev. James A. Davis, apparently a member of the church (we do not find his name in the Congregational Year Book), writes to the Atlanta Constitution indignantly reaffirming the charges. He declares that some of the leading members of that church have actually had social intercourse with Negroes, and that, for this reason, several members have lately left the church. This he supports by instances. He says that it is true that Dr. Sherrill did not exchange with a Negro, but he did exchange with the white pastor of the neighboring Negro Congregational church, thus recognizing the Negro church, and giving respect to a man who has by his service of a Negro church put himself lower than a Negro. Mr. Davis states that this church and its pastor are parties to the State Convention of Georgia, which held a meeting in the edifice of the Church of the Redeemer, "at which time papers were read and a general discussion was entered upon participated in by both white and colored delegates." It is also true, he says, that a similar meeting was held the next year at Macon, in a colored church—but the statement is so serious that we must quote:

Another program was carried out, and another advance step made toward social equality, when the pastor of the Church of the Redeemer and the Rev. S. C. McDaniel and other white delegates repaired to the dining room of the church, and there sat down to a feast of good things at the same table with the colored delegates and their friends.

We believe these statements are true. They are greatly to the credit of the Christian character of Dr. Sherrill, and especially of Mr. McDaniel, who is a Southern man; and we are very sorry that, instead of owning up that they were a Christian church, they were frightened into publishing a manifesto which gave the lie to their name of "Church of the Redeemer." —The Independent.

THE ENLARGEMENT OF RELATIONS.

We are not strong by our power to penetrate, but by our relatedness. The world is enlarged for us, not by new objects, but by finding more affinities and potencies in those we have. . . . It is not talent, but sensibility, which is best; talent confines, but the central life puts us in relation to all. . . . Feel yourself and be not daunted by things. —EMERSON.

The enlargement of life does not depend on opportunity, but on sympathy. It depends to a very slight degree on travel, on sight-seeing, on the number of people, even, that one meets; but very largely on the power of coming into real relations with some of that number. Responsiveness, sympathy, receptivity, — these are the doors through which life enters to us and through which we go forth into life. On this power depends the conditions of success, and on it also depends conduct, which Matthew Arnold rightly designates three fourths of life. The enlargement of all that range of feeling and thought which we call life does not lie in its external scenery. It is not, necessarily, the larger life to have a more imposing house, or finer apparel, or more dainty and luxurious surroundings than our neighbor. These are accidental things that may, or may not, accompany it. They are no inherent factors of the perfection or the completeness of life. Enlargement is something more intimate, more permanent in its nature, more entirely dependent upon those qualities that make personality. In fact, if one comes to scrutinize it closely the enlargement of life is gained by living so in harmony with the divine will—so at one with it—that one is receptive and responsive to every sweet influence. When the wandering wind finds out an Eolian harp, it becomes musical; but

"Hornpipe and hurdy-gurdy both are dull Unto the most musicianly of winds."

Now this state of harmony with the divine forces is not one of mere negation. It is not one of mere passivity. It is the very highest positive state. It is simply magnetic with vitality. It is the ideal condition of life, and therefore the condition of supreme success. It is the condition of recognition and of vision.

It is easy enough, however, for any of us to philosophize on what we should be; to discern the better conditions. The test is to realize them. And this is as practical a work as any labor of the hand. The initial step to be taken in any enterprise or endeavor is first to realize in one's self harmonious and receptive conditions.

Now the jars and discords come mostly from without; the harmony and sweetness must first be found within. If one is conscious of a fretful and discordant state let him seek entire solitude, if only for a moment. Then call up the spiritual forces. Take a strong stand in the affirmatives. "I and my Father are one." That is not merely a phrase of rhetoric or an assertion that Jesus alone can make. We may all make it, "I and my Father are one." He is the vine, we the branches. Demand to be taken into the true life, into one's own life. Do not merely desire to be at peace with all, to love all, but affirm that you are so. The love of God and all His creatures will set toward you till you are upborne on the current of divine magnetism.

"His strength was as the strength of ten

writes the poet of Sir Galahad. Therein lies the true philosophy. The latter line explains why he had the tenfold strength. All life is truly such only as it exists in harmony with its environment. We are now entering into the spiritual age—a fact that is just as true statistically as was that of the stone age or of the iron age. We have lived through the ages where the physical and then the intellectual powers were those most in harmony with the environment of the time. Now the environment is spiritual and the spiritual faculties must be those developed. It is the age of supernaturalism, one may say, if we may so call that law just higher than the ordinary and familiar one, and quite as natural on its own plane. The supernatural, after all, is merely that the higher has taken the place of the lower. Emerson said, fifty years ago: "Our painful labors are unnecessary; there is a better way." Now we are coming into the actual knowledge of that better way. The soul that can hold itself in direct and responsive relation to the Infinite Love will command undreamed of potency. It will at once enter on the true enlargement of life.

This command of new agencies will supersede the former need of practicing many of the old, economic virtues which were once held essential to thoughtful and elevated living. Among these that of spending the minimum and saving the maximum of one's financial gains was held to be one of the cardinal graces. Young people were to be taught to save, and the present was held to be of little account as compared with some far-away future. This saving, once entered upon, not unfrequently grew into a ruling motive of life, and the less that could be spent for living, dress, amusements, and incidentals in general, the more valuable time was supposed to be, with the result that with material wealth there ensued something not unlike spiritual pauperism. When the fortune was made—being largely made by the negative force of saving rather than the positive one of creating—it was ten chances to one if the man had sufficient resources within himself to enjoy the leisure it afforded. He had become accustomed to being bound on the wheel, and leisure was stagnation. Still, if there must be a choice of evils it was better to deny one's self—to postpone something of the larger life, rather than have the time come when one is a burden to others. But now life assumes a very different phase. In this spiritual age, thought is the true creative power. It is the spiritual and not the physical powers which are to shape all external possessions. This is the age in which one can command the invisible powers. True economy is not now to earn and hoard, but to earn and use; to earn and transmute into force, whereby are conquered new and wider resources. Under this law, gains accumulate on the principle of compound interest.

The external scenery of life is an important factor in daily success. It is now a part of true economy to live in beautiful surroundings, for it tends to produce that elevation of spirit, that exhilaration, that "plus energy" which is the motor of successful achievement. Nothing is gained by diminishing expenses if one also diminishes his buoyancy of feeling. Instead, indeed, of enriching he is impoverishing himself and is on the direct road to bankruptcy. It is the same folly that it was for the Israelites to gather up the manna and save it for another time, rather than use it each day while fresh; thereby transmitting its nourishment into strength and courage, and trusting in the promise of the Lord that He would supply the future as he would the present.

The heavenly manna is given to us equally in these days, only in a different form. It is wise to command the best possible surroundings and social outlook. It is a good investment to pay ten or twenty dollars a week more than is exacted by bare necessity if thereby one buys fifty or a hundred dollars' worth of inspiration and energy. They are forces more immediately convertible than bank stock. On the invisible side of life is this infinite storage of force—a reservoir, so to speak, of infinite energy. Now to learn the secret of establishing an individual connection with this is to gain the secret of all financial and material success. Those who achieve great things are those who have come, consciously or unconsciously, into this secret, or, as Emerson said a half century ago, "avail themselves of a certain plus power in the universe which they know how to use."

On the material plane of life we see how the finer and subtler agencies have usurped the place of cruder ones. Steam superseded the stage-coach and the winds of sail; electricity is already superseding steam. Gas crowded out clumsy methods of illumination, and electricity is replacing gas. Nobler and finer inventions have made all contrivances and conveniences of finer adjustability. The analogy holds true on both the higher and the lower planes, on the visible and the invisible sides of life. It is not by cruder and coarser drudgery, and by scrimping and saving and denying ourselves all the beauty and loveliness of life that we are to "get on" in even a material sense; but, instead, by a wider and wiser range of expenditure, "by living high enough to catch the outlook," by dwelling in the regions of artistic charm and of spiritual exaltation.

It is good to cultivate large relations of social sympathies. It is good to enter into other people's lives—not to penetrate but to relate ourselves to their thought and action, and to feel that when we are most keenly sensitive and responsive and outgoing, we are most truly going about our Master's business.

—Lillian Whiting, in Worthington's Magazine.

"HEAR THE OTHER SIDE."

The proceedings of the Parliament of Religions on Saturday last showed very clearly the animus and tone of the mongrel gathering, and justify the condemnation of it in advance by our General Assembly and other evangelical bodies. Prof. Charles A. Briggs was the leading speaker,—"one of the principal figures,"—and "he was accorded a welcome that was as enthusiastic as it was evidently sincere." He spoke "amid prolonged applause." "Prolonged applause was accorded to him when he took his seat." Why all this? Because he attacked the Bible with a vehemence and a shamelessness that went far beyond anything he had hitherto uttered, if the laudatory telegrams in the dailies be reliable. In this connection we call attention to one significant fact which we think cannot be challenged: the destructive higher critics, to a man, favor the irreligious Parliament. Its opponents are found in the ranks of believers in the inerrant inspired word of God.

—Presbyterian Journal.

The gentle reproach which Saint Paul so delicately expressed to the Athenians from the rostrum of Mars Hill, that they were "too superstitious" (or "somewhat superstitious," as the Revised Version gives it), might almost be urged against the throngs of Christian people who crowd the great hall during the prolonged sessions of the Parliament of Religions in Chicago. The interest, approaching enthusiasm, with which the vast audiences welcome the exponents of false religions is more phenomenal than the good-natured curiosity of the Greeks who gathered around Saint Paul to hear "some new thing." We imagine that the grand apostle to the Gentiles would greet more sternly these itching ears of nineteenth-century Christians. And what would he say to those who have gone through the world to seek out the most plausible, the most eloquent, the most entertaining representatives of every religion that man has invented, to show it off with hand-shaking and public congratulations to applauding assemblies of American people, while Christian nations are spending millions every year to convert the followers of these false prophets? . . . The Parliament seems to be, practically, a propaganda of Unitarianism, Old World and New World Theism, sanctioned by authority of a national commission and countenanced by the presence of a few Roman, Greek, and Anglican prelates. As to the Roman, we do not believe that they have any sympathy with the whole business, but are "improving" the opportunity to popularize a faith and polity that has heretofore failed to harmonize with its environment in this country. As to the Anglican, the members of the Church of England who have appeared on this extraordinary program are apparently at home there. It must, indeed, be encouraging to the Hindus and Shintos and Parsees and Buddhists and Theosophists and Christian Scientists and Higher Criticismists to hear a clergyman of the Church of England assert on the platform of the World's Parliament that "all religions are fundamentally more or less true, and all religions are superficially more or less false." This treason to the faith to which the reverend speaker had bound himself by a solemn vow was greeted with "applause" by the vast audience. Thoughtful observers of this spectacular performance cannot fail to note that the sentiments which are most applauded are such as we have above quoted. We add another from the same speaker, which was enthusiastically received: "The religion of the future will be pretty much summed up in the words of Tennyson, 'The whole round world is everywhere bound by gold chains about the feet of God.' [Applause.]" So the words of Tennyson are to be the Bible of the future.

Correspondence

AN EARNEST WORD FROM NEBRASKA.

EDITOR UNITY: I am a patron, reader and admirer of "our UNITY." I was going to say "your UNITY," but it belongs to me as much as any one, for it reflects my sentiments. It even does more than that, it reveals myself to myself. It tells my belief—it unfolds the germ of my religion better far than I can. I have been taking it about two years, and it has been a wonderful source of comfort and good to my soul. The Rev. Mr. Maan, of Omaha, called my attention to it.

I am placing liberal literature where I think it will be appreciated and bear fruit. It is kindly furnished me by the Post Office Mission of St. Louis and Boston. If I were not so bad off financially I would invest in several numbers of UNITY for friends.

If I can be at home this winter I think I shall undertake to organize a "Unity Club." There are legions of good people who are weary of the "orthodox views," but who do not understand the grand common-sense liberal religion advocated by UNITY. They think they are infidels, as the church people call them, and good-naturedly receive their doom, and in many instances think they are such, when they are only skeptics in regard to the orthodox creed; and, in most instances, were the religion of common sense and reason unfolded to them they would see that they were far from being infidels or skeptics in regard to the religion of intelligence and reason.

UNITY is doing grandly. It is improving in appearance, size and matter. May it continue to flourish.

I believe in prayer, but in the prayer of honest, tireless effort—deeds more than words, and faith that demonstrates itself by works. "As much as ye did it unto one of these, my brethren, ye did it unto me."

The only way to work for God is to work for humanity and the present life. The future life will take care of itself. H. N. W.

APPEAL FOR HELP.*

It has been well ascertained and decided upon that there is no power without union; and, therefore, we now find that all nations are trying to create means to produce union among them. Undoubtedly, religion is the most powerful means, the farthest reaching, the greatest, and the most valuable because of its validity; but, unfortunately, it has been as yet of different antagonistic and contentious sects; and the more these sects are augmented, the more disunion is produced, religious ties are loosened, and zeal is decreased, and, consequently, carelessness toward religion prevails, as is plainly evident in our present century.

I believe, after deep investigation throughout my life, that the only source of such dissensions and antagonisms is the misunderstanding of the ordinances of the three inspired books (the Bible, the Gospel, and the Koran), or the adoption of some of them and the rejection of the other or others. To prove that these books are inspired and from God, and that they are true and one, and to point out clearly the discrepant and ambiguous ordinances as existing among them which are supposed to contradict each other, I wrote, fifteen years ago, about eighty pamphlets on this subject, of which five only have been as yet published. If these principles become well known, and are fairly discussed, I believe more pamphlets, perhaps hundreds, will be published, which will tend to point out the facts as they really are and to remove all difficulties resulting from ambiguity and suspicion.

Two great reasons have prevented me from circulating such thoughts before the present time, viz: (1) The absence of freedom to expound religious thoughts; and (2) being unable to defray the expenses incurred by publishing what I have written on this subject.

It having been announced by me that I have these beliefs, I have lost

the fruits of my labor during these and several preceding years, and my money and all I possess. About $15,000 were seized by the Patriarchal Authorities, without the least right, but by the presidential influence.

Thirty years ago I translated several theological books from the Greek language into the Arabic; and up to the present time they have not been published, because I am not able to afford the necessary expense. Not only that, but four years ago I translated the New Testament from the Greek into the Arabic, which translation was reviewed by some learned men of Russia and of Syria and was approved by them; but, unfortunately, it had the same fate as its predecessors.

It is also necessary to start a weekly paper in English and Arabic to explain the questions that are prominent at present, and to bring the ordinances of the Divine Books, the Bible, the Gospel, and the Koran, into perfect agreement; but how to secure its expense I do not know.

For the sake of what has been stated, I have devoted my time, my thoughts, my labors and all that I earned in all my life; and am now in debt for the publication of this small book in English and Arabic.

In the name of God the Truth, who loves charity and peace on earth, especially in religious and moral matters, I humbly beg you to help me in the way you may deem proper, whether spiritual, moral or material. God knows (He is my witness) that in all my life I have not spent a single dollar for anything except food, clothing and lodging. My special aim now is to publish these facts, which are more important than any other thing in this world, to remove all causes that tend to bring religious dissensions and antagonisms. God the Almighty will reward everyone according to his own deeds; and whatever help is graciously given to me is accepted with many heartfelt thanks. Your humble and obedient servant,—

World's Fair Notes

The days of the Fair are numbered. The "Congresses" have come and gone. Altogether it has been a great summer for Chicago—as it has been also for as much of the world as has been here. For some inexplicable reason the notion spread through the East and abroad over the seas that this Columbian undertaking had been, after all the roar and noise of it, but partially or poorly carried out. Only gradually, as those who came, saw, and were conquered, returned to their distant homes, did the reputation of failure begin to wear away. No one, so far as known, has arrived within Jackson Park so loaded down with prejudices but immediately he began shedding them, and before the first half day had worn away was able to straighten up and go his way joyfully a free man. Such deliverances from bondage are a great blessing, first to the individual so delivered, and secondly to all people else with whom he shall come into social contact. Prejudices—pre-judgments—willfully toted about and paraded, are soul-wearing burthens—destructive to reason and human cheer. One of whom I have personal knowledge came this way from the State of New York "on business," and thought he would "just drop in on the Fair to kill a few hours of time." He did not stay two hours, but returned to his home by the first outgoing train, told his neighbors and brought back his "whole family instanter." It "made a new man" of him, he confessed, and his family echoed the sentiment with smiles and congratulations. The Fair has been a success in more ways than one, as it thus appears, for this lesson of unloading has gone far and been well learned and, I doubt not, inwardly digested.

In like manner the Congress of Religions operated for human well-being and elevation. There was a great scene to be witnessed for seventeen days. The surprise of the devout Christian who had never before even dreamed of an Oriental religion that could have aught to commend itself was ill concealed. Even the broad face of Joseph Cook at times seemed to relax in its rigidity of calmness and take on a sympathetic surprise. Shades of pre-judgment were evidently passing from before his mental vision as from before the eyes of all those vast Occidental congregations that daily crowded the Columbus Hall.

It was a goodly sight to see these Buddhists and "ists" of all descriptions standing there as zealous of their faiths as any Christian ever dared be. "How is it," asks one near, "that these fellows come here conducting themselves, not as heathen to be converted, but as if they were the missionaries of the one true Gospel and we were the heathen?"

And it was quite true that they seemed to speak from a lofty conviction and to be imbued with a religion that was deeply humanitarian. But they were not aggressive in the same manner as Christians. They appeared to have at least a suspicion that they might not know it all, and to be burdened with a degree of gentle courtesy that seemed to forbid entrance on the extreme work of the true Christian missionary. In plainer words, they did not so absolutely believe that theirs was the only religion "given among men whereby they could be saved." On the contrary, there appeared all the while in all their speech and action a certain striving away from the limitations of their several faiths toward some broader statement that would cover the whole of mankind—"with only the sky of truth above us," said one.

"The Chorus of Faith," which Mr. Jones is editing, will be interesting reading. To his untiring energy and liberal mind is to be credited a very large measure of the success which the Congress scored, and it is fitting that he should sum up the hopeful and splendid utterances for the larger public—why shall I not say—of the world? While it will not, of course, contain all, the gist of all will be in the "Chorus of Faith."

The Ethical meetings were interesting, as were the Free Religious, each in its own way contributing its mite to the common weal.

The labor congress was often interesting, but more vital and searching were some of the impromptu discussions that went on outside the building, where knots of people gathered about some one of the "unwashed" who had thought his way through privation toward a vision at least of "peace and plenty." What was lacking in the Congress was, as is the case in so much of the so-called labor literature, an effort to find some practical ethical basis on which labor pretensions may rest as on a bed of rock impregnable. Instead, devices and schemes for ameliorating the condition of the poor; loud clamors for justice; but few statements that made it plain "so he that runneth might read" in what justice consists. However, much cropped out in the discussions not prearranged for that may be the seed lost from sight for a time, but to reappear with fruit in due season.

"THE POST-TRANSCENDENTAL PERIOD OF UNITARIANISM."*

BY REV. JOHN C. LEARNED, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

To begin with, there is no post-transcendental period in Unitarian history. Transcendentalism is still alive. The impulse given to our churches by Emerson and Parker has never died away. Ever since the "Divinity School Address" (1838), the "South Boston Sermon" (1841), and the chapters from "Ethical Scriptures," published in The Dial (1840-44), it has been evident that there was a strain in the Unitarian blood to issue some day in a parliament of religions. It seemed far off then. It seemed near when, twenty-five years later, the Free Religious Association predicted it and renewed the hope. Now it has come,—the great world religions and many sects joining in a national centenary, and uttering their notes together in a noble symphony of faith and fellowship.

No doubt it will be a long time yet before the music of this divine classic will seem sweet to ecclesiastical ears, or the strangeness of this event wear off for those educated in the schools of tradition. It is still but a prophecy. The Archbishop of Canterbury sees but one religion; and to subject that to any discussion or comparison with the other worships of the world seems to him a profanation of the Christian faith. This is the only safe position for the defenders of orthodoxy. We, too, see but one religion; yet it has come to men of all races and times under many names. It is as really the ground of obligation, fidelity and reverence in the Calmuck as in the Catholic, in Socrates and Spinoza as in Paul or Luther or Pope Leo.

If there has been no post-transcendental period of Unitarianism, there has been no lack of events and transactions standing over and against the transcendental spirit—new readings of philosophy and science also tending to modify the conclusions and practices of transcendentalists. Some one has said that up to the time of Parker's death (1860) transcendentalism was like a lump—a pretty hard lump—in the Unitarian mixture. Since then it had gradually dissolved, until now, though not conspicuous, it had given a flavor to the whole solution. Certain it is that by no official or public act has the Unitarian denomination ever recognized and welcomed the convictions of the transcendental school. It has never felt safe in uttering as its own the inevitable predictions of its greatest prophets. It could not honestly declare itself for the intuitions of the free reasons, for the sufficiency of the inward light, so long as it clung to a special and miraculous dispensation, and laid the emphasis of its faith upon the Christian confession, or limited the terms of its fellowship by the Christian name.

At the time of Parker's death, the affairs of the Unitarians were at a low ebb. A few years before, James Freeman Clarke at the Berry Street Conference had spoken of them as "a discouraged denomination." Transcendentalism—renaissance, as it was, of the spiritual and intellectual life of New England, and offering something positive in place of the "pale negations" and disintegrating exegesis of Boston Unitarianism—had done nothing to fill or multiply or give hope to the churches. On the contrary there was a very uncomfortable feeling in the air. Recently, Parker had been refused the privilege of preaching the sermon before the graduating class of the Divinity School at Cambridge. Later, the alumni of the school had, with some bitterness, declined to pass a resolution of sympathy for him,—now sick and dying in Europe. The first and principal ground for this action was that Theodore Parker was not a Christian minister; that more than fifteen years before he disclaimed the Christian confession, saying that he took not the Bible, nor the church, "nor even Jesus of Nazareth for my Master." Dr. Furness, in criticising this action and other illiberal and ecclesiastical tendencies in the denomination, wrote: "In the true, living, invisible church every man of every religious name and of no religious name, who by working righteousness manifests the love of God in his heart, is an accepted worshiper in full communion with the saints on earth and in heaven."

There was distrust, inertia, and a vague dread of the future in those days. Organized Unitarianism was narrow and timid, with little to encourage effort. Dr. Bellows could characterize it as a provincial thing, "a Boston notion," and preached on "The Suspense of Faith."

The autumnal conventions then held were spoken of as "dreary pow-wows" on trite or trivial themes, such as "whether sin were not virtue undeveloped; or whether it were better to have four children or five in a Sunday-school class."

Graduates of the Divinity School were looked upon with suspicion as possible sympathizers with the great heresiarch. Their phraseology was watched in sermon and prayer and benediction. Some of the clergy refused to take part in ordination services where councils were declined, which usually occurred when the young candidate did not wish to be questioned on the subject of the miracles and the sacraments.

When Mr. Frothingham waited, with his venerable and blind father, for his three colleagues in Brooklyn and New York to assist him in the dedication of the Third Unitarian church of the latter city, he waited in vain. Though invited, they mutually agreed to absent themselves. When asked for a reason, it was, that the church was not properly organized and did not administer the Lord's Supper.

Not far from the date of Parker's death, several important books—all of European authorship—were published, constituting a veritable epoch in theological thought. It is sufficient to mention Darwin's "Origin of Species," "Essays and Reviews," Colenso's "Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua," and Renan's "Life of Jesus." To many young men these new results of science and biblical criticism were welcome and vital. The older men for the most part, it must be said, damned them with faint praise, or declared them noxious.

But while these works were molding opinion in the religious world, a civil war taxed the energies and resources of the American people,—the question of slavery was being settled on the battle-fields of the South. When the Union was restored and freedom was assured, and the forces so recently called to deadly conflict were released to engage in the enterprises of peace, there seemed no limit to the outlook and possibilities of material and spiritual advancement. The term "national" took on a new and higher meaning. The Unitarian denomination shared in the new hopes, called for larger means to promote its cause, and invoked the spirit of organization. Up to this time the amount of money annually contributed by, perhaps, fifty churches to the American Unitarian Association, was described as "a sum too contemptible even for ridicule" ($6,800 in 1864). Now, the surprising appeal was made to raise one hundred thousand dollars, followed by a proposition for a national convention of Unitarians to be held at an early date.

The genius of this undertaking was Rev. Dr. Bellows—already distinguished before the nation for his executive power in the work of the Sanitary Commission. The preliminaries of this meeting gave no serious difficulty, though it was apparent that there were two wings to the Unitarian body, and that the breach between them had not lessened since the death of Parker. Dr. Bellows, interpreting the present opportunity in a large way, was in favor of a broad church movement. He would even leave out the word Unitarian from the constitution or call—thus opening the door of our fellowship to any independent churches, and organizing under the name of the "Free Church of America." But this view aroused instant opposition, as an abandonment of our historic position, and as likely to let in societies that laid no claim to the Christian name. Some very influential conservatives were from the outset positively distrustful of results; the more experienced radicals of the Parker school were not very hopeful; but the main body, including the young radicals, entered into the hopes and enthusiasm of the gallant leader and his associates.

The call for the convention was calculated to allay all fears. It was as catholic as freedom itself. The address to the churches said the convention would not "force upon any parties to it any action which they do not heartily approve."

The delegates from 195 churches came together in April, 1865, in the city of New York. A resolution, preceding the presentation of a constitution, was unanimously passed, declaring that to secure "the widest co-operation of our body" all acts of this convention "are expressions only of its majority, committing in no degree those who object to them." In the light of later history this may be pronounced the first mistake that the convention made, leading into a labyrinth of difficulties. It may be replied that this utterance was necessary to quiet suspicions, as a peace measure, or as a relief to private consciences. It should not have been necessary. It was a delusion. It really foreshadowed a concerted action to ignore or override the wishes of the minority. For when the constitution was brought forward it was absolutely impossible that any clear-minded sympathizer with Parker could indorse it. Moreover, when adopted it did commit the members, by implication at least, to belief in the supernatural Lordship and messianic Sonship of Jesus Christ. Moreover, by the witness of those who had most to do with framing and advocating the preamble of that instrument, it was intended to make the Christian confession the test and condition of Unitarian fellowship. This statement was not made, as some supposed, for the outside world, but for the protection of the Unitarian denomination itself against the inroads of a radicalism now grown more outspoken and acutely feared.

It was estimated that in 1860 there were twenty-five ministers in full sympathy with Theodore Parker. This is probably too great a number. But in 1865 so many were suspected of sharing his views or of having lost all faith in the special claims or miraculous character of Christianity, that it was felt that some decisive steps must be taken to save the traditions, and even the "integrity" of the denomination. The matter was not suffered to rest here. Bitterly as the young radicals were disappointed at the terms of organization, they fell back on the generous invitation of the circular letter and on the fair-seeming of the preliminary resolution. They were too sincere and sanguine to believe that their overwhelming defeat could be more than accidental or temporary. So in the autumn of the next year (October, 1866), at Syracuse, they mustered their now depleted forces, and under the leadership of Rev. Francis E. Abbot, urged, in the interest of honesty and growing thought and a united fellowship, that the phrasing of the preamble be changed. The appeal was in vain. The amendment was firmly rejected. And as already the phrases and implications of that preamble were often used as a test of denominational soundness, it is not strange that the twice defeated minority should now abandon the National Conference or seek to create a more congenial organization.

One of the consequences of what has been called "The Battle of Syracuse"—a very Waterloo of the Unitarian anti-supernaturalists—was the Free Religious Association. Ever since the death of Parker, fitly designated as "a kind of theological John Brown" (for he was abhorred by the conservatives as much as he was admired by the radicals), those who had ceased to ground religion in miracle had felt the need of the leadership of a clarifying or master mind, who in living words should give his interpretation of passing events and of the thinking of the religious world. Some turned to James Freeman Clarke. He had been a friend of Parker when friends were few. He had founded a church upon a secular basis. He had said, "All question in theology are to us open questions." He had translated and published Hase's "Life of Jesus." He had proposed that the National Conference take the name of "Unitarian and Other Independent Churches." But it was soon seen that he was really a Christian "rationalist," representing a phase of thought little in advance of what is now known as progressive orthodoxy. Some suggested Dr. Hedge as "Reason or Rome—there is no middle ground"; "No infallible oracle out of the breast,"—seemed very daring. These challenging sayings were quoted as half-battles then. But Dr. Hedge described his own attitude well when he said he was "intellectually radical but ecclesiastically conservative." And when he wrote that the Christian churches must stand or fall on "the confession of Christ as divinely human Master and Head;" and when, in "The Bible or the Mathematics as the Basis of Preaching," he branded an anti-supernaturalist, or one who preached "Christian morals" only, as a traitor to the Christian pulpit,—it was felt that not in him was the successor of Parker or Emerson. It might be said that here was pre-transcendentalism in the post-transcendental period.

Other names were hopefully mentioned—some dead, some living. But it was evident that Unitarianism had not seen the full import of transcendentalism, or had failed to incorporate it into its faith. When the Free

Religious Association, however, met and organized (May, 1867) its choice for president fell upon one who by gifts of scholarship, clearness of conviction, courage of utterance, and nobility of character was suited to represent and lead the new movement. This was Rev. Octavius B. Frothingham. Although the type of transcendentalism seen in Parker was now undergoing modification under the influence of the philosophy of evolution, Mr. Frothingham was his true successor. And when we look back twenty-five years, we see how that group of rare men gathered about him anticipated the growing faith of to-day. The formation of that association has no small significance in the history of religious thought. Its position had in it the vitality of universal and enduring truth. There can be no doubt that, in the words of its faithful secretary, "it advanced the problem of religious liberty to a new and more comprehensive issue."

As for the National Conference, it probably gained in numbers as it secured enlarged confidence in the rank and file of the denomination by this secession. Dr. Bellows still clung to his idea of the American Church (1868), which he believed it was the duty and privilege of Unitarians to construct and launch. But it is no longer a "Free Church," but "the Liberal Christian Church." It is to be offered as an undogmatic faith, but is to be "positive in its doctrine of God our Father and Christ our Savior." He suggests, however, that at a later date "a more definite theological statement of the Christian religion" may be welcome and necessary. The object of such a church is less "to do good" than "to make Christians." Naturally, more and more emphasis is laid upon the word Christian. The year before (1867), Dr. Noyes, too feeble to stand, sat in his chair before the alumni of the Harvard Divinity School to vindicate the right of the students to liberty of thought—it having been charged that certain trust funds had been diverted from their original purpose for the support of those who had no right in Christian pulpits or to the Christian name. Now we are told that if anything is decided it is that we stand on Christian ground "as disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ."

In 1870 Dr. Eliot pleads for proper catechisms "to teach the distinctive doctrines of our Christian faith," and approvingly quotes Dr. Bellows in a saying that "there is no duty more urgent than the duty of furnishing our people with a definite statement of faith." Dr. Eliot deplors the state of the churches in the West. "Dispensing with the Christian ordinances, with prayer-meetings and Bible instruction, speaking of Jesus Christ as seldom as possible, and never by any chance calling him Lord and Master, the pulpit has sunk into insignificance and the pews into emptiness." He is heart-sick at the sight.

He thinks the whole denomination has been at fault for this. "We have been trying the experiment for thirty years past with how little belief Christian ministers, or ministers in Christian pulpits, can get along."

At this time Dr. Clarke, though not favoring it, thinks some kind of creed as a basis of union is inevitable. "This creed," he says, "will probably contain some articles affirming the supernatural character of Christianity and the superhuman nature of Jesus. The object will be to exclude radicals and unite together those who are sound on these points."

Although this tendency was arrested before its consummation, it is not to be wondered at that it brought on the "Year Book Controversy" as one of its legitimate fruits. Mr. Lowe, whose tolerant spirit was universally recognized, had written, when secretary of the American Association (1865-71), "I admit that we make a belief in Christianity a 'test of fellowship.'" Under his successor a direct and personal application of this test was deliberately carried into effect. Rev. William J. Potter, pastor of the Unitarian Church of New Bedford, declining to call himself a "Christian," his name was dropped from the annual list of Unitarian ministers. This official act, making creed rather than character, a word rather than worth, the condition of ministerial or religious fellowship, so glaringly contradicted the liberal traditions and ostentatious professions of Unitarianism, that, although revoked after ten years of tedious discussion, it gave a wrench to the denomination, and lent a prejudice to the Christian name, which has not been outgrown.

In the last ten or twelve years, the policy of the denomination has broadened with broadening thought. The influence of scientific studies and historical criticism has made necessary a revision of the fundamentals of faith. Some of the older churches have changed the phraseology of their covenants. Some, like that which once had Channing for its minister, have ceased to use them. The American Unitarian Association has published a volume of Parker's views of religion. It was edited by Dr. Clarke, who, twenty-five years before, found "not the smallest glimpse of Christian piety" in his writings, and thought him not entitled to the Christian name, because he "places Christ and Christianity with the other great historic religions of the world." But nothing could more strikingly indicate the advance of thought among us than the manuals published by our Sunday-school societies, when compared with those of a generation ago. They are topical rather than textual; ethical and historical, rather than evangelical and dogmatic.

In 1882, to stem the unallayed and rising discontent of the liberal party, a "conscience clause" was added to the constitution of the National Conference. It was offered by Rev. M. J. Savage, and is known as the tenth article. In the spring before, the Western Conference, whose work had been gradually growing in importance, determined to become a legal institution. After long debate, it chose purely secular and business terms for the phraseology of its charter. The action was premature—some who voted for it afterwards repenting. For the relation of the Western Conference to the National Conference and to the American Unitarian Association was such that the distinctively Christian Unitarians, both of the East and of the West, regarded the measure as opening the door of fellowship to that Free-Religious and non-Christian element, which had already caused so much trouble to the larger organizations. Still, the number of "ethical" Unitarians, and of those whose scientific reading had led them to reject the supernatural claims of Christianity, had increased. This was recognized, as we have seen, in the renewed demand for a change of the National Conference preamble.

By degrees, as the breadth of tolerance grew, and the Western publications voiced more constantly the conclusions of the "higher criticism"; as from time to time Ethical Culture lecturers, Jewish rabbis, and social reformers spoke at the Western Conference, and found fraternal welcome in its assemblies,—men who laid no claims to being Unitarians or Christians, nor even theists,—it became a matter of grave concern to recall the wayward churches of the West to their historic allegiance, to remedy the mistake made at Cleveland, and in some way to commit the Conference to the Christian confession.

The opportunity for making this attempt occurred at Cincinnati in 1886. The abnormal and alarming state of the churches of the West had been assiduously and widely proclaimed by Mr. Sunderland, who for two years had been in the field as Secretary of the Western Conference. He had noticed that "the Christian name" was rare in use and feeble in utterance. There was a strong sympathy with the Free Religious and Ethical movements. Agnosticism, then the startling and master heresy, was prevalent. There could be no peace or health or safety but by the affirmation of a doctrinal basis. He implored the Conference to declare its Christian theism, and he caused a resolution to be introduced, saying that "the primary object of this Conference is to diffuse the knowledge and promote the interests of pure Christianity,"—words taken from the by-laws of the American Unitarian Association. When this proposition was rejected for a substitute presented by Rev. W. C. Gannett, which announced that "the Western Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all who wish to join it to help establish truth, righteousness, and love in the world," a feeling as if chaos had come again ran through the Unitarian denomination. East and West shuddered with fear or grief or indignation. There was quick division, prolonged controversy, unfortunate misunderstandings. The conference was now described as only ethical, its aims being reduced to "mere morality," furnishing a refuge for atheism and irreligion. It did not say God or Christ or worship. Yet it was probably the first victory of pure transcendentalism in all ecclesiastical history,—the first cordial recognition and welcome ever extended to universal religion by an association of churches.

It hardly went beyond Emerson's address of fifty years before; which said that "the sentiment of virtue is the essence of religion—divine and deifying." When man is obedient to truth, right and love, "then is the end of creation answered," and he becomes a partaker of the supreme wisdom. For transcendentalism is subjective, obedient to motives and principles within; while ecclesiasticism is ever objective, is conformity to the externals of custom—to standards of doctrine and authority without. Transcendentalism believes more in the influence of spiritual heredity than in the shapings of material environment. Transcendentalism never yet helped win a sectarian triumph, and it never will.

Really, the struggle at Cincinnati had a double significance. Those who had done most to revive the Western Conference from its lethargy of fifteen years before and chiefly this was due to its ten-years Secretary, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, were prepared for the logical consequences of the Unitarian theory, "that religion is not in name, but in deed;" that by conduct, and not by claims and confessions, are men to be commended and saved. They wished therefore, to maintain the strictly undogmatic and hospitable attitude of the organization. This would be sure to give it means of influence far beyond its access of numbers. But in the second place, less consciously, perhaps, it was an effort for conference independence,—the privilege of managing its local affairs without interference from or dependence upon any other organization. This principle, which I believe to be as important as the congregational liberty of our churches, is yet to be wrought out and affirmed in the interest of freedom and of fellowship. Because both these issues were at stake, it was not possible, a year later, at Chicago, to accept "Christian theism" as a basis of compromise and co-operation from the committee of the American Unitarian Association.

Outwardly, without any extraordinary sacrifices or any drastic liberality of contributions, Unitarianism has made steady gains. New churches have sprung up in all parts of the land, especially of late, upon the Pacific coast. New activities, like the Guilds and Unity Clubs, have been inaugurated within the churches. The Ministers' Institute was formed in 1877,—meeting every other year to hear papers on "scientific theology." The spirit of association has increased. The circulation of our literature, through the agency of the Postoffice Mission, has proved a most efficient means for the dissemination of liberal and Unitarian views. The demand for the sermons of Mr. Savage, Mr. Chadwick and others has been phenomenal, and well demonstrates the tendencies of Unitarian thought. Of periodicals, all are now dead that reported the state of our churches thirty years ago,—all except the Christian Register.

"The awful register goes on"—forever, we hope. But no, none have died; all have been translated,—giving another confirmation to the doctrine of immortality. For we have just as many now as ever: one quarterly (The New World), one monthly (The Unitarian), and two weeklies (The Christian Register and UNITY),—leaving out those that serve some local want. In this latter period women have been called to our pulpits. The two theological schools (at Cambridge and Meadville) have been more fully endowed and a handsome denominational building (the suggestion of Mr. Lowe in 1868) has been erected in Boston.

If sometimes, in this survey of a generation of Unitarianism, it has seemed that too much time has been taken up with those things which appear to many, and especially to outsiders, as trifles,—a mere war of words over phrases, over definitions which do not define, or with misunderstandings about minor matters,—it may be replied that trifles, so called, which become the themes of contention, may symbolize all the difference there is between stationariness and progress, or between action and reaction. As Prof. William James shrewdly says, "The obstinate insisting that tweedledum is not tweedledee is the bone and marrow of life. * * A thing is important if any one think it important. The process of history consists in certain folks becoming possessed of the mania that certain special things are important infinitely, whilst other folks cannot agree in the belief." Unless the "little things" are got over, are ground into powder, or subside into the non-essential, they remain as permanent obstacles to any advance. To those concerned, therefore, there is no "useless controversy." It is their pathway to the light. The disdain of trifles, whether in word or deed, is the very spirit of Mephistopheles, "the sovereign root of indifference," of falsehood and of evil.

COLLEGE VERSE.*

If a comparison be sought between these two volumes, both we believe new departures, we find that Mr. Harrison's selections better represent the average of undergraduate verse, while for real poetry the meed of praise must be unhesitatingly given to the Western volume. But both will be welcomed by the man who still cherishes the joys, the loves, the friendships of his college days.

The honors of the Iowa volume are divided between Mary Bowen and Bertha May Booth, and we quote from both.

This by Miss Bowen:

TO SOME NEW BOOKS.

Books, with your lips yet dumb,
How strange to think you will be Friends in the years to come,
An inseparable part of me.

And this clever conceit:

THE FAIRY TELEGRAPH.

A cobweb glistens in the sun;
Upon its airy circuits run
The telegrams of fays.

From clover-top to milk-weed pod,
Thence where the stalks of golden-rod
Their shining towers raise;

A spider at each place receives
The messages on yellow leaves,
Then sends them here and there.

His messenger, the loitering breeze,
That, idling with the beckoning trees,
Doth drop them everywhere.

From Miss Booth's several contributions we select, after much indecision, these lines, entitled:

TRUST.

Since cycles infinite have passed away,
And still God's merciful, almighty hands

Have led the planets in their circling away,

And checked the lightning by invisible bands,

Have guided the aurora's shifting bars, Quelled by a touch the thunder's crashing strife,

And bound in changeless groups the eternal stars—

May I not trust Him with my little life?

In "Cap and Gown" we find small trace of the serious muse that seems to inspire the greater part of the other volume, but it perhaps better types the care-free life of the undergraduate. Mr. Harrison has made his selections from the publications of over twenty-five universities and colleges, and though the collection does not lack attempts at serious work, we find more like these lines to

There's a face that haunts me ever,
There are eyes mine always meet,
As I read the morning paper,
As I walk the crowded street.

Oh! She knows not how I suffer;
Hers is now a world-wide fame;
But till death that face shall greet me;
Lydia Pinkham is her name.

Examining the two books together we cannot but believe that Mr. Harrison might have done better in selecting from so wide a range. We cannot refrain from giving here one that he might have included, and which would have better represented the University from which it came than what Mr. Harrison saw fit to include from that source:

TO THE TRAILING ARBUTUS.

Sweet, modest flower, thy worth I know.

Have I not sought thee in the wood,
Where only puffs of spring winds blow,
To break the solitude?

Have I not sought thee—yet for what?
To tear thee rudely from thy place?
No, not for that; I thank God, not!
I breathed thy fragrance, felt the trace

Of the Great Artist's finest touch
In thy fair tint. It was not much—
I left thee in thy place.

Does not this beautifully suggest Emerson's

"Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?
Loved the wood-rose and left it on its stalk?"

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THEOLOGY AS ILLUSTRATED IN ENGLISH POETRY FROM 1780 TO 1830. By Stopford A. Brooke, M. A., LL. D. London: Philip Green. Cloth, 16mo., pp. 55. 1s.—Daintily bound in green and gold, this first Essex Hall lecture comes to us from the press of Philip Green. As UNITY readers have already seen an abstract of it in our issue of June 29, it is unnecessary for us to commend it to them now.

THE following cordial notice of our new Sunday-school Manual, "BEGINNINGS," appeared in Every Other Sunday for October 8, 1893:

Rev. Allen W. Gould has prepared, and published through the Western Unitarian Sunday-school Society, twenty-two lessons entitled "Beginnings," being the first year's course in a six years' study of religion. One is struck at once, even in a rapid perusal of this manual, with the vast amount of knowledge which it contains concerning the origin of life, belief, and religious usages. The plan of the book is highly suggestive, and calculated to make the reader or the student think. For instance, the leading titles of the lessons are of this kind: "How the World Began," "How the Arts of Life Began," "How the Languages Began," "How the Thought of God Began," "How Sacrifice Began," etc. The page is set in very clear type, the divisions of the subjects are exceedingly good, and questions and references are judiciously interspersed. This textbook is destined to serve most valuable needs in our Sunday schools. We have not gone into any criticism of the views set forth in the book. The author has the right to present his own ideas frankly and fully. Those views can be ascertained by any one who obtains a copy of the work. Price, in paper covers, 25 cents.

ONE of the handsomest of the many beautiful advertisements of the day is the sixty-page illustrated descriptive pamphlet issued by the New York Condensed Milk Company, manufacturers of the Gail Borden Eagle brand, so well known to housekeepers for a third of a century. We sometimes wonder whether the getting out of such expensive publications pays, from the advertising standpoint, but it certainly is a pleasure to look at the handsome pictures of the various places in New England, New York and Illinois in which this pioneer in packing good food has its manufacturing.

THE MAGAZINES.

ONE of the very best of our exchanges is the Kindergarten Magazine, a thing of beauty as well as of worth, a periodical that is of value to every teacher and parent,—not only to those who have the care of very young children. In an article on "The Whole Child," in the October number, Josephine Carson Locke says:

Every great educational movement has originated in the grown-up person laying aside his or her personal opinions, traditions, preferences, and honestly trying to look at things from the child's standpoint,—literally denying himself or herself, and becoming "as a little child."

This may not be the most perfect statement of truth, but it is a statement which contains a great truth, which is as worthy of consideration by the philosopher and the university professor as it is by the teacher of infants.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE for September 30 contains an article from the Contemporary Review, by Leslie Stephen, entitled "Ethics and the Struggle for Existence," suggested by Professor Huxley's Romanes Lecture, in which he criticises that gentleman's recent utterance very ably. It will well repay perusal. While the terms in which Mr. Stephen expresses his conclusion, in the final paragraph of his article, do not seem to us well taken, the general purport of the article seems to us not only good and true but cheerful and suggestive. In this connection we are prompted to call our reader's attention to a very able paper bearing on the same question, Dr. Lewis G. Jones's "Professor Huxley's Surrender," read at the Congress of Evolutionists, which we hope to see published at an early day.

THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL has of late been particularly interesting, noticeably the issues of Sept. 9 and 16, containing Dr. C. G. Davis' paper on Hypnotism, Rev. Minot J. Savage's paper on "Spiritualistic Interpretation of Psychic Phenomena," Mrs. Sara A. Underwood's paper on "Automatic Writing—So Called," and several other papers read at the Psychical Congress. It would appear that the congress was a highly successful one.

THE OLD STONE BASIN.

In the heart of the busy city,
 In the scorching noontide heat,
 A sound of bubbling water
 Falls on the din of the street.
 It falls in a gray stone basin;
 And over the cool, wet brink
 The heads of thirsty horses
 Each moment are stretched to drink.
 And, peeping among the crowding heads,
 As the horses come and go,
 "The Gift of Three Little Sisters"
 Is read on the stone below.
 Ah! beasts are not taught letters,
 They know no alphabet;
 And never a horse in all these years
 Has read the words,—and yet
 I think that each toil-worn creature,
 Who stops to drink by the way,
 His thanks in his own dumb fashion
 To the sisters small must pay.
 Years have gone by since busy hands
 Wrought at the basin's stone;
 The kindly little sisters
 Are all to women grown.
 I do not know their home or fates,
 Or the name they bear to men;
 But the sweetness of their gracious deed
 Is just as fresh as then.
 And all life long, and after life,
 They must the happier be
 For this "Cup of Water" given by them
 When they were children three.

Worshiping by Running.

In one of the great temples of Japan the devotion of the worshipers consists in running around the sacred building one hundred times, and dropping a piece of wood into a box at each round, when, the wearisome exertion being ended, the worshiper goes home tired and very happy at the thought of having done his god such worthy service.

TWO IDYLS.

II. The Walnuts.

The straight, green path lengthened out under the overhanging branches of the trees, which stood on either side, and terminated in a yellow field where the ripe wheat glistened in the sunshine. Here and there, the sun, piercing the thick foliage, formed little islands of light on the turf, which moved fantastically about as a soft wind fitfully swayed the tops of the trees.

Two persons, a man and a woman, with slow steps were walking down the path, she supporting herself with her parasol in lieu of a cane; he upright and smart, his hands behind his back; her hair covered with a veil of rich lace under which her silver curls were plainly visible; he with a broad-brimmed straw hat on his gray head. They were evidently annoyed with each other, for they walked on without speaking and without an exchange of glances, save now and then to cast a furtive look of reproach at each other. At last, when they had traversed half the walk, she said to him in a voice which, though sweet, still shook slightly as if there remained a little anger in it:

"It is decided then; you are going to make those children unhappy?"

"On the contrary, I shall arrange that my granddaughter will never reproach me with having caused her unhappiness by permitting this imprudence."

She shrugged her shoulders, but very slightly, however, as was becoming a woman of good breeding.

"Because the boy, who loves her, is not quite so rich as she— How fine that is! They are always sure of having bread at least—"

"But not butter, perhaps!" observed the grandfather.

"When one is in love he can eat kisses on his bread," she responded, with a little laugh.

As he did not answer this she walked on a few steps, looking to the right and to the left, then stopped before a walnut tree.

"Look, my dear," said she; "are there not some nuts there?"

With chivalric politeness the grandfather approached, and, looking through his glasses, regarded the tree and replied:

"Yes, there are some nuts there."

"Will you get me a few, my dear?"

The grandfather looked at the grandmother with some surprise. It had been many years since either had found any pleasure in eating nuts. Nevertheless he pulled down a branch within reach of his wife, and she broke off a little twig of nuts, as yet hardly ripe, and pinned it on her bosom.

"Do you not remember?" said she.

A ray of sunshine, breaking through the leaves, lighted up the old man's face—or was it a ray of memory? The gray eyes of his wife penetrated into his with a disquieting persistence. He remembered very well; but what had these walnuts to do in such a serious affair as his only granddaughter's marriage? He pretended to be occupied with a tree whose branches needed the attention of the pruner; but his wife went on:

"It is that very tree" (for it was an old walnut tree) "which had so many nuts the year that—"

"I know, I know," said he.

"I was here," she continued, "and I had just gathered the nuts on the lowest branches, when you came. It was you who helped me to finish filling my basket, and, as the pile of burs grew higher and higher, your eyes became more and more talkative; and it was you, I think, who put the last twig of nuts where I have pinned this one."

"My dear wife!" said the old man.

"And you said to me, 'Madeline, if your parents will not consent to our marriage, I shall be wild'—"

"And we were married and we have been happy together many years," concluded the grandfather.

"And we were not rich, we have become that—the children will do so—do you remember?"

They said no more, but they walked slowly on, arm in arm, until they reached the end of the lane. There they paused, and he said at last:

"Well, they must wait a little longer, so that we can help them more than we are able to do just now."

"Very well," she said; "they are young yet and their hearts are warm."

"You see, I must let them have enough to get some butter."

"And while they are young," said the grandmother, "I shall see that they always have enough walnuts."

ELMER JAMES BAILEY.

THE late Leopold de Meyer, of Dresden, a brilliant and popular pianist in his day, was once summoned to play before the Sultan at Constantinople. Going thither, he borrowed a grand piano from one of the Austrian secretaries of legation, and had it set up in a large reception room at the palace. There he awaited the coming of the Sultan; but when that intelligent monarch entered the room he started back in alarm and demanded of his attendants what that monster was standing there on three legs. Explanations followed, but were in vain. The legs had to be taken off and the body of the instrument laid flat on the floor, and Leopold de Meyer, squatting cross-legged on a mat, went through his program as best he could in that awkward attitude and without pedals. But the Sultan was delighted, and when the last piece was played gave the artist a handsome present as a reward for his labor.

LESSON VI.

THE SOWER.

Mt. xiii. 1-9.

*They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.
Though he goeth on his way weeping, bearing forth the seed,
He shall come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him.*

Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6.

*Amidst a blinded world he saw
The oneness of the dual law.*

Picture: The Sower, Jean Francois Millet (1814-1875).

There are many reasons why this picture is peculiarly appropriate. According to the accounts, this is the first parable that Jesus spoke, the first time that he used the form of teaching which afterwards became his favorite mode of communicating thought. Similarly, this picture of The Sower, painted in 1849, stands just at the dividing line between the two stages of Millet's art. It was in 1850 that he announced in a letter to a friend his determination to abandon mythological subjects and devote himself entirely to portraying the humble peasant life of France. In the parables Jesus conveyed his thought as in the later pictures Millet conveyed his, by means of subjects found in the commonplace life with which each was familiar.

Again, there is very much in Millet's life that reminds us of Jesus. Each was lowly born, each knew the distress of actual want, each was ignored during his lifetime and honored after his death, each opposed the prevailing ideals of his time, Millet in art as Jesus in religion, and, finally, each was able to dignify the seemingly hard, uninteresting life of peasant communities by showing its rich significance in suggestions of religion and beauty. As one looks at this picture of The Sower, he is irresistibly reminded of the life of the man who painted it and also of the man whose parable we are to study. Both sowed in obscurity and tears, both have reaped in light and joy.

What is a parable?—A parable is a story in which natural occurrences are so related as to reveal spiritual truths.

In the parable, at its best, the events described are such as may have occurred in nature, although it is not essential that the story should be based on an actual historical occurrence. Some of the parables of Jesus undoubtedly portray scenes actually before his eyes at the time they were spoken; some contain incidents which had happened within the memory of those who listened and would be instantly recalled. To the latter class, for instance, belongs the parable in Luke xix. 12, seq., where no one can fail to recognize, in the nobleman who went to the far country to receive for himself a kingdom, Archelaus, who after the death of his father, Herod, went to Rome that he might be established in his kingdom against the rebellious protests of the Jews. But it is not necessary to suppose that the parable of the Prodigal Son is drawn from an incident which Jesus had witnessed in actual life, or that the merchant seeking goodly pearls was an actual person whom Jesus might have named if he had chosen to do so. The parable need not be true to fact, it must be true to nature. A story in which trees talk and men do impossible things is a fable or an allegory, but not a parable. The essence of a parable is in its fidelity to nature, and therein lies its value also.

Why did Jesus teach in parables?—Because he had learned the truth which he taught by observation of nature.

The chronology of our gospels is so very uncertain that it is unsafe to assert, as some have done, that at a certain stage in his ministry Jesus altered his mode of teaching from pithy, sententious sayings, such as the rabbis used, to parables which gave light only to those who already had eyes to see and threw into even greater confusion and blindness those who had not. We know that Jesus learned truth from the great parable of Nature, which he knew to be a parable, and we cannot believe that he chose this form merely because he wished to put his thought in such a way that those who could not receive it would not be offended, while those whose spiritual sympathies were like his would discern the truth in the symbol. It may be that at first he modeled his teaching after the pattern of the rabbis, and afterwards changed his method for some reason not to be discovered now; but, however that may be, the parable was the natural mode of his expression, because it was in parables that truth came to him.

When a parable is true to nature it has a value beyond that attaching to a simple illustration. One of the hardest things to learn is that an illustration, as such, proves nothing; that because a speaker uses one so skillfully that we see his thought clearly, it by no means follows that his thought is true. But when the parable is based upon a natural law or universal principle and the analogy between the symbol and the thing symbolized is vital, then the parable is more than an illustration, it is proof, for what appears to be the dual law is really one. Perhaps the most important discovery of this century, important because it has been made the fundamental postulate of all study, is that man is part of the world, that nature does not cease to be nature when it becomes human. Hence a law of nature is a law of human nature also. Of course, Jesus did not formulate this idea, but his teaching is based on it nevertheless, and, therefore, his parables have a probative and not merely an illustrative value. The originality of Jesus' thought and its substantial truth are due, at bottom, to his belief, unconscious perhaps, but no less certain, that God was one, revealed in nature and in human nature alike, and hence that all nature is a parable of revelation.

The oneness of the dual law.*

What did Jesus mean to teach by the parable of the sower?—That the character of a man determines his reception of truth.

In the parable the four kinds of soil represent four conditions of soul.

(a) The Wayside Hearers.—It seems probable that the fields were separated not by fences but by beaten lanes, or driveways, and therefore as the farmer cast his seed near the edge of a field some of it might easily fall upon the compact earth, where the birds would pick it up. "It is still common in the East to see large flocks of birds following the husbandman as he sows his wheat, and eagerly picking up every grain that has not sunk out of sight." There are hearts and minds that are all roadway; the various ways in which they became so each can discover for himself. It was said once that, in the application of the parable, the hearts became hard (gospel-hardened was the phrase used) because there were so many trampling about to sow seed. One danger in these days is that by reading much and thinking little our minds may become quite incapable of taking in an idea, which lies in the mind, finding lodgment only till it is caught away by some new sensation.

(b) The Shallow Hearers.—Frequently in Palestine one will find places where the soil lies thin over a limestone ledge. When seed falls into such ground it is subjected to greater heat and quickly springs up, to wither away as quickly, because it has no depth of earth. There are persons whose hearts are as rock, but who have a shallow layer of sentimentality, in which truth thrives for a time but never comes to anything. It often happens that impenetrable feeling and sentimental emotion are found in the same character, and frequently the capacity for deep feeling is lost by over-exercise of emotion.

(c) The Thorn-Sown Hearers.—These are they in whom the sowing promises a fruitful harvest, but cheap ambitions, cravings after mean success, greediness for pleasures that are only sensuous, and lust for money or fame, check the growing grain and ruin the promising harvest.

(d) The Deep-Soil Hearers.—If a man's mind is open and receptive, if it be not over-crustured or under-ledged, and if he desires supremely to know truth and do right, then, said Jesus, into the mind of such a man truth enters, germinates and brings forth fruit, lifting the soul to greater beauty, as the life hidden within the lily "brings earth-born atoms to the glory of the air." But even in the good soil there are grades of depth and richness, as among equally good men there are differences of ability and genius, and as among the followers of Jesus there were Bartholomew and Peter, Thaddeus and John.

Jesus is reported to have said that there were many who could not receive his words. Modern psychology also teaches that since a new idea must be incorporated into the organism of thought already existing, it is physically impossible that new truth should find place in some minds. All nature is a constant parable, every event or fact is a seed of truth, and as we grow in depth of character, the parable is understood, the transforming truth is received. The lesson of the parable is summed up in Jesus' beatitude,—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Besides this main lesson of the parable there are a few side suggestions which deserve brief mention.

(1) The farmer, like God, sows broadcast, and does not pick his soil. Nor is the seed that bears no fruit really wasted. If it falls by the wayside, God's birds are fed, and science has taught us that by the agency of birds seeds are often carried from hard to fruitful soils; if it falls on the soil-filmed ledge, where it springs up only to die, its shoot, that never came to maturity, adds to the depth of soil and gives the seed that shall come next a better chance; if it falls among the thorns, a nature with good grain in it, even though choked by thorns, is better than one that is nothing but a briar-patch. Moreover, the four kinds of soil are sometimes found in the same individual. Don't be too scrupulous about picking soils.

(2) The Faith of the Sower. When corn is scarce it seems foolhardy to cast away what is needed for food, but the sower does it, relying upon the natural laws of seed-time and harvest. The faith of the sower is in every one who, in like reliance, casts away a present good, hoping for something better in the future. Abraham, who went out from home, forfeiting its advantages and delights, not knowing whither he went, is called the "Father of the faithful."

(3) The slow growth of truth even (shall we say, particularly) in the best soils. It is one of the laws of nature that the higher in the scale an animal is the longer is the time required for it to reach maturity. Geology has taught us of stretches of time so vast that the imagination utterly fails to take them in,—all these ages has the truth to which we have now attained been climbing toward realization. We sometimes get discouraged because our work shows such poor results; the discouragement should come in reality when the results are immediate. The best work is done on long lines. One soweth and another reapeth.

Notes from the Field

Western Unitarian Conference.—At the meeting of the Board of Directors, held September 26, Rev. A. W. Gould, of Hinsdale, was unanimously elected to fill the position of Secretary. Mr. Gould was not present at the meeting, and when notified of the action decided, after some hesitation, to accept the position. At the meeting of the Directors, held October 4, his letter of acceptance was read, and the Board voted that his duties should begin October 1st. It was also voted to pay Mr. Hosmer the Secretary's salary for the month of September, but he declined to accept it, saying that his services had been only occasional and had been given as a labor of love. The following resolution was then moved and unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, The resignation of our secretary, the Rev. F. L. Hosmer, has made it necessary for this Board to elect a new secretary, and we happily have obtained at this date, October, 1893, Rev. A. W. Gould to be our secretary, therefore,

Resolved, That we cannot give up the services of our late secretary, Mr. Hosmer, without expressing our high and respectful sense of his wise, discerning, valuable and faithful administration of the office of secretary of the Conference since he assumed the same, and our sincere thanks for his considerate care and work after his term of office had expired by his resignation, while the Board was electing and obtaining a successor.

Mr. Gould's acceptance was expressed in the following letter to Mr. Hosmer: Your official notice of my election to the position of Secretary of the Western Conference reached me yesterday. When I first heard of the vote it took me completely by surprise, and my first impulse was to say, no. I had not once thought of myself for the place, as I personally preferred my parish work, and I was so new to the faith that I had felt some scruples about taking so large a part in the work at headquarters as I have taken the past year or two. It seems as if someone longer identified with the movement ought to be its official representative.

But after talking with some who have an historic right to the name of Unitarian, and after thinking the matter over by myself, I have decided to accept the position as a place where I can work more widely and effectively for the cause I have at heart—the helping on of the grand movement which is lifting all Christendom out of the darkness of dogmas into the radiant light of religion. Though I have had no share in the past history of Unitarianism, I honor it most highly because it has been the denomination which has led all others in that upward movement. I am with it now only because it seems to me to be nearer the light than any other religious organization. But I do not bind myself to stay in it one moment after it stops advancing or allows any other denomination to get ahead of it. Yet as long as it keeps first, I shall be proud to bear its name and glad to serve it as faithfully and wisely as I can. And I thank you all for the confidence and esteem you have manifested in thus unanimously choosing me for a position of so much responsibility. Yours most sincerely,

A. W. GOULD.

Hinsdale, Ill., Sept. 29, 1893.

Chicago.—ALL SOULS CHURCH.—The Parliament of Religions, just closed, has left us still wanting to know more of India. Arrangements have been made with Rev. B. B. Nagarkar, of the Brahmo-Somaj of Bombay, who carries with us awhile, to give a series of four Conversational Lectures on Religions and Social Life in India, on successive Monday and Thursday nights, as follows: Monday, Oct. 9,—Our Social and Domestic Manners and Customs. Thursday, Oct. 12,—The Position of Women in India. Monday, Oct. 16,—The Indian Schools of Philosophy. Thursday, Oct. 19,—The Development of Religious Thought in India. Questions will be solicited at the end of each lecture. Tickets for the course ($1) may be obtained of Mrs. J. H. Cooke, 4126 Drexel Boulevard, Chairman of Lecture Section of Unity Club. The pulpit of All Souls Church will probably be occupied each evening during the month by speakers from the Orient and other visitors in attendance at the various congresses that may be in session. The Sunday School is being reorganized under the direction of the following Committee of Superintendence: Mrs. M. H. Lackersteen, Mrs. M. H. Perkins, Mrs. E. T. Leonard. The Pastor's Class in Religion and Teachers' Meeting will be held every Friday at 8 p. m. School meets at 9:30 a. m. The Kindergarten will open Monday, the 9th, at 9 o'clock a. m., in the auditorium of the church; Miss Gertrude Sackett, director.

Hinsdale, Ill.—Last Sunday Mr. Gould presented his resignation, to date from October 1st, when his service as Secretary of the Western Conference began. The resignation was accepted, though with many regrets and some tears, and only because they felt that he could better serve the cause they loved in his new position than by remaining with them. They were willing to make the sacrifice for the sake of the Conference. The church is in a flourishing condition, having received over thirty adult members and some twenty new families during the past year. Steps will be taken immediately towards securing a new minister.

Moline, Ill.—Prince Serge Wolkonky, the Russian Imperial Commissioner of Education, whose utterances at the Parliament of Religions commanded so much interest and approbation, discoursed Sunday night, Oct. 1, in Rev. Ida C. Hultin's pulpit, at Moline, Ill., on "Brotherhood"; and his lecture was received with much favor. "We classify humanity in our school books," said he, "into three classes: civilized, half-civilized, and barbarous. The child in the primary grades has this firmly fixed in mind, and it is only after completing a university course and traveling extensively in other countries, mingling with great minds in many lands, that he arrives at the fact that all men are brothers."

Omaha, Neb.—Wednesday evening, September 20, there was an organ recital in celebration of the acquisition by Unity Church of a fine organ, which by dint of the courage and perseverance of the ladies of the society has been secured in the face of the hardest times. Mr. Thomas J. Kelly was the organist, and Miss Julia Taliaferro, contralto, sang the "Ave Maria" of Gounod and selections from Bellini and Tosti. There was a large gathering, and everything indicates that the Church is full of vigor for its fall campaign.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

These sermons, dedicated to the Parliament of Religions and published through the energy of his parish, have already given the author, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, a wide hearing in that Parliament. Several thousand copies of these sermons were sold during the sessions of the Parliament at the Art Institute.

Of the Buddha lecture MR. DHARMAPALA, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes to the committee: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

Of the Mohammed pamphlet, M'D ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB, Editor of the Moslem World, published in New York, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia,' and I assure you I am greatly pleased at the manner in which you have treated the subject. It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. I can plainly see how your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain toward Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth. * * * I will be very glad to have some of these lectures to sell, and will place it on our book list."

—Longfellow.

MANY inquiries come to us as to the prospect of closer union between the various branches of the Liberal movement in religion, and a possible fusion of existing organs and organizations to this end. We can only say at the present time that we do not believe that the lesson of the Parliament of Religion is to be missed. Something is to come of it, but it takes time to plan large things and still more time to execute large plans when they are made. So we bespeak patience. Wait until the opportunity is given you to act and then be prepared to lend a hand right loyally. UNITY is still in quest of its ideal and is trying to realize its name.

PRINCE WOLKONSKY, of whose "Addresses" we have already spoken, is soon to give under the auspices of the Congress Auxiliary of the World's Fair, at the Art Palace on the lake front, a lecture entitled "Pictures of American Life as Observed by a Russian." Those of our readers within reach will certainly make an effort to hear him. Those not within reach may well promptly order from UNITY office a printed copy of the lecture, a limited number of which will be published uniform with "Addresses" heretofore noticed,—the whole edition of which has been exhausted, no further copies being now obtainable.

THE Chicago day at the Columbian Exposition witnessed what in all probability was the greatest throng of humanity ever before seen on this planet. If no modern event, with the facilities of railroads and steamships, approached this great company in size, it is not probable that any of the famous crowds of antiquity reached anywhere near the throng, notwithstanding the reputed millions of Xerxes and other heroes in ancient history. It was easy to come by the millions before the days of turnstiles, tickets, and cash receipts. The lasting moral of this throng is that Chicago is one of the great centers of the modern world. It holds prophetic possibilities of as great significance to the moral and spiritual life of our globe as it does to the industrial and commercial interests of mankind. Let Chicago continue to believe in itself and rise to the high obligations that rest upon it. And let the civilized world take heed of Chicago. Let there be high demands and great expectations laid at its feet. Chicago is yet to be heard from. There are other surprises in store.

IN answer to many inquiries we would say that Mr. Mozoomdar, owing to ill-health, was unable to accept any of the various invitations to speak in the West. He left immediately after the Parliament for the East, stopping only at Indianapolis and Buffalo. In Boston he speaks before the Unitarian Club, in New York he will address the Congregational Club, and after making a few other addresses he plans to sail about the middle of November for his home in the East. He will carry with him the cumulative benedictions of a land that he has helped to free from the tyranny of dogmatic Christianity. He has made many feel that Christianity has no right to claim a monopoly upon any of the virtues or the realities of spiritual religion.

THE course of lectures by Mr. B. B. Nagarkar, of Bombay, on the "Religion and Customs of the Hindus," spoken of in our last issue as being in process at All Souls Church, Chicago, has been given to a highly delighted audience, which, considering the distractions, has been large. Mr. Nagarkar speaks with logical clearness; and the spiritual sincerity and dignity of the man carry a conviction that mere logic could not bring. Engagements have already been made by which he speaks one or more times at Rockford, Milwaukee, Des Moines, Hillside, and is wanted again at Sioux City. The friends are urged to combine, as far as possible, with their neighbors, so as to reduce the traveling expenses to the minimum. Now that he is here, Mr. Nagarkar is willing to stay as long as engagements can be made for him without much delay. Some friends are trying to plan an itinerary that will reach California. Those willing to co-operate with this or other schemes for either Mr. Nagarkar, of India, or Mr. Hiral, of Japan, can make arrangements through Secretary Gould, at the Unitarian headquarters, 175 Dearborn street.

HISTORY seems to justify the distrust with which the citizens of a free State regard the political power of ecclesiastics. Even in America, in the very neighborhood of that hall not unfairly styled "the cradle of American liberty," a union of Church and State long existed; and the persecution of Baptists and Quakers and the judicial murder of witches, which marked the period, have confirmed men in their jealousy of State ecclesiasticism, even though they may realize that such atrocities are not likely to occur at the present day. In view of this common sentiment it is not strange that men should seek especially to guard against the political ascendancy of the Roman Church, because its thorough organization, its hierarchical system, and its admirable discipline, give it a power and effectiveness far greater than that of any of the other churches, even when the latter are numerically stronger. And the fact that that church has for its head a foreigner, brought up under monarchical influences, and that within a dozen years it has attempted to nullify the right of free speech, by forbidding an American citizen to give public utterance to the political and economic truths of which he was convinced (we refer to the case of Dr. McGlynn), are not such as to incline men to the belief that the Roman Church has outgrown the capacity for mischief which history has led men to look for in the political ascendancy of the church. But while all this is true, it is no justification for the outrageous and scurrilous charges by which fanatical Protestants have sought to influence their ignorant fellows against their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens. Our language is strong, but not too strong for the facts. The place for the publishers of such scandalous libels as have appeared within the year in some of the publications alluded to by the editor of the Catholic Citizen, is a lunatic asylum or State's prison.

Our Roman Catholic brethren owe it to themselves and to society to see to it that the editors of these journals be prosecuted, and if sane, punished as they deserve. In the interest of fair play we gladly republish the protest which appears in another column.

THE GOSPEL SIDE OF COMEDY.

"My boy, don't bother about tragedy; stick to comedy and you'll succeed. After all, it's better to make people laugh than cry." This was the advice of Edwin Adams, of blessed memory, to young Felix Morris when he was struggling for a position on the American stage against what seemed to be insurmountable difficulties. This sentence is quoted from a delightful little book of "Reminiscences" which Mr. Morris has recently given to the public. The book itself, as well as the reading of it by the present writer, are occasioned by the appearance of Mr. Morris for the first time as a "star," at the head of a carefully organized comedy company. The book is delightful reading, showing not only the lights and shadows of the dramatist's life, but telling modestly, but very interestingly, of a manly struggle for an ideal,—a heroic persistence on the part of a soul not equipped with the aggressive self-assertion so easily mistaken for heroism. Mr. Morris chose for himself the career of a tragedian. Fate defeated his purposes, overruled his judgment, and has made of him instead a facile, delightfully sympathetic comedian; and the advice quoted above, given by a senior to his junior, is the consolation of the defeated tragedian, as it well may be the inspiration of the comedian who we hope is at last to win the golden success which his long apprenticeship, diligent toil, gentle and loving nature deserve.

Having for a long time held in high esteem the Old Musician, as played by Mr. Morris in the Rosina Vokes Comedy Company, we were interested in the debut of this star, and went to see his opening performance. He wisely chose for his opening piece the Old Musician, and we were confirmed in the opinion long held that it is one of the most searching, tenderly true, and pathetically beautiful little melodramatic fragments on the modern stage,—sympathetic, quaint, searching. The second piece of the opening evening was entitled "Champagne," which, notwithstanding the versatile skill of Mr. Morris, was a disappointment. A society farce is necessarily stupid because, let the truth be confessed, "Society," with a capital S, is itself stupid; aye, more, the parade of elegant dresses and the attendant small talk and silly compliment is not only stupid but vulgar, whether on the stage, in the opera-box, at church, or in the drawing-room at home, and the sooner the earnest and the noble-minded men and women of America find this out the better it will be for all concerned. It was our good fortune to see the next venture, entitled "Evergreen," a sketch which should succeed, for it appeals to the permanent elements of the human heart. This was followed by a rollicking bit of humor entitled "Cousin Joe," which provoked the laugh that has no sting in it; all of which justified the Russian saying, quoted so effectively by Prince Wolkonsky in a recent address, "Humor is an invisible tear through a visible smile."

The upshot of this little editorial excursion into the drama is a fresh realization of the gospel side of comedy, the wholesomeness of laughter, which, if we may force the etymological suggestion, may be called also the holiness of laughter. We wish the pulpit were better acquainted with the comedian. We also wish with equal heartiness that the comedian might come into closer touch with the church that is undogmatic and consecrated to the betterment of this world. The church "that deems nothing foreign that is human" has much to give as well as much to receive in its dealings with the stage. Mr. Morris' Comedy Company is to go the rounds of our leading cities this winter. We commend it to our UNITY readers, and trust that the liberal ministers everywhere will recognize in Mr. Morris a gentleman of delicate sensibilities, of ethical insight and humane instincts. During a previous visit Mr. Morris gave a delightful afternoon reading in the parlors of All Souls Church, Chicago, and is to be heard again from that platform on his return. Perhaps other churches may be able to carry out this very practical method of bringing into closer relation the pulpit and the stage. Too long have they been estranged. "Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

A NEW LITURGY.

The committee selected by the Directors of the American Unitarian Association to prepare a liturgy has finished its task, and the result appears in the volume just issued by the Association,—“Book of Prayer and Praise for Congregational Worship.”* One’s first word should be a recognition of the labor involved, and which the committee has evidently given to the matter entrusted to it. No one unfamiliar with work of this sort can appreciate the study and care that must be more or less hidden in the finished result. He sees what is taken; he does not see all that has been examined and passed upon, the mass of material over which time and thought have been spent only to leave it aside at last.

With all due recognition of the painstaking labor bestowed upon this new service-book, however, the result is disappointing. It must be admitted that the committee had a difficult and delicate task. (1) In the first place our free congregational churches have been little trained in liturgical forms; and to launch a full-fledged liturgy, with “collects for the Christian year,” litanies, confessions, “the baptism of those who are of riper years,” an “ante-communion service,” not to speak of other features of this book, seems a rather visionary undertaking. And yet many of our free churches, and among them some that are accounted most “radical,” have in these last years shown a liking for a more congregational order of service, as indicated in the privately prepared programs for Christmas, Easter, Harvest Sunday, and other festivals of the year. This is a noticeable sign of our time. If instead of this attempt at a complete liturgy after the conventional type, with its supply of services for which in many of our churches there is no present occasion or probable future demand, and with its references to days never observed in any of them or likely to be observed, there had been prepared convenient leaflets through a considerable period, furnishing matter for a common service, these would not only have gradually trained our congregations in such use, but (what is of even more importance) would have revealed more clearly the prevailing atmosphere of thought and sentiment within them, and, by a natural sifting-process, have given us in time a service-book not “made to order,” but a genuine and wholesome growth. We could well have afforded to wait for the larger thing. (2) And in the second place the task of the committee was made difficult and delicate by reason of the already wide and fast growing disuse among us of once accepted phraseology,—a disuse, as it seems to us, in the interest of honest thought and the intelligent and intelligible communication of that thought. The English language is not so poor and scant that one is driven to words and phrases now grown vague and ambiguous, in order to express his reverence for Jesus among the sons of men, or to voice his sense of the high place which our Bible has justly held and still holds in the ethical and spiritual education of the world. In this respect the “Book of Prayer and Praise” is most disappointing. Its sins of commission seem to us to doom it to a very restricted use within that fellowship of churches for which it professedly has been prepared. Speaking for myself, we could about as easily use the Anglican liturgy as this mixed compilation now offered us; for that is well understood to be an inheritance from the past, with much that is matter of confessed dissent to-day, while the deliberate adoption of this book seems like a new and fresh subscription to implied doctrines and a general type of religious thought which we cannot think to characterize, to any wide extent, the Unitarian pulpit or pew to-day. If so, then the promise has departed from the fold that still loves to claim Channing and Parker and Emerson, and the flag they carried must pass to the hands of a bolder leadership, with convictions that are more than conventions. Bearing in mind the biblical criticism prevailing at Cambridge and Meadville, not to speak of that already gaining strong hold in theological schools classed as “orthodox,” what are we to make of such phrases, for example, as in the marriage service (p. 200): “For be ye well assured that so many as are joined together otherwise than God’s word doth allow,” etc.; or again (p. 178): “That those who do confess thy holy name may agree in the truth of thy holy word.” And while we are upon the “marriage service,” it may be asked in all kindness if it be not now a little incongruous, not to say absurd, to apologize for the institution of marriage and to justify it by the “presence” of Jesus at Cana and the “commendation” of Paul,—both of whom themselves remained unmarried. We are glad, by the way, to see in this service the recognition of the civil law as the source of the minister’s authority to perform the marriage ceremony. Again, in the burial service, if the words of commitment (p. 230) and the prayer (p. 232) do not teach by implication the resurrection of the body, they come confusedly and confusingly near it. The collects and litanies we must pass with a general word. Of the former, some seventy in number, nearly one-half close with a mediatorial phrase, far enough away from our growing thought of the omnipresent Life “in whom we live and move and have our being”—our Father, with all that this name implies; and the repetitions in the litanies will suggest to many those which Jesus referred to in the Sermon on the Mount, and not with special approval.

But not only in respect of words and phrases carrying a doctrinal or dogmatic tradition and meaning does the committee seem to have clung over-fondly to the past. It has chosen archaic and obsolete English here and there, which will be “an unknown tongue” to not a few, and a matter of questionable taste to those who will not have to turn to their dictionaries. For instance: “that thy grace may always prevent and follow us,” (p. 129); “we are sore let and hindered,” (p. 112); and the groom and bride are to be told (p. 199) that marriage is not to be “enterprised” lightly.

If we have dwelt upon what seem to us the faults and the unsatisfactoriness of this new attempt at a liturgy for our free churches of the Unitarian fellowship, it has been from no captious spirit, but from a lifelong interest in that fellowship and all that makes for its growth, outwardly and within. Neither are we insensible to the beauty and worth of much that is incorporated in the volume, nor, as we have already said, are we unmindful of the care bestowed upon its compilation; though we like here no better than we like in the English Prayer-book, from which it is taken, such wording of prayer as "that it may please thee to rule and govern thy holy Church universal in the right way." We think that the committee made a fatal mistake when it adopted its plan "to provide for differences of feeling with regard to the use of certain phrases" by duplicate forms. It is not wise to emphasize differences in thought in a service intended to be devotional. Nor is this at all necessary. There is a large expression which all devout theism can use; an expression which might speak from all our pulpits and in large measure from the pews. Had the committee been more mindful of this fact, it might have given us a book of truly common prayer. The extemporaneous part (which seems to have had recognition in its first thought and plan) would allow free scope for individual pulpits to voice what for them was not contained in the common service. The failure of the committee in this respect will be fatal to any wide use of its work. The inserted "Calendar showing what Holy Day of the Church falls upon each Sunday for twenty-seven years, 1894-1920," belongs to those features of the book which have pleased us least, but it is in harmony with the prevailing atmosphere. It remains, in closing, to commend the publisher's part in the type, paper, and tasteful binding of the book.

THE MORAL REVELATION IN THE WHITE CITY.

What moral story has the Exposition to tell?

If you wish to measure in any way the moral advance of the world, go to the Midway Plaisance, and study the conditions of the savages there. Study the rudeness, the ignorance, the animality. Study the poor shape of the head, and the indications, so slight, of thought, and then go to the White City and try to estimate the distance from one to the other. The world started animal, but the brute era for the main part of the world is gone by. The era of cunning, in the main, is being left behind. Even the era of the reign of intellect—intellect alone, conscienceless intellect—has gone by; and to-day the mightiest force in all the world, the force that controls the surging multitudes of men and moves them, the mobs if you will, the insurrections if you will, the riots and the strikes if you will, the schemes of men on State street and on Wall street if you will,—the one thing that controls these, as the sun in the heavens controls the storms at sea, is the moral ideal. There are mobs, there are riots, there are thefts, in Wall street and in State street. We do not deny that. There are clouds and storms at sea, and upheavings and waves and wrecks; but the light of the sun folds them all in its arms, and is mightier than they. So the moral ideal of the world folds all these human disturbances in its arms and soothes them to rest. It is mightier than they.

As we contemplate this manifestation of what man has achieved, of what man has become, as we look at the White City and see it as the measure of the man and as the measure of the angel in the man, the grandeur of that spirit that is a little lower only than God,—as we see this, may we not say, as Shakspeare said:

What a piece of work is a man! How noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving, how express and admirable! in action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a god!

The White City is not merely a great display. Think of it rather as a revelation of what is in man. John's city was to come down from God out of heaven. Our White City springs from the heart of humanity, from the mud and the dust, and reaches toward heaven. We have changed our point of view. We do not look for God any more away off in the skies.

To illustrate that change of view, and the view I would have this White City suggest to you, let me offer to you a few verses which Dr. Momerie quotes in his book entitled "The Religion of the Future." I do not know who wrote them:

The parish priest
Of austerity
Climbed up in a high church steeple,
To be nearer God,
So that he might hand
His word down to the people.

And in sermon script
He daily wrote
What he thought was sent from heaven;
And he dropped it down
On the people's heads
Two times one day in seven.

In his age God said,
"Come down and die,"
And he cried out from the steeple,

"Where art thou, Lord?"

And the Lord replied,

"Down here among my people."

Here is where our God is to-day. Think, then, of this White City as a revelation of what is in man, of a revelation of what is in God as manifested through man. So may you have a grander trust in man, a grander belief in the possibilities of this poor old stumbling, struggling race of ours, a grander faith in a present God, and the feeling that it is the business, the only business of religion, out of its prayers, out of its hymns, out of its aspirations, out of its search for truth, to reconstruct humanity, and create on earth a White City which shall be the present dwelling of God.

Exchange Table

"WHY do we have books about celebrated women? If any woman has done anything which entitles her to distinction as a poet, a scientist, an artist, a philanthropist, let her be mentioned among poets, scientists, artists or philanthropists. If her work does not entitle her to such rank, there is no occasion to speak of her at all. Why a woman's building at the Columbian Exposition? If a woman has painted a picture, or invented a machine, or executed any other work which is worthy of exhibition, let it be exhibited in its proper place beside all other works of the kind. If it is not worth showing as work, but only as woman's work, it is not worth showing at all. The fact is that we are going too far in this matter. In seeking to honor woman by these emphatic distinctions we are dishonoring her. Let woman have a place, by all means. Let her have every place she wants; but let it not be a separate place. It is a disgrace, not an honor, to have one's work judged by a special standard." —Critic.

SO LONG as Christianity and other great religions rest upon the personalities of semi-divine men, just so long will there be that strong partisanship which cries out, "Ours is the only God-man, and we will have no other." But when, conceding to these personalities all that can properly be demanded, we yet look behind them to the nature of God, of man, and the universe, for the verification of what we believe to be true, then, and not till then, can there be grounds for a reasonable expectation that the day of universal religion is really at hand.

THERE must be no union of Church and State on American soil whatever that Church may be. No Church has a right to call itself the American Church; such a title is meaningless in America. For the separation of Church and State we must stoutly contend, or be unworthy of our honored sires and our native or adopted land. If the fundamental principles of any Church are opposed to those of the American Government, that Church becomes a danger in American life.

AGE.

The wind-blown trees—at noon a tossing band—
 Are stilled with magic touch by gentle night.
 The birds fly past to nests in blossoms white,
 While stars their pale and mellow light expand.
 For falling twilight now with wizard hand
 Touche the face of nature with more tender light,
 Veiling rough furrows from the keenest sight,
 And peace spreads brooding wings o'er all the land.
 So on the face of Age, as life draws near Infinity,
 A beauty grows which youth will never know;
 A radiance from the past and sweet serenity
 Shine where the dimples chased each other long ago.
 And pain and sorrow have no power to mar
 The inner light of Soul which shines forever there.

FRANCES OVIATT LEWIS.

PARTICIPATION.

One of the fundamental principles in nature is participation. In some mysterious manner, the infinite and finite, the mineral, vegetable, animal, and human partake more or less of each other's nature. It is a familiar fact, that we participate in each other's joys and sorrows, that our physical, mental, and moral powers are interwoven, that all the sciences and arts have elements in common. The fact, however, that all human institutions are to be tested by this fundamental principle in nature is not so familiar, but is gaining recognition. We rejoice greatly in these days in the decline of despotism, aristocracy, pharisaism in church and state, in all social relations. There is nothing arbitrary or partial, exclusive or arrogant in the constitution and laws of nature. In their application to mankind, they exhibit a sacred and kind respect for man's freedom of choice and susceptibility to conviction. They are sovereign, it is true, but reverently solicit man's participation in their enforcement. They set us an example of patience and sympathy in our treatment of relatives, citizens, brain workers and manual workers, the innocent and the guilty, for are we not all alike in more ways than we are unlike?

This conception of the unity and copartnership in all of Nature's operations is working wonderful reforms in civil institutions. It has already made a beginning of democracy in the United States, aiming to be a government of, for, and by the people in conjunction with the laws of Nature. It has modified our penal institutions and started here and there profit-sharing industries and more ecclesiastical fellowship. There is a growing solicitude and care for all sorts and conditions of men, a consciousness that life, not shared with others, is not worth living, a desire and effort to reach underlying causes of poverty, disease, and criminality, and lay the ax at the root, instead of confining our attention to the alleviation of effects. Though we have by no means emerged from the reign of competition, avarice and selfishness, yet even our greedy corporations put on the garb of participation, and assure their patrons of their desire to give them the advantage of sharing their phenomenal bargains with them!

With nature on the side of genuine participation, and with a growing popular sentiment in its favor, we predict its ultimate triumph; but thousands are now perishing because they are not properly remembered in love by their fellow-men, who ought to share their advantages with those who are deprived of them. A more general unfolding of the unselfish affections by various instrumentalities is the hope for the future, and it will not be disappointed.—W. G. B.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PROTESTANT CLERGY.

BRETHREN: In the confidence that your conception of the purpose of the Christian ministry is to promote peace and harmony, rather than distrust and rancor, among fellow citizens and neighbors, we address you upon the facts herein set forth:

This is a land of religious freedom and equality. If its cities and villages should witness the stealthy formation of a secret political association of Catholics organized as such, and plainly avowing its purpose to "knife" Protestant candidates at the polls, to blacken and impeach the loyalty of Protestants as citizens, and to carry its secret hostility so far as to boycott Protestants in business and to plot for the dismissal of Protestant workmen from their chance to earn bread for themselves and families,—using for these rancorous ends all means, both fair and foul,—your pulpits, your press and your rostrums would not for an instant remain silent.

You would rightly denounce this species of proscription and persecution as wrong in principle, outrageous in its purposes, and cowardly and reprehensible in its means.

But does the wrongfulness of the principle, the outrageousness of the purposes, or the cowardliness of the means differ in the slightest because of the circumstance that your neighbor's ox is gored and not yours? Or because of the circumstance that Catholics are the victims of such a movement and not Protestants? Or that Protestants are the persecutors and assailers and not Catholics?

And as to the question of your duty in the premises: if a wrong or an outrage may be done upon your neighbor, does not your responsibility in the matter grow when the wrong and outrage proceed from your own household and the direct accountability placed at your door? And if piracy on the good name and property of your fellow-citizen is committed under your flag and with a proclamation of your sanction, how in all fairness must your silence be interpreted?

The facts that we subjoin have been common report for many months; and no intelligent American doubts their actuality: In many cities and villages of the West, a secret political organization now called the "American Protestant Association," now the "American Protective Association," but more inclusively, the "A. P. A.," has been formed for the avowed purpose of proscribing citizens who are Catholics, voting them down at the polls, boycotting them in business, and driving them out of employment in the shop and factory. This is a society composed of professing Protestants, and plainly avowing its aim "to down the Catholics." It proclaims that it "carries the flag and wears the colors of Protestantism." In some localities (as in Kansas) Protestant ministers are its active organizers, and in many instances Protestant churches are its places of meeting.

Its appeals are to Protestants as Protestants. To Protestants it addresses its attacks on Catholic charities and its prurient slanders on Catholic sisterhoods. It convokes Protestants to listen to the escaped nuns and the haphazard priests it picks up from the gutters of immorality to spatter the mire and filth of their records upon the community. It uses the pledge of Protestant veracity to authenticate its bogus Papal bulls—such as the recent one representing that Catholics were ordered to massacre all American Protestants on the feast of St. Ignatius (July 31); and the same seal of veracity is employed to give an appearance of genuineness to its bogus quotations from Catholic priests and papers. In the name of Protestantism it teaches ignorant people that arms are secreted under Catholic churches. In the name of Protestantism it makes the Catholic workingman apprehensive that his means of earning a livelihood are endangered. In the name of Protestantism it urges its members to betray labor organizations into the hands of capitalists in order that the workmen who are so largely Catholic shall be kept down to a dependent condition. To save Protestantism it makes a religious issue over every petty local election—inflaming the minds and passions of the ignorant with "the impending crisis" likely to ensue if a Catholic is chosen county clerk, if a Catholic teaches the district school, or if a Catholic impounds the stray cattle of the village. In the name of Protestantism it protests against the religious equality guaranteed by our charters of liberty, it swears its dupes into lodges by oaths which make it perjury for them ever afterwards to swear fealty to any American constitution, and it conspires to enthrone the fell spirit of sectarianism in every school-room in the land, carrying its proscriptive animus to the extent of making even children its victims.

Upon this statement of facts we address you this letter to suggest, in a spirit of entire friendliness and good-will, that you consider whether you have not as teachers and guides of the Protestant community some responsibility for A. P. A.-ism in the premises and some moral accountability for all its acts. Does your general silence imply your general assent to these proceedings? Does the acquiescence, with which you seem to see the Protestant name used in the campaigns of A. P. A.-ism, imply your indorsement of its methods; and does the fact that you utter no demurrer to its proclaimed championship of your church mean that you are secretly glad of this masked ally?

It is not merely the Catholic public, but the American public, too, that wishes to know the extent of your responsibility and partnership in A. P. A.-ism. Is Protestantism for or against religious persecution? Is the Protestant ministry with the American principle of religious equality, or is your ministry tired of that principle?

It is becoming a question of the harmony of Protestantism with American institutions; just as surely so as it would become a question of the harmony of the Catholic Church with American liberty if it nurtured, without rebuke and without protest, a secret proscriptive society among its members aiming to draw sectarian lines in politics and business.

Will the Protestant clergy define their position?

Will they call in the pirates who are sailing under their flag? Will they make good the damage done by the bombs of religious hatred thrown from their meeting houses? If they are against A. P. A.-ism will they wrest from it the sanction of their name and denounce its claim of their indorsement?

Brethren: it is a matter of fairness, honesty, Christianity and patriotism with you to speak out at once. The annoyance of this thing is ours for the present only; but the responsibility and the reproach of it will be yours for years, if your silence continues. —Catholic Citizen.

A RELIGION OF PROGRESS.

We hold in our body a great variety of religious opinions. We are learners. We do not profess to have attained or to know all there is to be known. We stand on the shore of an infinite sea where the polished stones and curious shells at our feet suggest the riches that are far out of sight, and where a voice louder than the storm-swept breakers, and softer than the gently murmuring surf, tells of an infinitude of truth waiting to be revealed to the waiting and receptive soul. We believe in the open eye, expecting ever new revealings of divine love, working and praying to weave the great ideas which have been made clear into daily life while we face the sunrise to catch the first beams of each new truth from the central orb.

COLD, OR HOT WATER?

I dreamed, the other night, that I had a contract of trying to thaw out a frozen world.

I had only a single match, a few splinters and a small tea-kettle with which to do the job.

Just as I had started a little blaze, and a faint puff of steam from the spout of the kettle encouraged me, along came some friends (?) gray with wisdom.

As soon as they saw what I was doing, they threw up their hands and exclaimed: "This will never do! This is dangerous! This has no precedent! This will get the church into hot water!"

While I reflected on what they said, they proceeded to take a little cup and begin to sprinkle cold water upon my fire.

It was nigh about extinguished, when along came a bright-faced angel who began to blow it with her breath and thus revive it again. When the flame waved and crackled, she turned to me and said:

"After this, when you have a work to do, never mind the man with the cold water sprinkler. The church would better be in hot water than in cold. Something is always better than negation. A lively mistake is better than dead stagnation. There is some hope of curing a raving lunatic, but none of a dignified corpse."

Then I looked at the bright-faced angel and saw that her name was "Progress." So, after that, when the fellows came with their little dipper of cold water to dash it on my plans and efforts, I said to myself:

"Angel of Progress, help me blow the flame, higher and hotter, until it drowns the voice of the critic, and its heat thaws latent life and force out the lethargy of the iceberg."

INDIAN EDUCATION.

The Indian Rights Association, under permission granted it by the Indian Department at Washington, is about to carry out a project which is likely to render good service to the cause of education among the Navajo Indians of Arizona and New Mexico.

Last spring the present excellent agent, Lieut. Plummer, appealed to the association for aid to secure the authority of the Indian Department in sending a party of the Navajo Indians on a visit to the East, so that the gross ignorance of a certain number of them as to the power of the government and the advantages of civilization might be dispelled. The association promptly acted on Lieutenant Plummer's suggestion. The department expressed its entire sympathy with the project, but confessed its inability, through lack of funds, to meet the cost. The association then offered to raise the sum of $700 if the department would grant its official sanction to the carrying out of the plan. This the authorities promptly granted. The sum of $624.50 has been raised, and Lieut. Plummer expects to start with eight Navajo Indians for a visit to the World's Fair about Oct. 9.

The importance of this movement is greater than might be supposed. The Navajos are in the main a well-disposed and intelligent people, but a portion of them living in the more remote parts of the reservation, and comprising the rising generation, are more or less troublesome through their ignorance; and complications which have arisen between settlers and themselves owing to questions of land and water, largely arising through the uncertain boundaries of their reserve, are more or less threatening. It is the opinion of their agent that this irritation, which, if unattended to, threatens perhaps serious trouble in the future, can best be allayed by attacking what is the real root, the gross ignorance of the Indians themselves, and their consequent opposition to the education of their people. It is not only the most humane, but by far the least expensive method of dealing with the problem.

That the effort is a wise one would appear from the fact that a Navajo Indian woman, already at the Fair, wrote a few days ago to her little daughter in the Agency School, urging her to study hard; that she could see so much more of that wonderful Fair if she only could understand English.

It is hoped that the project may have the sympathy of all friends of education.

SOME writers think the process of turning white among arctic animals is in some way connected with a decrease of vital energy; and in his notes on recent science, in the Nineteenth Century, Prince Krapotkin brings forward as an example the alleged permanent white colors of domesticated animals in sub-arctic regions, such as the Yakutsk horse. —The Independent.

WOMAN'S work in India has made great progress. There are now 711 women—foreign and Eurasian—missionaries in India. These have access to 40,513 zenanas, and have 62,414 girl pupils in the mission schools. —Exchange.

CREEDS, THEIR ABUSES AND USES.*

BY REV. MARION D. SHUTTER.

"Ye can can discern the face of the earth and of the sky; but how is it that ye do not discern this time?"—LUKE xii. 56.

The entire subject of creeds and their uses is again before us for discussion. One of the most distinguished members of a prominent communion has just been suspended from the church of his choice, of his life-long associations, because his views were not deemed in harmony with established standards. The discussion proceeded, not upon the inherent truthfulness or error of the opinions he advanced, but upon their relation to the Westminster Confession. The special question, therefore, that is agitating the minds of men is this: What is the value of that confession? The larger question inevitably follows: What is the value of creeds in general? But before proceeding to consider this question, it is only fair to say a word concerning the denomination now tossed and troubled with this unhappy controversy. The Presbyterian Church has an ancient and honorable history. Its founders helped to break the chains in which a corrupt mediæval church held the human soul. They lifted their arms in defense of civil as well as of religious rights, at a time when Liberty walked outcast among the nations. That church has produced a strong and sturdy type of character, has given to learning and literature many distinguished names, has sent her mission ships over every sea. If the great trumpet shall sound at last, that many believe will sound, it will rally the adherents of Calvin from the foot of a thousand martyr-stakes, from the cells of ruined dungeons, and from every island of the sea!

I. I do not propose this morning to launch thunderbolts indiscriminately against creeds in general. They have their uses; certainly they have served some purposes in the history of Christian thought.

A creed of some kind has formed the basis of every new religious movement in the world, and has served as the justification of that movement to all inquirers. When Luther heads his revolt, he must state his reasons. He must tell wherein he differs from the old body, and what he believes upon the points of difference. When he tells us this, he formulates a creed for his followers. When our Universalist fathers started out for themselves, it was necessary to state wherein they differed with the reigning theology. If a new denomination were to be started to-day, we should want to know why. The answer to that question would be the creed of the organization.

But creeds not only justify the existence of this or that religious community; they have served and do serve to some extent even now as a bond of union for their adherents. They are battle-flags around which the zealous rally, and to whose support they unite others. They furnish aim and motive for activity. They contain ideas that, it is felt, must be pushed in the world; they awaken enthusiasm and lead to effort.

It is also claimed for them that they prevent loose and indefinite and indifferent thinking, and compel the mind to lay hold upon something clear-cut and positive. Surely there is never too much clear thinking done, and if creeds can give us any assistance, by all means let us gratefully accept their help. Whenever Mr. Bagnet, in "Bleak House," was asked his opinion, you remember his invariable answer: "Ask her, ask Mrs. Bagnet; she knows my opinion. Tell 'em, my dear, what I think." To be sure, if one cannot form opinions for himself, he may very well point to his creed and say, "Ask that!"

II. All this and more may be said on behalf of creeds. Upon the other hand, there are certain considerations that warn us not to trust too implicitly in creeds.

It is a mistake to suppose that any creed or standard can be final. The world moves very rapidly. New researches and investigations are constantly bringing in new truths or placing old truths in new lights. A standard formed one hundred and fifty or two hundred years ago cannot meet the requirements of to-day. Right here is the grave difficulty. After a creed has once been adopted, it is well nigh impossible to change it. In spite of its inadequacy, it is very likely to hold the ground. There is no despotism on earth like that of a firmly fixed creed. The skeleton hands of extinct assemblies clutch the throat and strangle the life of every new-born child of light. Nearly every church to-day is dominated by the sepulcher. The ghosts of dead creed-makers are its rulers.

Even those who do not yield complete intellectual homage to the scepter of the past are often transformed into trimmers and apologists. "Oh," they say, "the words of the confession are not to be taken just as they read. The framers did not mean exactly what they seem to mean. We must give their words a very liberal construction."

One thing must be said about those old theologians who framed our creeds. They were not fools and they were not cowards. They were honest and straightforward men who were tremendously in earnest, and who said exactly what they meant. There is not one of them but would repudiate with scorn the attempt to soften, by milder interpretations, his stern and uncompromising thought. There is not one of them but would resist the attempt to twine honeysuckle vines around the iron frame-work of his logic. There is not one of them but would be infinitely disgusted with the attempt to counteract the fumes of his brimstone theology by sprinkling it with rose water. When he said "gridiron" he meant "gridiron," and not flower-bed.

The business of the modern thinker is to be as fearless as the ancient. Let him say fairly and squarely, "The men who made this creed believed just what it says. I do not believe it. The world has grown away from it and it ought to be changed."

It is a mistake to look upon a creed as anything but a "report of progress." It shows nothing but the thought of the time in which it was framed. It shows how far men had advanced. That is all. In the church where the Council of Trent was held, a tablet was set up and inscribed, "Here spoke the Holy Spirit for the last time." What folly and presumption! And yet it is practically such an inscription that many churches would write over their creeds to-day. "Here spoke the Holy Spirit for the last time,"—then what? Did the spirit of truth and inspiration perish? Is this creed the last utterance from its death-bed? A creed is all very well as a landmark, but not as a goal. It is good as a stepping-stone, but not as the ultimate shore.

III. The thought of to-day has the same right to express itself as the thought of yesterday,—is under the same obligation to express itself.

The severest censures passed by Jesus were upon those who tithed mint, anise and cummin, and neglected the weightier matters of the law. The next in severity were upon those who failed to recognize the new light and life of the world. "Ye hypocrites: ye can discern the face of the earth and of the sky, but how is it that ye can not discern this time?"

It is for the leaders of every generation to discern their own time; to adjust themselves, their thoughts and their creeds to the conditions and intellectual needs of that time. Let us mention some of the forces that are at work to-day, making our age, in certain respects, different from any preceding one.

This is an age of critical study of the Bible,—a study which has overthrown the traditional views of its complete and universal infallibility.

It is an age of scientific investigation,—investigation that has changed our ideas of creation, of the antiquity of man, and the fall in Eden.

It is an age of new political and social ideas. The creeds which dominate the religious world to-day were made under ideas of government entirely different from our ideas. They were formed under monarchies; and the divine administration was supposed to be modeled upon the relationship existing between an earthly king and his subjects. The arbitrary will of the human sovereign was attributed to the sovereign of the skies.

*Sermon preached in the Church of the Redeemer, Minneapolis, Minn., Sunday morning, June 4, 1893.

The human sovereign favored one class of subjects above another; hence, the doctrine of election, for God must also have his favorites. The arbitrary will of the ruler decreed life or death, the badge of honor or the dungeon. The despot of the heavens must also have his dungeons. Hence the doctrine of hell and penalty. Such ideas could not have grown up in a republican form of government, and are utterly foreign to the spirit of this age and nation. With the rise of the common people to a sense of their dignity and power, thrones are falling. With the fall of old systems of government will fall the systems of theology that are founded upon them.

It is an age of growing humanity. We see this in what is being done for the poor and unfortunate, and in the efforts to reform the vicious and criminal. In an age when man is becoming more merciful to man, you cannot successfully teach a doctrine of divine retaliation and vengeance.

These are some of the forces that are surely modifying the views of men upon religious subjects. There are those who draw back and fear the new light; but others boldly venture forth to greet it. I was interested once in what a gentleman related of his child's experience in the nursery. The blinds were closed, but through some chink or other there stole one long, bright ray, making a line of light across the floor. As the little fellow, in his play, reached this sunbeam on the floor, he paused in surprised perplexity. He forgot his toys in this new object. He looked across it to the comparative gloom beyond, and then looked back at his father. Finally gathering up all his courage and strength, he jumped—probably thinking it a chasm in the floor, or a bar across it. He did not quite clear it; but he found his feet on solid ground; and the sunlight flashed on his hair and cheeks, making a radiant picture of glad surprise and relief. In a moment he had forgot'en that he once thought of the sunbeam as something dangerous, and with perfect fearlessness ran back and forth and in and out of the light. In this larger nursery, a ray of God's light sometimes falls across the dusky floor. We shrink back from it. We dare not venture. We forget that our heavenly Father is in the room with us, and we turn away from the new sunbeam to the old gloom. But as soon as any one does have courage and faith to try it, he is transfigured with glory, the world follows him and finds there is nothing to fear!

IV. When we take the charges upon which Dr. Briggs has been suspended from the church in which he has lived and labored, we find that the opinions deemed heretical and dangerous are in entire harmony with the spirit of this age and land. He has discerned the signs of the times and heeded them.

He is charged with teaching that reason and the church, as well as scripture, are fountains of divine authority; that errors may exist in the original texts of the scriptures as they came from their authors; that many of the Old Testament predictions have been reversed by history, and many of the Messianic prophecies have not been literally fulfilled; that Moses is not the author of the entire Pentateuch; that the book of Isaiah contains the work of two prophets instead of one; that the processes of redemption extend to the world to come, in the case of many who die in sin; and that sanctification is not completed at death.

These are the counts in the indictment. I want you to bear in mind that there is not one of these charges urged upon its intrinsic merits. It is not and has not been under discussion, whether these teachings were right or wrong in themselves. It has never been asked, Are they true? but, Are they in accordance with the creed? The evil side of creeds has been most clearly seen in this entire controversy. It has been assumed that the only business of the church to-day is to guard the statements of the past, not to find out anything more or anything different; not to utter a new word, but to mumble the old ones forever. The intelligence of the present age upholds Dr. Briggs in his making reason a fountain of religious authority; the scholarship of the age upholds his position on the scriptures; the humanity of the age sanctions his views of the future. But because these views do not coincide with the declarations of men who lived two centuries ago, he is branded "heretic," and sent forth in disgrace. There is no help for it. So long as the creed itself remains unchanged, I do not see how it could have been otherwise. Under the circumstances, I think the assembly were justified in taking just such action as they did. Dr. Briggs was not in harmony with the Westminster Confession, and the Westminster Confession is the recognized standard in his denomination. It is not to the point that the confession itself is out of harmony with the reason, learning, and humane spirit of to-day.

V. In view of such facts as these, I remark that so long as creeds are considered necessary, we have the right to ask:

1. That they express the actual belief of the great majority of the preachers and people who are supposed to adhere to them and be governed by them. We may ask that the creed actually represent what it ought to represent—the present position of its denomination.

There are some lessons that ought to be learned from the agitation that has kept the country on the tip-toe of expectancy for so many months. There is a lesson here for those who leave money to an institution, and for the institution that receives it, as in the case of Union Seminary. When a bequest is made its terms ought to be rigorously and faithfully carried out. But it is to be hoped that the time will come when those who have money to leave will be animated by a broader spirit: when they will not bribe theological seminaries to teach obsolete dogmas; when they will not want to put a period to the world's thought.

I suppose most of us, when we were boys, used to cut our names or initials on the smooth bark of the birch tree. Perhaps we cut, right under them, somebody else's initials. If we looked at the tree a few years later we found that those letters could no longer be deciphered, and that they had become mere unsightly wounds on the tree. We who cut them did not immortalize ourselves; we only marred the birch tree. It is vain for anyone to think that he can put his mark upon the growing thought of the world, and that the mark will stay. He may mar the beauty, but he can not check the growth.

Our seminaries, too, ought to refuse bequests burdened with such conditions. They ought to guard against anything that might, in the future, turn them into mere theological curiosity shops.

I believe, too, that every ordaining council should demand of every candidate that comes before it, not only a declaration of his present belief, but a solemn pledge that he will keep his eyes open wide, so long as he lives and preaches, for any further truth that God may send into the world.

The time will come, too, I trust, when churches, in selecting their pastors, will say to them: "We place you in our pulpit, not only to show us what God has done in other times, not only to tell us about his mighty deeds in Palestine; but to watch for God's footsteps to-day, and to lead us into those paths where linger his latest glories."

2. If we are still to have creeds it is but fair to ask that they be such as can be preached in the pulpit, not such as the pulpit strenuously avoids. The best way to test a creed is to preach it. The fact is, most creeds remain as they are because they are not preached, and ministers dare not preach them. They are wrangled over in assemblies, they are used to club heretics, they are used to dominate theological schools, they are upheld in the denominational press; but they are not preached to the people, and the masses in the churches do not know what they are all about. If they did they would get out, or make the creed get out.

3. We have a right to ask that the central doctrine of every creed be that to which the most importance is attached, and then, perhaps, we can get along without the rest.

One of the strong pleas among our brethren who wanted their confession revised was that the love of God was not made prominent enough; and they asked that this doctrine be placed in the fore-front. Can that ever be made too prominent? It should seem as if by one mighty impulse the leaders and teachers in that church would have rushed forward to write upon the somber theological crags of that confession, to write over its harsher and more repulsive features, to write upon its gloomy tablets, in letters of living light, "God is Love."

If you are hesitating and uncertain as to what you believe this morning, let me recommend that you write that sentence, and start your creed with those words, "God is Love." There is your first article. And if you never see your way clear to write anything more, do not worry over it. It will guide you home.

More and more will creeds cease to be barriers in the way of fellowship. Men will be drawn together in the future more than in the past by oneness of aim and spirit, and less by doctrinal uniformity. In a world where there is so much to be done, where there is so much evil to fight, where the kingdom of righteousness tarries,—the feeling of love to our fellow men will finally become so strong that all who are willing to work for them will stand shoulder to shoulder.

The Study Table

A NEW SHAKESPEARE.

In outward appearance this edition of Shakespeare is all that could be desired. It is a good, honest library book, and no fancy article, such as his soul hateth who knows what is what in the matter of books. True it is an octavo, and the Aldine size and shape is the ideal size and shape for comfort and convenience. But there is excuse for the octavo size in the sumptuousness of the letter-press, and there is mitigation in the fact that the paper, though perfectly opaque, is thin and light, so that the volumes do not begin to be so heavy as they look. These outward things, though not to be despised, are less important than the critical character of the work. We have here the best text of Shakespeare that is now available. It is the text which Dr. Horace H. Furness originally chose for the text of his Variorum Edition, except for such variations as have been made from the original edition of 1865. Dr. Furness afterward made up a text from the different editions of the highest rank, and finally settled down on the text of the First Folio (1623), following obsequiously its every word and letter and misprint. Such a text has great interest and critical value, but it is the last that we should care to read habitually, except that of the first quartos. The editors of the "Cambridge Edition," as that of Clark & Wright is called, are not much behind Dr. Furness in their attachment to the First Folio, but they recognize the inequality of its various parts. It may be interesting and useful for us to indicate the difference between the method of Dr. Furness's Variorum Edition and that of the Cambridge Edition. No better description of the Cambridge Edition can be given than that of Dr. Furness in the preface to his first volume. It is as follows:

"In the Cambridge Edition, at the foot of every page, is given a thorough and minute collation of the quartos and folios and a majority of the variae lectiones of many modern editors, together with many conjectural emendations proposed, but not adopted into any text—the result on the part of the editors of very extensive reading."

"It is hardly possible," he adds, "to overestimate the critical and textual value of such an edition." If the edition of 1865 deserved such praise, the present edition, which will be known as that of 1891, when the first volume appeared, must much more deserve it. But while the Cambridge Edition gives the readings of the old editions, "it omits to note the adoption or rejection of them by the various editors, whereby an important element in estimating these readings is wanting." Dr. Furness's notes are much fuller than the Cambridge notes, and they contain the reasons given by this editor or that for his favorite reading. Moreover, Dr. Furness's edition contains appendices in which copious extracts are given from the various criticisms on the several plays that have been made by the most distinguished critics, together with reprints of those things which were used by Shakespeare as the raw material of his imagination.

Thus it will be seen that both Dr. Furness's Variorum Edition and the Cambridge Edition have their special traits commending them on different grounds for different uses. For the student of Shakespeare the Variorum of Dr. Furness is much the richer mine, so far as it extends; and that is to eight plays. At the rate of his production so far, it is hardly possible that his life-time will be long enough to complete the list. Meantime his text—that of the First Folio—is not a readable text, while that of the Cambridge Edition is eminently so, and as critical as readable; and the entire list of the thirty-seven plays is already at our command. Happy the lover of Shakespeare who can have both editions on his shelves!

J. W. C.

PICTURE AND TEXT. By Henry James. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1893. Cloth, 16mo, 75 cents. —With one exception, all the papers in this volume are concerned with artists and their productions, and more especially their productions in black and white. The exception is the last paper, which discusses the future possibilities of the theatre with the subtlety that Mr. James has elsewhere brought to the same subject in a more elaborate form. In point of style the book is highly characteristic of its author. It has his usual charm and also his usual preference for indirect as compared with direct expression. He never shortens a straight line to come at its point, but rather lengthens it, conceiving that the longest way round is the shortest way home. Sometimes we wonder if there is not too much of this. We tire a little of reading his sentences over two or three times to get their meaning, and, if we generally discover that it is a meaning which could hardly have been expressed in any simpler way, we sometimes think that with more simplicity he might have been more effective. In one of the essays of this volume,—that upon Daumier,—we find Mr. James comparing him with Gavarni, another French caricaturist, and regretting Daumier's relative simplicity. It is easy enough in that regret to find what Emerson called "the little subjective twinkle." But too much must not be made of this. Generally Mr. James's style and thought present a "marriage of true minds" to which we would not "admit impediments." The style is subtle because the thought is so. But how richly it abounds in delicate turns and winning cadences, and what a felicity there is of particular phrases; so that we say, "How good that is!" and wish it might come back to us at the right moment to eke out the poverty of our own expression,—as where Thiers is set down as "this personage of few inches and many episodes," and Gavarni is called "the most acutely profane of all chartered mockers with the pencil."

The first paper, "Black and White," deals with Millet—our own Frank—and Abbey and Alfred Parsons, and has much to say of Broadway, a little place in Worcestershire, England, where these artists have lived and worked together. Having seen Broadway with our own eyes, we know that it was impossible for Mr. James to exaggerate its simple, homely, moss-grown loveliness. As for what he has written of the artists named and of their works, and also of Reinhart and Boughton and Du Maurier and their works, the reader's enjoyment of it will very greatly depend upon his knowledge of the men in their productions. Mr. James's criticism is not that of a painter or professional connoisseur. There is in it nothing about "values" or "facture," nothing of the slang of the studios, or next to nothing. Evidently he thinks he knows drawing when he sees it, and has his preferences in the way of color. But what he cares for in pictures is beauty and expression; in landscape-art, the suggestion of a remembered outdoor loveliness, not merely the management of the pigments and the qualities of the drawing. To say this, is not to say that his criticism is exhaustive of the subjects which it treats. It is still less so because it is the criticism, in the main, of his friends' work. Abbey and Millet and Boughton and Reinhart are men whom he knows and likes, and the bias of his friendship is upon his pen, and here and there undoubtedly he lets "I dare not" wait upon "I would."

We are the more convinced of this when he comes to Daumier, the French caricaturist, whom he did not know in any personal way. At once the splint is off his arm; we have a freer stroke. We cannot help wondering whether the same freedom would not have found the manner of Abbey and Boughton and Du Maurier too infallibly subduing their matter to a uniformity that occasionally makes us tired. If Mr. James had known John Leech, would not his great variety and his immense humanity, even as casually mentioned, have suggested a contrast with the restricted range of Du Maurier, his monotony and acerbity, not altogether to the advantage of this gifted artist? But these doubts and questionings do not prevent Mr. James's "Picture and Text" from being a book that is most pleasing in itself and brings many things delightfully to mind.

OTHER ESSAYS FROM THE EASY CHAIR. By George William Curtis. New York: Harper & Brothers. Cloth, 16mo, 75 cents.—The present selection from the immense variety of Mr. Curtis's Easy Chair papers is not less admirable than that made by himself about two years ago. Indeed, we believe that we are not mistaken in our persuasion that he selected these at the same time that he selected the others, and was only prevented by considerations of space from including them in his first volume. Here is the same unerring grace, the same genial humor, the same kindly satire, the same reprobation of pretense and sham, the same devotion to the loftiest social and personal ideals, as in the former selection. "Bryant's Country," though it deals more with Chesterfield than with Ashfield, is clothed with the atmosphere which was ambient to the writer's summer home. "The Game at Newport" is a delicious satire on the solemn function of the Newport aristocracy as it takes its daily drive. There are four personal essays, "Ralph Waldo Emerson," "Henry Ward Beecher," "General Sherman," and, last in the book but certainly not least in interest, "Francis George Shaw," a beautiful appreciation of a noble gentleman, Mr. Curtis's father-in-law and counsellor and friend. One of the loveliest essays in the book is "The Grand Tour," for Mr. Curtis was never happier than in his reminiscences of his foreign travels,—reminiscences which he never cared to dim by new adventures. In "Christendom vs. Christianity" there is an expression of his religious sentiment, and in "Tweed" and "The Pharisee" our politics is touched with his Ithuriel spear. The least satisfactory, though one of the most charming essays in the volume, is "The Lecture Lyceum." It is unsatisfactory through its incompleteness, and it is incomplete because it does not name Curtis among the greatest on that memorable stage.

THE COMING RELIGION. By Thomas Van Ness. Boston: Roberts Brothers. Cloth 16mo., pp. 228. $1.00.—This is a book that we have read with great pleasure, and which we regard as a valuable contribution to the popular study of ethics and religion,—though unfortunately it confuses the two. The author speaks of three religions,—Christianity, the Religion of Science, and the Religion of Humanity,—from which he believes the coming religion will be evolved. We cannot but feel that by this nomenclature he introduces an element of error which is twofold: first, in that he designates the several systems of ethics—Christian, Humanitarian, etc.—as religions; and secondly, in that he parallels the system based upon science, or the search for truth (which in so far as it is scientific must, by the terms of definition, be the true system) with certain other specific systems, and by thus setting them over against the scientific system necessarily implies that they cannot be true,—although apparently he has no intention of thus begging the question. Notwithstanding, however, that these errors would seem to indicate a lack of clearness in thought, the fact is that one of the chief charms of the book is its clearness; the other being its fairness. Nowhere have we seen in such brief space so clear and full and fair a statement of the three theories of conduct which he undertakes to describe. As the work is human, it is, of course, not perfect; for instance, in accordance with his inadequate conception of the scientific system, as one of several of equal rank, the author once or twice slips into the error of treating a scientific system as identical with a merely mechanical one. In the chapters on "Reconciliation," where it becomes necessary to emphasize the inadequacies of the several systems portrayed, this tendency shows itself most prominently; and on the whole it may be said that this last is the weakest part of the book,—our author's reconciliation being a verbal one and no more satisfactory than that of the many great and little philosophers who have previously undertaken such work. The real value of the book is in the author's remarkably clear conception of the Christian, the Humanitarian, and the Scientific ideal, and the lucidity and sympathetic power with which he sets forth each of these. Notwithstanding the one or two slips to which we have alluded, the description of the "Religion of Science" is especially powerful. There is great need of such exposition, and we earnestly recommend the book to all who seek to understand their neighbors; to accomplish which it is necessary to comprehend the several ideals which, now and here, govern the lives of men.

A JUDGE in Harrodsburg, Ky., is a veritable solon. A number of negro boys, caught burglarizing a house, were brought before him. They were all young, and he wisely decided not to send them to the penitentiary. Instead he sent out for the boys' mothers and a dozen rawhides, explained the case to the mothers, and, as the New York alderman remarked of the gondolas, "let nature take its course." Punishment to fit the crime was served up right in the court room and justice was satisfied. When there is a vacancy on the Supreme bench of Kentucky the Harrodsburg solon should be remembered.

OCTOBER'S LAND.

The wind, that subtlest of courtiers, has changed its tone since the skies began to wrap themselves in shifting hazes through which the sun ploughs his way. It attended March with a roar and clash of trumpets, stirred the spring foliage with gentlest little breezes, and fanned through summer's burning halls singing a psalm of joy. But it blows from October's Land with a soft and melancholy rhythm, a note of condolence and retrospection. Gently it detaches the dead leaves from reluctant boughs, wafts them to earth, and sighs a requiem over their graves.

If, with closed eyes feeling the caressing warmth of the sun, we fancy in spite of the calendar that summer still lingers, the voice of the wind dispels the illusion and tells us that death and decay have replaced life and growth.

But the year dies royally. A great pageant is outspread every day, beginning with the first red shaft of dawn, piercing the purple mist and turning the dew-hung cobwebs spread over the withered grass into an iridescent radiance. As a faded beauty tries to cover wrinkles and gray hairs with beautifying cosmetics, so the fading earth envelopes herself in a soft spiritual brightness, lovely and pathetic as a smile on a dying face.

The birds that made the summer mornings tuneful have long since sought perpetual summer land beyond the southern horizon. October's Land is a songless country. The shrill cry of brilliant-plumaged bluejays, the chattering of chickadees hunting their breakfast among the ripe seeded weeds, and the lonesome chirp of a rheumatic locust trying to find warmth in the foggy sunbeams, are all that is left of the choir that filled with melody the summer skies.

Noon brings an Orient warmth. The forest dreams. A soft blue smoke fills the air as if the earth were a great hearth on which the year's rubbish was burning. A fine dust covers the foliage and floats in the atmosphere, that might be the ashes of the fire.

Sometimes a glory gleams from the changeful haze, as if a secret were about to be revealed. Faces look out with the pale star halo they wore when we last saw them. Is not the spirit land just beyond that opaline mist? But only the wandering mind can pierce those cloudy ramparts, and it brings no answer back.

And now some still night the first frost falls from the clear heavens, laying its beautiful but blighting touch on grass and foliage. The sun rises on a sparkling white world. We drink in the new wine of life in the crystal clear air, and the call of the crow over the brown fields stirs the soul with a sense of the ever-renewed life and joy of nature.

And with the frost comes the first fire kindled on the hearth, where its glow shall light up months of cold and gloom to come. While the sunset lingers in the west and stars begin to glitter, while the frost flakes gather and gray-robed twilight glides across the hill, we draw around the open fireplace and renew the fairy land of our childhood, touched by the grave cares and memories of life. Mournful or happy recollections, visions fearful or serene, appear and vanish, till the flickering flame and soft falling of ashes lure the mind into a reverie, from which it glides insensibly into the central stronghold of October's Land, the castle of dreams.

FABLES.

II. The Mockingbird and the Peacock.

In an orange tree, near the open window of a chamber where lay a sick man, sat a mockingbird singing his most ecstatic song—a song of the beautiful. Into the heart of the sick man it was borne with healing sweetness. And day by day, longing and attaining and longing still higher, singing of love and wisdom and goodness, but always and most of all of the beautiful, the bird found an interpreter in the man and knew it not.

Glancing up and down and all around, the mockingbird saw, for the first time, the glory of a peacock's tail. His song ceased. He gazed entranced. All that he had been striving to attain in his song seemed embodied before him. As the moth is drawn toward the lamp, so he was drawn toward the beauty he adored, till he was at its very feet. The peacock gave an angry scream, and, lifting his foot, struck the song bird.

Bruised in body and in spirit, his adoration spurned, misunderstood, the little songster hid himself in a leafy shade till time and the sweet air healed his wounds and he had strength to sing. The sick man had missed the song, but it came again; a little sad at first, but sweeter than ever, and joyous, too—full of love and praise, never a note of complaint. He was a mockingbird, remember, and must needs sing his own sweet songs, however base others might be.

And the peacock never knew it was a mockingbird he struck—a singer of the beautiful—come to bring him the sweetest gift of his full love and devotion; thought it was a toad to spend his anger on; and so went on screaming and scolding, vain of his splendor, unlovely in his beauty.

MR. BENNETT is a bright and well-preserved old gentleman; but to his little grand-daughter, Mabel, he seems very old indeed. She had been sitting on his knee and looking at him seriously for some moments one day, when she said: "Grandpa, were you in the ark?" "Why, no, my dear!" gasped her grandparent. Mabel's eyes grew large and round with astonishment. "Then why weren't you drowned?" she asked.

A SCHOOLROOM IDYL.

How plainly I remember all!

The desks deep-scored and blackened,

The row of blackboards 'round the wall,

The hum that never slackened;
And, framed about by map and chart,
And casts of dusty plaster,
That wisest head and warmest heart,
The kindly old schoolmaster!

I see the sunny corner nook

His blue-eyed daughter sat in,
A rosy, fair-haired girl who took
With us her French and Latin.

How longingly I watched the hours

For Ollendorff and Cæsar!

And how I fought with Tommy Powers

The day he tried to tease her.

And when, one day, it took the "Next!"

To stay some Gallic slaughter,

Because I quite forgot the text

In smiling at his daughter,

And she and I were "kept till four

To study, after closing,"

We stopped the clock an hour or more

While he, poor man, was dozing!

And there he sits, with bended head,

O'er some old volume poring

(Or so he thinks; if truth be said,

He's fast asleep and snoring).

And where the shaded lamplight plays

Across the cradle's rocking,

My schoolmate of the olden days

Sits, mending baby's stocking.

LESSON VII.

HOW JESUS TAUGHT.

*Across the sea, along the shore,
In numbers more and ever more,
From lonely hut and busy town,
The valley through, the mountain down,*

*What is it came ye here to note?
A young man preaching in a boat.*

*His sermons were the healthful talk
That shorter made the mountain walk,
His wayside texts were flowers and birds,
When mingled with his gracious words
The rustle of the tamarisk-tree
And ripple-wash of Galilee.*

Picture: Christ Preaching from a Boat—Hofmann.

In the last lesson the figure of the sower reminded us of the period of obscurity in the life of Jesus when he was casting abroad the seed of his thought. To-day, we study the period of popular favor in which the people were drawn to him by the simplicity and beauty of his speech and before the Pharisees had taken serious alarm. The figure of Jesus is the least satisfactory part of the picture; his attitude is conventional, but quite unnatural; yet the listeners are good, and the picture as a whole helps us to understand the sort of people who cared most for Jesus' teaching, the way in which he taught, and the probable history of his words before they were put into the literary form in which we have them.

What was the pulpit of Jesus?—A fishing boat on the Sea of Galilee or a green spot on the hill-side.

Jesus is represented as preaching from a boat in the Sea of Galilee. This body of water, called also the Sea of Chinnereth and the Lake of Gennesaret, or Tiberias, is like a potato-shaped bulge of the River Jordan, about twelve and one-half miles long and seven and one-half miles wide at the northern end. It lies in a deep basin between six and seven hundred feet lower than the level of the Mediterranean, and is fed by copious springs. The shores are more abrupt and craggy than the picture would lead one to suppose, and Josephus speaks particularly of the abundance of trees in the neighboring country, mentioning walnut, fig, palm, and olive trees. (Can you tell from the picture what trees the artist intended to represent?) Fish were plentiful in the clear, sweet waters of the lake, and in the time of Jesus, though not now, fishing boats were numerous, supplying the populous towns near by with their catch. It is from one of these smaller craft that Jesus is speaking in the picture.

Who made up his audience?—Jesus spoke usually to a chance-gathered company, only a few of whom had come expressly to hear him.

Looking at the picture we see some familiar faces. The three in the boat with Jesus seem to be Peter and James and John. In the little group of seven standing on the shore at the right of Jesus we distinguish at least two faces that are to be seen in other pictures by Hofmann. The rich young ruler is unmistakable, and the face of the old man beside him recalls one of the rabbis in the picture of Jesus in the Temple. Do you notice the two who can hardly see the figure of Jesus because of the lordly Pharisee who blocks their view? Do you think Hofmann meant to teach us anything by that? In the background at the extreme left is an aged man (how could you guess that he is blind?) whose expression suggests old Simeon in one of the birth-legends of Jesus (Luke ii. 25-35). In the group of women it seems to me that, besides the aged woman at the rear and the two mothers with their children, we can see girls, unmarried women, and a young widow—could you pick them out by their faces alone, even if there were no other sign? The boy at the left of the picture, with water-bottle slung at his side, musical instrument in his hand, and dog lying with head on his lap, has more of a Greek than a Jewish look. (Is there anything to indicate that he was a shepherd-boy?) It will refresh the memory of last week's lesson, if we try to find in this picture the four classes of hearers. It appears clearly from this picture that the preaching of Jesus was entirely informal: he had no fixed times for preaching or prepared discourses to deliver. We cannot imagine him racking his brains for a subject or preaching in a church behind a pulpit with a carefully prepared manuscript under his eyes. And therefore, befitting the character of his audience and his manner of teaching, his talk was mainly in parables and pithy sayings which could be quickly comprehended and easily remembered.

How were the words of Jesus preserved?—His sayings were carried in memory for a long time, then they were gathered together, written down and translated into Greek.

It is important that we should have some knowledge, clear and accurate so far as it goes, of the way in which what Jesus said has come down to us, for this "young man preaching from a boat" has proved one of the most potent influences in the history of the world and his words are still appealed to by many religious people as final authority. And the first thing to notice is that Jesus was a Jew and spoke to Jews, consequently he must have spoken in the language ordinarily used by Jews in Palestine at his time. That language was not Greek, but a dialect of Hebrew known as Aramaic. Do you see in the picture any one who seems to be taking down what he is saying? Reporters were not known in those days, and even if they had been, Jewish prejudice was so strongly against preserving the words of a teacher in any way except by memory that none would have attended Jesus. That supercilious Pharisee will go away and tell his friends what he has heard the new teacher say. Do you think he will report Jesus accurately, or will he pick out things he does not like and make them appear by his telling even worse than they really were? The young mother nursing her baby will go home and tell her husband what she has heard, but her report will not be like the Pharisee's. He in turn will report to the man who works beside him what his wife had told him about the sermon of Jesus, and he will tell some one else, and so on. Read over the sixth chapter of Matthew and try to see what various persons in the picture would have carried away if they had heard Jesus speak all these words. We have a clear idea now of the way in which the teachings of Jesus would be listened to and told, by those who heard him, to their friends. Not till years after Jesus died did any one think of putting down in black and white what he had heard him say. Do you think that the memory even of one who actually heard him speak could be trusted to carry his teachings word for word all these years? And how much less dependence could we place on the report if it came from one who knew nothing about Jesus except what had been told him. No one could remember all that Jesus said, some one would remember one saying or parable, some one else another: by and by people would begin to write down what they had remembered or heard, and so besides the Oral Tradition there would be a good many written records—but all in Aramaic, the language which Jesus spoke. In this language, according to an ancient tradition, the apostle Matthew some forty years after Jesus died wrote down what he remembered of the sayings of Jesus. If we had that document, precisely as Matthew wrote it, we should still have to hesitate about putting implicit confidence in it, for forty years is a long time and the human memory is very treacherous; but that document has disappeared. Scholars think it can be traced in our Gospels of Matthew and Luke, but a great deal has been added to it from sources that we know nothing about, and, what is worse, we have at the very best only a Greek translation, made by some unknown person, of the original Aramaic writing. Something like this, then, has been the history of the words of Jesus: spoken informally to audiences like that shown in the picture, they were handed down by word of mouth for nearly a generation; then one of the immediate followers of Jesus wrote down what he remembered of the sayings of Jesus as he remembered them; some unknown man translated this document from Aramaic into Greek, and this Greek translation, together with other records and memories also translated, was worked up by other hands into the Gospels as we have them. Does it not seem strange that after eighteen centuries the words which this young man is saying in this perfectly informal way should be regarded as the infallible utterances of God himself? Does it not seem stranger that people should imagine that his words, even if infallible when he spoke them, have been transmitted to us with anything like accuracy? The marvel is that people remembered so well and that, in spite of the perils of transmission and translation, the report of his teaching must be in the main substantially correct, since it bears so clearly the stamp of one unique personality.

NOTE.—For the sake of clearness, only the "words" of Jesus have been referred to and no mention has been made of the (traditional) original Mark document.

THE thief used to be branded upon his back, but the drunkard is branded on his nose.

Questions on Lesson VII.

That we may see how accurately the words of Jesus have come down to us, let us ask the teacher to read us a few verses from the book of Proverbs. Now let each in the class repeat what he remembers: have we all remembered the same things? Has any one remembered everything that was read? How accurately can we repeat the words? Now let us ask the teacher to read us a short story, perhaps one of Hans Christian Andersen's, and we will try to tell it over again. Can any one remember all the points in the story? Did we get all the details right? Do we all see what Andersen meant to teach by the story?

This helps us to understand how the sayings in the parables of Jesus were understood by those who heard them first. Have we any records by first hearers? Let us play the game of "Scandal": The teacher will whisper a sentence—only one, and it must not be repeated—to one scholar in the class; he will whisper it to another, and so on through the class. Now let the last boy write down the sentence as he heard it and read it aloud. Is it exactly as the teacher whispered it first? During how many years were the words of Jesus passed on in this way? Have we any words that Jesus actually spoke? In what language did he teach? In what language do we read his teachings? Have we any means of discriminating in our gospel between what Jesus actually said and what his followers only believed that he said?

ONE SUNDAY SCHOOL'S METHOD.

The following letter seemed to Mr. Fenn to suggest so good a method of using the Sunday-school lessons that he has given UNITY the privilege of publishing it:

MY DEAR MR. FENN:

We are using your Sunday-school lessons as they are coming out in UNITY. (We have followed the Six Years' Course from the beginning, and think it the best plan ever devised.)

I want specially to let you know how we are using the material. I have copied all the photographs, a sample of one of which I send you. The negatives are taken by different members of the school, who print enough copies for each child to have one. Then we furnish each child a little blank book in which the pictures are pasted in order, and on the opposite page the main points of the lesson are noted down. We have just made a beginning, but the school is very much interested. It promises to be the best work we have ever done, and the little books will be invaluable to our scholars. Of course this means a deal of work, but by dividing it up (we have a number of amateur photographers among our scholars) the burden is not heavy upon any one except the minister. The cost is trifling, done in this way, being a little over one cent for each picture, like the one I inclose.

It seems to us so good a thing that we wonder if other schools would not like to try it.

We think we may extend your list of pictures somewhat.

Very truly yours,
AUSTIN S. GARVER.

Notes from the Field

American Unitarian Association.—

The Board of Directors of the American Unitarian Association held its monthly meeting at its rooms, 25 Beacon street, Tuesday, Sept. 12. There were present Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Brown, Crothers, Dole, Fenn, Fox, Gaffield, Hoamer, Lyman, Reynolds, and Mrs. Bullard. The records of the last meeting were read and approved.

The business of the Central West had the precedence; and Rev. T. B. Forbush, superintendent of the Western work, was present. The following appropriations were recommended by the Western States Committee, the necessity for them explained by Mr. Forbush, and adopted by the board: $200 to the Free Congregational Society, Baraboo, Wis., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893, provided the society has a minister; $400 to Unity Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $1,500 to the First Unitarian Society, Ann Arbor, Mich., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $250 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Moline, Ill.; $400 in aid of the Liberal Christian Church, Shelbyville, Ill., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893, provided that $400 additional toward the salary of the minister be raised by the parishes in Shelbyville and Jordan; $450 in aid of the First Unitarian Church, Winona, Minn., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $600 to pay for the missionary services of Rev. Bjorn Peterson, at Winnipeg, Manitoba, for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $300 to pay for the missionary services of Rev. M. J. Skaptason for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $400 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Des Moines, Iowa, for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $200 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Beatrice, Neb.; $200 in aid of Unity Church, Eau Claire, Wis., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $500 in aid of the Swedish Unitarian Society, Minneapolis, Minn., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $300 in payment of the services of Rev. F. E. Matlock in South Dakota, for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $60 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Helena, Mont., for the month of October, 1893; $600 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Duluth, Minn., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $200 in aid of the Unity Church, Decorah, Ia., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $100 to pay for missionary services of the Wisconsin Conference for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $100 to pay for missionary services of Rev. E. A. Coit in Harrison for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $200 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Grand Rapids, Mich., for the year beginning April 1, 1893; $600 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Oklahoma, for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1893; $1,000 in aid of the First Unitarian Society, Salt Lake City, Utah, for the year beginning April 1, 1893.

Upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Middle and Southern States, it was voted that the sum of $1,370, the interest of the Frothingham fund for the education of the colored people, be appropriated to the Tuskegee Normal School, Tuskegee, Ala.

The Secretary presented a communication from the society in Tacoma, Wash., which was referred to the Executive Committee.

Rev. C. W. Wendte, the superin-

dent of work on the Pacific coast, being present upon invitation, made some very interesting remarks upon the subject of the present condition and needs of the Unitarian societies on the Pacific coast.

Adjourned. —Christian Register.

Philadelphia, Pa.—ETHICAL SOCIETY. The Section meetings since our last report have discussed: (Aug. 23) Mr. Danie's book, "Ai." "Love" (Aug. 30) through a paper by Mrs. Crompton; "The Ethics of Vegetarianism" (Sept. 16) through a paper by Joseph Parvin. Mr. Dalmás, who was to have given a piano recital on the 23d, was prevented by sickness from keeping his engagement. Mrs. Crompton's paper excited considerable opposition. She was rather disposed to deny the strength and efficacy of race love or even national love when compared with the intensity of the love of one individual for another, and she further argued that love could not exist without jealousy. But there were others who contended that love was not to be narrowed to the ordinary conceptions. Perhaps in the end the love of the race would be regarded as highest of all. Certainly, he who so loved was least capable of injustice. It is necessary that we should transcend purely physical considerations. The physical is holy and right, but there is another side equally high and enduring. The world will grow in the measure of its increase of love. Let the love of person for person have all the pure passion it may. Then let the husband love the world—let the child know its relationship with all the children of earth—let a noble spirit destroy state lines, and let not even the sea weaken the ties between nations. No man can know a surfeit of love. All the future of our civilization will hang upon the capacity of the race for loving.

The argument of Mr. Parvin for vegetarianism was mainly along physical lines. He showed by figures the properties of different foods, animal and vegetable, as demonstrated in physical substance, muscular and other, and dwelt upon the superiority of the contributions of the vegetable world. Mr. Wayland Smith, who spoke after Mr. Parvin, took up the ethical argument, which to him was far more searching and conclusive than that presented by Mr. Parvin on physical grounds, which yet were important enough.

Dr. Coit's Lectures.—Dr. Coit will speak for eight Sundays in Mr. Salter's absence. He sends me the following list of subjects as covering the entire period of his lectureship: October 8th, "John Morley on Compromise;" October 15th, "The Philosophy of Wagner's 'Parsifal'"; October 22d, "Bjornson, the Ethical Prophet of Norway;" October 29th, "Abraham Lincoln; or, Moral Opportunism in Politics;" November 5th, "The Valuable Outside of Ethics;" November 12th, "The Relation of Creed to Deed;" November 19th, "Robert Browning's Philosophy of Life;" November 26th, "After the Ethical Movement, What?"

August 13th, the Class had an informal discussion upon the question, "In What Degree Does Asceticism Belong with the Moral Life?" Asceticism may mean self-denial for the mere purpose of self-denial, or it may have for its purpose the doing of good. In the latter case it has an elevating tendency and is to be commended.

August 20th, Morris Lychenheim presented a paper on "Capital Punishment." In many parts of Europe and in some States of America the repeal of the death-penalty has been enacted. With mild and humane laws the Roman Republic flourished and prospered, but fell when the Government became cruel and severe. Tuscany, after abolishing capital punishment, found no increase of crime, but, on the contrary, a beneficial effect was experienced. During the reign of Henry VIII. seventy thousand executions for various crimes took place, and during Elizabeth's reign nineteen thousand persons were executed, and yet crime was not checked. Prison chaplains have declared that witnessing an execution increases crime instead of acting as a deterrent. The hanging of innocent persons is possible, one hundred such cases being known to English jurisprudence. Experience in Australia has shown that capital punishment has not acted as a deterrent. On the contrary, there has been a decided increase in crimes of murder. Homicidal mania is now considered by specialists as a disease, and should be so treated. As long as other means of punishment for murder are available, we are not justified in hanging.

August 27th, "The Moral Element in Howells' Fiction" was the subject of a paper read before the class by Miss Florence Briggs. The treatment and points suggested by the paper evoked considerable and vigorous discussion, which was, in the main, favorable to Howells. Howells' own opinion of the moral element in literature is shown where he speaks of literary art as "never noble, but always trivial and base, when it is sundered from the service of truth and humanity." Howells does not simply use his power to create characters, but he also directs it so as to help and uplift us. In Howells' earlier works the moral element is not so obvious; they are all in a lighter and less serious vein. They stand as a protest against melodramatic fiction, and aim to create a wholesome interest in the normal and commonplace. In his later works he shows moral growth and development. We get our strongest moral impetus from contact with people that are morally developed, and so Howells, by means of his art, creates for our association characters that inspire and uplift.

The points brought out by the discussion were as follows: These writers in whose work the moral element is strongly shown will survive and hold a place in the literature of the future. Howells seems to see the whole truth of a matter by a slight suggestion—and he shows the bad and the good in their true light. A writer is not judged by a code of rules, but by the effect produced. If he expands the intellect of the reader he has moral worth. Howells depicts actuality, but does not create ideal characters. Literature should not aim only at beauty, but be distinctively human. Many persons lack education, but are desirous of knowing and hearing the truth. In this respect, as a teacher, Howells supplies the need just as Shakespeare did in his day.

September 3d, Mr. Joseph Bicknell was to give the class a criticism of Aaron Burr, but he was unavoidably absent. Mr. Morris Lychenheim gave a brief sketch of Burr's life and career, and a discussion followed as to Burr's moral rank.

The class decided, a short time ago, to take up for the coming season's work a course of study upon "The Value of the Great Religious Systems." With a few exceptions the subjects heretofore treated have had little if any connection with one another, although, as a rule, they have been considered from an ethical standpoint; but the course proposed will be, from its nature, continuous in character, and cannot fail, if taken up in the right spirit, to have an important educational value. Mr. David S. Chrystal opened the course on Sunday, September 11, by a paper on "The Egyptian Religions." Mr. Salter, who has devoted much time to the study of comparative religions, has indorsed the proposed course heartily, and has taken the trouble to send the class a list of books bearing upon the first five subjects, and has promised to give a list of the best books treating of the remaining subjects. The first ten subjects are as follows: "The Egyptian Religions," "Teachings of Zoroaster," "The Babylonians," "Brahminism," "Teachings of Buddha," "The Buddhist Religion in History," "Esoteric Buddhism," "Philosophy of Confucius," "The Old Greek Religion," "Religion of Socrates." It is proposed to have these subjects on two alternate Sundays in each month until completed, and wherever possible efforts will be made to have two members open each discussion.

For Nervous Debility

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

DR. T. J. BOWLES, Muncie, Ind., says: "I have used it with satisfactory results in nervous debility, and have also found it to be very useful in all cases of indigestion characterized by distension of the stomach after meals, from fermentation of food."

Serious Railway Accident.

Milk train in collision; no milkman turns up; disappointed housekeepers; coffee without cream. A petty annoyance resulting from a neglect to keep the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk in the house. Order now for future exigencies from Grocer or Drugist.

Happy indeed are the homes which contain "Garland" Stoves and Ranges.

50c

is the price, postpaid, of each of the following books in neat paper binding:

Helen H. Gardener's Facts and Fictions of Life. Eleven addresses and papers, including "Sex in Brain," "Thrown in with the City's Dead," "Woman as an Annex," "The Moral Responsibility of Woman in Heredity," and "Heredity in its Relations to a Double Standard of Morals." Also in cloth at $1.

Theodore Parker's Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man. The strongest passages from many unpublished sermons. The best single book to give an idea of the eloquence and spiritual power of Parker; 430 pages. Cloth edition, gilt top, $1.25. To those wishing to circulate the book for the missionary work it will do, ten paper copies will be sent postpaid for one dollar cash with order. This offer applies only to the limited number now on hand. 4300 pages for a dollar! Cheaper than tracts, and this book will be read where tracts will be thrown away.

E. P. Powell's Liberty and Life. Seventeen discourses on the application of evolution to morals and religion. "The author is bold and vigorous but thoughtful and reasonable. When he tears down he does so in order to build anew." To post-office mission workers who wish to distribute this book, eight copies will be mailed for a dollar, no reduction on single copies.

Hudor Genone's Inquiringo Island and The Last Tenet are two bright, sparkling stories with morals that are not too obtrusive but are there. Inquiringo Island tells of a people whose sacred book is the arithmetic, on whose texts they have based a theology much like that of the opponents of Dr. Briggs. (Also in cloth at $1.00.) The Last Tenet is the story of an elect infant who grew up to be a missionary, and his twin brother who was an unfortunate Buddhist. (Also in cloth at $1.25.)

These sermons, dedicated to the Parliament of Religions and published through the energy of his parish, have already given the author, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, a wide hearing in that Parliament. Several thousand copies of these sermons were sold during the sessions of the Parliament at the Art Institute.

Of the Buddha lecture MR. DHARMAPALA, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes to the committee: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

Of the Mohammed pamphlet, M'D ALFAN- DER RUSSELL WEBB, Editor of the Moslem World, published in New York, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia,' and I assure you I am greatly pleased at the manner in which you have treated the subject. It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. I can plainly see how your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain toward Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth. * * * I will be very glad to have some of these lectures to sell, and will place it on our book list."

THE following sentiment, which the Kindly Light, the ever winning little sheet sent forth every week by the Unitarian Church of Ithaca, offers in its motto of current issue, is worthy a place in every church and in every heart.

The fraternity of churches is as in

"TO BE good and to do good, to love the good and to labor for it as the proper business and work of life, is the whole duty of man." This is a sentence taken from a sermon preached by Dr. Salter, of Dubuque, Iowa, in memory of his lamented wife. Dr. Salter is the Mentor of the Congregationalist ministers of Iowa, and is the father of our associate, William Salter, of the Ethical Culture Society. Here we find the common creed of father and son.
This is the growing creed upon which all intelligent and progressive souls are learning to unite more and more clearly.

UNITY has a proposition to make to the editors of all parish papers.
We cannot afford to "exchange" on an equal basis, as the cost of publishing UNITY is so much greater than is the cost of publishing these little sheets, and they are so very numerous. But the publishers will send UNITY to the editor of any parish paper, however small, as long as he carries a two-inch advertisement of UNITY. To all who express a desire to avail themselves of this offer
"copy" for our advertisement will

WE have received from Mr. Albert
A. L'ope, the indefatigable worker for good roads, a circular letter suggesting a graduated succession tax as a means of raising the funds necessary to properly equip our highways,—no tax to be levied on estates under $10,000, 1 per cent. on all estates under $1,000,000, 2 per cent. on the excess thereof up to $5,000,- 000, 3 per cent. on the excess thereof up to $10,000,000, etc. The plan seems to us a good one; but we see no reason for limiting this principle to road taxes, and we are inclined to think the rate of increase might advantageously be more rapid.

THE following from the columns of The Outlook we commend to the consideration of the men and women who are too busy with the problems of life, philanthropic or otherwise, to find time to go to church. It is the beginning of the church-going season, and we know of no higher gift, within the power of environment to give, to man and woman, than a church home that, to a reasonable extent, represents the ideals of that soul, and then a church-going habit, rooted in conviction and developed by regularity so that it becomes not a weekly distraction but the normal weekly rest time and reverent renewal of the soul:

Men who never go to church are natural pessimists; men who go to church, and breathe its atmosphere of reverence, of fellowship, of love, go out from church with a better thought of their fellow-men and a better expectation for themselves and for their fellows.

IN the Christian Register for Sept. 28 Rev. C. W. Wendte, Superintendent of the Unitarian churches on the Pacific coast, publishes an article in which he says:

Liberalism affirms that all thought is free and to attempt to cramp it is a crime. The true liberal believes in sincerity in matters of faith. No mind is truly free which entertains a hateful, scornful spirit against another mind. The true liberal not only tolerates but loves. He is charitable and sympathetic; the only unpardonable sin in his eyes is uncharity and a loveless heart.

Every thoughtful, earnest man must necessarily indorse these ideas as set forth by the alert, unresting pastor of the Oakland Unitarian Society. But this is a high standard which few of us live up to. The irritation manifested in the presence of those who do not use our names and wear our sect badge is still manifested by those who affect as well as those who discard the word "Liberalism."

"PHASES OF RELIGION IN AMERICA" is the title of a neat little volume put forth by Rev. W. S. Crowe, editor of the Universalist Monthly, in the columns of which these lectures first appeared. We know of no other single book in which the reader will find so much latter-day information concerning Methodism, Episcopalianism, Universalism, Unitarianism, Theism, Spiritualism, Ethical Culture, and the general considerations that would gather around such a study. Mr. Crowe, with the frankness of a free lance and the sympathy of an earnest soul, has tried to bring these various phases of religious life in America down to date; and to the student of the religious situation at the present time the book offers great attraction. Our UNITY readers will be particularly interested in this work, as they always are in the word and work of this earnest preacher and editor. Copies can be secured by addressing the author at Newark, New Jersey, and inclosing a dollar.

ONE of our women ministers objects to the prefix "Rev. Mrs.," saying, "One of these is enough, and I much prefer the last." We shall of course respect her wishes. Certainly there is no very strong reason for distinguishing a religious teacher as ipso facto entitled to special reverence, although it is to be hoped that the men and women who enter upon the duties of that high office will have characters worthy of reverence. But until all adopt the sweet and simple custom of the Friends, we believe that it will be found convenient to continue to use the prefix "Rev.," in addition to Mr., Mrs. and Miss, as a convenient way of indicating that the person thus designated is a public teacher of religion. As to the propriety of using "Rev." and "Mrs." together, we must differ from our correspondent. The justification of such a usage as this is the usage itself and its practical convenience. It is awkward and provoking not to know, before meeting a person of whom you may have read for years, whether she is to be addressed as "Mrs." or "Miss." The mere fact that in the case of male ministers, where no such question can arise, it is permissible to omit the "Mr." when the given name or the initials are used (it is still a barbarism—or, at best, newspaper English—to speak of Rev. Mr. Smith as "Rev. Smith"), is no reason why it should be considered an impropriety to speak of the Rev. Mrs. Smith and the Rev. Miss Mary Smith. On the contrary, we regard this as the better usage.

SAYS The Advance, speaking of the Oriental religions:

There were men and women on the platform and in the audience, large numbers of them, day by day, who understood these faiths, and the grounds on which they are supported, just as well before the papers were read and the addresses were delivered as after.

Not an atom was added by what these men said to the stock of common knowledge concerning the Oriental religions. That people in India and China have some right ideas of God, is no surprise. That God is no respecter of persons, and that He has never left himself without witness, are facts which all intelligent Christians have held and cherished ever since the New Testament was written.

We fear that the first part of this is too true; that there were many persons present whose prejudices were too strong to allow them to understand the meaning of much that was said on that platform, and who therefore knew no more after the addresses were made than before,—which is another way of saying that they knew as much before as after. As for the latter part of the statement, we cannot say what the number of "intelligent Christians" is; but certainly the realization that in India and China the natives "have some right ideas of God," is not very widespread among Occidental Christians even to-day, and the history of missions and of missionary methods indicates that even so far as it is possessed it is of recent acquisition. However this may be, let us be thankful that The Advance is on record as holding to these ideas,—indeed, asserting them with a vigor that brings to mind the witty description of the three stages in the advance of new ideas. First, we ignore them; next, we denounce them; finally, we always thought so!

We are glad to print the following editorial note from the Non-Sectarian for October, and we cordially adopt the sentiments as our own. When the intoxicating excitements of the Fair are over we propose to lend ourselves more earnestly than ever before to the bringing about of such a possible fusion. Meanwhile we reiterate, with our contemporary, the manifest truth that the great Parliament of Religions will fail to bring forth the most obvious fruitage if some time during the year 1894 the most Free elements in America do not at least come together for once to ask of each other, eye to eye, and hand to hand, "Why should we stand apart when our work is one? What is our common work, and how can we best accomplish it?"

We have been long impressed—and have given voice to the impression—with the necessity of an organization of the Liberal societies with a common name and for a common purpose; we have felt that the time is ripe for it, but never have we felt so sure of it as we are to-day. The Parliament of Religions, if it has proved anything, has proved that the people are ready for it—longing for it; as some one has said, "it is the clergy who stand in the way;" but the time is coming—and that very soon—when, if the clergy fail to lead the way, the laity will inaugurate the movement and carry it forward to success. A conference must be held as an initiatory movement, and the sooner it is done the better. If the Liberal societies will not, or do not, do it, the Independent societies must; their need of such organization is too imperative to admit of long delay, and if only they have the courage of their convictions, and undertake it, they will not fail to form an organization which the Liberal societies of the various denominations will gladly join. We have already given our views of the necessity and general character of such organization, and we are confident—more so than ever before—both of its possibility and its certainty, but we would again urge it upon the serious consideration of our societies—the Independent societies especially—and shall continue to do so until it becomes an accomplished fact.

A MARTYR OF EDUCATION.

The Christian religion holds no monopoly of that self-sacrifice that reaches to martyrdom. Religion, even, is not the only inspiration that leads to the heights of disinterestedness unless, indeed, religion be interpreted, as well it might, to include all disinterestedness. Science, political reform and education have their white lives whose stories in spire nobleness and lead to greatness. Such a life was celebrated by an unique and impressive service at All Souls Church, Chicago, last Sunday evening. On the desk, resting on a bed of flowers, was an urn of Benares brass, carved with Hindoo symbols. On the platform sat Mr. Nagarkar, of Bombay; Miss Sorabji, of Poona; Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Carpenter, of Roselle, New Jersey; the pastor of the church and others. The urn contained the ashes of Dr. Ananda Bai Joshi, who six years ago yielded up her young life in Poona, with the request that her ashes might rest in America, where her soul found enlargement through the hospitality of sympathetic friends and the opportunities of intellectual advancement. The husband, sympathetic and appreciative in all her struggles, found in the coming of Mr. Nagarkar, to attend the Parliament of Religions in America, the first opportunity of carrying out the sacred wish. All Souls Church was selected as the place where the memorial word and sacred welcome were to be said, before the ashes found their final interment in the family burying ground of Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter at Poughkeepsie, New York.

Many of our readers will remember that Dr. Joshi was the first high-caste Brahmin woman who ever crossed the seas. She took in this country a course of study, received the degree of M. D. with honors at Philadelphia, and returned to her native land with high purposes. She intended to ameliorate the condition of her sisters physically and intellectually. But she went back to find her work through the gate of death rather than the gate of life; and at twenty-one this brave little woman, master of seven languages, beloved and honored in two continents, died a martyr of education, a gentle woman-Winklereid who took into her own breast the shafts of ridicule, opposition and neglect, that thereby she might make way for liberty. Dr. Joshi came to this country a Hindu, and she went back a Hindu and died in the higher faiths of her fathers, with an unflinching trust in the universal father of souls, but without what the representatives of prevalent Christianity would call a "saving faith." Jesus she loved and honored, but she asked for no mediatorial service of him.

Our readers must imagine the nature of the service for the present. We trust that some Memorial notice will be put into permanent shape. Mr. Nagarkar spoke of her early life; Mrs. Carpenter told of the strangely romantic and beautiful manner in which the way was opened for this little girl of eighteen to come and find shelter in her home while she took her course of medical studies in Philadelphia; and Miss Sorabji, a fellow-townswoman, told of the last days and her final triumph at home. The pastor of the church conducted the preliminary Memorial service and spoke the final word on behalf of America, on behalf of the American women, and on behalf of that international religion, the cosmopolitan faith, that finds in this incident a beautiful interpretation. Truly the ashes of the Hindu saint resting in American soil will bring a benediction of peace to both continents beyond our powers of computation.

A SONG OR A SUPPER.

The following item from a leading paper tells of one more new departure for women:

Mrs. Dixon, wife of the Rev. Thomas Dixon, of New York, is with her husband, "hunting robins" down on Cobb's Island in Virginia. Mrs. Dixon is, if anything, a better shot than her husband. She accompanies him in all of his hunts, carries her own gun, and shoots the birds on the wing.

It is a departure, however, into a path in which I hope she will be followed by no other woman. The atrocity of going deliberately forth to shoot robins ought to be confined to the sterner sex, surely; and I am happy to say that I think few even of the sternest of them delight in this precious pastime. I wonder if this couple are acquainted with the robins? Have they ever had them for neighbors summer after summer in their lindens or their larches? Have they ever fed them in the very early spring, or helped them to replace their little ones who had fallen from the nest? Have they listened with rapture to their first spring songs, or bade them a sad adieu in late autumn? They evidently are not of the same mind as Ruskin, who would rather hear a bird sing than eat it, and says that is one of the reasons why he has been called mad. Would there were more mad people like the gentle-minded Ruskin. Then we should not be in danger of destroying whole species of our singing birds, as we are to-day, and have to look forward, as does Kipling, to the time "when the birds will all have died." Then

"The dawn will come as still as death,
With ne'er a single lark,
And joyless as one stricken dumb
The day will turn to dark.
And we shall clasp our hands and cry:
Ah, God! Ah, how I long
For one sweet-throated bird to sing
Even a foolish song." H. T. G.

FAIR PLAY.

Now that the Parliament is over, and the "Heathen" are presumably where they cannot retort, we find the following statement, originally made in The Interior, going the rounds of the Christian papers, and apparently having the hearty approval of most them:

Among the results of the Parliament of Religions these may be noted: No anti-Christian faith has offered to lay its sacred Scriptures beside the Bible for comparison; no contrasted creed, however it may boast of righteousness, has proposed a single new ethical conception not found in Christianity; no philosophy has offered to us a nobler conception of God than that we have obtained from the Old and New Testaments; no hope richer and more consoling has been suggested than the hope of an immortality of holiness; and no religion has presented to us a record of such continuous and tender self-sacrifice as that of the Christian believer. And it is especially noticeable that most of the men who eulogized alien faiths were those who personally owed their intellectual quickening and their morals both to contact with Christianity.

We cannot but protest against the narrow, unfair and boastful spirit here exhibited. In the first place, the religions represented—the great majority of them, certainly—were not anti- but *non-*Christian, which is a very different thing; and further than this, while it may be literally true that no non-Christian faith "offered to lay its sacred Scriptures by the Bible for comparison,"—no such offer of comparison from, any religion having been a feature of the Parliament,—the implication that other faiths were unwilling to risk such a comparison is false. And right here it may be noted that when in the Parliament Dr. George F. Post made his improper attack upon the Koran and said that it contained passages unfit to be read in public, he wisely refrained from offering to lay his sacred Scriptures beside it for comparison,—the fact being that there is much more indecency in the Old Testament than in the Koran.

Let us take the next statement. One would hardly expect from older faiths than Christianity—and most of those presented were older—"new ethical conceptions not found in Christianity"; to suggest such a thing is but a poor compliment to Christianity, it being more in order to ask whether Christianity "has proposed a single new ethical conception" peculiar to itself. But more than this, it may be suggested that the Buddhistic doctrine of Karma and Reincarnation, though not new, is a high ethical conception not found in Christianity.

The statement about philosophy is out of place, because the Parliament was religious not philosophical; yet we venture to assert that true philosophy does offer a nobler conception of God than that contained in the Old and New Testaments; and so, for that matter, does the religion of the Brahmo Somaj.

As the hope of immortality entertained by Christians is not peculiar to them, the next statement has little or no comparative value; and the one which follows it we are compelled to question, if not to deny. Is the true Christian's life more tender and self-sacrificing than the faithful Buddhist's? In view of the regard of the latter for the lower animals, as well as for man, the contrary would seem to be true.

And finally we must say that the last statement is pure assumption, resting, so far as it has any foundation, upon the undying fallacy, post hoc ergo propter hoc.

Let it be understood that we make this protest merely in the interest of fairness, not because we prefer to Christianity Buddhism or Mohammedanism. As between the three, our preference is for Christianity, although we regard it, not as the fullness of truth, but as one of several approximations to a goal not yet attained by man.

F. W. S.

WHAT women by nature cannot do, it is quite superfluous to forbid them from doing. What they can do, but not so well as the men who are their competitors, competition will suffice to exclude them from.

A SONG OF THE NIGHT.

O night of many voices! how they call,
When gentle sleep her magic touch withholds!
From out the deeps their grieving accents fall,
And past the visions troop from years grown cold.

They come in faintest sighing of the winds,
Which like the measures of a crooning lay,
Brings back the tender touch of long lost friends,
And sweet sad memories of a vanished day.

And when the mourning heart of midnight yearns,
And in wild gusts our thoughts are tossed at sea,

We hear again the step that ne'er returns
From that blest summer land of melody.

O deep-voiced night to thee alone belongs
The mystic hour which links us to our dead,
Day dims our vision, sweet tho' be its song
Of light and love and joys that have not fled.

For dawn with sweetest breath blows out the stars,

Beyond which lie the blossoming radiant hills
Where those we love have wandered from us far,

And blest be night that calls them to us still.

FRANCES OVIATT LEWIS.

THE PREACHER AS A MEDIATOR

The present, while a deeply interesting, is unquestionably a difficult age for the preacher. The audiences he addresses, especially in the great centers of population, are divided by gulfs of intellectual difference of a width and depth entirely unknown in earlier days. Amid a thousand diversities on minor points there are, however, in nearly every modern congregation, two broadly marked divisions whose character and relative significance it will be fatal to the success of a religious teacher to ignore. They may be roughly defined as the old school and the new. Every section of the modern church presents us with this position. Various methods exist of dealing with it. There is that of obscurantism, which sees nothing but evil in modern tendencies, and will hold no parley with them. Another method is that of the revolutionary, iconoclastic preacher who revels in the newest ideas, and who treats with scant courtesy any religious theories not as advanced as his own. A man of this type, if he has ability and sincerity, will gather about him a good many of the minds that the other has failed to touch. But to a number of people whose steadfast piety makes them the salt of churches, he has nothing to say which their spiritual nature can assimilate.

The situation calls for a new pulpit function. The modern preacher needs to be a mediator. A mediator is a go-between, who brings two different and, perhaps, opposing interests into living and harmonious relations. To do this he must, in the first place, understand intimately and thoroughly the two parties he is dealing with. A translator is in this sense a mediator, and no man can be a good translator who has not caught the innermost spirit, not only of the language and the piece he is interpreting, but of the people into whose thought forms he is about to render it. The preacher who would preserve unity and brotherliness of feeling amid the mental dissimilarities of his flock must in this way be a translator—that is, a sympathetic interpreter of the old to the new, and of the new to the old. As an indispensable condition for that service he must know both and live in both. On the one hand no man will do effective work on the hearts and lives of men who has not assimilated and realized in his inmost nature the principles, and still more the spiritual experiences, which underlie the old theology. The most devout of his congregation will feel that in him they have a brother soul who has borne, as they have, the burden of evil, who has been in the Slough of Despond, knocked at the Wicket Gate, trodden the Valley of Humiliation, and seen, from the Delectable Mountains, the Celestial City. With this rich experience in common they will trust him when he brings before them, as it will be his duty to do, the newer outlooks which it has been reserved for this age to open up.

An operation of a converse character will go on between him and that portion of his hearers who have been smitten with the modern spirit, and taught to look askance at old views in religion. His knowledge of modern science, philosophy and economics will be sufficient to cause him to give fullest weight to the considerations coming from those quarters. But the trust he thus inspires will in its turn be used to lead this portion of his hearers to complete what is lacking in their inward culture by the statement to them, in terms such as befit their intellectual status, of the claims of that spiritual side of things which the old theology was framed to present.

The modern need of mediators is indeed an urgent one over a very wide era. The relations between science and religion show the want of them very forcibly. The scoffs in some recent scientific works against theology would certainly have been spared had their utterers known more about the subject they were discussing. Theologians on their side show quite as badly in their dealings with science. What is wanted in the world of ideas is that which biology shows to be so valuable in organic life—namely, the crossing of breed. A theology or a science shut up to itself is in the condition of a cluster of families secluded for generations in some Alpine valley, where want of outside communication has led to a close intermarrying, the result of which has been cretinisme, or idiocy. Confinement to one class of ideas brings about intellectual cretinisme. Fresh blood must be introduced if vigor is to be maintained. The same thing holds between religion and political economy. We might have illustrated our subject entirely from the relation of these two interests. The treatment of economical questions, entirely apart from ethical considerations, brought the science some years ago into profound disrepute. On the other hand, pulpit utterances on these questions full of moral enthusiasm, but without any scientific knowledge of economics, are of little real value. Let the two elements mingle and the result will be a transformed world.

It may be, that in coming forms of social and spiritual evolution, the role of preacher as mediator may be exhibited in even more concrete ways. He may learn to mediate between the ideal and the practical by leading the church in the carrying out of great industrial and civilizing schemes. The Jesuit missionaries in South America with their extended and successful agricultural operations showed the way here, as did, on the other side of the reformation line, the Protestant pastor Oberlin, who, in addition to his wonderfully successful spiritual teaching, by his practical energy and sagacity transformed the once barren valley of the Vosges, in which his lot was cast, into a paradise of fertility, of rural comfort and prosperity. It will be a wonderful thing if the church, as the next phase of its progress, should give up the greater part of its talking and take instead to doing! The translation of its ethical and spiritual ideas into facts instead of into words is, nevertheless, perhaps the next experiment to be tried. The preacher of that day will have to learn a new kind of eloquence.

THE IDEA OF GOD.

A little philosophy inclineth a man's mind to atheism, but depth of philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion. —BACON.

Things in the concrete are palpable to the untutored mind. The ancients, becoming conversant with this psychological fact, represented abstract metaphysical truths by concrete personalities.

The vulgar, or ignorant people, losing sight of the eternal verities which these form-crystallizations were calculated to represent, worshipped the images instead of God in spirit and truth.

This was fetishism. There is extant a form of this kind of worship, which in its incipency led men into grave errors and cruel persecutions.

No farther back than the fifteenth century John Calvin, a bigoted fanatic, was instrumental in the burning of Servetus, a physician and naturalist of Geneva, a man of great learning and integrity, who could not entertain Calvin's belief. The odium theologium assumed a most horrible form in the terrible torture of this good man. Let us endeavor to discover the springs and seed of this awful deed: A concept, or noumenon, in the mind of Calvin, represented God to him as an anthropomorphic being,—that is, a being with the passions of a man,—a being whose wrath must be appeased by sacrifice.

This horrible superstition still remains in the sentient mind, and the idea must be supplanted by one more salutary before the votaries of fetishism will cease to persecute their fellow-beings. Reason, man's beacon-light, shows the absurdity of the idea of an anthropomorphic God. If God is infinite he is beyond the ken of the finite mind. If he is all-wise, he can learn no more; if he is all-powerful, he cannot be made more powerful. Again, if he is infinite, he is conditionless; and the conditioned can in no wise affect the conditionless. We can sin against a sentient being, because such an one has atomic conditions, and by being kind or cruel we bring about a change in these conditions; and good or bad acts are the precursors of pain or peace. We should allow this moral seed to penetrate our hearts, take root and grow. This eternal truth can never be dethroned or denuded of its sanctity. Let those who clothe pride, ignorance, folly and sloth in the sanctity which belongs only to the everlasting truth bestir themselves, and, instead of persecuting their fellow-beings in expectation of pleasing an imaginary God of relentless anger, go about doing good. Superstition is an insidious enemy of humanity, born of ignorance and nourished by ecclesiastics. Religion is a bona fide friend of mankind, born of reason and nourished by honest men.

God is immanent in nature. He touches the seed, and it miraculously blossoms into a beautiful flower. God is the spontaneity of living substances; he is the origin of protoplasm. He is an inherent, immutable, ubiquitous spirit. God procreates protoplasm, freighted with energy. He is the origin of psychic life. God is feeling, form, matter, force, and motion—the All; and of this wondrous whole we are a part. I have personified God; but God is not a person. A person must have idiosyncrasies. God is not mutable.

Let us not vilify the ideas of our ancestors, who conceived a transcendental God, with passion and parts; but rather let us indicate moral laws that govern the universe, and endeavor to work in harmony with them.

LIVE TO-DAY!

The wise man is he who knows the value of to-day: he who can estimate to-day rightly may leave the future to take care of itself. For the value of the future depends entirely upon the value attached to to-day; there is no magic in the years to come; nothing can bloom in those fairer fields save that which is sown to-day. The great aim of Christianity is not to teach men the glory of the life to come, but the sacredness of the life that now is; not to make men imagine the beauty of heaven, but to make them realize the divinity of earth; not to unveil the splendor of the Almighty, enthroned among angels, but to reveal deity in the Man of Nazareth. He has mastered the secret of life who has learned the value of the present moment, who sees the beauty of present surroundings, and who recognizes the possibilities of sainthood in his neighbors. To make the most and the best out of to-day is to command the highest resources of the future. For there is no future outside of us; it lies within us, and we make it for ourselves. The heaven of the future, and the hell also, are in the germ in every human soul; and no man is appointed to one or the other, for each appoints himself. To value to-day, to honor this life, to glorify humanity, is to prepare for eternity, to seek the eternal life, and to worship God. The harvest of the future is but the golden ripening of to-day's sowing.

—The Outlook.

THE RESULT OF THE RELIGIOUS CONGRESS.

The World's Congress of Religions, in connection with the Columbian Exposition, is destined to be the greatest enemy that traditional orthodox theories can encounter. Of course, there will be no direct assault. The effectiveness will be its ignoring of those old theories as matters too small and too stale for consideration. Orthodoxy rests upon four doctrinal theories—I. The corruption of the human race in Adam. II. The vicarious atonement of Christ's death. III. Salvation by faith. IV. Endless punishment. Just as modern literature and science and philosophy ignore these out-worn theories, the World's Religious Congress advertises to ignore them. These are not world themes any longer. They are sectarian themes—urged in obscure places. The time is past when they can even be considered in a representative body of the world's thinkers. You might as well try to hold a world's congress of sciences, in which alchemy and phlogiston and the philosopher's stone and perpetual motion were the themes to be discussed.

The circulars sent out by the Advisory Council declare the great purposes of the Congress as follows: "To deepen the spirit of human brotherhood among religious men of diverse faiths; to indicate the impregnable foundation of theism and the reasons for man's faith in immortality; to strengthen the forces adverse to materialism; to throw all possible light on the solemn problems of the present age; and to bring the nations of the earth into more friendly fellowship."

That circular begins with brotherhood and ends with fellowship. What a peculiar brotherhood and what a grim fellowship it would be for the Christian of that congress to tell the good and learned representatives of Mohammedanism and Confucianism and Judaism and Buddhism and Parseeism and Brahminism—men who will represent the oldest civilizations of the earth, and who will represent three-quarters of the inhabitants of the earth—what fellowship and what brotherhood it would be to tell those men that they and their nations and their ancestors are all to be turned into everlasting hell because they have not renounced their own faith and believed in the vicarious atonement of Christ's death! The old dogmas are too small, too narrow, too thoroughly devoid of human fellowship, too replete with the spirit of selfishness and bigotry, too long the cause of hatred and war and persecution,—they will not be put forward in the congress, except to be apologized for and smiled at as the weaknesses of our fathers. Higher criticism, modern literature, and the evolution of moral sense have retired them forever.

The themes to be discussed are Theism, Immortality, Worship, Practical Ethics and Human Brotherhood. The world's future good and man's eternal destiny are not supposed to hang on any such thread as the record of Daniel's escape from the lions, or Jesus' miracle at Cana, or the re-appearance of his own body after death. Whether the fourth Gospel was written by the disciple John before the fall of Jerusalem, or by some Greek convert of the second century, is not a question on which the fate of nations can any longer be hinged. That congress proposes a genuine universalism of religion—a serious consideration of the religious elements which are universal. When will the assumed leaders of our denomination, who "squatted on so great a word," wake up to its magnificent meaning!

NAGARKAR AT ROCKFORD, ILLS.

Perhaps no visitor has ever left with the people of Rockford so deep and affectionate an impression as this brother from the far East. His lecture conveyed a succession of the most interesting information; told in a manner that held the large audience in the closest attention. The pleasure and instruction the lecture afforded was shown by the many who, at the close of the lecture, came to Nagarkar with their warmest greetings. On Sunday he preached for Dr. Kerr. The crowded church expressed the universal desire to see and hear him again. The sermon was of surpassing interest. That service will remain for many a year in the memory of those who heard and were so illuminated and blessed by it. The ability of the discourse, its scholarly discrimination, its quality of tenderness and earnestness, the beauty and force of its language, the genius of its devoutness, and the charm of the preacher's personality,—carried in spirit the great company to whom he spoke to a high pitch of intelligent, sympathetic, and religious fervor.

In a fine address, which Mr. Nagarkar gave to the Sunday school of Dr. Kerr's society, he left in the glad hearts of the children and youth a gracious and reverent feeling they can never forget. K.

"GREAT TRUTHS."

TO THE EDITOR:

A correspondent writing in a prominent Chicago journal concerning the addresses of the representatives of the religions at the Parliament of Religions, states that Rev. Joseph Cook and others brought out prominently "the great truths which separate Christianity from all other religions." Is this statement true? Has Christianity "great truths" possessed by no other faith? When the Son of man was asked by the young man what he should do to inherit eternal life, he was told to "keep the commandments." Religion is defined, by the apostle James, as "visiting the fatherless and widows and keeping unspotted from the world." The directions of Christ to the inquirer are taken from Judaism, and the rules given are taught by other religions. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is as good a test to apply to religions now as when Christ uttered the words. Let us consider some of those religions which, according to Rev. Mr. Cook's eulogist, have none of those "great truths." Consider Buddhism. Its founder was born in the seventh century before Christ, its adherents number nearly five hundred millions, and it has never persecuted. What a beneficent record! During 2,400 years of existence, with adherents far outnumbering any other religion, it has never applied the rack, the fire and fagot to the adherents of other faiths.

"One who does me wrong I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil goes from him, the more good shall go from me." Such was the noble dictum of the founder of Buddhism. Not to partake of anything intoxicating is the fifth Buddhist commandment. The adherents of this great religion do not find it necessary, as do the Rev. Mr. Cook and his school, to invent an untenable theory—the two kinds of wine myth—in order to conform to the modern conception of temperance. Narrow-minded bigots may not discover "great truths" in Judaism or Buddhism, but all sincere lovers of truth will concede that these religions are civilizing, humanizing, elevating, and regenerating, and that the founder of Buddhism was the true brother of all those aspiring and bright reformers who sought to make humanity wiser and better—worthy children of the Eternal Spirit. JEFFERSON.

"A JESUS GALLERY."

EDITOR UNITY:

Some of our Sunday schools are using the lessons on the Life of Jesus, which Mr. Fenn is writing week by week in UNITY. They are admirably fitted for the older scholars,—I know at least one gray-over-the-ears minister who finds that they teach him. Each lesson is based upon a picture. The papers cost but 11 cents a set to schools, but the set of twenty-two pictures (Soule's photographs) costs $2.75. The lessons, then, are both grown-up and costly, yet so very good that it is worth while to know how easily both objections can be got around. Buy, to go with them in the homes, Mrs. Jaynes's little leaflet, Life of Jesus, with pictures, published by the Unitarian S. S. Society, 25 Beacon street, Boston, and noticed in UNITY of Aug. 24. Being the Life told for little ones, her text contains just the sort of details which Mr. Fenn has no room for in his lesson-papers, but which all are young enough to enjoy and most of us to need. So ignorant are our children usually, the children in the homes of the liberal faith, of the common Gospel facts, that for half our classes there could hardly be a better supplement to Mr. Fenn's help. Using the two texts together, a school is well equipped. But that is not all. Mrs. Jaynes's leaflets contain the best little Jesus Gallery there is within easy reach, the pictures one to each lesson being mostly reproduced from Durand's spirited woodcuts made for Renan's Life of Jesus; they are not idealizations, but give as near to the real facts and scenes as may be guessed; and are the better for that, some of us would say. There are thirty-six of these pictures, and they cover, not all, but most of Mr. Fenn's lesson-subjects, often with more than one illustration. Almost all the children in our schools can afford to buy these, as the set costs but 15 cents. In our own school forty sets are in use,—which means that as many homes have furnished themselves in this way with the little Gallery for home-study in connection with the older lessons.

THE RELATION BETWEEN RELIGION AND CONDUCT.*

BY PROF. CRAWFORD HOWELL TOY.

At the present time the external relation between conduct and religion is an intimate one. All religious ministers and manuals are also instructors in ethics; our sacred books and our pulpits alike emphasize conduct. This has been the case in human history a long time, but not always. In the very early times, in the childhood of the race, if we may judge from existing savage life and from the earliest records of civilized peoples, religion and morality occupied quite separate spheres, which rarely or never touched each other.

The god was approached and propitiated by methods known to the priest, by magic formulas which had no more to do with conduct than the word by which Aladdin controlled the slaves of the lamp. But the intermingling of moral and religious ideas has been parallel with the growth of society. One test of the elevation of a religion, in some respects the best test, is the closeness of its alliance with morality. This is equivalent to saying that religion and morality stand hand in hand on the same stratum of civilization; it is in general the highest culture that has the purest religion. The union between the two elements of life is further strengthened by the fact that religion has given powerful sanctions to morality. By a natural process of thought men have always identified their moral conceptions with the will of the deity, and ethical rules have been supported by theories of divine rewards and punishments.

The object of our inquiry is to discover, if possible, the precise relation between the religious and the ethical sides of our nature in order that each may have due recognition and best perform its functions in human development. The necessary harmonious co-operation of the two can be secured only by doing justice to both, by allowing neither to usurp the place of the other.

Our thesis, then, may be expressed as follows: Morality is complementary to religion, or it is the independent establishment of the laws of conduct which help to furnish the content of the undefined religious ideal. Religion, properly speaking, has no thought-content: it is merely a sentiment, an attitude of soul toward an idea, the idea of an extra-human power. The religious sentiment does not know what is the ethical character of its object till it has learned it from human life. Morality is the human reflection of divine goodness, produced by the same human endowments whence springs the sentiment of relation to God. Or, to state the case more fully, the content of the conception of God as the perfect ideal in truth, beauty and goodness, is given by science, aesthetics and ethics. Let us look at certain facts in man's moral-religious history which appear to illustrate one part of this thesis.

First, it may be noted that, in the ancient world, about the same grade of morality, theoretical and practical, was attained by all the great nations. The great teachers in Egypt, China, India, Persia, Palestine and Greece show remarkable unanimity in the rules of conduct which they lay down. The common life of the people was about the same in all lands. Whatever the status, a member of a given class in one country is not to be distinguished on the ethical side from his conferees elsewhere. Judean and Persian prophets, Chinese and Greek sages, when they are called on to act, show the same virtues and the same weaknesses. The higher family life, as far as we can trace it, was the same everywhere.

The moral principles regulating commerce and general social relations were scarcely different throughout the ancient civilized world, if we compare similar periods and circles. David acts toward his enemies very much as does one of the Homeric chieftains or one of the heroes of the Mahabharata. The internal politics and court-life of Judea remind us of the parallel history of China, India and Egypt. The prevarication of Jeremiah and the trickery of Jacob may be compared with the wiles of Odysseus and with double-dealing the world over. Instances of beautiful friendship between men like those of Jonathan and David, and Damon and Pythias are found everywhere. We find charming pictures of home-life in Plato, in Confucius, in the Old Testament.

Social laws were the same throughout the world. Slavery, polygamy and child-slaughter were universal, yet everywhere yielded gradually in part or in whole to the increasing refinement and the increasing recognition of the value of the individual. The position of woman was not materially different in the different peoples. Notwithstanding certain restrictions she played a great role, not only as wife and mother, but also in literature and statesmanship, among Egyptians, Chinese, Hindus, Hebrews, Greeks and Romans.

From this ethical uniformity we must infer that the moral development was independent of the particular form of religion. Under monotheism, dualism and polytheism, whether human or zoomorphic images of the deity were fashioned or no images at all, with varying methods of sacrifice and widely different conceptions of the future life, the moral life of man went its way and was practically the same everywhere.

Another fact of the ancient world is that the ethical life stands in no direct ratio to the religiousness of a people or a circle. While ancient life was in general deeply religious, full of recognition of the deity, there were several great moral movements which were characterized by an almost complete ignoring of the divine element in human thought. These are Confucianism, Buddhism, Stoicism and Epicureanism. Whatever we may think of the philosophic soundness of these systems, it is undisputed that their moral codes were pure and that they exerted a deep and lasting influence on ancient life. They all arose in the midst of polytheistic systems, against which they were a protest, and they attained a moral height and created a type of life to the level of which society has not yet reached. We may set this phenomenon over against the picture of kindness and honesty which sometimes presents itself in savage tribes, every act of whose lives is regulated by religion.

Turning to modern Europe, it is evident that progress in morality has been in proportion to the growth rather of general culture than of religious fervor. If religion alone could have produced morality, the crusades ought to have converted Europe into an ethically pure community; instead of which they often fostered barbarity and vice. The Knights Templars, the guardians of what was esteemed the most sacred spot in the world, came to be, if report does not belie them, shining examples of all the vices. Mediæval Rome was a hotbed of corruption. Protestants and Catholics alike burned heretics.

The English Puritans of the seventeenth century were among the most religious and the most barbarous and unscrupulous of men. In our day the same evil spirit which sometimes disfigures our political assemblies appears sometimes in our religious bodies. Trades and professions are characterized by certain virtues and vices without respect to the religious relations of their members. In a word, religion has, as a rule, not been able to maintain a high moral standard against adverse circumstances and has not exerted its proper influence.

In order to understand the relation between religion and morality we must note their origins. Morality, in the first place, is simply the product of our social relations. It is unnecessary to go into an examination of the origin of man's moral and social nature. Assuming this nature as a generally recognized fact, we may illustrate the growth of moral codes by examining some typical cases of moral rule. The idea of honesty assumes the existence of property, and of property belonging to another. In an unorganized communism or in the case where I alone am owner, there can be no such thing as dishonesty. Thus, in a family, a father cannot be dishonest toward the children absolutely dependent upon him. Further, the idea of property is at first phys-

A dog or a savage has a bone. He thinks of it merely as something good, as the means of supplying a want. Another dog or savage snatches it. What is the feeling of the original possessor? Simply that he has lost a good thing and that he desires to get it back. If he fails to recover it, his judgment of the situation is two-fold; he says to himself that he has suffered loss and that the invader is an enemy of his well-being. In all this there is nothing ethical; but the successful marauder in his turn suffers similar loss and makes similar reflection. When this has happened a number of times the difference between the brute and the man begins to show itself. The former keeps up the struggle from one generation to another without ceasing; the latter reflects on the situation.

The savage after a while acquires permanent property, a bow and arrow, the loss of which involves not merely a momentary but a permanent failure of resources. He perceives that he secures the greatest good for himself by an understanding with his fellows which assures to each the use of his own possessions. As social relations become more numerous the advantage of such an arrangement becomes more and more evident and respect for the property of others becomes an established rule of the community. The moral sentiment now makes its appearance, at first dim and untrustworthy, but gathering strength with every advance in reflection and intelligence, until finally the rule of life is embodied in the law, "Thou shalt not steal."

From this point the progress is steady. With the growing estimate of the worth of the individual, and the increasing dependence of members of the community on one another, the rights of property are more clearly defined, and there is a greater disposition to punish the invasion of these rights. Recognition of property-rights becomes a duty, but always under the condition that gave it birth, namely, the well-being of the community. So soon as it appears that this right stands in the way of general prosperity, it ceases to exist. Society, for example, does not hesitate to seize the property of an enemy in war, or to confiscate the property of its own citizens by fines or taxes. Or, in another direction, we do not hesitate to take what is not our own if we have reason to believe that it will not injure the possessor, and if there is a general presumption of his consent, as when, in passing by a field, we pluck an apple from a tree whose owner is unknown to us.

In the same way the duties of truthfulness and of respect for human life have arisen, and these are limited by the same condition. The right to slay a criminal by legal process, to slay an enemy in war, to slay a midnight burglar or would-be assassin is recognized by all codes as necessary to the existence of society. Men everywhere claim the right to state what is contrary to fact in certain cases, as, to enemies in war, to maniacs, in fiction and in jest. The statement of the novelist that a knight called Ivanhoe followed King Richard to Palestine, the declaration of the poet that the waves ran mountain-high, the assertion of Talleyrand that language is meant to conceal thought, though all contrary to fact, are not injurious, for they deceive nobody, and the obligation of truthfulness results from its bearing on our well-being. Under certain circumstances a man may conceal his opinion without offense to his conscience, namely, when he is convinced that such concealment will work no harm.

But there are two situations in which concealment is violation of truthfulness: when a man from his position is expected to speak and his silence will be misleading, and when, being a public teacher in science, art, or religion, he uses phrases which he knows to be understood by his audience in one sense while he employs them in another sense. There is a still more subtle form of untruthfulness, in which a man deliberately turns his mind away from certain evidence for fear it will change his opinion. This procedure is fatal to the intellect and to the soul; it obscures thought and perverts conscience, and is therefore a wrong to one's self. This is an illustration of how the clearer recognition of the dignity of the individual refines our conceptions of duty.

The same law of growth governs the history of the more general ethical conceptions. Love in its earliest form is nonmoral—it is mere desire or instinct. The affection of the untrained man for his child, or his family, or tribe, is not controlled by considerations of right. It must be ethically ineffective till experience and culture have determined its proper objects. Two conditions must be fulfilled before love can rise to the ethical plane. First, it must be transformed from selfish desire into a single-minded wish to secure the well-being of its object, and then it must know what is well-being. Both these conditions are attained through social intercourse.

The standard of good is determined, as we have seen above, by the observation of what is needed in society for the perfecting of each and all. The devotion to the interest of the individual is likewise a generalization from the facts of experience. The consciousness of one's own personality and its needs leads to the recognition of other personalities and their claims. Thus the best ethical thinkers of the world have in different lands come to the identification of one's self with others as the leading principle of moral life—the golden rule. Only it is to be observed that this rule is valueless unless a moral standard has been previously established. To do to others as I wish them to do to me is morally inefficacious in conduct unless I wish what is right. In a word, love is an impulse without moral content. Its proper objects must be determined in part by ethical experience and its method of procedure must be learned in the same way.

It is no less true that it is from social intercourse that we gain the final and fundamental standard of conduct, the idea of justice. The recognition of individual rights is a product of reflection on social experience out of which two conceptions inevitably flow—namely, the absolute right of the individual to perfection and the absolute right of society to perfection. These two conceptions, which appear on the surface to be mutually antagonistic, are reconciled by the fact that the individual finds his perfection only in society.

A fundamentally wrong theory of life is involved in the statement that the individual surrenders certain rights for the sake of living in society. The proper statement is that he comes to self-consciousness, to individuality, and therefore to rights and perfection only in society. At the same time, the content of justice is determined by social relations. It is only by experience that we can say that we owe just so much to each person. When we have determined this we have determined everything. There is nothing higher than this. Love can do no more than recognize the rights of every being, for to do more would be wrong. Mercy is only a name for a higher sort of justice; it is the recognition of the fact that under the circumstances the delinquent deserves something different from that which rough justice, or what passes for justice, has meted out to him.

Finally a great motive for right living is supplied by experience; namely, the hope of worldly well-being or salvation. Enlightened observation more and more shows that happiness attends virtue. This is not to be set aside as merely refined selfishness. It may take that shape in its cruder forms in what is called the "Poor Richard" system of morality. But it is properly that regard for self-development which all the highest schemes of life recognize as a fundamental and necessary principle. It is contained in the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount and in the ethical systems of Plato, Zeno and Kant, and it is not inconsistent with the purest unselfishness. What is more, from it the mind passes naturally to the broader ideal of the well-being of the world as the aim of life and the basis of happiness.

Turning, now, to religion, we find that it is simply man's recognition of an extra-human power in the world and the conviction that he stands in some relation to that power. It thus introduces us to a new social complex. In morality the parties are man and man: in religion, man and God. In our moral relations with a person or government there are two classes of influence to be considered—the moral power of the personality and the restraining or impelling power of his or its physical control over us. The second of these is what we call sanctions, rewards and punishments. These, again, are of two sorts, internal, or organic, and external, or inorganic, and it is only the first sort that can be called moral.

Thus let us suppose that it is better for a college student, physically and intellectually, not to study after midnight, and that he does stop work at that hour. Whether this is a moral process depends on the consideration which has formed his habit. If he has himself, through observation of his life and that of others, reached the conclusion that late study is injurious, and has therefore avoided it, or if he has on reflection followed the advice of others as probably wise, he has acted as a moral being; but if his conduct has been determined solely by his fear of incurring penalties, or by his hope of securing rewards held out by college rules, it is nonmoral.

In the sphere of religion the two sorts of sanctions are what we call natural and supernatural. The laws of nature may be considered to be the laws of God, and the natural penalties and rewards of life to be divine sanctions. Obedience to these laws is a moral act, because it involves control of self in the interest of organic development. But supernatural sanctions are inorganic and nonmoral, since they do not appeal to a rational self-control. He who is honest merely to escape punishment or receive reward fixed by external law is not honest at all. But he who observes the laws of health or of honesty because he perceives that they are necessary to the well-being of the world is also religious if he recognizes these laws as the ordination of God.

When religious sanctions are spoken of it is commonly the supernatural sort that is meant. It is an interesting question how far the belief in these is now morally effective. That it has at various times been influential cannot be doubted. In the ancient world and in mediæval Europe the deity was believed to intervene supernaturally in this life for the protection of innocence and the punishment of wickedness; but this belief appears to be vanishing and cannot be called an effective moral force at the present day. Men think of reward and punishment as belonging to the future, and this connection is probably of some weight. Yet its practical importance is much diminished by the distance and the dimness of the day of reckoning. The average man has too little imagination to realize the remote future. At the critical moment it is usually passion or the present advantage that controls action.

It is also true that the supernatural side of the belief in future retribution is passing away; it is becoming more and more the conviction of the religious world that the future life must be morally the continuation and consequence of the present. This must be esteemed a great gain—it tends to banish the mechanical and emphasize the ethical element in life and to raise religion to the plane of rationality. Rational religious morality is obedience to the laws of nature as laws of God.

We are thus led to the other side of religion, communion with God, as the effective source of religious influence on conduct. It is this, in the first place, that gives eternal validity to the laws of right. Resting on conscience and the constitution of society, these laws may be in themselves obligatory on the world of men, but they acquire a universal character only when we remember that human nature itself is an effluence of the divine, and that human experience is the divine self-revelation.

Further, the consciousness of the divine presence should be the most potent factor in man's moral life. The thought of the ultimate basis of life, incomprehensible in his essence, yet known through his self-outputting in the world as the ideal of right, as a comrade of man in moral life, should be, if received into the soul as a living, everyday fact, such a purifying and uplifting influence as no merely human relationship has ever engendered.

Religion, then, in itself furnishes us with no rules of conduct; it accepts the rules worked out by human experience. There is no moral precept, high or low, in any ethical manual or sacred book which has not been experienced, discovered, created, tested, approved by man himself, living his life in sympathetic relationship with his fellow creatures. The deepest, the ultimate source of our ethical codes, as actual phenomena, is social unity. It is this that cultivates sympathy, evokes the recognition of the right of the individual man to perfection, defines that perfection and creates the moral ideal. The building up of this unity is the highest moral duty of us all, and offense against it is the blackest sin of which man is capable. He who perpetuates distinction of caste and class, who by any social or religious code rears artificial barriers between man and man, and thus hinders the free interplay of social forces and the free communion and co-operation of individual men, commits a crime of far deeper import than the ordinary offenses which excite our indignation.

Here we see the moral function of love. It has no code, but it is an impulse which tends to foster unity. Nowhere is this fact more clearly recognized than in the Sermon on the Mount, which denounces all selfish antagonism and involves, though it does not explicitly state, the conception of social unity as the basis of moral life.

It involves a grave misapprehension of the subject to charge religion with the crimes which have been committed in its name. These crimes are the result of moral ignorance and weakness. Religion, the sentiment of relation to the extra human power, has no ethical code, but, like art and philosophy, adopts the code that it finds in the social organism of its time. It is not to be held responsible for what belongs to a different sphere. It is not a law-giver, but an inspirer; does not tell man what to do, but encourages him to do what he thinks to be right.

Religion, accepting the ethical code established by man, identifies it with the will and nature of Deity, a procedure to which no exception can be taken. The impetus which thus comes to the moral life is obvious. There is the enthusiasm which springs from the consciousness of being a part of a vast scheme, buoyancy given by hopefulness or certainty of final victory, and the exaltation of loyalty to a great aim and a transcendent person.

The true power of religion lies in the contact between the divine soul and the soul of man. It must be admitted that to attain this is no easy thing. To feel the reality of a divine personality in the universe, to value this personality as the ideal of justice and love, to keep the image of it fresh and living in the mind day by day in the midst of the throng of petty and serious cares of life, demands an imaginative power and a force of will rarely found among men. It is in this power that the great creative religious minds have excelled. The mass of religious people are controlled by lower considerations and never reach the plane of pure religious feeling. Most men look to God as their helper in physical things or as an outside law-giver rather than as their comrade in moral struggle.

Thus, religion has not come to its rights in the world; it still occupies, as a rule, the low plane of early, nonmoral thought; but is there any reason why it should continue in this nascent shape? Is there anything to prevent our living in moral contact with the soul of the world, and thence deriving the inspiration and strength we need? What has been done by some may be done in a measure by all. Inadequate conceptions of God and of the moral life must be swept away, the free activity of the human soul must be recognized and relied on, the habit of contemplation of the ideal must be cultivated; we must feel ourselves to be literally and truly co-workers with God. In the presence of such a communion would not moral evil be powerless over man?

Finally, we here have a conception of religion in which almost all, perhaps all, the systems of the world may agree. It is our hope of unity.

THE best way to become an orator is to have something to say and then say it.

A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

A FEW years ago, there lived a famous woman. A little boy sent her twenty-five cents and asked her for all of her books. He was too young to know their value. She wrote him that twenty-five cents would not begin to pay for all her books, but that she would make him a present of one of them and so she sent him "Little Men," and returned his twenty-five cents, wishing that she might gratify him to the full extent of his request. As she lay sick week after week before she died she made little garments for babies belonging to poor people who could not half take care of their children, and the last work she did was on a tiny night-robe which she could not finish. There it is with one sleeve left out. And her hands are folded across her peaceful breast in eternal sleep. There stands a peach basket covered with pink, curly tissue paper. It is full of papers and it is pretty and useful. She did that too. And she wrote on a sheet of paper "Little Women," "Little Women," over and over, all down the paper, so that it could be cut in strips; for hundreds of children wanted her autograph, or some least word from her own pen. Such simple things were the works of a famous writer who loved to be plain and commonplace because she lived in The World Beautiful. —Exchange.

PUT something by every week, in some shape or other, for a rainy day. Can a young man with only a dollar a day do it? Yes, and he can increase the pile as his income and years grow. He can do it from the very start. This is a world of many splendid opportunities. We want you all to know that with religion and common sense (keep them together) the problem can be worked out comfortably.

HOW THE LEAVES CAME DOWN.

I'll tell you how the leaves came down.

The great Tree to his children :

"You're getting sleepy, Yellow and Brown,

Yes, very sleepy, little Red ;

It is quite time you went to bed."

"Ah!" begged each silly, pouting leaf,

"Let us a little longer stay ;

Dear Father Tree, behold our grief ;

'Tis such a very pleasant day,

We do not want to go away."

So just for one more merry day

To the great Tree the leaflets clung,

Frolicked and danced and had their way,

Upon the autumn breezes swung,

Whispering all their sports among.

"Perhaps the great Tree will forget,

And let us stay until the spring,

If we all beg and coax and fret."

But the great Tree did no such thing :

He smiled to hear their whispering.

"Come, children, all to bed," he cried ;

And ere the leaves could urge their prayer,

He shook his head, and far and wide,

Fluttering and rustling everywhere,

Down sped the leaflets through the air.

I saw them : on the ground they lay,

Golden and red, a huddled swarm,

Waiting till one from far away,

White bed-clothes heaped upon her arm,

Should come to wrap them safe and warm.

The great bare Tree looked down and smiled.

"Good-night, dear little leaves," he said ;

And from below each sleepy child

Replied, "Good-night," and murmured,

"It is so nice to go to bed."

FABLES.

III.—Caged Birds.

The happy-family cage in a certain bird-store was not a very happy place on account of a blue jay who had been making a fuss generally among the others. He picked particularly at a little wren, whose meek and gentle behavior under oppression only excited him to more cruelty, till the owner removed the quarrelsome fellow, who, when he found himself in another cage, suddenly came to the conclusion that the little wren was his true heart's mate; and all day long he beat his head against the bars, sighing of his love and lamenting his fate. Nor was the little wren happy. She sat dejectedly in a corner, letting herself be made very miserable by her gay lover's woe-be-gone accents.

When the owner of the store came and found the blue jay lying panting on the bottom of his cage, sighing that his soul would leave his body if he were kept away from her whom he loved, he opened the cage door and let the blue jay out. Off he flew, out of the window, across the city roofs, across fields of sweet potatoes and of pinders to his own native wood and a certain sweet gum tree, never looking once toward the little wren, never giving her one thought. And was he to blame that in the sweetness of his liberty he followed his purer, truer instincts to his really own? Or was he to blame that in the unnatural atmosphere of the bird-store he made a mistake which nearly cost him his life, and which made others too very wretched? A designing spider whose web was made up of the threads of scandal he spun would have it so, and the tainted odor of the thing he made attracted many insects for him to feed upon.

But over the heart of the keeper came a wave of justice and he opened the cage door to the little wren and she, too, flew away. Not the faintest shadow of the memory of the bluejay crossed her mind as she nestled into the heart of a pomegranate tree in a neighboring garden.

Life in the bird-store was but as a horrid dream to the wren and the jay, now so far away from each other, and so happy in the separation. But to others it was still an oppressive reality, yet all they knew of life, for they were society born and bred, and this was society!

AN extravagant man is always talking to his wife about the necessity of economy.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE tells a curious story of Tennyson's appointment to the laureateship. The honor was first offered to Samuel Rogers by Prince Albert, and the banker-poet in declining it because of age recommended Tennyson for the place. The Prime Minister wrote in reply: "We are not acquainted with the works of this gentleman, and will you be good enough to let me know whether he has ever written anything which would make it improper for a woman to name him for this post?" Mr. Hale says that this story is as true as it is funny, for he saw the original correspondence with his own eyes. —Exchange.

Picture: The Good Samaritan. By J. J. Henner.

Our picture does not quite tell its own story. We see a young man whose relaxed muscles and parted lips show that he is badly hurt and probably at the point of death. We might guess perhaps that his condition was not due to accident or disease, since on neither hypothesis could his nakedness be satisfactorily accounted for. An old man whose face, hidden though it is, makes upon us the impression of anxious kindness, is holding his hand over the young man's heart to see whether it still beats. But who these persons are and what is the story of which this scene is clearly only an episode, we must read the parable to discover.

From the story, then, as Jesus told it, we learn that the scene of the picture is on the mountain road leading from Jerusalem down to Jericho, about twenty miles distant. The accounts of travelers assure us that the painter has not exaggerated the desolateness of the way: one describes it as "leading through a wild and dreadful solitude, a veritable rocky pass, with rocky walls right and left and rough stones scattered confusedly under foot;" and it is said (though on doubtful authority) that it was known as the Way of Blood, because frequented by highwaymen. This young man, then, must have been set upon by some of these robbers, who, after stealing all that he had, have left him naked and half dead by the roadside. The parable tells us further that while he lay there helpless and dying, three men saw him, only one of whom had humanity enough to give him assistance. The first of the three was a priest, a man whose sole business in life was to conduct the worship of God in the temple at Jerusalem; but this cannot be the priest, for the parable says that so far from helping the sufferer he actually crossed to the other side of the road and hurried by. Perhaps he thought the man was dead, and in that case to touch him would be to spoil his priestly purity and incur ceremonial defilement. The next to come along was a Levite, also a holy man and employed in the service of the temple, although in a subordinate position. All priests were Levites, but only one family of the Levites could be priests. But the Levite had too much to do in the service of God to turn aside for the service of man, and he was so busy caring for the temple of God in Jerusalem that he could give no heed to the temple of God in man. So he also, like the priest before him, passed by on the other side. Then a Samaritan approached, but there are many reasons why we should not expect him to stop and look after the dying man. He was a Samaritan and the victim of the robbery was probably a Jew, and "Jews had no dealings with Samaritans." There was bitter race-hatred between the two. If the priest and the Levite had met the Samaritan they would have scorned him as a heretic who did not know how to worship God aright; and the young man, had he been well and traveling with them, might have echoed the taunts with contemptuous railings, which the Samaritan would have returned with defiance. It would have been no more than would have been expected, then, if the Samaritan, seeing the helpless and possibly murdered Jew, had said with a grim smile: "Let his own people care for him; why should a 'dog of a Samaritan' look after a Jew?" Besides he was on a business trip and had valuables with him. The priest and the Levite were tolerably safe on the road, for they were not supposed to have much money with them and were respected as holy men of God besides; but this was a man whom it would be worth while to waylay, and he was a Samaritan, too. Quite the most prudent course therefore would have been for him to put spurs to his beast and get out of the dangerous locality with all speed, since this might possibly be a decoy, and at any rate the band could not be very far off, perhaps were even lurking close by waiting for a second victim. Moreover if he, a Samaritan, were found near a wounded Jew he might incur the suspicion of having been the assailant. Considerations of race prejudice and personal safety combined to urge him on; nevertheless, "moved with compassion," he bound up his wounds, using the best and most expensive healing lotion known in those days, and, supporting him on the beast while he walked alongside, brought him to a neighboring inn,—whose ruins may still be seen, it is said, on the Bloody Way,—and there stayed with him over night. In the morning, unable to delay his journey any longer, he left with the landlord a sum equivalent to two days' wages of an ordinary laborer, ordering him not to stint his care or look to the wounded man for recompense, but to spend all that was needful, and—"when I come again I will repay thee." So runs the story which interprets our picture, and now let us see why Jesus told it.

What was the intent of this parable?—It was spoken to teach a questioning scribe that obligation to love and helpfulness could not be defined by lines of race.

The occasion of the parable was this: A man learned in the law asked Jesus what he must do to inherit eternal life, that is, to have a place in the kingdom of the Messiah, which, as he believed, was soon to appear on the earth. The question was not an unusual one, and the "lawyer" doubtless supposed that Jesus would bring forth some new wire-drawn refinement or infinitesimal scruple which he would command him to observe. Instead of that, however, Jesus referred him directly to the law, and, accepting his own broad comprehensive summary of it in the two requirements of love to God and love to man, bade him obey these two commands if he would be saved. Then the lawyer, determined to prove that his question was less simple than it had been made to appear, asked, Who is my neighbor? In reply Jesus told him the story we have just related, and at the close asked him which of them—priest, Levite, or Samaritan—proved himself neighbor to the unfortunate man. It was a hard question for one to answer who believed religiously that no good thing could come out of Samaria, and to avoid pronouncing the hated name, he answered: He that showed mercy on him. Thus Jesus had made him confess that a Samaritan was neighbor to a Jew. Hence to love one's neighbor meant more than to love your fellow-Jews, for neighbors included Samaritans also.

How did this teaching agree with Jewish ideas?—It was in harmony with some of the noblest prophetic utterances, but it was in opposition to Jewish belief and practice at the time of Jesus.

It is remarkable that the high-water mark of Jewish thought prior to Jesus and Paul was reached in the eighth century B. C. by the very first of the writing prophets, Amos. To him Yahwe was god of the whole earth and not of Israel alone; he had brought the Jews out of Egypt, but he had also led the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir. But to this magnificent universalism popular Jewish thought never attained, and when Jesus lived it is probable that no ordinary Jew would have supposed, even for an instant, that a Samaritan was his neighbor whom he must love even as he loved himself. Then, under the influence of legalism, a neighbor was interpreted to mean only a member of the Hebrew race and commonwealth." In this as in other respects Jesus was one of the prophets opposing Phariseism as his predecessors had opposed sacerdotalism. He widened the term neighbor, and with it the whole conception of Law and of Israel's relation to God, by including under it Samaritans as well as Jews. Such teaching gave a death-blow to national and religious Particularism.

It has been questioned whether Jesus can have taught as he is here reported. Judging from other passages in the Gospels we should conclude that Jesus felt toward the Samaritans about as the rest of his nation did, and this story occurs in a section peculiar to Luke and containing an account of a Samaritan missionary tour which is almost certainly not authentic. It may be taken for granted that Jesus had no such large views of humanity and its teaching as Paul afterward preached, for Jesus was not a philosophic thinker. It is not apparent, either, that he had any enthusiasm for Humanity, in the present use of that phrase,—the idea of Humanity as an entity was quite beyond him,—but his practical sympathies were unbounded. He may have told his disciples not to enter into any city of the Samaritans, and still have been touched and taught by the story of the Good Samaritan, which he may have heard from some one else. In real life we may be perfectly sure that Jesus would have helped a Samaritan in need, and rejoiced over a Samaritan's act of kindness. Moreover, the story is put at a comparatively late period in his life, when his sympathies may have been broader than they were at first. At any rate, whether Jesus spoke this parable or not, and probably he did, it represents the thought of Christianity, if not of Christ, and its idea is the idea which afterward governed the church.

What is the implication of the parable?—The true worship of God is shown in the service of man.

It has been well said that in this parable is taught "the sanctity of charity." The priest and the Levite were holy men by profession, the Samaritan was holy by character and kindness, but no one who heard the story can have doubted which holiness Jesus preferred. To the lawyer he said, "Go and do thou likewise." This is in keeping with Jesus' invariable habit of laying all stress upon the simple, honest virtues and ignoring completely the concerns of greatest moment to the Pharisees. In this, too, Jesus deserted his age for the age of the prophets. In protest against sacrifice and ritual the prophets had taught that God cares supremely only for justice and mercy and truth, and Jesus repeats the same declaration in an age of narrowing casuistry. It is so hard for us to realize the world in which Jesus lived that we fail to understand how revolutionary his teaching was. No more daring radical ever breathed than this carpenter of Nazareth. To tell men that what God required of them was conduct like that of the Samaritan was strange doctrine then, and in some quarters it is heresy now. Here, if ever, in reply to a direct question, was the occasion for Jesus to set forth explicitly his scheme of salvation, if he had one. Was his answer like the one that would be given in a revival meeting to-day? Did he say anything about belief in himself, in the Trinity or the atonement? In place of that, he tells the story of one man who helped another in distress and urges his questioner to follow the example. The true worshiper of God and lover of men was the Samaritan who showed mercy.

What brought Jesus into disfavor with the people, particularly with the Pharisees?—His opposition to their race prejudice and ethical, social and religious convictions.

We have followed Jesus through the periods of obscurity and popular favor, we are very soon to follow him into the cloud of opposition and ultimate murder. Therefore we have to consider in a few lessons what that teaching was which finally brought Jesus to the cross. This parable shows two reasons why his own people grew to hate him. The first was his direct condemnation of race prejudice. The Jews hated the godless Samaritans. Jesus showed a typical Jew that a Samaritan knew who his neighbor was far better than he did, and actually held up a Samaritan as a model for a Jew. Lines of race were no longer to separate those whom human feeling united. Human feeling makes the neighbor; all who suffer as we suffer, and may be succored as we in their place would like to be helped, are neighbors in the meaning of the commandment. It filled a Jew with wrath to be told that God required him to love a Samaritan as himself. Then again, Jesus offended the religious convictions of his epoch. He taught that goodness was the principal thing, not fussy piety; and that was unbearable, for it is often much easier to be pious than to be good, to tithe worthless garden-herbs than to tell the truth. When we see how such simple preaching is received nowadays even by the church which worships Jesus as very God we cannot be surprised that it was distasteful eighteen centuries ago. Even yet what is called mere morality is deemed inimical to religion.

Questions.

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE PICTURE.—What should you guess about the picture if you had not the story upon which it is based? Was the painter at fault in leaving a cloth spread over the rock? Does the Samaritan seem to have any fear for his own safety?

THE PARABLE.—Put yourself in the priest's place, and see what excuse he may have had for not stopping. Did his religious character make it easier for him to stop or to pass by? What does that show, then, about the value of his religion? Can you find any excuse for the Levite? If you had been the Samaritan, would you have had any excuse for going by?

THE IDEA OF NEIGHBOR.—How do you suppose the lawyer would have answered his own question? How would the priest, the Levite, the Samaritan, have answered it? Do you suppose that the man who was robbed would have answered it in the same way before and after his misfortune? Do we always know who our neighbors are? (The question is meant to be ambiguous.)

THE PRIEST AND THE SAMARITAN.—What would the priest have said if he had seen the Samaritan taking care of the wounded Jew? Is there any hint in the parable that he was a Jew? Why have we assumed that he was? Which of the three proved himself a true worshiper of God?

CAUSES OF OPPOSITION.—What does this parable teach about the reasons why Jesus came to be disliked? What other men can you think of who dared to defy race prejudice and deny current religious convictions? Have they suffered as Jesus did?

THE PACIFIC UNITARIAN for October, in noticing Rev. A. W. Gould's book on "Beginnings," published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, concludes as follows:

After a preliminary chapter on Legend and Myth, it proceeds to consider the beginnings of the world, of man, of arts, of language, of laws, of the thought of God, of priests and of temples, presenting first the earlier conceptions as embodied in legend and myth, and then giving the latest deductions of science and scholarship on the same themes.

It is exceedingly well done, and in the hands of a capable teacher cannot fail to arouse interest and ground the pupil in an orderly and intelligent conception of both primitive thought and present conclusions.

To old members or new friends of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, the society desires to make the following offer: To members renewing their annual subscription of one dollar or to new subscribers, the society will send a copy of this new publication when requested.

This book has already met a larger need than simply the Sunday-school work for which it was planned, as it has been adopted in a "Religious and Moral Study Class" of adults in a neighboring city to the satisfaction of those who have examined it. A teacher in an Ethical Culture Society in Chicago has also adopted it for a text book in her class.

The society has incurred considerable expense in publishing the work, and those who feel like helping it with their annual subscriptions can thus receive a valuable return in addition to the satisfaction of having promoted a worthy cause.

Friend: Is your subscription paid in advance? If not, won't you assist UNITY by now sending in your renewal?

The Study Table

BEGINNINGS.

ACCORDING TO THE LEGENDS AND ACCORDING TO THE TRUER STORY. First year in a Six Years' Study of Religion. Unity Sunday School Lessons, No. XXIII. By Allen Walton Gould. Chicago: Western Unitarian Society. Paper, 12mo, pp. 150. 25 cents.

Mr. Gould has prepared an admirable manual of 150 pages for the first year of the "Six Years' Study of Religion." It is entitled "Beginnings," and is a careful, systematic presentation, in a manner as simple as the subject will allow, of what myth and legend on the one hand, and science on the other, have to tell us of the beginning of the world, of man, of communities, languages, laws, arts, and various religious institutions and ideas. The division is into twenty-two general topics, some of which will naturally occupy a Sunday school more than one Sunday. Such fullness of statement has been aimed at as to preclude the necessity of extended reference to other books in the study of the lessons, though each is followed by a list of the sources of information. This is a good feature, for in preparation for a "recitation" occupying an hour once a week, where the discipline is necessarily weak and the requirements lax, children will not generally search authorities. But the school that takes in and digests what there is in this book in a year will really have accomplished something considerable.

The question suggests itself whether the Six Years' Course might not be more advantageously accomplished by commencing with what is arranged for the fourth year (the study of Christianity), and so coming later to these far-off, more or less vague and indeterminate questions of "The Beginnings." Would not a rational interpretation of the New Testament story and a knowledge of the historical development of the Church be for the child the natural stepping-stone to these more erudite matters of the Origins? N. M. M.

JOSEPH ZALMONAH. By Edward King. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Paper, 12mo., pp. 365. 50 cents.—We have in this volume of 365 pages a tale of suffering and of resistance to wrong, though not the resistance of anarchy, that seems too awful for credence; and yet who shall say, from what is already known of "sweat shops" and "sweaters," that the picture is overdrawn? The scene is laid among the Jewish refugees from Poland and Russia, and depicts with startling realism the struggles of the poor exiles against starvation, presenting a view of the avarice of contractors and of their employers, the large manufacturing firms or merchant princes, that brings the bush of shame at the thought that such things can be in our "free America." Joseph Zalmonah, himself a refugee, as here portrayed, is "a hero," but not one of the ordinary type; his heroism is marked by self-denials almost to death, and his struggles are not for self, but for the sweater's victims. The author has a vigorous pen, and shows a familiarity with Jewish customs and the strange ways (strange to us) of the down-trodden people of Israel who, by the oppressive edicts of the Czar, have been driven into an exile where deepest poverty is their companion. The book is well worth reading, for it presents in vivid colors the sight that our own eyes may see if we will but visit for ourselves the homes, if we may call them such, of the thousands of toilers whose music is but the "click" of the sewing machine and whose life is but a living death. THE MAGAZINES.

IN LEND A HAND for September there is a greater variety than in the numbers immediately preceding. Mr. Arthur Macdonald's "Fundamental Principles of Criminology" is of interest to a much wider circle than its title would indicate; the extracts from Mr. Wood's report of Andover House is instructive and encouraging; and we have no doubt that the article entitled "Why Help People Who Have Failed?" is good reading for those who are disposed to put this query, but, not being of the number, we confess that we have not read it.

THE TRUTH SEEKER for Oct. 7 contains an able sermon by Dr. M. W. Chunn, on Agnosticism in Unitarian pulpits, written in response to a recent editorial in The Christian Register, upon which sermon the editor comments with unwonted temperance and agnosticism.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY for October 12 contains two earnest essays to meet the money problem,—one by Mr. C. F. Keller and the other by Mr. Mr. W. E. Brokaw,—both of them having value, but both, we fear, leaving out of consideration some of the necessary conditions.

Notes from the Field

St. Louis, Mo.—THE SELF-CULTURE CLUBS OF ST. LOUIS have entered upon their seventh year this fall.

A course of ten lectures on English history, from the earliest times to the present, will be given by Mr. Plank. The course will be illustrated by stereopticon views of some of the leading events and characters of English history. They will be given at the North Side Club on Friday evening, and at the South Side Club on Thursday evening.

Before the Young Women's Self-Culture Club, at 1730 Wash street, Mr. W. L. Sheldon will give a course of seven lectures on "The Story of Italian Paintings, Told in Biography, with Stereopticon Illustrations from the Works of the Great Italian Masters." These lectures will be given fortnightly. On the alternate evenings two lectures will be given on Italian history, by Mr. Plank, and two on Italian literature, by Mrs. E. D. Lee. The members of the club will give an entertainment once a month. The subjects will be the literature of and relating to Venice, Florence, and Rome, respectively. These entertainments will be given entirely by the members of the club, and will consist of essays, readings, recitations, and music. A class for the study of English literature will meet every Tuesday evening. They will study English literature from its origin, tracing its development to the present time.

The Young Women's South Side Club will devote its season's lecture course to American history and literature. Mr. N. O. Nelson will give a course of seven lectures on American history, from the period of discovery to the present time. These will be given every other week. The alternate evenings will be devoted to American literature. "American Novelists" will be the subject of an entertainment by Miss Laura E. Toms, and "American Humorists" of an evening's lecture by Rev. John Snyder. Four entertainments will be given by the club: The subject of the first, "Colonial Literature;" of the second, "Literature of the Revolution;" and of the third, "Contemporary Literature." A fourth will be a dramatic representation of "The Courtship of Miles Standish." A class for the study of elocution will meet on Monday evening, with Miss Sarah L. Tower as instructor. A literary and musical class will meet on Wednesday evening under the leadership of Miss Bella G. Waters.

The opening lectures of these courses were given under very favorable circumstances. The lecture hall was crowded each night, and the listeners manifested great interest.

There is a small membership fee for each club, but the lectures and meetings are open, without charge, to all wage-earners. E. N. P.

Minnesota State Conference met at Duluth on October 17, 18 and 19. The Conference really began Sunday evening with the dedication of the Duluth church, which has been removed to a more central location and tastefully renovated during the past summer. Mr. Crothers, Mr. Forbush and Rev. C. C. Salter, a Congregationalist of the city, joined with the minister and the people in the service. The society seem prosperous and harmonious, and well pleased with their admirable young minister, Mr. Southworth.

The first regular session of the Conference was on Tuesday evening, when Mr. Gould, Mr. Davis of Winona, and Mr. Crothers spoke at a platform meeting on "The Forward Movement in Religion." Wednesday morning, after an uplifting devotional meeting, led by Mr. Staples, of St. Cloud, the reports from the various churches were presented and proved very encouraging upon the whole, though a few of the churches were temporarily closed on account of the hard times. Nearly all of the ministers had been doing missionary work, and found in most places that the people were very eager for a larger faith. Miss Putnam gave a brief account of her itinerant ministry in North Dakota, unconsciously revealing how close she came to the hearts of the people. One of her posts—Detroit, Minn.—has so far organized as to give her a call for regular services, which she will begin after the first of January. Mr. Forbush reported the sad death of Mr. Petersen, of Winnipeg, and the Conference voted to send a letter of sympathy to Mrs. Petersen.

Wednesday afternoon there was an interesting discussion of "The Relation of the Church to Its Young People," followed by a close and attractive presentation of Spencer's ethics, by Mr. Hopkins, of Duluth, which called out a lively debate among the ministers. After a social meal in the church dining rooms, Rev. Axel Lundeberg, of Minneapolis, was ordained, at the request of the Swedish Church over which he presides in that city. Mr. Forbush preached the sermon, Mr. Gould gave the charge, and Mr. Davis the right hand of fellowship. Thursday morning there was an informal ministers' meeting at which a bright paper was given on "The Minister in His Study," by Mr. Ballou, of Fargo. The final paper of the conference was by Miss Putnam, on "The World's Parliament," catching the spirit of that historic occasion admirably. The officers for the coming year are: President, Rev. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul; Vice President, Rev. F. C. Davis, of Winona; Secretary, Rev. H. G. Putnam, of Fargo; Treasurer, Mr. Chapin, of St. Paul.

Duluth, Minn.—Sunday evening, October 15, the dedication service of the First Unitarian Church of Duluth was held, an occasion which may be considered the second milestone marking the progress of this sturdy young society, the first being the settlement, about a year ago, of a permanent pastor, Rev. F. C. Southworth, who has recently added to his own effectiveness and that of the society by taking to his new home a helpmate and home-maker. The dedication sermon was preached by Rev. S. M. Crothers, the dedicatory prayer offered by Rev. C. C. Salter, and an address made by Rev. T. B. Forbush. The "Dedication by the People" appeared to your reporter so admirably arranged that he has ventured to set it forth in full for UNITY's readers. It was as follows:

DEDICATION BY THE PEOPLE.

Minister: With gratitude for the blessings which have been given us, and with hearts made joyful by the ever enlarging opportunities for the worship of God and the service of man, we have gathered here to consecrate this building.

People: "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go up into the house of the Lord. Enter his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise."

Minister: To the earnest seeking for the highest and communion with the best, to the belief that right and truth will triumph, however lowly may be their guise, we, the people who worship here, do dedicate this church.

People: "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness."

Minister: To the recognition of unchanging laws in the universe, to the free investigation of these in nature and in man, to a reverent, unfettered and impartial search for truth, we dedicate this church.

People: "And the spirit of truth shall guide you into all truth. And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Minister: To the recognition of a law in ourselves which speaks with a commanding voice, and to a willing obedience to the dictates of conscience as to the command of God, we dedicate this church.

People: "Righteousness and judgment are the foundation of his throne."

Minister: To that charity which suffereth long and is kind, to a love for humanity which shall lift up the fallen and speak words of comfort to the distressed, we dedicate this church.

People: "Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love."

Minister: To the recognition that our neighbor's life is our life, that service is the true watchword of the age, and that helpfulness and brotherly kindness are better than devotion to self, we dedicate this church.

People: "For the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

Minister: To the open-eyed faith which sees in man and nature the working of an unseen power and the revelation of an infinite love, to the reverent worship of the All-true and to the humble service of the All-good, we dedicate this church.

People: "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

Tacoma.—We are glad to hear that notwithstanding the pinch of hard times which caught our fellow-workers in the Free Church with peculiar severity, it was never so alive, alert and enthusiastic as it is to-day. Its very adversities serve as incentive to sustain an interest in its activities, which grow in number and in patronage from month to month. This church has a cause to represent which gives its life a value far beyond the reach of Tacoma. With others it is called upon to prove the vitality of the ethical basis, and to show that there is a place for a church outside the outermost ring of a denominational name, even though the name be that of Unitarian, which is worn by so many who are trying to make the word synonymous with the freest Free church possible.

Seattle, Wash.—On the evening of Friday, Oct. 6, the semi-annual meeting of the Unitarian Society of this city was held,—and proved a very interesting and instructive occasion. A delightful feature of the evening was a fine musical program, ending with the reading of Sir John Bowring's "Erl King," which was followed by Schubert's musical rendition of the same poem. The proposition was made to change the name (without in any way altering the methods) of the Young People's Fraternity to the Unity Club, and allusion was made to the gratification felt by the parish at the approaching marriage of Rev. Walter G. Eliot, Jr., their pastor. In the course of his address Mr. Joseph Shippen, the president, happily expressed the aims of the progressive church as follows: First, to show religion to be reasonable. Secondly, to increase spiritual life in the community. Thirdly, to uplift humanity and prompt social progress. "We accept," said he, "the trenchant sentence of Charles Kingsley—'God's kingdom is not a kingdom of fanatics, yelling for a doctrine, but of willing, loving, obedient hearts.' On these lines we believe in the progressive church of the future."

The Fall Conference of the New Hampshire Unitarian Association was held at Manchester, N. H., Oct. 10 and 11. A very interesting feature of the meeting was the address by Rev. E. L. Rexford, of Boston, on "The Relation Between the Unitarian and the Universalist Churches: What They Have Been and What They Ought to Be." The address was a strong plea for closer union between the Unitarian and Universalist wings of the Liberal Church of America. Dr. Rexford expressed his sincere pleasure in responding to the invitation to address the conference on the topic assigned to him, showing, as it did, that the desire for union and co-operation was not all from one side, as some would have us believe. The address was followed by a general discussion of the subject, led by Rev. C. B. Elder, of Keene, N. H.

Superior, Minn.—An evening meeting was held in the beautiful little church here Thursday, Oct. 19, at which Miss Putnam gave an address on "The World's Parliament." Mr. Gould on "The Future of Religion," and Mr. Staples on "Conscious and Unconscious Religion." The church is temporarily without a minister, but its life is still vigorous. A large and sympathetic audience gathered at the evening meeting, and lay services are kept up, assisted by an occasional visit from Mr. Southworth, of Duluth, or Mr. Crothers, of St. Paul.

Peabody, Mass.—At the seventy-third session of the ESSEX CONFERENCE, held at Peabody, Mass., Oct. 19th, the following resolution was introduced by the President, Hon. E. P. Dodge, and unanimously adopted by a rising vote, at the close of an exceptionally interesting address by Dr. E. L. Rexford upon "The Relations of Unitarians and Universalists:"

Resolved, That the Essex Conference of Unitarian churches is heartily in favor of the union of all denominations who hold what is termed a liberal faith, and is ready to co-operate in a practical way to accomplish a purpose so fully in accordance with the clearly defined tendency of the religious thought of the present time.

Winona, Minn.—The financial depression has not been felt seriously at Winona, both the income and the membership having increased the last year. A Unity Guild has been organized and is doing practical missionary work as well as discussing social questions. A unique feature of the Sunday services is a series of lectures by laymen of all denominations, given immediately after the close of the morning services.

St. Anthony Park, Minn.—The people here have temporarily suspended their regular Sunday services, but they are keeping up all their other church work, and have one of the best Sunday schools in the State. And their pulpit is filled quite frequently from St. Paul or Minneapolis.

THE BROOKLYN ETHICAL ASSOCIATION has just arranged with Charles H. Kerr & Company for the publication of its lectures for the ensuing year. The new course will be on the subject "Life and the Conditions of Survival: the Physical Basis of Ethics, Sociology and Religion." The successive lectures will be published in Charles H. Kerr & Company's new magazine, New Occasions, beginning with the December number. The November number now just issued closes the first volume. With the second volume the size of page will be slightly changed and the number of pages increased to sixty-four, the subscription price remaining at $1. A few sets of the first six numbers are still on hand and will be furnished to new subscribers who wish to obtain the magazine from the start. Its editor, Mr. Underwood, will be remembered as the editor for many years of the Boston Index and of the Open Court during its first year. Single copies, 10 cents. Address Charles H. Kerr & Company, 175 Monroe street, Chicago.

| V. SOKRATES. | VI. JESUS. | VII. MOHAMMED. | |

These sermons, dedicated to the Parliament of Religions and published through the energy of his parish, have already given the author, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, a wide hearing in that Parliament. Several thousand copies of these sermons were sold during the sessions of the Parliament at the Art Institute. Besides the sermon thought, these little books give in a small space a comprehensive idea of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

MR. H. DEARMAPALA, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes to the committee in reference to the Buddha sermon: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'D ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB, Editor of the Moslem World, published in New York, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia, and I assure you I am greatly pleased at the manner in which you have treated the subject. It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. I can plainly see how your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain toward Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth. * * * I will be very glad to have some of these lectures to sell, and will place it on our book list."

*"No great deed is done
 By falterers who ask for certainty.
 No good is certain, but the steadfast mind,
 The undivided will to seek the good;
 'Tis that compels the elements, and wrings
 A human music from the indifferent air.
 The greatest gift the hero leaves his race
 Is to have been a hero."*
 —George Elliot.

OUR esteemed brother, the editor of the Christian Register, seems to have become so elated in consequence of America's victory over England in the recent yacht race that he was unable to distinguish between the hull and the stern of the victorious "Vigilant." It is to be hoped for our E. C.'s equanimity that these races will not be held oftener than once a year.

WE call attention to the selected article entitled "A Remedy for Mob Violence." Something should certainly be done to check these horrible and disgraceful outrages on order, justice, and humanity; and the method here proposed is one which may prove effective when others fail.

THE "Addresses" of Prince Wolkonsky, for which there were so many applications that the edition was soon exhausted, are being reprinted. His recent lecture, entitled "Impressions," has also been put in print. Friends of UNITY who desire either of these books may obtain it through this office. Price, fifty cents each.

HOWEVER the yacht race may have affected him, it must be admitted that the Christian Register's editor had his wits about him when he prepared his lines of greeting to the foreign guests of the Boston Unitarian Club. We quote one of the stanzas addressed to Mozoomdar, which is both wise and witty:

Sweet heathen of another race.
 Our fathers damned thy sires:
 A gentler flood of Christian grace
 Has quenched those hellish fires.
 Too good to damn, but not to burn
 With Pentecostal flame,
 No more thy message we shall spurn,
 But kindle at thy name.

WE are sorry to have to announce that the thing against which we have several times warned our patrons has happened. It has now become evident from the letters we have since received that quite an amount of money sent us during the month of September and early in October has gone astray—has been lost or stolen. Where care was taken to send by money orders or checks payable to our order, the senders have of course lost nothing; but where they have disregarded our warnings and sent bills and postal notes, they have suffered loss as well as we. In order that we may obtain as accurate a knowledge as possible of the extent of this evil we earnestly request all our subscribers to send us word at once if (by change of date on the address slips or in some other form) we have not acknowledged money sent us.

LUCY STONE, another of the brave band that struggled for the freedom of the slave and continued the struggle for freedom in contending for the rights of woman, is gone. Gentle, but stalwart; quiet, but irrepresible; a soldier spirit in feminine form; a valiant champion of unpopular truths. It cannot be that she has left no successor. We would despair of the world were we persuaded that such spirit as was hers is dying out in the world. Certainly they are not of her household who think, but dare not say; who feel, but do not confess it; who believe, but are waiting for an opportune time in which to confess the belief.

THE UNITARIAN for October is largely given to the Parliament of Religions. Aside from this perhaps the most interesting article is an account of the "Labor Church," started at Manchester, England. While we feel the most hearty sympathy with the admirable work of this organization, we cannot but regret that the religious reforms of our day show such a tendency to adopt exclusive names and to start a new church all by themselves. The Labor Church, the Church of Our Father, etc., have substantially the same aim, and are practically identical with that of many Unitarian, Universalist and other liberal churches; yet each starts a propaganda of its own, seeking to rally all under its particular name; a name which not infrequently, as in the case of the "Labor" Church, savors strongly of sectarianism and particularism. We should never allow ourselves to forget that true religion is catholic, and that in so far as we are faithful to that religion we are all members of one church. Let us by all means have a number of different conferences, if thereby the work of ethics and religion may be expedited, but let us not in instituting reforms form ourselves into sects, but remain sons and daughters of the one church of reverence, love and faith.

Two distinguished Englishmen passed away last month, both liberals in religion, though one was a churchman and the other a Unitarian leader. Some of our readers may have heard the paper which the latter, Rev. H. W. Crosskey, LL. D., F. G. S., contributed to the Parliament of Religions last month. Besides being an eloquent preacher and a geologist of repute, he was the earnest and active friend of primary education. Professor Jowett, the late Master of Balliol College, was probably better known to Americans at large than Dr. Crosskey, his translations and his long connection with the great English University having served to make known to the world his scholarship and to set off his marked personality. It was at his expense that the at one time much quoted couplet was made:

"I hold with Arminians, Turks, Jews and Socinians,
And call the result Jowett's liberal opinions."

JOHN PRESTON MANN, M. D., one of the oldest physicians in New York City, and an eminent surgeon there, died recently in Syracuse, N. Y., where formerly for many years he resided. He passed away in fullness of years, being at the time of his death seventy-two. He was from the beginning ardently devoted to his profession, an enthusiast in all that belongs to improvement and advance in his chosen art. It is believed that he was the first practitioner to undertake the cure of club-feet in adults without the operation of cutting the cords. Ever he was the fast friend of intellectual and spiritual liberty, interested deeply in all that pertains to the growth and uplifting of man. In the old years he stood dauntless and untiring, hopeful and faithful to the end, in the band of the abolitionists, co-operating with and sustaining Gerrit Smith, Beriah Green and their associates in the fierce and deadly struggle against slavery. Later he was in New York among the most cordial and steadfast supporters in the religious and philanthropic work of Mr. O. B. Frothingham and Professor Felix Adler. The life throughout was luminous with the qualities of high character and noble doing and sacrifice in behalf of others. Brief words, a partial report of which has been furnished for UNITY, were spoken at the funeral, by an old and life-long friend of the deceased, Mr. C. DeB. Mills, of Syracuse, N. Y.

Two valiant missionaries of the open faith, heroic witnesses to the power of a liberal gospel, have recently passed to the larger home. One the indefatigable missionary, Rev. Bjorn Peterson, the Icelandic missionary of the real Northwest, the great wheat-bearing stretches of Winnipeg and North Dakota. The other and younger brother, Rev. S. A. Dyberg, who laid down his life at Santa Barbara, California, whither he had gone in search of release from the disease that finally claimed him. Mr. Dyberg was a Swede, a graduate of Meadville, one who began a promising work in New England which failing health compelled him to abandon, and who in the far West turned his invalid days into working days, and endeared himself to the little missionary band at Phoenix, Arizona, and elsewhere. Both these missionaries belong to the Scandinavian race,—the people that perhaps more than any other people in Europe to-day are being stirred with the growing gospel that is to domesticate free thought in reverent lives, the people of Bjornson and Ibsen. The voice of Pastor Peterson will be missed in the homes of the isolated pioneers from Iceland in the settlements of Manitoba. Some of our readers will recall the winning picture of the "Lay Preacher," by Jacob Soemme, in the Norwegian collection in the Art Palace at the World's Fair, where the man of the spirit expounds the gospel of life to his audience of three simple peasants. Such was the work of Peterson. The message of the valiant Dyberg may well be illustrated by that larger canvas of Christian Skredsvig in the same collection, entitled "The Son of Man," where the Jesus story is fitted into Norwegian landscape, and the Son of Man comes to lighten the life of the toiler and the sufferer of the nineteenth century. UNITY extends its sympathy to the homes made desolate by these deaths, but would accompany the sympathy with the congratulation to the homes and the lives that have been illumined by these lives.

The real question involved in the Van Alen case is so admirably stated by The Outlook that we quote it almost in full:

The case of Mr. Van Alen has been needlessly obscured by surmises and suspicions which seem to be groundless. The facts appear to be these: Mr. Van Alen, who is a wealthy citizen of Rhode Island, made a large contribution to the Democratic election fund, unauthoritatively stated at $50,000. There was no bargain, expressed or implied, that he was to have any appointment, or influence, in return for this contribution. After the election Mr. Van Alen desired an appointment to the Italian Mission, and Mr. Whitney wrote to the President, warmly recommending him for various reasons, among others because of "his patriotic, generous and cordial support in the canvass, when friends are few and calls are great." There is no question that Mr. Van Alen is a gentleman, possessed of the character and accomplishments which would fit him for the mission, though without diplomatic training. Fifty thousand dollars is a large contribution, but probably, for a man of Mr. Van Alen's means, not proportionately greater than contributions made by a very large number of public-spirited citizens in both the political parties. One of the chief dangers to America is that offices will be disguisedly purchased by the wealthy. The history of Rome and of France afford warnings which America should heed. The mere fact that Mr. Van Alen contributed to the canvass is not an adequate reason why he should not be appointed Minister to Italy, but, on the other hand, "his patriotic, generous and cordial support in the canvass" is no reason why he should be appointed, and the fact that it was cited by Mr. Whitney as a reason for his appointment has raised the not unnatural suspicion that this, rather than Mr. Van Alen's competence for the post, was the chief reason for his appointment. In our judgment, the Senate should discard Mr. Whitney's recommendation and consider simply the question whether Mr. Van Alen possesses those qualities which make him a desirable representative of America in Rome.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE HOUR.

In the tragic death of Mayor Harrison it is fitting to note that now people of all political opinions see what it would have been well for them to have seen always: that spite of political differences, partisan prejudices and sad partisan mistakes, spite of public errors, misunderstandings and misinterpretations, beneath the Mayor and the politician there was always the man, human and humane, loving and beloved, susceptible to the beauties of nature, the higher persuasions of art and literature. This man who made so large a place for himself in this world must have a place, beneficent, progressive and sublime, in whatever world awaits him. And this awaits him by virtue of his humanity,—to which his creed, religious or political, was an incident, an accident, perhaps a heavy misfortune, while the graces of the inquiring mind, the loving heart and the conquering will were essential and fundamental elements in the soul. These form the imperishable part. It becomes us also not to exaggerate the place of the poor disordered mind that did the lamentable deed. Chicago is not represented on any of its levels by that unbalanced soul. The excitements of politics, the vicissitudes of poverty, the distractions of the great throngs that have frequented our streets this summer, none of these produced the gory deed. It was a solitary canker spot, some private grievance, some disordered atom in an ill-balanced brain, that did it. And even this was an exceptional moment in the exceptional life; a moment that was the result, doubtless, of months of struggle between the man and the beast in that nature, between the normal and the abnormal; and that mad hour in which the beast asserted itself will be the lifelong regret, and perchance it will be the chosen task of eternity to expiate and atone for the same. In the hour of Chicago's great triumph it comes to this humiliation and grief, but it is still well with the city and well with human life. These painful exceptions prove the high rule that teaches the essential integrity of human nature, the vascular quality of human society, and the ultimate triumph of the good in man.

HOW SHALL THE RECORD BE PUBLISHED?

The Columbian Exposition is a thing of the past. The World's Congress Auxiliary, which organized and carried to successful issue two hundred and ten different congresses, has closed its records, and the remaining anxiety is to know how and where these records are to be preserved. Americans have much to answer for in the way of sins against the Angel of History. We have been criminally careless of our records; and when the coming historian shall search for the material necessary to give the true history of the nineteenth century he will find much of it missing. Upon Chicago, and that part of Chicago most responsible for the Exposition, rests the responsibility of giving to the world an adequate record of this six months' life. Valuable indeed will be the volumes that will give, so far as possible, in cyclopedic form, the triumphs at Jackson Park. The photographer and the engraver should make common cause with the printer in preparing such records. But far more valuable to the future historian, and more instructive to the present student, would be the volumes that would contain the unabridged record of all the congresses held in the Art Palace on the lake front. These records reproduced with photographic accuracy would bring humanity a story of its civilization down to date. It would be a mine in which the specialist would delve for generations to come. It would be the material which the historian of any department of thought could not ignore. Those papers published in extenso, revealing as they would the crudities, sophistries, superstitions, and bigotries of humanity at the present time, as well as its ideals, its reverences, poetry, and power, would be not only the noblest monument of the great Exposition, but the most valuable record of the world's progress and achievement to be found in any one source throughout the world. But the publication of such a record is in itself an undertaking of World's Fair proportions, a typographical venture perhaps twice as extensive as that which puts forth the ninth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, a publication greater in extent than anything that we know of yet undertaken by any American publisher: an undertaking far beyond the capacity of any publishing house in America; an undertaking which will require all the love and enthusiasm, local pride and business energy represented by the men and women of the Columbian directory, to carry it to a successful completion. The favorite plan now in vogue among those in authority is to secure its publication by the United States Government. But any one acquainted with the leisurely procedure of our government printing houses will realize that if the job is put into the paternal hands of the government printing department the grand-children of the present board of directors will be far along in spectacles before they can read the report of the Agricultural and Real Estate congresses which were in session last week. We have no objection to the government making generous contributions to the Publication Fund. It ought to purchase four or five thousand sets complete and place them in the diplomatic libraries of the world. These books ought to be presented to the State Department of every nation with the compliments of the United States. This and much more the government might and probably would do; but the work should bear the imprint of the World's Columbian Exposition. And back of that imprint must be the same business vigilance and energy that made the Columbian Exposition a success. If these records are ever to see the light, Chicago energy, Chicago money, Chicago love, and Chicago idealty must see to their publication. This greatest social triumph of the race, the noblest co-operative achievement of man, the beginning of a new era in education, state-craft and religion will be shorn of half its power if it misses the monumental publication it deserves; and this means at least a cold million dollars of Chicago money which will be hazarded in this venture. But if invested with the sagacity of Chicago capitalists it would all come back from the legitimate sales of the work, bringing with it another million of profits. We venture these figures as a guess: a minimum of fifty volumes at five dollars a volume, to be sold in separate congresses or as a whole; the aggregate sale would reach at least a hundred thousand copies; gross receipts, $25,000,000; net profits, $1,000,000. Where are the capitalists, in Chicago or elsewhere, to stand behind this great missionary venture, an educational and civilization mission? Surely some man or men, or, if not that, some woman or women, will see this through in some one way or another.

THE great sinner against society is the cynic, the scoffer, the disbeliever, the man in whose spirit negation sits enthroned. "We are saved by hope." The man who awakens hope, aspiration, confidence in the spirit of men contributes something to the social welfare. He is a builder rather than a destroyer. He helps to save men, because he awakens in men the dispositions and the spiritual energies by which their lives are enriched and made useful to themselves and others.

UNWEEPING OR UNWEPT.

"Unwept, unhonored and unsung"
 Were not the worst of Fortune's bringing;
 Dread, rather, thine own eyes and tongue
 Unweeping and unsinging.
 Unweeping for thy brother, bound
 But struggling in the somber Night,
 Unsingings from thy vantage ground
 The happy tidings of the Light.
 Weep and be sure thou shalt be wept.
 Sing gladly, and the joy-sounds ringing
 May wake some soul, which long hath slept,
 To echo back thy singing.
 Let fall thy tears! Let rise thy strain!
 So canst thou never be among Those heritors of man's disdain,
 Th' "unwept, unhonored and unsung."

 pendent*.

THE FRATERNITY OF CHURCHES.

If Jesus taught anything, he taught the brotherhood of man. If he asks loyalty to him in anything, it is loyalty to him in this truth that he asks. The parable of the Good Samaritan can mean nothing else than but just that men should love one another and help one another. The parable of the last judgment means this,—Jesus making destiny turn upon the fact of men's having been brotherly or not. If Jesus is any truth, he is this truth of brotherhood. It was his life. It is his spirit. It is his sway over the hearts and lives of men. His love for men, strong, passionate, tender, is the essence of his religion. His is a religion of love, or else it is a religion of nothing. Through love he would find truth; through conduct, the will of God. His test of discipleship is love, and the test of that love, obedience. I take it that systems of faith, the creeds and the rituals, elevated into a test of discipleship, is in reality disloyalty to Jesus, tending to defeat that work of brotherhood which he came to do in the world. If churches were gathered about the sympathies of their loves, and not about their intellectual faiths: about their needs of organization for doing the works of brotherhood in the world, rather than about their speculative theologies, there would be a holier, more helpful church in the world than there is, and truth would lie clearer in the understanding, and faith take the unseen with sunnier, certainer confidence. But as it is we have divided on the intellectual part of our religion, making the faith-part, not the love-part, the great test of fellowship. While that remains a fact, men must stay apart on those intellectual propositions and assertions of dogma; for no one can say credo to what is pseudo.

A REMEDY FOR MOB MURDER.

We copy the following from the Baraboo Republic:

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Some time ago Judge Tourgee and others commenced proceedings looking towards a suit in the interest of the widow of Sey J. Miller, who had been cruelly hung by a mob in the western part of Kentucky. These contemplated proceedings, while being in the interest of the widow, were more especially intended to obtain a decision in the United States Court against these lawless and cruel proceedings common in many parts of the country and more especially against the negro. It will be remembered I made an effort through the Republic some short time since to raise some funds in this city towards paying the expenses of such a suit, resulting in but few contributors and a very small amount subscribed.

Since then near the city of New Orleans, where a justice of the peace had been murdered by a negro—the murderer having escaped to the swamps, being still at large—the inhabitants of the vicinity under great excitement and presumably for the purpose of intimidating the negroes, hung the three brothers of the murderer, who were entirely innocent of any connection with the crime, flogging with great severity all the female relatives of the murderer, among them his mother.

Since then the Roanoke tragedy has taken place and without doubt many other negroes have been executed by mob violence, the report of which has not yet become public.

Because of these things I again call attention to the proceedings in the interest of the widow of Miller, for the purpose of urging that funds be raised to assist Judge Tourgee and others in their efforts for a United States Court decision making the several counties or States liable for all damages caused by mob violence. Will not some of our citizens who are interested in the welfare of all of our people take up this question actively in the general interest?

FRIENDSHIP IN THE CHURCH.

ALL depends in church on the friendship, just as all depends on the love in the home. A church without that is an egg without either yolk or albumen,—it is nothing but an air passage through which words may be spoken, there is nothing in it out of which live things can come. One of the most radical sentences that Jesus ever uttered was that in which he bids men stop their praying and go their way if they remember that their brother has aught against them.

It is akin to that deep insight of his with which he saw that God will not—which means God cannot, for it is a moral law—cannot forgive us unless we first forgive others. When two or three persons meet together, there God is not in the midst of them. They are rather between each other and God. And this again is an ideal to which I do not think our churches yet have practically reached. The word is still worship, not friendship. How many of us, I wonder, go to church with the sunny feeling of at-oneness with everybody and a wish to be blessing for everybody, uppermost, rather than the thought, "I wonder who is going to preach, and whether it will be interesting." In the East people often go to church from a kind of settled ecclesiasticism; in the West I think there is very little of this among the more liberal sects, but that here they go to hear a man. And what I am trying to thank you for, so far as I personally am concerned, is that church has become to me a place where a motive better than either brings me gladly. I come to meet friends, and to meet them on the upper hill-sides of our nature. The worship comes as consequence of the friendly meeting. It is first you and then God, and that I guess is one of the shortest paths to God—through human hearts.—From W. C. Gannett's farewell sermon to the Milwaukee Unitarian Parish, published in the "Milwaukee number" of the Liberal Co-Worker.

IN order to do justice to the International Conference on aerial navigation held in connection with the Columbian Exposition, the editor of the American Engineer and Railroad Journal, instead of trying to crowd the papers there read into that periodical, has decided to issue them in a special supplement, published monthly, entitled "Aeronautics, Published by the American Engineer and Railroad Journal," each number to contain not less than eight pages, and to be sold for 10 cents; annual subscription, $1. The first (October) number, of sixteen pages, is now out; and, judging from it, the series promises to be an interesting one for those interested in this branch of science. So rapid is the scientific progress in our day, that we should not be surprised to find this develop into a permanent magazine, affording valuable assistance to those laboring at aeronautic problems.

MEMORY.

The summers are not dead:
 Their seeds the winter holds
 And while the snow we tread
 Its warmth their life unfolds,
 And when the Spring returns
 They rise in beauty bright:
 So memory the past inurns,
 So Love brings it to light!

A FAREWELL.

ABSTRACT OF THE REMARKS MADE BY C. DE B. MILLS AT THE FUNERAL OF DR. JOHN PRESTON MANN, AT CROLY FARM, SYRACUSE, JULY 15, 1893

I once heard Wendell Phillips say,—it was at the funeral of William Lloyd Garrison,—no life closes without sadness. Death, after all, no matter what memories surround it, is terrible and a mystery. We never part hands that have been clasped life-long, in loving tenderness, but the hour is sad.

So it is in the common feeling of us all; so, in the universal testimony of the experience of human kind. It is the mixture of dear and sacred ties, the extinction to outward eye of a near and cherished presence; the light is gone out, the soul in manifestation—it was here, it is departed; we see, we know it no more. The curtain drops; we have reached in relation to that life—so far as sense and sight may know—the end. Birth is the beginning; death, to all outward seeming, is the end. Afloat upon the sea of time, buffeting as best we may its billows, we drop one after another into the silent gulf of the deep, and the generations and the ages know us no more forever.

I speak of it, as it is to the outward seeming. Such is the report to the fine senses. Happily, however, these senses do not furnish the full inventory of the man. They are not the sole source, in the larger meaning, of his knowledge. Within his nature are impressions, insights, perceptions, that are paramount in their clearness and commanding force to all that is borne in upon him from without. When Locke and his school, in the closing years of the seventeenth century, were so strenuous in affirming their primal postulate—"Nothing in the mind but what was first in the sense," Leibnitz, one of Germany's great thinkers, responded, "Tis nothing except the mind itself."

The mind sees change; it has within it a consciousness so deep as to be inextinguishable, of a somewhat that is unchanging—eternal. It sees death; it posits, it affirms life. It sees end; it affirms continuance. There are things we cannot do. It is impossible to suspend breathing by an act of will. There are things that are unthinkable; truths whose existence we cannot disimagine. Let one think, if he can, of annihilation, in the full meaning of that term; his intellect will recoil, it cannot grapple with such a concept, cannot believe in such a possibility.

So Science, which often vaunts itself upon finding its ground and sole warrant in observation, in what may be ascertained and verified by the senses,—Science affirms certain eternal elements in the world, the in-destructibility of force, etc. It thus lays its appeal to an inner perception. For the indestructibility was never submitted to observation. Tyndall, in language that holds of true poetry, describing the changes that go on continually, working constant mutation of form and structure, speaks also of the law of conservation of this persistent energy. "Waves may change to ripples, and ripples to waves; magnitude may be substituted for numbers, and numbers for magnitude; asteroids may aggregate to suns, suns may resolve themselves into fauna and flora, and fauna and flora all melt in air;—the flux of power is eternally the same. It rolls in music through the ages, and all terrestrial energy—the manifestation of life as well as the display of phenomena—are but modulations of its rhythm."

The thought declares this in the realm of morals and religion—declares the pervading presence of Supreme Power that is moral, that is beneficent, that is ruling all things well, making the bad good, the good better, evolving light from darkness, life from death, growth and beauty from the very bosom of ugliness and decay.

In witnessing death, we do not see the whole fact. There has been a living impression wrought by that soul that dwelt enshrined in flesh: an impression which transcends the changes that overtake the seen and temporary, which abides beyond death, and fixes the image ineffaceably on memory's page, on the tablet of the heart. And this all the more, if the soul was a royal, a loving, a fraternal soul, one in whom the great virtues and affections shone forth. Such a soul writes an indelible impress upon us. Its presence beam in the memory, lives in our freshest thoughts, is a companion, a mentor, a beckoning guide, an inspiration and uplift continually. Thus this mortal is putting on immortality. Everything passes, yet nothing dies. The seen perishes, but it is transfigured and glorified in a quenchless life. The royal spirits we have known, being dead they yet speak; absent they are here; silent, unseen, they beam upon us and fill us with a high companionship. Death, separation, bereavement are extinguished in the presence of the immortal real. There—in that world—

"everlasting spring abides."

It is pleasant to me to stand here to-day, and say that such a soul was the dear friend and brother whose visible presence is henceforth withdrawn. A true son of the highest, he has left a memory that it shall be a delight to cherish. I knew him in the early forenoon of his career. He came to this city when the hard battle against slavery was on, when Jacob's friends were few. Loyally he stood with the little band that witnessed for justice and uttered rebuke against the crime of the nation. In this allegiance he never faltered; he hoped on, hoped against hope. He knew in sure perception that

"God is just

And every wrong must die."

How enthusiastically I have heard him speak of his old teacher, Beriah Green! Of that powerful mind he had felt the force. He had been thrilled and lifted by that magical voice of eloquence. To have known such a man—one so opulent in gift, so charged with life-enlarging, quickening power—was rare fortune to any. Sir Joshua Reynolds said: "I feel a self-congratulation in knowing myself capable of such sensations as Michael Angelo intended to excite." So our friend might well have felt a self-congratulation in knowing himself capable of such enlargement and high resolves as Beriah Green had the power to awaken. John Preston Mann was one of the men who had these divine susceptibilities, and they were awakened in him never to sleep henceforth any more.

He was devoted to science in the province of the healing art. The human frame, with its delicate and vastly complex organization, its hundreds of millions of cells and fibers so built as to make a whole of symmetrical order of exquisite firmness and perfection; the 7,000,000 pores making twenty-eight miles of human drainage—all this wonderful temple of man's body fascinated and enchanted him, and he gave the emphasis of his life to study of that stupendous theme. His success corresponded to his enthusiasm and devotion. Many the ones he has delivered and cured, the deformed or malformed and crippled he has restored. Children with club feet or distorted and disabled limbs, he made sound and whole. The pursuit of this work was a passion with him. He inscribed his name and personality in the memory of multitudes whom he treated and cured.

He was free in his thought; large, catholic and progressive in his faith. He felt that he could afford the luxury of a religion that did not degrade, but rather gave continual uplift and growth. A religion that sought the Supreme One in his image revealed here on earth in humanity: holding that he best worships God who best serves man. That the invisible Presence is fittest known in his laws, and obeyed in honoring them. Truth was his divinity, righteousness his ritual, a noble human life the incense he offered day by day. He belonged to no one of the churches of earth, finding their inclosures too limiting for his broad, expanding faith, but he was a member, as I believe, of the general assembly and church of the first born.

He was an advancing spirit. He never believed that the final word of the divine wisdom had been spoken. Religion to him was a growth in thought, in inward power, without end. Truth is perpetually being revealed, and the scripture of God's word grows age by age, the final apocalypse waiting even the periods of time for its discovery and utterance. He never built a localized heaven; he realized the infinite Presence is everywhere, that the heaven of heavens is here and now as truly as anywhere in the universe of space. The soul carries its heaven within it, and finds bliss in its very abode without. Salvation he knew as a present attainment. He had already in his activity and in his repose entered upon the life eternal.

For what need I of book or priest,
Or sibyl from the mummied East,
When every star is Bethlehem's star?
I count as many as there are Cinque-foils or violets in the grass,
So many saints and saviors,
So many high behaviors,
Salute the bard who is alive
And only sees what he doth give.

Fare thee well, thou loving, faithful, worthy brother! The open career is open before thee, we doubt not, for ardent pursuit of thy loves in science, in thought, in high service to all. In the immensities of God are the mansions where may abide thy progressive spirit. Fare thee well, and may the benediction of thy pure, loving soul rest upon us all to cheer and incite, to teach new lessons of duty and lift to new heights of possession and spiritual joy.

ROMANIST INTOLERANCE.

EDITOR UNITY:

Did it ever occur to you that some of your articles are pure nonsense? In your paper of 19th you publish "An Open Letter to the Protestant Clergy," in which the writer speaks of Protestant boycotts. Why, my dear sir, I myself and my brothers have been for years the subjects of Catholic boycottism, and this simply for throwing off the yoke of Catholic doctrine and thinking for ourselves. Not a Catholic will enter one of our places of business except when they can't procure the article wanted in any other store; and even on the street, when meeting, will not recognize us if they can possibly avoid it. Pah! I know too much of Catholic intolerance. I have been there and know of what I speak. J.

Marietta, Ohio.

[We fully realize that Roman Catholics are often blindly and cruelly intolerant, and we sympathize with our correspondent in his indignation at the treatment he has received. But "two wrongs do not make a right," and we must not refrain from protesting against Protestant intolerance merely because Romanists are also intolerant, nor even if Romanists be the more intolerant of the two. Having seen some of the rabid publications to which The Catholic Citizen refers, we know that the charges it makes are in the main true. It is our duty to protest against injustice wherever it is found. When we have denounced the injustice of non-Romanists to Romanists, we may with better grace protest against Romanist intolerance.—ED.]

The Study Table

THE GOSPEL AND ITS EARLIEST INTERPRETATIONS.*

The object of this work, as stated by the author, is to "elucidate the teaching of Jesus and to present, both in their relation to it and to one another, the principal types of religious doctrines contained in the New Testament" (p. iii.); and its critical premises must be given also in Dr. Cone's own words:

The discussion in this work proceeds upon the judgment that the synoptic Gospels are the sole historical records of Jesus' teaching; that the fourth gospel contains a transformation of it effected under the influence of Hellenistic thought; that the doctrine of Paul must be gathered from Romans, I. and II. Corinthians, I. Thessalonians, Galatians and Philippians; that Hebrews, Colossians, Ephesians and I. Peter are to be classed as deutero-Pauline writings composed toward the end of the first century; and that II. Peter, Jude, the Pastoral epistles and the so-called epistles of John are to be regarded as anti-Gnostic writings of the early years of the second century. [P. 34.]

The very description puts an edge on the reader's appetite, for it gives assurance that the discussion will be based on critical scholarship and proceed after the comparative method. It is gratifying to find one author who not only accepts the results of criticism and adopts the historical method, but does so avowedly, without apology or weak extenuation. The fiber of the book is admirable. The self-possession, dignity and candor of the author are so fine and pervasive that one shrinks even from mentioning them. And they are amply justified by scholarship and unusual power of discrimination. Dr. Cone is familiar with the best authorities, but he is the mouthpiece of no man or school. Sometimes, indeed, one wishes his references were more available to the average reader, for he refers again and again to German books of which there is a perfectly good English translation (it is hardly just to refer to Grimm-Wilke's Clavis, now that Prof. Thayer's translation is at hand), and in not a few instances he ignores such English authorities as Lightfoot, who have written ably on the subject under discussion. Occasionally, also, the author's independence even of the ordinary translation of the Greek text is irritating: there is no reason why the imperfect tense in Luke xxiv. 21, rightly translated we hoped in the Revised Version, should be set aside for the positively incorrect rendering we are hoping (p. 57); on p. 135 we have a paraphrase of Mark iii. 29, which reads, "an indefinite continuance in sinning;" but the Greek, which the author quotes, can hardly mean anything but an eternal sin, as it is in the Revised Version: not to mention several other instances of the same character, it is questionable whether the author's silent correction of the use of shall and will in the usual versions is not more provoking than instructive, especially when it results in such a sentence as this,—“Unless your righteousness shall exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees ye will not enter into the kingdom of heaven.” A very bad mistranslation is that of Rom. v. 12, “all have sinned” (p. 181), which vitiates the entire discussion as to the first and the second Adam. A strict following of the original, where the aorist tense—“so that all sinned”—seems to shut off absolutely the idea that death is the result of personal sin, would have led to considerable modification in the treatment of the Pauline transformation. It must be said that the treatment of Paul and his thought is the least satisfactory part of the book. Dr. Cone makes a process of reasoning concerning righteousness and the law the psychological antecedent of Paul's conversion, and deems it impossible that he could “devote himself with enthusiastic ardor to a cause without reliant conviction of its truth.” But the starting point with Paul was clearly a conviction of the resurrection of Jesus, however it may have been obtained, and it is not likely that his reasonings about the law arose until he was thrown into controversy with the Jewish Christians. Paul was one of those men with whom feeling, impulse, is first, and logic second. This misconception of the character of Paul and of the psychology of his conversion vitally affects the story of the development of his thought. Yet the contrasts between the Synoptists and the Pauline Epistles, in respect to Christology, righteousness, sin and the future, are drawn with exceptional skill and clearness. Only one cannot help feeling that the facts might have been marshaled into platoons to advantage. The mass of details is often confusing, and it would have been helpful to have smaller subdivisions with concise headings.

It would take more room than UNITY can well allow to write of this masterly book as fully as it deserves. And since the greater part of the book is so thoroughly good, it seems not only ungracious but unfair to dwell upon points where the author appears to us to have erred. Yet in the most important section of the book, that on “The Teaching of Jesus,” he has not entirely escaped from that rationalism which he so justly condemns in the introduction. Rationalism is that method of criticism which assumes that an author or a hero was thoroughly sound, consistent and truthful, and therefore feels quite at liberty to correct the record into conformity with the supposed character of its writer or the man of whom it treats. Rationalism is to the higher criticism what the fancied infallibility of the original document is to the lower criticism. This method Dr. Cone explicitly rejects in favor of the historical method, but its ghost is not yet fully laid. It is freely admitted that Jesus shared the ignorance and superstition of his time in regard to demonology, but where greater things are at stake no such concession can be made. It kindles expectation to read on page 48 that "in respect to the temporal character and theater of his kingdom his teaching was a continuation of that of the prophecies and apocalypses which preceded him," but we are doomed to disappointment, this remarkable admission being tacitly taken back as the author goes on, for we find on page 86 that "Jesus completely transformed the Messiah idea of the prophets." After saying that the kingdom of God in the thought of Jesus was "the realization in human society of the highest ethical and spiritual ideals, its perfection would be attained when the will of God should be done by men on the earth" (p. 49), we are amazed to read on page 127 that Jesus did not conceive of the life to come as an earthly state under the Messianic reign, that he "cannot have entertained a popular Jewish belief that the Messianic future was a temporal condition," etc. The difficulty lies in the author's belief that Jesus' ethical conception of the kingdom of God must have excluded apocalyptic ideas and had no "unrealized and unrealizable hopes." But upon what does that belief rest except upon a rationalistic assumption of the self-consistency of Jesus? That he did hold to a spiritual conception of the kingdom is quite unquestionable, but he taught his disciples to pray "Thy kingdom come," while he also believed that the kingdom of God was already in the world. Our records represent him as holding both the popular idea and his own spiritual idea of the kingdom. It is easy to say that since the popular idea would naturally have been attributed to him by tradition it has forced its way thus into the records, but the only justification for such a plea is an assumption that Jesus himself cannot have entertained both views, and such an assumption should not be made except as a last resort. Is it necessary? Jesus was not a logical reasoner; he did hold beliefs, as our author allows, which were inconsistent with his chief constructive ideas: precisely these two conceptions which it is said Jesus could not have held together have been held by some of the rarest spirits in the Christian Church from that day to this, who, believing in the presence of the kingdom of God in this world, have at the same time expected this age to have a catastrophic termination; why then must we not say that Jesus held both, inconsistent as they may appear to us?

In every other school of thought represented in this book and in every other New Testament thinker our author admits grave and flagrant self-contradictions; he accepts the influence of the legal righteousness in the last verse of the 51st Psalm, from which he says the author was unable to free himself, notwithstanding the spirituality of the rest of the composition, although that verse has often been deemed an interpolation; but from admitting serious self-contradiction in Jesus he draws back in defiance of the historical method and with a too evident leaning toward rationalism.

This volume is a great acquisition to Biblical scholarship. No more worthy book on its subject is to be found in English, and it deserves thorough, patient study from every New Testament student. Adult classes in the Sunday school or study classes in the Unity clubs can do no better work this year than to spend the entire winter over this book.

THE BIBLE, ITS ORIGIN, GROWTH, AND CHARACTER.*

The modest profession of this book is not to make an original contribution to scholarship, but only to popularize the most firmly established results of Biblical study. The author is a critic not of the Bible but of the critics of the Bible, and brings to his task not only wide, industrious reading but also what is of superior value, abundant "grace of saving common sense." The chapters appear to have seen service originally as lectures or sermons, for the style is loose and flowing, and colloquial forms of speech are preserved which detract occasionally from dignity and elevation. Here and there, too, we notice faults due to rapid preparation. Surely, the sacrificial idea did not "come into Judaism from heathenism" (p. 18), unless by heathenism is meant the inheritance of primitive Semitism, and so, indeed, we are told, later on, that in an early stage of Jewish development "bloody sacrifices formed the chief part of their worship" (p. 30), and also that at the beginning of the Hebrew national career "vast numbers of cruel and bloody animal sacrifices were offered to Jehovah" (p. 20). Again, on p. 76 it is stated that the book of the Law read by Ezra to the great assembly of 444 B. C. was "doubtless the Priestly Document;" and yet on p. 174 we are told that "the book was almost beyond question essentially our Pentateuch, or the five so-called Books of Moses." But such slips are of comparatively little importance. Even Martineau is not free from them. It may be that the characteristics of the Fourth Gospel are "anything but those betraying senility," yet Dr. Peabody, no mean judge of such a question, was very firm in the contrary opinion.

For the reader who wishes to know how the case stands with the Bible at the present stage of criticism, this book will prove of great service. It sets forth with perfect clearness what is virtually the "consensus of the competent" in Biblical criticism, and its copious references, with the appended list of books, enable any who choose to pursue the subject more elaborately. It is no pioneer in scholarship, but it puts one in the accepted highway of which modern investigators have so far made sure. Our feet are never off the asphalt.

A GENERAL OUTLINE OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT. By Clinton D. Higby. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 134. 30 cents.—The object of this little book is stated to be to bring the subject of civil government (in the United States, the States, the counties, the townships, the cities and the towns) within the reach of those whose time is short and who would complete the course in a single term. When the size of the book is considered, and the further fact that it is in large print and doubly leaded, it must be evident that the treatment is very brief. The best feature of the treatise is the series of excellent references to books in which the topics mentioned may be followed out at length. Were it not for this feature we should regard the treatise as a failure. Dr. Higby has undertaken too much. Where so little is given, what is should be unquestionable. But it is not. There are positive errors in the book, such as the statement that in Tennessee the County Superintendent is appointed by the County Judge (the fact being, unless there has been a very recent and sweeping change in the Tennessee laws, that in Tennessee the County Superintendent is elected by the justices of the peace of the county, there being no county judge except in such counties as have obtained a special act from the legislature creating one). Such an error is, however, in itself trivial; but such misleading statements as that on page 24 are serious. "The President appoints only Secretaries, Assistant Secretaries and Commissioners; the remaining officers are either appointed under the recommendation of Congressmen or are under the control of the Civil Service Commission." Here we are not told who does make the appointments, but are given to understand that the Congressmen have a legal right in the premises, like that of the Senate, by whose advice and consent the Constitution provides the President shall make appointments. It is just such practical matters as this that should be explained in a work designed to acquaint one with the modus operandi of government. The distribution of federal powers, limitations, etc., may be learned directly from the Constitution; but the details of the administration of the government under the Constitution cannot be so learned. Dr. Higby might have spared some of his statements as to the former matters to make room for some account of the latter. Or, if he did not intend to explain, he should at least have avoided misleading. On the whole the book cannot be recommended.

PHILLIPS BROOKS YEAR BOOK. Selections from the writings of the Rt. Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D. By H. L. S. and L. H. S. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1893. Cloth 16mo., $1.—Phillips Brooks was neither a sententious writer nor one who put forth his strength completely in the paragraphs of his sermons. His power was in the stream of his discourse, in his sermons taken as wholes, and the whole was always greater than the sum of all its parts. The reader who is mindful of these things will not be disappointed in the selection from his writings which has been put into that form of which the "Daily Food" of fifty years since was one of the first examples. Very innutritious and unpalatable food it was for the most part. This is very different from that. It does not tell the whole story; no one could guess from these passages alone the power of Phillips Brooks: and still the wonder is that they are so fine and good; so little formal or ecclesiastical; so human in their tone and touch. Besides a selection from Phillips Brooks there is, on almost every page, a selection from one or another of the poets. These selections are most admirable, and when we discover that Clough and Arnold are drawn upon more freely than the other poets we cannot help wondering whether we have here a sign of Brooks's catholicity or that of his editors merely. However this may be, it is very certain that we have here a sign that these poets of skepticism had in them an element of faith; that in their honest doubt there was more faith than in the dogmatism of the creeds. We have often been surprised at the appositeness of the calendars and year books to particular circumstances and needs. We have no doubt that a great many persons will find here the very thing they need to help them in some doubt or difficulty or distress; in their joy a'so, where, possibly, there is greater need of help.

A JAPANESE INTERIOR. By Alice Mabel Bacon. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, 12 mo., pp. 267. $1.25.—We can best give our readers an idea of the scope and value of this handsome product of the Riverside Press by quoting from the author's preface:

The letters presented to the public in this book were written during an experience of life in Japan somewhat different from that of the average foreign resident in Japan. The author's call to the Orient came to her from one of the most conservative and anti-foreign of the Tokyo schools, a school for noble girls, under the management of the Imperial Household Department. The invitation was sent to her through a Japanese friend who had been the teacher of English in the school since its foundation, for no foreign recommendation would have had much weight with the conservative and cultivated Japanese in charge of the institution. Work in such a school naturally brings a teacher into close contact with the most refined and cultivated of Japanese women, and cannot fail to give to those who perform it a new sympathy with a class usually but little understood. * * * In all that great city I had no acquaintance of my own race and language, but my Japanese friends so cared for me and surrounded me by their kindness that instead of missing the society of my own people, I found its absence a positive advantage, in that it threw me entirely upon congenial and interesting Japanese friends for that social intercourse necessary for all civilized beings. * * * The letters do not lay claim to deep research or wide knowledge of all subjects touched upon by them. * * * Whatever theories are advanced are put forward as the material from which thought may be made, and not as the result of mature deliberation.

Because the book is what the author modestly states it to be, we recommend it to those who would look out at the world with the child's freshness and freedom from prejudice, that they may learn what it can tell them. We are convinced that Japan has something to teach the West, because, however superior we may be to the Japanese in many respects, the sweetness of their social life puts them on what we should not hesitate to recognize as a distinctly higher moral plane than that of average Western civilization.—F. TASKS BY TWILIGHT. By Abbot Kinney. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 8vo, pp. 211.—This ambiguous title belongs to a book on education in the broad sense, or the conduct of life. The four divisions are Education, Education of Girls, Thoughts, and Diet, and the first part is subdivided thus: Physique, Boys, Manual Labor, Practice Makes Perfect, Observation. It is interesting as the work of a strong, virile, self-reliant and apparently successful man. His views are what might be expected from such an individual, and they are clearly and forcibly expressed. The characteristic feature of the book is the author's belief that procreation is the great function of life, that in our children we attain immortality, and that our chief purpose should be to produce sound, healthy children and to properly care for them. The book will not be highly satisfactory to the advocates of "woman's rights," because, although the author approves of the higher education of woman, he would not have her engage to any extent in callings which take her out of the home, and it never occurs to him to doubt that man is the head of the family.

PRATT PORTRAITS: SKETCHED IN A NEW ENGLAND SUBURB. By Anna Fuller. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Paper, 12mo., pp. 325. 50 cents.—Nothing that has come to us for years has given more pleasure than these charming sketches of New England life. Several of them have previously appeared in Harper's Bazar. Old and new alike are marked by freshness, simple humor and an eminently healthful tone. All lovers of New England would rejoice in this book, and all who are not should read it. We do not know where there is to be found a more representative picture of middle-class American life in the present century. In saying this we do not wish to convey the impression that the story is subordinated to some ulterior purpose. Nothing of the kind appears. The charm is primarily a literary one. The studies are not profound, but so far as they go they are true, and we especially recommend them to those of our readers who take up a book for rest and refreshment.

CAMPAIGN ECHOES: The Autobiography of M's Letitia Youmans. Toronto: William Briggs. Cloth, 12mo., 311 pp.—This sketch of the life of the pioneer of the white-ribbon movement in Canada has an introduction by Frances Willard, who was a participator in much of the life this book commemorates. It is a simple, earnest record of the ways by which this great-hearted woman was led by the "inner light" out of domestic and home duties to the larger work of the world. The education of both children and parents in the duties we all owe to society is the foundation thought of her life, and her work, which has been rich in helpfulness to others, has been devoted to the temperance problem. That she has been a power for good in Canada and elsewhere is evident from the story.

HISTORY AND LITERATURE IN GRAMMAR GRADES (Monographs on Education). By J. H. Phillips, Ph.D. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. Paper, 12mo., pp. 17. 15 cents.—An essay valuable for its direct counsel, and still more for the educational reforms it suggests. If we apprehend the author rightly, he would have the child begin the study—that is to say, the reading—of literature (not the reading about it) at a very early age, and would teach history in the natural order, remembering that young children are interested in persons and events before they are in places, and are interested to locate a story before they care to know just when, in the course of time and events, it took place. These considerations suggest the true order in which literature, geography and history should be taken up and combined, and the way in which the teaching of these subjects should be adapted to the minds of children of different ages.

THE "SHIN SHIU CATECHISM," which is now being distributed in Chicago by a representative from Japan of the above-named sect of Buddhism, is admirably adapted to awaken the contempt of thinking men for Buddhism. It is a striking caricature of some of the worst forms of degraded Christianity, in which salvation by faith and the doctrine of vicarious atonement play the principal role. Morality is not absent from such religious teachings, but it has no vital connection with them. To those who do not realize how utterly unreasonable and immoral the teachings of certain Christian sects are, we commend this little book as a tract. Fortunately for Buddhism, the doctrine this book teaches is as remote from the higher and more authentic forms of that faith, as the form of Christianity it so unintentionally caricatures is from the true teaching of the loving Nazarene.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS for October is one of the best if not the best number that has yet appeared. The principal original articles are Wm. E. Smythe's exposition of the magnificent promise of irrigation in the far West, in which he warns the public against allowing its chief benefits to be monopolized by a few capitalist speculators; Edward B. Howell's "Evils of an Appreciating Currency," in which he makes a very telling use of charts to enforce his view of the subject; and Mr. Stead, the editor's, paper on "The Civic Church," read at our recent Parliament of Religions. All of these are interesting in themselves, and what is more, are thought-inspiring.

IN THE ALTRUISTIC REVIEW for October the principal feature is a reliable, though all too brief, description of Hull House and its activities. The editor's sketch of the late John Crerar will have an interest for the many who knew no more of this man than that he devised a large sum for the support of a public library in Chicago. He seems to have been an earnest, conscientious, but rather narrow man. "The Idol of German Spectacles," by Dr. Cuppy, republished from the London Journal of Education, is perhaps a needed protest against exaggerated notions; but it should be noted that in the author's estimate no recognition is made of the fact that it is customary in Germany to go from one university to another in the pursuit of education, and that, therefore, the number presenting themselves for a degree at a given university will naturally be far less than the number taking lectures. Herr A., before taking his degree at the last university he attends, may be a faithful student at several others. Yet, according to Dr. Cuppy's method of judging, he would be counted among the non-studious at these universities.

THE best things in Worthington's Magazine are generally to be found in the departments, "The World Beautiful" and "Between You and Me." Lillian Whiting, Charlotte Perkins Stetson and Mrs. Wells keep these departments interesting and helpful. The October number is no exception to the rule.

A GARDEN SECRET.

I.

I heard a whisper of roses
And light white lilies laugh out,
"Ah, sweet, when the evening closes
And stars come looking about,
How cool and good it is to stand
Nor fear at all the gathering hand!"

II.

"Would I were red!" cried a white rose;
"Would I were white!" cried a red one,
"No longer the light wind blows,
He went with the dear dead sun,
Here we forever seem to stay,
And yet a sun dies every day."

III.

A LILY.

"The sun is not dead, but sleeping,
And each day the same sun wakes;
When stars their watch are keeping A season of rest he takes."

MANY ROSES TOGETHER.

"How very wise these lilies are!
They must have heard star talk with star!"

IV.

FIRST ROSE.

"Pray, then, can you tell us, lilies,
Where slumbers the wind at night,
When the garden all 'round so still is,
And brimmed with the moon's pale light?"

A LILY.

"In branches of great trees he rests."

SECOND ROSE.

"Not so. They are too full of nests."

V.

FIRST ROSE.

"I think he sleeps where the grass is;
He there would have room to lie:
The white moon over him passes;
He wakes with the dawning sky."

MANY LILIES TOGETHER.

"How very wise these roses seem,
Who think they know and only dream."

VI.

FIRST ROSE.

"What haps to a gathered flower?"

SECOND ROSE.

"Nay, sister; now, who can tell?
One comes not back for an hour
To say it is ill or well.
I would with such a one confer,
To know what strange things chanced to her."

VII.

FIRST ROSE.

"Hush! hush! Now the wind is waking;
Or is it the wind I hear?
My leaves are thrilling and shaking.
Good-by! I am gathered, dear!
Now, whether for my bliss or woe,
I shall know what the plucked flowers
know!"

STUDENT LIFE IN RUSSIA.

Nowhere in the world is the student subject to such a strict, searching and rigorous discipline as is the student in a Russian university. From his entrance into school the boy of ten or eleven years of age has to go through a long and tedious process of training, the nature of which, according to the New York World, tends more to fit him for army service than to fill the professor's chair. In the preparatory class the boys are taught the names of the royal family in order, and the names of the entire dynasty in their ranks and order. These he must know by heart. Next comes the way to render honor and salute all military officers should he meet them or speak about them. Here also he must learn by heart the Russian national anthem, "God Save the Czar." Next come marching and various military commands. An account is kept of the physical developments of each boy, so when he is sixteen years old it can be seen by his physical progress if he is fit for the army service. At this time the scholar receives a passport of "identification" and a book containing the rules and regulations which are to govern his life in the institution. The discipline the Russian student has to undergo may produce one or two results. The student may be obedient or abjectly slavish, or the rules and laws by which he is governed may give him food for reflection and create a natural aversion to the authorities.

Here are some of the requirements: Each student must wear a military uniform with brass and nickel-plated buttons, which have to be polished every day; each student must also clean his own shoes; mustache and beard are not allowed; hair must be clipped close; smoking and carrying a cane are forbidden, as well as the use of intoxicants whatsoever. While walking to and from school the student must carry on his back his knapsack filled with books, weighing in all about twenty-five or thirty pounds. This he must do in all kinds of weather. The student cannot attend any social or public gathering or entertainment, neither can he go to the theater or concert hall. He must not be on the street after 7 p. m. He must not read any newspaper whatsoever, or any books but those written by Russian authors and approved of by the censor. Anyone observing the violation of any of these rules may demand the student's passport and return the same to the authorities, for which the informer receives a reward, while the student is punished by being locked up for twelve hours in a dark room.

Secret societies or organizations among the students are not to be dreamed of; neither are students permitted to gather in groups. Two may converse or speak with one another, but three together are not allowed. A young Russian who says he attended one of these institutions is authority for the statement that there is always among the students one spy in ten. The same person declares that when a spy makes an unfavorable report the student reported against suddenly disappears. In the year 1885, he affirms, there were twenty-one disappearances in St. Petersburg University and double that number in Moscow. If inquiry is made for the missing student, the inquirer will be told that the young man was considered a dangerous subject to the community and was therefore removed out of harm's way. The teachers, professors, and directors of universities are appointed by a body selected for that special purpose by the Czar himself. Many parents, knowing the risks and the dangers their boys are subject to while in a Russian university, educate them abroad. The young man sent abroad for education is looked upon by the authorities as a dangerous subject, full of liberal ideas and opinions concerning public problems.

TAKE THE CONSEQUENCES.

The mother, more than the teacher, has opportunities to quietly let a deed impress its nature upon the child's mind. Little children are naturally logical and quickly perceive justice or injustice. The child who is rightly treated will accept the right kind of punishment as a matter of course. A friend of mine who had been given this idea of punishment, upon returning home one day found that her six-year-old boy had taken his younger brother over to the wagon-shop across the street, a forbidden spot, and they had smeared their aprons with the wagon-grease. In telling the story afterwards, she said: "My first impulse was to whip the boy, because he knew better than to go; but I thought I would try the other way of punishing him, and see if it would do any good. So I said, 'Why that's too bad. It will be rather hard for you to get the grease off, but I think I can help you, if you will get some turpentine. Run to the drug store on the corner and buy a small bottle of it." On his return she took the two aprons and spread them upon the floor of the back porch; then, giving him a little sponge and the bottle of turpentine, she showed him how to begin his cleaning. In a few minutes he said: "Oh, mamma, this stuff smells horrid!" "Yes," she replied, serenely, "I know it does; I dislike the smell of turpentine very much, but I think you will get through soon." So Willie kept on scrubbing until he had cleaned the aprons as well as he could. "Well," said his mother, as she helped him put away the cleaning material, "I think my boy will be more careful about going to the wagon-shop, will he not?" "You bet I will!" was his emphatic reply.

THE smallest living organisms, and those most to be feared by man in his battle for existence with the rest of nature, are bacteria, or microbes. They have an average diameter of but one twenty-five thousandth of an inch, and a length from one to ten times as great. The smallest of them are, however, much more minute than this; large numbers are only just visible under the highest powers of our best microscopes, and there is no doubt that still more powerful instruments would reveal multitudes of new forms. Two thousand microbes could swim side by side through the eye of a needle, and one could hold fifty millions of millions in the hollow of one's hand. An ordinary microbe will divide and become two every hour, or in even less time, and if it and its descendants were given an unlimited food supply so that they could continue their divisions without interruption, in a day they would number forty million individuals. Some kinds have the property of producing poisonous secretions which cause disease. When a person becomes infected with some of these microbes, it may be only a small number, their great fertility will soon cause their number to be so increased that illness and perhaps death may result.

—The Weekly Review.

AN advocate of sanitary reform holds that fruits and berries, intelligently selected and properly used, might take the place of less harmless and much more expensive drugs. Under the category of laxatives he includes oranges, plums, figs, tamarinds, and mulberries. Pomegranates, cranberries, blackberries, and quinces are astringent (blackberry jelly having proved a specific for the cure of dysentery in cases where even laudanum failed); grapes, black currants, and cactus figs ("prickly pears") are diuretics; lemons, limes, and white currants are refrigerants. Apples counteract seasickness and relieve the nausea caused by tobacco smoke. A kind of blue grapes, resembling our Concord, are used in Switzerland for the cure of dyspepsia. The patient is kept on a low diet of bread and skim-milk, sometimes bread and water, but twice a day is permitted to turn himself loose upon a large vineyard, and eat away to the limit of his physical capacity. The combined diuretic and laxative effect of the grape juice purifies the blood, and marvelously restores the vigor of a disordered stomach.

The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion.

LESSON IX.

JESUS AND THE SINNER.

Luke vii. 36-50.

This man receiveth sinners.—Luke xv. 2.
Do I find love so full in my nature, God's ultimate gift.

That I doubt his own love can compete with it? Here the parts shift?

Here the creature surpass the creator,—the end, what began?

Picture: Jesus and the Sinner. Hofmann.

In the last lesson we saw how Jesus offended prejudices of race and religion and so turned the tide against him. To-day we are to study the chief among his ethical judgments, which would still be a ground of reproach in many quarters were it thoroughly understood. The picture shows us three Pharisees amazed and indignant at the way Jesus is treating a woman who is pouring ointment from an alabaster flask upon his feet and wiping them with her hair. The picture is inaccurate in detail, for Jesus was reclining, not sitting upright at the table, and there is a patronizing lordliness in the hand outstretched over the woman's head that we cannot like, but the faces of the Pharisees are good and instructive. One is looking at Jesus in horror that he should allow this woman, who in the narrative is vaguely but significantly styled "a sinner," to come so near him. Another Pharisee who has recognized the woman is whispering into his neighbor's ear that Jesus cannot be a prophet, for if he were he would know her character and, of course, would condemn her. The third, regardless of Jesus, is almost rising from his chair as if fearing that the woman at whom he looks with scorn and disgust may attempt to perform a like service for him.

Which of the company did Jesus think the best?—Jesus taught that the sinful woman was morally better than the complacent Pharisees.

This is certainly a startling judgment. Of the woman we know absolutely nothing. Matthew, Mark and John speak of an anointing in Bethany by Mary, the sister of Lazarus and Martha; and therefore many have supposed that the same incident is related by Luke, who is silent as to the woman's name and lays the scene in the home of Simon indeed, although in Luke he is a Galilean Pharisee, while the Simon of the other account is a leper of Bethany. But it is incredible from all we know of Mary that she was a woman who could be called "sinful" and of whom Jesus would say "Her sins which are many." There may have been two anointings of Jesus, or the reluctance of Jesus' disciples to believe that their Master could have treated an abandoned woman so kindly may have led them to twist the story which Luke has preserved in its original form. Fortunately the representation which this story gives, as found in Luke, of Jesus' ethical judgment, is so thoroughly substantiated by all other accounts that we may dismiss merely critical questions and regard the narrative in Luke, and this picture which is based upon it, as true to the feeling of Jesus if not to historic fact.

But are we willing to agree that the woman at the feet of Jesus is really better, morally, than the Pharisees who sit at his side? Look at their faces: with perhaps the exception of the whisperer, all of these men have pure, clean faces. That Pharisee with hands crossed on his breast is not one who would "devour widows' houses and for a pretense make long prayers"; he is obviously no hypocrite, but an honest, upright, pure-minded man. The Pharisee who is ready to rise shows a face that tells of long fastings if not of prayer; he also is a man of integrity and purity. Why, then, does Jesus contrast them unfavorably with the sinful woman? Their faces show: for while there is no trace of evil passion there is not a single hint of gentleness or tender sympathy. They despise the woman, and cannot see why Jesus allows her in his presence. Therefore were they in the opinion of Jesus in worse case morally than the woman at his feet. He thought that coldness was worse than passion, that unsympathetic righteousness ranked lower in the moral scale than erring tenderness. Sins of the flesh were less heinous than sins of the spirit. In Dante the same verdict is rendered; sins of incontinence are punished in the circles next below the unbaptized, while sins of treachery have their retribution in the belt just above the lowest depth of hell. Yet, does not this shock our moral sense? Is it really true that a perfectly respectable but hard-hearted, unfeeling man is farther from the kingdom of heaven than another who, though warm and sympathetic, is guilty of incontinence? That is a fair question for discussion. There is no doubt, however, how Jesus felt about it; his associations were often with social outcasts—the publicans and sinners. He believed in them, and trusted them most of all, finding them most responsive to his word. We judge instinctively the same way. We love reckless, loving Rip Van Winkle, but we turn away from a bloodless, heartless man. To the religious teachers of the day Jesus said: "The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of heaven before you."

What did Jesus say about forgiveness?—Jesus said that the presence of love in a man or woman always meant forgiveness.

Jesus held forth no low standard of life. It was he who taught that it were better to cast eye or foot away than to be led into sin; he took judgment upon evil in heart or even in look as well as in actual deed; his ideal of morality was extraordinarily high, he shared the divine hatred of sin. And yet with all rigor of the moral code he had also a tender yearning over the lost sheep of Israel whom he had come to call to repentance. Jesus declared to Simon that the woman's sins were forgiven, but the ground of forgiveness is obscure in the narrative. Judging from the parable of the two debtors, which Luke assigns to this occasion, we should conclude that this act of reverent, grateful homage was prompted by words of forgiveness which Jesus had previously spoken to her. She loved much because much had been forgiven to her. But in the story as we have it there is a hint of a very much more surprising doctrine, namely, that sin which is prompted by love is forgiven because of that love. It may be that the latter thought represents the real teaching of Jesus, which his disciples either misunderstood or modified because of its possible dangerous consequences. It is beyond doubt, however, that Jesus taught that in a loving temper was the only forgiveness for sin. In contrast to Paul, who ordinarily conceived of forgiveness as something external and forensic, Jesus always thought of it as inward and ethical. The man who forgives his brother is himself forgiven by God, since forgiveness of sin can be only the removal of sin, which is selfishness, from the heart. If love be within, sin is not there, and did not Jesus always put evil in the heart-motive and not in the outward act of transgression? We see, therefore, that this idea of forgiveness to love which, perhaps, shocks us at first standing, is really in harmony with a great deal of the thought peculiar to Jesus, it falls in with his general way of thinking, and may therefore have been his teaching in this particular case. If one do wrong from love does the love redeem the fault? In any event, there is no forgiveness while the heart remains hard and selfish. A great deal is said in current religious teaching about forgiveness of sins, but it is usually in the line of Paul's thought. Indeed, in this very narration, as Luke gives it, the closing verses have an unmistakably Pauline ring. "Thy faith hath saved thee"—but the real Jesus is heard in the other saying: "For she loved much." Sin is in the heart: if the heart be cold and unsympathetic the man is sinful, though the conduct may be blameless in its obedience to the "Thou shalt not" of law: sin is forgiven only when the heart is restored to sympathetic, tender, unselfish love. Only in the spirit of willingness to forgive others is a man's own forgiveness found.

How could Jesus speak for God in forgiving sins?—Because he knew that God could not be more harsh and severe than man, and he found in his own heart only pity and forgiveness for penitent sinners.

We have come upon another application of what in an earlier lesson we found to be the distinctive and peculiar method of Jesus—he reasoned from man to God and from God to man. His ethical principle is, "Treat men as God treats them—Be ye perfect even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect." Beyond this law we can hardly go, for the moral law which is to govern the relations of man to man must be revealed in nature: by that law God deals with man and by that same law man must ultimately treat his brother. As Dr. Cone has admirably said: "The peculiar, the original contribution which Jesus made to this department of ethics consists in the setting in which he placed the duty of universal love, or perhaps, better, in the foundation on which he established it, when he gave it a religious significance and sanction by enjoining it as a duty for men on the ground of the divine love toward them." And matching this thought of the duty of man to man is another of the feeling of God toward man. Jesus regarded his thoughts and feelings as revelations of God. Hence when he felt pity for the wayward and fallen he knew that God pitied them too. When he found no condemnation in his own heart he declared the forgiveness of God. To say that Jesus could not have pronounced forgiveness in the name of God unless he were himself God is to miss utterly the very central idea of Jesus. So men did see in Jesus a fresh revelation of God. The expression of the Pharisees in the picture shows how they felt toward sinful men and women; in them is the revelation of the wrath of God against all unrighteousness; but Jesus was a purer, better man than any one of his table-companions, and in his compassion was a revelation of the love and pity of God. It was rare then—is it not rare now?—to see purity combined with pity for the impure, and to find that union of qualities in a man is a revelation of their existence in God. In Jesus men saw that purity could be tender and that tenderness could be pure.

How did this teaching turn the people against Jesus?—It offended their ethical traditions and made them question his purity and prophetic character.

Is it strange that men should have drawn back from such teaching as we have studied to-day? Are we quite sure of its truth ourselves? Does it not still arouse suspicion when a man "receiveth sinners"? Are we ready to agree that sins of the spirit are actually worse than sins of the flesh? Is it clear to us that love maketh an atonement for sins? We have been taught for so many years that Jesus was truly God, and the relics of that belief still color our feeling so deeply, that we fail to realize the sublime audacity which led him to affirm that God felt as he, the obscure carpenter of an obscure Galilean town, felt toward sinners. Among the Jews, who abhorred uncleanness, who had got into the way of thinking of God as a judge and his relation to men as legal, and who had a written revelation of God which they deemed supreme and final, is it any wonder that there arose a revolt against the teaching of Jesus?

In teaching this lesson the greatest care must be taken not to minimize the guilt of sins of the flesh, but to show in their true heinousness the more subtle sins of the spirit. Hawthorne has much that bears on the subject—see, for instance, the character of Hilda in "The Marble Faun" (cf. especially chaps. xxiii. and xlii.), the stories of "Egotism," "The Christmas Banquet," "Ethan Brand" and "The Man of Adamant." Dante also should be studied.

Questions.

The Picture.—Its inaccuracies of detail,—could you discover any from reading the account in Luke even without any other knowledge of Eastern customs? What sort of men should you judge the Pharisees to be from their faces, from the direction in which each is looking? Do you like the attitude of Jesus?

The Ethical Discrimination of Jesus.—Do you really think that Jesus was right in his ethical judgment upon heartless Pharisees and passionate sinners? Whom would Jesus call "the perishing classes"? Can you think of other sayings attributed to him or stories told of him which have the same idea? Do you think of other great teachers in literature and religion who have taught similarly? What is forgiveness? What revelation of God did men find in Jesus?

The Ethical Law of Jesus.—What was it? How sound do you think it is? Can we find out how God treats men? Has society adopted that principle? In an article on The Psychological Laboratory at Harvard, Dr. Nichols says: "Every ethical problem is a psychological problem." Has that any bearing upon this principle of Jesus?

The Ethical Sanction of Jesus.—What was it? What has ethics to do with religion from the point of view of Jesus? The method of Jesus and how he applied it to moral problems.

And now, two questions, the most important of all: Have we truly represented the ethical thought of Jesus? Do you believe that thought to be true?

For Alcoholism

Use Horstord's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. P. P. Gilman, Detroit, Mich., says: "I have found it very satisfactory in its effects, notably in the prostration attendant upon alcoholism."

BEGINNINGS

According to the LEGENDS and According to the TRUER STORY.

BY ALLEN WALTON GOULD.

The First Year's Work in the Six Years' Course of Study.

Arranged for by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society.

This book is prepared by Rev. A. W. Gould, President of the Society, and is well calculated to lead the private student and Unity Club classes, as well as the Sunday School classes, into the surprises and inspirations of Evolution as applied to the foundations of morals and religion. Every student of these subjects will be glad of a copy.

Look at it and look into it, and try it.

Notes from the Field

Chicago.—The Annual Conference of the Unitarian and other Independent Societies of Illinois will be held at All Souls Church from the 7th to the 9th of November. The following is the program: Tuesday, Nov. 7, 8 p. m., Annual Sermon, by Rev. H. W. Thomas of Chicago; 9 p. m., Social Reunion. Wednesday, Nov. 8, 10 a. m., Devotional Meeting, led by Rev. J. V. Blake, Chicago; 11 a. m., Reports of State Work by the Secretary and the ministers of the different churches; 3 p. m., Paper on "The Liberal Church and the People," by Rev. R. A. White, Chicago; Discussion opened by Rev. R. B. Marsh, Peoria; 4 p. m., Paper on Method of Missionary Work in Liberal Churches, by Rev. A. N. Alcott, Elgin; Discussion opened by Rev. A. H. Laing, Joliet; 8 p. m., Platform Meeting on "The Larger Religious Horizon,"—The Larger Horizon of the Universalist Church, by Rev. A. J. Canfield, Chicago; The Larger Horizon of the Unitarian Church, by Rev. Ida Hultin, Moline; The Larger Horizon of the Independent Church, by Rev. J. H. Acton, Aurora; The Larger Horizon of the Jewish Church, by Rabbi Hirsch; The Larger Horizon of the Ethical Movement, by Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, Chicago; The Possibilities of Liberal Organization, by Rev. J. L. Jones, Chicago. Thursday, 10 a. m., Devotional Meeting; 11 a. m., Business.

Hinsdale, Ill.—The pulpit at Hinsdale was filled Oct. 15 and 22 by the Rev. Messrs. Vivekananda and Nagarkar, who preached with much acceptance to overflowing houses. A course of lectures by Messrs. Vivekananda and Hirai are also being given and attended to the full capacity of the church. Next Sunday the pulpit will be occupied by the Rev. J. C. Allen, a recent graduate of Meadville and a former parishioner of Mr. Gannett in Rochester, who writes very cordially in commendation of him.

Geneva, Ill.—The Unitarian Society held its annual meeting in the church Wednesday, Oct. 18. After supper the meeting was called to order by Mrs. Harvey, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, to listen to reports and elect officers for the coming year. Mrs. Harvey, Mr. B. W. Dodson and Mrs. Blackman were elected trustees, Mr. T. H. Eddowes secretary, and Miss Lizzie Long treasurer. The principal work of the past year was the building of the parsonage, funds for which were largely contributed by outside friends, who personally or by report were familiar with the early history of the church, especially in connection with the labors of Mr. Conant more than fifty years ago. The society desires to express in this way its sincere thanks to all friends, East and West, who have aided in this work. A small indebtedness of about $200 remaining, it was voted to raise that among ourselves, and Mr. Dodson and Mr. Harvey were appointed a committee for that purpose. On the following Sunday, Harvest Sunday, the full amount was raised, and the society is now out of debt.

St. Paul, Minn.—During the four Sundays in November and the first two of December, Rev. S. M. Crothers will deliver a series of evening sermons on "Texts from the Poets." The first text is from Keats,—

Beauty is truth, truth beauty,—that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.—
and the last from Browning :

To trace love's first beginning in mankind,
To know even hate is but a masque of love's
To see a good in evil, and a hope
In ill success.

The other texts are, in order, from Shelley, Wordsworth, Emerson and Matthew Arnold.

New Paynesville, Minn.—The Rev. Helen G. Putnam, of Fargo, N. D., did some good work here this week. On Sunday, the 22d ult., she held a service in I. O. O. F. Hall, kindly donated by the large-hearted members of that order. Fifty persons attended, and gave the closest attention to her fine discourse on character. In the evening she addressed a house-full in the Congregational Church on the Parliament of Religions. She spent the next three days visiting unorthodox families, and found more than a dozen who belonged to no fold, and were glad to hear the free word. Besides these families she found about twenty individuals who were equally glad to hear her. If friends of the liberal faith were to travel about among the people awhile they would be surprised at the endless field for work. Thousands of hearts are waiting to be warmed to life and love by the sunny rays of reason in religion. G. R. S.

Mt. Pleasant, Mich.—The Michigan Conference of Unitarian and Independent Churches will be held at Mt. Pleasant, from the 7th to the 9th of November. The following is the program: Nov. 7, 1893, Opening Sermon, 7:30 p. m., by Rev. W. D. Simmonds; Nov. 8, Devotional Meeting, 9 to 10 a. m., led by Rev. H. Digby Johnston; Reports of officers, Reports from Churches in the State, Appointment of committee, 10 to 11; Paper by Rev. T. B. Forbush, followed by discussion, 11 to 12; Paper by Rev. F. W. N. Hugenholz, followed by discussion, 2 to 3 p. m.; Paper by Rev. J. T. Sunderland and discussion, 3 to 4 p. m.; Platform Meeting, 7 p. m., subject, "The Aids to the Advancement of Liberal Religion"—1st, "Science, Giving Juster Views of God and Man." Rev. H. Digby Johnston; 2d, "Historic Criticism, Giving Juster Views of Revelation and the Bible;" 3d, "Growth of Human Sympathy." Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett; Nov. 9, Devotional Meeting, 9 to 10 a. m., led by Rev. C. J. Bartlett; Paper by Rev. Reed Stuart and discussion, 10 to 11; Paper by Hon. S. U. Hopkin; and discussion, 11 to 12; Closing Business of the Conference and Election of Officers, 12 m.

Manistee, Mich.—The Secretary of the Western Conference preached at Manistee, Oct. 22, and was greeted by a large and sympathetic audience. The church is still without a minister, but is ready for the right person when he or she comes. That they were still alive was shown by their purchasing fifty copies of "Beginnings" within ten minutes of the close of the services.

Ames, Iowa.—Rev. Miss Safford, of Sioux City, who with her colleague, Miss Gordon, has also for some time been caring for the religious needs of Cherokee, preaching there every other week, and contributing to the organization of a promising Unity club, has now turned her attention to the State Agricultural College at this place, in the chapel of which she preached to the students Oct. 15, and in the afternoon held a largely attended inquiry meeting, at which the students kept her busy several hours answering questions. In reference to this occasion The Student, the college paper, spoke as follows:

The talk given by Miss Safford in Morrill Hall Sunday afternoon was appreciated by all, whether agreeing with her belief or not. We have a very able class of ministers to address us on Sundays, and students would enjoy more talks from them after the manner of this one. We are here for education of the broadest kind, for information on all questions and on all sides of the question; and this can only come from the most perfect liberty of discussion and access to all sources of information. It is a violation of the non-sectarian spirit of a State institution to suppress the expression of opinion on one side of a religious question on the supposition that "our side" contains all the truth that has been unearthed and doubtless the truth will perish with us. Let "non-sectarianism" be true non-sectarianism.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—The Cincinnati Branch of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women, of which Mary P. Wells Smith is President, has sent us the following interesting program for 1893-94: October 16th.—Extra-Biblical Religions. Rev. Geo. A. Thayer. A paper written for the International Congress of Unitarians, at Chicago. November 13th.—What I Learned at Chicago. Five-minute talks by Mesdames Brotherton, Corre, Champion, Stanwood, Stone, Sykes, Owens, Goepfer, Ives, and other ladies. December 11th.—Early Unitarianism in Cincinnati. Mrs. Lucy E. A. Keeler. January 8th.—Religious News Committee's Report. February 12th.—Unitarian Hymns and Hymn Writers. Mrs. Davis James. March 12th.—The Religious and Ethical Influence of Poetry. Mrs. E. M. Brown. April 9th.—The Unity of Religions. Miss Anna Laws. May 14th.—Philanthropic News Committee's Report.

Marietta, Ohio.—Services have been held here throughout the summer, and the various activities of the church are already organizing for new work. The Sunday school has started, using "Beginnings" as its text book, with a regular teachers' meeting and the prospect of a Children's Church later. The Unity Club is soon to take up the study of politics; and the Young Ladies' Lecture Committee has just had a lecture by Mrs. Jenness-Miller, the proceeds of which are to go to start a Boys' Club. The indefatigable young minister, Mr. Penney, is giving a course of Monday evening readings from Living American Poets. The following is the list of the authors and the dates: Sept. 25, Thomas Bailey Aldrich; Oct. 9, Edgar Fawcett; Oct. 23, Bert Harte; Nov. 6, Edward Rowland Sill; Nov. 20, Anne Reeve Aldrich; Dec. 4, Walter Learned; Dec. 18, College Verse; Jan. 8, Jas. Whitcomb Riley; Jan. 22, William Watson; Feb. 5, John Henry Brown; Feb. 19, William Dean Howells; March 5, Clinton Scollard; March 19, Hamlin Garland.

Baltimore, Md.—The historic church at Baltimore, which during the twenty years of Mr. Charles R. Weld's pastorate has paid a debt of $30,000 and built a chapel house with many conveniences for the work of the parish, has just completed extensive interior alterations of the church-building, and on the 29th of October commemorated the seventy-fifth anniversary of the dedication of the original building and consecrated the remodeled church to its large religious and humanitarian work. Rev. James De Normandie, of Boston, and the pastor were to conduct the service at 11 a. m. and Rev. Grindall Reynolds was to preach in the evening.

The Brooklyn (N. Y.) Ethical Association will give for the year 1893-1894, a series of lectures, or essays, Sunday evenings, on LIFE, AND THE CONDITIONS OF SURVIVAL, as follows: I. Oct. 29, 1893. "Cosmic Evolution as related to Ethics," by Dr. Lewis G. Janes, President of the Association. II. Nov. 12. "Solar Energy," by Mr. A. Emerson Palmer. III. Nov. 26. "The Atmosphere," by Dr. Robert G. Eccles, 1st Vice President. IV. Dec. 10. "Water," by Dr. Rossiter W. Raymond. V. Dec. 24. "Food," by Prof. W. O. Atwater, of Wesleyan University. VI. Jan. 14, 1894. "Structural Variation," by Prof. E. D. Cope, of the University of Pennsylvania. VII. Jan. 28. "Locomotion," by Dr. L. M. Holbrook, editor of the Journal of Hygiene. VIII. Feb. 11. "Work," by Dr. David A. Gorton. IX. Feb. 25. "Protective Covering," by Mrs. Lizzie Cheney Ward. X. March 11. "Shelter," by Mr. Z. Sidney Sampson. XI. March 25. "Habit," by Rev. John W. Chadwick. XII. April 8. "Sanitation," by Mr. James A. Skilton, Corresponding Secretary of the Association. XIII. April 22. "Philanthropy," by Rev. John C. Kimball, Corresponding Member of the Association. XIV. April 29. "Religion," by Rev. Edward P. Powell, Corresponding Member of the Association. (These essays will be published monthly at 10 cents a copy, by Chas. H. Kerr & Co., and may be obtained at that price from the Unity Publishing Company.)

Olympia, Wash.—Rev. W. G. Eliot, of Seattle, is ministering to the society at this place by coming over Sunday evenings and holding services here. Rev. Napoleon Hoagland, who has labored with the society for three years, is now visiting with his family at his old home in Shelby County, Ill. He tarried three weeks in Chicago to attend the Fair, and he announces his readiness to take work in a new field by the 1st of November.

Santa Barbara, Cal.—Rev. Henry G. Spaulding, who during Mr. Thacher's absence in the East is supplying the pulpit of Unity Church, on October 10 conducted the funeral exercises held over the remains of Rev. Samuel A. Dyberg, who died there at Santa Barbara Cottage Hospital October 8.

Early in the month Mrs. Laura Ormiston Chant addressed a large audience on "The Modern Woman."

Religions of the World.

By JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

THE SEVEN GREAT RELIGIOUS TEACHERS.

- I. MOSES. II. ZOROASTER. III. CONFUCIUS. IV. BUDDHA.
V. SOKRATES. VI. JESUS. VII. MOHAMMED.

These sermons, dedicated to the Parliament of Religions and published through the energy of his parish, have already given the author, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, a wide hearing in that Parliament. Several thousand copies of these sermons were sold during the sessions of the Parliament at the Art Institute. Besides the sermon thought, these little books give in a small space a comprehensive idea of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

MR. H. DHARMAPALA, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes to the committee in reference to the Buddha sermon: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'D ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB, Editor of the Moslem World, published in New York, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia,' and I assure you I am greatly pleased at the manner in which you have treated the subject. It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. I can plainly see how your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain toward Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth. I will be very glad to have some of these lectures to sell, and will place it on our book list."

NOTABLE NEW BOOKS.

Facts and Fictions of Life. By Helen H. Gardener. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

When we find the two qualities, power to make up independent opinion and courage to express it, united in one person, it is always a person who compels our admiration. Helen H. Gardener is one of those persons. * * * She has just published a collection of eleven essays under the title of "Facts and Fictions of Life," all of which abound in vigorous and daring—sometimes extreme—thinking, and are written in a style to attract, to hold attention and to stir the reader's own capacity for thinking if not always to convince.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Asleep and Awake. By Raymond Russell. Cloth, $1.00.

"Asleep and Awake" is a story of thrilling interest, and a nice artistic point has been scored by making the writer the hero of his tale, but keeping his personality concealed until the final page is reached. Portions of the book deal with the boldest realism, but never in an offensive manner. It is strongly done, and the tale is told by a sure and practised hand. The struggle of poor, untutored Lenore, in her contest with the world, is very pathetic, and it will doubtless awake some readers to a new realization of the pitfalls that beset women—especially if they are young and handsome—upon their entry into the great world.—Columbia.

"Asleep and Awake" is a book that will be read with interest by the student of mental philosophy. Between the lines the author throws out bits of thought that might fittingly grace the memoirs of a philosopher of note.—Philadelphia Item.

Information for Nurses in Home and Hospital. By Martin W. Curran. Cloth, $1.75, net.

An excellent work of modest form and price that is certain to be of value to many. It is not a book to teach everyone to be his own physician, but to teach nursing in sufficient quantity to be of avail when no professional is attainable. The fund of information in it is great and of wide range. It teaches what to do before the doctor comes in cases of accident or poisoning. It gives antidotes for all poisons in handy form for quick reference. It teaches how to bandage or set a broken limb when no help can be reached. And this is only a small portion of the whole, and possibly not the most important. The book is illustrated with figures wherever needed and comes highly recommended.—Chicago Times.

Where Brooks go Softly. By Charles Eugene Banks. Crown octavo, blue and white vellum, gilt top, with frontispiece from drawing by T. J. Nicholl, $1.50.

The verses are simple, sweet and true. * * * "Where Brooks Go Softly" will be welcomed with pleasure by those who read Mr. Banks' earlier book, "Quiet Music," and it cannot fail to make new friends for the singer.—Chicago Tribune.

The assertion that Mr. Banks is the brightest writer of verse in the west will not be disputed by readers familiar with his work.—G. W. Weippert in Evening Lamp.

"Where Brooks Go Softly" is the title of a book of poems that you will love, that is, if you love the true, the genuine, the pure that belongs to the human.—Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

"Love! blessed Love! if we could hang our walls with
The splendors of a thousand rosy Mays, Surely they would not shine so well as thou dost,
Lighting our dusty days.
Without thee, what a dim and woeful story
Our years would be, oh, excellence sublime!
Slip of the life eternal, brightly glowing In the low soil of time!"

—Alice Cary.

WE are pleased to learn that we of the West, who have been listening to Mozoomdar and the other prophets of India, have, in turn, been able to make an acceptable offering to their countrymen. The Calcutta Indian Messenger has recently republished in full from UNITY Mr. Gannett's sermon on "Culture Without College;" which at the time of its publication called forth so many expressions of appreciation.

THE Appletons, who have done so much towards popularizing science, have projected a series of books to be known as the "Anthropological Series." The books are to be edited by Prof. Frederick Starr, of the University of Chicago. The first book will be by Prof. O. R. Mason, on "Woman's Place in Primitive Culture." Others will follow on Prehistoric Archaeology, Ethnology, etc. Anthropology is perhaps the newest of the sciences. It certainly must prove not only one of the most interesting but the most important science that can engage the attention of the student. We must improve our anthropology before we can ever ameliorate to any great extent the atrocious theology that still obtains. Let us know more of man; then we may more wisely infer the nature and purpose of the Power that gave him being.

THE following tribute to President Bonney, from The Independent, we quote with much pleasure. The great felicity displayed by Mr. Bonney in saying just the right thing in welcoming each one of the many congresses, could not fail to command the admiration of all.

Of the various people brought into prominence in connection with the World's Fair, there are few who are more interesting in their personality than Mr. C. C. Bonney, the originator, manager and President of the World's Fair Auxiliary, with its multitude of congresses touching upon almost every phase of intellectual development. Mr. Bonney is a man of slight build who would never attract particular attention. He has been known by a limited circle for many years as a quiet, unassuming lawyer, noted for nothing in particular unless it be a broad catholicity which kept his interest alive in the most diverse men and opinions. A Swedenborgian in religious profession, he did not mingle greatly with men of other denominations, so that he was by no means widely known: and when it appeared that it was through his persistence, tact and indomitable energy that such a unique enterprise had not only been conceived but actually carried through, his neighbors in Chicago were not less surprised than those from other parts of the land. His addresses of welcome and introduction have been singularly appropriate, seeming to catch the central thought of all, whether missions or evolution, education, labor or socialism. He has been most ably seconded by those in charge of the different departments, and all have worked together to accomplish what will be far more enduring in its results than the Fair itself, beautiful and wonderful as that is.

The Parish Outlook is the name of the monthly bulletin issued by the Follen Church, East Lexington, Mass., of which our old fellow-worker in the West, George W. Cooke, is pastor. In the November issue it sets forth the non-sectarian attitude of the Follen Church in words which will doubtless express the attitude of a large and increasing number of churches to whom circumstances have given the name "Unitarian," but which are ready to abandon the name promptly the moment it is pushed to any doctrinal limitation or denominational definiteness that will differentiate them from the non-dogmatic work and workers who are now laboring under many sect names or under no denominational name whatever. How long such churches will wear the Unitarian name will be determined by the temper of those who have the name most in keeping. It is acceptable only when it is held loosely, and easily convertible into its literary and spiritual synonyms.

This church is not Unitarian in the sense of requiring that its members shall accept the belief of that denomination; and it is not Unitarian in the sense that the doctrines of that body are specially inculcated from its pulpit. In fact, as in name, Follen church is independent and non-sectarian. Under Dr. Follen it was so organized, and it has continued such to the present time. But in being independent it does not wish to withdraw itself from the sympathy and co-operation of other churches. It is sectarian only in so far as it is necessary to be so, in order to secure fellowship. In so far as its own special work is concerned, it is the distinct aim of Follen church to be a village, and not a denominational organization. That is, in all its work its purpose is to serve the interests of East Lexington and its people, rather than the interests of any denomination. It does not keep before it, as its main purpose, that of making its members Unitarians. Its aim is to serve the moral and religious, social and intellectual, interests of the people of East Lexington. In its religious teaching the aim is to inculcate what is important, positive, and universal. It has no time for debating sectarian differences. It wishes to help individuals, to elevate the community, to make life sweeter and better. In trying to make a non-sectarian church, it is not our aim to make a church that has no religion. We wish to stand for something that is sure and great, that inspires men with hope and faith. What all religious people hold in common seems to answer to this idea. That we try to teach: that the church stands for.

WHAT to do with Prendergast is now a painful question which the Chicago court must decide. We are threatened with a long, learned, wearisome investigation as to the scientific nature of insanity. However difficult it may be to fit his case into exact scientific terms, there is no question but that the strong Saxon word, "fool," fits his case, and fools are dangerous persons to have around always. They are ever liable to do foolish things as this man has, and foolish deeds have always an element of wickedness in them. It will be a ghastly thing to hang a man who in a few years will doubtless die of dementia or some cognate imbecility; a man who is already old before he is thirty, a man whose antecedents on the paternal side helped populate the mad-houses of Ireland. But if there be any intimidating power in punishment it is right that he should be used as a warning to other fools who are being tempted by such short cuts to notoriety and revenge, and it is certainly true that this man has already had too much freedom. The community needs protection from such. It will be hard to find a jury who will hang such an imbecile. It would be a plain and clear and quick task to commit him for life within the walls of Joliet. If the relic of barbarism known as capital punishment were off of the statute books of Illinois it would be a much easier matter to do the wise and the right thing with Prendergast.

WE have quoted in another note the words of George W. Cooks, concerning the name "Unitarian." We desire also to commend his words in the same issue of the Outlook concerning Christianity. Both these notes show how many of our ministers are growing into clearness of utterance concerning these matters. We look for no "changes of front," no startling "revolutions," but there is now taking place a phenomenal change of emphasis. "Pure Christianity," like "genuine Unitarianism," are words that mean nothing when pressed to any doctrinal equivalent. Like the skylark, they sing only when allowed the freedom of the air, the indefiniteness of life. Seize them in the hand and there is no song and not much beauty. Press them close in order to preserve them and the live thing is dead and worthless.

The study of origins and historic relations has shown a common root in the past, and that no sect has a monopoly of good or evil. The tendency of the age towards unity and harmony in other directions,—in politics, in social life, in intellectual ideals,—has led to the same result in religion. The men who honor and trust each other in business during the week cannot hate each other on Sunday because they attend churches that have not the same name and creed. The men who encounter the same high intellectual ideals in the literatures of Pagan, Catholic, and Protestant ages are not likely to give over-much weight to petty divisions caused by religious controversy. Such studies as these have led men to see that the Christianity of controversy and of sect is not the real one which ought to appeal to them.

WANTED A CIVIC CATHEDRAL.

For years we have been urging the need of a free hall, or a nest of halls, in Chicago and other cities. Such a building to be erected not for gain but for humanity; a building around which the educational and the humane interests of the community will gather; a building into which everything that makes for the betterment of the world will be admitted free, subject only to the conditions of good behavior, courtesy, and the necessary rotation, and where nothing coarse, selfish, or speculative would be admitted for any price. Our plea in this direction has been regarded as Utopian by many friends who are disposed to regard UNITY as sane on most subjects. But the practicality of such a scheme has been demonstrated in a large way by the Art Institute Building on the Lake Front during the last six months. Notwithstanding certain remediable annoyances the building itself has been a revelation, a direct contribution to practical sociology. It has shown what a People's Palace under wise direction might do for any and every town. Now that Chicago has it no more for such uses, we begin to realize how helpless this great city is in its struggle with evil of every kind. The friends of culture, refinement and reform are impotent for want of any adequate place in which to exhibit their spiritual wares, and where they may meet for mutual co-operation and consultation. Chicago is again, spite of all its boasted might and hospitality, without a single place at the center of its life where the friends of the city or of any interests of the city may meet to advance such interests without first satisfying the demands of financial, theological, or private courtesies. All the available halls in the city are built with private means by those who have a right to expect in return some private gain. It costs a thousand dollars to control the great Auditorium Hall for a single night, one hundred dollars to secure Music Hall; fifty dollars is the price of Recital Hall, which seats but four hundred and fifty people; and it takes twenty-five dollars to secure the First M. E. Church, the next most available hall in the center of the city. The churches of the city are guarded with the exclusiveness of dogma and of pride. There is a disposition to forbid anything that trespasses upon the creeds or soils the carpets. But if these barriers were removed, it would remain true that the churches of Chicago have escaped from the throbbing heart of the metropolis. They have practically abandoned nine or more square miles at the very core of the city to the minions of darkness; while they have taken themselves to the more luxurious quarters of the favored. They have concentrated their energies to save Michigan Boulevard and associate avenues where the perishing rich are, where the upholstered pews will rent higher and the salaries of the soprano and the preacher be more abundant and secure. If the noble Columbus and Washington halls could be put into iron and glass, certain remediable defects obviated, and the attendant side halls retained as adjuncts, they would become permanent rendezvous for the humanities, a meeting place for souls on the same broad and hospitable basis as the Congress Auxiliary. They would become a winter and summer park for mind. Chicago would gain thereby a School in Sociology, a People's College, a Civic Church, superior in power and municipal influence, we believe, to any school or university within the corporate limits. But this building is already committed to the high uses of art. Let us then have another building more wisely planned. It should be a building none the less commodious and ample, one that will contain a nest of halls ranging in capacity from three thousand to thirty. Let these halls bear the memorial names of Columbus, Washington, Bonney, John Barrows, Bertha Palmer, Ellen Henrotin and others, that the memorable congresses of the world may forever stimulate, direct and check the deliberations therein. Let such a building be intrusted to a body of men and women who have been trained to the work in the Columbian year, and they will show to Chicago and the world what high uses such a building may be put to.

Potter Palmer has recently made the generous offer of $200,000 with which to erect a Woman's Memorial Building. This is a noble gift, but woman deserves a more noble memorial than a building circumscribed by sex. Let the women lead, pool their resources with men, have their upper rooms, with their industrial and other exhibits, but let them help give to Chicago a permanent Congress Hall. Surely there is wealth enough—and conscience enough back of the wealth—to secure for Chicago such a temple of the humanities, a secular cathedral that will give to the citizens of the nineteenth century just what the communities of the middle ages had in their cathedrals. Then the cathedral was the focus of the intellectual, social and ethical interests of the community. In it all the arts then known found their center and their inspiration. Poetry, music, sculpture, painting, and architecture were there enthroned. All these will be welcome to this new civic cathedral, but most of all, the new arts that seek to combine the above for the betterment of life,—the liberal arts that embellish and ennoble human life. Let Chicago have such a building.

Chicago's needs are probably the needs of every city in America. The condition of things here described is practically the condition of all towns. Probably the little cities of from five to twenty thousand are the greatest sufferers in this matter. Where will the first Liberty Hall be built?

TO THINK OR NOT TO THINK.

The increasing frequency of frightful crimes throughout the country impels every thoughtful person to a search for causes for that increase.

These are doubtless many and varied, but among them must certainly be counted the defective or diseased nervous organizations of the criminals, more especially the youthful ones. There is something unnatural about this youthful mania for crime. There is apparently a whole class of young boys, and even girls, growing up in the midst of us, with a criminal tendency, on whom the usual restraints of conscience exert little or no influence; who apparently care nothing for the dividing line between what is right and what is wrong, if they are able to see any such line. In many instances their comprehension of such a line is very much blurred, and the moral law the vaguest possible conception. The causes of this state of things are worthy of the most serious thought and should be diligently sought for. Perhaps the recent utterance of M. Charles Fere, a well-known authority at Paris on nervous and mental diseases, may throw some light on the subject. He says these diseases are frightfully on the increase in France. And he thinks this due to the increase of beer and absinthe drinking, since the establishment of bars about twenty-three years ago. He especially observes the increase of spine and brain diseases in young children, and traces these largely to the drunkenness of the parents, especially of the mothers. The children of such parents, he claims, are often deformed, or idiotic, or violently impulsive and destined to swell the ranks of criminals. In the north of France, where there is a large class of drunken women, things are at the worst in this respect. Children with these defective organizations of course need the wisest and most careful training, but get, as a rule, no moral training whatever. They follow the example of those with whom they live, and begin to crave and to use tobacco and alcohol at an early age,—which hastens the breakdown of their nervous organizations. Of course the accompanying vices of drunkenness are in part responsible for the ruin which is wrought. The crimes of violence against women, so alarmingly frequent now, can be traced largely to that sex-mania induced by debauchery in parents. The papers are crowded, day by day, with accounts of the murder of young girls who refuse to marry men who seek them, and of wives who refuse to live with drunken and depraved husbands, and with even more frightful crimes than these. Is it not time that we seek seriously for the fountain of these evils? And does it not behoove us to search diligently for some remedy? Opinions will differ as to both cause and remedy, but we can scarcely be wrong in disseminating knowledge of the physical and mental and moral ruin which is wrought by the use of stimulants and narcotics, especially by the young and by mothers. Men and Things

IN the death of Dr. Philip Schaff, for so many years professor in the Union Theological Seminary, American Ecclesiastical Scholarship has lost one of its brightest lights. Since his coming to his adopted country nearly fifty years ago, this industrious German-Swiss scholar has made so many useful contributions to ecclesiastical and theological literature that his is probably the best known name in America to the younger theologians.

It is said that Mr. Tom Mann, the English labor leader who did so much for the Dockers by organizing them and thus making their strike possible, is seriously contemplating entering into deacon's orders in the Church of England.

A LETTER to Our Animal Friends from the President of the Society for the Protection of Animals in the State of Vera Cruz, Mexico, sends the cheering intelligence that bull fighting and cock fighting have become a misdemeanor in that State, punishable by fine, imprisonment, and confiscation. An arduous campaign will probably be needed to enforce the law, but its adoption is as great an achievement as all the rest which remains to be done is likely to be.

THE thing for us to remember is that mere censorship by itself, though it may well be the precursor of reform, is not itself reform. The time may easily come to a nation or a community when it is so charmed and satisfied with the swift discernment, the keen sarcasm, the biting rebuke with which the task of censorship is performed, that it will lay down its morning or evening journal, having done no more than read it, with as much complacency as if it had gone to a primary meeting, or had risen up and gone to work to "turn the rascals out."

BREATH IS FOR PRAISE.

Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord. Praise ye the Lord!

—PSALM cl. 6.

Thou art a perfect harmony;
Thy universe doth sing;
Creation beats its journey out Upon a happy wing.

But I a discord seem to be
In all the dear refrain:
Instead of answering with joy
I answer only pain.

O, fashion me such tuneless reed
Unto Thy blowing breath;
Then play on me Thy spirit airs,
Enchanting even death.

Then all my friends shall hear in joy
And each one better be;
And every throbbing of my heart
Be gladness unto Thee.

Music is of Thee, O Lord, and unto Thee it should lift across Thy children's gratitude. With Thy thought that sings Thou touchest discordant sounds and they are shaped into wondrous melodies; and, that we might be raptured of their glory, Thou hast given us the gracious hearing by which we enter into music's dear delights. Thou givest us the music without and the appreciation of it within. Thou makest us its blessed fulfillment. In us it turns into joy. Thou art in such perfect accord with Thyself that Thy being sings in a perfect gladness; and that gladness comes out in the fluting of Thy streams fulfilling themselves in our listening ear; in Thy winds that blow a mighty diapason, or sigh out in blossom-tinted melodies as gentle as a baby's kiss; in the birds that fill the day with their unweary gladness; in all these charming nature sounds that always sing for any man that hath the ears to hear. And in these human voices all are motions of great song that do not yet lift up into Thy conscious praise. And when I think on Thee and all Thy goodness to Thy children here, my heart is moved to concord of sweet sounds, and I would put that heart into these countless sounds, and make the whole round earth an anthem, sung to bless and gladden Him whose life is given to all, whose love, a tender mother-breast, broods over all. When birds I hear, or streams, or lowing kine, when children's voice; and the sounds of busy trade, I'd lift my heart on wings of these until I knew how perfect is Thy kindness and Thy love to all, until somehow I might teach men to pause in self's too busy service, and think upon Thy goodness so, until they take all things of earth and lift them unto Thee in hymns of brother-ministry. While raptured with Thy nature singing everywhere, it came to me that man makes finer music on his instruments than Thou dost breathe through Nature's many pipes; that human voices have diviner melodies than all the throats of happy birds. And then I do recall that this has come to man by patient ways of making, through the growth and through the toil of all the generations. And so I hope that harmony may yet reign over all the earth, that out of all these "increments of patient pain" will come some hymns of love divine enough to satisfy Thy perfect heart, to justify Thy making of the race. Myself will yet become a song of Thy own beauty praising Thee. Thy breath upon me blowing shall yet get answer of love's most perfect, holy song. Thy gracious hand on touching me will yet get answer of such strains as shall bless Thy earth and make Thy heavens ever glad because new beauty's born. For all the world and for myself I'll not despair. Thou art but making us. The time will come, when made, we'll praise Thee as we ought, fulfilling every gracious song that makes the motions of Thy heart a dear delight and saving for these brothers of the human kind, the holy family of Thy holy life. Till then, O Lord, I'll praise Thee as I can; I'd sing the best I know; and Thy dear voice, O let it drop to mine, until Thou teach me how to perfect sing, and give Thee glory in my being's every quivering line, and be Thy benediction to the least of these to whom Thou givest the graces of Thy life, the touches of Thy making them such children as Thy deeps of love determine in their holy dreams. Amen!

Thou art lowing in Thy kine
And bleating in Thy sheep;
Thy singing is the happy birds,
Thy chanting, ocean's deep.

Thou art blowing in Thy winds
And shining in Thy sun.
Thou ripenest the growing grain
And all the saps that run.

Thy tenderness is baby's face;
Thy blushes are the grapes;
No thing's within Thy universe
But that Thy loving shapes.

Creation is Thy coming forth
To do Thy holy will;
And every voice when truest heard Is saying, "Peace! Be still!"

In everything Thy loving glows,
I find Thee everywhere;
No thing is anywhere but that Thy being it doth share.

And so I live eternal life;
And nothing ever dies;
What we are naming death is but
Some fuller life's surprise.

PASTOR QUIET.

A LETTER FROM NORWAY.

A few words from this "land of the midnight sun" may be of interest to the readers of UNITY.

In this southern part of the country no midnight sun can be seen, still at midsummer there is no darkness. One can easily read within doors at eleven o'clock with no other light than the soft twilight. At first, a stranger to these conditions is struck with awe and a feeling of foreignness. Our children could not be persuaded that their bed-time had arrived in such light, and had more faith in their senses than in the clock.

I can imagine nothing more peaceful and restful than a stroll along a country road in the changing, bewitching light of a midsummer night in Norway. Add to the charm of the subdued light the beauty of a view over the fjords, and one must be dull indeed to remain untouched. And the people here—the common people—seem to appreciate these phases of Norwegian nature. They seem loath to give up any part of the summer evening, but may be seen strolling about streets and roads, rowing or sailing on the fjords, or lounging in doorways well on toward midnight.

What the splendid park system of Chicago and other American cities does for the poor is done here by all the country surrounding towns and cities. Kristiania has, indeed, its parks, and many for a city of its size, but it is not to these the working people flock on Sundays and holidays. Beautiful spots on islands and along the water, several miles from the city, attract the crowds on our fine holidays, and these little outings are made possible for even the poorest by the cheapness of fares on railroads and steamboats. For three cents for adults, and half price for children, these fine picnic grounds can be reached, while many others are within easy walking distance. Everywhere bands are playing and flags are flying. The Norwegians have a handsome flag and they hoist it on all possible occasions, from the baby's birthday to the national holidays and festivals. Indeed, one of the first sights to strike me as strange was the forest of flag-staffs to be seen wherever a village nestled in a valley or clung to the steep, rocky terrace along the coast. Often a country villa will be entirely hidden among trees, its presence proclaimed only by the white flagstaff rising above everything.

I can think of nothing finer than a trip on one of the many pleasure steamers around the islands and fjords near Kristiania. Take one of these trips on a fine summer day, in the perfection of weather, not too warm, with clear air, blue waters and a delightful breeze. Or better still, take it on a summer evening at sunset, and while the sky is all aglow and the water reflects the gold and purple light of the west. The band is playing some of the fine music of which the country is proud and for which it is justly famous. The steamer winds in and out, sometimes through a channel so narrow that we can almost touch the steep rocks on either side. The waves thrown up by the boat dash against the shores, the sound echoing and re-echoing. In another minute a broad sheet of water is before us, the islands at a little distance reflected in the smooth surface. One moment we are in a glowing open space, bright with all the glory of the first twilight, the distant mountains still alight in the last rays of the sun, the water reflecting as in a mirror the western radiance and the surrounding woods and hills. In another moment the little steamer turns suddenly into a passage hidden until the course was changed, and from the light and warmth of the open water we pass into cool shadows where all is silent save for the waves from the boat dashing against the overhanging cliffs of gray or black rock.

Many of the larger islands are dotted by pretty country villas, occupied during the summer months by city people. As the steamer nears the little piers, these island people come down for the evening mall, or to meet and walk home with husband, father or friend returning from the day's business; or they are out simply for a stroll and drawn to the landing by the never failing interest in the arrival of the boat. Cheap fares and regular trips by steamers at convenient hours make living in a delightful country home possible, not only for the wives and families of business men, but for the business men themselves. It is possible for the whole family to enjoy country life as cheaply as, or even more cheaply than, in their own city homes; and the husband and father is not confined to hotel or boarding house in the hot city, save for a weekly or monthly visit to the family. Clerks and shop girls, too, are able to benefit by country air and country food. The fare for an hour's ride in a steamer, morning and night, is often cheaper than the same number of trips by street car in the city.

There is a democracy in the summer pleasures here that should gratify an American. High and low, rich and poor, mingle in pleasure resorts, riding in the cheap cars,—and there are three classes on railroads,—traveling on the same steamboats. The working man and his wife, with their flock of little ones, eat their simple picnic lunch in as lovely a spot as their employers, and seem to enjoy everything as fully, if not more so. The chief promenade street in the city has been spoken of by travelers as one of the most remarkable in Europe, not because of its beauty, for it cannot boast of width, fine pavement or architecture, but because here all the city can be seen, all phases of its life. The poorest promenade here, instead of hiding away in slums and back alleys. The servant girl exhibits her bit of finery; the newly confirmed delight to walk here in their new sense of dignity and importance—and their new clothes; while the wealthy lady and her pretty daughters enjoy a stroll during the fashionable hours of the day. On this same street, in the tourist season, one can hear all the leading languages of the world. Germans, Frenchmen and Englishmen, Americans and Italians jostle one another while gazing curiously at show windows, or studying the many photographs, large and small, of fine scenery or interesting spots in Norway.

At present Norway is passing through a political crisis that, however it ends, must mark an important point in its history. The king's refusal to sanction and execute the bill passed by the national assembly, or Storting, for a separate consular service, has roused bitter feeling and a rapidly growing opposition to the union with Sweden. Republican sentiment is increasing, and the king's crown sits very insecurely. He finds Sweden, with its strong aristocracy and unquestioned royalistic feeling, much more to his taste and comfort than his democratic Norwegian kingdom. He did not care to remain here over the 17th of May (the Norwegian Fourth of July), knowing as he did that the liberal demonstration would be most emphatic. The two parties are distinguished by the flags used,—the conservative by the Norwegian flag containing in one corner the mark of union with Sweden, the liberal party by the "clean flag," or the national flag without this mark.

One thing that strikes a New-Englander very forcibly is the indifference to church life. The more intelligent people attend service only on some special occasion, when there is some special attraction,—looking upon the church as nothing to them, but well enough as a restraining force among the poorest and most ignorant. The minister draws his salary from the State, and is a convenient personage at weddings and funerals, and a respectable addition to society. The only earnestness in religion seems to be among the few Methodists and the fewer Catholics. The intelligent, thinking people doubt the old dogmas, but have nothing to replace them, so they drift into agnosticism or indifferentism. Life is without faith, and consequently rather dark and pessimistic. Unitarianism, with its bright, cheering faith, is unknown. The liberals are such only as rejecting the old and ready for a new, liberal gospel. That they are ready is shown by the eagerness with which a lecture or talk on liberal religion is received. Mr. Lyche has given several lectures in Kristiania and other places, and has been urged to start at once a Unitarian church. At one of the lectures the speaker asked that those who would help on such a movement should send in their names. Seventy did so at once. A lecture was given before the theological students of the national university (Lutheran, of course) at the students' request. And there are among those students quite a number too liberal for the State church, yet with no chance for any other. There is no doubt, whatever, that a liberal church could be started easily in the capital and its influence would spread throughout the country, reacting, no doubt, on Norwegians in America. Kristiania is more a center for Norway than any city in the United States is a center for its own State or part of the country. It is to Norway what Paris is to France. In Kristiania one elbows all the men and institutions that affect the country at large. From the papers in the capital other papers take their cue. If an artist has painted a picture of merit, one has only to walk down the street in Kristiania to see it exhibited in the window of an art store or advertised as within. Ibsen, of world-wide fame, is a familiar figure on the streets and at the cafe of the largest hotel. Bergen is the only other city to share the honor of being at all a center for thought and culture. So in religious matters, also; Kristiania is the center from which the influence of a liberal religious movement would most widely spread, and spread beyond the boundaries of Norway.

A THOUGHT.

I once saw a great point of rock, solid, immovable, lifting its shoulder above the turbulent rapids of Niagara. So at the Parliament of Religions and the Congress of the Evangelical Alliance, I saw a few great ideas lifting themselves grandly above all the flood of varying creeds and contrary opinions: the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, Evolution, Unity, the Institutional Church.

But a few months ago above the swamps and confusion of Jackson Park deep foundation piles were seen, upon which, afterwards, was reared the White City by the lake.

Oh, the city to be reared upon the foundations so plainly visible above the flood of opinion at the Art Palace! Of its soft splendors, its restful waters, its opportunities, its inspirations, who shall speak? Afloat upon its waterways, what visions shall be seen? At home in the heart of its tenderness, what shall God's children be?

UNIVERSAL RELIGION AND JUDAISM.*

A DISCOURSE BY EMIL G. HIRSCH.

No one alive to the working forces of our day can be blind to the fact that among them is a wonderful quickening of the religious spirit promising in recent years—if not in weeks—a strong movement toward a broader and more inclusive statement of the highest truths. This religious re-awakening must be a surprise to those that in the last decades have never ceased emphasizing the empty pretense that religion has yielded the torch to the sciences; that religion is a mist, weaving its curtain during the damp and dark hour of the night, to be torn asunder by the bold arrows sent forth from the quiver of day's monarch. The sciences have not disproved religion's claims; on the contrary, the methods of the sciences applied to this phenomenon in human life and human history, have demonstrated incontrovertibly, that religion is essential to man, and is necessary to human society. In strict accord with the teachings of the sciences the children of this era are once more searching for religious light, and hungering for religious inspiration. However, the ambition to-day is not so much to rebuild the small temples in which of old the fathers breathed forth their prayers, and in which they gathered their manna of consolation. Those temples, we feel it, are too narrow; in keeping with a much larger plan the religious architects of our day are attempting to erect a new edifice, in which God's altar shall once more blaze forth with light, to weapon man with the highest thoughts and stir him with the deepest emotions. In one word nothing short of universal religion stands in the foreground of our anxiety—our strongest affection, our most impatient hope.

Universal religion may, at first thought, appear to be one of the easy consummations of modern day. The sympathies of all men are to-day flooding beyond the old barriers. We defy distance; we laugh at the anger of oceans; we refuse to obey the mandate of mighty mountain ranges, from whose peaks sound the warning: "Thither, but no farther!" Where is the impediment that we would respect in our onward march of triumphant victory? East and West are closest neighbors; the North looks in at the windows of the South; zones, geographically marked off, mingle together, scorning the distinctions dotted off by human hands or emphasized even by climatic conditions. Why, then, should not, in religion, man be brought nearer unto man? The universal religion certainly would appear to be the final glory of this marvelous age of intrepid progress, of unchecked advance in all spheres of human endeavor. Yet, tempting as the outlook is, bewitching as this peep into paradise unquestionably is, the dream's realization is much more difficult than it presents itself to the first glance. Religion to a certain degree is the product of local conditions and of temporal circumstances, as clearly as it is the exponent of a universal human need and the attempt to bring into harmonious relations individual human life with the eternal spirit in and above the sweep of the ages, with the Law of Him in whom all that is, moves and has its being.

Man as an abstract concept is the same at the equator as at the poles; but the man who builds his house in the moderate climate, is actually differentiated from both the brother who marvels at the midnight sun, and his fellowman under skies where night and day are always equal. Climatic conditions have left their imprint on religion's presentation and not merely, as perhaps one might suppose, in religious ceremony, but also in religious thought. It is easy to understand, that where nature by her very liberality makes life a luxury, the great questions which are fundamental to religion, are answered in a way different from that followed where the skies are leaden and the soil is barren. India, for instance, by the very exuberance of its vegetation makes life worthless. Its sun is so intense as to render activity almost impossible. India is the predestined home of the contemplative. By no accident or artifice, but simply in consequence of its climatic conditions, India followed a path of religious evolution, the ultimate outcome of which is the thought that conscious life is a burden, a fatal error of the creative power—a curse, while contemplation, meditation, inactivity, are the cardinal virtues, pointing the way to salvation from the limitation and load of conscious life. We need not assume an accidental or artificial perversion, but simply familiarize ourselves with the natural conditions of Asia Minor, Syria, and the territory which homed originally the Semites, to understand what led there to the pregnant notion that the creative energies of nature claim veneration, and the generative process appeals to the instinct of reverence and awe as the supreme and frightful mystery. Under the influence of that potent, though to us repugnant conception, human sacrifices could not but form an essential part of religious economy. Under it those frightful rites, indescribable though they may be in our tongue, and offensive even in suggestion to our sense of shame, not merely unimportant shadows but at the very root of the Semitic ritual, are a natural sprout which could not help ingratiate itself with the people living amidst the conditions that gave it sap. In another belt where the sun deftly wields the brush of the artist, and nature herself is beaming in the golden tints of beauty, religion becomes an invitation to worship the beautiful, and the divine heralds itself to man through the subtle revelations of form and harmony. The religion of Greece is a fairy version of the poem scanned by the blue sky itself; the echo of the odes sung by the sea beating its rhythmic cadence upon the shore of Ionia's islands, bursting upon the eye of the beholder like flashes from brilliant jewels dropped from a richer casket, or molded like perfect figures clean from gifted sculptor's chisel.

And, so not to weary you with details, the phenomena of religion's history press home abundant evidence, that climatic conditions go far to make and mar the character of all religions which have asserted themselves since man's tenure of the earth. Time, too, or historical conditions, have played no mean part in the development of religious doctrines. Religion's first tendency is toward isolation; that is to say, religion at first divides rather than unites men. Only when other energies have breached the restricting wall of clan, race or nationality, religion avails itself of the opening and broadens its outlook and stakes off its domain with a wider measure. In tribal society, humanity cannot be conceived of as the child of the one God. The tribe thinks itself the offspring of its own deity; but each tribe is child to another god. The god whom men worship assigns to them a place within or without the community, the confines of which restrict the domain of the duties one man owes to another. Commerce and war pierce these barriers of blood or locality; they prepare the way for religion to widen its fellowship, and thus the tribal god grows into the god of one nation, and still later the national god into the God of all humanity.

Historical conditions have in this wise affected the making of our theological systems and the trend of men's religious ideas. To-day we would have the universal religion. Has humanity advanced far enough to rise above local conditions, climatic surroundings and historic influences? It seems we have the power to rise above the merely local or the climatic, for to-day—to compare something extremely trivial with something deeply tremendous—viz., fashion with religion—we find that in dress the national peculiarities are rapidly fading away. The cut of a lady's garment is almost the same to-day in Capetown and Paris. National costumes are almost everywhere discarded. Now and then in some secluded nook of some European mountain range the lonely traveler stumbles upon a peasant woman still proud to wear the unchanged headgear of her mother. In the middle ages the different classes of society were distinguished from each other by their dress, but the advancing spirit of our age has wiped away these invidious outward signs of class and rank. With us, it is difficult to distinguish, at a social dinner, the waiter from the gentleman, and the guest of "low" birth from the baron of high descent. So to-day rapid intercommunication and exchange of thought and commodities, have forced the national costumes to recede before the common universal uniform, befitting the men and women of all nations alike.

Climatic conditions, therefore, seem to be among those things which need not affect us. If they have no longer voice in deciding the cut and color of our garment, they certainly need not have influence over our metaphysics—our views on the universe, or the significance of life and its relation to that power that rules us and directs our affairs as well as those of nations and the world at large. These climatic conditions were important—and we can easily see the reason why—in the infancy of religion. Then, indeed, man, helpless, found himself face to face with a world full of marvels and bristling with horrors. Man's knowledge of self and his world was imperfect, he could not escape viewing the universe in the light in which it presented itself to him, as some stupendous energy, or an aggregate of energies, weaponed with the tornado's breath and the volcano's fires. Naturally, man feeling his utter helplessness fell prostrate, implored mercy, and found none. Where, however, nature's power delighted to smile on him and woke the fragrance of the rose to bewitch him or offered him the horn of plenty, joy could not but echo in his own heart, and fill him with the trustful certainty that nature was not unkind. But to-day we hold the key to nature's mystery. We feel at least our mastery over nature's forces, we believe in the possibility of our controlling them to our use. We are not frightened at the roar of the thunder, nor are we swayed by the softer pleadings of the flower's beauty. Nature to-day speaks to us in a dialect different from that in which she addressed our remote ancestry. And therefore in religion we can rise, nay, we have risen, above climatic natural conditions.

The difficulty in the way of the proclamation of a universal religion lies in another plane. Historical influences are not as easily overcome as are the local. Men are the children of their parents; as these in turn are the offspring of their progenitors. In the eighteenth century thinkers affected to disregard this fact. For them, man was in the beginning; and the historical evolution along and into national channels was then thought to be a lapse from the original grace. The differentiation into Christian and Jew smacked in their opinion of arbitrary perversity. Lessing's is a beautiful presentation of this view of the eighteenth century. But we of this nineteenth century, contemporaries of Darwin and Wallace,—we who have listened to the story told by Nature, and have watched the processes of her growth,—we are not, we cannot be blind to the ever active law of heredity. Not man as such, but a concrete man was first created. Man did not open the procession of the ages, but the prehistoric and historic clan and tribe registered its qualifying name on the first page of Time's ledger, as do to-day the Frenchman, the German, the Russian, theirs. The babe born here to-day differs spiritually from the little ball of humanity opening its eyes to the light in Norway and Sweden. These elements cannot be underrated or neglected. Man as such is not the beginning of history, but its ultimate issue. No greater truth underlies the dogma of pristine humanity and subsequent lapse into nationality, as taught by the thinkers of the eighteenth century, than does the theological assumption of original moral perfection in Adam in Paradise, lost to the race after the fall. Lessing, of course, occupies the highest promontory of the outlook. But we in this age, while envying his enthusiasm for humanity, cannot as quickly be steadied with so great a faith in so erroneous a theory. Historical conditions are stubborn factors in the equation. The great question for us is how to utilize these historical conditions with the ultimate goal, a universal religion, unswervingly kept in view. All one may venture safely to assert is that these historical conditions are beginning—but merely beginning—to be utilized. Thousands and thousands of men and women believe in a universal religion; but as yet that universal religion is their own, no other and no one's else. The Christian to-day professes his impatience for the universal religion; but explicitly or implicitly by him, Christianity is alone credited with the right to this exalted function. Our Buddhist friends in the same spirit insist that they are in possession of the universal religion; and, therefore, beg leave to invite all men to accept Buddhism. Every faithful believes his own to be the predestined universal faith. The Jew is no exception. Especially he of Chauvinistic leanings, fond of trumpeting his glories, has no doubt that he is of the chosen people. He is convinced that the universal religion is his; his little Judaism not merely is the bud but the blossom of universal religion. What need for him of a Parliament of Religions? Have then the dividing historical conditions been eliminated? The leaven of separation is still working. History has dug the channels along which the streams run. Time alone, not quick revolution, can force the current to the meeting point. The waters will commingle, but as yet, though flowing toward the place of union, they are distinct from each other.

So, the universal religion is, now as ever, an ideal. What, now, is the attitude of Judaism toward this ideal? Of course, I exclude that Judaism which I have just now characterized. That Judaism is, in its own conceit, so perfect, as to need no further light; it is so thoroughly convinced of its exclusive destiny as to scorn as a slight the suggestion of a further expansion. It is as narrow as any dogmatic Christianity; as narrow as ever was barbaric tribalism. At the risk of being accused of anti or un-Jewish vagaries, I confess that I have no sympathy with a narrow Judaism, and I have no hesitancy to avow that I propose to expose its arrogance whenever it may lift its self-laudatory voice.

What is true Judaism's attitude toward universal religion? The Judaism of the prophets has always waited impatiently for the dawn of universal religion's blessed era. You perhaps would doubt this? Read, I pray, the prophets! Is there one that fails to passionately proclaim his yearning for the light of the day when universal religion will bring together all men around God's altar? They are silent as to the name by which this larger covenant will be known. They would not label it Judaism. They picture that coming time as the age when none will say to his neighbor, "Know ye Yahweh; for from the least to the highest, from the youngest to the oldest, all men know Yahweh, the earth will be full of the knowledge of God as the waters cover the depths of the sea." The only limitation I discover is that the universal religion shall be a God-religion. But what is understood by the term God-religion, according to the prophets? "Not," say the prophets, long before Jesus of Nazareth repeated the same thought, "not those who exclaim: 'The temple of the Lord! the temple of the Lord!' have the knowledge of God. He whose hands are clean and whose heart is pure; who doeth no wrong; whose conduct is God-like, he evinces the knowledge of God."

Thus, while the religion of the prophets is fully assured that the world is reasonable, that not chance, but purpose, presides at the loom upon which are spun the patterns unrolled in time and nature, on the other hand, these prophets recognized thousands of years ago, that not creed but deed, not confession but conduct, made the God-like, and gave warrant for the conviction and belief in the one and only God. Their God was the ideal of holiness. His service consisted not in sacrifice, but in the service of man to man.

The prophets, in their religion, had risen above climatic limitations. I have before indicated that in Syria and Palestine, the climate made for a sensual religion; a religion worshipping the generating powers in a frightful manner. Do not speak too often of the "Hebrew" race. Those who know what the Hebrew race were lay the hushing fingers on their lips. The old Hebrew religion was like all other Semitic religions of that time. Sacrifice of life and virgin virtue was as little abhorred by the Hebrew of old as by the other ancient Semites. The prophets rose above these climatic influences. They preached the holy God of Sinai. In Palestine, the land of the fig and olive, the land of corn and wine, they spoke for the stern God of Sinai. The early prophets, or to be more exact, the Nazarites disregarded, at this early period, locality and territorial characteristics. These old prophets evolved the god of morality in sheer contrast to the deity of immoral incitement, grown out of and the reflection of the climatic conditions of the then-land of Canaan. The prophets, however, were themselves carried along to the fullest extent by the sweeping current of historical development. Earlier prophets are still convinced that Yahweh is the god of Israel alone: Every people has a god. Moab and Ammon theirs, Israel his. The distinction between the god of early Isaiah and the god of other nations lies not in the unity of Israel's god, but in his "holiness." "Wash ye: make ye clean." This admonition spells an element which the theology of no other nation could grasp. The second Isaiah—to overleap the intervening links—announces the one universal God. The exile matured this wider thought. I have no doubt the opening chapters of Genesis date from the same period. It was then that to the history of Israel those chapters of universal tendency dealing with man and not with the Jew, were prefaced as a grand monument to the universal possibilities of Biblical religion. It would thus seem that there is no conflict between the religion of the prophets and the universal religion to come. But if this be true, why is it that Judaism has refused three times in its history to flower forth not merely ideally, but actually into the universal religion? Ezra was the first to descend from this high prophetic mount of outlook to the narrow valley of Judaism. Can we blame him? He was convinced that Judaism had a mission, but he was also deeply conscious that the stream, unless confined at the source, could not deepen, but would, remaining shallow, slowly stagnate and evaporate. In order to preserve the prophetic idea he ramparted it by formidable walls. History has justified his course. The fate of the Samaritans would also have been that of his colony. The second chance was offered when Christianity stepped out into the world. Why did Judaism not then cast off the hampering vestment of national texture and take on the wide flowing garment of the Prophet, calling all men to God's service? The teachers felt then, and justly, that were Judaism to leave its protecting bastions, the pure doctrine of the religion of conduct would be greatly endangered, if not speedily replaced, by a religion of creed. The history of Christianity verified their intuitive fear. Those Jews—the early Christians were Jews—that sought the broader world at that time, exchanged the fetters of national ritualism for the still more galling restraints of dogma.

Is Paulinism the religion of conduct? Christianity began as an ethical movement, it ends with a creed. Hatch's book on the Greek element in Christianity shows how it had to end thus. The Greek speculative spirit so repressed the Jewish ethical idea that the unequal combination of the two produced a barren creed. Judaism's narrower course was justified—for the sake of the freer thought it could not then give up its own religion. The time was not yet ripe, historical conditions had not yet prepared the soil for the reception of the seed. Is the world riper to-day? Ah! no: If we had heeded twenty years ago the cry: "Out, out, give up Judaism," we should have then had to pact with atheism. The atheists of yesterday are to-day convinced of their mistakes. But what of agnosticism? Even "agnostics" to-day are working for a positive religion; and many an atheist of twenty years ago, and many an agnostic, who would not have brooked in his hearing the pronouncing of the name of God, is to-day worshipping at the shrine of orthodoxy. Know ye not that many an "atheist" of this type to-day runs after Dr. Stoecker and is a member of the evangelical church? This little straw points the direction of the tide. Were we then wrong twenty years ago in refusing to throw away our safeguards? Can we afford this experiment now with less risk? The world around us—to-day as yesterday—labels all virtue as Christian. Take the most advanced Unitarians: Do they not always talk of Christian charity, Christian gentleness? Christianity is for them the only universal religion of right conduct. Shall we then give up our name as long as it is a by-word among the nations; as long as it is held that it covers either stubbornness, obstinacy, blindness or downright wickedness? He is a coward who would take to his heels in days of danger. Shall we be cowards? They must first give up the name Christian as qualification for all that is noble or good, or true, before we will consider the proposition to sink our historic designation. We may make ready to give up our livery when they abandon theirs. We can wait. In the meantime we enlarge our temples; we open our doors. But, say you, ethical culture is not a victim to this conceit. There certainly is not talk of Christian virtues. No, there is not. But there again the claim is advanced that to be abreast with the wider thought of humanity, one must cease to be a Jew! Jew for them is always a sign of a predisposition to prejudice, and as one of the leaders put it, one must either give up thinking or abandon Judaism. As long as thus the name my fathers bore is held up to ridicule or is said to imply wickedness or inferiority, I for one will claim it as my badge of honor. And I do this all the more eagerly since the Judaism of the prophets has taught everything that is expressed to-day in the name "humanity." This is not an idle claim; it is substantiated by the facts. Therefore I am a Jew; not less a man for being a Jew. Our congregation to-day would do a great service if it would only recognize the fact that we must change our system of the organization and adopt the method of all other denominations, that of individual memberships. If we did, we could carry out our program easily. Six years ago, as urged by the then president of this congregation, we declared that we are not a Jewish congregation in the narrow sense that Jews by the accident of birth alone can join us; we are a society of men and women banded together for the spread of the ideas proclaimed by our prophets. Why has that declaration seemed a mere empty boast? The reason is not to be found in the adjective Jewish congregation, but in the system of organization. This system is a stumbling block in the way of our growth. I verily believe this Sinai Congregation, as a Jewish congregation, could become a nucleus for a wider movement to embrace all that are unchurched, but that are not ready to hold that God has been dethroned and this world is the purposeless product of chance. We could father a genuine "ethical culture" movement, but from the inclusive side, because we are convinced that after all the uniform cannot, by its outward appearance, replace an inner harmony, which, even without the external accessories, will not fail in due season to assert itself.

And therefore our Judaism may welcome every movement looking toward a universal religion. We cling to the word Jew, because the world for eighteen centuries hath made it synonym with all that is evil. The fathers call upon us from their graves to defend their memory from this opprobrious, this unjust imputation; and I as one of their sons cannot be deaf to the call, I must defend this sacred memory as long as it is aspersed and attacked; in this sense we are Jews. Our prophetic Judaism is universal; we need not give up the name. But when the world relinquishes all other qualifying adjectives, in God's name and under God's blessing, we will not forget our duty. Then the Jewish temple is enlarged into the temple of humanity, and then Sinai's thundering law in truth executed by all the world renders it unnecessary that the watchman of Sinai should still stand at the post.

"May God speed that day when Judaism is no longer needed! We have, on the Day of Atonement, in the concluding service, a beautiful prayer, "Open to us the gates at the time when the gates are closing." Read that prayer again! If ever radical Judaism found a trumpet voice in clarion tones to proclaim its hopes, it found it in that prayer. Why, it is a prayer for the destruction of Judaism by the rise of a broader humanity. Such is the gist of the Neilah, as conceived by the loyal of all loyal Jews, immortal Einhorn. Judaism asks for its own dissolution when humanity's broad daylight dawns. This hope is the program for reform; it is the watchword of our expectations. The gates will open, and we shall pass out into the wider gates of humanity. But as long as these wider gates are shut—our own open in front; should not be closed behind ourselves. Yet the day cometh—not perhaps to-morrow; it may be in a hundred years—when that broad gate will be thrown open and all men will march on to the altar of truth and righteousness, which is the altar of the common God. Then universal religion has triumphed, and no one will say to the neighbor: "Know ye God! for then they know God from the least to the highest; from the poorest to the richest."

ETHICS AND RELIGION.

DEAR UNITY:—Having been "on the go" this summer, I have but recently seen UNITY for June 8, in which Mr. Sanders replies to some remarks of mine.

I do not believe much in argument as a means of arriving at the truth, but I do believe free, honest discussion and a careful use of terms to be helpful to that end. By a different use of certain words Mr. Sanders has made some of my statements appear at a disadvantage. In the interest of clear thinking permit me a few words of explanation.

We do affirm that God is in the flower and the dog as truly as in man, but not in the same degree. We believe that by a process of evolution through ages past man has come to stand as an embodiment of all that is below him; also that as a spiritual being he is the embodiment of all that is above him; that he reflects all of the attributes of Divinity. According to our understanding then, man is not only a part of the universe but contains the potentiality of the whole—is a microcosm. If this were true of the "vegetable" or "dog," then might those terms be substituted in my argument for the word "human," but not otherwise.

Now, in regard to Ethics. It seems to me confusion is the result of trying to make a separation between the True, the Beautiful and the Good. The Truth contains of necessity the Beautiful and the Good. Goodness and Beauty should be considered as different phases or manifestations of Truth. In my previous letter I defined Ethics as "the science of right living." Webster puts it: "The science of human duty," which is the same thing. It is in this sense alone that "ethics," or its synonym "morality," is a larger term than "religion." The breadth or narrowness of the term ethics depends wholly on a man's idea of what his duties are. Canine ethics, Hot-tentot ethics, Puritan ethics and Unitarian ethics all differ from each other, and while each might be "highly moral" according to his standard of ethics, all might fall short of the ethical ideal of the man who thinks ethics rightly means "the science of human duty"—religious duties not excepted. Because the Puritan was "highly moral," according to his narrow ethical understanding, we are not justified in concluding that the ideally moral man, according to our standard, could be also "at a low stage" religiously. I claim that it is not only an error to suppose "religion can exist without morality," but that it is equally erroneous to believe that a man can fulfill all moral obligations without being truly religious. We find in our own nature faculties relating us to the beautiful and the sublime; also faculties relating us to the spiritual world; all requiring attention and cultivation as truly as those faculties that have to do with providing the physical necessities of life. One who neglects to cultivate his religious nature and his love for the beautiful fails to comply with some of the most important demands of the laws of his being, all of which he is morally bound to obey.

The reference to physical imperfections was foreign to my argument. So far as a physical blemish is the result of disobedience to law the person is responsible, but a man may be ideally good, or "perfect" in the sense I meant it, and yet be far from the ideal physically.

My ideal of a "highly moral" man, is one who recognizes the moral sense or the "inward voice" as his true guide, believing it to be the voice of God in his soul. This monitor will instruct him to consider all his faculties divine and will instruct him in proper methods of use and development. Surely such a man must regard his religious duties—though only a part—yet a most important part of his life duties. Such a man will be of necessity "the lover of beauty and of truth no less than of goodness."

E. S. GREER.

Mayfield, Cal.

[As Mr. Greer neither accepts my definition of religion nor offers one of his own, I should still be unable to discuss the question further with him even were I to accept his definition of the province of Ethics. But in so far as the use of terms is the point at issue, to expect me to accept his is for Mr. Greer to beg the question. My use of terms in the letter of June 8 was the same as in the sermon which formed the basis of Mr. Greer's original criticism; and that is certainly all that he should expect.

World's Fair Notes

A few weeks at most and the vision of the White City will be a memory. But the memory of it and the glory of it will not soon vanish from the earth. The story has already been told under every sky. Prince Wolkonsky has expressed his weariness of the "Alpha and Omega of American life," which he pronounces to be "Business." "In other countries people work in order to enjoy life; here they live in order to perform their business." Our people give him "the impression of so many cooks who prepare, in tremendous hurry, a bountiful banquet which they will never eat." We have at times felt something of this ourselves, but it is probably all a mistake.

"Business," here, may be in excess in many instances, but the spectacle to be witnessed in America is a whole people thrown individually on their own resources for the outcome of their lives. And so it happens that "Every man hath business,

Such as it is."

It is altogether a new thing in the world to have an unlimited ambition thrust upon everybody, with the accompanying penalty that everybody must set to work, do "business," to feed that ambition. That we have not learned as a people to gauge precisely the wise proportion of business and pleasure, is due undoubtedly to the fact that we are as yet new to the endeavor, have not had time in which to moderate and keep all things in the happily balanced. But that we have some idea of enjoyment beyond the "rush" and worry of too much "business," is proven by this unparalleled exhibit of beauty and industry just brought to a close. Here we give back our answer to the charge of "sordid materialism." By the transmutations of genius our American "materialism" passed into the most ethereal splendor our little earth has had the happy fortune to witness. And when we come to sift to the bottom this pestilential "business" mania we shall find there reserved the thought of a happiness and peace that shall, like the splendor of the great Fair, pass understanding. The "business," Prince, is the getting ready. You are weary of this "business," and now of the "Fair," and ask plaintively, "Don't you think we have heard too much of it?" Doubtless we Americans overdo the matter. We tire ourselves of talking, but principally for the reason, I believe, that we always wind up with the consciousness that words are inadequate. We have no speech to express our soul's delight. We can only say, "This is what America means. Take it all back, all you other people have said about our worship of the Almighty Dollar. The dollars we revere, but 'tis a borrowed glory they wear—the shadow of the coming things, excellent and always to be cherished, toward which we press as to the mark of a high calling.”

There is much to be forgiven, Prince, here in America, but so much more to be revered and applauded, that we ourselves do the “forgiving” part easily and relegate it to the rear. Our “sins” are many, but they are the more certain to be “washed white” if we press on with our “business,” carrying also in our hearts expectations of marvels yet to be.

“The Future hides in it Gladness and Sorrow :
Press we still thorough.—
Naught that abides in it Daunting us—onward !

The work of demolition is begun, but out of it all there will doubtless be reserved a small remnant that will save to the future some realizing sense of the City that was.

And very likely, too, that future will say of it all, “Very good for the year '93; but easily now we build a far more imposing exhibit of the genius of the human race.”

So, farewell, and “so mote it be.”

POSTSCRIPT.—I am permitted by the generous editor of UNITY to add as postscript to my concluding “Notes” of the Fair a word personal to myself and my own undertakings. From time to time there have of late appeared in this journal kind words and references to the new magazine which I shall issue as a sort of companion to my other work: a magazine for young people, “The Start in Art, Science and Literature.” The first number is going through the press, and would have been out before this, but for interferences unavoidable but unlooked for. I am able to make a “World’s Fair note” of this because the decision to issue a quarterly periodical of the character of The Start was reached early in my attendance at the Fair; the influences, suggestions, acquaintances made there strongly and decisively urging me so to do. I could say to Prince Wolkonsky, with an utter sincerity, that this is not business with me in what he regards as the tiring sense, though I hope as sincerely there will be “business” enough in it to float it and make it serve well the good purpose for which its career is begun. The readers of UNITY may find The Start an “extension” only, but one in which the younger people, I believe, will find themselves interested.

The Study Table

SOME NEW BOOKS.

WHERE BROOKS GO SOFTLY. By Charles Eugene Banks. Chicago: C. H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 172. $1.35.—A book of poems, as the title would indicate, some of which are wholesome and helpful, and others of which show a sympathy with the sad or wrong conditions of life that ends with depression and bitterness. Such titles as “The Bitter World” and “Unrewarded” will give a hint of this, but of only a part of the book’s tenor. There are poems of nature and life that are pleasanter reading, and confirm the belief that poems and songs should be uplifting rather than depressing. That the author himself feels this is indicated by one of his most attractive ones :

HE WROTE FOR ALL.

“The world is cruel, careless, cold,”
I sighed, “and cares for naught but gold !

Why should my troubled pages plead
A brother’s woe—a brother’s need !

“My song is drowned in Mammon’s roar”

(I flung my pen upon the floor).

“The hand that fortune stoops to bless Must crush the buds of tenderness.”

My toddling wee one put the pen
Into my trembling hand again ;
And, clambering upon my knee,
Said, archly : “Papa, wite for me.”

I wrote—a homely, childish tale
Of hope and love—no pensive wail
Of others’ wrongs—but what her smile
Had wakened in my heart the while.

And when the ink had scarcely dried,
I heard the song on every side ;
It filled the land from sea to sea, While thousands cried, “He wrote for me !”

A HANDBOOK OF RATIONAL PIETY. By Henry W. Crosskey, LL. D., F. G. S. London: Philip Green. Cloth, 16mo, pp. 173. 2s. 6d.—This book consists of extracts from sermons delivered in the course of a lengthened ministry. It is carefully arranged in topics, and the extracts following the headings are brief and readable. Nearly all questions of religious import are touched upon in this volume, and the handling of them is able and often eloquent. It would be a helpful book in many homes. H. T. G.

WE have received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association the following Essays and Sermons: “Punishment for Sin: Is it Eternal?” by H. Shaen Solly, M. A.; “The Son of Man in His Day,” by Horatio Stebbins; “Things Doubtful and Things Certain,” by George Batchelor; “The Unshaken,” by James De Normandie; “The Great Reconciliation,” by Henry Woods Ferris; “All Things for Good,” by C. H. Wellbeloved. They are all strong, well-considered utterances of the essential truths of liberal Christianity, and are excellent tracts for the time, deserving a wide circulation. The names of the authors alone are a sufficient guarantee of this. H. T. G.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE CYCLOPÆDIC REVIEW OF CURRENT HISTORY, which is the new name for the old Quarterly Review of Current History, is a very useful publication for the busy man who wants to know what has actually been taking place. The new arrangement which appears in the number for the second quarter, whereby the most widely discussed questions are given a special place at the beginning of the magazine, is, we think, an improvement for which those who most use the magazine will be thankful.

THE UNIVERSALIST SECRETARY, of Des Moines, Iowa, gives evidence of prosperity by increasing its size two fold. UNITY is a willing, although an unintentional contributor to the pages of the enlarged sheet, and extends the hope that the Secretary may grow in usefulness as well as in size.

ALL the more important addresses presented in the Parliament—Catholic, Protestant, Denominational, Hindu, Buddhist, Chinese, Parsee, Japanese, Mohammedan, will be given verbatim exactly as they were presented. Men of unique interests and masters of many faiths, from the ends of the earth, poured into the Parliament a wealth of aspiration, experience, learning, thought and worship, wholly unexampled in the previous history of our race. Agents are reporting immense success. Sales promise to equal that of “Grant’s Memoirs” and Stanley’s book. Good salesmen make from $15 to $20 a day. Exclusive territory. First choice to those who apply first. Full outfit, $1.00. Act quick. Address PARLIAMENT PUBLISHING COMPANY, Chicago.

THE KNIGHT.

Not alone to the days of the storied past

Shall noble deeds belong ;

To-day may make us heroes true

As those of olden song.

We will fight, as of old, for the weak, the sad ;

We go on the knightly quest,

To turn the bad to good for man,

And leave the better best.

And men, they shall see that the Right is Joy,

Though death may be its cost !

That though we fail, his Right shall win,—

No field of God is lost !

AN APPLE MISSION.

One day, upon answering a gentle ring of my door-bell, I found a sweet little girl, five or six years old, waiting to see me. A tiny white handkerchief was folded across her shoulder and came down to a point at the waist. On her left arm hung a red and black calico stocking-bag. A quaint, curious little figure she was. Her errand was as singular as her appearance.

"Will you let me mend stockings for you this morning, ma'am, or mittens? I will mend for five cents an hour, and I can mend toerably well, drama says."

I drew her into the sitting-room, gave her a small chair by the fire, and said: "Now, my dear, tell me why you want to mend stockings for me?"

Without appearing to heed my question she gravely drew from her bag a gray stocking, with a nicely mended heel.

"Here," she said, "is a hole I mended for drama yesterday. Proerbyly you would like a zample."

I praised her neatly darned "hole" and repeated my question. She smiled and said brightly, "Oh, yes, drama said I should have to 'splain to you

'bout my 'slety betause you might not know all about it. You see, there's ten of them, and they're very tired at night, and apples rest them. You know horses like apples dretful much. Every horse has to have an apple, and sometimes they're so tired they have to have two, and that's manyer than drama's dot, and so I have to mend things and det some money. Drama said I must tell peoples all about it. Do you un'stan' now?"

I assured her that I was very sorry for the tired horses and that she should mend for me an hour a day for a long time. At this the demure little mouth broke into lively smiles as she said, "Oh, dood, dood!" and began at once to open her bag and hunt for thimble and needle, while I went to find her some work.

She said little as she worked, but gave such attention as would bring great skill to many a grown member. She had lost two or three of her first upper teeth, and the loss gave her some trouble in the articulation of many words. Once she stopped her work a moment, and said, speaking slowly, "O, one day I didn't know what I sood do. I didn't have one apple left, not one for drama. I save a soft one for her. She's dood; drama's very dood. You see, one of the men whipped his horse, and so I had to give him an apple, too; I gave him drama's apple, and then he didn't whip his horse no more. I was sorry for drama, but she didn't care any when I 'splained to her; she dest dive me a love pat."

"A love pat! What's that?" I inquired.

"Oh, don't you knew? It's dest a soft, dentle little pat on your cheek. I like love pats. Hain't you dot any little dirl?"

"Not now, my dear. God took my little girl away to heaven when she was about as old as you are."

"Did he? Then perhaps he dave her to my mamma. Dod's dot my mamma, too."

Something made me bend down and kiss her sweet cheek. She looked up quickly and said: "If my mamma's dot your little girl, then I must tome and mend for you, mustn't I? I tould bring my things and stay, only I tan't leave drama, tourse."

She looked up at me with sweet blue-gray eyes, clear and pure as the sky, eyes whose light shone in upon and brightened the deep shadow of my own loss.

"And what will you do in summer, little one, when there are no apples? Will you give each horse a lump of sugar?"

"Tan I? O, of tourse, horses would like that. Yes, that's dest what I shall do."

"How came you to have your 'slety,' as you call it?"

"Well, you know the minister said I must be a little 'deavorer, and help people; and so I found the horses. Some of them draw toal all day, and then they're dest dretful tired; and I know I ought to help them, tause they touldn't talk and tell anybody."

When the mending was finished—very neatly, too, for the work of such small hands—she put away needle and thimble very seriously, and went home "to see 'bout drama."

After a few days I hunted up my little friend's home, which proved to be scarcely a square away. For a few rods the road approached the house by a steep incline. I was fortunate in the time of my visit. "Drama" was going to have a load of coal, a little too heavy a load, evidently, for one horse. About midway up the hill the heavy wheels seemed to settle down to stay, and the horse, after some patient tugging, seemed to become discouraged. At length, in the midst of whipping and scolding, the tidy little figure of my stocking-mender appeared by the roadside. She seemed to have just stepped out from the canvas of one of Sir Joshua Reynolds' sweet pictures of children. She came and stood for a moment near the team without speaking. She seemed to have by instinct the tact of an accomplished strategist and the kindness of an angel. Soon she said, with a smile, "It's pretty hard work to drive a toal team, ain't it?"

The driver glanced down annoyed, but the sight of her small figure and sweet face made his features relax a little at once.

Perceiving her slight advantage, she said immediately, "I think I sood try a love pat."

The man broke into a laugh, and said: "That's so, chick. How'll I do it?"

"Pat his neck very softly with your hand, very softly, and I'll dive him this apple; then he'll proerbyly pull better," she replied, and stepped at once in front of the horse, and reached up to him a fine red apple. The driver doubled up with laughter for a moment, and then actually patted the neck of the horse gently and lovingly, while the poor beast munched his apple.

"Now I dess if the load ain't too big he tan pull it," said the child. Surely he could and did.

"Maybe you're tired, too, and would like an apple," I heard the child's voice say, as they reached the last step of the incline, and she offered the man a small apple, not so fine a one as she had given to the horse.

"I b'lieve I would, my beauty. Thank ye; ye're a trump. I won't hit the old hoss agin to-day, blamed if I will."

I rose from my seat under a tree, where I had retired to be out of the way, and to witness the proceedings. Below me was a long shed connected with a railway station. Here, no doubt, my little "deavorer" found her tired horses at evening, waiting for whatever business the last train might bring them.

As one would suppose, I found my call at the little home very pleasant.

"Dramma" was an unusual old lady, most kind, simple, and sagacious. The child, always called "Dolly, dear," showed me treasures of dolls of varied colors, materials, races, and names. With all her sweet graces of kindness and wonderful wisdom, she was full of all the simple gayety of a child,—perhaps fuller of it because of those graces. I congratulated myself on having found such a little friend, and all Christian Endeavor workers on having such a co-laborer. When we can, in so childlike and trusting a spirit, work together with God, men will bear and forbear.

Mistakes of Children.

If only we could recognize that children do not mean to be irreverent! Little Lewis was really as devout as could be expected from a four-year-old, and sang with great fervor Sunday-school hymns innumerable, sometimes revising them after his own fashion or jumbling them up with scraps of other songs in a style less shocking than comical. What on the lips of the "intellectual doubter" would have been only profane sarcasm was irresistibly funny because of its innocence, when Lewis, his imagination fired by the first opera he had ever witnessed, inextricably mixed up Moody and Sankey and "The Mikado" as follows: The day following his attendance at the latter performance he burst upon the scandalized maternal vision attired, in imitation of his admired KoKo, in a patchwork crib-quilt and a feather duster in his hands, waving accentuation to each syllable as he capered about chanting:

The will of the Lord be done, be done,
And so you had better succumb, cumb, cumb!

That, his mother says, was his "star" performance, although he very nearly reached the same height of ludicrous misconception when he retailed to the puzzled ears at home that

The Lord is frizzled and conkeled every fole,

his version of an Easter carol whose chorus ran:

The Lord is risen and conquered every foe.

The Right Side of Heaven.

A little Swedish girl, walking with her father on a starry night, was so attracted by the brilliancy of the sky, all lit up with twinkling stars from one end to the other, that she seemed to be quite lost in her thinking. Her father asked what she was thinking of so intently. Her answer was, "I was just thinking, if the wrong side of heaven is so glorious, what must the right side be!"

HON. CHARLES C. CHICAGO, Ill., November 3, 1893.

COL. HENRY L. TURNER, President Parliament Publishing Co.:

My Dear Sir:—Replying to your favor of the 2d inst., I desire to say that in my opinion the Rev. John Henry Barrows, D. D., is the only person able to intelligently edit the published proceedings of the Parliament of Religions. He alone can accurately write the history of the great event. The Parliament Publishing Co., of which you are President, has been officially authorized to publish these proceedings. All other publications are necessarily unauthorized, unofficial, inaccurate, incomplete, and misleading.

In view of these facts, and as a recognition of Dr. Barrows' fitness for this work, and of your authority as publisher, I desire you to enter my order for five complete sets of this work.

Yours very truly,

H. N. HIGINBOTHAM,
President World's Columbian Exposition.

What Dr. Barrows' Great History of the World's Parliament of Religions is to be: There will be—Numerous chapters intended to give a bird's-eye view of the various meetings, the purpose being, by this descriptive work, to place the reader as far as possible in the position of an attendant on the daily sessions.

All the more important addresses presented in the Parliament—Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, Chinese, Parsee, Japanese, Mohammedan—will be given verbatim exactly as they were presented, without any touch, by introduction, annotation, or otherwise, of interference with the full and absolute freedom which was the basis of the Parliament.

A specially valuable feature of the work will be the presentation of certain unusually valuable papers which are properly a part of the records of the Parliament, having been prepared for presentation during its session, but which were not presented, having been crowded out for lack of time, such as Canon Fremantle's address on the Religious Reunion of Christendom, a paper on Sacrifice, by Prof. Conrad von Orelli, of Switzerland, "The Civic Church," by W. T. Stead, etc., etc., all of which are only accessible to this company.

There will be brief biographies of the leading actors in this great gathering. There will be some two hundred full page half-tone engravings, being portraits of the prominent participants and reproductions of valuable photographs of religious subjects, gathered during the past two years from every corner of the globe at great expense, with special view to illustrating the topics to be treated at the Parliament.

There will be carefully written reports of the denominational and general religious congresses prepared by able representatives of such congresses.

In the final chapters there will be given Dr. Barrows' personal summing up of the entire work.

An elaborate index prepared by a thoroughly competent expert will enable the reader to have at command at a moment's notice every salient point of the book.

The mechanical characteristics of the book will be clearness of type, richness of paper, elegance of illustrations, thoroughness of work and attractiveness in general appearance.

LESSON X.

"THE SHEPHERD-GOD."

The Lord is my shepherd.

—Psalm xxiii. 1.

*And yet the spirit in my heart
Says, wherefore should I pray
That thou shouldst seek me with thy love,
Since thou dost seek me always?*

*And dost not even wait until I urge my steps to Thee;
But in the darkness of my life
Art coming still to me.*

Picture: Shepherd and Sheep, by Ch. Jacque.

Does it excite surprise that while there are so many pictures of Jesus as the Good Shepherd, some one of which may be already on the walls of our school-room, this apparently non-religious picture should have been preferred? If, however, Jacque's picture seem not to be religious, the fault is in us and not in the picture. For it was a scene like that depicted here out of which Jesus drew the thought of God which we are to study to-day. Not that many precious verses in the Old Testament did not help him to interpret the scene, but is it not easy to imagine that when one day Jesus saw a shepherd watching his flock, or wandering over the hills in search of a sheep that had strayed away, he said to himself,—Even so God cares for and seeks his wandering children, he cannot be less mindful of them than this shepherd is of his flock; and then, remembering that he must treat men as God treated them, he felt that he, too, must make it the business of his life to seek and to save that which was lost. This picture has been chosen that from it we may learn, as Jesus learned from the same scene in real life, a thought of God to which he was led under the guidance of his method. Look at the face of this shepherd as he stands surrounded by his sheep on the crest of a hill: it tells of alertness and trained watchfulness: if danger threatened the flock, that man would not run away like a cowardly hireling, for he and his sheep have grown to know and love each other. The sheep are not afraid of him, and would huddle about him if they were in peril. As the shepherd is to the sheep so God is to his children.

What is the shepherd thought of God?—God is both the strong protector of his children and the seeker after those who wander.

ment we find that idea of God expressed under the figure of a shepherd: in the book of the Kings David says that as he, a shepherd-boy, had been true to his trust, and had saved his lambs from the wild beasts, so the Lord would be as faithful to him now as he had been to his flock. If we could believe the sweet twenty-third Psalm of Davidic authorship, we might find its origin in this incident. But no one could have said trustfully. The Lord is my shepherd, who had not seen or been a faithful shepherd. Frequently in the prophets of the captivity the belief appears that God is the shepherd of Israel, but almost invariably the tender side of the shepherd's life is brought forward. Attention is fastened not so much upon the firm, unyielding front toward the foes as toward the gentle, tender watchfulness over the flock. The powerful God, jealous for his reputation of invincible might, is also the God of loving watchfulness over his people Israel. Still, however, he is the shepherd of Israel alone, and it is for the flock rather than for its individual members that he cares. During the period which has been called the "four centuries of silence" (not quite accurately, however, since to this period must be given at least the Book of Daniel and many of the psalms), we find a heightening sense of the importance of the individual, but at the same time a loss of the old-time simple trust and confidence in God. God's eye was upon the individual, but it was an eye of jealous scrutiny, not of tender care. Portions of the book of Job (particularly the seventh chapter) sound like the protest of a sensitive soul against these two tendencies of individualism and distrust which, in combination, made life anxious and full of fear. In addition, as we have previously seen, the ethical idea of righteousness had been virtually lost, and the ceremonial, forensic thought had taken its place: hence there was fear that God's anger might be over the individual because of some unintentional oversight. Then Jesus came, to whom the individual, not the nation or Humanity, was the center of interest and the individualizing tendency reached its culmination in him, the bearer of a lyric faith. He swept away all dread born of the scruples of casuistry, and re-established ordinary every-day goodness and kindness as the ideals of conduct. So his teaching of God's watchfulness over the individual was bright and cheery, his eye was upon men for good. "The very hairs of your head are all numbered." As the good shepherd knoweth his own sheep by name, so God was the protector of all his children, individually and not merely collectively. The nearest approach to this personal care in the Old Testament is in the 91st Psalm, evidently of very late date, but even here it is only the righteous for whom God cares and whom he protects. Jesus taught that God's love went out to all his children, to the unjust as well as the just. The good shepherd watches over the unruly sheep no less, but rather more, than over those who never stray from the fold. Jesus conceived of the shepherd-God as the protector of each human soul.

(b) The Seeking God. "If any man have a hundred sheep and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine and go unto the mountains and seek that which goeth astray?" "The good shepherd goeth after that which is lost until he find it." We touch here one of the most significant elements of Jesus' thought of God. To the most of his contemporaries, God was a sovereign sitting afar off waiting for man to keep perfectly his law before sending the blessed Messianic kingdom for which all were looking. But Jesus held that God took the initiative; that he was not a waiting but a seeking God. Man was not to work to bring God's blessing, he was to live and labor in the inspiration of God's present and unvarying blessing. This idea is found in the Old Testament where it is taught that God chose Abraham and led him out of his home in the far East, and chose Jacob rather than Esau with no reason save his own will. God did not wait till Abraham got to Canaan and found him there: he revealed himself to Abraham and led him to Canaan. Paul, too, has this thought; in fact, as we shall see later on, it is one of his constructive ideas, salvation by grace and not of works. The reason why the parable of the shepherd was chosen instead of the prodigal son is that in the latter parable the father goes to meet his son only when he sees him almost at home. If Jesus had been giving the parable to illustrate his thought of God instead of to sting the Pharisees into shame by the example of the elder brother, he would have represented the father as seeking his child in the far country. God protecting and seeking each one of his children even in the far country of evil—this is Jesus' thought, illustrated by the parable of the shepherd.

What effect did this idea have upon Jesus?—It led him to a shepherd life, loving all and seeking the lost.

The familiar parable of the good shepherd, in which Jesus explicitly applies that title to himself, is found only in the Fourth Gospel, and hence is not certainly authentic: nevertheless there is abundant proof that he tried to be what he believed God was. He certainly cared for men as individuals. The personal emphasis is one of the most noticeable traits in Jesus. His method of social reformation was by individual uplifting, if indeed social improvements as such ever commended themselves to him. He put the individual man face to face with God with no priest or form or rite between the two. This was an advance upon the corporate idea which prevails in the Old Testament, where usually the nation is regarded as the unit, but it is clear to us that there was a great truth in the earlier conception which Jesus ignored. The personal idea of Jesus must be combined with the national idea of the Old Testament. Society and the individual develop together with reciprocal influence. As individuals grow better, society will improve, but also as society improves the environment in which its new members are born and educated, individuals will improve also. God's care is over the individual, only, however, to fashion him into a perfect member of the human brotherhood: the national, or social, and the personal ideal must be one since both are expressions of the one God, and both individual and nation are rooted in the eternal life. It follows therefore that in this particular the individualistic thought of God, as Jesus held it, needs to be complemented by the nationalistic thought found in the earlier prophets. The care of nature is that the evolution of unselfishness shall go on in every human soul and therefore is that care operative, in numberless ways, upon all. If God cares only that all men should be good his care must be for saint and sinner alike. We should have to limit on one side the idea of Jesus, who obviously extended that care into regions where it does not prevail, and we are obliged to interpret the words of Jesus into different phraseology; but when we limit the care of God to care for goodness and think of Him as working in and through nature, the belief of Jesus is seen to be true. The care of God over every soul, of evil and good alike, is manifest in nature.

We saw in the last lesson how Jesus devoted himself to seeking the outcasts and now the motive has been made clear. He sought the lost because he believed that God was seeking them. The good shepherd cannot rest while one of his sheep is out of the fold. It can hardly be denied that Jesus stopped short of the logical outcome of this thought and even taught some things inconsistent with it. That there were some doomed to eternal punishment in the outer darkness, he seems to have believed. Assuredly the great world outside of Israel did not have place in his thought; he was so much interested in the individuals whom he met daily that the all-embracing Humanity did not come into mind. But in his best moments Paul believed in the final perfection not only of all men but of the material universe as well. The Shepherd-God brings all home to perfection at last.

It is commonly said that Jesus' peculiar contribution to religious thought was his belief in the Fatherhood of God. But of course fatherhood is a word of quality, denoting a certain attitude of being. And that attitude must be the same that has been described in the parable of the shepherd. Ordinarily in the Old Testament where God is called Father, it is the nation that is his son, but Jesus taught that each individual is son of God. The Father cares for and seeks each child as the shepherd his sheep. We have approached the same truth along a less familiar road while thinking of the Shepherd-God. The ideas attaching to the fatherhood of God depend upon the kind of fatherhood a man has experienced. To a typical Roman, it is doubtful whether God the father would have been a tender and loving being. As Jesus learned from the faithful shepherd the faithfulness of God, so from Joseph he must have learned to speak so constantly of God as his father. It speaks well for Joseph that Jesus found no word that better expressed his wondrous thought of God than the name of Father.

Questions.

The Picture.—A shepherd is an unfamiliar object in this country—why? Do you remember any stories about shepherd-boys in Palestine, Scotland or elsewhere? How much do you suppose Jesus had seen of a shepherd's life?

The Protecting God.—What do you think of the truth of the 91st Psalm? How does the Psalm compare with a similar expression in Emerson's Essay on Worship? Have you read Mr. Gannett's sermon on "The Fall of the Sparrow"? Are our words meaningless when we speak of "The Protecting God"? Compare Jesus' idea of God's watchful care with that of the Old Testament in respect to (a) individual or national, (b) kindly or jealous, (c) particular or universal.

The Seeking God.—Do you see any difference between the two ideas of the seeking and the waiting God? How has the Orthodox church compared with the Unitarian in respect to its ideal of the seeking God? "Since Thou dost seek away"—what does Mr. Chadwick mean by this? What is it to be found by God? Is it the same thing as finding God?

The Personal Element in Jesus.—How did Jesus compare with his contemporaries and with the earlier prophets in his individualism? Canon Fremantle has a book on "The World as Subject of Redemption"—what would Jesus have said to the idea, Paul, Isaiah, Calvin, Channing? Personal and social evolution—Is one the cause of the other or do they proceed side by side?

The Fatherhood of God.—Did Jesus mean anything more by it than we have already discovered in the "Shepherd-God"? "God is our Father"—What idea would a Roman have got from that? a Jew? a Teuton? Can you think of any children nowadays who might be afraid of God if they heard him called father?

Mrs. J. C. Jaynes' "Lessons on the Life of Jesus," a series of thirty-six illustrated lessons, is recommended to those who do not wish to buy the more expensive photographs. They are for sale at this office at 25 cents per set.

Notes from the Field

Ann Arbor, Mich.—The work at this university town starts with the system and scholarship that characterize its minister. The morning themes up to the holidays include: "The New Aim of the Christian Church," "Fifteen Years in a College Town," "The World's Fair," "The Increase of Faith," "Sermons Which Little Children Preach Us," "Rev. B. Fay Mills and the State University," "Revivals True and False," while the Sunday evening sermons are "On Jesus and his Religion,"—taking up "Sources of Information," "Miraculous Birth," "The Messiahship," "Jesus and Miracles," "Jesus and Old Testament Predictions," "Jesus and Resurrection," "Jesus Among the World's Great Teachers," "Jesus and Humanity's Ideal," Mrs. Sunderland's bible class studies "The Origin, History, and Doctrines of the Various Churches and Religious Movements of Christendom," and the Unity Club has its cheap and interesting lecture course, containing such names as Savage, of Boston, and Nagarkar, of Bombay. And not content with the past, it is proposed to organize a Young Men's Guild, that should correspond to the King's Daughters among the young women.

Helena, Mont.—A RELIGIOUS TOUR OF THE WORLD.—Mr. Crooker, minister of the Unitarian Society, will begin on November 5th, 1893, a course of Sunday evening sermons at the G. A. R. Hall. An effort will be made to describe the religious conditions and tendencies in non-Christian lands. Nov. 5, The Religious Crisis in Japan; Nov. 12, The Ways of the Spirit in China; Nov. 19, The Buddhist Outlook; Nov. 26, The Brahmans of India; Dec. 3, Hindu Sects: Jains, Sikhs, and Others; Dec. 10, The Star in the East; The Brahma-Somaj; Dec. 17, The Children of Promise: The Jews; Dec. 31, New Life in the Moslem World; Jan. 7, Missions: Fruits and Failures. This work has been planned in order to extend the interest in comparative religion awakened by the recent Parliament of Religions. Later in the winter another course will probably be given, in which a study will be made of religious conditions and tendencies in Christian lands.

Boston, Mass.—Mr. Savage's church has recently sent another hundred dollar contribution to the Western Unitarian Conference. The Western Conference at the present time stands not only for the non-doctrinal basis in Unitarianism,—the Unitarianism that believes that the moral law is a sufficient foundation for the religious life and fellowship,—but it also stands for a missionary work administered on the ground. Unitarians who believe that the Western field can best be tilled by Western organizations, with their center in the West created and erected by the West, may well show their sympathies, as Mr. Savage's church has, by lending a hand in this high work. Let others go and do likewise.

Milford, N. H.—The pastor of the church in this place has just closed a course of five lectures to the public,—embracing the five Sunday evenings of the month. The audiences have regularly increased. The subjects have been Henry Wilson, William Lloyd Garrison, Charles Sumner, Theodore Parker, and Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Mr. Rich has been urged to repeat these lectures in the town hall, and may do so later. A second course is under way for the Sunday evenings of November.

Besides this he is arranging for a course of ten lectures on "The Religions and Larger Sects of the World," part to be given in the town hall and part in the church. The subjects to be treated are:

Confucianism and Buddhism, by a native born Japanese divine, Watari Kitashima; Mohammedanism, by M'd Alexander Russell Webb, if his services can be secured; Judaism, by one of its strong believers; Spiritualism, by the Secretary of the American Psychical Society; Roman Catholicism, by Rev. Father Hughes, who received his seven years' education in Rome and is a fine orator; Universalism, by Rev. E. L. Rexford, D. D., and Methodism, the Baptist faith, Swedenborgianism, and Orthodox Congregationalism to follow, the course to be closed by the pastor on "The Religion Universal."

Rutherford, N. J.—Rev. G. H. Badger, the pastor of the Unitarian Church at this place, has awakened considerable interest by inviting the ministers of all other denominations in the place to deliver from his pulpit sermons on the essentials of their faith. These are not to be controversial, but in the line of general information.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER.

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahmo leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people sbrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fasting, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Parting, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

*Have faith in nothing but in industry.
Be at it late and early; persevere,
And work right on through censure and

—Longfellow.

HE who would fill his heart with the love of humanity must begin by stowing within him splendid deposits of love for men and women in particular.

CHRISTIANITY has tried to establish a religious monopoly in the world long enough. Its success in this direction has been questionable. Let it accept its place as one of the great world-redeeming forces, and it will draw to itself the respect and love of many excellent ones who heretofore have been repelled by its arrogant claims.

IN facing the hard work that lies before us, in realizing the fatigue resulting in the hard work that lies behind us, let us not forget that work is still a benediction. The trail of the serpent is found in the gardens of indolence, as the old legend teaches. The sluggard is the devil of modern society. Let work ever be glorified. But this cannot be unless the work done be glorious.

“LOVE is the spirit of this church, and service is its law. This is our great covenant: to dwell together in peace, to seek the truth in love, and to help one another.” These are the words on the title page of the year book of the Unitarian Church of Rochester, N. Y., for the current year. It has just come to hand, and contains an exhibit of a parish carefully organized, earnestly at work, and worthily represented in this neatly printed pamphlet.

IN the re-election of Judge Gary, in Chicago, the people have vindicated the dignity of the bar; and Governor Altgeld has received a merited rebuke, not for pardoning the no longer dangerous anarchists but for the way he did it. The deed he did was commendable, but the method pursued and the reason ascribed were, to our mind, as we have already stated, unworthy and ignoble.

THE Emerson class of the Unity Club of Rochester voted last year on a favorite motto from their author, with the following result: First choice, from the Divinity School Address: “He who does a good deed is instantly ennobled. He who does a mean deed is by the action itself contracted.” The second choice is from the Transcendentalist: “It is the quality of the moment, not the number of days, of events or of actors, that imports.”

SOCIAL SCIENCE is the subject of the day. Not only are the universities and colleges devoting more of their attention to this field of investigation, but churches, unity clubs, and other organizations throughout the country are giving their time to the study. Whatever else a Unity Club program may contain, hardly one comes to us in which there is not mapped out a line of sociological investigation. It seems to us that at this season our Notes from the Field are especially well worth our readers' attention. Some of the programs give such full outlines for a course of study that those who would like to take up the subject alone can do so very successfully with their help. Of course UNITY is unable to publish in full the more elaborate programs and bibliographies, but we have no doubt that the organizations which put forth these programs would willingly send copies to inquirers.

THE quiet little conference held last week at All Souls Church, and reported elsewhere, was another step forward; one more advance towards the consummation which will alone give missionary efficacy to the gospel UNITY represents. The appointment of a committee of three, with Mr. Fenn, President of the Illinois Unitarian Conference, as chairman, to see what can be done towards bringing about a practical co-operation between the various liberal societies in the State of Illinois, means that the problem will be taken up with deliberation and determination. When we trust each other and are sufficiently in earnest to sink minor differences in order that the great realities of natural religion and reverent free thought may be felt, there will be a response on the part of the public heart that will greatly surprise us. The world is waiting to see whether the so-called liberal religious organizations mean what they say and say what they mean. When they are assured of this the prophecies of UNITY will begin to be realized. Perhaps in common with its active constituents UNITY will discard its present name and will run up the words upon its banner, "The Liberal Church," or some kindred name alike acceptable to Reform Judaism, the Ethical Culture workers, the Universalists and the Unitarians. In this movement of co-operation we are ready both to lead and to follow. We await the suggestions and encouragements, the assurance of co-operation, that will show us how most wisely to serve the highest needs of this age, a Free Church, democratic; devout, untrammelled, but earnest and working.

A BIRTHDAY GIFT TO THE SENIOR EDITOR.

This week the senior editor has reached and passed the semi-centennial climax, and his associates may send him greetings to the high tablelands where reigns the serenity that is freed from the fever of youth or the chill of age. He is now neither young nor old, but just fifty, and we venture to solicit for him a birthday greeting from every reader of UNITY, the child of his affection, which is now swinging round to its sixteenth birthday. If you would warm the cockles of his heart, let the love of the UNITY readers be manifested by one new subscriber all round. It is needless to say that since the organization of the new company in March last UNITY has in every way increased its claims for respect and for support. We have added to the cost of publication nearly 40 per cent., but owing to manifest causes there has been no commensurate increase in resources. Will not our readers justify the optimism of its editor by doubling between now and the first of March each one his support of the paper by adding to his own subscription a new subscriber? Pending certain apprehensions of change for the better and for the broader in the management of UNITY, suffice it to say that no change is contemplated except for the better. If new friends take hold of our hands it will be that we may more adequately represent the wider constituency which we have always tried to serve and the support of which we have aimed to deserve. Now is the time to give the push forward and thereby give the senior editor the most welcome birthday gift you could possibly devise,—a new subscriber for every present patron. In order to stimulate this jolly push the company makes the following offer of premiums. In our advertising column will be found a list of all the available publications of the senior editor. With every order for the $3.00 package there advertised a copy of UNITY for one year will be sent free to a new name. For one dollar and twenty-five cents we will send to new subscribers UNITY for one year and one set of Mr. Jones' Seven Great Teachers of Religion, in a case. Sidney Morse has been advertising in our columns his new Art quarterly for young people, to be called "The Start." The first number appears the first of January. This fifty-cent magazine and UNITY will be sent to any new subscriber for a dollar and a quarter. Our fourth offer is to send "Glimpses of the World's Fair" and UNITY to any new subscriber for a dollar and a quarter,—"Glimpses of the World's Fair" being a handsome little volume, about 7 inches by 5, containing nearly 200 beautiful full-page photographic reproductions of buildings and scenes at the World's Fair. Or, if cash premiums are preferred, we will give 20 per cent. to any of our parishes or to any solicitor who will send us five new subscriptions, and 25 per cent. for ten or more new subscriptions,—that is, we will credit five new subscriptions to any one sending us four dollars, and ten new subscriptions to any one sending us seven dollars and fifty cents. Here is a chance for those who want to raise funds for church work, through their annual sales, fairs or other activities, and at the same time give a push to the friendly helper outside. Send seventy-five cents to UNITY, and put the other twenty-five cents into the home cause.

UNITY PUBLISHING CO.

A. U. A. FINANCIERING.

THE American Unitarian Association at its October meeting voted it "inexpedient to make an appropriation for the publication of the proceedings of the Unitarian Congress at Chicago." We regret this conclusion because, as we have said before, we believe that the papers there offered, published together, would present a better bird's-eye view of the Unitarian movement throughout the world than has ever yet been presented in one volume. In themselves many of the papers were valuable. The studies of such men as the lamented Dr. Crosskey and Prof. Gordon of England, and Messrs. Calthrop, Simmons, and Savage in this country are worth printing of themselves; but taken together, in connection with the historical studies made by Messrs. Slicer, Allen, Batchelor and Learned, and the studies of Unitarian influence in philanthropy, literature and comparative theology offered by Messrs. Peabody, Lord, and Thayer, we would have a book that would actually fill a long-felt want; a book that would represent Unitarianism, not in its denominational or national aspect, but in its international relation. It would show its part in universal thought and its relations to universal religion. It seems to us that the A. U. A. is neglecting an opportunity all the more to be regretted because, as we understand it, Geo. H. Ellis, the publisher, is prepared to assume the responsibility and bring forth the book if the A. U. A. would buy six hundred copies at a dollar apiece to be used in its missionary work. We are sure many will agree with us that the same amount of money could not be spent more profitably in missionary work. There seems to us to be a lack of proportions in the action that economizes in this direction, but votes at the same meeting a salary of three thousand dollars to a "superintendent" of the central West. This, with the five hundred dollars for "office" in the neighborhood of Lincoln Park, Chicago, and probably five hundred more for traveling and contingent expenses, makes an investment of four thousand dollars to "superintend" the distribution of about eight or ten thousand dollars more. The practical outcome of all this "superintendence" of Western work has been and is to depress, distract, and divide the missionary enthusiasm of the Unitarians of the West. The work would go on better and stronger if it were less "supervised" in a manner that inevitably fosters a factious and schismatic spirit. For the perpetuation of this dual center and divided loyalty Boston money and A. U. A. legislation is now chiefly responsible. Once the A. U. A. claimed that there was a theological necessity for this "superintendence," that the "pure Christianity" represented by it in the West asked for and needed such co-operation and protection. Now the A. U. A., through its representatives, is trying in every way to prove that there is no distinction between its missionary methods and hospitable attitude and that of the Western organization; but still, with the characteristic obstinacy of ecclesiastical organization that never acknowledges a mistake, it persists in keeping the sentinel on his beat after the supposed danger has disappeared,—like the sentinel whom Thoreau found wa'king his beat at Quebec because "there used to be a harsenal 'ere and the hoffer 'as forgotted to horder hoff the guard, although the harsenal 'as been removed some years ago." Let the A. U. A. take the guard off the central West and there will be more and better missionary work done within its borders. Spontaneity and co-operation will come again, and the A. U. A. will have some four thousand dollars more money with which to put into permanent form the Unitarian Congress papers and to do much other good missionary work.

THE AUGUST STORM AT THE SEA ISLANDS.

We all read the story of the great August storm that submerged the low-lying Sea Islands off the coast of South Carolina. It drowned eight hundred persons, besides much cattle, wrecked houses by the score, ruined the crops, and left six or eight thousand people to be fed until the next year's crops are sown and grown and harvested. The Red Cross Society is now in charge of the relief work, and Clare Barton says: "It is a harder problem than the old battle-fields. Strangers cannot understand how a storm could work such woe."

The Islands, often fringed by wide borders of waving marsh-grass, through which black sea-creeks run, filling and ebbing with the tide, lie almost flat upon the sea: a rise of twenty feet on a plantation is called a "hill." At full moon the tide always encroaches a little on the land, and with a gale blowing from the east is apt to last eight hours instead of six. And now to quote a letter from Miss Laura Towne, a Philadelphia lady who has made her home upon St. Helena Island ever since she went there in the war-years to help the freedmen:

When the tide rose on the 27th at full moon, the wind started to blow a terrific gale, drove the sea over the land, and there it remained for eight hours, raging like breakers on a beach. That is why so many people were drowned. They are all, even the children, good swimmers, and know how to manage boats from early childhood. But no one could swim in those breakers. The boats were swamped at once, and danger was greatly increased by the number of trees dashing in all directions, as well as by the wreckage of houses. It was night, and the children were in bed. Nobody had any idea that the tide could carry away their houses, though they had learned to fear their fall before the wind. It was so black from clouds that none could see the danger till it was upon them. That tide advanced eighteen feet above high-water mark, and was a raging surf, with boats, trees, boards and animals tossed helplessly in the midst of it. Children and their parents were there, too, as helpless as the boards.

That makes picture of the story. And here it is as drama, taken down from the lips of a negro boy who told it to Mr. James Macdonald. The boy lived on the "Eustis Place," where fifty-two drowned bodies were found:

De win' blow so hard dat day, and when night come you ain't man 'nuf for stan' up 'gin um. Now de rains come, and I nebber see such rain like dat since I bo'n. Ma and Pa and we-all chillen been in de house, and pretty soon he begin for rock, and den de door bus' open, and we can't shut um. De moon been big, but kiver up wid cloud, but you can see little bit, and when I look out de tide up to de door and seem like you see de whole ocean. Den de water come in de house, and we huddle up on de stairs. Man! de house rock awful, and we so scare! Den crack! and down come de house on top we-all. Den such a fight and struggle! I catch onto Bubba [4 years old.—Macdonald.] and hol' him tight, and every time I try get free. de house strike me hard, but I ain't give up. I say, "Bubba, hole on hard," and Bubba most give up. I try agin, and tank God, my head break frough. I 'suffle and buffle wid my free han'—if I had bofe han's,

I been all right—and when I pull little Bubba frough, he say, he so tired "please let me go." I ain't let him go. When I get frough for look 'roun'—here Pa holdin' Ma on de gable of de house and all dem todder one gone! Ma say "I mos' done," and Pa courage um and say "hol' me tight."

Well, we deaf, and de win' blow so hard and de wave so high. I mos' gie up myself. Pa courage we, and tell Ma "don't gie up." Ma was beat out, and Pa have sich a battle wid de house,—he weak too. De nex' wave strike Ma, and knock him out. Pa leave um, for he couldn't cotch um—she gone, and we ain't see him no more. Just Pa and Bubba and me, and de rain lick we, and de wave beat we, and if daylight been little longer fore he come, I have to gie up. But I save Bubba dough! And now all is lef' is just Pa and Bubba and me—and Pa he broken down altogether, and mos' 'stracted.

Let me add a word about the Sea Island people. They are nearly all blacks,—in St. Helena there are 6,000 black to 50 white, and in Beaufort County 30,000 blacks in a population of 34,000. Their isolated position kept them, before the war, about as pure a bit of Africa as our black belts held, and the same thing is true today. They were almost the first slaves to receive freedom; for Admiral Dupont's ships silenced the Beaufort river forts in November, 1861, and by March a company of northern teachers was on the ground, opening schools and organizing freedmen's labor. Now, after a generation of freedom, the land is mostly owned by the blacks in little farms of ten to forty acres. The great majority live in their own houses, scattered over these farms, instead of in the huddled negro quarters of the old plantation. The houses are often two-storied, with porch and window-blinds, instead of the two-roomed negro-cabin of the old time. Inside there is perhaps a bit of lace at the window and of carpet on the floor, with a fair supply of furniture. On St. Helena Island alone, I believe, four to five hundred sewing machines click, and here and there a small parlor organ may be heard. On the roads the mule and ox and cow-carts that one meets belong mostly to colored "massas." The young men heretofore have worked in the phosphate diggings, while the women and children take care of the fields and raise, besides the corn and sweet potatoes on which they live, the long Sea Island cotton and vegetables for the Northern market. On St. Helena there are ten or eleven public schools, and the system is topped by a normal and industrial school, containing 230 pupils in five grades, which receives from each public school the highest scholars for an eight months' term. This school, which teaches carpentry and nursing among other branches, is managed with the greatest ease, without any attempt at corporal punishment, by eight colored teachers and three white ones,—the heads of all being the Miss Towne above referred to and her companion, Miss Murray, another lifelong devotee to the uplifting work. It is no Paradise—this island region; the devil of drink is there; five per cent. of the customers will cheat them if they can, is the storekeeper's reckoning; the home morality is not perfect; they take life too easily, are not very energetic, not very persistent. And yet it is a self-reliant, industrious, prosperous community. Black Beaufort County is said to be more free from capital crimes than any other in the State, and to pay larger annual taxes than any county except Charleston. The people are steadily buying more land; and whereas, fifteen years ago, a $1,500 stock would do for the storekeeper, now a $10,000 stock is needed.

At least, this described the island-life as it was before the desolating, stripping storm,—especially the life upon St. Helena, which I know best. The people well deserve help in their sudden disaster. Help, as said above, will be needed till the next crops are in. A gentleman who went through that night of wind and wave said, "After the storm, for a week, all were brothers; the next week, cousins; and now I am willing to regard most people as very distant connections." It is too apt to be so in our sympathy for sufferers. I know that disasters crowd thick upon each other: since the Sea Island storm an even worse storm, with similar destruction, has hurled itself on the low-lying Louisiana coast. Still, if there be those whom this tale may move to send money to the Sea-Islanders, let me offer, if no better way is known to the senders, to receive it and forward it to Miss Towne and Miss Murray. It could not be more wisely spent than it will be by them.

15 Sibley Place, Rochester, N. Y.

There is a story of a party containing two ministers crossing a lake in a storm. When matters became most critical some one cried out, "The two ministers must pray!" "Na, na," said the boatman, "the little one can pray if he likes, but the big one maun tak an oar."

A THOUGHT OF THE MASTER.

Dear Jesus, I have wept
In grim Gethsemane,
And while thy cold disciples slept
Have watched and prayed with thee;
And through all struggle, every loss,
I see the meaning of thy cross.

Yet, though my soul hath prayed
By day and night to know
The faith that could in thee be stayed,
That would thy Godship show,
My feeble faith can only see Thy heaven-endowed humanity.

Dear Jesus, I have sought
To cast my sin on thee,
To feel thy crimson blood hath bought
My soul's full victory.
But I must still believe the smart
Of sin shall fall upon each heart.

Dear Jesus, thou who taught
The spirit's gentler might,
Whose lightest touch was strangely fraught

With the scul's hidden light,
Wert thou a god I could but bend
My heart to thee, not feel thee friend.

As this I daily try
To walk beside thee now,
I sometimes feel that thou art near,
The thorns about thy brow:
Human as I,—as I divine:
Thy life the way, the light for mine.

THE ILLINOIS CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER IN- DEPENDENT CHURCHES.

Pursuant to the program announced in UNITY of November 2, the Conference began Tuesday evening, November 7, at 8 o'clock, with a service held in All Souls Church, Chicago. The opening prayer was offered by Rev. F. L. Hosmer, after which a hymn was sung, and then Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, the pastor of the church, made an address of welcome and introduced Dr. H. W. Thomas, who read as his text, "He who is not against us is for us" (Mark ix. 40). DR. THOMAS spoke in substance as follows:

The personal pronoun, I, announces the great fact that one is; discriminates between selfhood and otherness. So far as we know, only man can say understandingly, I am.

Out of this fact of personality arises the associated feeling of ownership. Having said I am, soon man says I have, I own. Only the person owning the body can use it. The I that speaks of my body, goes on to say my mind, my heart, my love! That I cannot be less than a part of the Infinite. The I goes on and says my raiment, my house, my money,—that which I by my natural powers have acquired. But from my house the step is short to our home; and soon we come to speak of our neighborhood and our religion. And so from personal consciousness one goes on to the sense of commonness, of that which I have in common with others.

But when we have gone thus out of the self from the mine to the ours, we soon come to differences and dissensions,—the harmony we find disturbed, man seems to be opposed to man, one an enemy of another; one party opposes another, and even one sect has a feeling not friendly to another. Honest differences of opinion separate us; even in religion I believe one often feels it a duty to oppose another. So even the large-hearted John went to Jesus, saying that he and his fellow disciples had forbidden the men casting out devils in his name. But Jesus said: "Forbid him not; he that is not against us is for us."

It takes a broad outlook to realize how the lower forms of good that in their degree have been serving the world must give place to the higher. Suppose that to make a road the earth from the higher places must be moved to fill up the lower. And men at that time are set to doing it by carrying it in baskets. But a thoughtful man builds a wheelbarrow and coming in overcomes the basket-man in the competition; then in turn a wagon and horse are brought in, and then a plow, a scraper. Such things constantly happen, throwing men, temporarily, out of employment, it is true; but throughout it, in the long run, more and better roads can thus be made,—more and better work can be done for the world with no further wear upon human lives. Shall we forbid the higher forms of industry? We should hardly tell our inventors to stop their work because they are disturbing the existing order of things. No; the great question is, the highest form of good.

So in religion; when the lower criticism would forbid the higher criticism: when conservative would restrict the liberal, the same great principle holds: "He who is not against us is for us."

We wish to realize the larger God-side of a world, the all sides of the world. How few are really against us! The great masses of the world, on this principle, are for us. Only a few, the murderers, the thieves and the robbers, the virtue-stealing voluptuaries,—are against humanity. My friends, it is want of knowledge, want of comprehension of world good, that keeps nations warring against nations, millions groaning under their debts and armament. The wise statesman must see that wealth is not increased by helping one section against another. Nor can we make fifty cents in America worth a dollar in Europe.

A thousand million eyes quench not the light of the sun, nor dim the brilliancy of the stars. The sun, the stars, are for each soul, each mind. The laws of logic are not worn out by any amount of truth: the laws of justice are not broken down and crushed by justice.

He who would live a selfish life will finally find that his own happiness is only possible in so far as he has the confidence and love of all. That is God's gift. A universe for each, multiplied by the participation of a world of souls.

These principles should find a place in religion,—that it may be regarded as something which belongs to all. So the Christ felt. He called himself the Son of man, not Jew or Nazarene. He was the son of man, of humanity.

In all the Hindu philosophy, we are told, there is not one word of condemnation of those who have not a particular conception of God. The Buddhists say he is a Buddha who is illuminated, whether he be Christian or Brahmin. Alas, that Christianity is being made sectarian! Are not those on our side who are not against us?

Remember Heaven never forgets to reward. Aye, goodness is its own reward. In bearing the burdens of the world we forget our own. We ought, in working for our side, to forget the little dissension; and differences that distinguish one from another.

Let us toil in the noble endeavor to build a church wide as the need of man, high as the love of God,—a home for the millions of men!

Dr. Thomas closed with a brief but noble word of aspiration; after which Rev. Mr. Duncan, the Secretary, made the announcements for the remainder of the conference. Mr. Jones added that a simple lunch would be served by the ladies of the church, during the noon recess the next day; so that friends could, without inconvenience, attend both sessions. "The City of God" was then sung, and Dr. Thomas pronounced the benediction.

WEDNESDAY SESSIONS.

Rev. James Vila Blake conducted a devotional service, after which reports were received from the Secretary of the Conference, Rev. L. J. Duncan, and from the several ministers, Hon. D. L. Shorey being in the chair. After the reports a recess was taken until 3 p. m., lunch being served by the ladies of All Souls parish. In the afternoon, in consequence of a miscalculation as to trains, Rev. R. A. White was unable to be present, and Rev. A. N. Alcott, of Elgin, was called upon to read his essay on "Methods of Missionary Work in Liberal Churches," a strong paper, which evoked a protracted debate,—which the absence of Rev. Mr. Laing, who was to have led the discussion, seemed not to affect. The purport of Mr. Alcott's paper was the advocacy of a broader organization among liberal societies for the purpose of helping liberal religious life throughout our cities, towns and villages. The paper elicited much discussion, in which Rev. Mr. Caton, assistant to Dr. Gunsaulus, to quote the words of a reporter for the daily Herald, "expressed sympathy for a union on a broader basis than the antiquities of Joseph Cook." Others who participated in the discussion were Rev. Messrs. J. Vila Blake, Gorton, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, A. I. Bradley, L. J. Duncan, W. W. Fenn, and Mesdames Wooley and Bayliss. Some, as Messrs. Fenn and Blake, were of the opinion that the united action contemplated was not at present possible because of the fundamental differences between those who believed in a natural religion and those who regarded revelation as a necessity.

THE WEDNESDAY EVENING SESSION.

At 8 o'clock the services began, Rev. W. W. Fenn presiding. After the opening song Mr. Fenn read the 13th chapter of Corinthians and offered prayer. The conference and guests united in singing a hymn, after which Rev. A. N. Alcott was invited to reply to the critics of his paper on the "Methods of Missionary Work in the Liberal Church," which had called out so much discussion in the afternoon that it grew too late for him then to reply. To the objection that we already have sufficient instruments within the five liberal bodies mentioned, he suggested the analogy afforded by the union of the original thirteen republican and sovereign States. There as here, Mr. Alcott maintained, the union was the necessary perfection of the existing organizations, necessary for an enlargement of the horizon. Such union of the liberal bodies would increase their strength tenfold, presenting a united front to the world. The difficulties in the way of this union are similar to the difficulties and prejudices which worked against our national union.

The human mind and heart are capable, as the Parliament of Religions showed, of the largeness and height we hope for.

Is the union merely a beautiful dream? Every great and grand achievement of the world has been so called. They were the visions of earnest souls. But they proved to be more. The telegraph, the Atlantic cable, our republican form of government, were long dreams. We need more of a vision. Religion is in its own nature creative; we want it to show the new and large horizon. The underlying assumption of this afternoon's criticisms was that here we are as Liberals, and here we must remain. But we must not be content to be Liberals. We must move on. We have all been too stationary. We must have a propaganda that is strong and urgent. Under the banner of the moral and religious service of mankind we can all come together.

Apologizing for the absent guests to the feast, Mr. Fenn then introduced Rev. Ida C. Hultin.

Miss HULTIN said that she could not, nor did she believe she was expected to, speak for all Unitarian churches, but for one.

We are beginning to feel, she said, that we are to move on and up from that which is to that which is to be,—is to be because we make it. As a child, hearing the older settlers on moving into a new house declare that it was not as homelike as the little cabin in which they had first lived and where their children were born, I sometimes wondered why they did not move back into the little houses. But they never did. The charm of the old was in its associations, and more of a dream than a reality. While in it they were looking forward to the time when they should be able to leave it for larger and better quarters. And so it is in all life. The true life is not a resting, but a continual striving. Religion is not something that we get, but a getting of something.

All real progress is spiritual; for that which seems material is but the expression of a power within. If with the more accurate geology, astronomy, science, of to-day, we can put that which makes it all to be more alive for us, law turns to love. Each thing is an incarnation of the Life, the Love of the Universe. Rising in man higher than vegetable and brute—rising in man as humanity rises. The hunger for protoplasm began the resistless, upward, onward struggle which issues to-day in a hunger for righteousness.

Some one at the Great Exposition which has just closed spoke of loving the souls of men, but hating the bodies, that seem uncouth and unlovely as we meet them in crowds. That sounds harsh, but taken aright it may be well; well enough if it means that we love the human soul, but hate the imperfections of the present state—so hate them as to change them for something higher and better.

Miss Hultin then went on to speak of the ever-broadening horizon, where the human and the divine meet, saying that in order to fit ourselves to the larger outlook before us some readjustments may be needed, but that these we should not hesitate to make. We should rather have the spirit of him who uttered the words: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, but I say unto you," etc. We may give up our name; names are but symbols, and if in the course of development the time comes when our name no longer symbolizes our present thought and feeling,—we can let it go. After all, the religious intent is the important part of the whole matter. In the evolution of thought and things there has been religious growth. And religion is found to be not a statement of faith, a set of resolutions, a system of theology, but a LIFE: the science of man's highest development,—of man's, no matter from what uttermost part of the earth he may come,—his highest development, no matter how he reached that development or in what terms he may define his inspirations.

Religion is that something that ought to enter into the details of the every-day life, and teach a man the best way to treat his dog, his horse; then it certainly ought to teach him how to treat his brother—and I mean brother, be he Trinitarian or Unitarian, Calvinist or Universalist, Swede or African, Greek or Jew, Japanese or Indian. We as liberal people need sometimes to realize that the real spirit of brotherliness will make us as tolerant of our conservative friend as of our atheist neighbor—I fear we are not always.

Further on in her address Miss Hultin quoted the following verses, saying that while they might not be highly artistic, the thought suggested was one we might well consider:

I used to gaze on Blutton Hill
And think it very high,
And one of Nature's mighty props
That helped uphold the sky.
One day I toddled up its side
And stood upon its top,
And then I learned the sky must rest
Upon some other prop.

And there I saw it, just beyond,
Another hill, much higher,
Its summit mingled with the sky,
All fused with sunset fire.
"That hill's a button on the earth,"
Said I to little John,
"The great sky spreads its buttonhole,
And there it fastens on."

One day I climbed this other hill,
And found with heavy heart
The button and the buttonhole
Were very far apart.
But there against the crimson west
Another hill was seen,
A mighty spangled cushion where
The big sky loved to lean.

And so I've kept on climbing hills
From busy day to day,
But from its topmost peaks I find
The sky is far away.
In spite of many tumbles, still
This sermon I would preach, Life's greatest worth is grasping for
The things we cannot reach.

If we will, said she, we may become a conscious part of the Infinite Life,—of the forces and purposes ever throbbing on to diviner issues; of the Providence that makes no mistakes, that never halts nor wavers nor turns back, the persuasive sweep of whose laws is bearing us all on to the fulfilment of those laws through love.

When Miss Hultin took her seat, Dr. Emil G. Hirsch, Professor in the University of Chicago, and Rabbi of Sinai Congregation, was introduced.

DR. HIRSCH made a happy and witty speech, saying that he was no stranger here. I represent, said he,
the oldest Unitarian in the world.
Few understand Judaism; especially Reform Judaism. We have long been regarded, he said, as witnesses to the truth of the New Testament, as a source of amusement for the mighty of the earth, as archaeological curios, and finally as exhibits on liberal platforms,—to show, not our liberality, but the liberality of our hosts. The Reformed Jews stand for universal Judaism,—a return from the rabbinical to the prophetic,— and that is universal religion. We have not, a Jew never had, a creed. Whoever obeyed the law, thereby was held to subscribe to the existence of God. At one time this compliance with the law was ritual, now it is ethical. Judaism is to-day an ethical society built on an historical platform. Our bond as Jews is a community of sympathy, not of dogma.

However liberal he may be, every Jew will stand a Jew as long as the Christian makes it a reproach to be a Jew. It is not the Jew who is exclusive; intermarriages, for instance, were quite frequent before the Christians made them dangerous.

We are not a race, but an historical community. Even Reform Judaism is not prepared to admit that Judaism required outside light to make us as highly ethical and liberal as we claim to be, and are. Jesus was a great prophet of the height of Jewish thought. But we do not admit that he was superior to all the Jewish thought of his day. He put the thoughts and aspiration rife among the best Jews into a form that conquered the world. The Sermon on the Mount and Lord's prayer are Jewish anthologies—a string of the richest Jewish pearls.

The Orthodox Jews, as well as the Liberals, say that men who live up to the light they know shall be coheirs in the salvation of God; and hence they felt not the necessity for missions. But now the Reformed Jews feel with you the necessity for lifting up our high thought before the world.

It was ten minutes of ten when Dr. Hirsch sat down, and Mr. Fenn announced that he who was to say the last word was one who always struck twelve, and that he now had two hours and ten minutes to do it in.

MR. JONES, after speaking briefly of the breaks in the program, said that he could not say a new word to them. They knew his word; he had been speaking it twenty-three years.
Continuing, he said, I am a Universalist on this side of the river. I am a Unitarian of Unitarians, but such a one as has no sympathy for that Unitarianism whose coldness froze out Emerson, nor for the narrow Unitarianism that opposed Parker, and that holds not out the hand to the Western Conference, because that body thinks the pursuit of Truth, Righteousness and Love a sufficient bond of fellowship. I am loyal to that Unitarianism that is true to its highest traditions; I am too true to the higher spirit of Unitarianism to recognize the right of its national conference to put upon it its little interpretation, with its theological phrasing and its "Lord Jesus Christ," or to tolerate the action of the A. U.
A. when for a time it could find no place in its fellowship for William Potter or William Gannett.

I love fellowship; I like folks and like a lot of them; but year after year
I have denied myself and All Souls congregation the inspiration of the Thanksgiving Union because my brother Salter was not admitted. I will not, though I may by hereditary right, go in, if the door slams after me in face of Salter or Mangasarian or Hirsch. I am Unitarian when Unitarianism is reproached because of its naturalism, but there is a feeling —and it is justifiable—that shrinks from Unitarianism because of its connotation of a theological dogma and of a theological warfare now without meaning to us.

There are many towns where there is not a special's guard of Unitarians or Universalists, but three or four ethical culturists and as few Reform Jews. No one of these classes can have a church in such a place;

but take them together and mix them up and they won't know one another apart, and together they can make a dent on that town. Our faith must be free like the lark's song in the sky. Put it under restraint, bring it down to earth, and you have the bird but no song. We cannot, the dictionary cannot, fix the meaning of a word for all time; like living things words grow, and they should not be cramped. When you hold the lark in your hand you have no song. Hold it too tight and it will die, you will not even have the bird!

THURSDAY MORNING SESSION.

Judge Shorey presided at the final session, for the disposition of the business of the conference. Rev. Mr.
Fenn said that personally he thought the time was not ripe for the union of forces that had been advocated, but that others did, and he was no obstructionist; he therefore offered a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to consult with others societies in reference to a broader alliance of liberals for missionary work. The resolution called forth considerable debate, participated in by those who had previously discussed Mr. Alcott's paper and also by Dr. Taylor and Mrs. McMahan.
Mr. Alcott recommended annual meetings similar to the Unitarian State Conference.

Mr. Blake spoke of the difficulty experienced in persuading ethcal cul-turists to exchange, and said that Unitarians were not sure enough of their own freedom to be entitled to lead this new movement.

Mrs. Harvey thought Unitarian prominence was not a necessity.

It was at this point that Mr. Fenn said that he himself did not think the time was ripe for the project, but that others did.

Mr. Jones said he was not afraid of the word "failure."

Mr. Alcott related the experience of his own church and the deep impression made upon it by hearing the members of the Liberal Ministers' Alliance, who had been invited to address his congregation. What impressed his parishioners was the substantial unity of belief expressed by the various speakers from the different organizations.

Dr. Taylor said that they might try even if they were not sure to succeed. There was nothing so terrible in a possibility of failure.

Rev. Mr. White expressed his sympathy with the movement. Universalism, he said, was not a word to conjure with; neither was Unitarian;
let us drop names.

All favored a broader fellowship and truer unity in work, but some thought it not now practicable. The resolution was adopted.

The business committee nominated, and the conference elected, four members of the board of directors, as follows: Mr. Fenn, Mrs. Wooley, Mrs. Forbes, and Mr. Duncan. Mr. Gould had tendered his resignation of the presidency because of his election to the secretaryship of the Western Unitarian Conference, and Mr. Duncan had resigned the office of State Missionary (which he had held in connection with the secretaryship of the Illinois Conference) because of his duties as pastor of the new Church of Good Will at Streator. The committee made the following nominations: For President, Rev. W. W. Fenn, of Chicago; for Secretary, Rev. L. J. Duncan, of Streator (who consented to hold the office, without salary, until a man could be found who would combine the offices of missionary and secretary); for Treasurer, Mr. B. K. Dodson, of Geneva; and they were elected. Rev. Mr. Blake was elected director, vice Mr. Marshall, resigned. The committee appointed under the resolutions consisted of Revs. W. W. Fenn, Jenkin Lloyd Jones and Mrs. Woolley. A resolution of appreciation was passed for Mr. Duncan's work in the State and for the conference; and another in recognition of the hospitality of All Souls Church, after which the conference adjourned.

The Western Unitarian Sunday School Society held its monthly meeting on Tuesday, November 7th. Present, Messrs. Gould, Jones and Kerr, Mesdames Leonard, Lord and Perkins.

In addition to routine business transacted Mr. M. M. Mangasarian and Mr. Albert Scheible were elected to fill vacancies on the Board of Directors.

As the basis of the second portion of the fourth year of the Six Years Course, entitled "Illustrations of Manhood and Womanhood," it was decided to use "Noble Lives and Noble Deeds." Miss Lord was appointed to make the selection of the twelve lessons best suited to our use. This selection will be printed in UNITY as soon as the choice is made.

MARION H. PERKINS, Sec.

A MAN never comes to his best, unless he works with his best powers, under the best inspirations, and for the best ends. An instrument gives out its rarest music only when touched by a master hand. The souls of ours respond in anthems whose key-notes are victory, and swell into sublimest choruses, only when they are lifted up to be played upon by the finger of God. Then there is music for the angels.

Prof. Norton has such a genius for accuracy that we wonder he consented, if he did, to the inaccuracy upon the title page—"1894." The custom of antedating books published in the last months of the year is a bad one, and to date "1894" a book published Oct. 25, 1893, is carrying the custom to an unusual excess. But it is most ungracious to begin by criticising unfavorably a publication that, with the exception of the title page, calls for unstinted praise. The two volumes are expensive, but not for their size and make, to say nothing of their spiritual contents, on which it would be impossible to fix any money value. Nevertheless, the best readers are not those who have the most money; and before long, we trust, there will be an edition of the book to which folk with slender purses can attain.

Prof. Norton has carried his self-effacement, as an editor, very far. He has written brief introductions to some of the chapters; to others none; and his footnotes are extremely rare. Their scarcity assumes that all the readers of these volumes will be well acquainted with Lowell's works and the circumstances of his life. Doubtless the most of them will be, but the best informed will sometimes wish for a little fuller information; if not for themselves for those whom they conceive to be less instructed. Every little while we hear that the race of interesting letter writers is no more; that the delightful company, like ghosts at cock-crowing, has fled before the face of the stenographer and the penny post. Already we have had several pleasant reassurances; but if "this appearance is positively the last," as the play-bills say, it is one of the most notable of the series. If any function disputed, in Lowell's range of gifts, that of the poet as identical with the man, it was his epistolary function. But for his own injunction, "Don't never prophesy unless y' know," we should be quick to prophesy that his fame as a letter writer will rank among the highest on the roll of a delightful art.

The range is wide, from 1827 to 1891, but not so wide in years as in the variety of the matter. Here is the exuberance of animal spirits; the overflow of wit, humor, fancy, drollery; such a delight in nature as few men have ever had, flooding the page with scent of flowers and song of birds; judgments of men and books remarkable for the keenness and in general for the kindness of their appreciation; a commentary on great public events in which the writer bore a great and honorable part; glimpses into the glad and sorrowful experience of one of the most loving hearts that ever beat for kith or kin or for causes to which heaven had joined great issues. There are only two letters of his early boyhood and they are encouraging in their lack of any intellectual or ethical precocity. His first letters in college have few signs of his paternity of the coming man. But soon the signs of growth, mostly in the way of wide and appreciative reading, begin to multiply. Graduating in 1838, his class-poem was an assault upon the abolitionists and transcendentalists. He was soon ashamed of this. In 1839 he indorsed the MS., or printed poem, with a quatrain punishing the youth's temerity. The forties were the happy period of Lowell's life. He was in love; he was married; he was writing poetry with such speed and gust as never further on, with a happy confidence in his own gift and of a brilliant future; children were born to him; he had enlisted in an unpopular cause, and he was full of the joy of battle. The fifties were his slackest time. They were the years of his greatest sorrow, of ill health, of the hardest years of his professorship; when, as yet, Pegasus was not easy in the harness and was mourning the lost freedom of the open fields. The early sixties, with their new set of Biglow Papers, meant a new happiness in poetical creation and a new gladness in his letters. Nothing, except his early impecuniosity, makes his letters so bright as the reflection on them of his delight in making poems. But there was no such delight in this after the forties as there was then. Then he had more confidence in his future and in his ability to impress himself upon the world. In his later years he felt that he might have been a much greater poet had not the poet "been tripped up in the professor's gown." It was a pity, for the poet was the man; the poet, not the essayist, the humorist, the publicist, the statesman, the diplomatist.

It was Lowell's consciousness of this, and of his failure to work out the best for which the gods intended him, that was most influential in giving a melancholy tone to his life after he had come "midway upon the road of our life." But other causes were co-operant with this: the habit of the humorous mind; periods of ill-health; the sordidness of our politics; his immense distrust of the scientific tendency of thought, while still he could not build again the house of his inherited belief.

One of his early correspondents was his classmate George B. Loring. He wrote him many letters before Loring had become a pro-slavery apologist, and while the anti-slavery was not yet the winning side. But Lowell's best letters in the forties were to his co-editor on the "Anti-Slavery Standard," Sydney H. Gay, and to Charles F. Briggs, whom he celebrates in "The Fable for Critics" as "Harry Franco," the editor of the "Broadway Journal" and a co-editor with Curtis and Parke Godwin of "Putnam's New Monthly Magazine." The letters to these gentlemen are the brightest that he ever wrote, the puns and witticisms pricking the flanks of others just before in every paragraph, sometimes in every line. In the later period Prof. Norton and Leslie Stephen were his most favored correspondents. If the letters lose in gayety they gain in beauty, wisdom, seriousness, and depth. Those to Howells and Gilder are admirable in their illustration of his attitude toward younger men of his own craft. One cannot read his praise of Mr. Cleveland without thinking of the pain his recent sale of the Italian embassy for $50,000, given to the campaign fund, and the discharge of his own faithful assistant on the English embassy, in acknowledgment of $10,000 from another applicant, would have given his too sanguine heart. Those who have imagined foolishly about Mr. Lowell's recreancy to America would do well to read these letters. But they are not people who read this kind of literature. The partisan newspaper is generally good enough for them.

JESUS AND MODERN LIFE. By M. J. Savage. With an introduction by Professor Crawford H. Toy. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis; cloth, 12mo, pp. 229. $1.

Every prolific writer or speaker is apt to fall into the habitual use of certain words which reveal the temper of his mind. If Mr. Savage has such a word, it is "frank," and no other could describe so well the impression he makes upon us. His work is marked by clearness, directness and candor to an altogether exceptional degree (more's the pity) among religious books, to say nothing of sermons. In this last volume he considers the teaching of Jesus upon the pressing problems of to-day, aiming to discover how far that teaching is in accord with the present movement of society and how much it actually helps towards a solution of questions relating to Divorce, Wealth and Property, Prayer, Non-Resistance, etc. Obviously, a critic's first duty is to find out precisely what Jesus taught, and in view of the scantiness and uncertain origin of our materials that is no easy task. Unlike most students, perhaps, who would be classed as Liberal, Mr. Savage believes that Jesus taught eternal punishment and took himself for the Messiah; and in this, we think, he is perfectly right. Yet it must be confessed that after such admissions have been made and after Jesus has been declared not a great man intellectually, since so much of his thought was inadequate and traditional, there is very slender support in this volume for the admiration with which our author regards him.

There are a few curious slips, valuable mainly as showing how a man thoroughly familiar with his subject may blunder now and then. When, for example, we find a passage quoted from the Hebrews but ascribed to Paul (xii. 2; p. 206), we marvel no more at some of the errors of the Fathers; or when, again, we find it stated that the 119th Psalm cannot be a defense of our Old Testament, since "a large part of the Old Testament had not then been written, and those parts that had been written were not gathered into a book" (page 43); it is evident that the idea of Davidic authorship is lurking in the background. For once Mr. Savage seems to be confused in his use of terms; for while the Jews certainly show no evidence of a belief in resurrection, except in Daniel, there are frequent hints of belief in a future life. Therefore the sentence on page 57, to the effect that with the single exception of the book of Daniel there is not in the Old Testament "a single clear trace of any belief in any future life for men," must be corrected by the substitution of "resurrection" or "desirable future life." (Cf., e. g., Is. xiv. 9, seq. 1 Sam. xxviii. 12.) Again on page 103 we read that in the New Testament it is Jesus the Christ everywhere, not Jesus Christ. Yet the very first verse in the New Testament reads Jesus Christ (without the article), and so repeatedly. One other correction must be made in this admirable book lest Mr. Savage's readers share his regret that modern criticism is taking away the beautiful story in John vii. 52—viii. 11. True, the incident does not belong in the Fourth Gospel, but its authenticity is not seriously impugned in consequence. In fact, it may be questioned whether, now that it has been taken out of the Fourth Gospel, its authenticity is not even more firmly established than when it was in good and regular standing there.

This is a capital book, which no one who cares at all about the real Jesus as thinker and teacher can afford to neglect. W. W. F.

THE WORK OF WASHINGTON IRVING. By Charles Dudley Warner. With four portraits. New York: Harper & Brothers. Paper boards, 16mo, pp. 60. 50 cents.

Washington Irving could not have written more gracefully of Mr. Warner, if he had written after him instead of before him, than Mr. Warner has written of Irving here. Nearly half of the book is taken up with a vivid rehabilitation of the New York of Irving's childhood and youth. He finds Irving's first great service to literature in that love of Nature for her frank, objective beauty, with which he interpenetrated all he wrote. His second service was his investiture of New York and the Hudson River with a romantic and poetic beauty, albeit his Knickerbocker legend was an absurd and almost criminal distortion of the character of the early Dutch settlers of New Amsterdam. With the invention of the short story he had much to do, Charles Dickens sitting at his feet and learning of him this lesson. Of Irving's graver work, the "Columbus" and the "Washington," Mr. Warner has a word of hearty praise. His indifference to the great stirring questions of his time in politics and reform is touched upon as tenderly as gratitude demands for one who added so much to the pleasantness of life. J. W. C.

LITERARY GEMS. Fifth Series. IDEAS OF TRUTH. By John Ruskin. CONVERSATION. By Thomas De Quincey. SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER. By Oliver Goldsmith. THE EVE OF ST. AGNES. By John Keats. THE STUDY OF POETRY. By Matthew Arnold. THE HOUSE OF LIFE. A SONNET-SEQUENCE. By Dante Gabriel Rossetti. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Gilt-morocco, 32mo. 75 cents each.

We have just received the six little volumes of classics constituting the fifth series of Putnam's "Literary Gems." The works themselves are so well and favorably known that it is sufficient for us to quote the publishers' own words in description of these charming gift books: "A series of productions, complete in small compass, which have been accepted as classics of their kind, and which are entitled to the most attractive form that can be given to them. Each 'Gem' is presented in a separate volume, tastefully printed in 32mo, and attractively bound in full morocco, gilt top, with a frontispiece in photogravure." Each dainty volume comes in a box.

THE MAGAZINES.

In reading the International Journal of Ethics for the October quarter, the thought of Dickens' Circumlocution Office suggests itself to one. We do not go so far as to say that "How not to do it" was the motto of the writers; but in too many cases there did seem to be a disposition to take the longest possible way to solve the questions at issue. We cannot resist the belief that the truths brought out could have been made quite as clear, and that the discussions would have been quite as philosophical and scientific, in case a few less words had been used. Notwithstanding this blemish on several of the papers the number is a very interesting one. Prof. Royce's discussion of "The Knowledge of Good and Evil," suggested by Dr. Simmel's article in the July number, on "Moral Deficiencies as Determining Intellectual Function," is a paper that must interest all students of ethics, and that will doubtless help to clear up this subject in many minds. Its spirit is admirable, and there is certainly no undue haste in its treatment of the topics involved in the subject. In "My Station and its Duties," Mr.

Sidgwick undertakes an elaborate demonstration of what hardly seems to require such treatment. The fact that it was the President's Address before the London Ethical Society accounts in large measure for the treatment given the subject. Mr. W. L. Sheldon's discussion of "What Justifies Private Property" is an admirable performance, one might almost say a model of what such a discussion ought to be. The other principal articles are shorter,—a keen and discriminating discussion of "A Phase of Modern Epicureanism" by C. M. Williams, and an article by Dr. John S. Billings on "The Effects of his Occupation upon the Physician." Among the discussions is a spirited reply by Mr. Westermarck to Dr. Starcke's strictures on his "History of Human Marriage." As usual the book reviews are excellent. Perhaps the most interesting for UNITY readers are G. F. Stout's review of Mr. J. S. Mackenzie's "Manual of Ethics" (published by W. B. Clive & Co., University Correspondence College Press, London, England), from which it would appear that the book is a valuable one; and Mr. Mackenzie's review of the second volume of Spencer's "Principle of Ethics."

"METHOD" is the name of a new quarterly devoted to methods of church work, edited by Rev. Ellison R. Cook, a Methodist minister of Sparta, Ga. The price is only 60 cents per annum, and we believe that most ministers will find in it something of helpfulness and suggestion for them. It is a handsome illustrated octavo magazine of nearly sixty pages. We wish it success, and we believe that with its excellent practical articles and its very low price it will succeed.

HOPE AND HOME, the stalwart little champion of Proportional Representation, has issued No. 22, dated Oct. 21, in which Mr. Albert Cridge among other good things makes a very bright and satisfactory reply to Mr. W. S. U'ren's criticism of Proportional Representation made in the interest of the Initiative and Referendum. We advise those interested in the matter to send 10 cents to Hope and Home, 429 Montgomery street, San Francisco, Cal., for Mr. Cridge's pamphlet, "Proportional Representation, the Referendum and the Initiative."

NEW OCCASIONS for November contains Herbert Spencer's short but interesting paper contributed to the recent Congress of Evolutionists, combating the notion that according to the evolutionary doctrine it is needless for individuals to have any care about progress, since progress will take care of itself; to which he replies that for a proper evolution the units considered, whether high or low, must respectively manifest their matures, and that in the case of men this includes their altruistic impulses. Aside from this the best feature of the number is, in our judgment, Miss Annie L. Muzzey's poem, entitled "A Heathen's Faith."

THAT The Monist for the current quarter is valuable is sufficiently attested by the fact that Prof. Lloyd Morgan has written for it. Besides his paper, "Dr. Weismann on Heredity and Progress," there are an number of articles on scientific, philosophical and scientific subjects, a paper by Theodore Stanton on "Sebastian Castillon and Religious Toleration," and a thoughtful criticism on "Some Points in James' Psychology," by Dr. W. L. Worcester.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER.

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix: Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation.—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

MOTHER, MOON AND STARS.

The moon is bending o'er the sea
As I, my babe, bend over thee;
She rocks it gently to and fro,
As I now rock you, so, and so,
The wind, her breath, sings softly,
"Dear,
Sleep sweetly now, for I am near."

The stars look down upon the lea,
As I, my babe, look down on thee:
The earth 's at rest: thy vigils keep,
As I watch o'er thy peaceful sleep,
And through the silence I can hear:
"Sleep sweetly now, for we are near."
—From "Hush-a-by, Baby," by William S. Lord.

HOW DO ANIMALS SHOW INTELLIGENCE AND MEMORY?

Of course among the domestic animals we expect a great degree of intelligence, as we often find in dogs, etc. But the wild animals show by their acts that they, too, are intelligent. You go in quest of them, go peering about, looking into every nook: how quickly they discern your inquisitiveness, and the chances are that you will walk a mile and conclude that the woods are deserted. But stroll leisurely along with your thoughts intent on your own business, and how many creatures will bear you company. The squirrel will salute you, and pause while he plays bo-peep with you. How timid at times are the field-mice, how they dash away at the slightest sound of danger; but resting at noon-tide during my rambles how often I have had them peer at me, and at last as I ate my lunch they would come and take the crumbs from my hand. Many have tried to have a like experience and failed, they could not inspire confidence in the timid creatures. Have we not here proof of a long line of thought? Do they not literally weigh the elements and decide whether the man before them is friend or foe?

During the summer I put my horse in a pasture where there was no water. An hour had passed, I had forgotten the horse. when I heard a significant whinny, and, looking up, saw my horse standing at the bars, and divined his want. I opened the bars, the horse passed out, went to the trough, and after drinking went back into the pasture. This may at first appear too simple to mention, but let us analyze it. The horse called to me; he relied on me; he knew that I would hear and recognize his voice. He stood at the bars, knowing that was the place to go out, rather than at the fence several yards nearer the watering trough: then my horse took it for granted that I would understand what he wished. After he had drank he returned to the pasture, confident that I would again let the bars down when he wanted to drink. Can the feeling of thirst alone have prompted this train of thought? Had my horse not known several things, he would have merely looked about the pasture for water and not have molested me.

A Lucky Accident.

One of the greatest discoveries ever made was the result of the purest accident. It was the year 1796. The citizens of Munich had just witnessed the first triumphant performance of Mozart's opera, "Don Juan," and the theater was deserted by all save one man, Aloys Sennefelder, who, after making a round of inspection in the building to see that no sparks had ignited anything combustible, retired to his room to stamp the tickets of admission for the day following.

When he entered his apartments he had three things in his hand—a polished whetstone, which he had purchased for sharpening razors, a ticket stamp, still moistened with printing ink, and a check on the treasurer of the theater for his salary. As he placed the latter upon the table, a gust of wind swept it high up in his room, and then deposited it in a basin filled with water. Sennefelder dried the wet paper as well as he could, and then weighted it down with the whetstone, upon which he had before carelessly placed the printing stamp.

When he returned to his room the following morning, he was astonished at seeing the letters printed with remarkable accuracy upon the dampened paper. A thought came to him. He wondered whether, by some means, he could not simplify his work of continually copying the songs of the chorus. He went out and purchased a large stone, commenced making experiments, and, as we all knew, finally discovered the art of printing from stone—lithography.

Give Him a Chance.

Three years ago a little chap came into my office to shine my shoes. I was going to make a change, for my messenger boy had secured a place where he could do better. The boy

I am speaking of was, I think, one of the dirtiest boys I ever saw in my life, but I made up my mind to give him a chance. I told him about the job and I told him about how well my boy had done. But I said to him, "Billy, one of the first things I want you to do is to go home and get cleaned up. Get that dirt off you if you have to use sapollo, and here is a quarter to get your hair cut. Now don't you come back until you feel as clean as I am." Well, when that boy came back I hardly knew him.

A few days ago I said to him "Billy, I'm going to send you over to see the World's Fair at Chicago. I want you to see it and I want you to have a right good time, and when you come back I want you to get up on that platform and tell the other boys just what you saw there and how you saw it." Well, he came over here and saw the Fair. He was here eight days and I guess he had a pretty good time. When he came back he not only entertained his friends, the newsboys, but a great big audience as well. He got up there on that platform, and he detailed from memory the cost of those buildings, the ground they covered, how high they were, how much higher they were than the buildings of Paris and Philadelphia, and a vast amount of information about the exhibits they contained. I give you my word that my boy told that audience more about the World's Fair in fifteen minutes than I could in half an hour. People who say there is no gratitude in a newsboy don't know what they are talking about.

LESSON XI.

THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

—Matt. xix. 14.

Picture: Jesus and the Children. Hofmann.

What does this picture teach us of Jesus?—It reveals the sunny, genial, childlike side of his character.

There is nothing more attractive in this picture than the real human smile on the face of Jesus. He is so often referred to as "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" that many good people think of him as always sad, oppressed by the evil of the world, just as if it were not possible to know sorrow and still retain gladness, to be acquainted with grief and keep serenely happy nevertheless. The genial, even humorous, side of the nature of Jesus has been overlooked. As a rule the Jews, so far as we know them from the Bible, show little capacity for humor; there is withering sarcasm in the prophets, there are fierce jests and savage puns, but gentle, playful humor is almost entirely lacking. Yet some of the parables and pithy sayings of Jesus have a touch of quiet fun which is peculiarly delicious. It is very probable that some of the things which we fail to understand in his teachings would be perfectly clear could we hear the tone of voice in which he spoke and see the light in his eyes. It is exceedingly unfortunate when the words of a man who has a sense of humor are handed down to posterity by those who are without it. We have not time to dwell upon this side of the character of Jesus, but it must not be forgotten that, with his deep insight into the world and his scathing indignation at wrong and injustice, he was also a pleasant man, and had a marvelously taking way with children.

The incident which has given the subject of our picture has given rise to much fruitless discussion, and is often adduced in support of infant baptism. But, as we see, Jesus is not baptizing the children. It was not unusual for mothers to take their children to a distinguished rabbi that he might lay his hands upon them in blessing. The mothers meant no more than this when they came to Jesus, and he did no more than this. To use this incident as an argument in favor of infant baptism is quite unjustifiable. But it is a delightful scene in the life of Jesus and its position in the Gospel of Matthew is very interesting, following as it does immediately upon the passage in which Jesus seems to teach the superiority of celibacy.

What did Jesus mean by the Kingdom of God?—He meant both an inward spiritual state and also its outward expression in human society.

But our use of the passage and the picture must be to teach Jesus' idea of the kingdom of heaven. The phrase was no new one on his lips, it had a definite meaning in his time, and unless there is clear evidence to the contrary we must assume that he used it in its ordinarily accepted sense. When a phrase stands for an intensely real belief in the popular mind a man can hardly be acquitted of insincerity if in his teaching he uses it in a sense entirely different and peculiar to himself. The Jews believed that there would be sent to them from God a mighty deliverer who should exalt Israel to a position of supremacy among the nations. This is the baldest and simplest form of the idea; doubtless many believed in a resurrection of both just and unjust, or of the just Jews alone, and a general judgment after which the unjust should be destroyed, and the Jews, including those who had died before the coming of the Messiah, should reign over a world everywhere obedient to the law of the Lord. It is hard to say to what extent the apocalyptic ideas prevailed among the people, but the general belief was that the kingdom of heaven was to be established upon the earth by the coming of a heavenly Messiah for the glory of his people Israel. Of course in this conception there were ethical elements: The coming of the Messiah was dependent upon the righteousness of the people, and the law of the Lord was to be supreme. Nevertheless, the righteousness was emphatically formal rather than real, and the law of the Lord, as then understood, was chiefly concerned with ceremonialism. Moreover, the glory of the people, and its freedom from foreign rule, were more prominent than the hope of universal obedience to the ethical will of God. Not that purer and loftier ideas were not held among the people: the tendency is to paint the background of Jesus too darkly, and his own person too brightly, for the sake of the contrast. There must have been many who thought pretty much as Jesus did, but he has become the representative for history of all that higher thought, and although we know for certain that there were holy and broad-minded Pharisees, the tendency of Phariseism is shown in the typical Pharisee, as ordinarily conceived. In history, as in biology, there are missing links; gradations disappear. There are gaps in the historical as there are in the geological record. It will be understood, therefore, that whenever Jesus and the Pharisees are put in contrast each is regarded as the representative of a tendency. And it is past dispute that the Pharisaic tendency was to emphasize the material character of the kingdom and the ceremonial features of the Law. But Jesus was interested only in simple goodness, his thought was predominantly spiritual, hence we should expect to find him laying stress upon the ethical elements of the kingdom and paying little or no heed to material sovereignty.

"Of such is the kingdom of heaven."—What did those little children know or care about the scruples of the Pharisees? A child is weak, and the kingdom of heaven is not to be established by might of arms, its subjects are the poor in spirit, the weak, and those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake.

The kingdoms of the world arise and continue by reason of strength in battle, but it shall not be so with the kingdom of heaven. A child is simple, and openness not craft or diplomacy becomes a subject of the kingdom of God. A child is innocent and pure, and innocence and purity are the characteristics of the kingdom. Emphasizing these elements of the kingdom of God, Jesus naturally was led to see that where these qualities existed there the kingdom already was. So for him it was already present,—"in the midst of you," he said to the Pharisees. In this belief in the actually present kingdom of God Jesus did differ most widely from current thought.

But while the ethical character of the kingdom which Jesus made prominent existed, although obscurely, in contemporary thought, did not the emphatic elements of the popular conception exist also in him, yet subordinated to his main idea? Before answering this question we must face a difficulty with regard to our sources of knowledge concerning him. In textual criticism it is a fundamental principle that the harder reading is to be preferred to the easier; that is, a scribe is more likely to alter his text into conformity with ordinary usage than into variance with it. In higher criticism the same principle is valid: those who communicated the sayings of Jesus would be more likely to preserve such as fitted in with customary beliefs, and to change the exceptional into the ordinary. Hence when we find some idea or utterance attributed to Jesus which is unlike current belief or which popular preferences would have been apt to ignore or modify, we may be reasonably sure that it is authentic, but if we come upon the common notions also, especially if they contradict those which are established as his by their uniqueness, the natural tendency of critics is to ascribe them to popular traditions and misunderstandings of the words of Jesus. Now the constructive belief of the followers of Jesus was that he was the Messiah, consequently they would be prone to impute to him Messianic traits and to find in his career fulfillments of Messianic prophecy. That many things in the Gospels are to be accounted for in this way, no critic will deny. When, therefore, we meet with teachings concerning the kingdom of God which have the popular sound, and seem to be inconsistent with the spiritual view of the kingdom which we know Jesus held, must we not say that they are due to the later reflections of his disciples, under the guidance of mistaken notions, and cannot have been spoken by Jesus himself? Plainly there are isolated or extreme utterances which may be explained so, but besides these, interwoven in many of his parables and implied in his most characteristic sayings is so much that looks toward the current belief that it seems impossible to deny that Jesus held it without treating our records too violently. When he says, "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of heaven as a little child shall in no case enter therein," how can we dislocate the sentence and say that the first half is his and that the second member has been falsely attributed to him? Is it not more historical and just to say that he had two ideas of the kingdom of God,—it was both a spiritual state to be received and an external condition to be entered? It is in the Jewish Gospel of Matthew (xxi. 43) that Jesus says "The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof,"—that is, the nation showing by its fruits in character that it has the spiritual kingdom of God shall receive the external sovereignty of that kingdom. These are eminently characteristic sayings of Jesus and they are too much of a piece, too closely woven, to be wrenched asunder. He did teach that the kingdom of heaven was already present, and yet, he taught his disciples to pray "Thy kingdom come." In view of these passages and others that might be cited, as well as of the parables attributed to him during his last week in Jerusalem, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that Jesus did hold a twofold conception of the kingdom of God: it was an inner spiritual state of righteousness, but it was also the realization and embodiment of righteousness in some future outward form of sovereignty; it was present, it was to come; it was to grow in the world like seed, it was to spread silently and gradually like leaven, yet the process of transformation was finally to culminate and burst forth in an outward reality. Doubtless the popular ideas were comparatively unimportant in the thought of Jesus, and his chroniclers have often grossly exaggerated them, but it seems certain that they were there. He held essentially the current belief in its entirety, only he laid supreme emphasis upon its ethical and spiritual elements which he purified and developed.

Questions.

The Picture.—Do you know any other picture of Jesus which shows him with a smile on his face? Do the children seem afraid of Jesus? Are children ever afraid when they think of him now? Is he baptizing or blessing them? Do you suppose that after Jesus had blessed them those boys and girls grew to be bad men and women? Try to think from all you know of Jesus what he may be saying to these children? Would he tell them they must love him? Is he speaking to them of heaven and hell?

The Happy Jesus.—Was Jesus a sorrowful man? If he had been, would children have come to him? Can you think of anything he said that showed a sense of humor?

The Kingdom of God.—If these little children are typical subjects of the kingdom, can it be built on power or knowledge? What sort of kingdom must it be? Is it possible for a man to keep his child-heart? Did Jesus have any other idea of the kingdom?

Joseph May, of Philadelphia. 4:00—"Our Missionary Opportunity from a Layman's Point of View," a paper by George W. Stone, Esq., of Wilmington, Del. 4:30—"How Can Women Make the Most of this Missionary Opportunity," a paper by Mrs. Charles T. Catlin, of Brooklyn. 4:45—Discussion. 5:0—Business. Resolutions, etc. Evening Session. 7:45—Introductory Service. 8:00—Five short addresses will be delivered on the following subject: "Modern Tendencies in Religious Thought as Illustrated:" 1st.—By the Parliament of Religions. Rev. S. R. Calthrop. 2d.—By the Growth of the Scientific Method. Rev. Merle St. C. Wright. 3d.—By the Higher Criticism of the Bible. Rev. S. A. Eliot. 4th.—By the Growing Recognition of the Naturalness of Religion. Rev. W. C. Gannett. 5th.—By the Increased Emphasis on Conduct and Character. Rev. Stephen H. Camp. Women's Meeting. On Thursday morning at 10:30 there will be a meeting of the Women's Alliance for conference and fellowship. Mrs. B. Ward Dix, Mrs. Joseph Curtis, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, and others will address the meeting.

Ithaca, N. Y.—On November 5th, the Unitarian Church undertook for itself a little study in comparative religions by hearing two lectures by Mohammed A. R. Webb, one on "Mohammed, the Prophet," the other on "The Practices and Tendencies of Islam," and then holding a conference for asking and answering questions concerning Islam.

Cleveland, Ohio.—We are in receipt of the monthly calendar of the Unity Church, of Cleveland, containing an interesting program for the month. Services are held morning and evening, and among the features of the year's work are a series of discourses treating of "The Poets on Immortality,"—the first of which will be delivered Nov. 19, taking up Walt Whitman, and sermons upon philanthropic work in London and elsewhere. Early in the month a meeting of the young people is to be held to complete an organization for religious and social work. The program of the Unity Club, which is held fortnightly, is: For Nov. 6—"Talks upon New Books," Mr. Edward Wright, Mr. Albert Pike and the Club. "Women as Wage-earners in America," Mrs. May Haymes. "Sketches of American Life,—New England: A reading from Mary E. Wilkins," Miss Mary Langley. For Nov. 20—A reception to Cleveland authors by the Club. We notice with pleasure that the pastors, Misses Murdoch and Buck, announce a definite reception day (Monday afternoon of each week at the church parlors, and alternate Monday evenings at their residence).

Hobart, Ind.—This little place has a church that is quite unique in its way. For many years it has been without a settled pastor, and yet it has kept up its regular evening services, conducted in part by its own members and in part by occasional visits from Chicago ministers, while its Sunday school is one that would do honor to the most flourishing of our churches, sometimes numbering as many as a hundred pupils, and having an uninterrupted history of nearly thirty years. We suspect that much of the credit of this vigorous little church is due to the energy and tact of one man, who is willing to work himself and is able to persuade others to work with him.

Englewood, Ill.—At the First Universalist Church, during the month of November, Sunday evenings will be filled by the organ concert and by lectures. Every Tuesday evening the classes in geology and French meet. Nov. 6, Monday.—Philosophy and Fiction Section. Nov. 8, Wednesday.—Woman's Section at 1:30 p. m. Nov. 13, Monday.—Rambler's Section, opening meeting. Nov. 15, Wednesday.—All day meeting of the Aid Society, with lunch. Nov. 20, Monday.—Philosophy and Fiction Sections. Nov. 22, Wednesday.—Woman's Section. Nov. 27, Monday.—Rambler's Section. Nov. 28.—Harvest Sunday. Dates of Music Section will be announced later. The first lecture course of the year will begin Sunday evening, Nov. 12. The first lecture will be given by either the Hindoo monk Vivikananda or Mr. Gandhi. After this will follow five lectures by Mr. White: Two of these five will be free lectures. To two, viz., the illustrated lectures on the Rhine and Italy, an admission of 25 cents will be charged. The admission for the first lecture by Mr. Vivikananda or Mr. Gandhi will also be 25 cents. Therefore three lectures of the six will charge a small admission, because those lectures cost some money and should reimburse the outlay. Three will be free to all.

Quincy, Ill.—The Unity Club of Quincy has divided its work into three sections,—having a literary, a social, and a social science section. The former, in a course of eight meetings, makes a study of the poet Ibsen. At each session there is a paper by one member and reading from an appointed poem or poems by another member. The Papers are: A Sketch of Modern Norway: Bibliography of the Poet: Reactionary Tendencies in Thought: The Conventional—The Ideal; Individuality in Women: Commercial Hypocrisy: The Problem of Heredity: Self-Obiteration—Self-Realization. The Social Science Section takes up the Study of the Development of Civilization in a course of seventeen meetings, of which seven are devoted to lectures by Rev. C. F. Bradley, and the other ten to discussions led by various members of the sections.

Mt. Pleasant, Mich.—The eighteenth annual conference of Michigan was held at this charming little town November 7th, 8th, and 9th. Mr. Simonds, of Battle Creek, gave an eloquent sermon Tuesday evening. Wednesday morning the devotional meeting was led by Mr. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor, who took "Prayer" as his subject, and defined it as the soul's sincerity, the soul's silence and the soul's harmony. The annual reports of the various churches were made more systematic by a set of questions sent out by the president of the conference, Mr. C. S. Udell, of Grand Rapids. Reports were presented from Ann Arbor, Battle Creek, Grand Rapids Unity Church and Holland church, Kalamazoo, and Sturgis,—all in a flourishing condition. Midland also reported that it was keeping up its church life, though without a pastor. There were no reports from Detroit, Athens or Sherwood. There was an interesting and animated discussion of the possibilities of more missionary work the coming year, but the matter was finally referred to a missionary committee, consisting of the president and Hon. S. W. Hopkins, Rev. C. J. Bartlett, Rev. H. G. Johnston, Rev. W. D. Simonds and Mrs. A. T. Streeter. At the afternoon session Mr. Sunderland gave a paper on the Penalties and Rewards of Pioneering in Religion; and Rev. H. D. Johnston, of Grand Rapids, gave his First Impressions of Unitarianism. His impressions were not wholly favorable, as his new associates seemed to him to lack somewhat in organization, in positive belief, and in spiritual life—lacks which others who have been longer in the ranks also feel. The Platform Meeting in the evening, on the Aids to the Advancement of Liberal Religion, was interesting and well attended, the speakers being Mr. Stebbins, Mr. Forbush, Miss Bartlett and Mr. Gould. The concluding session of the conference Thursday morning had two papers, one by Mr. Hugenholz on church life, the other by Mr. Forbush on The Next Step of Civilization. They both drew out a lively discussion which was only ended by the limits of time. The whole conference was a thoroughly enjoyable one and the visitors joined most heartily in the vote of thanks to the Mt. Pleasant people for their generous hospitality and sympathetic attendance. Among the visitors was Rev. Howard MacQueary, who reported that the Saginaw Universalist Church was flourishing in everything save finances. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, C. S. Udell, of Grand Rapids; Secretary, Hon. E. G. D. Holden, of Grand Rapids; Treasurer, Hon. S. Babcock, of Manistee.

St. Cloud, Minn.—Morning and evening services are regularly held here. The first two evening sermons were on the Parliament of Religions, the last two on The Pilgrims in Holland and New England. The Unity Club holds its regular meetings on Wednesday evenings in the church parlor. It will be occupied during the winter with a study of Emerson. The essay read and discussed this month will be "Self-Reliance."

Minneapolis, Minn.—Sunday Nov. 5, Miss Junata Stafford, of Chicago, addressed the Swedish Unitarian Congregation in its hall at Labor Temple, on "The Way to Great Deeds." The hall was crowded and more seats had to be brought in. After the service Miss Stafford conducted the Swedish Sunday school. Her simple, hearty way of addressing the people brought them near to her, and the great truths she sowed will surely bear fruit in their minds, who listened to her with so much interest and attention. A. L.

Omaha, Neb.—The Unity Club of the First Unitarian Church of this place has issued an admirable program for the year 1893, from which it appears that the work is carried on in three sections, each of which holds a meeting Friday evening of every third week, beginning October 20 and ending April 6. The Historico-Economic section takes up successively the topics: Beginnings, The Mercantile and Kindred Systems, The Physiocrats, The School of Adam Smith, Successors of Smith, The Historical School, Socialism, and Contemporary Economics. Three members are appointed to discuss a particular sub-topic at each meeting. At the first Mrs. Curtis discusses the Economic Results of the Crusades; Mr. Mann (the minister), The Industrial Renaissance, and Miss Wallace, Early Economic Writers. A list of references is given as follows: Cossa: Introduction to the Study of Political Economy, 1893, (Part II.) superseding the same Author's Guide to the Study of Political Economy, 1877. Ingram: History of Political Economy, 1888. Blanqui: History of Political Economy, 1880. Longe: History of Political Science in Europe. Toynbee: Industrial Revolution. Pollock: History of the Science of Politics, 1890. Perry: Political Economy (1883), Chapter I. Smart: Introduction to Theory of Value (on Austrian School), 1891. Encyclopedia Britannica: Articles "Political Economy," "Socialism," etc. Block: Progress of Economic Science since Adam Smith, 1890. Another section takes up the History of Painting in Italy in a similar manner, and in the program is given a list of some sixty books of reference to be had in the Omaha Public Library. The third section, "Lectures and Dramatics," provides two dramatic entertainments and six lectures.—"Economics in the Ancient World," "Household Hygiene," "Sanitary Progress," "Walt Whitman," "The Sun," and "Tennyson."

Portland, Ore.—The William G. Eliot Fraternity of the First Unitarian Church has issued a very interesting program of the Sunday Evening Meetings and of the Tuesday Evening Lectures on the Social Questions, with a select (and remarkably full) bibliography of Sociology. The subject of the Sunday evening meetings is Representative Unitarian Workers, together with a Few Great Names of Other Faiths. In the later lectures quite a number of living men are considered,—Stopford A. Brooke, Chadwick, Lyman Abbott, Collyer, Brooke Herford, Savage, William C. Gannett, and Edward Everett Hale. In the Social Question Series there are four introductory lectures, treating of the importance of the study and of the development of civil and political institutions. Then follow three lectures on the factors of the social problem; eight on general solutions proposed for the social problem; and, finally, seven on specific social reforms.

You Must be Mistaken

if you think you've used Pearline, and have any fault to find with it. It must have been something else. That sometimes happens. Because Pearline is so well known and so popular, it has become a household name. People say "Pearline" when they mean anything that may claim to help in washing. Perhaps you haven't noticed—and that's just where the trouble is. If you've been using the worthless or dangerous imitations, no wonder you're out of patience. But don't make Pearline suffer for it. Don't give up the good, because you disgusted with the poor.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 358 JAMES PYLE, New York.

"Stand and Deliver!"

We do it. We are always "at the old stand," ready to deliver anything in the line of Books you may care for. Send 2-cent stamp for our catalogue. A few of our specialties are:

"In the City by the Lake," by BLANCHÉ FEALING. A Beautiful Souvenir of the World's Fair City. The two idyls of Chicago life in this volume, "The Shadow" and "The Slave Girl," really two divisions of one narrative, are full of thrilling interest, and contain vivid descriptions of real scenes and places about the great metropolis of the West. The author has clothed the near and now with the dignity and beauty which other writers bestow upon things and people which have become history and myth. Ev' n so unpractical a thing as the Chicago River is touched poetically. Holiday edition bound in white and gold. A lovelier Christmas gift for your friend who has visited the World's Fair City, or who would like to have visited it but was unable. Dark cloth binding, $1.25; white and gold, $1.35.

"Art, Music and Nature," consisting of choice selections compiled by Mary E Pratt from the writings of PROF DAVID SWING, together with his portrait. The Inter Ocean calls it "A collection of literary gems in the highest and best sense of the term." Chicago Mail: "The work will find its way to popularity." New Orleans Picayune: "Charming in its make up, and printing and binding all that could be desired." Bound in white, green and gold. Price $1.

"Letters to a Little Girl," by MRS. HELEN E STARRETT. A series of letters embodying, with all the charm of a story, important suggestions as to conduct, morals and manners. Miss Haskell, Principal of Monticello Seminary, pronounces it "the book that all little girls should have." A boon to mothers and teachers. A great favorite with both young and old. Cloth, tasteful bound, with admirable portrait of the author, $1.25.

"Mother Goose's Christmas Party," by ABBY MORTON DIAZ. An ingenious story in rhyme. A charming gift for a child or just the thing for amateur entertainments. Leading roles appropriate either for adults or children. Handsomely printed and bound in white, 50 cents; pamphlet edition, $1.50 per dozen.

Why Financial Panic? Why Scarcity of Money? What is the Remedy?

No money in circulation! Yet hundreds of millions of dollars in gold, silver, treasury notes, silver certificates and national bank notes are somewhere in the country.

The money is locked up. It is locked up because people see that there is no absolute safety in private banks. The so-called "national" banks are private banks except that the nation guarantees their circulating notes. It does not guarantee their depositors.

Why not have real national banks? HON. THOS. E. HILL, author of the famous "Hill's Manual," has worked for years on a plan of government banking which is elaborated in our new book MONEY FOUND. It tells how real national banks could take care of the people's money with absolute safety, pay three per cent on long time deposits, make loans to every borrower with good security at four per cent, thus bringing instant and permanent relief to the country.

"BEYOND the Mountain, there are Men Also" is the suggestive title of the searching sermon Mr. Judy has published in the October number of his parish paper. Here is a sample sentence: "The greater men are, the less occasion they have to be cruel or exclusive."

WE take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to the announcement in our advertising columns made by the publishers of this paper. Is not the time almost ripe for another movement all along the line? Is the momentum of the great Parliament to be lost to all outward observation? If it is felt anywhere it should be felt by the UNITY constituency. If it served any cause it served the triple interests of freedom, fellowship, and character in religion, to which interest this publication is committed. Brothers and sisters, are you ready to take hold with us? Let the push be made all together. One, two, three, go!

THE Iowa Conference, a report of which is expected from another hand, took at least three prophetic steps at the last session. One was an overture to the Universalists of the State to meet with it once a year in joint convention for purposes of mutual encouragement. The other was a determination to try to formulate farther the church of the isolated, to bring into conscious fellowship the scattered members of the universal church throughout the State. Two things are necessary before the latter purpose can be carried to successful issue. One is the success of the former venture, the dropping of all partisan names that divide liberal spirits. The Church of the Isolated cannot be Unitarian nor Universalist, but it will be both, and also for the many more independent souls who are indifferent to both these words as terms of denominational import. The other thing necessary to advance the interests of this Church of the Isolated is, an acknowledged helper in the way of the printed page, a weekly go-between to be the Silent Pastor, answering questions, making suggestions, exchanging experiences. UNITY offers itself for such a service. It already has a large parish among the isolated. It would like to serve them better. The third prophetic step in a missionary way was the determination to accept no more help in its missionary work from the A. U. A. This is the first condition of power and the sooner the other States in the West shall follow the example of Iowa the sooner will they find their work growing in their hands.

DR. HENRY BLANCHARD, pastor of the Universalist church of Portland, Maine, is out in his denominational paper with a call for a Universalist League which is to be a compact among the liberal clergymen of that denomination; those whom the denominational journals have been vigorously denouncing and trying in vain to suppress for several years on account of their too radical opinions. Dr. Blanchard doubtless finds many more within the denomination who agree with him that it is time that the progressive elements in the Universalist church should assert themselves. When we remember that the distrusted elements are represented by such ministers as Drs. Blanchard, Rexford, Crowe and Shutter, and Revs. White, Alcott, Sample, Dinsmore, Gorton, Johannot and many others, we have no fears but what they will find a hearing. The only question is whether these men who have honestly outgrown all the traditions, not only of the Universalist sect but of all sects, and are representing the universalities of natural religion, are wasting precious time and energy, upon denominational politics, that had better be spent in building up directly and de novo the Liberal Church of America, that open church for which there exists already much material. When those who believe in this church now found in the ranks of so-called Universalism, Unitarianism, Reform Judaism, Ethical Culture and Independency, will trust each other and take hold of each other's hands confidently, they will greatly augment the power of each. The Declaration of Purpose set forth by these Universalist brethren of the forward look is so interesting that we print it entire. If the brethren will excuse us from wearing the demoninational badge we shall be glad to join that League, and gladly tender UNITY to its service.

We, the undersigned, associate ourselves in an organization to be known as The Universalist League. We desire to serve the Universalist Church. We believe that it is possible to make this Church a greater power for good among men. We revere the memories of our fathers, but we believe that the sons have a larger work to do.

We see that vast and far-reaching changes of religious opinions have taken place during the last twenty-five years. We believe that a living Church will adapt itself to the living issues of the living present. We desire that the Universalist Church shall take a large place in the leadership of Learning and Philanthropy. We believe that this Church can gain increase of power, dignity of position, and larger following and usefulness by a change of attitude toward other bodies, and of emphasis in its teachings.

We believe that it is its duty to cultivate fraternal relations with the Unitarian and other religious and ethical associations. We believe that it is its duty to make emphatic advocacy of the truths of the "Higher Criticism," of the fact that all religions deserve reverence and study, of the thought that action in this life has great influence upon the spiritual condition of the life in another world, and of the need of applying Christianity to the great social problems of the day.

To secure the results at which we aim, we will use the agencies of the Press, the Platform and the Pulpit, and we invite the co-operation of those who sympathize with our purpose and share our hopes.

THE THIRST FOR POWER.

The third temptation of Jesus, as set forth in the New Testament parable, is the besetting temptation of the potent. Its lures are those that beset the noble. "Without influence, reputation and position you can do nothing. Get these first and then you may be useful. Bring to your side the powers of earth, then use them in the service of heaven. A little tact, and Herod will be on your side. Humor the whims of the Pharisees and they will give you leadership. Their money and their influence will be back of you,"—was the seductive argument. Get thee behind me, Satan, for you are a liar and a deceiver! The great workers of the world did toil without the "influence" or the "money" and the "power" that you recommend. Lincoln won the Presidency in 1860 because, in the eyes of his nearest and best friends, he forever ruined his chances for the Presidential chair in the great Springfield speech of 1858, when he declared, in utter disregard of consequences, the manifest but ominous truth, "A house divided against itself cannot stand." The dream of the policy hunter is a delusion. His rotten chain of expediency, be it hitched to a cause never so worthy, will not stand the strain. Close by the shrine of Mammon is erected the altar of ambition. This altar never lacks devotees. Here "schemes" are laid in the interests of lofty purposes. Party influence often solicited in the interest of non-partisan principles. There are no influences more demoralizing than these temptations to seek power by unworthy means for worthy ends. By means of them noble youths ripen into perverted manhood; loving girls are changed into calculating women; duty is lost in expedience; piety transformed into pretension; humility fades into egotism. The charity that whispereth not to the left what the right hand doeth, goes forth with a trumpet to herald its stately march. If we are puzzled to understand this third temptation of Jesus, we need but to close our Bibles and go out on the streets. Note the wild rush for notoriety, the inordinate thirst for fame among men. See the women strut like peacocks in their fine feathers, that they may be seen. Every day statesmen become demagogues; lawyers, pettifoggers; doctors, quacks; preachers, actors,—that they may eventually be able to do good. How many of the beatitudes are ignored. How nearly are the Ten Commandments forgotten in order to get ourselves or our children into the Society that is spelled with a capital "S." How men chafe under limitations; how the quiet "well done" of the conscience is bartered for the shallow applause of the multitude; how we abandon the select company of God's chosen children of thought and sincerity in order to be one of the thoughtless crowd that hold the power at voting time; how great was the victory of him who rose superior to this temptation of power and remembered the saving text planted in his heart as he stood by his mother's knee, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve."

FIFTY YEARS OF SUNSHINE.

One evening last week in a charming home on the South Side of Chicago a little group were gathered to do honor to one of Chicago's hardest workers and best-loved men, Jenkin Loyd Jones. Although his influence has so largely been a personal one,—the effect of the consciousness upon those who come in contact with him, that they have to do with a great-hearted, loving nature,—yet he and his work are so completely one, and therefore his life has necessarily so largely been a public one, that what is his is his friends', and I feel that I should be wronging the readers of UNITY, the great majority of whom belong in so true a sense to his circle of personal friends, were I to deny them wholly the knowledge of an occasion which was so very full of heartfelt pleasure and of quiet inspiration to those who were privileged to be present. This is all the apology the junior editor has to offer for saying a few words in the paper of which our much-loved friend is senior editor about the quiet little celebration of his semi-centennial. I have his permission to allude to the fact that the celebration was held, and I shall interpret that permission to suit myself.

On November 14th Mr. Jones was fifty years of age, and that evening he and Mrs. Jones were invited to dinner by one of his parishioners and oldest friends, who, without his knowledge, had also invited a few of those who had known him longest or been most intimately associated with him in his work, to meet him in the evening. It was of course impossible to extend the invitation to all his friends, for, as was remarked, the hostess had not the Liberal Arts building at her disposal.

After the cake was cut, several letters from friends, near in feeling but geographically distant, and two poems written in honor of the day, were read. One of these poems was and remains anonymous, the other has been secured for UNITY. The occasion was a peculiarly impressive one because of the echo in the hearts of all present of the warm feeling and unaffected praise expressed in verses and letters. I should be glad to lay some of these affectionate tributes before UNITY's readers in full, but it is of course impossible. Yet for the sake of those who have known this big-hearted man only in later life, I quote a few words from a friend of his early manhood; not only, however, because of their tribute to the man, but also because of their tribute to his church,—the church for which he stands, which is also the church for which UNITY and its friends stand; and finally, I quote them, because in themselves, entirely aside from the occasion which gave them birth, they are good reading for all who believe in the higher life and the influence of personality. The author of these words is now one of the most honored professors of science in a great Eastern university:

More than a quarter of a century ago (how long it sounds!) we first met, touched our lives together, worked in the same way and in the same spirit together, and in the naturalness of a common life and purpose became friends. These ties to me have been stronger than kindred; and while the years have rapidly come and gone, and our lives have deepened into hard and earnest life-work, and we have seldom met,—met only often enough for me to see that the broad and rich mantle of sturdy manhood and noble character which now gives the joy and the soul to all his work and life was all foreshadowed and outlined in what I loved twenty-five years ago,—yet during all these long intervals, these years of separation, this noble friendship has been as vivid, as near, as ever present and as helpful as though we had daily met. Many other friends I have had, who came into my life, have gone out of it, and have been forgotten; but my dear friend Jones came to me and entered into my life and became a part of it forever. Such character and life is immortal, it is unlimited and infinite in its influence. It is my hope of immortality. Last Sunday,* one week ago to-day, I attended the first church of my life to which my full sympathies and my whole heart reached out with longing for membership. The depth and broadness of the invitation on which membership rested so realized my ideal, and the words and presence of my dearest friend were so overpowering that I could neither restrain the tears nor force myself to move, though I longed to grasp his strong hand and enroll myself under him in the church of humanity.

Some of the bright and kindly letters read elicited applause from the little company, but there was no outward expression of approbation when the letter from which this extract was taken was finished. It touched us too deeply.

*Harvest Sunday at All Souls Church, on which occasion new members are received by pastor and congregation. F. W. S.

After the reading of the letters and poems was concluded Mr. Jones responded in a few feeling words expressive of his appreciation of what he called the "over-kindness" with which he had been treated. He intimated that one could not give to another unless the latter's nature were high enough to respond to the impulse from without, and that hence it might be seen that if his had been the good fortune in some measure to brighten and dignify the lives of some of his brother men and women, this influence was to be regarded as no less a tribute to their natures than to his; and, alluding to the letter from which our extract is taken, he pointed out that the picture of friendship there given reflected the noble nature of the writer no less, to say the least, than it honored him of whom it was written. He had not expected, he said, to feel any marked difference between his fiftieth birthday and his forty-ninth or between his fiftieth and his fifty-first, and yet he did find the influences of the occasion such as made this more like a new birth for him than any previous anniversary. He felt that at fifty he was neither old nor young, and though he realized that now his life was more than half spent, he looked forward to the future with a glad heart. In reply to those who had commiserated him upon the unremitting labor of which his life had been made up, he wished to point out that it was full of joy; and he then told the story of the dying engineer who for many long years had faithfully made his runs in fair weather and in foul, in the blasts of summer and the stinging cold of winter,—who said to the sympathizing comrades that gathered around him as he was drawing his last breath amid the debris of the wreck which had ended his career,—“Well, boys; I've made my last run; I shall never again hold the throttle; but I've had lots of fun!” So he could say; while, his had been, and he was inclined to think because his had been, a busy life, there had been lots of fun in it!

When the party broke up not a few of its members went home with the feeling that that evening was destined to be remembered as something in the nature of a benediction on their lives. All felt that the hostess had reason to congratulate herself upon having given to her guests a delightful evening; for all were disposed to say amen to the words of one of the closest friends of the guest of the evening, who was not privileged to be present,—“No one deserves more to have his fiftieth birthday kept with love and honor and gladness and thanksgiving.”

FREDERIC W. SANDERS.

Men and Things

THE men of Colorado have shown their faith in principle, in womanhood and in themselves by giving women the ballot.

WE learn from The Outlook that at the New England Conference of Charities and Correction, held recently in Newton, Mass., many significant facts were brought out. These are especially so: In Maine there is an appreciable diminution in the number of almshouses, “for the reason that the poor and dependent have been taught to help themselves.” In Massachusetts pauperism is diminishing, there being now only 7 paupers to every 1,000, as against 10 to the 1,000 twenty years ago.

DR. JOSEPH PARKER, of London, recently said: “When ladies grumble to pay half a crown for an article upon which some needy sister has spent a week of continuous toil, and then on Sunday give away tracts and ring the bells of heaven as if they were favorite angels of God, they ought to be told that their blasphemy and their benevolence are alike despised. When a woman is compelled to work all day for 4 pence it is a mockery to build her a mission hall and invite her to hear prayers from the people who ought to have paid her a better price for her labor.”

DESTITUTION IN RUSSIA.—The charities of Count Tolstoi and the welcome given an American gift of grain are but slight indications of the destitution prevailing among the Russian peasantry. Attention has been called recently to another indication in the official statistics with regard to the number of farm animals in the empire, and particularly the number of horses. There, as here, the complete absence of horses on a farm is an unmistakable evidence of extreme poverty. According to the statistics, in the year 1882 there were in the village communities of European Russia 9,079,924 peasant households. Of this number 2,437,555 households, representing a population of perhaps 14,000,000, and constituting 27 per cent. of the whole agricultural class, did not own a single horse. Of course it is not to be supposed that these households were always without horses, but the conditions of life have been such that death and debt have deprived them of these auxiliaries, and there has been absolutely no surplus to replace the loss. There is not much to be said for the economic far-sightedness of a government which sells the last horse of a poor peasant farmer for taxes and thus renders it practically impossible for him to ever pay taxes again. —Exchange.

A BIRTHDAY GREETING.

TO MR. JENKIN LLOYD JONES, ON HIS FIFTIETH BIRTHDAY.

Half a century ago
Sang a mother, soft and low:
"This is sweet Thanksgiving Day.
Harvest offerings all may lay
On the altar; but I bring Rarer gift unto the King.
Other gifts their work have done,
I bring life but just begun.
Take, dear Lord, this little child
Newly born and undefiled, Let his life to others be Gift of gifts for sake of thee.
Not for him do I ask gold,
Not the prophet's vision old;
Nor yet music, art or fame,
Silver speech or poet's name.
Give him not a ruler's rod,
Let him be a man of God."

Angels bent and softly smiled,
Holding close that little child.
"Since thou akest but one gift,
That he human burdens lift,
Every other gift shall be Added to his legacy.
Love of music, love of art,
Golden speech and poet's heart,
Priestly office, voice of seer,
That men cannot choose but hear,
And the weary, lonely, sad,
Turning to him shall be glad."

Fifty years since then have sped,
Angel guarded, angel led,
Now he stands in manhood's prime,
Lightly touched by hand of time.
'Tis his birthday brings us here
Glad of heart to call him dear.

Blessings that shall never end
Be thy part, beloved friend!
As thou givest true heart's gold
Never touched by rust or mold.
Loving most who most need love,
Not the ones who most deserve.
May the tide of blessing roll
Back in joy upon thy soul,
Turning all thy loss to gain,
Making heartsease out of pain.
Our best gift we bring thee here,
Love encircling all the year,
And because we call thee friend
Our Thanksgivings never end.

LYDIA AVERY COONLEY.

Nov. 14, 1893.

FRANCIS PARKMAN.

"Thorough, beautiful and true." By these words Mr. Howells once characterized the works of Francis Parkman. "Here . . . in a world which is continually rebuilding seems really to be work that need not be gone over again." Surely this is no usual praise; it could not be rendered to Bancroft, to Prescott, or to Motley, men with whom Parkman is naturally associated. If it is true, it gives to the last of our eminent historians a unique place.

On Wednesday afternoon, November 8, Francis Parkman died in his home at Jamaica Plain, Boston, in the 71st year of his age. Born in 1823, he came, like so many famous New England men, of clerical ancestry. His father, also named Francis, studied the logic under William Ellery Channing, and was pastor of the New North Church in Boston for thirty-six years (1813-1849). In 1829 he founded the professorship of pulpit eloquence and pastoral care in the theological department of Harvard. He was the first vice-president of a society for indigent clergymen, and president of the convention of Unitarian ministers which met at Baltimore in 1852. Having such a father, the younger Francis was naturally sent to Harvard College for his education, and was graduated in 1844.

As a boy, living close to the Middlesex Fells (even to-day a wild waste of woods and shrubbery, of special interest to a naturalist, and to Cambridge students of a wandering turn), Parkman had ample opportunity to indulge a taste for catching squirrels and wood-chucks; and in the summer he frequently went to the woods of Maine, or to Canada. Here we come upon the natural taste for out-door life which was to be of so great importance to the future historian of the French dominion of America. At the age of eighteen (mark the year!) the boy had formed his purpose of writing history, and began (as later he tells us) "to prepare for executing it by examining localities, journeying in forests, visiting Indian tribes, and collecting materials." For a while after his graduation he devoted himself to the study of the law, in order to understand the international legal questions involved in the history of the colonies. Previous to this study he had spent some months in Europe.

In the spring of 1846, just before the declaration of war with Mexico, Parkman and his close friend Quincy Adams Shaw left Boston for a trip West as far as the Rocky Mountains. A fortnight elapsed before they reached St. Louis. Thence, with a cart, horses, mules, two French guides, and presents for the Indians, they advanced by way of the Missouri and the Platte Rivers and by trails into the heart of the wild West. By the camp fire and in the canoe Parkman gained familiar acquaintance with the men and scenery of these regions. For a time (as he has written) he lived in a village of the Western Dahcotah, between Mount Laramie and the range of the Medicine Bow in Wyoming. Thus he observed the customs of councils, the etiquette of the Indians in the exchange of presents, maintained "a courtly tenue at feasts of dog-flesh," and was able "to be on agreeable terms with the unattractive squaws and their swarming paposes."

This, you will say, was just the training for one who was to write accurately of the details of tribal organization, of the religious rites, of the passions and traits of the Indian. True. And should you want proof of this training, read "The Conspiracy of Pontiac" (1851), which tells of these matters with remarkable clearness. But remember that Parkman never wholly recovered from the ill effects of the deprivations and hardships he was obliged to undergo in the Indian country. For a time he lost the use of his eyes, and was quite dependent upon the sight of another. Much of his material was in the French language, and had to be transcribed from the French archives and sent to him. Seventy volumes or so of manuscripts, mostly folios, now remain in the keeping of the Massachusetts Historical Society, a testimony to the thoroughness and industry of the man.

The direct outcome of his Western trip was "The California and Oregon Trail" (1849), the first of his works. Those works, however, on which Parkman's fame rests firm-set are the series, in seven parts, known under the general title—"France and England in North America." They appeared in the following order: "Pioneers of France in the New World" (1865); "The Jesuits in North America" (1867); "La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West" (1869); "The Old Regime in Canada" (1874); "Count Fontenac and New France Under Louis XIV" (1877); "Montcalm and Wolfe" (1884); and "A Half-Century of Conflict" (1892). Besides these Parkman wrote a novel, "Vassall Morton," long since consigned to oblivion, and "The Book of Roses" (1866). It is worth noting that he was especially fond of lilies among flowers, and for a year or so was instructor in horticulture at the Bussey Institute of Harvard University.

Recent students at Cambridge will remember occasionally seeing Mr. Parkman in the University library.—a gray-haired man of medium height, with an active step and a keen eye looking out from a strong, serene face frequently lit up by a genial smile. The personality of the writer is manifest in his books. Thorough none doubts them to be; and few are ready at present to contest their claim to accuracy. As the Saturday Review once said, they "show no trace either of weariness or of a struggle with the overwhelming mass of details." There is an all-pervading charm which never fails to hold Parkman's readers. And "Montcalm and Wolfe" will prove as interesting to the boy of fourteen as to the maturer student of history. Such character studies as those of Fontenac, whom Parkman calls "the most remarkable man who ever represented the crown of France in the New World," of Jean Ribaut of Dieppe, of LaSalle, the man of iron will, and of Montcalm, will, it is safe to say, never be surpassed.

In the Introduction to "Pioneers of France" may be found this striking passage, a good illustration of the historian's vivid style:

"The French dominion is a memory of the past; and when we evoke its departed shades, they rise upon us from their graves in strange, romantic guise. Again their ghostly camp-fires seem to burn, and the fitful light is cast around on lord and vassal and black-robed priest, mingled with wild forms of savage warriors knit in close fellowship on the same stern errand. A boundless vision grows upon us; an untamed continent; vast wastes of forest verdure; mountains silent in primeval sleep; river, lake, and glimmering pool; wilderness, oceans mingling with the sky. Such was the domain France conquered for civilization. Plumed helmets gleamed in the shade of its forests, priestly vestments in its dens and fastnesses of ancient barbarism. Men steeped in antique learning, pale with the close breath of the cloister, here spent the noon and evening of their lives, ruled savage hordes with a mild, parental sway, and stood serene before the direst shapes of death."

In the same Introduction, Parkman gave the qualifications of the historian, when he wrote that he "must seek to imbue himself with the life and spirit of the time. He must study events in their bearings near and remote; in the character, habits and manners of those who took part in them. He must himself be, as it were, a sharer or a spectator of the action he describes." Viewing his works in the light of this estimate, we see how true Parkman has been to an ideal. Few men will be found so worthy to serve as models for the coming time, if "thorough, beautiful and true" are to be the final words of criticism.

By an oversight the statement was made in our issue of Nov. 2 that the price of the PHILLIPS BROOKS YEAR BOOK was $1. The price is $1.25.

"The Chorus of Faith," which we have advertised for the middle of November, has been delayed, and probably will not be ready before the second week of December.

NAGARKAR AMONG THE UNIVERSITY BOYS.

DEAR UNITY: The boys—yes, and girls, too—have been enjoying a great treat. A ray from the "Light of Asia" has come athwart our horizon and illuminated our campus and university like the "search light" at the Exposition. This "missionary" from the Orient, with, as some of the boys said, "gentleness, earnestness and tenderness beaming from his face," captured us all—faculty and students.

Mr. Nagarkar occupied the pulpit of the Unitarian Church, Sunday, the 4th inst., morning and evening, addressing a crowded house, largely students. The "Message of the Brahma-Somaj" was received with enthusiastic interest, many lingering about him long after he had finished his lecture, with their queries on almost every word he spoke.

Our interest was manifested by our desire to get all we could of him and give of ourselves. He was driven around the city, of which "we Badgers" are so proud, and the University campus, of which, we think, there is none more beautiful in the country. Monday morning was given to our State house and the afternoon to the University buildings, giving special attention to Science Hall, Chemistry Hall, Mineralogical and Natural Science Museums, the Machine Shops, and Washburn Observatory. In the evening the Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity tendered him and the faculty an informal reception. After a social chat Mr. Nagarkar spoke on the universities and educational systems of India. Among other things, in contrasting our universities with theirs, he said that he was "delighted to have seen so many machines and engines in our college workshop, made and finished in every particular by the students, and that this was a source of pride to the young workman. In India, on the other hand, the students were inclined to look down on manual labor. Surely, when the masterly attainments of the mind are expressed through the delicate manipulations of the hands, and mill-wheels and grease are handled with as much grace and care as our Greek and Sanskrit text books, we shall have taken a goodly step in the promotion of human welfare and in emancipation in its highest form." What wonders in the way of delicate manipulation, in forming artistically the result of the shops there is in store for the aristocratic, shapely hands of our conservative India brothers when they begin, and what a field they will find it for thought-provoking, intellectual quickening!

It is needless to say that all he said was greedily received, or how we were surprised and awakened to the fact that these men in far-off India could shame us with their pure, classic English, refinement, gentleness, thoughtfulness and thirst for more knowledge. Said one of the professors to me at the close of one of his discourses, "It does seem like a great piece of impertinence to send missionaries to such men, does it not?"

After the conversation we had piano solos and vocal music, ending with a few rousing college songs, and thus ended one of our "red-letter days."

Tuesday evening Mr. Nagarkar left for Hillside, where he will visit the school and get a touch of American farm-life.

Who can limit the flight of human hope? What known law can anticipate the soul's practicable achievements? My God, life is small: thou art great. But my life ends not with me. IMMORTALITY.

Like a sunrise to the soul,
Is our hope of life before;
Now its waves of beauty roll,
In their flood-tide on our shore:
Hearts enjoy the grandeur sent!
With the stars that beam above
Dreams of endless life are blent—Pencilled out in golden love!

"THE RED HAND OF LADY MACBETH."

A Reply to Joseph Cook.*

BY JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth unto his own flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth unto the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap eternal life. GALATIANS VI. 7, 8.

For the last fifteen years or more, Joseph Cook, in his rhetorical climaxes, has escorted the red-handed queen of Shakespeare's great drama before American audiences, and has challenged now Unitarianism, now philosophy, and again the non-Christian religions of the world to clean that lady's murderous hand, and to bring to her soul a peace as though the foul deed had not been done. With swift and vehement rhetoric he rushes upon two immense assumptions, viz., that the above named forces are powerless in this emergency, and that Christianity (meaning, of course, his especial interpretation of it) can wash clean the stain. He assumes that some supernatural chemistry can remove the blot and give to the soul again its sweetness and its purity. His favorite word is "wash," and by word and gesture he enforces this thought of a miraculous change, a supernatural and vicarious atonement brought about by the shedding of another's innocent blood on Calvary. How this is done, even the philosopher, Joseph Cook, does not pretend to explain, but that it is done he asserts with all the dogmatic power of his ponderous eloquence. On the platform of the Parliament of Religions he has lately made his challenge again, a challenge which has been made so often that it might be called an orthodox classic. And to some minds it carries much weight. The frequent repetition of it seems to carry convincing power to so many that I deem it my duty as a teacher of morals and religion,—not for controversial purposes, but for truth's sake, for morality's sake,—to give it some attention. In the name of common sense and common decency I protest against a sentimental piety that promises to save the soul by tampering with the bookkeeping of the Recording Angel, to redeem the life by an unfair accounting; I protest against this juggling with the eternal laws of right and wrong, the immutable order of creation, the unchanging and infinite decrees of cause and effect. Whatever promises release from the divine law of sequence and consequence is impious, and is as disastrous to the soul that trusts to it as an attempt to escape from the laws of gravitation would be to the man who should throw himself from a high building expecting to float in the air.

*A sermon preached in All Souls Church, Chicago, Oct. 8, 1893.

But let Joseph Cook state his case. As reported in the Herald, he brought his "vicarious scheme," the peculiar secret of Christianity, the unique gift of Jesus, to the notice of the Parliament of Religions, where were gathered honorable representatives of the great life-helping and life-strengthening faiths of the world, in the following words:

Here is Lady Macbeth. See how she rubs her hands. What religion can wash Lady Macbeth's red right hand? That is a question I propose to the four continents and all the isles of the sea. Unless you can answer that you have not come here with a serious purpose to the Parliament of Religions. I speak now to that branch of skeptics who are not represented here, and their silence and their responses are as inefficient as a fishing rod would be to span this vast lake or the Atlantic. I turn to Mohammedanism. Can you wash our red right hands? I turn to Confucianism and Buddhism. Can you wash our red right hands?

After more impassioned rhetoric of this kind he concludes:

It is a certainty, and a strategic certainty, that except Christianity there is no religion known under heaven or among men that effectively provides for the soul this joyful deliverance from the love of sin and the guilt of it. It is a certainty and a strategic certainty that unless a man be born of water and be delivered from the guilt of sin and of the spirit, it is an impossibility in the very nature of things for him to enter into the kingdom of heaven.

If Christianity has any short cut by which murderers, perjurers, defaulters and workers of mischief of every kind can slip unscathed into heaven as though they had wrought no mischief, then it is a rebel religion, and Jesus is an insurrectionist come into the world to defy the benign order of the universe, teaching men how to escape their just debts by virtue of a bankrupt act which does not hold in any court save his own. It is hard to tell just what Joseph Cook means, but it is perfectly clear that he thinks Lady Macbeth can take advantage of some transaction that happened in far-off Palestine, that she can transfer her guilt to the suffering one that was lifted on the cross of Calvary, and that because he suffered she may escape the consequences of her foul deeds. He would release her from the embrace of that God who holds her responsible for her own deeds, and would find her some way of escape from the expiation of her sins by the long but high road of experience that cures by discipline. Her vaulting ambition may not bring its benignant pain by which the soul is self-shrived and taught by agony the way of harmony, and is led through pain to principles that restore power, patience, peace. In order that we may discover the immorality in this vicarious atonement, this "look-to-Jesus-and-be-saved" kind of a scheme with which the great Boston orator undertook to browbeat the representatives of other faiths and forms of thought at the Parliament, let us study more closely the character of the deed, the temper of the woman to whom he promised such swift and prompt immunity if she would only "look on the cross until it was no cross to bear the cross."

You remember the story out of which the great dramatist has wrought his profound tragedy. Macbeth, the trusted general of the "most sainted king" of Scotland, has rested envious eyes upon the throne. Ambition and augury tempt him to treachery and assassination, but his better nature holds him back; and when he finds the king his guest he found himself the prisoner of a double trust. The ties of kinship, the duties of a host stay his fell purpose.

"Besides, this Duncan

Hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been

So clear in his great office, that his virtues

Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongu'd, against

The deep damnation of his taking off: And pity, like a naked, new-born babe, Striding the blast, or heaven's cherubim, hors'd

Upon the sightless couriers of the air, Shall blow the horrid deed in every eye,

That tears shall drown the wind. I have no spur

To prick the sides of my intent, but only

Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself,

And falls of the other."

Then did the ambitious wife, who had anticipated these compunctions, had foreseen the humane uprisings in her husband's heart, come to the support of his evil purpose. She was not ignorant of that better nature that would rise up within him to confront the ambition that prompted murder. In the privacy of her own room she had said:

"Yet I do fear thy nature;

It is too full o' the milk of human kindness

To catch the nearest way. Thou wouldst be great;

Art not without ambition, but without The illness should attend it: what thou wouldst highly,

That wouldst thou holily * * *

Hie thee hither,

That I may pour my spirits in thine ear,—

And chastise with the valor of my tongue

All that impedes thee from the golden round

Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seem

To have thee crown'd withal."

Not only did she anticipate the divine weakness within her husband, but she had known that her own evil purpose must needs be nursed. She felt that the woman within her, the motherly and wifely soul, would be in the way. She was afraid that heaven would interfere, and so she invoked the forces of hell.

"Come, you spirits
That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here,
And fill me from the crown to the toe top-full
Of direst cruelty! Make thick my blood;
Stop up the access and passage to remorse,
That no compunctious visitings of nature
Shake my fell purpose, nor keep peace between
The effect and it! Come to my woman's breasts,
And take my milk for gall, you
murth'ring ministers, Wherever in your sightless substances
You wait on nature's mischief! Come, thick night,
And pall thee in the dunkest smoke of
hell,
That my keen knife see not the wound
it makes,
Nor heaven peep through the blanket of the dark,
To cry 'Hold, hold!'"

Having thus fortified herself, she prods her husband on. When words of love and dreams of glory are inadequate to keep him to her purpose, she turns upon him with a vixenish impatience: she scolds him, shames him with her own reckless distemper. When he rises into a noble triumph for the moment, and says,—

"Prithee, peace:
I dare do all that may become a man:
Who dares do more is none,"— she breaks forth into a fendish triumph over all her better self:
"What beast was't then That made you break this enterprise to
me?
When you durst do it, then you were a
man;
And, to be more than what you were,
you would Be so much more the man. Nor time nor place
Did then adhere, and yet you would make both:
They have made themselves, and that their fitness now Does unmake you. I have given suck, and know How tender 'tis to love the babe that milks me:
I would, while it was smiling, in my face,
Have plucked my nipple from his boneless gums
And dash'd the brains out, had I so sworn as you Have done to this."

After the foul deed is done, still for a time she nurses heroically the devil-plant she has watered in the soul of her husband. When she finds him wavering and weakening from thinking of the "brain-sickly" things, she takes the daggers, enters the awful chamber where lies the murdered body, leaves them where they will testify against the innocent, comes back triumphantly victorious over her better nature, and says:

"My hands are of your color; but I shame
To wear a heart so white."

This is the woman to whom Joseph Cook would give easy access into heaven. A spasm of adoration, with eyes turned toward Golgotha, and the hideous memory falls off, the strained sinews of the soul become restored, her hand becomes clean; and Lady Macbeth, the foul murderer, Lady Macbeth, the evil genius of an ambitious man, she who has invoked the powers of hell to unsex her that she might see a crown upon her husband's head, she who, with deliberate forethought, gave over the sweet felicities of domestic joys, the regnant powers of innocence, that she might sit upon a throne and join in the retinue of a king,—becomes a redeemed soul, one of the lambs of God. She might, if she would, go straight to heaven; while her victim, the good King Duncan, who was sent to his reckoning unprepared, is writhing in hell, and Banquo's ghost moves uneasily through the realms of hate and woe.

This champion of orthodoxy, Joseph Cook, indignantly flung into the face of the representatives of all the religions of the world the assertion "that it was an impossibility in the very nature of things for one to enter the kingdom of heaven except he be born again" through this Christ atonement, this supernatural vicariousness that washes the red hand white and makes the murderer's saint. All I have to say to such a Christianity is this,—that I am glad I do not believe it, and I call upon all lovers of morality, all friends of justice, all believers in an infinite God whose will is rectitude, whose providence makes for righteousness, to deny it. Such a "scheme of salvation" is not only unreasonable but it is immoral, it is demoralizing, it is a delusion and a snare in this world, however it may be in the next. It makes distinction where there is no difference. There is no power on earth or in heaven that can make such a transaction other than mean. It is unfair. It belies the methods of the universe. It breeds spiritual conceits, encourages a complacency that does not make for character. It degrades the noblest thing in human nature,—conscience, the scourge of the bad and the consolation of the good; conscience, whose pricks as well as whose lures are benignant; conscience, whose stings, though scorpion-like, are medicinal;

whose reproofs, like its warnings, are angelic. This theology of Joseph Cook, if carried out to its logical conclusion, if it became a profound belief instead of, happily, a seventh-day make-believe in most lives, would "Pour the sweet milk of concord into

hell,
Uproar the universal peace, confound
All unity on earth."

Compared with this debilitating sentimentalism of Joseph Cook, how moral, how religious, how inspired and inspiring is the gospel preached in this drama by the great revelator of Avon, Shakespeare, the inspired prophet of universal religion, because he was the enkindled mouth-piece of universal man. What does he teach of the character of that high-handed rebellion in which the strong-souled woman led the weak-souled man? How swift, how real, how permanent was the reaction, the rising of the soul of both man and woman out of the pestilential atmosphere of hell, which courted means of crime, into the soul-saving atmosphere which, by the purging fires of shame, the angel-lashes of conscience, the pangs of remorse, the gaunt terrors unspeakable and innumerable that clothed them round about, all missionaries of the higher life, taught them that the laws of the moral universe are as inflexible and inexorable as the laws of gravitation. And if the Son of God himself were to try to interfere with this course of benign discipline, the deed, like this murder, would "make the earth feverous and cause it to shake." Note how in this place Shakespeare, true to the highest laws of the soul, true to the profoundest realities of religion, leads back the guilty pair towards God. How soon did Lady Macbeth see that—

"These deeds must not be thought After these ways; so, it will make us mad."

How promptly to this once valorous general, who for the moment was swayed out of his proper orbit by ambition, came the voice which cried:

"Sleep no more!
Macbeth does murder sleep,—the innocent sleep,
Sleep that knits up the ravell'd sleeve
of care,
The death of each day's life, sore labor's bath,
Balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course,
Chief nourisher in life's feast. * * *
'Sleep no more! to all the house:
Glamis hath murder'd sleep, and therefore Cawdor Shall sleep no more; Macbeth shall sleep no more!'"

How rapidly did Lady Macbeth's vision gain its normal clearness before the wild and wicked game had been played to its end. While Banquo was still alive to threaten the safety of the throne they had won through blood, she reflected:

"Naught's had, all's spent,
Where our desire is got without content :

'Tis safer to be that which we destroy,
Than, by destruction, dwell in doubtful joy."

With her came back slowly but surely into the ordered realm of the divine law that morality which is always sane and that sanity which is always moral, which taught Macbeth to say ere his crime was done:

"But let the fame of things disjoint,
both the worlds suffer,
Ere we will eat our meal in fear, and sleep

In the affliction of these terrible dreams

That shake us nightly; better be with the dead,

Whom we, to gain our place, have sent to peace,

Than on the torture of the mind to lie
In restless ecstasy. Duncan is in his grave:

After life's fitful fever he sleeps well:
Treason has done his worst: nor steel,
nor poison,

Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing,
Can touch him further."

How soon did his title
"Hang loose about him, like a giant's robe Upon a dwarfish thief."

How swift and inevitable was the ripening in to the sick distaste of the man who has alienated himself from the sources of life; the old age that comes at any time when the heart is no longer fed by the fountains of youth, love and loyalty.

"I have liv'd long enough: my way of life

Is fall'n into the sear, the yellow leaf,
And that which should accompany old age,

As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,

I must not look to have: but, in their stead,

Curses, not loud but deep, mouth-honor, breath,

Which the poor heart would fain deny,
and dare not."

Joseph Cook says that the blood of Jesus will wash white the murderer's hand. Shakespeare says:

"Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood

Clean from my hand? No; this my hand will rather

The multitudinous seas incarnadine, Making the green one red."

Joseph Cook teaches that it is possible to wipe away the results of a high crime, to throw into oblivion the record of blood. But Shakespeare teaches that this is an old doctrine outgrown. It belongs to the olden time. Now murdered men

"rise again,

With twenty mortal murders on their crowns,

And push us from our stools. This is more strange

Than such a murder is."

Joseph Cook would give to Lady Macbeth peace and sanctity if she did but look towards Calvary. Shakespeare, having probed deeper into the human soul, sends her through the long road of expiation that fills her life with agony. You see her great nature perturbed with agitations. She walks in restless despair, even in her dreams, her eyes open, but her senses shut. The hands she once willingly dipped in human blood for the encouragement of her husband, and which she thought a little water would wash clean, carry spots that fill her sleep with the terrors of wakefulness, and in her dreams she walks and talks as she tries in vain to purify her hands.

"Out, damned spot! out, I say!
* * * Yet who would have thought the old man to have had so much blood in him?"

* * * Here's the smell of the blood still: all the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand. Oh, oh, oh!

Shakespeare, with Joseph Cook, hears the cry of the human:

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseas'd,

Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,

Raze out the written troubles of the brain,

And with some sweet oblivious antidote

Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff

Which weighs upon the heart?"

Neither does Shakespeare, any more than Joseph Cook, leave the soul in despair. This, perhaps the darkest of the Shakespearean tragedies, is pierced with gospel rays. It is a hopeful chapter in the Bible of the ages. The Doctor's reply to the demand of Macbeth just read is: "Therein the patient must minister to himself"; and how well do the patients minister to themselves in this drama; how surely does this very road of crime lead these prodigals, like the prodigal of the Judean gospel, inward to themselves. Then they will surely yearn for the father's house. The home ties will again assert themselves, and by repentance and reformation they will find the family board. Out of the humble soil of humiliation will grow aspiration, and tears will wash the eyes clear so that they may again see the beauty of the world, the promise of life. And the soul, making "stepping stones of its dead self," will rise to nobler things.

The diagnosis which Joseph Cook would make of Macbeth and his lady is something like this: "Children of perdition, inheritors of an infinite sin perpetrated by a finite Adam against an infinite God," and, according to the song he has chosen for his epitaph,—

Endless sin means endless woe.

Into endless sin I go,

If my soul from reason rent

Taken from sin its final bent.—

he finds them the children of despair, having no potency within to save themselves; no redeeming tendency; no Godward gravitation; no adhesion linking them eternally with the best and the noblest in human nature, unless there comes from without some seeking ray from Calvary; unless there is sent from above some searching throb of Christian grace that will lift them out of this slough of despair, this hell-related sea, by a miraculous intervention, through merits not their own, as a drowning man is lifted out of the sea by the rope which the captain on board graciously throws around his neck as he is about to sink.

The diagnosis of these souls as made by William Shakespeare is very different. In Macbeth we see how this foul passion of ambition wages a constantly losing war with a hundred nobler impulses. This one passion barely triumphs for once over the diviner instincts of his nature, and this single feast of blood cloyes his appetite for such. He will have no more of it. Give him endless life in heaven, in hell, or on earth, and he is through his murdering, you may be sure of that. If Shakespeare is right in his portrayal of this character you can trust Macbeth to work his way to daylight. He's true at the core, and that core is an indestructible something allied to justice. A soul that is capable of shame is in the confidences of virtue. A spirit writhing with remorse is already in the counsels of the Almighty. Macbeth is standing on saving ground: he is made of salvable material.

And as to Lady Macbeth, she who seems the wickeder as revealed by Shakespeare, discloses a crime rooted in a heavenly grace; it was short-sighted love that drove her into this mad wickedness. She cherished murder in her heart not for the sake of a crown, but for the sake of him whom a crown might grace. She thought not of herself, but of him who had, in her eyes, a crown-deserving brow

"Had he not resembled

My father as he slept, I had done't.—
My husband!"

That is the truer key of her nature. Who can study the pathetic revelation of the sleep-walking scene without seeing "through the troubled surface of her crime a depth of purity immovable"? The roots of the salvation of Lady Macbeth are planted deep in the soul of Lady Macbeth. They were born with her, and she will adapt herself to her environments through weal or through woe, in heaven or in hell. By the help of pain and pleasure she will reach her God-appointed destiny. With Jesus or without him, she will know the beatitudes of Jesus in time or eternity. Good triumphs over bad; passion beats itself out into love; violence will give way to gentleness; discords will be swallowed up in harmony.

I know not who Mr. Cook meant by the "skeptics not represented" to whom he made his first demand that they should wash clean the hand of Lady Macbeth; but if he meant those represented by Darwin, Spencer or Emerson, those who trust science and reason, who believe in progress and search for the foundations of religion in the soul itself, they would say, as I understand them, "Who dares wash clean the hand of blood that has not yet completed its mission? The stain remains, the smell abides for the saving of the soul. They are a part of the redemptive processes of the God of nature, and if Christianity pretends to interfere with that holy law, to sneer at that blessed school-master of the spirit, so much the worse for Christianity." It is as true of Lady Macbeth as it is of Jesus, "By the thorn road and none other is the mount of vision won." Evolution traces the growth of humanity through its mistakes, its blunders, its crime. The virtues of one age become the sins of succeeding ages. What we call evil is, as Leigh Hunt says, "a rough working towards the good." Not Hecate, the evil priestess of hell, and her uncanny witches, shaped the movement of the plot in this tragedy of the human soul; but angels of light, the ministers that wait upon progress and civilization, have thus worked upon man in his march from barbarism to civilization, from bestiality to angelhood.

Deep love lieth under These pictures of time;
They fade in the light of
Their meaning sublime.
The fiend that man harries
Is love of the Best;
Yawns the pit of the Dragon,
Lit by rays from the Blest.
Pride ruined the angels,
Their shame them restores:
Lurks the joy that is sweetest
In stings of remorse.
Love works at the center,
Heart-heaving away;
Forth speed the strong pulses
To the borders of day.

Thus sang Emerson in his song of the "Sphinx," and he perhaps has as good a right as anyone to speak for the "skeptics" whom Mr. Cook challenged. As for the other religions at which he hurled his defiance, for once let us be thankful they were present to answer for themselves. And I think to the minds of the majority of the listeners and readers Mr. Cook was adequately answered over and over again. Representatives of many faiths might have matched his audacious claim for the peculiar saving power of Jesus by a counter-claim for each of their own illumined ones. And they might have substantiated their claims just as Joseph Cook substantiated his, by pious appeal to sacred texts, to saintly lives, and to the grateful testimony of burdened hearts, the radiant evidence of gladdened, quickened, and reclaimed lives. Or they might have rebuked his claim, as they did many times over, by a more generous recognition of the universality of this shower of grace which has fallen in all ages and in all times upon the white lives of earth's Saviors. They might have rebuked him by resting their case upon the universal laws of character and the universal discipline of life, which, as I have tried to show, has no use for commercial atonements, and will brook no interference from vicarious mediators who would obtrude themselves between cause and effect, between the sun and the plant that finds its life and beauty in its rays, between God and his children.

When Joseph Cook offered to the Mohammedan the red hand of Lady Macbeth and asked him to wash it clean, he might have pointed him to this text in the Koran:

The fate of every man have we bound about his neck; and we will produce unto him, on the day of resurrection, a book wherein his actions shall be recorded: it shall be offered him open, and the angels shall say unto him, "Read thy book: thine own soul will be a sufficient accountant against thee this day. He who shall be rightly directed, shall be directed only to the advantage of his own soul; and he who shall err shall err only against the same: neither shall any laden soul be charged with the burden of another."

And the disciple of Confucius, when summoned to this act of cleansing Lady Macbeth's hand, might have quietly handed this text from the analects of Confucius to the Boston lecturer:

Heaven does not actively interfere with the soul of man. It has endowed him at his birth with goodness, which may, if he will, become his nature, and his true destiny may be thus realized. But all this is to be accomplished by his own efforts. In common with all created things, he forms part of Heaven, and by fulfilling his destiny he is able to assist the transforming and nourishing powers of Heaven and earth. Even the length of his days is in his own hands, for it is not Heaven that cuts man's life short, but by the results of his own conduct it is brought to an end.

And the Buddhist when appealed to might say: "There is hope for Lady Macbeth, for we are taught that to abhor evil and cease from sin will bring the greatest blessing. Self-restraint and purity is the greatest blessing. Never in this world does hatred cease by hatred. Hatred ceases by love. This is always its nature. Not where others fail or do or leave undone, the wise should notice what himself has done or left undone."

Numberless are these healing beatitudes of the Buddhist, but he would say to Mr. Cook: "As we love Lady Macbeth, we would not if we could interfere with the Karma, that Law of Cause and Effect that carries one's past into the future and makes for character."

And finally, all these representatives challenged will join with Joseph Cook in turning glad faces towards Jesus, and will recognize in him a representative of those beacon lights of humanity who in the gladness of goodness have encouraged souls to fight the good fight against weakness and temptation, to learn the hard, though holy lesson that "whatsoever ye sow that shall ye also reap," that "by their fruits ye shall know them." These helpers of the race have cheered and won to triumph the distracted souls because they have led the way through which all must go. It is the triumph they have won which promises the triumph we are to win. Through them do we learn that subtle law of unity which binds each to each and all to the throne of the Eternal; that divine vicariousness of law which makes us partakers of one another's guilt as also we are partakers of one another's triumphs, which makes the suggestion of a miraculous vicariousness crude, depressing and unspiritual. In this larger hope I take hold of the red hand of Lady Macbeth and fear not the stain which no water can wash away, which no perfume from Arabia or from Judea can sweeten, but which may be utilized to the salvation of her soul and mine and of all souls. In this goodly company that reaches from the Nazarene carpenter to the ambitious Macbeth, from the mendicant Prince of India to the foolish heart of Lady Macbeth, I am willing to enroll myself and take my chances with the hindmost. I turn away from Calvary if my gaze upon it makes me selfish enough to ask for a salvation that leaves Prince Siddartha outside, or to hunger for a heaven from which Lady Macbeth or any other red-handed soul is eternally shut out. I ask you to join with me in this long and slow, but sure, struggle of humanity towards truth, righteousness and love. The materials and the ideals for the construction of this temple to the God of truth, righteousness and love are deposited in every human soul, and that material is imperishable wherever it is, for it is of the nature of things; it is the law of being, the spirit of the universe, the Infinite and Omnipotent God.

Let us struggle for it, reach for it, pray and labor for it, that we may merit the sweet benediction of the old man in the play:

"God's benison go with you, and with those That would make good of bad, and friends of foes!"

A SONG FOR A SINGER.

TO MY DAUGHTER.

There is never a day too long, sweet one,
 For the beautiful cares of life;
 Never a duty serenely done
 But tempers the wearing strife
 For earthly splendor, ignoble gains.
 As long as the sunshine falls,
 As long as the fair moon fills and wanes,
 Kind Nature our need forestalls.
 Was Whittier blind to his brother's ills?
 Did Thoreau repine for gold?
 Did the sage of our rugged Hampshire hills
 Ever sigh for the days of old?
 The past was an open page to him;
 Its glory the soul's despair;
 In the light of this golden age how dim
 All its pitiless pageants were!
 To-day is the garnered fruit of time,
 Our country the blessed of God.
 The deeds of the now-time how sublime!
 These walks have the dear saints trod.
 What war so holy as ours for man?
 What martyr like Lincoln blest?
 All about us service the just may scan,
 Found worthy the Christ confessed.
 O, the wordless poems they live to-day—
 Our brothers and sisters true,
 And fragrant flowers do the toilers lay
 On the tasks that are set for you.
 I know "their angels do now behold
 The face of the Father" here,
 In acts as brave as the poets told,
 And that tyrants paled to hear.
 We would blush for self if we only knew How lovely the little things
 Our neighbors are doing out of view;
 His peace their compassion brings.

Our human nature is half divine!
 Godward we trend always;
 The heart is a mystic sacred shrine,
 Though we fail of "the perfect" way.

Then live, sweet soul, it is woman's hour!
 And this is her "promised land."
 Live up, for thy gentle reins of power
 Are laid in a child's soft hand.
 If this matchless lake has a million waves,
 A million hearts on shore
 Boat warm and fast in the love that saves
 From the wrongs of the days of yore.

ELSIE'S BURDEN.

AN EVOLUTION STUDY IN BLACK AND WHITE.

Long, long ago before Elsie's great-grandfather was her grandfather, or even a father, but only David L—, a young husband, the friend he loved much did a wrong—a foolish, selfish, thoughtless act. All David's after life and that of his posterity was deeply, darkly colored by the spirit in which he took his friend's fault. As impetuous in his sense of honor as his friend was in his folly, and far more imperious, he mistook revenge for justice, and in his "righteous indignation" he estranged his friend. In the place of pure white love, with all its happy offspring of smiles and pleasantry and open-hearted confidence, came black hatred and its dark attendants of malice and revenge, of scorn and all the rest, that but to name is frightful. So the good he might have done his friend was turned to wrong,—a greater wrong than his friend's. The law of Nature, that works on resistlessly however we may ignore it, imposed this penalty upon him,—that in his heart he should bear forever the burden of hate which he had imposed upon himself. As he could not stay forever in the world his children had to take it up and bear it for him. Some hated their fellow-man and were murderers, others hated themselves and died by their own hands, until none were now left to bear the hereditary burden—the burden that is called insanity—but Elsie and her father. In him it had become the hate of wrong. Being strong he could bear the strife. A reformer stern and fierce he waged a warfare against existing evil's. She, being weak, could not. In her the burden had become a hate-strife, a shrinking from all contention, a timidity that was painful, a dread of stern looks, of frowns, of cross words.

He saw it and said to her: "My daughter, vanquish hate with love, drive frowns away with smiles."

So, smiling up into his face, she saw the stern look melt to tenderness as he said, "My daughter, hate of wrong is love of right."

And she replied, "Oh, father, surely the debt is paid, the forever has ended."

But he answered: "No, my child; so long as there are hearts to bear the burden the forever will last. The burden of hate is heavy; the burden of love is light. Be strong, be brave, turn hate to love, disease to health, death to life. To bring happiness and cheerfulness to others—this shall be your burden. Bear it well."

So well did she bear it that she was no longer weak, but strong, strong from the struggle to keep love from reverting to hate. Sometimes the struggle was fierce and then she would remember her father's words, "My daughter, hate of wrong is love of right," and she would question herself, "Cannot abstract hate become abstract love—if we will it so?" And in her heart she felt the burden of hate turned to the burden of love—as the water was turned to wine, and all the wedding guests in her soul came arrayed in the pure white garments of love.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.

One night on one of my side trips in the mountains of the Cumberland, I slept in a cabin where the accommodations were as narrow as the host's liberality was broad. My bed was in the loft, and I reached it by a ladder. In the morning when I had arisen, I thought that a little cold water for my hands and face would not be very unwholesome, and as there was none in sight I called for the small boy of the house and he came to the foot of the ladder. I looked down through the hole in the floor and told him what I wanted, and he invited me out into the yard, where there was a trough full of water and a piece of coffee-sack stuff hanging to a post for a towel. The boy, whose face hadn't been washed for a month and whose tow hair hadn't been combed for a year, watched my proceedings with interest. When I began to comb my hair with my pocket comb, he felt compelled to talk.

"Do yer wash yer face every day?" he inquired curiously.

"Usually," I replied with a smile.

"An' comb yer hair?"

"Yes."

"Every day?" he repeated.

"Yes, every day."

It was too much for him and he was silent for a moment.

"Well," he said at last, "don't yer think yer a heap uv trouble to yer-self?"

That time it was too much for me, and I gave him a dime and told him to go off and have a picnic.

LESSON XII.

THE TRANSFIGURATION.

Mark viii. 27-ix. 29.

*The mount for vision,—but below
The paths of daily duty go,
And nobler life therein shall own
The pattern on the mountain shown.*
—F. L. Hosmer.

Picture: The Transfiguration of Jesus, by Raphael (1483-1520).

The picture shows us four groups. At the base of the knob-like summit of a mountain are nine of the disciples, and an afflicted child who has been brought by his family in hope that he may be relieved by Jesus. Since the names of the apostles vary slightly in the different lists it cannot be told with certainty which of the disciples each figure represents. The easiest to make out is Thomas, whose earnest, questioning face, by far the most attractive in the picture, looks out from the very center of the group upon the demoniac child. At his left are said to be Matthew, with Simon the Zealot kneeling in front of him, and Bartholomew at their left, pointing to the child. At the extreme right of Thomas is said to be Andrew, with an open book of the law, and at his left Philip and Judas or James pointing upward to the mount where Jesus is. The two figures in the background, then, would be James of Alphaeus and Judas Iscariot. The child, who in Matthew is explicitly called an epileptic, is held by his father, in whose face some students of the picture have seen an explanation of his son's affliction. In fact, with an acuteness hardly to be commended, critics have discovered that the father's family, of which a brother and sister are at the father's right, was naturally weak-minded, while the mother's family—the mother and her sister in the foreground and a brother with upraised arm behind the father—have faces of unusual intelligence and vigor. But into these minute details we need not go; it is enough to see that a child has been brought to the disciples of Jesus, whom they cannot cure, and that some of them are pointing to the mountain where Jesus and three of his disciples have gone, promising help as soon as the Master returns.

Turning to the mountain, then, we see a second group, that of the three disciples—Peter in the middle, with the two brothers James and John on his right and left. As in the Gospel narrative the three are represented as half dazed with sleep, half dazzled by the splendor that surrounds Jesus. On either side of Jesus are Moses and Elijah holding respectively books of the Law and the Prophets. The fourth group at the extreme left of the picture consists of two men, St. Lawrence and St. Julian, placed there at the request of the Cardinal de Medici, for whom the picture was painted, and commemorating his father Lorenzo and his uncle Giuliano de Medici.

What is the meaning of this scene in the life of Jesus?—Jesus, having devoted himself to death as the Messiah, went with his three most intimate friends to a mountain to pray, and there was transfigured by the glory of his noble purpose.

Luke says, characteristically, that Jesus went off alone, but for his three disciples, to pray. He did not go to the mountain to be transfigured, but to pray, and the transfiguration is only an incident of his prayer. To understand this scene we must study it in its historical setting. In each of the three accounts it immediately follows the critical episode at Caesarea Philippi, in which for the first time Jesus openly declared himself the Messiah. At the beginning of his career Jesus simply took up the proclamation of John—"Repent ye for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17). Like John he emphasized obedience to the moral law as the only method of preparation, but being of a more sunny and loving temper, his ethical ideal was more genial and tenderly sympathetic: for him love was actually the fulfilling of the law and the reality of the coming kingdom. So, as we saw last week, wherever he found love he knew that there the kingdom was already present, "within you" or "in the midst of you." But if, as he and nearly everybody else among the people believed, the Messiah was to bring in the kingdom, must not the Messiah have already come if the kingdom was present? If, then, Jesus had a twofold idea of the kingdom must he not also have had a two-fold idea of the Messiah? In the Old Testament there was the suffering Messiah of the 53d of Isaiah (originally spoken of the suffering remnant of the people, but misinterpreted) as well as the Messiah of Glory. Moreover, there are faint traces of a double Messiah even in the Talmud. We may conjecture, then, that the progress of Jesus' thought was after this fashion. At first he held like the majority of the people, to a kingdom and a Messiah that were to come, but like John he saw that plain righteousness must be the essence of the kingdom, and hence the only adequate preparation for it. Then he saw that in loving hearts the kingdom had already come and was to grow from man to man till its consummation in outward and visible sovereignty. As teacher of the new ethical ideal of tenderness and loving sympathy, through him and his words that kingdom was to increase in human hearts. Was he not then the Messiah who was to bring in the kingdom of God? So he may have reasoned, but he did not doubt that the kingdom was to be outwardly manifest and that for that, the Messiah was yet to come. Then the idea of the twofold Messiah of the Old Testament, and possibly also of a few of the people, dawned upon him with all its fatal implications. Seeing that his words were alienating the people from him, knowing the enmity of the Pharisees and the suspicious watchfulness of the Romans, he understood that for him to continue in his present path would bring him into suffering and possibly to death. But was not precisely that predicted of the Messiah? Thus knowing himself to be the bearer of the ethical ideal of the kingdom of God, and hence its real Messiah in human hearts, and discerning that to fulfill his mission as preacher would carry him into the sufferings and death predicted of the Messiah, it is not strange that at last he allowed himself to be called "the Christ," and by this acceptance of the Messiahship devoted himself to the fate of the suffering servant of Yahwe. Up to the time of Caesarea Philippi he had never called himself the Messiah; this is evident from his reply to Peter—Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven (Matt. xvi. 17)—which would be pointless and untrue if he had ever announced himself to them as the Christ. More, he seems to have forbidden all mention of such a thing, for the disciples do not say that the people called him the Christ, although there can be no doubt whatever that many besides John had asked "Art thou he that should come?" and hoped that it was "he that should redeem Israel." But now he declares himself the Christ and from this time forth begins to teach that he "must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things . . . and be killed and rise again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21). As teaching Messiah of the growing spiritual kingdom he was to suffer and die, but as victorious Messiah of the consummated, realized kingdom of God he was to return again in power and great glory. Jesus believed himself the twofold Messiah of the twofold kingdom of God.

Now we understand why the transfiguration followed directly after the declaration at Caesarea Philippi. Jesus dreaded death and shrank from it like any other man, but believing himself the Messiah he faced death inevitable. His stern rebuke to Peter shows that the apostle's words were a dangerous re-enforcement to what he felt to be the weak, cowardly elements in his own nature that recoiled from suffering and death. That he might gain complete mastery over himself he goes to the mountain to pray. In his prayer victory is won, and stern duty takes on "the Godhead's most benignant grace." Stripping the story of all its legendary accretions, we have to do with a common human experience that may be repeated in every one of us. Duty taken up into the mount of prayer ("looked at from the highest point of view," in Emerson's phrase) is transfigured into radiant joy. The glory on the mount shone in the face of a man who had seen on the face of duty that commanded him to death the loving smile of the Eternal.

Returning from the mount, strong in his joyful determination, Jesus finds the scribes wrangling with his disciples. If Raphael had shown us the scribes in his picture he would have given us a most dramatic and instructive contrast. The disciples of Jesus and of Moses wrangle on the plain, but those who rise to the holy mount see there Jesus and Moses in loving communion. The disciples have failed to cure the epileptic child. As we look at this picture, it may be that we ask impatiently—Why is Jesus there in glory while he is needed so much down on the plain? What right has a man to use in meditation and prayer hours which might be expended in relieving urgent suffering? But it is with power received on the heights of prayer that Jesus takes away the pain and misery before which his disciples are powerless. "This kind goeth not forth save by prayer."

The interpretation of this event in the life of Jesus will, doubtless, seem strange, because the theory of Jesus' idea of the Messiahship upon which it is based is novel. The commentators who are classed as "Liberal" usually deny altogether that Jesus called himself the Messiah and reject unqualifiedly the notion that he believed he was to return at the "consummation of the age" in the realized kingdom of God. But while such an idea of Jesus may perhaps keep him on a higher intellectual and spiritual level it requires a violence in dealing with our sources that seems uncalled for and summary. We have tried to show how the two ideas of the kingdom of God came naturally to the mind of Jesus and dwelt there: we have also seen how the conception of a double mission of the Messiah attached itself naturally to these two ideas of the kingdom; from this point of view his belief in the second advent is perfectly explicable and reasonable. Thus we keep closely to our records without violating historic probabilities. If this thought of Jesus removes him farther from our minds, it brings him indefinitely nearer to our hearts—a great pure soul entangled by the misconceptions of his time in an idea of the Messiahship which betrayed him to his death.

Questions.

The Picture.—How could you tell from the picture that the scene is laid on a mountain? Can you pick out the apostles? Why did Raphael introduce the two figures on the summit at the left of the picture? What do you think of the picture as a work of art?

The Vision on the Mount.—What event preceded the transfiguration? What relation does it bear to it? Did Jesus think himself the Messiah? What did the Messiahship mean to him? What do you suppose really happened on the mount? Do the three disciples in the picture look as if they could tell accurately what they saw and heard?

The Duty on the Plain.—What did Jesus find when he came back after his night of prayer? Why were the disciples weak? Why was Jesus strong? How much of this whole story do you think is true? How much of it is true to human experience?

THE GOSPEL AND ITS EARLIEST INTERPRETATIONS.

EDITOR UNITY: Kindly permit me to make a correction of one or two points in W. W. F.'s appreciative review of "The Gospel and Its Earliest Interpretations," in your latest issue. He finds a "bad mis-translation of Rom. v. 12," on p. 181. But on p. 181 there is no translation of or reference to the passage, but only a passing allusion to it. On p. 173 the passage is correctly translated, referred to and annotated.

I should like to say also that the charge of "rationalism" in my interpretation of Jesus' conception of the kingdom of God proceeds from a misapprehension of my grounds and method. In maintaining that Jesus did not adopt the political or the apocalyptic idea of this kingdom, my judgment is not determined by rationalistic considerations, such as a priori preconceptions of the greatness of Jesus, but by critical reasons, by which I am led to regard certain sayings of his as genuine and certain other apocalyptic words ascribed to him as spurious. The translation of Luke xxiv. 21, is that of Noyes.

While wishing to call attention to these corrections, I desire to express my appreciation of the many kind and commendatory words which W. W. F. has written concerning my book.

ORELLO CONE.

Buchtel College, Akron, Ohio.

[It is gratifying that Dr. Cone deemed the review of his book worthy of notice, and if the reviewer has erred in referring to a few points where the work seemed to him to fall below its usually high level, he is glad to be corrected, that there may be no diminution from his admiration of the book. No one could for an instant suspect Dr. Cone of being consciously biased by a priori considerations regarding the person of Jesus, yet feelings often linger after the convictions on which they were originally based have disappeared. Moreover, among the critical reasons by which the discrimination is to be made between genuine and spurious sayings of Jesus must be the general opinion one holds concerning him. "It is difficult not to think," says Dr. Cone (p. 56), "that his ethical conception of the kingdom of God should exclude, should render impossible to him such apocalyptic ideas and such unrealized and unrealizable hopes." But if Paul, who with all his mental faults was far more logical than Jesus, could fall into as bad self-contradictions as Dr. Cone says he did, why may not Jesus have been inconsistent also? Even Dr. Cone himself has these two sentences within five pages: "Through all his teaching there runs the apparent paradox that the kingdom is here and that it is to come" (p. 50); and yet again, "It cannot but appear strange to the historical judgment that Jesus, who had repeatedly declared that the kingdom of God was already among men and that his public ministry had introduced it, should speak of it in the passages already quoted as if it were yet to come," etc. (pp. 54, 55). Unless we suppose that Jesus was logically self-consistent it seems hazardous to set aside all the passages in which he is represented as sharing the popular belief. But such an assumption is decidedly rationalistic. Undoubtedly in Dr. Cone's mind there is no such conscious leaning, yet repeated reading of the chapters in his book only deepens the impression that he has not kept entirely free from the method of interpretation which he disclaims.

On p. 181 Dr. Cone writes: "If it is not transmitted and all men are subject to death only 'inasmuch as all have sinned,'" etc. Surely here is a translation of Rom. v. 12, and a mis-translation. It was not asserted that Dr. Cone had always mis-translated the passage, for in several places the aorist is accurately rendered, but the discussion of the subject proceeds as if the aorist were a perfect, and that constant misunderstanding appears finally in a plump mistranslation. If the force of the aorist were strictly observed, it seems as if Dr. Cone's interpretation would be quite impossible. The verb is an aorist, and the verse when strictly interpreted is in perfect accord with Paul's thought. There are in the world two great streams, one of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life, whereof Adam and Jesus, the second Adam, are respectively fountain heads. Every man by virtue of his descent from Adam is in the first stream, but he who believes in Jesus is by that act of belief put into the Christ stream. And as the sin of Adam was the sin of his posterity so the righteousness of Jesus becomes the righteousness of all who believe in him. The reviewer's criticism was that throughout the discussion Dr. Cone had neglected to observe rigidly the tense of his verb and had put his prevailing misinterpretation into an out-and-out mistranslation on p. 181.

As for Luke xxiv. 21, whether the translation be Dr. Noyes' or another's, it is incorrect, and the Revised Version is right.—W. W. FENN.]

The Study Table

THE EMPIRE OF THE TSARS AND THE RUSSIANS.*

This is a work of great value, and we are inclined to believe that the present translation, from the third French edition, is considerably more valuable than the original.

Here we have a sympathetic study of Russia by a French scholar whose work has for many years held a high place in Europe, a work the value of which is testified to not alone by the demand for it outside of Russia, but by the twofold fact that while it is highly indorsed by Russian scholars and patriots, it is banned by the Russian Government. This latter fact the author regards as a tribute to his sincerity, saying that he has the rare good fortune of being able to "express all his friendliness toward Russia and her people without a doubt being cast on his independence of spirit." His fairness is indicated in the fact that in the very preface in which he tells of the Russian Government's ban, he goes on to speak in high terms of the sincerity and earnestness and moral dignity of the Tsar, whose pride it is to be true to the traditions of his country and his race. The author endeavors to make clear to us that we of the Occident (whether Europeans or Americans) must not judge this vast, half-Asiatic country and its people, held back in their development by the combined influences of a harsh climate, barbaric invasions, a stationary religion, and long and intimate intercourse with despotic states,—that we must not judge them by the standards of the West. And on the other hand he would have us realize that with all these drawbacks Russia and the Russians are full of promise; that the nation is still in its nonage, but from its maturity much, very much, may be looked for. The present volume treats of the country and the people; the second is to treat of the institutions; and the last, of religion and the church. As it is impossible within the limits of space at the writer's disposal to discuss the volume before us with the fullness it merits, it may not be amiss to indicate its scope by giving the titles of the eight books into which the 580 pages constituting the first volume are divided. They are: Nature, Climate and Soil; Races and Nationality; The National Temperament and Character; History and the Elements of Civilization; The Social Hierarchy—The Lower and Urban Classes; Nobility and Tchin; The Peasant and the Emancipation; Mir, Family, and Village Communities. These matters are discussed with great fullness and care; the first two books especially contain one of the most careful discussions of the influence of climate, soil, etc., upon a people that is to be found anywhere, and the whole work has much of interest for the ethnologist and the anthropologist as well as for the student of social phenomena as such.

But what gives the present edition its unique value is the contributions of the translator, Zenaide A. Ragozin, an historian of some consideration and a member of various learned societies of France, England and America, and, what for the present purpose is of more importance, a Russian patriot whose twenty years of American life have done nothing to diminish his enthusiastic belief in the high destiny of his people. The reader of the English edition thus has the advantage of the frequent comments of one to the manner born, in addition to the candid discussion of a competent observer from without.

It may be thought that the author himself shows something of the present bias of his nation in favor of Russia; and it may be feared that this fact, in addition to the circumstance that the translator is a Slavophil, will render the book unsafe as a guide; but such fears we consider unfounded. In his remarks upon the character and policy of the present Tsar it does seem as though our author were somewhat influenced by the National partiality for France's ally; but we cannot see that his reliability as an historian is affected by this. On the contrary he seems eminently fair, and his candid discussion of Russian shortcomings now and again calls forth the emphatic protest of the translator. After hearing both sides we believe that most readers will generally be inclined to adopt the author's view in preference to that of the translator, but even when this is the case we are enlightened by the translator's comments. The book is destined, we believe, to a large and growing popularity on this side of the Atlantic; for, besides its value to the scientist, it is full of interest for the general reader. The publishers have spared no pains to make the book worthy of its author. Each volume is separately indexed and the present one contains four maps. Paper and press work are of the finest, and the binding is strong and handsome. We await the succeeding volumes with great interest. Till then we must content ourselves and our readers with this brief notice. F. W. S.

TWO SOLDIERS, AND A POLITICIAN. By Clinton Ross. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 32mo, pp. 139. 75 cents.—This is a pleasant little volume for an idle half-hour, if you care for a glimpse of Wolfe, the hero of Quebec; of John Andre, and Sir Henry Clinton, and "Colonel Burton Ford of the staff of General Washington"; of Talleyrand, that dramatic figure of French history,—all set off by some imaginary personages who speak in letter, diary, and dialogue. Indeed, Mr. Ross admits that he has drawn some imaginary portraits of men found "in that twilight land of the fancy where fact and romance meet." We like best the second picture of "Lord Fenwold," with the sight of Revolutionary days and of Paris and London life. The letter form does not conceal the commonplaceness of the thoughts on Wolfe, and Talleyrand deserves a better artist. An historical portrait may be inexact, but an imaginary portrait has no excuse for existence if it is not artistically done. H. B. L.

MR. M. M. MANGASARIAN, the lecturer of the Chicago Society for Ethical Culture and one of our contributing editors, has recently delivered an address on the "Ethics of Marriage and Divorce," which his society has published in a handsome pamphlet and which may be obtained at this office (price, 10 cents). The motto which stands at the head of the address is from Browning,—“The more man gets to know of his own life's adaptabilities, the more joy-giving will his life become.” But that which best types the thought of the lecture is a sentence of the lecturer which occurs in the latter part of the discourse: “You cannot prevent the body from decomposition when the soul has left it.” This being his point of view, he rightly holds, as it seems to us, that divorce is necessary in order to prevent the desecration of marriage.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE FOR 1894. AS A channel through which are received the richest fruits gleaned from the vast field of foreign literature, the ripest productions of the most brilliant intellects, this standard weekly magazine stands before the literary world without a peer. It is an absolute necessity to every American reader.

In addition to the productions of leading British writers, THE LIVING AGE will publish during 1894 selected works of other noted European authors, translated expressly for it. A story of thrilling interest, from the French of Paul Perret, will be begun in the first January issue, which is the opening number of a new series and begins the 200th volume of the magazine. Its prospectus for 1894 is well worth attention in selecting one's reading matter for the coming year.

Special and generous offers are made to new subscribers. Littell & Co., Boston.

Notes from the Field

IOWA STATE CONFERENCE.

The fifteenth annual conference of the Iowa Association of Unitarian and other Independent Churches, which met with Mr. Judy's flourishing church in Davenport, Nov. 14-16, was noteworthy for three important matters considered in it. In the first place, the relation of the Unitarian and Universalist bodies was the subject of an interesting discussion by members of both churches, in which most of the speakers seemed to look for practical success along the line of co-operation rather than of union. The second noteworthy topic, and one of far more practical importance, because it means help to the helpless, was an attempt to make Mr. Judy's Church of the Isolated a reality. This most promising idea was carefully discussed, and a committee was appointed to report ways and means of putting it into operation. The ways reported were: 1. The selection of some man or woman to organize the isolated individuals in each circuit. 2. The arrangement of periodic meetings in each circuit. 3. Co-operation with the Post-office Mission, both in organizing and distributing literature. 4. The use of Sunday circles as helps to such organizations. And the means reported were an appropriation of one hundred dollars from the State Missionary funds for use in the work. The Post-Office Mission was a great discovery, because it enabled each church to reach hundreds of distant and lone individuals with rays of new light and waken them into a religious growth. And if the Church of the Isolated can help these lonely atoms to unite with each other in organic growth, with their own officers and literature and meetings, it will be a still greater discovery than the Mission itself.

But the most noteworthy subject of all in this conference was its declaration of independence of the American Unitarian Association in regard to money matters. Of the seven hundred and seventy dollars spent by it in missionary work the past year, every dollar was raised by the conference, and the one hundred and fifty dollars sent to it by the Boston Association was returned intact. And it voted for the coming year to do the same and even more. It appropriated a thousand dollars for missionary work, all to be raised at home, and it raised one-tenth of that sum before the conference adjourned.

Mr. Forbush, who was present the second day of the Conference, made a long and labored defense of the money methods of the Eastern Association, though he admitted that much of the aid was given where it was not needed and did more harm than good. But he seemed to be wholly unaware of the real objection to the present relation of the A. U. A. to the Western churches,—an objection that has nothing to do with the wisdom or folly of its individual appropriations, but relates wholly to its undemocratic attitude in disregarding the action of the Conference of the Western churches, and ignoring the official elected by those churches, and putting its own agent, appointed at Boston, into the field to decide what churches it should aid and what it should leave unaided. As long as it holds that attitude, as long as it is an autocrat of the church, and not an agent of the churches, so long it will do more harm than good with its well-meant benefactions. It will keep the rest of the country, as far as it can, at just that stage of religious growth which Boston has reached. It will prevent the very growth which it is our mission to foster by our independent churches and conferences.

In other matters also the Iowa conference was interesting and profitable. Tuesday afternoon Mr. Louis Block, of Davenport, presented the subject of the "Post-Office Mission." In the evening an eloquent and inspiring sermon was given by Rev. Mary A. Safford, the President of the conference. Wednesday morning was occupied with a business session and the reports of the churches. All the societies were represented, either by delegates or by written reports, save Iowa City, Keokuk, and Rock Rapids, and all of them gave encouraging reports. The Sioux City church reported over $6,000 raised and spent for church work during the year; an average attendance of 260 at the church services, and 136 at the Sunday school, while Davenport reported about half that sum and about half that attendance at church, though in the Sunday school the attendance was larger in the latter city. Wednesday afternoon came an earnest paper by Rev. C. E. Perkins, of Iowa City, on the Reasons for the Existence of the Unitarian Church, in which the chief emphasis was laid upon the Religion, and not the Freedom of the movement, a position which was disputed by some of the speakers in the discussion that followed.

A generous and cordial Reception and Supper was given Wednesday evening, followed by two addresses,—one by Mr. Nagarkar, of Bombay, on the social reforms instituted by the Brahmo Somaj, and the other by Prof. Patrick, of the State University, on Helpful and Harmful Charity. Thursday morning "The Young People of the Church" was the subject of an excellent paper by Rev. H. D. Stevens, of Perry, and he was followed by Rev. J. H. Palmer, of the Universalist Church at Cedar Rapids, who gave a paper on Co-operation between Unitarians and Universalists, a paper which resulted later in a resolution looking toward a Mid-year Conference of Liberal Ministers of the State. The afternoon was devoted to Sunday-school work, with papers on "Infant Class Work," by Mrs. Parker, of Quincy, Ill., and "Work for Older Pupils," by Rev. Elmer Gordon. The session was concluded in the evening by a most impressive address by Mr. Jones on "The Cause of the Toiler as Represented in the Art Palace of the World's Fair."

The officers elected were: President, Rev. Mary A. Safford; Vice President, Dr. J. G. Biller.

Portland, Maine.—At a meeting of the Main Association of Unitarian and other Christian Ministers held in the First Parish House last spring, it was decided to form a closer bond of union among the liberal ministers of the State. With this end in view a meeting was held in the same place on Wednesday, Nov. 8. It continued during the forenoon and afternoon. Sixteen ministers were present, representing the Swedenborgian, Universalist and Unitarian denominations. Papers were read by Rev. J. L. Seward, of Waterville, and by Rev. W. M. Kimball, of Portland.

An association was formed under the following conditions: "Desiring to increase fellowship and co-operation among the Liberal Christians of Maine, and to develop intimacy and friendship and intellectual and spiritual improvement among ourselves, we, the undersigned ministers, associate ourselves together to forward these ends."

CONSTITUTION.

Art. 1. This association shall be known as The Maine Association of Liberal Christian Ministers.

Art. 2. The officers shall be a President, Secretary (who shall also act as Treasurer), and four Directors. These six officers shall constitute an Executive Committee, who shall have general charge of the Association.

Art. 3. The regular meetings of the Association shall be held on the first Tuesdays of November, February and May. The meeting in November shall be the annual one for the election of officers.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Rev. Henry Blanchard, D. D., of Portland; Secretary, Rev. John Carroll Perkins, of Portland; Executive Committee, Rev. E. E. Newbert, of Augusta; Rev. J. F. Rhoades, of Biddeford; Rev. Abram Conkling, of Bath; and Rev. S. C. Beach, of Bangor.

It is felt that in a State like Maine, with its long distances and therefore the lack of harmony in the liberal efforts of the ministers and people, there may result from a movement of this kind a vast amount of good.

Baraboo, Wis.—Mr. Hirai gave his paper on "The Real Attitude of Japan Toward Christianity" last Saturday night in the Free Congregational Church. There was a full house and a great deal of interest and enthusiasm manifested. Mr. Hirai also occupied the Sunday morning hour with a talk on Japanese religious beliefs. His talk to the Sunday school was very interesting. He told some pretty plain truths while here, and his talks awakened much thought. R. C. D.

Pomona, Cal.—On the last Sunday in October, a service at the First Unitarian Church was held in recognition of the World's Parliament of Religions. The minister began the service by reading Samuel Longfellow's poem beginning:

Out of the dark, the circling sphere
Is rounding onward to the light:
We see not yet the full day here,
But we do see the paling night.

After a responsive reading and the hearty singing of a hymn, Rev. Mr. Pierce spoke, his text being the words of Peter in Acts x. 34: "Of a truth I perceive that God is not a respecter of persons, but in every nation he that loveth God and doeth righteousness is accepted with Him."

"We speak," said Mr. Pierce in the course of his sermon, "of Christianity as a 'revealed' religion and all true, and all other forms of religion false. While Jesus was preaching that only the pure in heart could see God, Seneca was saying: 'The mind unless it is pure and holy comprehends not God.'"

"Stand and Deliver!"

We do it. We are always "at the old stand," ready to deliver anything in the line of Books you may care for. Send 2-cent stamp for our catalogue. A few of our specialties are:

"In the City by the Lake," by BLANCHE EARLING. A Beautiful Souvenir of the World's Fair City. The two idyls of Chicago life in this volume, "The Shadow" and "The Slave Girl," really two divisions of one narrative, are full of thrilling interest, and contain vivid descriptions of real scenes and places about the great metropolis of the West. The author has clothed the near and now with the dignity and beauty which other writers bestow upon things and people which have become history and myth. Ev'n so unpoetical a thing as the Chicago River is touched poetically. Holiday edition bound in white and gold. No longer Christmas gift for your friend who has visited the World's Fair City, or who would like to have visited it but was unable. Dark cloth binding, $1 25; white and gold, $1.35.

"Art, Music and Nature," consisting of selections compiled by Mary E. Pratt from the writings of PROF. DAVID SWING, together with his portraits. The Inter Ocean calls it "A collection of literary gems in the highest and best sense of the term. Chicago Walt. The work will find its way to popularity." New Orleans Picayune: "Charming in its make up, and printing and binding all that could be desired." Bound in white, green and gold. Price $1.

"Letters to a Little Girl," by MRS. HELEN E. STARRETT. A series of letters embodying, with all the charm of a story, important suggestions as to conduct, morals and manners. Miss Haskell, Principal of Monticello Seminary pronounces it "the book that all little girls should have." A boon to mothers and teachers. A great favorite with both young and old. Cloth, tasteful bound, with admirable portrait of the author, $1.25.

"Mother Goose's Christmas Party," by ABBY MORTON DIAZ. An ingenious story in rhyme. A charming gift for a child, or just the thing for amateur entertainments. Leading roles appropriate either for adults or children. Handsomely printed and bound in white, 50 cents; pamphlet edition, $1.50 per dozen.

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Apropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahmo leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fasting, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Parting, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

| I. MOSES. | II. ZOROASTER. | III. CONFUCIUS. | IV. BUDDHA. |
| V. SOKRATES. | VI. JESUS. | VII. MOHAMMED. | |

These sermons, dedicated to the Parliament of Religions and published through the energy of his parish, have already given the author, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, a wide hearing in that Parliament. Several thousand copies of these sermons were sold during the sessions of the Parliament at the Art Institute. Besides the sermon thought, these little books give in a small space a comprehensive idea of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

MR. H. DHARMAPALA, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes to the committee in reference to the Buddha sermon: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'D ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB, Editor of the Moslem World, published in New York, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia,' and I assure you I am greatly pleased at the manner in which you have treated the subject. It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. I can plainly see how your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain toward Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth. * * * I will be very glad to have some of these lectures to sell, and will place it on our book list."

*Can rules or tutors educate
The semigod whom we await?
He must be musical,
Tremulous, impressional,
Alive to gentle influence
Of landscape and of sky,
And tender to the spirit touch
Of man's or maiden's eye;
But, to his native center fast,
Shall into Future fuse the Past,
And the world's flowing fates in his own mould recast.*

THANKSGIVING DAY, Puritan in its origin, is universal in its destiny, because it is founded in nature and not in miracle. It is a festival of liberty, civic and social life, not doctrinal and ecclesiastical in its requirements. It is to be one of the sacred days in the Church of Humanity that is coming, the Church of the Moral Law. It is a realization of Emerson's prophecy that that church will "take upon itself beauty, music, pictures and poetry."

THE genial founder and pastor of the New York "Church of the Stranger," Rev. Chas. F. Deems, D. D., is no more. In its measure his was a work for the church catholic, and he was thus a brother to the Liberals of to-day, however far his private creed may have been from ours.

JOHN BURROUGHS said that "Emerson's face revealed no blank spaces." His was a face serene in turmoil; while he was declaring sentences that would provoke a tumult in other people's breasts, his own face was calm as a summer morning. He smiled over the "storm in the Unitarian washbowl." The sermon on the mount brings a sanity which even the beatitudes do not explain; so the writings of Emerson lift to beatific heights for which the text seems no adequate explanation. Perhaps because in both cases personality breaks through the paragraphs.

CHARLES G. AMES has recently been preaching a "Sermon to the Prosperous," in which he says, "We must move away from the cruelties of competition towards free co-operation. Competition annuls the law of brotherhood." Mr. Ames' words have relation to business competition, but they are also sadly true concerning the rivalries of religion. The barbarities perpetrated in the name of religion by the competing sects are famous, or rather infamous. Let us try free co-operation in religion for a while, and see how that will work.

KINDLY LIGHT, of Nov. 12, has a six-column comment upon the lectures given by M'd Russell Webb, the American representative of Islam, under the auspices of the Unitarian church of Ithaca, New York. He calls the visit an "Echo of the World's Parliament of Religions," and says to those who may seek a similar echo, "that they will find Mr. Webb sincere, courteous and fair." We should advise such persons to ask Rev. J. A. Scott, Ithaca, New York, to send them a copy of this always suggestive little parish sheet through the mail. Mr. Webb has a message and a purpose largely in common with that of the constituency which UNITY seeks to represent, viz: widening the range of human sympathies and emphasizing the universal elements of religion.

ONE of the interesting results of the colony established by Australians in Paraguay is an awakening of the powers that be in Australia to the necessity of a course of action which shall keep its own sons in that thinly peopled island-continent. A "Co-operative Communities Land Settlement Bill" has been prepared, the purpose of which is to give to any group or body of workers who apply for it a body of land for a colony, which may be developed according to their own plan, and to whom money or tools will be advanced by the government without interest, the same to be returned to the government within twelve years in installments. As much land is still to be had in large tracts much may come of this. The Twentieth Century suggests that it might be well for our own Government to do likewise.

WE learn from the Independent that at the recent conference of Liberal Presbyterians, in Cleveland, O., there were about sixty ministers and elders present, including Rev. Drs. Patterson, of Chicago, Egbert, of St. Paul, Francis Brown, of New York City, Fiske, of Ithaca, N. Y., Millard, of Rochester, N. Y., and Haydn, of Cleveland. The manifesto issued protested against what the conference regarded as undue assumptions of authority on the part of prose-cutting committees and ecclesiastical courts, and urged liberal ministers to remain in the church, insisting upon their belief that it was broad enough "to embrace in its communion and in its ministry all forms and schools of reverent scholarship which accept the essential and necessary articles of our common faith, acknowledging the Lord Jesus as Divine Master and Savior, and the Bible as the only infallible rule of faith and practice." Certainly this platform is not so disastrously broad as to cause very great consternation in conservative circles, although it does imply a change of base from the Westminster Confession to the Bible.

A NEW VOLUME FROM EMERSON.

Here is cause for Thanksgiving which the President and the Governors did not get into their proclamations. If Charles Lamb was moved to say grace whenever he sat down to Shakespeare why should we not give thanks for this sheaf of ripened wheat granted by the "Celestial Ceres," even more than for the perishable wheat that sustains the perishable body, gathered on Minnesota prairies. A new volume of Emerson! A book which makes available again the words which had passed out of reach of most of his lovers, completing the round dozen of the Riverside edition.

This volume is a priceless addition to the Emerson library if for no other reason than that it gives to us for the first time a general index of all the published works of Mr. Emerson. And what author of modern times so needs an index? How unavailable, even to the man of most retentive memory, is much of his material without an index? What writer so full of quotable things, so apt with fact and anecdote, so wide in his range of quotation and illustration? And now much of these are given a new availability. Whatever interest there may be in the body of this new volume, the best reading to the Emerson lover is found in the index pages. They awaken so many pleasant associations. They present graphically the wide erudition of the man who was no erudite; the extensive reading of the man who taught so well the limitations of books. This index shows us his favorite paths, it tempts many conclusions, some of which are dangerous. If, for instance, we were to seek by index for Emerson's favorite prophet we would find suggestiveness in these figures. The index contains seven references under the head of Zoroaster; six under Mohammed; fourteen under Confucius; twenty-six under Socrates, and seventy under Jesus. The name of Moses does not appear, neither does the name of Buddha. Had Emerson done most of his work before the "Light of Asia" had reached the Western hemisphere? or was there something uncongenial in the humble earth-pilgrim of Asia to the joyous sky-traveler of America? Perhaps so; for one of the seven references under the word "Buddhist" reads "Nature no Buddhist." There is an index of quotations as well as a topical index. This index contains, if we count it right, one hundred and forty-two references in all. Glancing over it one readily discovers, if not his favorite authors, the most familiar ones. There are eight quotations from Milton, nine from Wordsworth, and twenty from Shakespeare; the Sonnets being frequently drawn upon. The inference which these figures suggest is sustained by a reference to the text in this new volume, where we find him saying that Milton "would curl his lip at the slipshod newspaper style of Wordsworth." And yet, he says, "Wordsworth has done more for the sanity of this generation than any other writer." Dare we say that on that account Wordsworth tallies one more than Milton? Again we turn to the body of the new book and find him saying:

The prodigious growth and influence of the genius of Shakespeare in the last one hundred and fifty years is a fact of the first importance. It, almost alone, has called out the genius of the German nation into an activity which, spreading from the poetic into the scientific, religious and philosophical domains, has made theirs now at last the paramount intellectual influence of the world, reacting with great energy on England and America.

No wonder that Shakespeare should lead all the rest in his quotation, and that there should be almost a column of references to him in the general index.

We have one quarrel with this general index, and that a personal one. It compels us at last to retire from exclusive use the dear old volumes in Quaker drab, the original Emerson issued in the early sixties by the Ticknor & Field house, the volumes that for a quarter of a century have been thumbed, underscored, marked with cross references, and with emotional accents of appreciation and dissent. These humble volumes have heretofore held lordly sway in our affections over the more stately and presentable volumes of the Riverside edition. But the index is to this last edition, and there is no help for it, we must stock up. Every lover of Emerson must now own the Riverside edition and have the twelve affluent volumes with their general index at hand. Emerson has called the writings of Plato "an epitome of libraries." In this as in many other senses he himself might be called the American Plato. One other thing is worthy of remark concerning this index; it comes, not as we might have expected from the quiet alcoves of the Harvard library or from its classic neighborhood, but from an appreciative student out in the "wild and woolly West." Prof. John H. Woods, from the Platonic city of Jacksonville, Illinois, has done this high service to the book-lover and the truth-seeker. "No doubt about it," said Bronson Alcott in 1878, "in the next twenty-five years the Mississippi Valley will be sending missionaries to Massachusetts."

But the index is by no means the only interesting thing in this new volume. It contains eight papers reprinted from the now famous and rare Dial; two papers reprinted from the North American Review, on Michael Argelo and Milton; a lecture on Boston, printed for the first time, we infer, from a course of lectures on "Life and Literature" delivered in Boston in 1861; and the initial paper, which gives the title to the book, "Natural History of Intellect," and one on Memory. These two are all the editor can bring to us of several courses of lectures on Mental Philosophy delivered in the fifties and the sixties. The absence of the philosophic method, as popularly understood, is perhaps the surest evidence of Emerson's philosophic profundity. These first sixty pages may well lead us to distrust the best balanced "scheme," and to break from the tyranny of the "systems" of philosophy. Emerson accepts the humbler mission of "writing anecdotes of the intellect: a sort of Farmer's Almanac of mental moods." Any attempt to force these into a system he considers premature.

"'Tis the gnat grasping the world." And again he says, "Metaphysics is dangerous as a single pursuit." "The analytic process is cold and bereaving, and,—shall I say it?—somewhat mean, as spying. There is something surgical in metaphysics as we treat it. The poet sees wholes and avoids analysis."

We have no space to speak of the other papers. It is interesting to read his estimate of Boston, historic and prophetic, in 1861, in the light of thirty years of history. Let Boston itself read, and ask itself how far was it just then? how does it fit now? The lamented William Hunt used to say that "Michael Angelo was so great a man that the subsequent ages have produced no man large enough to interpret him." If this is true perhaps no more successful attempt at a just estimate can be found than in these forty-seven pages of Emerson's. Milton also finds here an interpreter that is akin to his own greatness.

This volume cannot be expected to add anything to the power of the Emerson literature, but it is so much more familiar riches, representing Emerson in his prime. Every page bristles with quotable things. For instance: "Things belong in a row." "Modern literature indicates the uprise of the soul, and not the decline." "With egotism on the one side and levity on the other we shall have no Olympus." "The poem, of all the poetry of the present age, for which we predict the longest term is Abou Ben Adhem." Evolution he describes as "man's escape from the quadruped type, not yet perfectly accomplished."

Surely it is an opportune time for UNITY to send forth this Emerson number; the Thanksgiving season, of which he might well be considered type and prophet. To this Thanksgiving season he brings to us treasures new and old. Thanks for the new volume that revives and enlarges our appreciation of the old one.

"Thanks be to God for his holy saints; thanks be to him who giveth wisdom, Which in all ages entering into holy souls maketh them friends of God and prophets."

Courage consists in equality to the problem before us.

—Emerson, in Courage.

We are as much gainers by finding a new property in the old earth as by acquiring a new planet.

—Emerson, in Uses of Great Men.

PHILANTHROPY AND INTEGRITY

In Mr. Gronlund's book on socialism ("The Co operative Commonwealth") he makes what seems to me a very significant admission. It is, that as sympathy has grown strong and individualism has weakened, integrity has deteriorated; or, in his own words, "crimes against property have notoriously increased."

I suspect that there is more than a grain of truth in this statement. And when we take into account the forms in which "philanthropy" presents itself and the views which are urged concerning property, why should not this be so? We are pointed to the innumerable charity institutions for the relief of every conceivable suffering or want of man, to the tender mercies and comforts extended even to the worst criminals, as evidence of the growth of human sympathy. Our age is compared with other ages, our generation with past generations,—with Roman stoicism, or with Puritan hardness of heart,—and we are told to behold the gain of good-will, of unselfishness, of tender sentiment. But when it comes to the matter of integrity, of inflexible honesty, why, crimes against property were never so rife as now.

Is there not good and sufficient reason why the rights of property should be lightly esteemed or disregarded? What are most of the reforms advocated to-day but direct or indirect attacks upon property rights? All the socialistic schemes now in vogue are calculated to create a deep-seated skepticism as to the just title of any man to the things he possesses. One man shows you that to take interest is unjust; another tells you that to own land is only less criminal than to own a slave; a third tells you that all capital is "the fleecing of labor;" while there are not wanting those who affirm that any private ownership is fraud.

Large numbers of the young are growing up where old-fashioned honesty in property matters, where the old-fashioned conscience about taking the possessions of others, does not exist. What must be the influence upon a boy who hears his father, or those about him, say: That merchant's wealth, that manufacturer's capital, that railroad's outfit, that gentleman's carriage or pictures, were all stolen; they are fraudulent possessions, and none the less so because legally taken from the earnings of the poor? Will it be strange if he contributes as little as possible, by any service of his, to make the wealth of his employer greater? Will he be particularly careful of his employer's time, or of his employer's goods? If capital represents the robbery of the wage-earner, will not the wage-earner justify himself in any effort to destroy it?

My own impression is that it is no great wonder that in the slush of sentiment and pseudo-philanthropy now so prevalent, the sense of integrity and of justice is weakened. The skepticism so common in socialistic and communistic circles, about the right to property and the rights of property owners, weakens the whole structure of society. Carried a little farther, government would dissolve, the state would crumble, only, however, to pass into the hands of tyrants as cold-blooded as any that history records.

To destroy the sense of personal ownership is in the majority of cases to destroy the sense of personal responsibility. If what I have,—however honestly gained, as I look at it,—is not my own; if I cannot produce or accumulate anything without the feeling that it is the gain of injustice or tainted with fraud,—why, then I can have no respect for the rights by which any man keeps his possessions. We are all thieves together. Capitalist's dollar or workman's dollar,—if he is so unfortunate as to have saved one,—there is nothing sacred or to be respected in either. What wonder, then, that each steals from the other all he can get for present enjoyment, with no more compunction than the beasts have that struggle with each other over their prey? J. C. L.

A great integrity makes us immortal: an admiration, a deep love, a strong will arms us above fear. It makes a day memorable. We say we lived years in that hour.

A man should learn to detect and watch that gleam of light which flashes across the mind from within more than the luster of the firmament of bards and sages.

See what strong intellects dare not yet hear God Himself, unless he speak the phraseology of I know not what, David, or Jeremiah, or Paul. We shall not always set so great a price on a few texts, on a few lives

BIRTH AND BOYHOOD.

Ninety years ago this week, in an old gambrel-roofed parsonage among the apple trees of Boston—not far from where the great fire flashed out among the granite blocks in 1872—the minister of the First Church of the city jotted down the following item in his diary:

"May 25, 1803. Mr. Puffer preached his Election Sermon to great acceptance. This day also, whilst I was at dinner at Governor Strong's, my son Ralph Waldo was born. Mrs. E. well. Club at Mr. Adams'."

Had the Rev. William Emerson known who his son was as well as we, he would not have sandwiched his advent in between the dinner and the club in that way. But at all events the little fellow had arrived, and Massachusetts knew, at least, it was an Election Day.

Mr. Emerson, like many of his Massachusetts brethren at that time, was a liberal Congregationalist well out from Calvinism; for a silent change of faith had long been going on in the ancient Puritan meeting-houses, and now the "Unitarian movement" was beginning. Behind the father, in the various lines of ancestry, lay several long ministries in those "first churches" of the wilderness—reaching up to Peter Bulkeley, who, in 1634, led his flock of members across the sea and westwards on, through twenty miles of woods, to settle Concord. Many of these ancestors had been to Harvard College. So that the little boy had the Brahmin blood of New England in him.

The father died in 1811, leaving the mother and six children to struggle with poverty. She took boarders, and the boys did the housework. Ralph—"a spiritual-looking boy in blue nankeen"—said grace at the table, scoured the knives, drove the cow to pasture, perhaps on Boston Common, and shared his winter overcoat, turn and turn about, with the next smaller brother. He was too spiritual and serious and reserved to make an easy playmate, it is said. In a recent number of the Atlantic Dr. Furness has just been telling us his memories of those dim playdays. Spite of the poverty the boys were born to go to Harvard; so books and lessons crowded hard the chores. In his essay on "Domestic Life" Emerson gives a glimpse of this eager, bracing home-life, where "the angels that dwelt with them were Toil and Want and Truth and Mutual Faith." One other bracing angel, all their own, they had in an "Aunt Mary"—Mary Moody Emerson—an imperious, glowing soul, a dumb Dante of New England Calvinism, who transcendentalized the fiery faith into a poetic worship of the Infinite. He draws her picture for us in a reverent but most amusing essay. To the boys she was a searching counselor of perfection, an outside conscience ever urging them to "scorn trifles, lift your aims, do what you are afraid to do!" More than either parent this aunt hints the ancestral sources where their genius rose.

THE YOUNG MINISTER.

By 18 Ralph was out of college, where, in contrast with two brilliant brothers, he had made little mark. A few years passed, and then, obedient to the family fate, he was ordained as minister of a Boston church. One of our illustrations reproduces the "Order of Services" at the young man's ordination. (The original was found a few years ago among the papers of a Boston minister who took part in the service. It must be an almost unique copy and our reproduction is probably the first one ever made.) This was in 1829, by which time nearly all the leading Boston churches had become full "Unitarian," his own, the "Second Church," among the others. "That young man will make another Channing," said a hearer in Dr. Channing's church on a Sunday when Emerson preached there on exchange. "One day there came into our pulpit the most gracious of mortals, with a face all benignity, who gave out the first hymn and made the first prayer as an angel might have read and prayed," said a hearer in New Bedford. Yet in three years and a half the radiant youth resigned his pulpit and the ministry. Not that he disliked the work, or was unsuccessful in it. It was simply that he could no longer sympathetically administer the "Lord's Supper." He told his people why: that the rite claimed a sanction that did not belong to it in the intent of Jesus: that its oriental symbolism was no longer fitted to our tastes; but chiefly, that the exaggerated value set upon the form, the insisting on it as a vital thing, was to confound the substance of Christianity with its shadow. To-day most Unitarians agree with young Emerson about this matter, but then his people loved their rite, and so in all gentleness and good will they parted.

AT CONCORD.

He went to Europe for a little while, where his greatest sight was neither Rome nor Paris, but Carlyle, Carlyle hard to find in his Scotch heather, and little listened to by men as yet. It was the beginning of the historic friendship, which after the many years lies chronicled in the "Correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson." Then home again, and now to Concord (1834), where he soon bought his house, brought a young wife, and settled down to a thinker's quiet life. And now, being about thirty years of age, the real Ralph Waldo Emerson began to teach. His daily walk among the woods and hills; his books—there were not many of them; his thinking—the chief part of his day; the crystallizing of his thoughts in paged and indexed journals; the quarrying of his lectures from these journals, the lecturing itself, and from time to time the gathering of the lectures into a printed book—in this peaceful work he lived until he died. But if peaceful, it was earnest work, as of one enlisted in a service. If the Arctic explorer's tale of daring toil woke any shame in the scholar's heart, it showed, he said, that the scholar was not toiling as he ought. And it was no hermit's life he led; "society and solitude" was the double motto of his days. Such essays of his as "The American Scholar" (1837), "Literary Ethics," and, again, "The Scholar" (1876), and such poems as those called "Saadi" and "The Poet" are autobiographic of his method and ideal. "Books are for the scholar's idle times." "There can be no scholar without the heroic mind." "Truth shall be policy enough for him." "A great soul will be strong to live as well as strong to think." "The day is always his who works in it with serenity and great aims."

THE TRANSCENDENTAL MOVEMENT.

The first ten years in Concord were Emerson's ripening season, and this same period (1834-44) covered that upheaval of the New England mind that is called the "Transcendental Movement." Of this movement Emerson was the recognized center, but in close connection with him stood Alcott, Margaret Fuller, George Ripley, Theodore Parker and others. It was a general strike for intellectual and spiritual independence; a dissent all along the line from the traditional authorities in literature, philosophy, science, education, philanthropy, family and social customs, and religion: so it took many shapes, some of them comical, most of them crude, yet not a few of them the beginnings of needed and enduring reforms. "Brook Farm" was one phase of it; the "Transcendental Club" and Miss Fuller's "Conversations" another; rough "Come-outer" Conventions and the rise of the "Investigator" another. The philanthropies were all astir. In these days rose Anti-slavery and Woman's Rights and Non-resistance, while Temperance and Educational Reform took on new energies. All this, besides a cackling brood of minor isms, ologies and pathies. It is all far enough away from to-day to be romantic ground, and many writers have described it, some seriously, some laughingly; Hawthorne in his "Blithedale Romance," Lowell in his "Thoreau" and his "Fable for Critics," Frothingham in his "Transcendentalism in New England" and his "Life of Parker," Emerson himself in such essays as his "Transcendentalism," "The Young American," "New England Reformers" and "Historic Notes."

THE LECTURER.

Emerson was related to the movement chiefly on the side of philosophy and religion, the side on which it was the continuation and transfiguration of the early Unitarianism. He never joined his friends at Brook Farm in their experiment of transcendental family life. And not till later did he give much active sympathy to the Abolitionists. Although he always had a prompt, brave word for any cause that won his faith, at no time in his life was he a man of the reform organizations. Still less was he himself an organizer. The little magazine he helped to found, called the Dial (1840-44), and his winter lectures, gave him his opportunity for self-expression. Within those first ten years at Concord all the addresses that make the first three volumes of his works were written, and they contain the substance of his whole life's thought. In 1836 he printed anonymously his earliest book, a very little one but with nothing small about its title. "Nature," and even its few pages seem to hold in embryo nearly all he ever said. Its language was so new that it took eleven or twelve years, it is said, to sell five hundred copies of the beautiful and mystic poem-in-prose.

But, "Nature" and his poems in verse excepted, almost everything he wrote reached the public first in lecture-forms. Outside of the churches, and outside of the college, he created a new profession in New England—that of lecturer. For seven successive winters (1834-1841) he hired his hall in Boston and gave his evening course. "Biography," "English Literature," "The Philosophy of History," "Human Culture," "Human Life," "The Present Age," "The Times"—were his roomy subjects. What these evenings were to the little audiences depended on the ears that listened. One wise man said frankly, "I don't understand him—but my girls do." John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States, deposits judgment in his diary thus: "A young man named Ralph Waldo Emerson, after falling in the everyday vocations of a Unitarian preacher and a schoolmaster, starts a new doctrine of transcendentalism, declares all the old revelations superannuated and worn out, and announces the approach of new revelations and prophecies." On the other hand, the question that went laughing round certain Boston circles when Emerson's first boy was born in 1836, "Was the child born with wings?" meant something besides mock. And that there were ears that tingled and hearts that throbbed, we know from what the young poet James Russell Lowell told us in his essay called "Emerson the Lecturer": "Emerson awakened us, saved us from the body of this death. He put us in communication with a larger style of thought, sharpened our wits with a more pungent phrase, gave us ravishing glimpses of an ideal under the dry husk of our New England; made us conscious of the supreme and everlasting originality of whatever bit of soul might be in any of us."

Now and then, on invitation, he gave some single notable address, like the oration on "The American Scholar" at Cambridge, in 1837; and the address before the Divinity School of Harvard College, in 1838; the former well called by Dr. Holmes "our intellectual Declaration of Independence," and the latter causing a sensation as profound in the religious as the other in the literary circles,—people debating whether Emerson were a Christian, a pantheist, or an atheist. Probably few thought him the first; even the Unitarians were very uncertain of that. Yet Father Taylor—that star that slipped from heaven to light a sailors' Bethel—Father Taylor, the Methodist, said of this same young man: "I have laid my ear close to his heart, and never heard any jar in the machinery; he is more like Jesus than anybody else I have ever known. Should he go to hell, it would change the climate and emigration would set that way."

THE FAITHS OF EMERSON.

Ceasing to write sermons, Emerson had begun, unconsciously to himself and to the world, to write scriptures. In his earlier lectures he preached a constant gospel of self-reliance:

"Whoso would be a man must be a non-conformist." "If the single man plant himself indomitably on his instincts, and there abide, the huge world will come round to him." "Defeated all the time, and yet to victory born."

"It is in rugged crisis, in unweariable endurance, and in aims which put sympathy out of question, that the angel is shown. The things of a man for which we visit him were done in the dark and the cold."

"It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion: it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude."

But the individual was thus sacred as an inlet of the universal spirit. Emerson was no systematic philosopher. He neither borrowed formulas from philosophic idealism, nor cared Newly, startlingly, inspiringly, as one having authority and not as the scribes speaking from tradition. Concerning each of these high faiths listen for a moment to his own words.

1. The Soul and Over-Soul.—"There is no bar or wall in the Soul, where man, the effect, ceases, and God, the cause, begins" "We live in succession, in division, in parts, in particles. Meantime within man is the soul of the whole; the wise silence; the universal beauty, to which every part and particle is equally related: the eternal One. . . . When it breathes through his intellect, it is the soul. Yet all must come, as surely as the first atom has two sides." "A cultivated man, wise to know and bold to perform, is the end to which nature works, and the education of the will is the flowering and result of all this geology and astronomy." "Character is nature in its highest form."

And of Jesus, "Alone in all history he estimated the greatness of man. One man was true to what is in you and me."

3. The Spiritual Laws.—"These divine laws execute themselves, they are out of time, out of space, and not

ON CONCORD RIVER ("MUSKETAQUIT").

"Thy summer voice, Musketaquit, Repeats the music of the rain;
But sweeter rivers pulsate fit to elaborate a system of his own. He simply affirmed and reaffirmed certain insights of his own mind. And what were these—what ideas stand as equivalent and synonym today for "Emerson"? It is not hard to tell, so constantly does he repeat them. They were:

1. The Soul, the Over-Soul, and the essential oneness of the two.
2. The One Miracle of Nature.
3. The fact of self-enacting Spiritual Laws, and the unity of these laws with those which hold in the world of matter.
4. The "Beautiful Necessity" by which, according to these laws, all things work for truth and right forever.
5. The Source of Religion in the Ought, the Sovereignty of Ethics, and the progress of religion from theology to morals.

genius: when it breathes through his will, it is virtue; when it flows through his affection, it is love."

"If a man is at heart just, then in so far as he God; the safety of God, the immortality of God, the majesty of God do enter into that man with justice."

"Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line, Severing rightly his from thine, Which is human, which divine."

2. The One Miracle of Nature.—"Other world! There is no other world. God is one and omnipresent; here or nowhere is the whole fact." "The invariable mark of wisdom is to see the miraculous in the common." "But the word Miracle, as pronounced by Christian churches, gives a false impression; it is Monster. It is not one with the blowing clover and the falling rain."

"It is a long way from granite to the oyster; farther yet to Plato, and the preaching of the immortality of subject to circumstance. Thus in the soul of man there is a justice whose retributions are instant and entire. He who does a good deed is instantly ennobled. He who does a mean deed is by the action itself contracted."

"The laws of material nature run up into the invisible world of the mind" "The axioms of physics translate the laws of ethics."

"I look for the new teacher that shall follow so far those shining laws that he shall see them come full circle; shall see their rounding complete grace; shall see the world to be the mirror of the soul; shall see the identity of the law of gravitation with purity of heart; and shall show that the Ought, that Duty, is one thing with Science, with Beauty, and with Joy."

4. The Power that Makes for Righteousness.—"The primordial atoms are predetermined to moral issues." "There is a force always at work to make the best better and the worst good." "The Law alive and beautiful works over our heads and under our feet. Pitiless, it avails itself of our success when we obey it, and of our ruin when we contravene it." "The law is the basis of the human mind. In us, it is inspiration; out there in Nature, we see its fatal strength. We call it the moral sentiment."

"In the mud and scum of things
There alway, alway something sings."

5. The Sovereignty of Ethics.—"The sentiment of virtue is the essence of all religion." "All the victories of religion belong to the moral sentiment." "Men talk of 'mere morality,' which is much as if one should say: 'Poor God, with nobody to help him.'" "I consider theology to be the rhetoric of morals. The mind of this age has fallen away from theology to morals. I conceive it an advance."

"The next age will behold God in the ethical laws—as mankind begins to see them in this age, self-equal, self-executing, instantaneous and self-affirmed, needing no voucher, no prophet, and no miracle besides their own irresistibility; and will regard natural history, private fortunes and politics, not for themselves, as we have done, but as illustrations of those laws, of that beatitude and love. Nature is too thin a screen; the glory of the One breaks in everywhere."

HIS INFLUENCE.

A prophet was among us. Whatever else he was, Emerson was that. To himself he seemed a poet, poet rather than philosopher; and in this most men would agree with him. He wrote to his betrothed before their marriage: "I am born a poet—of a low class without doubt, yet a poet. That is my nature and vocation. My singing, be sure, is very husky, and is for the most part in prose. Still I am a poet in the sense of a perceiver and dear lover of the harmonies that are in the soul and in matter, and specially of the correspondences between these and those." But some name more direct than poet we need for him, some name implying the ever present attitude of worship in the man and the revelation in his word and the exaltation that he wrought in others. "Priest of the intellect" Alcott called him. "He brought you face to face with the infinite in humanity," said Henry James. "The friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit," Matthew Arnold said. That was the impression that Emerson made when here; that is the impression that he is making now, and making more and more as years go by. His audience is widening fast. He seems to be a spiritual solvent of the churches. The "Emerson classes" hold Roman Catholic and Presbyterian, Episcopalian and Jew, Unitarian and the unchurched, side by side, all finding unity in him, and all finding uplift. Yet what he said was equivalent to a searching criticism of the current Christianity of these churches. For the prophet must needs be critic. Now and then his words hit hard, as in the Divinity School Address; now and then a quiet sentence stung, as when he spoke of "the pale negations of Boston Unitarianism." He was a Unitarian logically developed and spiritually transfigured, but the increment was large enough to clear him of the name and of all sectarian names. But he was always in sympathy with the Church and Christianity in the broad sense. His name and Theodore Parker's will always be connected, and with right, for those five great faiths of Emerson glowed full as brightly in the heart of Parker. But in two respects the connection is a contrast. What Emerson uttered without plot or plan, Parker tried to formulate into a system. Parker was the Paul of Transcendentalism. And whereas Parker in his method of reform was a son of thunder, Emerson was—in Holmes' graceful phrase—"an iconoclast without a hammer, who took down our idols from their pedestals so tenderly that it seemed like an act of worship."

HIS LATER YEARS.

If those first ten years at Concord were the ripening season, the productive years stretched on for twenty or thirty more. But there is little more to tell in a sketch so short as this. His outward life had in it very few events. A "spiritual biography," such as Mr. Cabot has written, is the only kind that can be written of him, and few biographies so charming of this kind have been given to the world. Always he remained the quiet thinker, always the knightly scholar, always the careful fashioner of sentences, always the lecturer. As early as 1847, when he made a second trip to England, he found a distinguished welcome. And everywhere his welcome grew, until his winters regularly held a long lecture trip through the West. Few knew him intimately. Nature had gifted him to be her solitary thinker, and did not frustrate that gift with the other gift of easy access. Yet there are few great men whose courtesy has bred more anecdote; for "he encountered each man alive as if expecting to receive more than he would impart." He was a revered friend to many—to the plain farmers and the children of his village as well as to the strangers who came from distant lands to see him. Of his face and manner, so simple, so sincere and so serene, the friends who knew him best are fond of quoting the lines written of Sir Philip Sidney—

"A sweet, attractive kind of grace.

A full assurance given by looks.

Continual comfort in a face.

The lineaments of Gospel books."

A few years before his death his memory ebbed away in all its channels; but the ebbing of the thought-streams seemed to lay bare to plainer view the under-beauty of his nature—the serenity, the courtesy, the humility that had so long been loved as "Emerson." On April 27, 1882, he died. And now the pilgrims seeking Concord go to "Sleepy Hollow," where his grave and those of Hawthorne, Thoreau and the Alcotts lie. They find him resting at the foot of a great pine tree; the only stone a shining mountain rock, and on the rock no name.

A NOBLE little Emerson Anthology will be found in Unity Mission Tract No. 20. It contains 125 passages from the essays and poems, grouped under seven subjects.—the Over Soul, Nature and Man, the Moral Law, Character, the Heart of Love, the Immortal Life, the One Religion: Selected by W. C. Gannett. Price 5 cents: 10 copies, 25 cents.—Emerson's "Divinity School Address" is printed complete as Unity Mission Tract No. 8. Five cents; 10 for 25 cents. Both for sale by UNITY PUBLISHING COMPANY, 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

TWO IN TEN.—An exceedingly interesting report of a postal mission gives this extract from a letter: "I will try to lend your literature; I am particularly anxious to influence a friend who recently told her daughter that ten out of twelve persons would be lost eternally! Said poor — to me: 'I wonder which two out of our family will be saved; there are ten brothers and sisters.'" Comment would almost spoil; but it will bear a good deal of thinking about.

RESURGAM.

Autumn fades and for the last time
 Falls the robin's evening lay,
 Like a happy note of morning
 Trembling down the dying day.
 Fallen leaves are all around us,
 Memories haunt the word and wold,
 And we recognize "Resurgam"
 Written in the season's gold.

Naught there is but has a future.
 Bird or blossom, bud or bee;
 Shall God give to them the morning
 And deny the dawn to me?
 Nay, I will not, dare not doubt it:
 Never was immortal curse,
 And the promise, the resurgam
 Is for all God's universe.

Though the pride of man proclaim Him
 And His weal heaven's only care,
 Still within His soul must linger
 Doubts that whisper low, "Beware!"
 If God counts the falling sparrows,
 Think you that the count is vain?
 Wherefore count or men or sparrows,
 If the dead shall dead remain?

The Study Table

HOLIDAY BOOKS.

The bouquets of Christmas blossoms are already being gathered. The first splendid bunch of beauties is handed us by the Lee & Shepard publishing house. Four elegant witnesses to the rapid advance of the typographic art. The first is Julia C. R. Dorr's "Periwinkle," illustrated in charcoal by Zulma DeLacey Steele. The poet's "Tinkle, tinkle, Periwinkle!"

finds a woody setting in these eighteen bits of rusticity which come, cool and fresh, with a mid-summer atmosphere. The next is the ever-expected annual from Irene Jerome, whose decorative work each year shows a growing grasp on art, and also a deepening confidence in her hand on the part of the publisher. This year she has left the woods and birds and confined herself chiefly to the pansy with conventionalized settings of scroll work in gold. Miss Jerome is always happy in her letter text, which this year includes selections from "H. H.," Emerson, Chadwick, Gannett, Susan Coolidge, Paul H. Hayne, and the deathless Scripture. It all makes a beautiful little sermon in color and melody on the text, "I Had a Friend."

"The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" continues to hold the artists as did the grim sailor the wedding guest. They cannot forego its inspiration and so they try to illustrate a text that always outreaches the pictures. J. Noah Paton, R. S. A., is the one who has tried it this year. He has come near enough to the text to make a series of pictures cold, severe, and yet wild, which, together with F. H. Underwood's introductory note, will conquer again a new file of children will have vitality quite beyond the holiday season. To perpetuate the fancy of the bouquet, this publishing house ties up the bunch with a pretty little "All the Year Round" Calendar, each month being domineered over by a heart-winning little miss in red.

The G. P. Putnam's Sons, of New York, hand us a handful of immortelles, deathless flowers, put up in beautiful but durable vest-pocket form. They are books that will really get into the pocket and will be read all the year round. If you want a seventy-five cent little book for a present, you ought to find here something you like, for the series contains Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer," Keats' "Eve of St. Agnes," Matthew Arnold's "Study of Poetry," Ruskin's "Ideas of Truth," De Quincey's "Conversation," and Rossetti's "The House of Life." These are well named "Literary Gems."

THE GREAT REMEMBRANCE and Other Poems. By Richard Wat-on Gilder. New York: The Century Co. 1893.

The beautiful appearance of this volume, with its golden lotus on a milk-white ground, is what it should be for a visible sign of the contents. There is here no new revelation. Some time since Mr. Gilder took his line, and here he follows it with unabated dignity and strength, but with no visible access of fresh power. Yet is he most satisfactory within his narrow range. The workmanship is wholly beautiful. It is like that of low relief in marble. This sinless artist never drapes his goddess warm. He is not a colonist and the modeling of the high relief or statue is not here. Deep feeling and lofty sentiment are here, but passion there is none, or it is held in perfect intellectual restraint. The poem which names the volume so loftily, "The Great Remembrance," is so strong and fine that those of us who knew Lowell's "Commemoration Ode" by heart can read this with sincere delight, and it could hardly win from us a better praise than this. One very interesting thing about Mr. Gilder is that with his profound idealism there goes along a certain opportunism. His imagination is easily touched to the fine issues of patriotism and such current events as have in them a heart of poetry for the discerning eye. We have here in proof of this a series of sonnets on the "Vanishing City" of the Columbian Exposition and "The White City." Those whose principle is nil admirari will be astonished by these bursts of cordial sympathy and praise. The relations of Lowell and Gilder were so honorable to both that we read the tribute to Lowell almost as if we had read it in some pre-existent state. In several other poems Mr. Gilder allows himself "the delights of admiration"; in one for Tennyson, in another for Booth, in another for Paderewski's playing, a poem full of sympathy and with the ability to find the word and phrase to fit the thing. "How Death May Make a Man" is the strongest poem in the book: the theme has made the poet more virile than he is commonly; not more so than he has been at times before now. He is never better than in his songs, and here there are several "short swallow flights," of which "Fades the Rose" has a peculiar charm. The sonnet "The Unknown" suggests a doubt whether "How Death May Make a Man" is the strongest in the book. At any rate it has the stronger motion. J. W. C.

OUR SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY THRO' FRANCE AND ITALY. By Joseph and Elizabeth Robins Pennell. A new edition, with appendix. New York: The Century Co. Crown 8vo. $1.50.

First in the pages of the Century Magazine, and second in an edition made for better times than these, the substance of this book has been to many readers "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." In this new edition, which is as beautiful as any one should desire, and which is printed with every charm of pretty affectation, there are many more illustrations than there were in the Century articles. These illustrations are the work of an artist who has drunk deeply at Whistler's spring and carries the suggestiveness of his sketching very far. That sometimes it verges upon caricature in the treatment of the human figure and sometimes crosses the line is hardly for the better. But there is no irreverent treating of the landscape or the architectural features of the journey. This was "sentimental" only as following in part the course of Lawrence Sterne's. It is far from sentimental in its treatment of things seen and heard along the way. It is all very bright, but sometimes the staccato movement is a little wearisome. We would have some alternation of a calmer flow. The detour from Sterne's track to Barbizan furnishes one of the most interesting chapters. One sometimes wonders if any two people in the world have had a better time together than Mr. and Mrs. Pennell on their tricycling travels. The writer of this notice, remembering how he found them in the Vicar's Close of Wells Cathedral, can testify that they attempt to lure their readers with no counterfeited joy. J. W. C.

IN AMAZON LAND Adaptations from Brazilian Writers, with Original Selections. By Martha F. Sesselberg. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, gilt top, 8vo, pp. 94. $1.50.

This book has that uncertain degree of value which belongs to whatever treats of a little known land and people. It is made up of stories, sketches, legends, descriptions of customs and recollections. Much of the book is translation,—how much it would be impossible to tell, were it not for the execrable English (if English it may be called) of certain parts of the work. We are surprised that G. P. Putnam's Sons should allow such work to go out under their name; for not only are the selections poorly made, the original being mutilated and mistranslated, but the punctuation and proof-reading are wretched. On page 3 we have anthropological for anthropogical; and this is but one of many disfigurements which the large, clear type, excellent paper and broad margins, only serve to emphasize. On the whole it must be said that the book reflects credit on neither author nor publisher. F. W. S.

A Suggestion.

The following letter from an active and successful Sunday-school teacher in Massachusetts contains a hint which we do not feel at liberty to suppress; and so quote her own words:

I have a class of women varying from 30 to 70 years, who come to my corner for what I take them, the result of my explorations among all the religions and isms extant. Not one is there that fails to interest me. The Parliament of Religion has been a rich field yielding abundant harvest. I find the sermons on the Great Teachers, published by the editor of UNITY, an excellent summary to bring things nearer home. I used "Buddha" to-day and should like seven Sundays in close succession for the whole set. I am impatient to use them. If I had a class of girls or boys I should find them just as useful. Now may I suggest that you advertise them for class work. How much better than the prosy text-books with their "Who next" and "What then?"

THE MAGAZINES,

THE November Forum is a notable number, containing articles by Dr. von Holst, Paul Bourget, Gen. Badeau, Walter H. Page, W. M. Payne and Dr. Felix Adler. Dr. von Holst is an interesting rhetorician: none would say that he writes profoundly on the theme, "Shall the Senate Rule the Republic?" Gen. Badeau has given an admirable picture of Hamilton Fish, Grant's great Secretary of State, the man who showed "that high character is not inconsistent with an intimate acquaintance with republican politics." The careful and candid consideration of the race question in the South by Mr. Page, under the challenging title, "The Last Hold of the Southern Bully," is a worthy contribution on a very perplexing question. Mr. Payne, associate editor of the Dial, offers some practical suggestions on the topic "What a Daily Newspaper Might Be Made." Dr. Adler glances at the aims and purposes of the American ethical societies.

THE ATLANTIC offers its readers three good stories. "The Man from Aidone," a tale of Sicily by Elisabeth Cavazza, with its beautiful touches from the peasant life of a strange land, takes a tragic turn. Mrs. Catherine writes in her characteristic style, and Craddock's serial "His Vanished Star" is continued. Bradford Torrey takes you a delightful walk in Florida "Along the Hillsborough." Mr. Apthorp treats in a gossipy way of Franz and Dresel, and Mr. Owen Wister has some thoughts on "Catholicity in Musical Taste." "The Hungry Greeklings" is a study of the decline of Greek civilization, written by a recent graduate of Bryn Mawr. High praise is paid to a book, "Irish Idylls," by Jane Barlow. The Contributors' Club has something to say against cleverness as set forth not only in such characters as Evan Harrington and the Egoist, but in everyday people like Mr. Mallock.

THE NORTH AMERICAN has its usual variety of articles. Mr. Lodge, writing on "Obstruction in the Senate," shows clearly the present condition of affairs in our upper house. Courtesy has hitherto permitted unlimited debate in the Senate without insuring opportunity to vote. "A simple rule giving the majority power to fix a time for taking a vote upon any measure which has been before the Senate and under discussion, say, for thirty days, would be all sufficient" to remedy the evil. Mr. Pinkerton says a timely word in favor of Congressman Caldwell's bill, recently introduced into the House of Representatives, to place train-robbery under the jurisdiction of the United States courts. "The Revision of the Belgian Constitution" sets forth a recent change which has for its object the enlargement of the franchise in Belgium. H. B. L.

EMERSON'S SCHOOL DAYS.

In school and college he was liked for his equable temper and fairness, but was not demonstrative enough to be eminently popular. He was not vigorous in body, and therefore not a champion in athletic sports. He was singularly free from faults, and this was the substratum for his subsequent expans on in character and intellect. Dr. Furness says:

After the public school was dismissed Mr. Webb had a few boys who came to him chiefly to learn to write. Ralph and I used to sit together. I can see him now at his copy-book; quite a laborious operation, it appeared, as his tongue worked up and down with his pen. But then, thank Heaven! he never had any talent for anything,—nothing but pure genius, which talents would have overlaid. Then it was that he wrote verses on the naval victories of the war of 1812. In his last school year Ralph more than once delivered "original poems" on exhibition days, and some of his "themes" so pleased Mr. Gould that he kept them to show to the school committee.

His gift of rhyming was a matter of modest family pride among the brothers, and he was often called upon to exercise it in writing to them when they were separated. In his letters to Edward, who was away from home at the Phillips Academy at Andover, he often passes into verse, as for instance:—

The other day, while scouring knives, I began to hum away at that verse,—

Harp of Memnon, sweetly strung, etc.,

but I really did not think that the harsh melody of the knives sounded quite so sweet as the harp.

Melodious knife, and thou, harmonious sand,
Touched by the poet scourer's rugged hand,
When swift ye glide along the scouring-board,
With music's note your happy bard reward.

Closing another letter,—

And now, dear William, with a rhyme
I'll close,

For you are tired, I may well suppose.
Besides, we soon shall hear the nightly bell

For prayers.—so now farewell.

He always recurred with much amusement to his brother Charles's disgust at being held up to school as,—

Another brother, small and younger too,

New to the school and to his studies new,

Hath here received instruction of that kind

To banish all its dulness from the mind.

The last two lines he thought particularly delightful.

In one of his letters to Edward:

Aunt's only message to you is, Be brave; that is, do not be cast down by thoughts of home. I have begun Tele-machus in French at Miss Sales', and at home I am reading Priestley's 'Lectures on History.' Mother thinks you had better try to borrow 'Charles XII.' or some other history to amuse you during vacation. But as even nonsense sounds good if cloth'd in the dress of Poetry, I believe I must resort to that as my last expedient:—

So erst two brethren climbed the cloud capp'd hill,

Ill-fated Jack and long-lamented Jill,
Snatched from the crystal font its lucid store,
And in full pails the precious treasure bore.
But, ah! by dull forgetfulness oppress'd (Forgive me, Edward), I've forgot the rest.

Yours,

RALPH.

A MOTHER'S SONG.

A few years ago a company of Indians were captured on the Western frontier. Among them were a number of stolen children who had been with the savages for years. Word was sent throughout the region, inviting all who had lost children to come and see if among the little captives they could recognize their own. A long way off was a woman who had been robbed of her darlings—a boy and a girl. With mingled hope and fear she came; with throbbing heart she approached the group. They were strange to her. She came nearer, and with eyes filled with mother's love peered into their faces, one after another, but there was nothing in any that she could claim; nor was there anything in her to light up their cold faces. With the dull pain of despair at her heart she was turning away, when she paused, choked back the tears, and in soft, clear notes, began a simple song she used to sing her little ones of Jesus and heaven. Not a line was completed before a boy and girl sprang from the group, exclaiming: "Mamma! mamma!" and she folded her lost ones to her bosom. So lives a mother's early influence in the hearts of her children.

INTO PATHS OF LIGHT.

Hand in hand with angels
Through the world we go;
Brighter eyes are on us
Than we blind ones know.

Tenderer voices cheer us
Than we deaf will own;
Never, walking heavenward,
Can we walk alone.

Hand in hand with angels;
Some are out of sight,
Leading us, unknowing,
Into paths of light.

Some soft hands are carried
From our mortal grasp,
Soul in soul to hold us
With a firmer clasp.

Hand in hand with angels
Walking every day;
How the chain may brighten,
None of us can say.

Yet it doubtless reaches
From earth's lowest one
To the loftiest seraph,
Standing near the throne.

LESSON XIII.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

Matt. xxi. 1-17.

*The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring.*

—Bayard Taylor.

Picture: Cleansing of the Temple, by Hofmann.

Can this be the same man whom we saw in the picture of two weeks ago, then fondling little children with tender smile, now swinging a scourge with stern, threatening face? The voice that was so gentle when he spoke to the penitent vibrates now with strong indignation. He who was tender with little children is brave in the presence of wrong, and he who loved and pitied the outcasts is daring enough when a perilous deed of righteousness must be done.

What is the story of the picture?—

At the end of his last journey to Jerusalem Jesus entered the city in triumph and drove the traffickers from the temple.

To understand this picture we must review the last few days of Jesus' life. Soon after the transfiguration, Jesus set out for Jerusalem to attend the Passover feast. He did not travel alone, for many pilgrims were taking the same journey, and in all the Galilean caravans there was suppressed excitement over the thrilling intimations that came from the disciples of Jesus. However it may have originated the Passover had become the great feast of deliverance: it looked backward to the miracle by which God led his people out of Egypt, and it looked forward, also, to the future Messiah who should work an even greater deliverance for the people of God. At no other time were the signs of Roman authority so odious and Messianic hopes so ardent. Hence a mere hint that the Messiah was actually at hand, there he was with his twelve disciples, was enough at Passover season to kindle the wildest hopes and raise the most desperate valor. Late in the afternoon, the company of which Jesus is central figure reaches the little village of Bethany on the eastern side of Olivet; here Jesus stays over night in the house of his friends, Lazarus, Mary and Martha, while the excited pilgrims hasten over the hills to enter Jerusalem before nightfall. In the morning Jesus himself, with his disciples, starts for the city. His friends are wildly excited, for he who has declared himself the Messiah is on his way to the city of David; they run before him shouting and praising God. Following the road that leads over the shoulder of Olivet they catch sight of the city and the temple glorious with marble and gold. As with louder shouts of rejoicing they rush down into the valley, those who had preceded him the night before and have been watching for his coming, swarm out of the city gates with triumphant cries and hurry to meet him, as at the feast of Tabernacles the city dwellers went forth to greet approaching pilgrims. The two companies meet, and when Jesus is seen riding on an ass's foal, as if in designed fulfillment of an ancient prophecy concerning the Messiah, the excitement turns into frenzy. Tearing branches from the trees that line the road and casting their garments down to carpet his way, the swaying crowd bears Jesus along into Jerusalem. Straight to the temple he goes, and there, with the almost delirious multitudes at his back, he breaks in upon the chaffering vendors and thieving money-changers with a passionate scorn that stops not short of violence. Overwhelmed by the sudden in-rushing of such a tumultuous mob, overawed by the personality of Jesus, always impressive but never more than when, as now, he was filled with passionate indignation, the desecrators of the temple made haste to escape. Then Jesus went back over the hill to pass the night in the quiet home of his friends.

Why did Jesus allow this demonstration?—Because he was convinced that he was the Messiah, and therefore would enter Jerusalem as the Messiah should.

This "triumphant entry into Jerusalem" is the most puzzling scene in the life of Jesus. It seems so utterly unlike him that we are disposed to believe it cannot actually have happened. Moreover, there are discrepancies in the accounts: (a) According to Mark the purification of the temple took place on the day after the "triumphal entry," according to Matthew and Luke on the same day. In this Mark is clearly wrong, for this act requires for its successful accomplishment just such a state of excitement in Jesus and his followers as the events of "Palm Sunday" imply. (b) In Matthew's narrative there is an odd misunderstanding of the prophecy quoted from Zechariah, which has led the author or editor into a gross absurdity that is cleverly covered up by the Revised Version. In the original passage in Zechariah only one animal is referred to—"riding upon an ass, even upon a colt, the foal of an ass." But "Matthew" mistook the common Hebrew idiom, and hence introduces two animals, upon both of which in some unexplained way Jesus rides into Jerusalem. (c) In the Fourth Gospel is a story like this in the Synoptists', only it is placed at the beginning of Jesus' ministry instead of at the end of it (John ii. 13-22). Yet if the purification of the temple really occurred at all it is far more natural to place it in the setting of the Synoptists than in that of John. To one who believes that Jesus never proclaimed himself Messiah at all, or Messiah only in a purely spiritual sense, this episode must appear totally incredible. But in these lessons we have adopted a different view, one of the merits of which is that it makes the event of Palm Sunday perfectly explicable. Jesus had avowed himself the Messiah, and was now coming to Jerusalem fully expecting to fulfill there the prediction relating to the suffering Messiah. But he was the Messiah, and therefore he would assume his rightful honor and authority. Keim quotes a passage from the Talmud, of uncertain date, to the effect that if the Israelites are good, Messiah will come in the clouds of heaven, but if they are not good, then riding on an ass. It is unlikely that such a saying would have arisen after the time of Jesus, and it may be, therefore, that this interpretation of the passage in Zechariah was in the mind of Jesus when he mounted the ass's colt. As Messiah both by public declaration and by symbolic act he would ride into Jerusalem, though knowing perfectly well that this testimony would contribute to bring about his death. As Messiah, too, he had the right to put the substance of his preaching into a conspicuous object lesson, and purify the temple, his Father's house, which the hucksters were desecrating. If we accept the idea of Jesus' belief in himself as the Messiah, this public display becomes entirely comprehensible and the undertone of pathos heard in all the events of the day is perfectly natural.

Why did Jesus cleanse the temple?—Because he felt that the abuses which he attacked were opposed to the true worship of God.

After all, it is not to be wondered at that he should have found in the temple what he did. When worshipers from abroad wished to make their money offering to the temple, it must be not in foreign but in Jewish coin. Hence there was need of money-changers, and where could they be stationed more conveniently than in the outer court of the temple? If animals were to be offered in sacrifice, where could the rich man more easily procure his lamb, or the poor man his doves, than in the temple where the offering was to be made? So presumably the custom arose of having money-changers and vendors of sacrificial offerings in the sacred precincts.

The cries of the animals, the noise of buyer and seller, and above all the sharp and unjust bargaining which seems to have been practiced, had undoubtedly offended many a man besides Jesus: probably he himself had felt the iniquity of it before, but now he had come to the temple as the Messiah, and therefore it was incumbent upon him to remove the abuses which he found. It was therefore a natural outburst of indignation, to which he gave readier expression because he deemed himself the Messiah.

In a previous lesson we learned that John, the priest's son, disgusted by such scenes as this which met Jesus' eye, had withdrawn to the wilderness with the question of Micah in his heart, and there had learned thoroughly the answer of the ancient prophet (Micah vi. 6-8). Jesus had reached the same general position as John by a revolt from the Pharisees instead of the priests. But now he too has set himself against the priestly as well as against the scribal tendencies, and the priests as well as the Pharisees are bitter against him. Moreover, Rome could not tolerate the presence of one who claimed to be a Messiah, least of all at Jerusalem in Passover week. So by this act Jesus awoke at once the jealous hate of the priests and the suspicion of the Romans, as he had previously angered the Pharisees, and so himself made inevitable the death which he anticipated.

Questions.

The Picture.—Can you think of any other heroes whose characters have exemplified our Golden Verse? What is the scene of this picture, the time? What authority is there for representing Jesus as armed with "a scourge of small cords."

The Entry Into Jerusalem.—What are the difficulties in the account? Was it like Jesus to prepare or countenance such a dramatic display? Do you think that he really did go into Jerusalem in the way described?

The Purification of the Temple.—Why were money-changers and sellers of animals in the temple at all? Whereabouts in the temple were they? Was the temple built like one of our churches? What kind of building was it?

The Temple of God.—What is the real temple of God? What is its inner shrine and what are its outer courts? Can there be real worship within while the outer courts are not pure? What would a purification of the temple mean for us?

Notes from the Field

Chicago.—Kinza Ringe Hirai, the Buddhist priest and philosopher of Japan, who made such a sensation at the Parliament by his account of the way Christian nations treated Japan, and B. B. Nagarkar, the colleague of Mozoomdar in the Brahma Somaj of India, have been speaking at many of our churches to the great acceptance of their hearers. Some thirty or forty places have had the pleasure of hearing them, calls having come from as far north as Duluth and as far south as Atlanta. Mr. Hirai goes East early in December, as the guest of Mrs. S. G. W. Benjamin, New Brighton, N. Y., and from there he will go to Philadelphia to speak before the Unitarian Club on December 21st. He will return by the way of New England, probably stopping a few weeks in Chicago during February, and then going on to the Pacific coast to take ship for Japan, leaving a host of fast friends behind him. Mr. Nagarkar will spend the holidays in Chicago, and then pay a visit of five or six weeks to California, returning in March to make his way East, and reach England by May. Friends along the route of these two travelers will miss a rare treat if they fail to hear them speak as they pass by.

We shall also have a chance to hear two other speakers from the Orient, as the following pathetic little letter shows:

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE, CHICAGO, ILL.

We read a book "What Do Unitarians Believe?" and found that the Unitarians are always ready to accept the truth and reject the untruth. It is a best Maxim. There is no higher religion than truth. We found in this book that it was written under the subject of "Bible," page 18, which we quote here: "Every race has its Bible, and all scripture is given by inspiration. But little as we know as yet concerning the ethnic scriptures,—the Vedas, Zendavest, Shu Kings, and Quran we know enough to see that the Jewish and Christian sacred books are greatly superior to them in literary, moral and religious value, and this because they flowed out of a higher conception of God and man and human duty, and out of a nearer converse with the Divine.

Dear sir, as it is said that as little we know as yet concerning the ethnic scriptures, then we ask how the final opinions are passed, or can be passed, that the Jewish and Christian sacred book are "superior to them in," etc. As we are Vedic missionaries working in the United States, are ready to show dark or light side of Vedas—as in literary we may tell you that our Sanskrit language in which the Vedas are written is more complete and copious than the Hebrew or any other language, such as Latin, Greek, etc., and our language is full. Jewish or Christian sacred books are written in the Hebrew, so it shows that in literary the Vedas are the first. Next to it, in morality: Our Vedas are full of it; perhaps, and here we doubt that you may believe it because you are or may be well familiarized with the translation of the Vedas by the European scholars, such as Max Mueller, Monier Williams and such others. Their translations are totally wrong, as proved if you read the books given in the list which I send to you for your perusal, and send for if you are interested in finding the truth,—then you will come to know that how far the European scholars have been partial and guilty to mislead the people from the path of truth. In the morality and in the religious values the Vedas you will find, if inquirer, the best authorities and acceptable by all. If you will allow us to let you know, then we shall write you now and then about the morality and religious values of the Vedas. Don't take us as Hindus. This is the cause that the Light of the Vedas is kept in secret by the Brahmins, whom nowadays we call Hindus. It was all done owing to their selfishness while they invented their own religion, Brahmanism, as it was called after them, and which was changed into the word Hinduism when the Mohammedans conquered India. Vedas do teach only Monotheism, but the Hindus applied their meaning to gods and goddesses, wherefrom all other religions of the world sprang up. We shall let you know how the Christianity sprang up and who was Christ and how his teaching came, etc., if we find that you would like to accept the truth. We are going to preach our religion in this United States, where we found that our ancient Vedic Religion is misrepresented and misunderstood. We guess that the Unitarian Societies in this country would be willing to confess their wrong conception or idea concerning the Vedas. Our lotus are airt about to spread the light of Truth of Vedas. Can you suggest us how can we be able to preach and let the people know all over in the United States. If any one shall come forward to convince us for our truth or untruth we shall be highly obliged, for our principle is:

Accept the Truth and renounce the untruth, Unitarians, say why "the Bible is still the book of books to us for" * * * (read page 18).

If you shall study Vedas you will accept it as your Bible, and must be accepted by the whole human race. Yours very truly,

JINDU RAM, SIDDHU RAM.

Englewood, Chicago, Ill., Nov. 20, 1893.

Has not this letter a lesson for those Christian denominations which are sending missionaries out to the rest of the world?

If any of the churches wish to hear these missionaries, they can be reached at the address given above; and they will be found bright and entertaining in answering the questions of the audience, though their preliminary papers are a trifle tedious, judging from the meeting at Masonic Temple last Sunday evening.

The newly organized WOMAN'S LEAGUE met at the Church of the Messiah on Monday, the 20th, at 2 p. m. The meeting was largely attended and represented a wide range of theological beliefs. The special business in hand was to give the new society a name that should suit all those who wish to work in its organization. After two hours of most friendly debate and conference, one by one the names liberal, religious and progressive were discarded in the interest of the broadest possible freedom, and at the end the name stood as it began; "The Woman's League." Its object is the free discussion of religious and ethical questions. Its President is Mrs. Celia P. Woolley and its Secretary Mrs. Hannah G. Solomon. The next meeting will be held in January, at which time papers will be read and discussed.

Janesville, Wis.—The Wisconsin State Conference will be held in this place Dec. 5-7. Mr. Forbush gives the sermon Tuesday evening. Wednesday is filled by the usual reports in the morning and with papers in the afternoon on "The Church and the Children," by Rev. R. C. Douthit, of Baraboo; and on "The Church and the Young People," by Rev. F. W. N. Hugenboltz, of Hillsdale. In the evening Rev. J. L. Jones gives a sermon on "The Cause of the Toiler." Thursday Rev. C. F. Niles, of Menomonie, gives a paper on "Unity Club Work;" Rev. Loftus Gibb, of Janesville, on "The Church and the Community;" Rev. W. F. Place, of Arcadia, on "The Object of the Liberal Church;" Rev. Lloyd Skinner, of Eau Claire, on "The Obstacles of the Liberal Church;" Rev. J. T. Schindler, of Racine, on "The United Liberal Church." The Conference ends Thursday evening with a platform meeting in which Rev. H. T. Secrist, of Milwaukee, speaks on "The Foundations on Which We Build;" Rev. C. F. Niles, of Menomonie, on "The Purpose for Which We Exist;" and Rev. G. H. Clare, of Madison, on "The Glories of Our Gospel."

Toledo, O.—Brother Jennings and his earnest associates deserve the congratulations of the friends of Liberal religion everywhere for having accomplished an admirable piece of work.

Six years ago he began the tilling of one of the proverbial "burnt fields" about which grim reference is frequently made in Boston when the missionary work of the West is under consideration. And on the 15th inst. there was dedicated a beautiful church-home; compact, artistic, modest and modern, well calculated to do the work of a seven-day church and to carry out the work which its name would suggest,—a "Church of Our Father,"—a church wherein no man will be a stranger. The attendance was good at all the meetings, the interest active, and the spirit hospitable and progressive. Perhaps Mr. Jennings will testify that the ashes of burnt hopes may after all prove under certain circumstances a good fertilizer. Other men labored at Toledo. He entered into their labors and put some more labor onto the field and the thing was accomplished. UNITY extends its congratulations to the Toledo friends. Let others go and do likewise. The new church of Our Father was dedicated November 15 and 16. The church was organized May, 1888. The following was the programme: Wednesday evening, November 15, organ voluntary; opening sentences, minister of church and congregation; hymn. "The forests gave their oak and pine," congregation, led by Mrs. Thomas Biddle; Scripture reading, Rabbi Emanuel Schreiber; prayer, Rev. H. H. Barber, of Meadville, Pa.; response, Gounod; hymn; sermon, Rev. J. L. Jones, of Chicago, Ill.; solo, "The Holy City," Stephen Adams; collection, statement by pastor, followed by Mr. Jones, of Chicago; hymn, No. 88 Unity Collection, congregation; benediction. Thursday morning, November 16, devotional meeting at ten o'clock, led by Rev. George B. Penney, of Marietta, Ohio; paper by Rev. George A. Thayer, of Cincinnati, Ohio; paper by Rev. H. H. Barber, of Meadville, Pa.; discussion; recess and luncheon at church; after-dinner speeches of ten minutes each in audience-room of church, by Revs. George A. Thayer, Barber, Sunderland, Penney, Dr. Schreiber, Rev. Charles Cravens, and others. Thursday evening, November 16, organ voluntary, Batiste; opening sentences, by minister and congregation; hymn; Scripture reading, Rev. J. T. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor; prayer, Rev. George A. Thayer; response, Gottschalk; hymn, congregation; sermon, Rev. Grindall Reynolds; solo "There is a green hill," Gounod; doxology; benediction.

Oakland, Cal.—Now that Mr. Wendte has returned to his parish the Oakland Unitarian Church is full of life and activity. Like so many other churches, it has its course of sociological study, in the form of Sunday evening lectures. Under the auspices of the Starr King Fraternity a course of university extension lectures is being given by Prof. W. H. Hudson, of Stanford University, on "Modern Poetry and Modern Thought." The Unity Club, Woman's Auxiliary, and other auxiliaries of the church are also active. The weekly calendar closes with a broad and sweet statement of the aims of the church,—such a one as UNITY delights to see. Mr. Wendte recently preached on "What I Would Do for Oakland if I Were a Rich Man," and the Oakland Enquirer printed the sermon the following day. From its report we learn that Mr. Wendte would do three things for his city.

He would give it a public library, a conservatory of music, and a park system. And he thinks the need of such public institutions in every city calls to the rich of those cities to supply the need. His sermon was introductory to the series of addresses by laymen on "Present Day Reforms," to be given on Sunday evenings, the first being on "Reasons for the Prevailing Discontent," by Prof. E. E. Ross, of Stanford University.

San Francisco, Cal.—In response to the following letter, addressed by a number of citizens of San Francisco, including Horace Davis, Charles A. Murdock, and other prominent Unitarians, President Jordan, of Leland Stanford, Jr., University, is giving a course of University Extension Lectures to crowded houses, under the auspices of the Pacific Unitarian Conference, upon the following subjects: Factors in Organic Evolution; Heredity; The Struggle for Existence and Survival of the Fittest; Degeneration in Evolution; Do Species Exist? The letter was as follows:

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, representing many in the community who are desirous to hear your exposition of the Scientific Doctrine of Evolution, and the reason for believing it to be the true philosophy of the Laws of Life, respectfully invite you to deliver a course of lectures on this subject at a nearly day in this city, time and place to be decided on hereafter.

Salem, Ore.—Now that the rainy season has begun this society has begun active work. Twice a month the Unity Club meets, once for purely literary work and once for sociological discussion. Twice a month the Junior Unity Club meets for literary work, followed by amusement. Once a month a sociable is held in Channing Hall, which has been partly finished off, and where young and old engage in dancing under the direction of the church members. The sociables of Unity Church are very popular and bring in a considerable revenue. Rev. Mr. Copeland is giving a series of Sunday evening lectures on the religions of the world, in which he quotes largely from the addresses given at the Parliament of Religions. The church is well filled to hear these lectures. Everything in the Unitarian Church of Salem is flourishing.

Tacoma, Wash.—We are very glad that despite the severe business depression from which this city is suffering the increase in membership of the Tacoma Free Church is sufficient to counterbalance the diminution in the financial ability of the old members. An enthusiastic meeting was held at the close of last month to increase the large and growing interest in the church and provide for the coming year.

Wichita, Kan.—The church of this city has extended a unanimous call to the Rev. W. S. Vail, formerly of the Universalist Church in St. Paul. He had been engaged to fill the pulpit for the month of November, but the people were so greatly pleased with him that they called him before the month was half over.

Fort Worth, Tex.—Rev. S. J. Brownson, a former Presbyterian minister, a long time citizen of Fort Worth, who became interested in Unitarian Christianity under Mr. Shultz's preaching, has taken up the good work on his own account. Mr. Brownson is one of the editors of the Fort Worth Daily Gazette, and he has begun to give regular

Sunday evening discourses, which have been attended with some success. "We intend," he writes, "to try it on strictly Unitarian lines, making it as popular as possible with an effort to reach the 'masses.'"

Florida.—Rev. I. C. Gibson is working hard as a traveling missionary in this State. In some towns he has an organized band of liberal Christians to support him. In other districts those to whom he ministers are scattered; but he keeps on the fight although no appropriation has been made for his work by the A. U. A. for a year or more. Although he has a family he is willing to give himself to the arduous work of a liberal circuit rider for $500 a year, and in fact is bound to give himself to the work whether or not he gets the $500.

Boston, Mass.—Dr. Philip S. Moxom, the well-known liberal Baptist minister, who two years ago withdrew his resignation from the pastorate of the First Baptist Church at the earnest solicitation of an overwhelming majority of his congregation, has again tendered his resignation, and there is little probability that it will again be recalled. It seems that a hostile minority have continued to work against him and have asked him to repeat his offer of resignation. For this The Outlook criticises them severely, saying that they were bound by every obligation of honor to accept the will of the majority or to withdraw if they could not bring the majority to their way of thinking.

Baraboo, Wis.—Rev. L. J. Stoughton having resigned the charge of this parish last summer, Rev. Robert C. Douthit, a recent graduate of Meadville, and son of Rev. Jasper L. Douthit, of Shelbyville, Ill., has been called to succeed him and has accepted the call.

As a Tonic After Fevers Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

DR. W. B. FLETCHER, Indianapolis, Ind., says: "I have used it with great satisfaction in a large number of cases of nervous debility, and as a tonic after fevers."

BACK NUMBERS?

Can any of our readers supply us with the numbers of UNITY issued May 18 and June 29 of the present year (numbers 12 and 18 of volume XXXI.)? If so, they may confer a favor upon us and upon the friends who have asked us for these copies,—a request with which we are unable to comply.

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Appropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

Mr. Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Montevideo World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation—Brooklyn Standard-Union. He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantiality of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

ALL SOULS CHURCH (Unitarian), corner Oakwood boulevard and Langley avenue. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Minister.

CENTRAL CHURCH (Independent), Central Music Hall, corner of State and Randolph streets. David Swing, Minister.

"Stand and Deliver!"

We do it. We are always "at the old stand," ready to deliver anything in the line of Books you may care for. Send 2-cent stamp for our catalogue. A few of our specialties are:

"In the City by the Lake," by BLANCHE FEARING A Beautiful Souvenir of the World's Fair City. The two idyls of Chicago life in this volume. "The Shadow" and "The Slave Girl," really two divisions of one narrative, are full of thrilling interest, and contain vivid descriptions of real scenes and places about the great metropolis of the West. The author has clothed the narrative with the dignity and beauty which have become history and myth. Even so unpoetical a thing as the Chicago River is touched poetically. Holiday edition bound in white and gold. No longer Circulated for your friend who has visited the World's Fair City, or who would like to have visited it but was unable. Dark cloth binding, $1.25; white and gold $1.35.

"Art, Music and Nature," consisting of choice selections compiled by Mary E. Pratt from the writings of Froop David Swing, together with his portrait. The Inter Ocean calls it "A collection of literary gems in the highest and best sense of the term." Chicago Mail: "The work will find its way to popularity." New Orleans Picayune: "Charming in its make up, and printing and binding all that could be desired." Bound in white, green and gold. Price $1.

"Letters to a Little Girl," by MRS. HELEN STARRETT. A series of letters embodying, with all the charm of a story, important suggestions as to conduct, morals and manners. Miss Haskel, Principal of Monticello Seminary, pronounces it "the book that all little girls should have." A boon to mothers and teachers. A great favorite with both young and old. Cloth, tasteful, bound, with admirable portrait of the author, $1.25.

"Mother Goose's Christmas Party," by ABBY MORTON DIAZ. An ingenious story in rhyme. A charming gift for a child or just the thing for amateur entertainments. Leading roles appropriate either for adults or children. Handsomely printed and bound in white, 50 cents; pamphlet edition, $1.50 per dozen.

AMBER BEADS.—Every one who reads the Chicago dailies will remember the bright paragraphs on every-day topics signed "Amber." In response to many requests, sixty-four of the best of these have been put into book form by the author. Mr. Lederer, the Chicago Herald artist, has designed the cover. There is a pretty edition in paper at 50 cents, and one in cloth at $1.00.

ELSIE: A Christmas Story.—Kjelland is the acknowledged prince of Norwegian writers of fiction. "Elsie" is his best story, and, strange to say, it has not been previously published in this country in the English language, though there is more than one Norwegian reprint. Mr. Miles M. Dawson has made a most pleasing translation, and the mechanical make-up of the book is unique and dainty. Cloth, 50 cents.

WHERE BROOKS GO SOFTLY, by Chas. Eugene Banks, with frontispiece by T. J. Nicholl, is one of the handsomest gift books of the season. The poems in this volume are simple and sincere, such as appeal to the hearts of the millions. Blue and white velum, gilt top, $1.50.

MORE THAN KIN: A Book of Kindness By James Vila Blake. Ready December 1st in holiday edition, half vellum cloth, about 25 pages. $1.00.

THE FAITH THAT MAKES FAITHFUL. This book of popular sermons by William Gannett and Jenkin Lloyd Jones has reached its twenty-second thousand, and is still in active demand. A heavy embossed paper cover has been substituted in the 10-cent edition for the less durable bond paper formerly used. Blessed be Druggery, the first sermon in the book, which in various forms has reached a circulation of a hundred thousand, is now offered separately in a handsome edition, silk stitched, with rough white cover, suitable for water color decoration, at 10 cents a copy, or $1.00 a dozen.

Any book published by us will be mailed promptly on receipt of price. Catalogue free. Address

*Shall I ask the brave soldier who stood by my side
In the cause of mankind, if our creeds disagree?
Shall I give up the friend I have valued and tried,
If he kneel not before the same altar with me?
From the heretic girl of my soul shall I fly
And seek somewhere else a more orthodox kiss?
Perish the heart and the law that would try Truth, valor and love by a standard like this!*

THE following utterance by Rev. Dr. Sprecher, of Cleveland, Ohio, presumably an "Orthodox" minister, may fitly be taken as one of the "Signs of the Times" in the discussion of which it was made:

If Christ were on earth to-day I don't know whether he would join a church or not. He certainly would not preach long in any church without being charged with heresy. All the Christian denominations have different doctrines and Christ could not agree with all of them. The laboring men say they do not come into the church because it has no Christianity in it. Well, they are pretty nearly right. The fact is, there is about as much real Christianity outside of the church as in it.

MR. MOZOOMDAR gave his closing address to a Boston audience on Tuesday evening last. The meeting was held in answer to a complimentary request signed by Boston's leading gentlemen, among whom were the names of Edward Everett Hale, Dr. Holmes, John Fiske and others. Mr. Mozoomdar has had a wide hearing in his course of four Lowell lectures on "Hindu Life and Thought." He leaves our shores with the blessings of a multitude of people who have received through him new respect for the ancient Hindu prophets, a new appreciation of the present spiritual life of India, and what is still better, a new impulse within their own souls that carries them towards breadth and earnestness.

AGAIN the tariff tinkerers are at their work, and the agony incident to commercial and industrial uncertainties is being felt. The committee that is at work on a new schedule may smile to-day at the suggestion that what we want is not to get the advantage of our neighbors, but to be advantageous to our neighbors. But some day that will become a sound principle in political economy. Then "tariff protections," "balance of trade," and "balance of military power" will be outgrown superstitions. What matters it whether England, Sweden or the United States makes the most iron? whether the greatest wheat-delds are in Russia, India, or Manitoba,—only so everybody plays fair. There is great plenty to go all round under the fair-play policy, and there is life in the trading of commodities.

C. S. DARROW is well known in Chicago as one of the most earnest and fearless of thinkers. In the December Arena he has a striking paper on "Realism in Art and Literature," the fundamental position of which seems to us well taken and nobly argued. But, like many others of this school of thinking, he seems to us to be in danger of discovering the reality of misery more quickly than the reality of joy. Realism has a radiant side to it, and he poorly applies its principles who does not see this side as well as the other. Our quarrel with the so-called "Idealism" in art is that it understates the fact. The glory hoops, angel wings and trumpets of the so-called "masters" in Christian art are too gross and materialistic to represent the actual beauty, love and divinity that cluster around any mother and child in a peasant's cottage.

WE print the following remarkable and productive dream of a Florida correspondent, hoping that the "suggestion,"—taking the word in its technical hypnotic sense,—coming immediately after the heavy mince-pie dinners which belong to the season, may produce similar dreams during the sleeping hours of many of our readers, so that they may wake like this subscriber into a happy disillusion and the prompt action which betokens true thankfulness. May the inspiring dream disturb the slumbers of two thousand and five hundred of our readers between now and Christmas time. To this end we prescribe that the following extract be read just before retiring and just after partaking of a heavy turkey and mince-pie supper, and then reread early next morning. Continue this dose until the desired result is reached :

DEAR UNITY: World's Fair expenses had very nearly emptied my purse, and I doubted if I had better continue UNITY when the recent call came; but in my dreams last night some Congress of the Parliament of Religions was being held which I was attending, when a stranger informed me that the editor of UNITY and others had just been burned to death in a church. I awoke with a feeling of weeping bitterly as over the loss of a personal friend. The pleasure I felt in finding it all a dream urges me to add my personal mite towards his present happiness by sending a UNITY subscription. Please find one dollar inclosed.

WE had thought that our brother Chaney, the Southern superintendent for the A. U. A., was cut out exactly for missionary work; but since he has been conducting The Southern Unitarian we know that he was made for the editorial chair—and yet that happy expression of a poetic thought suggested by Niagara, which we find in the November Southern Unitarian, seems to mark him as a poet. Come to think of it, we have always been impressed by a certain resemblance between him and our honored Edward "Everything" Hale, and that, or perhaps, more generally, the fact that he is a cultivated Yankee accounts for the versatility and excellence of his talents. But this is aside from our purpose in beginning this paragraph, which was to call attention to the words of wisdom of our contemporary's recent literary creation. Our friend has recently begun a study of the characteristics of the long neglected class, the unprosperous whites of the South, to which he has given the general name of John Slowman. Below is some of the proverbial wisdom of John Slowman, for which we are indebted to The Southern Unitarian:

"Up North they say 'I guess,' but they allers reckon. Down South we say 'I reckon,' but we most generally guesses."

Speaking of rival crops John says he reckons "if cotton is king, corn is president."

"Fair to middling," said John, testing a bale of cotton, "means foul at both ends."

"When the pig gets in, the goobers (peanuts) get out."—J. S.

"Spare the weed and you'll reap the seed," says John.

"A mortgaged farm," John Slowman says, "is like a peck measure with the bottom out. The craps jes run through it."

"Where's the man that first kicked him?" asked John when they showed him a horse that kicked.

"Begging," says John, "is stealing by daylight."

The Liberal Arts.

The old Romans included under the above title the pursuits fitting a freeman, as contradistinguished from the servile arts which represented the employment of slaves. In the older German University vocabulary it implied those higher pursuits the chief motive of which was not money-making, the studies that are not mercenary. At the recent Exposition this department went without a definition. It included the exhibits under the heads of education, literature, engineering, public works, music, the drama and many other things that scarcely came under any of these heads. Its exhibits ranged from alms-houses to churches, gymnastic apparatus to workmen's dinner-pails, bank-vaults to photography. This department, requiring over ten acres of space, may be said without much violence to fact to represent the non-commercial activities of the world. Back of it lay the great army of those whose prime motive in life is not money-making; they who toil not for self but for truth, not for money but for beauty. They live not to get rich but that they may know, choosing knowledge in preference to ease, plenty, or life itself.

It is to be regretted that this department did not have a building all its own; that the world might be taught more impressively the extent of these higher industries in the human field. If the Liberal Arts side of civilization could be exhibited as forcibly and as tangibly as are the commercial or military sides of the nations, it would dissipate the gloomy pessimisms that so benumb the energies of men. In all the warlike and man-killing powers of Europe, back of the arts of war, beneath the industrial arts inspired by greed, lies the great army of those who toil that the boundaries of truth may be enlarged, they who work for the advancement of soul, the delights of the intellect. And these Liberal Arts are eventually to shape, direct, or destroy all the other arts. The realm of the unselfish is constantly growing, and the motives of the Liberal Arts are coming to be the dominant motives. Those who pursue wealth are, most of them, doomed to disappointment. The love of gain is an uncertain and disappointing motive. Even if it succeeds it is inadequate to arouse the full powers of the soul. The noblest energies are love energies. After the body has exhausted itself in the interests of greed or hate love reaches down into new mines of strength, awakens slumbering vitality, revives drooping energies. This world would go to sleep, it would die of stupidity and mental inanity were it not for the Liberal Arts, the itching for more truth, the love of beauty, the non-commercial enthusiasms for the pleasures of mind, the high purpose to reduce the misery of the world. These are the things that keep men alive because they keep men happy. The sullen and the sour are so because they have been selfish. They have been in pursuit of the servile arts. He who would be happy must not be mean. The buoyant spirits belong to those who strive for the enlarging and the ennobling of life. The Liberal Arts offer a motive absolutely universal. They are within the reach of everybody, pursued by the maid who tries to improve her bread-making as well as by the man who adds a new power to the telescope. The most difficult of all the arts is the art of cheerful living; but it is the most inspiring of all arts, in the pursuit of which all other arts cheerfully lend themselves.

Mr. Gould's New Book.

Mr. Gould's "Beginnings," recently published by the Western Unitarian S. S. Society as the first volume in their "Six Years' Study of Religions," has already received much praise, but not half as much as it deserves. It originated in the valuable lessons which Mr. Maxson prepared for UNITY, and which he would have completed for permanent publication, with his usual care, had he lived. Mr. Gould, when invited to edit and enlarge these lessons, found the matter accumulating and the work growing until he decided rather to make a book of his own. Profiting by Mr. Maxson's work and Mr. Gannett's notes upon it,—but following mainly his own method—he has produced the present volume.

It is peculiarly well adapted for Sunday school work,—especially for older pupils,—being methodical, clear and simple in its presentation, and accompanied with very pertinent and suggestive questions and with helpful notes and references. But it is no less valuable for general reading, and most adults will find in it a great deal that is interesting, instructive and new to them. It is arranged for twenty-two lessons, in seventeen chapters (why did the publishers print the chapter headings in smaller type than the sub-headings?) on such subjects as "Legend and Myth," Creation, Floods, Man, Eden, the Arts, Languages, Communities, Laws, Death, Sin, the Soul, God, Heaven and Hell, Sacrifice, Priests, Temples. Each subject is treated first "according to legend and myth," and then "according to history and science": the first division being always subdivided into "the Biblical story," other corresponding stories, and "their origin"; and the second into "the truer story," "its origin," and "its meaning."

Mr. Gould seems to set most value upon the first division; and his treatment of myth and legend is indeed very rich and full for a work of this size, and shows wide reading and a wise selection of fitting and interesting illustrations. His treatment is also highly appreciative, and aims, as he says, to show that "our early ancestors were, in their degree, rational and religious beings"; and how "no custom or belief of the past is without its reason; and how those reasons are always groping in the direction of religion." It would be hard to find a work that treats old legends more lovingly, or tries to find a better meaning in them.

But he need not have deprecatized his treatment of the other division, of "history and science"; for that is quite as rich, and sometimes more so, in its concise statement of the latest conclusions, in its thoughtfulness and search for lofty spiritual meanings. Perhaps he does not always state the case for physical science so strongly as he might; as, for instance, in his treatment of the nebular hypothesis, emphasizing the Antromeda nebula pictured in 1890, as if it were exceptional, when there were at least fourteen spiral or concentric nebulae known forty years before that. Still the scientific sections are, for so brief statements, very satisfactory, and the historic ones peculiarly so. His "truer story" of the primitive "community" and "mother-headed family," for instance, is an excellent summary of latest anthropological researches, and the place it gives to woman will be new not only to most Sunday schools but to many secular readers. So his "truer story" of Laws finely covers the fundamental processes in the evolution of morality.

The "truer story" of the rise of religious beliefs and ceremonies is also admirably told. Perhaps he was not justified in speaking so positively of "blood-brotherhood" as the meaning of sacrifice. Perhaps he has tried more to trace a final cause and optimistic meaning in all things than he would have done if the book had been intended for secular use. But the aim was admirable, has been carried out very ingeniously and with general success. Mr. Gould is very happy in tracing the good from apparent evil. In his treatment, that dreadful Deluge becomes a text from which to show how the floods have been making the earth "a garden of Eden." From the dismal caves of our savage ancestors he gets the lesson of "an ever-brightening future." From the "Fall" of man he gets that of "growing conscience." The story of God's displeasure at the "tower of Babel" he turns into the truth of "Language a tower to heaven." Even in "Death" he finds "Growth" as the deepest meaning and says: "Science tells us that death is as natural as birth, that it is indeed a second birth, and that it was not introduced six thousand years ago by an angry God to punish the sin of man, but that it was introduced millions of years ago by infinite wisdom as the means of leading life upward." Everywhere in nature and art he reads the lesson of progress and says, "in trying to make pots and pans man has found a universe to rule." He repeatedly shows the good of obstacles and supposed evils; but perhaps we ought to add old Herodotus' statement of the same truth in the closing lines of his history. Herodotus tells how Cyrus rebuked the Persians for wanting a larger and richer land,—since, he says, fertile countries are wont to produce cowards, and the same land will not yield both fine fruit and brave men. The same manly thought and tonic quality abound in Mr. Gould's book, tempered everywhere, too, by finer spiritual interpretations. It will be found a very healthy and helpful work, not only for Sunday schools but for all the people at home.

Men and Things

REV. DR. W. H. McLANE, in a recent number of the Independent, describes a Social Science Club recently formed in New Haven, Connecticut, as follows:

In the latter part of 1892 some half-dozen men met together and agreed to form a society for the study of social subjects. They agreed to invite a few other men to a subsequent meeting. These men met together, adopted a constitution, and called another meeting at which officers were selected, and the organization was completed. A meeting was held once every two weeks until May, and they have been resumed in October. A nominating committee receives and presents names, the object being to have all classes represented; and the membership is limited to fifty persons. The membership is composed of men of native and of foreign birth; Jews and Gentiles; Roman Catholics and Protestants; Democrats and Republicans; ministers, lawyers, professors, teachers, bankers, manufacturers, merchants, clerks and mechanics. The president is a judge of the Supreme Court of the State; the secretary is a merchant; the treasurer is a bank clerk; the executive committee consists of a minister, a lawyer, and the secretary of a large manufacturing company. The meetings have been well sustained and full of interest. The subjects discussed have been such as these: "Methods of Taxation in Connecticut," "The Charter of New Haven," "Manual Training in Public Schools," "Land Ownership, Public and Private," "Profit Sharing," "Immigration," "Ownership of Railroads." These problems have been freely discussed and various opinions have been expressed. For example, the paper read on "Land Ownership" advocated the public ownership of land; the speeches which followed, for the most part, advocated private ownership. The paper on "Ownership of Railroads" advocated private ownership; the speeches which followed, for the most part, advocated public ownership.

Would not all towns and cities be benefited by such an organization, and are not religious liberals the men to lead in such a movement?

CONCERNING the progress of Socialistic ideas in New Zealand, the Cleveland Citizen calls attention to the adoption of the grouping contract system as a substitute for the private contract system. When a railroad is to be built, for example, it says, the grading is given to a group of laborers large enough to do the work. This group appoints a committee to sign the contract with the government for them, and the men elect their own bosses and perform the work on the basis of a pure democracy. Other portions of the work are put out to other groups. Sometimes a trade union in a body takes the contract, and even the physically weak members of the union receive the same wages as the strongest, while the superintendent or bosses receive no more than the weakest laborer. That great dream of the brotherhood of man is being realized.

ECONOMIES WROUGHT BY CHEMISTRY.—Chemists turn scrap iron into ink, old bones into lucifer matches, the shavings of the blacksmith's shop into Prussian blue, fusel oil into oil of apples and pears, the drainings of cow-houses into fashionable perfumery, beggars' rags into new pilot-coats, cess-pool filth into ammonia, and tar-waste into aniline dyes and saccharine. In Paris they first utilize rats to clear the flesh from the bones of carcasses, then kill the rats, use up their fur for trimmings, their skin for gloves, their thighbones for tooth-picks, and their tendons and bones for gelatine wrappers. These are a few of the things the Iron Industrial Gazette names among the products converted into use by the chemist and inventor.

A National Thanksgiving Hymn.*

O Thou to whom a nation brings
The gift of grateful prayer and praise,

The source whence every blessing springs,

Who guideth all our earthly ways,—
Enlarge the scope of our desires,
Make firmer our fraternal ties;
Let all souls seek our council fires,
The world partake our charities.

Grant, Mighty One! to us the skill
To conquer every giant wrong;
The power to do Thy gracious will,
The soul of love, the breath of song;
The peace that moveth side by side
With honor, mercy, justice, faith!
With human hopes and rights to bide:
In league with life, in face of death.

As free to think as birds to soar,
And grateful as the streams that run
To carry to the toiler's door
The meed his honest hands have won;

Thanksgiving for the right to hold
Opinions and their just defense:
Allied to nature and the bold Sweet souls who kept their innocence.

Who dared the evil powers of hate,
The harpy ignorance that drew
The rich, warm blood of hearts, elate
With gentle instincts firm and true.
Oh, bid our lives repeat the strain
They learned of freedom in its morn,
As shells that murmur of the main
Forever to the ocean-born.

From man to Thee; from flower to star;
From where white daisies kiss the sod;

We hail the golden links *far,
That bind us to our Father, God!
Give us "more light" The Truth to sing,
From chill Alaska to the sands
Where cacti scarlet banners fling
To brighten arid stricken lands.

HELEN HINSDALE RICH.

Settlement Work in Philadelphia.

THE MINSTER STREET SETTLEMENT.

Some months ago there was seen on Minster street, Philadelphia, a house which to-day is scarcely recognized.
Minster street is a narrow lane running between Sixth and Seventh Lombard and Pine streets, in a district frequently alluded to as the slums. This was to be the center of a "Settlement" to be known as the Minster Street Neighborhood Guild.

The house was an undesirable one,
the cellar filled with water emitting unpleasant and dangerous odors. The yard had a filthy well, and out-buildings were in a state of decay, and all were overrun with vermin. The occupants became disgusted with both the house and the neighborhood, and moved after a short stay. It had long been occupied by families of colored people.

The house was secured by the Rev.
Chas. Daniel and workmen set to work. The walls were scraped and disinfected. Two rooms were added by inclosing a side area. All was underdrained, and it is now the only house in the street with a bathroom. The well was cleaned and filled, and yard fenced and graded.
A little pavilion was erected, and a swing will soften the ruggedness of the life. A boy remarked: "They have a yard just like on an excursion."

A little lumber was left over so the posts were given to the people of a wretched court whose children were envious. They will now have a swing of their own, although the Settlement swing will welcome the children of the neighborhood.

After the workman left the house
it was an object of beauty, and yet it was only the old house rebuilt. Mr.
Daniel with his wife and three children are now occupying it, and the work of the Settlement has commenced. Such things have their good influences.

During the reconstruction the news got abroad that a clergyman was to occupy the house, and they seemed amazed and said: "Well, we need it." The improvements were a constant object lesson. It could have been rented a dozen times to persons who would appreciate clean places if they were to be had. The old house rebuilt and beautified is only the beginning of another regeneration in the individuals, their homes and the neighborhood.

Next door is a small church which has also been secured. The basement when refitted will make an excellent place for work among boys and girls.
A kindergarten is contemplated and various agencies for the general up-lifting of the youth will be set on foot.

Mr. Daniel worked for a whole month with the workmen. He handled the saw, hammer, pick, shovel, trowel, paint brush and broom. The Settlement idea is one of personal interest and service, a sympathy with men in their daily lives. This was carried out in this rebuilding. More is now known of the workingman, what he can do, and what he cannot do, his wages and his thoughts and the perplexities of getting things done. Such contact with men is a liberal education; and it is this education that is necessary to solve the vexed question of the proper relation which we sustain to our neighbor.
The Settlement idea will go far toward solving the question.

It is a part of the Guild's method to put the poor in the way of using the institutions already created instead of trying to create one more institution. Among a foreign element there is great opportunity for helpfulness. Personal contact and sympathy reveals the fact that there is the most woeful ignorance of the advantages lying close at hand, and a reluctance to make use of them. Very few of the children seem to go to school.

To urge parents to send them is a work which is without limit.

If a child should be found a victim of the brutalities of parents, the attention of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children will be called to it. Destitute children will be referred to the Children's Aid Society. Cases of sickness and misfortune will be aided to the various hospitals and homes already so abundant and splendidly endowed. Personal contact and sympathy lie at the bottom of the work and they make one of its broadest foundation stones.
The giving of alms is not altogether overlooked if a man should be found who has fallen among thieves; but it is an exceptional benevolence. The giving of work is considered a greater gift, and the giving to the youth a capacity and facility to work a still greater. The trade school close at hand will be used to aid the youth to become capable of self-support. It is always maintained that the personal contact of children with ladies and gentlemen, even in their play and sport, is an event in their lives, and affords opportunity for the inculcation of the deepest ethical principles in incidental moments.

The location is a good one.

In a company of twenty children gathered in the guild room, four were negroes, sixteen were Russians just learning the English language, and all but three were barefooted. There is here a wide door of opportunity thrown open, in these two oppressed peoples brought together seeking sympathy and guidance.

The home life as an influence is emphasized. The children are given a welcome into the family circle. A characteristic feature is the little social gathering on Monday evenings.
It is composed of colored girls thirteen to seventeen years of age. They meet in the parlor of Mr. Daniels' house before a large open fire-place.
Each brings a few sticks of wood.
The blaze is started in the chimney, all the lights being out, which sets the shadows dancing on the walls. Then story-telling begins, and each in turn adds her fagot to the flames as the stories proceed. Of course there is wide opportunity for instruction, and for fellowship that is helpful.

The work is dependent entirely upon the voluntary contributions of people who may chance to read The Nazarene, which is published in the guild's interest. The expenses have not yet been currently met, but good work has already been done in the six weeks of its establishment.

Church-Door Pulpit

The Free Church, and What It Will Cost.*

BY REV. CHARLES F. DOLE.

You, here in Chicago, are facing a very remarkable ideal of a church. The proposed Parliament of Religions is likely everywhere to set men to thinking about this ideal, but many of you are actually trying to realize it. Most ideals of the church heretofore have been somewhat exclusive and aristocratic. The idea has been that mankind was divided into two great classes, with distinctly different destinies. The ideal of the church has been, therefore, to gather into one body all those who were supposed to represent the kingdom of God, and to leave the rest of the world outside. All sectarianism is based on the notion of gathering the elect by themselves. The new ideal of the church proceeds from the thought of a common humanity and a common destiny. This ideal is so new and unique that I suspect even those who believe in it are in danger of undervaluing the conditions and the cost which alone make it possible. Please see what you propose to do. On the one hand, you would gather into your church men and women of the most needy and degraded classes, such as the Salvation Army is seeking to rescue. On the other hand, you open your doors to Chinamen, disciples of Confucius, to Buddhists, to Agnostics, to followers of Herbert Spencer, or of Schopenhauer, if the pessimists are willing to join you. A man may say, "I believe in no religion except doing good," and he is welcome to your communion. A man may say, "I believe in no God and no future life," and he is invited to join your church.

I suspect that there is present under this new idea of the church a subtle motive of the old Puritanizing and aristocratic tendency. We want to have all the "good" in our church. We are thinking of the good when we set this ideal before ourselves. We see that such persons as Professor Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Lubbock and George Eliot are unmistakably our benefactors. It was in the thought of such high-minded persons that a generous English divine, Mr. Butler, expressed the wish that the church might be broad enough to admit Harriet Martineau and Francis Newman. Now there are persons of this type who profess little or no religion, but whose lives are sweet, beautiful and helpful, in every community. Modern men cannot easily bear to think of shutting these persons out of their church or of arrogating to themselves superiority over them. In contemplating the new ideal of the church, we are therefore much more likely to be thinking of certain noble lives whom we wish to gather to ourselves, than of the opposite class of the poor, the needy and the degraded. There is always a natural desire to make our church consist of the really "elect," the congenial, the pure, the public-spirited,—in short, the moral and spiritual aristocrats.

There is involved also in our new ideal of the church a subtle bit of a creed. It may be a pretty good creed, but it does not happen to be universally accepted, and is therefore so far exclusive. It is that a church is simply a union for helping one another and others to the good life, and especially for stirring men to do the deeds of the good life. The aim of the church is essentially practical as measured in conduct. This is a new and original idea of a church. It is so far from the old idea that, if one were going to quarrel about words and definitions (which I for one do not), I should have to complain of our friend, Mr. Martin of Tacoma, for saying "church," quite as loudly as he complains of certain others for saying "Christian," or "Unitarian." Indeed, I suspect that this advanced use of the word "church" needs explanation for ordinary persons more than our large and modern use of the word "Christian" needs to be explained. Let us, however, be bold and venture, in the want of a better word, to use the word "church" with this enlarged sense. In a growing world, we need not be afraid of the growth of language.

I see also another article of our little creed of the broad church. It is that sound moral character is a sufficient basis for church membership. Good character is enough without any profession of belief in God or in immortality or in the ideal things. Good character, therefore, though on the basis of a materialistic philosophy, is a sufficient introduction to our church. We do not ask what a man's philosophy of goodness is. Does he wish to be a helper of others? or, does he only wish to be helped? On this ground we invite him into the brotherhood of our church. Certainly this is a new sort of creed for establishing a church!

It must, therefore, be clearly admitted that we have in our thought of the ideal church what might be called a dogmatic element, at least an element of exclusion. There will be many conscientious persons who from their point of view will shake their heads over our proposed church, will be slow to see how it can possibly be made to work in practice, and will be likely to remain outside. Many of these persons are the very ones who, on account of their character, we should be delighted to have with us. Many of them are earnest and noble persons whose minds are still possessed with the old and limited thought of the church.

Our church will also be necessarily exclusive as regards many who at present simply have no interest in what we propose to do. In other words, by the necessity of its aim, it will be morally exclusive. The selfish, the worthless, the lazy, however much they may need its help, will not be likely to come into it.

Let me tell you now what I fear will happen, if, under ordinary circumstances and at the ordinary temperature, an attempt is made to start our new church. For there is still a glacial chill in the air of our century which allows lynching in Indiana and witnesses a Presbyterian President sign a Geary bill. We will suppose that the church is attempted under the lead of a well-meaning but inexperienced minister, quite fresh from the Divinity School. He has no profound experience either of religion or righteousness. He knows little of men's deeper spiritual needs, but he is attracted, as he may well be, by the breadth and freedom of our brave and beautiful theory. I think that we know enough of human nature to prophesy what will take place. I foresee, in the first place, that very few of the type of Mr. Huxley and Mr. Spencer will be ready to sacrifice their individualism, their leisure and their means in order to help the new movement. It goes without saying that most professing Christians of the old denominations will look askance upon the movement, even if they have not churches of their own. The people about the saloons and in the slums will think it too respectable for them. A certain queer lot of people will infallibly come with a curiosity to see what the new thing is. There will be people of the blatant sort who love to hear themselves talk. There may be a few theosophists who would like to steer the movement in their direction. There will be spiritualists with a similar purpose. There will be those who hope that the new minister will attack the humbugs of professing Christians. There will be a few representatives of socialism. There will be many who look for a decided sensation, of what sort they neither know nor care. It cannot be boasted that the average character of the possible membership is very much higher than the average in the churches already established. Paul's church at Corinth would not have presented the appearance of a more motley assemblage than that of our new ideal church. And yet the movement presents fine possibilities. There is in it a nucleus of earnest-minded people. There are real and crying needs of moral uplifting and spiritual guidance. Nevertheless, as we study this new movement we are oppressed with the foreboding that under the present conditions and leadership it cannot succeed. The appearance of the subscription paper, we fear, will cause a fatal panic.

The point that I wish to make clear is that, so far as our new thought of the church is true and ideal, by so much is it more costly to carry out. As you could not have the best modern bicycle or steam engine or ocean steamer without a wealth of new and complicated conditions of science and invention, without the new and higher processes for making steel, so you simply cannot have the ideal church of the future without unusual and exceedingly high moral and spiritual conditions. You could not make the modern steam engine work with the rude tools and appliances of the dark ages. Neither can you have your ideal free church where the comparatively barbarous habits, feelings and ideals of the old mediævalism still prevail. You must have not only the right quality of finished steel, but you must also have a sufficiency of it. If it is true in the end that the best things are the cheapest, it is also true that the best things are the product of long and costly processes. If it is true that the best things are very simple, it is also true everywhere that the simple things are the latest to be learned. In other words, your free and ideal church comes as the crown of the labor of the ages; it is the fruitage of evolution.

In our northern region it is too cold to hope to ripen strawberries in the month of May, but we can provide special conditions and ripen our strawberries under glass, if we will take the extra trouble and expense. So I propose now to provide rather exceptional conditions and a more congenial climate than usual for our free church. I will suppose that there is a certain town; we will call it Texas City. The people there have had a series of misfortunes. First they had an epidemic of typhoid fever, decimating the population and scaring many of the people away. Two or three of the ministers of the churches established there, were frightened away by the fever, and never came back. Then a disastrous fire happened, sweeping away a large part of the town and all the church buildings. Meanwhile certain things have occurred especially drawing the people together in sympathy. At the time of the fever and in the fire there had been notable instances of heroism. Many persons had risked their lives in nursing the sick. Some who had been supposed to have no religion, and were called Atheists or Materialists, had shown themselves generous, disinterested and devoted. The only minister left in the town, a man of uncommon breadth of thought, and of noble personality, had distinguished himself by his helpfulness in the time of need. He had lost his only child by the fever. On the night of the fire, in his efforts to help a neighbor, he had broken his right arm.

Meanwhile there had been serious moral needs in the town. The liquor saloons and gambling places had been much better filled than the churches. The boys and young men of the place were exposed to great temptations. The churches had been too numerous for the size of the place, and had been obliged to struggle so hard to maintain themselves that they could never afford proper care or expense in meeting the moral needs of the community. They had failed to appeal to the chivalry of the people, and had been at a low ebb generally.

The common sufferings of the people and the sense of really serious needs, with a dim sense of desire for the comfort and inspiration of religion, now bring to the citizens of Texas City an earnest inquiry what they can do in this emergency in the way of establishing a real, helpful, and successful church.

You will observe that the great law of vicarious atonement has been at work to clear the ground and provide the exceptional conditions that we wanted. Our contention with our friends of the older forms of religion has only been that they limited this vicarious law to a particular instance. We hold that it is universal. It is the costly means by which all kinds of progress, and especially moral and spiritual progress, are hastened forward. In Texas City, the fact that the only minister left in the place has suffered with and for the people will give him henceforth a peculiar influence. Others, likewise, who have borne an heroic part in the misfortunes of the place, will have, as we shall see, special consideration.

The people of the town are called to a mass meeting in the open air on a Sunday afternoon to consider the question of their new church. There is a general feeling that one church of the right sort will meet the needs of the community better than several churches. Here now is the opportunity for our ideal church.

The first question that happens to be raised is that of organization. Who shall be members of the new church? There are those, mostly church members in the older churches, who would naturally be inclined to answer this question in a somewhat exclusive manner, after the traditions to which they have been accustomed. The fact is, however, that there is present at this meeting a certain Mr. Huxley, whom no one has ever seen in a church before, but who risked his life in nursing the sick. There is an eccentric Mr. Spencer, whom no one supposes to have any religion, one of the rich men of the place, who has nearly stripped himself of his property by his generosity to the suffering poor. There is a Miss Elliot, a freethinker who filled her house full of persons who had been burned out. No one can bring himself to vote to have a church that will shut out any of these good and humane persons. It is on the whole the unanimous desire of the meeting to try the experiment of making the church as broad and inclusive in its membership as is the city itself. In this decision a good many old-time prejudices of conscientious Methodists and Baptists are sacrificed. The venture seems as bold, at the least, as democracy must have seemed when it was first tried, or as it now seems to many timid persons.

The next question is one about the methods of supporting the new church. The strongest churches before the fire had tried to raise their money by pew-rents. The poor had not felt much at home in any of the churches. It now appears evident that the single church must be as free for all the people as are the seats at a public meeting in the city hall. But how shall the necessary money be raised, if the seats are free? The method must be by some free form of subscription. The privileges of the church shall be given to each according to his need, and each shall do what he thinks right for the support of the church, not only according to his means but also (a more hazardous condition) according to his willingness and his sense of the importance of the church. It is plain that in this attempt to make the church thoroughly popular and quite accessible to the poorest people, it will be necessary for those who believe heartily in it to give a good deal more than would be their strict relative proportion. In fact, the maintenance of the new church promises to be quite costly to the few who desire it most, inasmuch as a large part of the people of the town have never been in the habit of giving a dollar for church support. Many, therefore, while curious about the new movement, cannot be depended upon to do much for it. Their moral and religious interests are not yet sufficiently strong.

Moreover the new church, if it is to meet the needs of the whole city, must be managed on an ample scale of expense. It is very possible, in its various undertakings, that it will require as much money as all the churches together have heretofore cost. For one thing, it will be absolutely necessary, if the church is to appeal permanently to the chivalrous feeling and the generosity of the community, that it must do more than all the churches ever did before for the good of the community. It will, perhaps, have to support a free kindergarten. Part of the ample basement of the new edifice will be used for a reading room. There must be means for attractively reaching and befriending boys and young men, and taking them out of the grasp of temptation. For this end the church must maintain various classes for manual training and other such purposes. The building must therefore be in the center of the city so as to be easily reached from every quarter. The large hall used for its Sunday services must be also adapted for use as a lecture room, and for other civilizing entertainments. All this will cost money, both in establishing the plant and in its maintenance. It is probable, however, that many who never gave money to a church before, now seeing that the church is meeting the needs of the city, and making it in every way a better place to live in, will become generous contributors.

Moreover, if the church is to have Sunday services, there must be a considerable outlay for excellent music. There will be an appeal to the young men and women of the city to volunteer and provide a great chorus choir. There will be an opportunity for others to volunteer to organize an orchestra. The Sunday services must be made rich and attractive. There will be need of professional help, well paid for, to direct the music. There will also be the demand on the part of the volunteers for very considerable outlay in promptitude, faithfulness and devotion. That which will be asked of them for the sake of their church will amount to a certain moral discipline. We believe, however, that it will prove both profitable and delightful.

A very important and critical question now appears. What will the new church stand for? What will be its creed, or at least the purpose that binds it together? How much can its people agree to? In a large way, it must be admitted that the church will stand for all the higher interests of man. It will stand for the endeavor to make individuals perfect. It will stand for the noblest relations of helpfulness among men, for all kinds of friendly service. In short, it will stand for what is called practical religion.

There are some who will wish to stop here. There are those in our mass meeting who consider themselves agnostics and materialists. They are shy of using any words or terms of religion. There are a few who have heard of the societies for ethical culture, and would like to turn the new movement in this direction. It is very evident, however, that a large proportion of the assembly want something more. The mayor of the city now rises to speak. With a good education, he has been a somewhat rough and hard-headed man of business, but, when trouble came to the city, he showed himself brave and public-spirited. His heart has lately been softened by the death of a beloved daughter. He confesses that he has never heretofore been interested in religion. As far as he is concerned, he would have been content to organize an ethical society. On the other hand, he has a dim notion that there may be something more in religion than he has ever himself felt. He remembers his old mother. She certainly used to get help and peace and restfulness in prayer. The mayor has read certain philosophical books. It seems to him quite possible, if this is a universe, that a man should bear some sort of a relation to the Power, or Life, that makes it a universe. If there is a Good Will that rules all things, it would be natural that men's wills should run alongside of the Good Will. It might well be that a man's life would be at its fullest and best, when it stood in the relation of willing obedience to the laws of the Universe Life. The mayor had got some such notions as this from reading the books of a man called John Fiske. He has been also disposed lately to think that there might be something in the possibility of immortality. Certainly no one could say that these ideas of religion might not be true. There was at least a splendid "perhaps" in them. For his own part he wanted to have in the church all the moral and religious material that there was. He did not want to put any limit on the thought of his church. If there were these who believed more than he did, he wanted to give them full opportunity. If any honest minister could teach him more than he knew now, or give him more faith in Goodness at the heart of the universe, he would be glad to march in that direction. It occurred to him that his life, spent in money-making since he was a boy, had not given him the right to any large amount of faith.

The Mayor's little speech seemed to everyone very fair. It was agreed presently that the new church should stand for religion in the largest possible sense. It was agreed that it would be really a sacrifice of freedom, if the secularists, the positivists, the materialists set any dogmatic limit against following out the utmost religious possibilities. It was seen by all that it would be the ruin of the new movement, if the Methodists and the Baptists and Presbyterians should be driven away by any narrowness in the proposed motto of union.

Another critical question now appeared. What sort of Sunday services should be instituted? What sort of preaching should they try to have? The Methodists and others had been used to a certain warmth of religious temperature. They had been used in particular to a good deal of affectionate reference to the life and person of Jesus Christ. Many of the most earnest people present had been accustomed to the public prayer as a part of their religious service, so that they would scarcely have been able to recognize the service as religious if the prayer were omitted. On the other hand, there is a little set of persons who for themselves care for nothing but the sermon, and would like that better if it were called a lecture.

There are several different theories of how to manage this difficulty. One theory is that the Methodists, and others like them, shall have the use of the church at a certain hour, and shall find the minister to meet their peculiar needs. The free-thinkers shall also organize a lectureship and have a separate meeting. In other words, the church shall organize itself into different sections, each meeting apart by itself. But this plan, besides being quite expensive, would threaten to defeat the essential purpose of the new church.

Then some one proposes a sort of compromise scheme. There shall be a common service for all, but there shall be nothing admitted into it which any one can object to. There shall be no phraseology used except such as all parties would like. There shall be no service of public prayer, if any happen to raise objection against it. This compromise plan evidently would be cold and meager. It would really suit no one very well. The principal objection, however, is that it is narrow and that it would actually create constraint. It puts a limit upon the possibilities of the common service. It is as though no music should be permitted at the concert, except such as happens to be popular with every one, in which case the best music would sometimes be excluded by the idiosyncrasies or the want of education of the few.

We have already suggested that the one minister on the ground has been exceptionally well educated. He is familiar with the best thought of all the different dominations. He has what has been called "the sympathy of religions." He has the gift of going straight to the heart of a thing, and finding its essential meaning. He is well acquainted, too, with modern thought and science, and has sympathy with men's doubts and questions. He is really able, therefore, to interpret all the vital and helpful ideas that genuine religious persons have ever held, into the simplest terms of modern thought. He is able to interest common people and to give them plenty of parables and illustrations for conveying religious thought. He is also immensely interested in practical righteousness. He has a great ideal of what may be made of his city, and his own personal sacrifices in behalf of the town give him just now a peculiarly strong hold on all classes of the people. There is, therefore, an instinctive feeling that he ought to be the minister of the new church. Without believing less than the Baptists and Methodists, he is able to show them in warm, sympathetic and beautiful form the essence of their own beliefs. Without compromising his own modern thought about Jesus, his admiration of that great historical example brings him into ready touch with those who have been accustomed to the loving use of his name. While possessed of a strong and profound religious faith himself, the directness and manliness of his thought commend him to the respect, and pique the curiosity, of those who have hitherto stood aloof from religion. If this man, summing up the best of the old thought into the freest terms of the new, will conduct the Sunday services for our church, there will be no limit to the possibilities of a rich, helpful, and, in the best sense, truly devotional worship. For all that he will say, whether it be called prayer, or sermon, or address, will be possessed by a strong faith in the beneficent Life that orders the universe.

There is still one further possible plan, in the way of managing for those who are shy of any service that can be called worship. The Sunday service may be ordered so as to allow those who please, to omit the prayer, and to come in merely for the address, and for such part of the music as shall be freed of any religious significance. We can imagine this plan to be proposed, but the mayor, in his blunt way, is certain to veto it. "We want union here," he says, "not separation. We are all bound to make certain concessions for the sake of the whole. The Methodist and Baptist people have already made immense concessions. It surely cannot hurt any of us to sit by and listen while others pray. I call it narrow and dogmatic to exclude ourselves from that which the majority wish. I call it bad manners. It is as though, because I do not enjoy Beethoven's music, I should insist on staying out of the concert till they have got through playing Beethoven. Who knows but that there may be something in Beethoven after all? Who knows but that I may come to enjoy him? It is certainly no great sacrifice for the sake of the general order, if I want to hear the gay band-music, to listen to the Beethoven, too. Besides," says the mayor, "I think it is a good thing to give our children the chance of understanding and enjoying all that any one else possesses. If our children should become as religious as our new minister is, I think that they would be better off than some of us are." When the mayor had finished speaking again, no one was found to make any motion for arranging the service so that people could stay away from a part of it. The fact was that there were not really half a dozen people in the town who would have dreamed of making use of such a special arrangement.

A curious question is now brought before the assembly. There are always those in any meeting who are apt to take an exaggerated interest in determining what the name of a proposed enterprise shall be called. Two parties, accordingly, appear now. One party are very zealous that the new church shall distinctively bear the Christian name. The opposite set would like to have it called the free-thinkers church. It is obvious that, as a matter of fact, it is now a church of free-thinkers, for all kinds of thought are included within it. It has been unanimously agreed that all kinds of thought are welcome. All inquiries may be pursued, all sorts of questions may be freely asked. As a matter of fact, also, the church is Christian. It is Christian in its traditions, for nearly all the people in it were educated to some kind of Christian belief. This church would not itself be possible, except as a sort of consummation of the growth of Christian ideas. The church is Christian, also, from the fact that there is great reverence on the part of nearly all its people for the life and death of Jesus. The church is essentially Christian, in the pervading spirit of friendliness and good-fellowship, in the faith and hope and love that have won triumph over great public and private misfortunes. In the best sense you could hardly make the church more Christian by calling it so than it is now in reality.

On the other hand, the church would certainly cease to be really Christian if its people should fall into a quarrel and lose their good spirit over the question of naming it. Neither would it be so broad and real a free-thinkers church as it is now, if a majority should happen to vote to attach any name to it which would drive some of its people away. The fact is, what makes a church Christian is that the good spirit is there, so that a "Christ" would be at home in it. What makes it a free-thinkers church is, not that a majority vote it so, but that thought is perfectly free there. The new minister makes these points very plain in a little speech. "I happen," he says, "to be attached to the Christian name, and I should be glad if all felt towards it as I do. But I cannot blame some of my neighbors if they have formed prejudices about it. In fact Christians have often behaved so as to create very bitter prejudice against the name. I advise therefore," he says, "if any really object to the use of the name, that you leave it aside. I think if Christ were here, he would be very happy in this church and think it was decidedly his kind of church. I do not think he would be half so happy if we called it by his name against the protest of any of our friends, for, though I do not agree with their protest, I believe from their point of view that it is quite honest."

One of the free-thinkers, also, at this point, helps very much to the peaceful settlement of this question. "This is a good enough free-thinkers church for me," he says, "and you could not make it better by calling it so. I would a little rather not have it called Christian, but even if you do call it Christian, I cannot for the life of me see any reason why I should go out of it. If you called this city a tyranny and named the Mayor a Despot, while you still had a perfect democracy, I should vote against you and call your names ridiculous; but as long as we had the reality of a free government, I certainly should not feel obliged to move out of town; much less should I give up our church, because the majority preferred a particular name. In fact, I have to confess that your new name is capable of a very high meaning." After the free-thinker's speech the question of the name of the church was indefinitely postponed.

You will please observe that the patience and good temper shown both by the minister and the free-thinker are rather rare and costly products on the tree of evolution. Much thought, a habit of self-control, and a very clear understanding of what evolution means, go to make this sort of temper.

Another more subtle kind of difficulty now appears. It is inherent in human nature. It is the tendency to break up into cliques and social sets. It is said that even on the crowded streets men tend to move in groups, slightly detached from one another. As long as there is any movement among mankind, and movement goes on at different rates of growth, it seems likely that the formation of social groups will always continue. It is well to recognize it as a fact of human nature. The evil is not in this tendency to a certain stratification; the evil is when the people of the different groups treat each other unsocially, with coldness, with suspicion, with the tone of superiority, or even with contempt.

Take, by way of example, the case of any old established church. We will suppose that it is a liberal, or Unitarian, church. There is little trouble, I assure you, in such a church from the want of religious freedom. Anyone of whatever opinions is welcome to the church. It is probable that a Jew or a Chinaman could easily become a voting member. It is no barrier against membership in such a church that a man is an agnostic or a materialist. Such men are often pew-owners. They often like, for the sake of their families, if not for their own sake, to attend church. Everyone is glad to have them there. If they have influence generally in the community, they are apt to have quite their due share of influence in deciding church questions and in calling a minister. They are never urged to profess by a word what they do not honestly believe. There may be persons in the same church with them of narrow or even bigoted opinions, but the general tradition has already been established in all liberal churches, of liberty of conscience, liberty of thought, and at least outward respect for others' opinions. There is apt, however, in such an old church to be a certain social constraint, a real want of social freedom. There are groups and sets in the church, who are somewhat shy of each other, none the less that they have excellent social intentions. Strangers and new-comers in the church are apt to find a certain coldness of atmosphere. There are social sets in the community who have a vague impression that the old church is inhospitable and does not want their presence. And yet, there was never perhaps better moral timber than in this old Unitarian church. Many of the prejudices against it are quite exaggerated. Its members generally would be pleased, in a mild way, to see the poor among them. They wish to give a true welcome to strangers. No people in the world are kinder-hearted, if humane service is demanded of them for their neighbors. The trouble is not with the moral material of the people of the church, so much as it is with the moral temperature at which they live. Their need is of some slight increase of spiritual heat and vitality. They have learned the lesson of paying one hundred cents on a dollar very well. They know about kindness to animals. They need a new access of those great spiritual qualities known as faith, hope and love. They need a quickening of their imagination, so as to put themselves in one another's places. An access of love, a quickening of the sense that they are the children of God, would thaw out all suspicion and constraint and set their hearts free.

This need will presently show itself, we suspect, in Texas City. In the meantime, however, as we have seen, the people have actually been brought by their common sufferings and common hopes for the city into uncommonly harmonious relations. They are ready just now to do anything that will make for friendliness and social freedom. No one could be a snob, if he wished, in the present atmosphere. There is very little further, however, that can be immediately done. There is one question that has a bearing upon the future. It touches the expense, style, luxury, and ornamentation of the new church. All are agreed that the building should be outwardly solid, substantial and worthy of their city. There are some who have a pardonable pride also that the interior should be rich and elegant. It is certain that the tendency in this direction will serve to make the poorer people feel less at ease. Luxurious appointments will tempt churches-goers toward richness of dress, thus setting up a barrier between the rich and their poorer neighbors. On the other hand such simplicity of appointment in the new church as may be readily combined with good taste, will march with simplicity of dress on the part of the people, and will remind all classes that the house is their common property.

So much for the establishment of our new church in Texas City. You will have observed what uncommon conditions it has required. It begins with very considerable expense and sacrifice; not expense of money alone, but the giving up of many prejudices. Something has been required of every class of people who compose it. You will notice, however, that throughout the breadth of the organization there has nowhere been demanded any sacrifice of principle. No one has been asked to say what he does not believe. What has been required has been the giving up of personal preference, of bigotry, of egotism, and of self-will. All this sacrifice has been the result of a strong and genuine movement of brotherly kindness, welding together all classes of the people.

We must confess that it is an open question, what will be the outcome of a movement so auspiciously started. We have helped our man mount the bicycle and given him the initial impetus. It remains to be seen whether he is capable of keeping it in motion. As in all kinds of machinery, so with the church. Not only good guidance is required, but also a certain respectable momentum. In all human enterprises there is a disintegrating, centrifugal influence at work. The success of the new church will depend, as in the beginning, largely on the loyalty and good temper of certain leading individuals. If Mr. Huxley and Mr. Spencer, after having so kindly assisted in the start, henceforth quietly stay at home and only pay their subscription, and take no pains to attend the common services of the new church, there will be a loss of power and motion. If the Baptists and Methodists begin to talk of withdrawing from the common church, and instituting sectarian enterprises, it will be a public misfortune. If the new minister too, soon after this crisis in the life of the town, is called to go to Chicago or New York, and leaves his work in the hands of some person of merely moderate ability and little spiritual insight, I foresee a period of chaos.

On the other hand, the conditions for permanent success appear very favorable. It wants only to be seen in the city that the new church is proving the means of real moral awakening, that there is a revival of righteousness in the methods of business, that there is a new and kindlier spirit in the relations of employers and working people, that the old-time bar-rooms and gambling dens suffer for lack of patronage, that the boys and young men are more pure and manly and are interested in worthier pursuits, that the government of the city is free of partisanship and is administered and maintained with high public spirit. It needs also to be shown, even more profoundly, that the people of the town possess a new courage and a new inspiration for their work, that they have comfort in meeting trials and losses, that not only among the devout is there a sense of the living God and that men are his children, but that all classes share a happy feeling as of those who live in a righteous and beneficent world. This moral uplift, this practical working of righteousness, this humane sense of brotherhood, this kindling of the sense of universal and divine relation, will soon produce a kind of spiritual momentum, which will abundantly justify the existence of the church and assure its permanent success. One can hardly conceive that there could be any institution more desirable for the happy life of a community than such a church as we have imagined.

I fancy now that I hear certain questions. "Why," you ask, "do you not express greater confidence that the time is already ripe for such churches everywhere? Why do you speak so cautiously of possible failure? Do you mean to imply that our ideal or free church, in your opinion, cannot be consummated in our generation? Do you practically tell us to be contented with such imperfect churches as we have?" I have implied nothing of the sort. I hold that it is the part of anyone who sees an ideal to press toward it with all his might, and to try to do his best to realize it. I call it terrible and demoralizing to any set of people to sit down content with recognized imperfections. I speak with caution only because I am impressed with the arduousness of our work and the many different sides on which it has to be carried out. I see, therefore, on our part, the distinct danger of exaggerating the comparative importance of some one aspect of the work. There is danger, for example, if one is interested in the method of free seats, of exaggerating the importance of this outward method, as compared with other subjects even more profound. There is danger of supposing that, if we get free seats, we have therefore got the ideal church, with all the faith and hope and love needful for maintaining it. I say this as one who believes that the triumph of the free seat method would certainly tend to react helpfully on the moral and spiritual life of any church which adopted it.

There is danger, also, if one has much at heart the securing ample freedom of thought, if one happens to be annoyed by any show of bigotry on the part of his fellows, and especially if one sees certain kindly Jews or agnostics outside, who might possibly be brought into his church,—there is danger, I say, of quite exaggerating the importance of the vote which would give such persons welcome. The fact is, no mere vote can ever make people really welcome to an organization. Nothing but congeniality, the sense of common needs, the touch of brotherly sympathy, is effectual in bringing into a church those who have hitherto stood aloof from it. Of all institutions in the world, in a church especially, a vote does not merely mean the triumph of a majority, it must represent a willing, hearty temper, in order to do any good. The securing this temper is essential to securing the vote.

There is even greater danger, I think, of exaggerating the relative importance of names and definitions. I speak as one who would like to have names as accurate as possible. But I suspect that it is a species of dogmatism when we insist upon the particular names of our own preference, before the average man in our church has been educated to see the significance of the issues which we raise. I think of those terrible contentions in the early church councils. Only the few, whether Arians or Athanasians, understood (perhaps no one ever understood) what the quarrel was about. The majority in the councils were more barbarians than Christians. It was pathetic to see the rabble voting on questions of the nice distinction of words when, as our friend Mr. Calthrop says, they were not even aware that there was a Holy Ghost. And even to-day I think it may be possible that we ask too much of men who are but little used as yet to the thought of God, when we urge upon them delicate questions, on which good men differ, regarding the use of historic words—historic words that are always changing and taking on new significations.

The fact is, the ideal church which we are contemplating fills me with a sense of humility as often as I consider it. It means hardly less than a perfected humanity. It means also perfected individuals. It means, therefore, great and beautiful disinterestedness on the part of all who look towards it, it means large sympathy and insight and imagination, it means forbearance and tenderness towards the weak and uneducated. It means, at least on the part of those who are leaders in the new movement, generosity, good temper and self-control. It forbids partisanship. It demands what Matthew Arnold calls "sweetness and light." It demands on the part of those who guide and steer that they shall be always at their best, when too often their eyes are sleepy and dull and their hearts are cold.

Our ideal, also, involves a wonderful deal of patience, or rather a new quality of patience. The old sort of patience was supposed to be directed toward those who were evil or did you wrong. The new patience is the patience of the evolutionist. It is the patience of the farmer who has to sit by and wait for the tender green things to grow, who must feed and water them and help them grow the faster. It is the patience of one who knows that the sweet nuts may be encased in a rough and hurtful burr, but who can wait till, as the nut ripens, the burr bursts of itself. It is the patience of one who does not expect to see in the children the maturity of grown men, who counts the long and painful cost of what he undertakes, and is not easily disappointed. It is the patience of one who appreciates the condition of the great multitudes of people who must make up our churches,—hard pressed by labor, urged by competition, with little leisure to spend upon the high subjects which men's souls need for their rest and comfort. It is the patience, too, of those who see that even superstition, narrowness and bigotry are phases in men's religious growth; that their growth cannot be forced, that their faults are not cured by opposition and negative treatment, but by the positive warmth of love, by deepening their experiences of what faith means.

While our ideal thus makes us very modest and humble, we cannot look at it without the stirring of a great hope. The fact that such an ideal of the church should blossom out in man's growing thought is a sort of proof of divineness. Already in many places we see the beginnings of the ideal church. We see individuals who are entirely ready for it. I will not deny that there are communities where the general conditions may be quite ripe. There are beautiful and noble lives, such as we all know, that present to us the great essential facts of breadth, freedom, earnestness, thoughtfulness, brotherly kindness, faith, too, and hope and love. Such lives are always contagious and produce others like themselves. The evil in the world is not catching so truly as good is; for the evil tends to kill itself, but goodness makes life grow. All these facts fill us with confidence that we live in God's growing world; and if we live in his world, whatever is best, whatever is desirable, must assuredly come to pass. It may, or may not, come in our time. To help bring it to pass, however, to be a co-operator, with one another and with God, is joy and delight enough for any man's life. Our ideal church, then, must come to pass. It is too good not to come to pass, in God's world. We will devote ourselves anew, with more strenuous efforts, to help bring it to pass.

Correspondence

The Moral Law.

EDITOR UNITY: Every lover of truth and good morals will commend the able and conclusive refutation, in the issue of UNITY of 23d ult., of Rev. Joseph Cook's Theories, by Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Unlike that eminent pulpit orator, Frederic W. Robertson, Rev. Mr. Cook appears to have no faith in the Eternal Equity—"the calm and salutary verities of science and law." Rev. Mr. Robertson wrote in 1847: "What saves a man,—his own character or that of another?" Paul's teachings are in line with this: "Render to every man according to his works."

Every enlightened teacher of morals will heartily indorse these words of protest of Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones—"I protest against the juggling with the eternal laws of right and wrong." That great writer, James A. Froude, voices the same eternal law; he says: "What are the lessons of history? It is a voice sounding forever across the centuries the laws of right and wrong. Opinions alter, manners change, creeds rise and fall, but the moral law is written on the tablets of eternity. For every false word or unrighteous deed, for cruelty or oppression, for lust or vanity the price has to be paid at last. * * Justice and truth alone endure and live," etc.

Even the "pagan" creeds of Egypt insisted on purity of life and the practice of charity, and that truth and knowledge should be sought for. Is it possible that in this age of progress a citizen of Boston has a lower conception of morals or of religious truth than the "pagan" of four thousand years ago?

FRANKLIN.

The Man Half a Century Old.

I remember very well the impressions of my first meeting with Jenkin Lloyd Jones. At the time I had not completely outgrown the effects of the season of doubt and denial through which I had passed. I was sick mentally, and needed a physician. It was at Wels, N. H., where we spent a number of days together discussing the great interests of life. By the beautiful lake and the picturesque hills we walked arm in arm, absorbed in the spiritual realities which we were called upon to teach by word and deed. I can never forget the eloquent sincerity with which he expressed his faith in the dignity of human nature, and the inspiring hope which he cherished for the future. In that communion with him I found healing.

Permit me to lay this humble tribute upon the altar which is already crowded with a thousand tokens of appreciation from a thousand hearts.

My Treasure.

The west sun shines from clouds at last,
 And slant beams mark a radiant way
 Where a dear form in beauty cast
 Makes length'ning shadows seem less gray.

She's gracious as the coming dawn
 Whose half-smile hesitates a space—
 And then, as if her doubts were gone,
 She archly looks up in my face.

The light that comes with early morn
 Is breaking over lip and brow,
 And bright new thoughts, of morning born,
 Are flushing all her features now.

Ah, in the western sun-light's glow
 I stand and watch her eastern light;
 My golden tints are darkening slow;
 Her rosy colors grow more bright.

They flood my path with richer hues;
 In her my hopes have found new birth,
 For her sweet sake I take new views,
 Through her bright eyes I see the earth.

My thoughts will not run out for her
 To where I stand in sunset's glow,
 Feeling the light would be a blur
 If this bright one I did not know.

Enough, I hold her in my heart
 The rarest gift that heaven has sent,
 Enough that I can give her part
 Of that for which my life is spent.

A POOR man had been injured in the street. A crowd gathered. One said: "How I pity him!" Others said the same. A sailor pulled out half a dollar, and handing it to the man, said: "I pity him 50 cents; how much do the rest of you pity him?"—The Myrtle.

The Thirsty Stars.

A long time ago, seven little stars came out one night to play hide and seek in their beautiful sky-garden,—and oh, such a twinkling time as they did have, hiding behind mother-father stars and the pretty floating cloudlets!

First one would wink and then another, which meant, "Come, I've found such a good hiding place." Then they would all blink, which meant "Ready!" So they kept winking and blinking until they grew very warm and thirsty. Just then they remembered that there were no drinking-cups in the sky-garden. What was to be done? Of course they did not sit down and cry,—for they were brave little stars, and always tried to find out a happy way to do everything, even if it did seem hard.

So they twinkled and blinked, And laughed and winked, which meant, thinking what to do. "I've got it!" said one bright little twinkler; "we can all join hands and make a dipper; four can form a cup, and three the handle, and we can get a drink from the first cloudlet that comes floating by."

So they all joined hands and made the dipper, just in time to fill it with water from some pretty white clouds that were on their way to cloud-land.

After having enjoyed a cool drink, the stars thought Lady Moon looked thirsty, and they decided to fill the dipper again and take it to her. She was delighted, for she really wanted a drink; but oh! what do you think happened? Lady Moon was very, very cold, and the moment she touched the dipper to take a drink, it caught her breath, and the seven little stars were frozen together in the form of a dipper, forever; and if you try I am sure you can see them every bright starlight night, twinkling merrily in their beautiful home up in the sky.

Every-Day Life.

With Lowell we can say that "new occasions bring new duties," for every day brings its work for us to do. With ordinary people these duties are not great, dazzling deeds. One's life can be noble and full of beauty without once stepping outside of the home circle and the ordinary round of every-day events. A grand life is made up of little sacrifices, little acts of charity, little burdens borne for a weary brother, and little crosses patiently carried for love of the dear Heavenly Father.

HERE is a Whittier story told by the poet at his own expense: "I once went to hear a wonderful orator; and he wound up his speech with a poetical quotation, and I clapped with all my might. Someone touched me on the shoulder, and said, 'Do you know who wrote that?' I said, 'No, I don't; but it's good.' It seems I had written it myself. The fault is I have written far too much. I wish half of it was in the Red Sea."—Exchange.

Lesson XIV.

THE LAST SUPPER.

Matt. xxvi. 17-30.

The holy supper is kept, indeed, In whatso we share with another's need. —Lowell.

Picture: The Last Supper, by Leonardo da Vinci (1452-1519).

The picture is too well known to require explanation. Its anachronisms also are so manifest that they need not be dwelt upon. For the table and its appointments Leonardo was evidently satisfied with the model furnished in the refectory of the Milan convent on whose wall the picture was painted, and did not feel obliged to attempt a reproduction of the actual scene in a Jerusalem upper-chamber. Moreover, he has erred in representing the meal as taken by day, for although the moon was always at full when the Passover was eaten, the light on the landscape seen through the windows must be of the sun, and the episode upon which the picture is based cannot have occurred till long after sunset. Jesus has just spoken of his betrayal and the various emotions which the announcement called forth are beautifully shown on the faces of the apostles. It is remarkable that John, on the right of Jesus, shows neither surprise nor indignation, but alone of all the apostles has an expression like that on the face of Jesus himself.

What was the Passover?—A Jewish festival in memory of the deliverance from Egypt.

It seems to have been a very ancient Semitic custom to offer the firstlings of the flock in sacrifice (cf. Ex. xxii. 30). Since "in Arabia all cattle, small and great, yearn in the season of the spring pasture," the sacrifices would be most numerous at that season of the year; and because originally sacrifice was a communal rather than an individual matter, there would be a disposition to offer all the sacrifices of a community at the same time. The festival seems to have been at this stage in its history when the Jews left Egypt (Ex. x.), and thus the spring festival took on historical association. In the land of Canaan, and perhaps earlier in Egypt, the first fruits of the soil were devoted to the god of the land. This form of sacrifice could not arise till the people had passed from the nomadic to the agricultural life. The season of the first-fruits could be definitely fixed and the general festival came to be known as the feast of unleavened bread. With the centralization of worship in Jerusalem, we find the more ancient spring festival of the firstlings attached to that of the first-fruits and its historical character becomes prominent. The feast of the Passover, then, originated long before the exodus from which it received its historical stamp, and was subsequently allied to the harvest festival of the first-fruits. In the time of Jesus all the festivals had lost their primitive character, and the Passover had undergone the greatest transformation, being thought of only as an historical reminder of the escape from bondage.

What was the Last Supper?—A simple rite, instituted by Jesus during the Passover meal, that the memory of him might be kept by his disciples.

Our sources do not agree about the last meal which Jesus ate with his disciples. The Synoptists say plainly that it was the regular Passover meal (Matt. xxvi. 19; Mark xiv. 16; Luke xxii. 8, 15), but John is equally positive that the Passover was not to be celebrated till the evening of Friday (xviii. 28; xix. 14). It is hard to decide which account is authentic. It is against the Fourth Gospel that it represents Jesus from the beginning as the lamb of God, and hence would have been likely to find appropriateness in the synchronism of his death with the slaughtering of the Passover lambs in the temple—yet it was not the Passover lamb that took away the sin of the world (John i. 28). On the other hand, the Synoptists preserve the tradition that Pilate, following a usual custom, offered to release a prisoner at the feast, and gave the people their choice between Jesus and Barabbas. Inasmuch as one of the objects of releasing a captive would be that he might keep the Passover with his family, it may be that even in the Synoptists there is a tradition in harmony with John's. While the question must be left indeterminate, it is probably safer to follow the Synoptists and hold this the Passover meal.

In that case, the events of the day would have been about as follows. Between three o'clock and five, the lambs were slain in the temple. In the great crowd of Jews that thronged the temple were two disciples of Jesus (Luke says Peter and John), carrying a lamb to be slaughtered. Earlier in the day they had found a householder whose upper chamber was given them for the evening. "It may be mentioned that it was customary to allow to strangers the use gratis of the necessary room, with articles of furniture, especially with cushions and tables; in return for which it was usual to leave behind the skin of the Passover lamb and the earthen vessels that had been employed." [Keim, Jesus of Nazareth, v. p. 280.] Thither the disciples carried the slain lamb. Probably everything else needed for the feast had already been provided. On the evening before, the family whose room had been placed at their disposal began to remove the leaven from the house, and by noon of the Passover day not a particle of leaven was to be found. "To them would fall also the duty of baking in the early morning the pure unleavened mazzot, the cake of wheaten meal, as well as the preparation of the charoset—the thick batter of fruit flavored with vinegar and cinnamon—and the bitter herbs." At evening Jesus came with the rest of the apostles and the Passover began.

In the course of the meal, possibly near the end of the feast and just before the time of the thanksgiving, the blessing and the drinking of the third cup, Jesus took one of the wheaten cakes and breaking off one piece after another gave a fragment to each of his disciples, and then when the third cup was brought he passed it to his friends in turn, bidding them think of him as often as they broke bread or drank wine in the future. It is possible that he meant only to make his memory a part of each subsequent Passover feast, but from the history of the ceremony in the church it is more probable that he expected the apostles to keep together, and wished them to think of him at every common meal.

How was the Eucharist observed in the early church?—It formed part of an ordinary meal in a gathering of the whole church, and was taken in memory of Jesus and in hope of his speedy return.

The earliest account is found in 1 Cor. xi. 17-26, which shows how the ceremony was observed in Paul's time. As the service of commemoration was separated gradually from the usual supper, the former was called specifically the Eucharist (blessing or thanksgiving, 1 Cor. xi. 24), and the latter was called the Agape or Love-feast; but the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" comprehends both in the word Eucharist, Ignatius in the word Love Feast (cf. Teaching, etc., Schaff's ed., pp. 57-62). Rich and poor, master and slave, sat down together once a week on the same footing of brotherhood in Christ and partook of bread, fish and wine." During this meal bread was broken, wine was passed and prayers were offered in memory of Jesus and in hope of his second coming. Out of this beautiful and significant service, which is evidently only commemorative, have grown the Catholic celebration of the Mass and the Protestant "Communion," both of which are very far from the intention of Jesus.

Exactly what Jesus did mean by the rite can be gathered only from his own words, but these differ materially in the various accounts. Yet all agree in the following particulars:

(a) Jesus called the bread his body and the wine his blood (Matt. xxvi. 26, 27; Mark xiv. 22-24; Luke xxii. 19, 20; 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25; cf. also John vi. 56). This has been aptly called, "The last parable of Jesus." Can we not imagine how the idea occurred to him? He knew that for him death was at the door, and as the meal proceeded the gloom grew thicker around him. The red wine in the cup suggested the blood he was to shed—"See," he said, "my blood!" And as he solemnly broke the bread—"My body broken!" Only those who are utterly unable to appreciate the tender mysticism of Jesus, and his invariable habit of seeing analogies, and expressing them in parables, could fail to understand his mood and his pathetic words.

(b) Jesus looked forward to a future reunion with his disciples in the kingdom of God (Matt. xxvi. 29; Mark xiv. 25; Luke xxii. 18; 1 Cor. xi. 26?). This is a striking feature of the ceremony in the early church: it looked backward, to be sure, but it also looked forward to the time when Jesus should come again. In the "Teaching" the service closes with a triumphant ringing cry "Maranatha"—the Lord cometh.

(c) The mention of a covenant in connection with the cup. All accounts agree that Jesus believed that his blood was to be shed for a purpose, as symbol or seal of a covenant (1 Cor. xi. 25; Luke xxii. 20; Mark xiv. 24; Matt. xxvi. 28) and, Matthew adds, for the remission of sins (xxvi. 28). Believing, as Jesus did, that he must die in Jerusalem to end his first mission as Messiah, it is only natural that he should have questioned as to the meaning of that death. Why must the Messiah suffer and die? May we not suppose that as he recalled the teaching of Isaiah that the servant of Yahwe suffered for the sins of the people, and as he thought of the system of ideas represented by the lamb before him, the idea of sacrifice came to him as a possible explanation of his death? Surely those who had believed in him as Messiah must have entered into a new relation with God by reason of that belief, and at his second coming they should inherit the promises. But they must remain faithful to their belief during the dark days of separation, they must be mindful of the covenant, and therefore this wine, shall be to them a reminder. The thought of Jesus on this matter we cannot see clearly, perhaps it was not clear even to himself; but we may be certain that he believed his death was decreed by God for the good of others, and it is possible that in the idea of sacrifice either as seal of a covenant or as a means for the remission of sins (cf. Heb. x. 11-28) he found an explanation of his predetermined sufferings, and to keep his disciples faithful, bade them think of him and of the relation to God upon which they had entered by belief in him whenever they partook of wine, the symbol of his blood shed in their behalf.

"And having sung an hymn they went out unto the Mount of Olives." The hymn was from the Psalter (Psalms cxv.-cxviii.), and should be read in the class. Also it is urgently recommended that the prayers in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, chaps. ix. and x., be read also. The Teaching has been published by the American Unitarian Association for free distribution, and may be had on application. For a modern idea of the communion, see "Robert Elsmere," chap. xlix.

The observance of the Lord's Supper had three results in the early church:

(a) It leveled distinctions of race and class by bringing all together in a common meal. This must have been of especial importance when the church consisted of both Jews and Gentiles.

(b) It fostered personal loyalty to Jesus as the embodiment of the new ideals.

(c) It kept alive the hope of his return.

BEGINNINGS.

A list of books is given in the Christian Register for Nov. 23, by the Unitarian Sunday School Society as "useful in studying and teaching the new lessons" on the Old Testament now being issued by that society. The first book on the list is our recently published work "Beginnings" And it is recommended without reserve, though the teachers are cautioned against the Bible for Learners as "sometimes extremely ultra." This recommendation, taken with the fact that the book is used in the Ethical Sunday School in Chicago, shows how catholic the spirit of the work is and how successful the author has been in giving the simple truth, freed from all theological bias, in treating of the origin of human institutions. And the use of the work as a handbook by a class studying the history of art in a neighboring city shows how wide is the range of the little manual. It will be sent free to any annual subscriber to the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, when requested. The annual subscription is one dollar.

NOBLE LIVES AND NOBLE DEEDS.

A selection of twelve lessons from this admirable series is being made by one of the members of our Sunday School Board for use in our schools when Mr. Fenn's lessons are finished. The list of lessons chosen will be published in this column in a week or two.

Fifteen hundred copies of Mr. Fenn's leaflets are printed weekly. The thirteenth is just issued. Back numbers can be supplied.

A new edition of "Unity Services and Songs for Sunday School," by James Vila Blake, is just issued. We shall now be able to fill orders that have been waiting.

Notes from the Field

San Francisco, Cal.—The Second Church of San Francisco continues to thrive. Morning and evening services are held with increasing morning congregations, and evening congregations so large that they cannot increase without enlarging the building,—which seats nearly five hundred people, including chairs placed in the aisles. Mr. Sprague has recently had an ill turn from overwork and cold, but services were not suspended, as Mrs. Sprague was ready to take his place.

The average attendance at Sunday School has grown to 120 pupils. The school has recently taken up "Beginnings" with much enthusiasm. A weekly teachers' meeting is held by Mr. Sprague, assisted by his wife. A good sign is that parents attend in goodly numbers.

The Ladies' Auxiliary held a bazar Nov. 2 and 3, the net receipts of which amounted to $710.

Though the church has still a debt of $6,000 upon it ($1,000 of which we hope soon to pay), the ladies have decided to take up some active charitable work, and a committee has been appointed to report on ways and means.

Mr. Sprague is giving a series of Sunday evening sermons on "Human Rights," as follows: "The Rights of Children," "The Rights of Working People," "The Rights of Woman," "The Rights of the Sensitive."

Our pastor and his wife are busy people, as, besides the large work of our growing church, they spend three mornings a week in Leland Stanford, Jr., University attending classes in social science and philosophy. Our church boasts of a rapid growth in membership, having received sixty-nine new names since April 1, and there is quite a company still to join who are nearly ready.

Evanston, Ill.—This little church is holding its own in numbers and steadily growing in organization. Its ladies' society during the last year raised over $500 toward a church building. That was a very large sum, when the small number of the society is taken into account. Much of the money was made by canvassing for the Ladies' Home Journal. They have started out on a new campaign this year and would be glad to have all of the old subscribers renew through this society; and they would welcome an unlimited number of new subscribers.

Wichita, Kan.—Rev. W. S. Vail has announced his acceptance of the call to this church, much to the gratification of the people here, who were unanimous in their choice. He has also begun work at Arkansas City, where preaching had been suspended for several months. His energy and experience promise most excellent results in both places.

Midland, Mich.—Though the church here has been without a pastor for two years, it has bravely kept up its organization and continued to hold its Sunday school every Sunday morning, and with a good attendance. We are glad to learn that it has now secured the services of a minister who will, at least for the present, divide his time between this church and that at Mt. Pleasant.

Mitchell, S. Dak.—Rev. Helen G. Putnam delivered her paper here on Sunday evening, Nov. 19, in the Congregational Church, "to an audience that packed the church to its doors," according to the report of the Mitchell Daily Republican of Nov. 20, which also says that "Miss Putnam is a very able speaker and held the attention of her audience through the entire address." She delivered the same address in the Methodist Church of the neighboring town of Bowdle on the following Sunday.

Hillside, Wis.—Rev. F. W. N. Hugenoltz has been compelled, much to the regret of the people, to give up temporarily his work here, owing to the precarious condition of his wife's health. His place will be filled by Rev. J. C. Allen, a graduate of Meadville.

For Nervousness
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

DR. H. N. D. PARKER, Chicago, Ill., says: "I have thoroughly tested it in nervous diseases, dyspepsia and general debility, and in every case can see great benefit from its use."

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Apropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

In some cases the stock is limited.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'd Alexander Russell Webb Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

Chas. H. Kerr & Company's New Holiday Books.

MORE THAN KIN.—By James Villa Blake. This is not a book of sermons nor of essays, nor is it a novel, yet it has some traits of all these. Its thoughts are grouped around a simple story of daily living, and through the book runs a consecutive study of kindness in its various phases. Altogether it is a book to read and reread, to take up at a moment of weariness for the delightful uplift it gives; to study as a text-book in the greatest of sciences, the science of living. 18mo, 334 pages, half cloth, $1.00; full cloth, two colors, $1.50.

AMBER BEADS.—Every one who reads the Chicago dailies will remember the bright paragraphs on every-day topics signed "Amber." In response to many requests, sixty-four of the best of these have been put into book form by the author. Mr. Lederer, the Chicago Herald artist, has designed the cover. There is a pretty edition in paper at 50 cents, and one in cloth at $1.00.

ELSIE; A Christmas Story.—Kjelland is the acknowledged prince of Norwegian writers of fiction. "Elsie" is his best story, and, strange to say, it has not been previously published in this country in the English language, though there is more than one Norwegian reprint. Mr. Miles M. Dawson has made a most pleasing translation, and the mechanical make-up of the book is unique and dainty. Cloth, 50 cents.

WHERE BROOKS GO SOFTLY, by Chas. Eugene Banks, with frontispiece by T. J. Nicholl, is one of the handsomest gift books of the season. The poems in this volume are simple and sincere, such as appeal to the hearts of the millions. Blue and white velum, gilt top, $1.50.

THE FAITH THAT MAKES FAITHFUL. This book of popular sermons by William C. Gannett and Jenkin Lloyd Jones has reached its twenty-second thousand, and is still in active demand. A heavy embossed paper cover has been substituted in the 50-cent edition for the less durable bond paper formerly used. Blessed be Drudgery, the first sermon in the book, which in various forms has reached a circulation of a hundred thousand, is now offered separately in a handsome edition, silk stitched, with rough white cover, suitable for water color decoration, at 10 cents a copy, or $1.00 a dozen.

As the bird trims her to the gale,
I trim myself to the storm of time,
I man the rudder, reef the sail,
Obey the voice at eve obeyed at prime:
"Lovely faithful, banish fear,
Right onward drive unharmed;
The port, well worth the cruise, is near,
And every wave is charmed."
—Emerson.

IN the death of Professor John Tyndall there is cause for sorrow to the truth lovers of the world.

UNITY has to beg the pardon of its readers for a bad blunder by which several articles got into the STUDY TABLE week before last, without the author's or the proof-reader's corrections. Most of the misprints were sufficiently bad to suggest the necessary correction at once, but in the notice of "The Great Remembrancer," the word colonist for colorist may have puzzled the reader at first.

THE liberal students at Cornell University have recently organized a league for "spiritual, intellectual, and social improvement." There are thirty-five charter members. This is another sign of the times; showing the tendency towards synthetic religion, reaching the sanctities by the road of study, rising into reverence without binding the soul by dogma. Let other college students go and do likewise. It is a pity that our young life should burn itself out in enthusiasm over the brutalities of foot-ball and the cheap excitements of class rivalries and college politics. Young men and women, what are you going to college for? Never in your lives will you have such an opportunity of facing the grave question of life and settling, for yourselves at least, some of the fundamental perplexities of the spiritual life, as you are having during your college days. Do not waste your golden opportunities.

PRESIDENT ATWOOD in last week's Universalist very properly calls attention to Prof. Momerie's exaggeration in saying that "there is no more connection between the knowledge of theology and the practice of religion than between the knowledge of geography and the possession of a landed estate." But we are not sure that when Dr. Atwood goes on to say that "the study of theology has usually conduced to religion," he is not saying something which, in the sense in which he means it, is equally untrue. Literally the latter's statement may be true, that attention to any kind of theology has a tendency to emphasize some sort of religion. But there are high and low religions, as well as scientific and unscientific theologies; and from the context it appears that Dr. Atwood meant us to infer that the study of the historical theologies has conduced to a high religious life. The latent error in both Dr. Momerie's and Dr. Atwood's expressions is the notion, at present a popular one, that religion is an unimixed good, but that theology may or may not be good—with the chances in favor of the negative. The fact is that while the common—which is the essential—element in all religions may be good (and in like manner the element essential to all theologies), there are bad forms of religion as well as bad forms of theology; and it is not fair to put all the blame on Theology's shoulders. What has probably tended to obscure the truth that religion and theology are wont to vary correspondingly, is the fact that the most elaborate theologies have accompanied a comparatively low plane of religious life,—whence men have concluded that a high theology and a high religion have no connection. The fallacy consists in regarding these elaborate schemes of theology as high ones,—the fact being that, inasmuch as the subject matter of theology is one about which the finite mind of man has very little knowledge, an highly elaborated theology is prima facie an unscientific one.

JOHN CALVIN LEARNED.

The telegraph has just summoned us to the funeral of John Learned. The stalwart, just and true man has laid aside his arms. We cannot think him dead. We cannot at the present time speak aught but the word of grief. He was the most unflinching, equable soul we have ever known. Integrity and loyalty were his conspicuous attributes. A fearless thinker, a tireless seeker was John Learned. On this account he was also a great truster. The agitations of the day did not disturb him much. When others were panic-stricken he was calm. A man of deep emotions he was never emotional, because his heart was on intimate relations with his head. By another week we may be able to speak more deliberately, to give some of the details of his life, work, and final sickness. Now we can only mourn with the dear family he so loved and served; with the great city, with the best life of which he had been intimately connected for nearly a quarter of a century; with the Unitarian body, which he served so well that they almost distrusted him, and frequently resented his high services; with our UNITY readers, who for sixteen years have so waited for his ripened word. They rested in his judgment. They followed him who shrank from being a leader.

How much we at this office have lost, the readers of UNITY alone can form an estimate of. Loving, loyal John Learned, how we shall miss him! Noblest Roman of them all! How we loved him! Twenty-five years ago he contributed a hymn to the Radical. Then it was read in the plain type of every-day print. Now we read it in the illuminated text of a transfigured life, as we see that every line of it was written with his heart's blood. Every stanza was beaten out in life-measures. Now that he has once more set "forth to pursue the mighty day" we must ask the dear brother, the kind helper, the wise mentor to lend us his words that we may use them to measure our loss and to interpret his own life.

SAVING FAITH.

Great Spirit of renewing Truth!
Come shining through our darkened eyes,
And make the tides of light roll in,
To cleanse from error and from sin:
Destroy the Refuges of Lies.

If any falsehood of the Past
Round us has thrown its iron chain,
Burn through and melt each fettering link,
Ere slaves of Prejudice we sink:
Give us to Freedom once again.

Faith in the present may we have!
Faith that God lives and works to-day!
Faith that all righteousness prevails,
That Revelation never fails
In souls that work and pray.

O Future, thou art held in trust!
To build for thee a glowing way
Our hearts are pledged: no Past can bind,
No Age's Promise is behind.—
Set forth, pursue the mighty day!

NO NONSENSE ABOUT HER.

Kate Field's suggestion of the establishment of labor bureaus to bring the laborer and the work together, is worthy of more serious consideration than has been accorded to it thus far. Indeed it seems to me to be the one really practical suggestion, which has been made in the late discussion as to what to do with the unemployed. I have long cherished such a plan myself, for the relief of the housekeepers of the country places, who find it impossible to get the servants they so much need. Knowing the number of poor women and homeless girls who are in need of the homes and wages these needy housekeepers offer, I have been extremely anxious to have some society organized whose aim it should be to bring the two together. In spite of the expectation that I shall be accused of "damnable iteration" I refer to it again.

It is exactly in the line of Miss Field's proposed movement, and would become a part of it. That there is work enough in the country to give every idle hand employment seems a probability at least. The wages might not be high, but work, at even low wages, is the desideratum now. The workers will have to go to the country, where they are needed, and cannot longer herd in the great cities; but that is the one most desirable thing to be accomplished. But at present the idlers do not know where the work is, and the seekers after help do not know just where to get what they need. If we had these labor bureaus, both parties would be helped. There is scarcely a country place in the land now that does not need one or more dressmakers. Hundreds could be located where they would have constant work and fair prices. This is true also of nurses for the sick, of good laundresses, and of women who can do cleaning, paper-hanging, and such other work as women in the country so much need.

The call for servants is, of course, the most pressing, but among farmers the demand is not so great in winter. Kansas has adopted Miss Field's suggestion and established a State employment agency, in connection with the labor department. It is much to be hoped that other States will follow her example, and that the movement will become general.

Mr. Depew says: "If some philanthropist would concentrate his capital upon a labor bureau whose purpose should be to find employment, it could perform incalculable service."

Perhaps some lover of his kind, in the coming Congress, will present a bill, similar to the one upon this subject introduced by Senator Blair in the Senate in 1888, and see to it that it is not buried in committee as that one was.

In the meantime, let every one interested in the problem of the unemployed constitute himself a society of one, to assist in finding work for the workers. It is the only true and living charity. H. T. G.

Men and Things

MR. ALEXANDER JOHNSTON, in one of his discourses on methods of work in the Organized Charities, laid down the principle that to help wisely the needy, assistance "must be adequate" to the needs; that to help insufficiently so that distress soon lays hold again of the unfortunate tends to produce the pauper spirit. In the line of adequate help we note the paper of Robert Treat Paine on "Emergency Loans" read at a recent Conference of Charities. This Loan organization has for its object "the breaking down of the business of the money sharks." It is conducted on business principles, not as a charity, and has proved a boon to those for whom it is intended. We see in this movement an appreciation of the truth enunciated by Mr. Johnston, and we believe it to be a wise step towards helping at critical periods to save the unfortunate but worthy from loss of self-respect and, finally, from the pauperism that results from continuous discouragement.

FROM THE WOMAN'S JOURNAL we learn that Western Australia is likely soon to follow New Zealand in granting full suffrage to women. A recent effort to secure a favorable vote by the Legislature came within one man's vote of being successful. In South Australia, also, the chances are good that women will soon be given the franchise.

AMONG the most beautiful charities of New York is an estate of about 184 acres ten miles north of the city, left by the late Robert B. Minturn as the seat of a number of buildings crowded out of the city itself. Several of them have recently been completed and are to be dedicated this week. The main object in view in erecting the buildings has been to provide homes, instruction and worship for the boys and girls gathered from the slums of the city by various organizations, such as the "Sheltering Arms," "Children's Fold," etc. Special attention will be given to industrial training.

WHERE GOD ABIDES.

The doors are open one and all,
And sweet the anthem's sacred call,
Where God abides.

No priestly cant or time-worn creed
Usurps the place of kindly deed,
Where God abides.

Each day of all the gladsome year Alike hath power to draw us near Where God abides.

And ever in the human heart
The living springs of goodness start,
Where God abides.

KATE KELSEY.

DR. MARTINEAU'S OXFORD ADDRESS.

[The following address needs a few words of explanation. Some weeks ago an event happened in England of great importance to the liberal religious thought of that country. The Unitarian Theological School was removed from Manchester to Oxford, and taken, as it were, into the college family of that ancient university. What an advance that removal marks we can realize when we recall the fact that only a score of years ago no Unitarian student was allowed to attend any of the colleges of that university; and that half a century ago, when Edward Everett had been invited there to receive the degree of D. C. L. and it became known to "the clerical rabble" that he was a Unitarian minister, such an uproar arose "as to stop the proceedings."

Therefore the advent of the Unitarian school was rightly regarded as epoch-marking if not epoch-making, and was celebrated by feasts and addresses. One of the addresses was by Dr. Martineau, and in his most magnificent vein, though it was apparently quite unpremeditated. The Warden of Merton, as the representative of the University, had welcomed the new school, but had declared that its avowed object—"the scientific and fearless search after truth" in theology—marked no new departure at Oxford; that the same freedom of research had existed there in the Middle Ages; and "that, at the present moment, there is as much freedom of theological opinion among Anglican Professors of Divinity, in both our Universities, as there could well be in any Non-conformist communion;" and that a knowledge of "Biblical criticism" would be dangerous for the young.

When Dr. Martineau was called upon to reply to this welcoming speech he turned upon the complaisant Warden and, in the grand style he is such a master of, swept away the sophistries by the splendid flood of his eloquence, as the resistless waves of a rising tide sweep away the toy structures of sand on the shore.

And the Address seems to us to have a work to do in this country also, even in our own denomination, where too many of us are still building our little forts of sand on the shore of the mighty ocean of truth and are unwilling to see them swept away by any rising flood, however divine it may be.]

We have hitherto believed that Manchester College stood alone in its inheritance of absolute freedom from test-restrictions in its theological teaching and learning. But the accomplished Warden of Merton rather takes the shine out of this pretension by telling us that we claim no liberty of the theological discussion which was not habitually exercised in the mediæval schools, without hindrance from ecclesiastical authority. I am not, like the Warden, deeply versed in the scholastic philosophy, and am ready to believe whatever he tells me. Thomas Aquinas, I know, can state the pros and cons of the theological questions fairly and with lucid brevity, always, however, giving verdict for the Church at last. And, if I remember right, Abelard found it not very safe to venture on a more audacious course. It is indeed unquestionable that, then as well as now, intellects exceptionally active might with impunity reopen problems already closed by Church decree. The point of importance is, "Was this an asserted and acknowledged right? or was it only an unpunished license? and, if exercised by a priest, was it consistent with the obligations which he had voluntarily assumed?" Quote it, if you will, as an example of indulgence towards culprits whom it is more prudent not to touch; but not of unconditional loyalty to the spirit of truth in preference to the behests of men. If in this respect Manchester College is not unique in this country, I should rejoice to hear of the Theological School equally uncommitted to any bespoken results of research. From the third century onward the ecclesiastical spirit has been straining after fixity of doctrine. During the same period the providential order in Christian nations has been one of intellectual and spiritual growth. It is self-evident that the two cannot work harmoniously together. Fix your theology, and you crystallize your universe. Leave your universe free to expand within your thought, and it will soon dwarf your defined theology. If you are bound to a confession, you are paralyzed as a scholar. When the tension between the stationary and the motory forces becomes intolerable, a convulsive crisis, as at the Reformation, ensues and readjusts their relation, always by some theological surrender which unexpectedly releases a fresh religious power. So obvious is this that even Protestant Orthodoxy and Catholic Infallibility at last fall in love with the idea of Progress in history of Faith, and claim for themselves that they are carried onward in the very process of standing still. It is worth while to see what this means. You remember perhaps the story of Robinson and the English Puritan exiles in Holland, on the eve of their departure for new homes and free worship in America. They were Independents, rigorous in their Geneva theology; and their tears flowed more freely because they were parting from the beloved pastor who had trained them in it; for Robinson was too old to share their enterprise. Kneeling on the beach, he called them to prayer; and in his closing blessing encouraged them to look for ever clearer vision of divine things; for sure he was that "there was yet more and more light to break forth from God's word." What could this mean, coming from one who believed in the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures from the first word to the last? Did he refer merely to the future correction by scholars of mistaken readings and translations? No; he was intent on reaching, not more exactly what the writers said and meant, but more fully what was the thought of God hid behind their literal meaning. In his view. "Inspired" words were assumed to carry more than their obvious significance. If that seemed to be trivial, it symbolized the great; if material, it veiled the spiritual; if historical, it was a prophetic hint. Swedenborg is well known to have worked out this doctrine of a double sense in the language of Holy Writ: but in truth it has never been absent from the interpreters, or even the writers, of the books received as sacred. It has spoiled the whole history of Biblical exposition, turning the scriptures into an occult cipher-writing, speaking only to those whom the spirit furnishes with the secret key. Under the influence of this preconception, that besides the literal and textual sense there was the symbolical, and within the symbolical there was the spiritual. Robinson might well expect an indefinite delivery of truth within truth, as the interior caskets were opened. But now that interpretation is complete when the immediate thought which dictated the words is found, we must treat all else as put into the text by the reader's fancy, instead of drawn out of it by revelation of the Spirit of God. Increments to Theology from this source are arbitrary and illusory, and stand in no secure relation to the progress of the world. That the Catholic Church itself is not insensible to the charm of the idea of Progress is evident from its "Theory of Development," so attractively presented in the late Cardinal Newman's exposition of it. The perpetuity of the Church, he insists, does not imply that it can only stand still. On the contrary, it has been always on the move, and has provisions that may ever keep it so: nor has our own generation passed without increasing its body of doctrine. It is undeniable, as a fact, that the conditions of Catholic orthodoxy have enlarged their range as the ages advanced. The reason is obvious. The very act of pronouncing authoritatively on a single article of a creed, and shaping it into words, either abstract like "Person" and "Substance," or figurative like "Father" and "Son," necessarily starts a number of dependent ambiguities which must subsequently come up for discrimination and choice. From the Sonship of Christ, for instance, what endless questions arose, and occupied the Church for centuries ere they were set at rest. "Incarnation," the "Two Natures," the "Monophysite," "Monothelite," and "Sabellian" problems came up in turn for judgment and definition, after which the favored doctrine was added to the Divine code, and the alternatives were dismissed and visited with anathema. But what is the worth of this sort of "Development"? Precisely that, when logically conducted, of the assumed premise out of which it is drawn; and where this is a dictum unsecured, all that is consequential on it is precarious, with risks increasing at every link. Traveling on this line, you are as likely to become incumbered by a monstrous excrescence of falsehood as to clear your way into the simple relations of truth. Thus it was with the Ptolemaic astronomy, starting from the geocentric assumption that the heavenly bodies really move as to us they seem to move. It was possible to draw a scheme of orderly motion, like the figures of a dance, in which the more conspicuous phenomena would have an intelligible place. But, one by one, minuter changes were observed for which there was no room without heaping epicycles upon cycles and stringing loops upon circles, till the complexity baffled the resources of every calculus. In spite of infinite ingenuity the science went further and further into the dark, till, on the suggestion and trial of the heliocentric position, the crowd of jostling phenomena fled off into symmetrical order and explained their own periodicities. Precisely similar in their origin from a false assumption were the Church complications to the Ptolemaic bewilderments; and if not also in their issue, it is only because the heavens can take care of themselves, and there is no astronomical Pope to excommunicate their inconvenient anomalies and blot them out from the Cosmos. These spurious "Developments" from unsecured premises are not what we mean by the progressive growth of human thought, in religion as in all else. Mere deduction from what you now think will never open to you fresh fields of thought, divine or human. Only by larger knowledge of facts, natural or spiritual, and careful generalization from them of the true rules of their happening, do we come into right relations with the world in which we live. And as that world is also the scene of the divine existence and the manifestation of the divine action, it is vain to imagine that while its aspects change before our thought, theology can remain unaffected in its form and dimensions. In recognition of this concurrent variation of theology and general knowledge, Manchester College commends to the teachers and the taught an unconditioned quest of sacred truth. Is there then, you may perhaps ask, nothing permanent in the contents of religious faith? Yes, of religious faith, even though you should pass from church to church, and your assent should shift from creed to creed. For the abiding element is to be found, not in the intellect's theoretical conception of things divine, but in the order, depth, and power of the moral and spiritual affections, and in the adoring and loving sense of an infinite personal relation in which they place us. All the time that the understanding may be on the move in its escape from imperfections, the responsible and aspiring soul may forever kneel before the eternally Perfect. The reverential conscience, the trustful love, the self-devoting will, may abide the same through all theological research; and be ready to take possession of whatever universe and whatever history that research may lay open to them as the temple of their worship and epic of the Divine Life. Be the scale small or great of the scene thus filled with God, the Religion which so consecrates it is the same, and makes a fellowship of heart for the child, the peasant, and the philosopher. This it is that carries faithful minds unharmed through changes which frighten people helplessly resting on crumbling authorities. What "destructive criticism," they say, "is this! What is to become of the Sabbath if the six days' Creation is given up? And of the Fall of Man, if we listen to Darwin? And of the Redemption, if we lose the Fall"? Not only is it true that criticism destroys these things as facts; but that, unless it did so, we should be still in the stage of Accadian civilization; should image the universe to ourselves as a two-storied world divided by a crystal palace roof studded with electric lamps and an arc-light or two over the portals of the day and night; its ceiling supplied with water-tanks and turn-cocks to irrigate the flower beds and fill the fish-ponds below! Of this lower plane we should be thinking as the scene of an abortive experiment of a new creature; who, though said to be in the image of God, proved to be so great a simpleton as to break down at the first temptation, and so become the progenitor of a foredoomed race peopling a ruined world; which, at the end of the ages, had to be bought off at a frightful cost of suffering to the Holiest of all. If criticism is "destructive" of this picture, does it not spread before us a more sublime? If it dwarfs the Mosaic chronology, does it not unfold a record that has neither Alpha nor Omega? If it does away with the flat sea and rooted earth "that cannot be moved," does it not roll them into a globe and fling it spinning and circling on a track from which it never swerves? If it melts away the crystal roof, think whither it is that it lets the stars retire! Suppose what we now know of our abode and our environment to open suddenly upon a devout worshiper looking out on the little Hebrew universe. Nay, let it be Jesus of Nazareth himself, when he had gone up into the mountain to remain all night in prayer to God: and if then had been revealed to him all that comes to us from the vault of stars above him, and the dip of the horizon below; if the moon had told him her wondrous tale, and the light of Orion and Pleiades had reported its length of way and what infinitudes it left behind; if, in short, between the second and third he had found himself transported from the built firmament of Genesis to the open universe of Newton and of Herschel; do you think that he would have knelt no more? that he would have shut up his spoken or silent prayer, because there was no longer anything adorable? Would he not rather have been lifted into a devotion too rapturous for speech? And so it ever is with all our warranted "negations." We discard the relatively mean and low to escape into the great and glorious; we leave the rudiments to fall away, that we may press on towards perfection. We exchange a God with a "throne" and a "foot-stool," a "right-hand seat" and a left, for the Living Presence of a Universal Mind, looking into our eyes in all that is beautiful, and communing with us in all that is right. One thing more I would point out as a necessary inference from the fundamental principle of "Free Teaching and Free Learning." If we approve of this principle, we must take it with all its risks. If the alumnus, in the conscientious exercise of his freedom, carries from the class-room theological convictions at variance from those of his teachers, he will be only following the call of duty should he enter the service of a Church less catholic than ours. Nothing can be more absurd than, under the motto of an open theology, to expect all your students to arrive at the same implied, though unnamed, conclusions. Hence it follows that if the College is intended to train ministers for a particular denomination, that denomination must hold the same impartial attitude toward doctrine as the College assumes, by neither name nor act committing itself, in its corporate capacity, to a particular theological school. The noble principle, reasserted in every announcement issued from Manchester College, is exposed to the imputation of insincerity by every word or deed put forth in forgetfulness of this relation between Church and College.

"NOW IS THE APPOINTED HOUR."

Sometimes we ask why the heart must lie

In the ashes of love burned low,
With no power to turn in the book of life

The leaf that is blotted so.

Sometimes we mourn the years that are gone

And weep for the hopes that have fled.
Sometimes we long for friendships past
And bitterly mourn the dead.

Yet never a year so rich as this year,
Nor a day with such hopes as this one;
There was never a time of such infinite worth

Amid all that is past and gone.

SOPHIE GIBB.

The orthodox interpretation of Christianity drags religion down from the high plane of the universal to the limitations of a sect, and then one sect, as Romanist or Protestant, excludes the other and in this way is made powerless the religious faith and hope of man. O, it would make life larger and better to feel that this is a world of friends and not of enemies, that the millions are looking for the good. In the outworking of world and racial problems, injustices and hardships may befall the individual, but the compensations are sure in the sometime of the future. History never forgets. Heaven always rewards. Aye, goodness is its own reward. In the blessed consciousness of trying to do right the soul loses its burdens in the great work and joy of trying to lift and carry a whole world of souls to the higher life. O, it should be ours, ours who stand for the religion of humanity, to stand for the great our side of God and man; and forgetting the dividing and weakening lines that have separated us in the past, we should be one in the noble endeavor to welcome the ungathered millions to a home for all souls, a church as broad as the needs of man, as wide as the love of God and with its doors out to the infinite beyond.

H. W. Thomas, D. D.

RIDING AND HITCHING.—One mode of transportation among the poor whites of Southern West Virginia is known as "riding and hitching." It is resorted to when two travelers find themselves with only one horse and they are going too far to ride "double." In "riding and hitching" one traveler takes the horse and goes a mile or more, while the other foots it behind. The equestrian naturally makes faster speed than the walker. So, after he has ridden his share, he dismounts and hitches his steed to a tree by the roadside and pushes on afoot. In time the other walker comes to the hitched animal, mounts him, rides on until he has overtaken the first rider and got some distance in front, when the operation is repeated. Thus each rides alternately, and the horse gets a breathing spell.

The Study TableGOLDWIN SMITH'S OUTLINE OF OUR HISTORY.

To see ourselves as others see us is proverbially a good thing for us. To see our national selves as Mr. Goldwin Smith sees us is to see ourselves with very friendly eyes, hardly less so than those of Mr. Bryce, with whose "American Commonwealth" this history naturally suggests comparisons. In their structures the two books are entirely different, as different as an "Anatomy and Physiology" from a biography. Mr. Bryce's is a much more important book than this, involving much greater labor in its preparation and containing much more useful matter, both for the English and the American reader. Mr. Smith's book is a remarkable piece of condensation. He has seized on the important things at every stage with happy intuition, and has not cumbered himself with indifferent and irrelevant matter. Here and there the stress of condensation brings things that were far apart too near together. The author's general knowledge of his subject is complete, while occasionally there are little slips, some of which an American schoolboy might easily have corrected,—as where the Charter Oak is transplanted from Hartford, Conn., to Providence, R. I.,—and the proof-reading is characterized by the usual English carelessness in this particular. The style of the book is Goldwin Smith's, and therefore it is clear and strong, sometimes a little too rhetorical, especially for a book which has been recommended for the use of schools and colleges. The worst example is on pp. 73, 74, where more woes are pronounced than Jesus leveled at the Scribes and Pharisees, all leading up to a reprobation of Samuel Adams, which is one of the most doubtful of the many personal estimates which enliven and enrich the course of the eventful history. In this particular and in his general attitude toward the separation of the colonies from the mother country Mr. Smith reminds us of the politician who was "for the law but agin its enforcement." He is for separation, and does not think it came too soon; but he is against Samuel Adams and Patrick Henry and the others who did most to bring about the separation. He would have had it brought about with mutual amenities—an impossible thing. Canada has waited for her turn one hundred and seventeen years, and a perfectly amicable separation, which Mr. Smith so much desires, is as far off as ever.

The title of the book is too large for its contents. He should have made 1607-1871 his including dates, instead of 1492-1871, for he makes short work of the period from 1492 to 1607, disposing of it in two pages. The accounts of the different colonial settlements are very admirable in their indications of the various strains of character that entered into them. New England readers will relish his narration much more than Southerners, for he is very strongly if not unduly impressed with the superiority of the New England settlements to all the rest, and with their formative influence upon the subsequent developments. On page 36 there is a sentence which seems to have somehow got loose from its proper moorings a century or before: "Presently Unitarianism raised its head and in time possessed itself of the government of the University." This is written of the close of the seventeenth century! From the allusion to the "House of the Seven Gables," on the next page, it is evident that Mr. Smith has never read the book.

In the chapter on the revolution the estimate of Washington is as generous as the most patriotic of his countrymen could ask; though, perhaps, exception might be taken to the statement that he "never won a battle." The date of Burgoyne's surrender is given as 1779 instead of 1777—one of many marginal dates that suggest ill-made figures in the MS. of the book and no serious revision of the proof. The treatment of Andre's death is of a piece with the sentimentalism that has given him a monument in Westminster Abbey. It is treated abstractly—as if Arnold's treason had nothing to do with it. Mr. Smith is nothing if not anti-Gallican, and he seldom touches the relations of France to the conflict without cerebral excitement. This is most evident in his treatment of the effect of our revolution upon France (pp. 115, 116). The last chapter of Arthur Young's "Travels in France" is the best comment on his extravagances. See also Buckle's chapter, "Proximate Causes of the French Revolution."

In dealing with the period of constitutional construction Mr. Smith's view of Hamilton reflects the Federalist bias of the writers in the "American Statesman" series, while the life of John Adams in that series by Mr. Morse, whose maiden effort was a eulogy of Hamilton in two volumes, does not appear to have been consulted. If it had been we might have had some hearty reprobation of Hamilton's treatment of Adams in 1796, and of his private manipulation of Adams's Cabinet, as well as of his fatuity, that did more than all other influences to make the wreck of the Federalists in 1800 as disgraceful as it was ruinous. Of much more importance is the exaggerated estimate of Hamilton's part in the framing of the Constitution of 1787. The outcome was very far from representing his ideal, which involved a Senate for life on a property basis and a President legislatively chosen for a period of good behavior,—a scheme which could never have been forced upon the States, or only to bring on another revolution. The exaggeration of Hamilton's part entails the depreciation of Madison's, which in the convention was of much more importance. The estimate of Jefferson is depreciatory in the main, but with the liberal allowance that if Hamilton "divined Europe," as Talleyrand declared, Jefferson divined America, reading the secret and imposing the law of its political future,—a much more important matter.

Mr. Smith's fourth and fifth chapters—"Democracy and Slavery," "Rupture and Reconstruction"—are his best. The account of slavery at the beginning of the fifth chapter bids fair to be a classic characterization of the foolish wickedness which it describes. In its details it is not so full as Mr. Rhodes's recent history, but it is written in a more effective manner. Both have drawn largely on Frederick Law Olmsted's "Cotton Kingdom," which is as serviceable a memoir for the historians of the pro-slavery rebellion as Arthur Young's "Travels in France" for the historians of the French Revolution. The characterizations of Clay, Webster and Calhoun, and later that of Lincoln, are most admirable. That of Webster is free from the idealizing taint of many recent writers. That of Lincoln is as lofty in its praise as Lowell's verse in the Commemoration Ode. But it has not the "wholeness of texture" which Matthew Arnold loved. To say that in 1860 he was "available as a rail-splitter," and say nothing of his contest with Douglas and the impression made by his Cooper Institute speech, is a rhetorical absurdity. To speak of him as being "like his father, without habits of settled industry," is equally absurd. But still more absurd is the remark that everybody read "Uncle Tom's Cabin" "with a feeling of its unreality." It was as real as life and death to the majority of its readers; more real than the "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin," which gave the corresponding facts.

In general the relation of slavery to the war is admirably wrought out. So, too, the relation of Garrison and the Abolitionists to the conflict, an easier task because Mr. Smith had already written a brief biography of Garrison marked by a rare appreciation. "In 1861," he says, "came the catastrophe," and then goes on to describe the events of 1860. The date is, of course, mistaken. And was Jefferson Davis "a man after the Southern heart?" It turned out that he was not, in course of time. He elicited no general admiration. He has no such place in the affections of the South as Lincoln has in the affections of the North. But these are little matters, and in general the proportion of our blame and praise has not fairly represented our feeling for the book which Mr.

Smith has written. Its merits are many and commanding and its faults are few and slight. It will do good on both sides of the water. That it challenges some traditional opinions is not a defect. It rebukes our arrogance. It summons us to better things. Let us hope that the author's purpose to write another volume on our later politics will soon be carried out. As he reads the papers this morning (November 8) he will find that in their bearings on the fortunes of Maynard, a corrupt judge, and Boody, a corrupt mayor, they seem to show that we have a fund of moral perception and righteous indignation vested in our democracy which can be drawn upon in great emergencies for almost any amount.

HANDBOOK OF ENGLISH CATHEDRALS.

By Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. Also with plates and diagrams. New York: The Century Company. 1893. Crown, 8vo. $1.50.

It was a happy thought to make a handbook out of Mrs. Van Rensselaer's twelve articles originally contributed to the Century Magazine. Published by the Century Company and printed by De Vinne it goes without saying that the book is a pleasure for the eye and hand. The articles have undergone a second revision. Since first writing them the author has been the round of the great French cathedrals, so that she is now able to speak with more comparative judgment of those on English soil. She does not admire these too much. Mr. Moore may have shown conclusively that the French Gothic is the only logical system, but logic does not give the measure of beauty in architecture. If the "fretted vault" of the French cathedrals is more impressive than the lower vaulting of the English, "the long-drawn aisle" of the latter is more impressive than the shorter aisle of the former, and the dominance of their transept towers is much more impressive than the weak stiletto spires which correspond in buildings across the Channel. The setting of the English cathedrals in their closes of rich sward and noble trees is another count in their favor.

Mrs. Van Rensselaer has chosen her twelve cathedrals wisely. That her choice was made with the approval of the late Prof. Freeman is sufficient proof of this, though her choice does not include Exeter. She should have been allowed to make her dozen articles a baker's dozen, and then Exeter would have come in. Those who have seen the Early English front of Ripon and the choir of Carlisle, with the most beautiful "east window of divine surprise" that the decorated period produced, will miss those things, of course, but in general the best is here. The writer is extremely modest. She does not pretend to write for architects, but for the average tourist, and for such her book will prove more serviceable than the hand-books of Murray, splendid as those are, besides being ten times as compact. As the cathedrals are set in their closes so she has set them in the wealth of their historical associations, thus adding vastly to the interest of her book. It will be a capital book for those who have been the round, and will for many a year renew their pleasure in the century-growing piles. Mr. Pennell's pictures, so numerous and so beautiful, will do much to make the recollection more vivid and "the lost pulse of feeling stir again."

CHINESE NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENT.

Forty Stories, told by Almond-eyed Folk, Actors in the Romance of The Strayed Arrow. By Adele M. Fielde. Illustrated by Chinese Artists. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 8vo, pp. 194.

This is a work to delight the heart of the ethnologist as well as of the child, and the publishers have given it a setting worthy of themselves and of both classes of their constituency. The twenty-five illustrations enable us to study Chinese art, while the forty stories which are strung on the thread story of the Strayed Arrow somewhat as those of the thousand and one nights are upon the tale of the cruelly-determined Sultan and his clever sister-in-law, offer to the student of men and manners a quantity of material remarkably rich in proportion to its bulk.

Those who have observed the publications of Putnam's Sons at all closely for several years back realize, though perhaps the American public as a whole does not, that this firm has been engaged in something more than the effort to run a paying business,—it has in a quiet way been carrying on an educational work of no mean value. Apparently taking as a motto the worthy maxim, "The noblest study of mankind is man," Putnam's Sons have given especial attention to educational work along the lines of social science; and although the value of some of their efforts in this direction has inhered rather in the nature of the subject than in the manner of its execution, we believe nevertheless that the American public owes to them a considerable debt of gratitude for their moderate success in cultivating the popular taste in the direction of economics, history, folk-lore and the like.

We should be glad to comment at length upon the excellence of the book under review,—upon the vigor and suggestiveness of certain of the illustrations; upon the charm of the author's simple, direct and remarkably concise style; upon the large, clear type, appropriate cover, and general attractiveness of the press-work. But space forbids, and we can only advise our readers to get the book for themselves; it will make an admirable holiday book, being full of interest for young and old, and we regard it as a real contribution to that broad humanity which comes from a wide outlook upon life and, more specifically, from a degree of intimacy with the every-day life of a people whose culture is different from our own.

EL NUEVO MUNDO. A poem by Louis James Block. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 95. $1.00.

As was to be expected, the Columbian year has inspired many literary efforts poetic as well as—we were going to say—prosy; and, depending as so many of them do on that factitious circumstance, but few will really live, though they all stand a chance of being resurrected a hundred years hence. Prof. Block's poem is largely conceived, beginning at the beginning and dipping into the future, and some of it is so very good that the reader feels almost a sense of personal wrong that some of it is so very bad. Its worst fault may be illustrated by the following words and phrases taken from a single stanza: "Waters . . . tumulted," "reinless wars," "The world a vast impendence," "half lampllessly," "noisy foam," "potenced nothingness"—wording which suggests the undergraduate effort at poetical translation.

The obscurity is so great at times that when one compasses the meaning of a stanza he exults as when he solves a mathematical problem, but however popular the puzzler's column may be it should be restricted to the column. To present the historic setting of the achievement of Columbus is a lofty undertaking, and this conscientious effort will doubtless meet with its large reward; but if, according to the famous epigram, a play must have "wit enough to keep it sweet," then good poetry must give light enough to read it by.

THE BOOK OF JOB. Critical Edition of the Hebrew Text, with notes. By C. Siegfried, Professor in the University of Jena. English Translation of the Notes by R. E. Bruennow, Professor in the University of Heidelberg. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. Leatherette, 4to, pp. 52. $1.00.

This is the first installment of the new critical edition of the books of the Old Testament, printed in Hebrew and edited by Prof. Paul Haupt, Ph. D. The whole edition when complete will represent the ripest scholarship in Europe and America. The typography is of the highest order, and, owing to a gift of $5,000.00 placed at the disposal of the editor, he is enabled to make the price of the separate parts so low as to bring them within the reach of all students and critics, who will await anxiously the future installments. The printing is done in Leipsic and is in colors; thus, parallel compositions are printed in blue, correcting interpolations conforming the speeches of Job to the orthodox doctrine of retribution are printed in red, while polemical interpolations are printed in green. By this arrangement even those who are not Hebrew scholars will find the book helpful.

DICCON THE BOLD: A STORY OF THE DAYS OF COLUMBUS. By John Russell Coryell. Illustrated. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 279. $1.25.

This is a delightful story for boys, and its freshness and vigor have a charm for older readers. The brave, honest, simple-hearted English lad who loves adventure and the sailor's life, and regards it as the happiness of his life that he has the good fortune to accompany the great Admiral on his memorable trip, wins our sympathy despite the fact that his love of fighting would hardly be becoming in a nineteenth century hero. It must be confessed that he is always extricated from his numerous difficulties just in the nick of time in a manner not altogether lifelike; but after all it may be questioned whether a person with the sunny disposition of Diccon would not be sure to find life a success in whatever condition he might be placed.

THE RUSSIAN REFUGEE. By Henry R. Wilson. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co. Paper, 8vo, pp. 610. 50 cents.

This is a novel displaying a love of nature and of natural methods of education. It is well set and passably interesting; but it is a trifle too didactic, is far too long, and contains too many alleged characters that are psychologically untrue or are mere types.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE FORUM, under its present management, has been rapidly forging ahead until now it has a position of which it can well be proud. In its peculiar field, as ministering to the serious study of social problems, we regard it as the best of our American magazines. Its tone is serious, candid, and critical,—as far removed from sensationalism and extravagance as it is from unprogressive conservatism. Its latest forward step is the reduction of its price from 50 to 25 cents a number, a reduction from $5.00 to $3.00 per annum. It is now within the reach of a larger number of readers, and we trust that its prosperity will correspond to its merits. The December number is a strong one, including papers on "Child-Study—the Basis of Exact Education," by President G. Stanley Hall, of Clark University; "Israel Among the Nations," by W. E. H. Leckey; "The Beginning of Man, and the Age of the Race," by Prof. Brinton; "Need Not of 'More Money,' but of 'Better Exchange,'" by Mr. T. G. Shearman; "A Plan for an Automatic, Business-Like Tariff," by Hon. W. J. Coombs; "A Plea to Free the Schools from Politics," by Dr. Rice; "The Most Popular Novels in America," by Hamilton W. Mabie; and papers by Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, Franklin H. Head, Woodrow Wilson, A. Augustus Healey, Wm. D. Foulke, and Frederic Harrison,—a notable list of names; but what is far more to the point, a number of these are eminently practical, serious studies of present problems.

WALTER BLACKBURN HARTE, whose series of essays on literary and social matters, "In a Corner at Dodsley's," was for the past two years a regular monthly feature of the New England Magazine, is to begin a new series of papers in Worthington's Magazine, of Hartford, Conn., under the caption of "In a Library Corner." The first essay, on "The Mystery of Style," will be published in the December Worthington's.

THE DIVINITY OF MAN.

A Lecture by Swami Vivekananda.

REPORTED FOR UNITY.

Swami Vivekananda, of Bombay, a Hindu monk, is a man of handsome presence. In speaking his voice goes in regular, rather monotonous waves of sound, now up, now down. He wears a long orange toga or gown, belted at the waist with red girdle, dark-red pantaloons and boots, and a lemon-colored turban covers his black hair. In the street an additional turban and a fashionable American black cloth ulster or surtout varies the Oriental costume.

Dr. Thomas, in introducing him to the audience, said: "The speaker of the evening comes from a land of ancient scholarship, in whose philosophy are found the roots of the philosophy of England, Germany, France, and all Europe, whose religion is the most ancient in the world, whose bible antedates the Hebrew Bible—and he speaks to us in our own language."

Swami Vivekananda then spoke as follows:

"As we look about us we see two sides of life, external, internal; matter, external form, and the internal life of thought. If we look only at the external we are crushed, man is only an atom, and almost not that, in the universe; but in the world of thought he seems more powerful. In the heavens are stars, suns and worlds one thousand—one hundred thousand times bigger than the earth, and as the firmament contains the stars, so the eternal contains all. Take the law of gravitation. A stone falls,—two, three stones fall,—and Galileo says, he sees the law of gravitation. Thus after we see many phenomena, we reduce them to unity. This is human reasoning, finding unity, reducing the many phenomena to laws.

"The external and internal phenomena have always engaged the attention of thinking men. Can the external and internal be reduced to unity?"

"There are three schools: the Dualist, the Materialist and the Idealist. We pass over the Dualist; he gives up in despair. The Materialist says there is only the external, the other is the outcome of the former. You must believe in matter. The Idealist says there is only thought, mind, there is no matter. To the Hindu both are partially true, partially wrong. Can matter and mind be reduced to unity? The Materialist says mind does not exist.

"Is this table an existing something? Is it independent of the whole universe? Soon we see there is both independent and relative existence. In the matter of heat and cold you cannot think of one without the other, you cannot separate them; without comparison the idea cannot come.

"There is this story in the Sanscrit: A prince was asked, 'What is the most wonderful thing in the world?' 'It is this, that men and women die and the rest think that they will never die, but will live on forever and ever.' Why is it when we see all men die about us, why do we not think that we shall die? It is because we shall not die, and we act upon that. If we were mortal all action would cease, man would not look to the future, man would never work. When he works it is because he knows he will not die. In and through this lies the great secret of the universe.

"The universe is relative, but there is something absolute, something that never dies, and this is the motive power of all our actions. Whether we see the stars or not, they are there. We must not take relative things for absolute. We see the stars against the sky, and because there is a background we are able to see the stars; so because there is a background of absolute and independent existence, we are able to see the things that are dependent and relative.

"In the internal, spiritual world man believes he will not die. If the body is myself it will die, for the body changes every moment; it is only a current of matter. What right have I to call it the same? Every seventh year every particle is changed. We see there is sameness and change. But there is something for background; absolute existence is the background of mind and body; the Eternal Being is at the back of every existence; that Being we call God, and the mind, soul. The animal kingdom differs from the vegetable, and the vegetable from the mineral. The dog and the elephant are made of clay; both are clay; as clay they are one; as beings there is a sense in which they are one. There are related beings, and beings are various.

"In the moral world, unselfishness is the basis of all morality. We give up the individual, the little circle of diluted selves, and march toward the universal. The underlying basis of all religions is the regaining the absolute and unconditional nature of the soul. If the soul is relative, it is bound, degraded. Everything that changes dies. Immortality, unconditionality, the Infinite—are one and the same. There cannot be two Infinities. If there were, they would condition each other.

"The Infinite is like the ocean. All bring water from the ocean. All religions come with their different cups to this ocean for water. So the different religions are different stages of growth, and they take in the Infinite, according to their purity of heart.

"Religion is not the outcome of the weakness of the human heart; it is the outcome of strength, it is the effort of the soul to regain its nature. A wise man was asked, 'What is the most important thing for man to do?' 'Be friendly to human beings, be kind and helpful to those in distress.' 'Is that all?' 'No; be happy.' 'Is that all?' 'No; see only what virtues men have, never see their faults.' 'Is that all?' 'No; believe in men as you believe in your own brother.' 'Is that all?' 'No; this it is. See yourself in another shape. Not your brother, but your own form multiplied,—you, in another shape.'

"Religion is the manifestation of the divine nature. How can man change? Can the leopard change his skin? Whence can the sinner get a supply of virtue? He is a diamond: when the dust is washed off, the divine nature becomes manifest. Develop a man on a low, brutal plane and there is the murderer; develop him on a higher plane and we have a saint. The doctrine of original purity was proclaimed before the doctrine of original sin.

"There is this story of the lion: As a lioness came upon a flock of sheep, a cub lion was born, and the lioness died. The lion grew up with the sheep, ate grass, bleated, and when the sheep fled the big lion fled with them. He was a big lion, but he did not give up the sheep nature. A lion came upon the flock and found this full-grown lion, which fled from him with the sheep; but he waited, caught the sheep-lion, held him down, and told him he was a real lion! He bleated a reply. Then he took him to a lake and showed him his image, the image of a lion, in the lake. He roared: the sheep-lion roared; he found he was a lion, not a sheep. So man is not a sinner, but God's son—this is what the Hindu religion teaches. From the Vedas we have a legend. There were two eagles on a tree; the one below ate fruits, bitter and sweet, and was miserable. The one on the top was full and perfect, and wanted nothing below its own nature. It was a majestic eagle, with no fear or misery. The one below felt he could be like the one above, and as he came nearest the reality of his own existence, he became like him.

"Whatever may have covered it up, the soul is unconditioned, immortal, it has only to know its own nature and that will make it free. Do not expect to make men better by criticism, but by giving them higher ideas. Criticism makes men worse. Praise men; place higher planes before them and they will come up to them. You know how difficult it is to cut a log against the grain. Man must come up. Religion is the manifestation of the Divinity existing in man—and we can help the process of this manifestation. This is not the idle dream of philosophers. Thousands and thousands of the thinking people of India have been built up on this idea.

"It is told that Alexander the Great, conversing with a monk, was so pleased with him that he asked the monk to come with him. The monk refused. 'Do you know I can kill you?' The monk replied: 'You cannot kill me. I am immortal—you can only kill the body.' Alexander said: 'Had I not been Alexander the Great, I would be this monk.'

"At Benares I knew a good and wise monk. He seldom spoke, but wrote his answers to the questions of the people. The English Government was hanging Hindus and monks, because it declared them to be mutinous in disguise. The English authorities ordered this monk whipped till the blood spouted out from his body. They cut him with knives and poured lime-juice in the wounds, but he declared: 'All is divine. Ye are gods, still ye are gods—I am a soul, what can kill me?'

"In the Vedas, a prophetess, when her disciples ask about God, tells them: 'You are immortal. You are really He. When you realize this, then will all doubt cease, all fear will vanish, imperfection will go forever; for the soul becomes divine by realizing the divine.' Paul said: 'In Him we live and move and have our being.' Why are ye afraid? Fear not; thou art a spirit. Sorrow not, for thou art a spirit. Death cannot come; thou art a spirit, thou art He! Thou art He!"

Correspondence

A QUESTION.

EDITOR UNITY: In the recent issue of a widely circulated journal of your city, the editor, in referring to the fact that a new railroad was to be built in Palestine, among other things, said: "It has been something to contemplate that the land where 1,900 years ago the seeds of a new civilization were planted has lain in the shadow of centuries unmarked by the iron heel of progress."

Is this a truthful statement? We think not. That eminent father of the church, St. Augustine, said: "What is called the Christian religion has existed among the ancients, and was not absent from the beginning of the human race until Christ came in the flesh, from which time the true religion which existed began to be called Christian."

Another eminent theologian declared the soul to be an older authority than prophecy and its voice "the gift of God from the beginning."

The idea that the expression, "Fatherhood of God," is only about 1,800 years old is another mistake. The Egyptian King, Rameses in a perilous position, thus appealed to the Deity:

"I invoke thee, O my father: I am in the midst of throngs of unknown people, and alone before thee; no one is beside me. My bowmen and my horsemen have abandoned me," etc.

This prayer to God the Father is in the oldest literature of the human race, and was uttered before the Jewish lawgiver gave his code to his people—more than 3,400 years ago.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible: I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation.—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahmoo leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Westery, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fasting, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Parting, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

SONGS FOR THE AGED.

“Oh! Grandma, I wish you wouldn't ask me to play and sing for you. I'm all out of practice,” said the fifteen-year-old granddaughter with an airy toss of her head.

“Thee can surely sing ‘Home, Sweet Home,’—and there was a wistful look upon the Quakeress' face as though her heart was hungry for music.

“I really can't stop. It's time I was going to the King's Daughters' meeting now. Here comes Gladys; good-by, Grandma.”

“Good-by, child: thee must learn to be a good daughter, but thee need not go to the chapel to find the work the King has given thee to do; there's plenty within the home if thee had but the eyes to see.” The granddaughter was away down the street ere Grandma had finished—indeed she seemed to be talking more to herself than the child, and she was unconscious of the plain little girl behind the drapery, who was always seeing some little act of kindness to do.

“Grandma,” said the childish voice from the broad window-seat, “Sister says I'm not old enough to join her circle, but can't I be your King's Daughter and do the things sister hasn't time for? I can sing ‘Home, Sweet Home,’ for you. I'd like to.”

The child crept close to the aged knee and rested her tiny arm upon the folds of the soft drab dress, and in a sweet, childish voice sang song after song which she had heard from the thin, aged lips.

“Can't I sing to you every day when sister is out? She laughs at me and calls my singing old-fashioned, but you like it, don't you, Grandma? When I grow up and learn to play on the piano, I will learn some of the good old tunes you like so much, just for you.”

Away went the child to her play, little knowing the sunshine she had left in the grandmother's heart. The joy of those three words, “just for you,” thrilled her so that for the time the elder child's heedless, careless refusal to sing was forgotten.

The young child was, indeed, the sunbeam in the home; and all unconsciously was acting the part of a King's Daughter, by her continual sweet disposition, her thoughtfulness of others, and her simple, childlike, loving heart, better than the elder sister, who went weekly to her meeting, but lacked the true spirit needed.

Why should we so heedlessly pass by the little home pleasures—leave the song unsung to search for work outside? None will prize it more than the home circle. To Grandma a song—a hymn—sung in her younger days, is dearer than any studied opera or ballad.

Why not sing to her? She cannot leave the home fireside, and you have a thousand chances to make her life happier. Be ever mindful of her comfort. Sing to her, if you have any voice to sing for any one, the songs she loves best. When you are with her, be as childlike and simple as the little one who has just left her knee—the sweet songster whose one desire was to please Grandma.

Then you will come into the true relation to become a King's Daughter, but not until then.

A PRETTY INCIDENT.

A newsboy took the Sixth avenue elevated railroad cars at Park place, New York, at noon on Thanksgiving Day, and sliding into one of the cross-seats fell asleep. At Grand street two young women got on and took seats opposite to the lad. His feet were bare and his hat had fallen off. Presently one young girl leaned over and placed her muff under the little fellow's dirty cheek. An old gentleman smiled at the act, and, without saying anything, held out a quarter with a nod toward the boy. The girl hesitated a moment and then reached for it. The next man as silently offered a dime, a woman across the aisle held out some pennies, and, before she knew it, the girl, with flaming cheeks, had taken money from every passenger in that end of the car. She quietly slipped the amount into the sleeping lad's pocket, removed her muff gently from under his head without rousing him, and got off at Twenty-third street, including all the passengers in a pretty little inclination of the head that seemed full of thanks.

Among the thorns that hedge thy joyous way;
Nor autumn richer fruits for winter's gloom,
Entrancing all who see the ripening day.

Never hath God endowed a man with mind

Slaves, held forever on the brink
Of morbid fear; since the great Teacher said,
Not fear but hope I bring: by love my lambs are led.

A BOY'S PHILOSOPHY.

During one of our recent heavy storms, three-year-old Dorothy and her brother Richard, six years old, were at play. One unusually heavy gust of wind and rain striking the window, Dorothy, much frightened, ran to mother for protection. Richard walked up to her and said, “You mustn't be afraid, Dorothy, the storm can't hurt you.” Then, after a moment, during which there probably came to Richard's mind the stories of disaster and destruction wrought by storms which he had heard, he added, “Anyway it can't hurt your soul!”

JESUS ON TRIAL.

John xviii. 12—xix. 16.

*One faith against a whole earth's unbelief,
One soul against the flesh of all mankind.*
—Lowell.

Picture: Ecce Homo, by Rembrandt (1607-1669).

The place is the palace of Herod the Great, on the west of the temple and connected with it by a viaduct, which was occupied by the Roman governor on his visit to Jerusalem. The time is Friday morning after the scourging of Jesus and just before the final giving of sentence. About the shoulders of Jesus is the purple robe given him in derision by the soldiers, and upon his head is the crown of thorns. The presence of a great crowd is shown, not merely by the sea of faces in front, but also by the gesticulations of the man who occupies an elevated position near the archway, and is evidently reporting the proceedings to a multitude that can neither see nor be seen. "The crowd are not even looking at Jesus, for Rembrandt well knew that such a multitude, in this state of violent excitement, would be incapable of fixing their attention upon anything. One face alone has apparently caught the suspicion that this is no common culprit. It is a hard-featured soldier near him who is wrapped in thought. These are the real Jews, and this is the real Pilate—vacillating, bending in indecision, with his expressive outstretched, self-excusing hands and false, temporizing face,—who has no chance before them. It is not so much the clutch on his robe by one, or the glaring eye and furious open mouth of another, or the old Jew hoary in wickedness, who threatens him with the fury of the multitude; but it is the dreadful earnest face, upturned and riveted on his, of the figure kneeling before him—it is the tightly compressed lips of that man who could not entreat more persistently for his own life than he is pleading for the death of the prisoner. Rembrandt has given to this figure the dignity, because the power of a malignant delusion; horribly fine." (Life of our Lord in Art, by Jameson, ii. p. 95.)

By whom was Jesus tried?—According to the accounts Jesus was tried before the Jewish courts, before Herod of Galilee, and also before Pilate, the Roman governor.

The story of the trial of Jesus varies so much in the different records that a detailed statement is necessary.

(a) Before Annas. This hearing is mentioned only by John (xviii. 12-23). Annas had been high priest (6-15 A. D.), and, although no longer in office, was a man of great prominence.

Caiaphas, the actual high priest, was his son-in-law. The account in John, however, is very puzzling: in verse 24 we must read "sent" as in the Revised Version, not "had sent" as in the Authorized Version; therefore the preceding narrative can relate only to an examination before Annas, who is called erroneously the high priest. John has only an allusion to Caiaphas, knows nothing of any meeting of the Sanhedrin, or indeed of any Jewish judicial tribunal, and alone among our sources makes mention of Roman soldiers at the arrest of Jesus. It may be true that Jesus was examined by Annas, but the account of that examination, given in John, cannot be authentic.

(b) A nocturnal meeting of the Sanhedrin at the house of Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi. 57-63; Mark xiv. 53-65). This was not a merely preliminary hearing, as it is often represented, but Matthew and Mark would clearly have us believe that it was a regular, decisive meeting of the Sanhedrin. Yet everything is against this view: (1) The place of meeting—that the chief court of Israel held this session not in its regular place of meeting ("upon the temple mount itself, on the western side of the inclosing wall"—Schuerer), but in the high priest's house, is quite incredible. (2) The time. It was contrary to the Jewish custom that the court should be held by night, and least of all would a session be held in the night during the early part of which the Passover was celebrated. (3) The forms of proceeding are un-Jewish. The traditional forms observed in capital cases are wonderfully scrupulous in favor of the prisoner: reasons for acquittal were to be heard before those for conviction, after speaking in favor of the accused no one was allowed to speak against him, although the converse was permissible. The student disciples were allowed to speak for, but never against, the defendant. A sentence of acquittal could be given on the same day with the trial, but one of condemnation could not be pronounced until the next day. Great care was exercised also in polling the court, that its younger members might not be influenced by the decisions of those who were older, etc. (Schuerer, i. ii. p. 194). Not one of these forms was observed in the trial of Jesus as related by Matthew and Mark, nor can it be said that in hate the Sanhedrin deliberately set aside its established usages. The probabilities are altogether against such a supposition, and we are forced to conclude that these reports of a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin are unhistorical.

(c) A morning meeting of the Sanhedrin (Matt. xxvii. 1; Mark xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66-71). Matthew and Mark merely mention the fact that in the morning a second meeting of the Sanhedrin was held. Luke, however, knows only of this session, but most of the objections already presented in (b) are valid against his narrative also.

Singularly, the story of the Fourth Gospel commends itself here as superior to that in the Synoptists. There are, of course, unauthentic details due to the author's, or editor's, exalted conception of Jesus: in Gethsemane, there is no human agony, the traitor's kiss is omitted; the company sent to arrest him are overawed by the majesty of his person and fall to the ground before him—yet here, as elsewhere, the Fourth Gospel seems to show signs of a perfectly historical tradition which has been worked over and put into form by another hand. There is a good deal of evidence to support the belief that in our Fourth Gospel we have a genuine Johannine tradition, which has been freely dealt with by a disciple of the apostle. It seems quite unlikely that there was a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin, and John is probably right in describing only an informal examination before a few chief men of the Sadducean party. Moreover John is probably right in introducing Roman soldiers at the time of the arrest. In the early years of the church, when its peace depended upon Rome, the tendency was to shift the blame for the death of Jesus from the Romans to the Jews. But we are compelled to believe that there can have been no formal action taken against him by the Jewish court. The truth probably is that a few of the leaders among the Sadducees, having no faith in Messianic ideas at all, angry at Jesus because of his conduct in the temple on "Palm Sunday," apprehensive of a popular Messianic outbreak at the Passover time, and desirous of gaining favor with Pilate, co-operated with the Romans in causing the arrest and death of Jesus. The so-called Jewish trials were nothing more than informal examinations conducted probably by Annas, Caiaphas and a few others. With this explanation of the alleged Jewish trials we may pass rapidly over the others.

(d) The first trial before Pilate (Luke xxiii. 1-7). This hearing was cut short by the mention of Herod's name, and Luke relates that Pilate, partly to rid himself of the responsibility for condemning a man in whom he found no fault, and partly to make friends with Herod, sent Jesus immediately to the tetrarch who had put to death John the Baptist.

(e) Trial before Herod. Luke alone knows of this trial (cf. Acts x. 27), and it seems to be only an attempt to implicate the Jews more deeply in responsibility for the death of Jesus.

(f) The second trial before Pilate. If we reject the Herod trial we may study the trial before Pilate as a whole. There are two points wherein all our authorities agree.

(1) Pilate did not wish to put Jesus to death (Matt. xxvii. 23; Mark xv. 10, 14; Luke xxiii. 4, 14, 22; John xviii. 38, xix. 4, 6, 12; Acts iii. 13). This is not incredible on the face of it, for when Pilate actually saw Jesus, who had probably been represented to him as a dangerous insurgent, he must have recognized at once that this was no mad stirrer-up of insurrections, and, therefore, his Roman instinct for justice would naturally lead him to discharge a simple, inoffensive man. Yet the accounts of his reluctance are certainly exaggerated: the story of his wife's warning dream and of his washing his hands that the responsibility might be transferred symbolically from himself to the Jews, can hardly be deemed historical. It is not likely, either, that he hoped by bringing Jesus before the people after his scourging to arouse pity for him. If Jesus was led forth at all it was probably intended as an insult to the Jew—Behold your king!

Pilate was a hard, cruel man, and it was only his love of justice that prompted his wish to release Jesus, but the outcries of the mob and their threats (John xix. 12) were too much for him and he yielded. In face of the accounts in the Synoptists that Jesus was silent before Pilate, answering only "Thou sayest" to his formal questions, we must reject the long and impressive interviews in John. Pilate was not awed by his prisoner; he saw in him only a quiet, harmless man.

(2) Pilate gave the Jews their choice between Barabbas and Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 15-26; Matt. xv. 6-15; Luke xxiii. 18-25; John xviii. 38-40; Acts iii. 24). It is not probable that any great number of people accompanied Jesus to the judgment seat of Pilate, but while the trial was going on in the open air, a crowd appeared (Mark xv. 8), asking that the usual custom of the feast be observed and a prisoner be released. Thinking to find an easy way out of his perplexity, Pilate proposed to set the "King of the Jews" at liberty, but the people knew comparatively little about Jesus, and there was a prisoner upon whom their hearts were set—Barabbas, whom they honored as a patriot (Mark xv. 7). Therefore Pilate's purpose was thwarted.

What was the charge against Jesus? — That he declared himself the Christ.

Matthew (xxvi. 60, 61) and Mark (xiv. 50-59) relate that Jesus was accused of threatening predictions concerning the destruction of the temple, but the latter adds that in this particular the testimonies did not agree. According to all the Synoptists, however, the decisive question was, Art thou the Christ, the Son of God? and it was Jesus' affirmative answer, coupled with a prophecy of his future glory, which settled his fate so far as his Jewish examiners were concerned. Those who deny that Jesus believed himself the Messiah, deny consistently the accuracy of this report; but from the view adopted in these lessons it stands unimpeached. Before Pilate the same charge is urged,—that he professed himself the Christ, the King of the Jews. We have seen that he had spoken and acted as the Christ, that his arrest was brought about by the co-operation of a few leaders among the Sadducees with the Romans on account of this claim, and therefore it is entirely natural that this should have been the charge on which he was condemned. If he had been a popular hero like Barabbas, ready to take the sword, he might have had a popular following which would have made his arrest and execution dangerous, but he was comparatively unknown in Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 10), and therefore the people were little interested in his fate. He was condemned to death.

Questions.

The Picture.—Does the face of Pilate exhibit the traits of his character as we know them? Do you like the face of Jesus in the picture? How has Rembrandt conveyed the impression of a great multitude? What is the scene of the picture? The time?

The Trial of Jesus.—What are the reasons for not believing that he was given a formal trial before the Sanhedrin? How was his arrest brought about? Recount the trials mentioned in the Gospels. What was the trial before Annas and Caiaphas? What are the two certain facts about the trial before Pilate? Why did Pilate wish to release Jesus? Why did the people prefer Barabbas to Jesus?

The Charge Against Jesus.—On what ground would the Sadducees object to Jesus as the Messiah? The Pharisees? What would be the attitude of the Romans toward one who avowed himself the Christ? Did Jesus really believe himself to be the Messiah, and if so, how did he understand the term?

Last and Most Important Question of All.—Is it just to say that the Jews as a people were directly responsible for the death of Jesus? Was there an indirect responsibility?

SUNDAY-SCHOOL ITEMS.

Mr. Albert Scheible has been elected Treasurer of the Western Sunday-School Society.

Rev. Joseph H. Cooke has consented to prepare the lessons in the fifth year of the six years' course—The Growth of Christianity.

A letter from the Unitarian headquarters, San Francisco, says of Mr. Gould's new book: "These 'Beginnings' are taking very well here; many—the writer included—consider them the best thing that has come out in the line of Sunday-school work for a long time."

A new edition of "Services and Songs for Sunday Schools," by J. Vila Blake, is just published. If any orders for this book have not been filled, will friends kindly notify us. For some time past we have been missing letters sent to this office. Hence this request.

Chas. H. Kerr & Company's New Holiday Books.

MORE THAN KIN.—By James Vila Blake. This is not a book of sermons nor of essays, nor is it a novel, yet it has some traits of all these. Its thoughts are grouped around a simple story of daily living, and through the book runs a consecutive study of kindness in its various phases. Altogether it is a book to read and reread, to take up at a moment of weariness for the delightful uplift it gives; to study as a text-book in the greatest of sciences, the science of living. 18mo. 334 pages, half cloth, $1.00; full cloth, two colors, $1.50.

AMBER BEADS.—Every one who reads the Chicago dailies will remember the bright paragraphs on every-day topics signed "Amber." In response to many requests, sixty-four of the best of these have been put into book form by the author. Mr. Lederer, the Chicago Herald artist, has designed the cover. There is a pretty edition in paper at 50 cents, and one in cloth at $1.00.

ELSIE; A Christmas Story.—Kjelland is the acknowledged prince of Norwegian writers of fiction. "Elsie" is his best story, and, strange to say, it has not been previously published in this country in the English language, though there is more than one Norwegian reprint. Mr. Miles M. Dawson has made a most pleasing translation, and the mechanical make-up of the book is unique and dainty. Cloth, 50 cents.

WHERE BROOKS GO SOFTLY, by Chas. Eugene Banks, with frontispiece by T. J. Nicholl, is one of the handsomest gift books of the season. The poems in this volume are simple and sincere, such as appeal to the hearts of the millions. Blue and white velum, gilt top, $1.50.

THE FAITH THAT MAKES FAITHFUL. This book of popular sermons by William C. Gannett and Jenkin Lloyd Jones has reached its twenty-second thousand, and is still in active demand. A heavy embossed paper cover has been substituted in the 50-cent edition for the less durable bond paper formerly used. Blessed be Drudgery, the first sermon in the book, which in various forms has reached a circulation of a hundred thousand, is now offered separately in a handsome edition, silk stitched, with rough white cover, suitable for water color decoration, at 10 cents a copy, or $1.00 a dozen.

Any book published by us will be mailed promptly on receipt of price. Catalogue free.

Notes from the Field

THE TIME-SPIRIT AT WORK.

The announcement which follows is taken from the Ketchum Keystone, of Alturas County, Idaho. Elsewhere in the same paper it appears that Mr. Gillette is to give a course of Sunday evening lectures on the Great Historical Religions of the World, treating them under studies of "Seven Great Religious Teachers." It is perhaps still farther significant of the religious breadth of the locality that these lectures are to be interrupted on the first Sunday of each month, because then services are to be held in "Union Church."

THE FIRST FREE CHURCH OF KETCHUM, IDAHO—TEMPORARY.

Based on the principle of unconditional freedom in religion, the principle by which the World Church is now growing that will unite men of all races and creeds.

OBJECT OF THE FREE CHURCH.

Standing for growth in religious thought, as against fixed creeds, which, having cradled nobly the human race in religion, are now alienating increasing thousands from organized religious life, the World Church recalls all to religion. Under it the unchurched return to fellowship and organized good-works, in the glad freedom of growing thought as deep as religion and wide as science. It points men to the depths of a divine nature in them, which calls to higher life: and which, under freedom, must lead to ever clearer knowledge that what we call religion is profoundly natural to human nature, and deeply necessary to unfold men to growth in higher life. It teaches that religious revelation is something not miraculous, or of the past alone, as told in Bible or other good book, but that it is of the present, of the sacred here and now in our very nature!—an ever present revelation in the soul of man: that we have a perpetual "religion by revelation to us" if we but recognize it in conscience, history, science and eternal beauty around us. The Free Church teaches that man is divine in essence and purpose, and through strenuous endeavor, with joys, errors, suffering, peace, sin and repentance, he is to work out a divine and immortal destiny.

FELLOWSHIP OF THIS SOCIETY.

With no questioning of one's beliefs and unbeliefs, but to sympathy and perfect freedom in the study and pursuit of all duty and truth and love, and to a fellowship of hopes and hands in the doing of good and the building of the soul's beauty, this society calls those who will join in its purpose, and invites all who desire to hear its message.

Place of meeting, at the Unity Club-rooms, on Main street.

FREDERICK K. GILLETTE,
Minister and Lecturer for Winter of '93-4.

Chicago.—A JEWISH COLLEGE SETTLEMENT has been opened within a fortnight at No. 178 Maxwell street, by Messrs. Jacob J. Abt and Jesse Lowenhaupt, as residents, with the co-operation of a number of Jewish collegians and other public-spirited citizens, including Miss Jane Addams and a number of the Hull House workers, and several of the most prominent rabbis of the city, Drs. Hirsch, Moses, and Stoltz; the latter of whom may in a sense be regarded as the father of the movement, since it was his lecture; on "The Chicago Ghetto" subsequently published in The Reform Advocate, which led to the enterprise.

Chicago, Ill.—The Liberal Ministers' League will resume their sessions for the winter on the 18th of this month, at the Wellington Hotel, where a private dining-room will be reserved for the accommodation of the members and their guests. Rev. W. W. Fenn of the First Unitarian Church, will read a paper.

Geneva, Ill.—The Unity Club of the Geneva church, under the leadership of its minister, Mrs. Celia P. Woolley, has undertaken work in two sections—Fiction and Social Science, each section meeting fortnightly on alternate weeks. In the department first mentioned Romola and Ivanhoe are discussed, and those who have had the pleasure of using one of Mrs. Woolley's guide books in such work need not be told that the treatment will be full and suggestive. The program for the sociological section deserves the attention of all who are contemplating such work, especially for its introduction. The subjects to be discussed are: What is Social Science? Primitive Society; Marriage and the Home; The City; Communistic Phases of the Ancient Religions; Man's Ownership of Man—The Feudal System; Man's Equality with Man—The English Constitution; The Church as a Factor in Social Evolution; Puritanism and Democracy; Social Theorists, French,—Rousseau, Fourier, Comte; German Social Theorists,—Marx and Lassalle; English Social Theorists,—John Stuart Mill, Arnold Toynbee, Herbert Spencer; Modern Theories,—Single Tax, Nationalism, Anarchism; Social Science and Modern Industrial Problems.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—The Unitarian church at this place has a full program. From the 22d of October to the middle of December, Mr. Sunderland preaches morning and evening, and in addition to the Sunday school, Ladies' Union, King's Daughters, Unity Club (which is the entertainment branch of the church, providing a course of miscellaneous lectures, musical entertainments and socials), and Library and Reading Room, it is proposed to establish a Young Men's Guild, to be composed of the liberal young men of the university and city, the purpose of which shall be the promotion of practical religious and philanthropic work. One of the most interesting features of the year's work is Mrs. Sunderland's Bible class, which this year takes up Religious Denomination,—including not alone the best known of the older sects of Europe and America, but also the Salvation Army, and the movements known as Spiritualist, Theosophical, Christian Science, and Ethical Culture.

Janesville, Wis.—In a recent sermon, which has since been published, Mrs. Sophie Gibb spoke as follows of the Parliament and the Fair:

I think my hearers will join in the estimate if I say we have just passed through one of, if not the most marvelous summer in the history of our nation. Perhaps some seasons of the war were more thrilling or intense, but not more decisive as to many deep underlying interests of life. This has been a year of marvelous speech and deed, but of more tremendous and widespread thought. Battles by bullet and sword show many enemies slain, red fields of carnage and triumphant banners; but the battle of ideas is a silent warfare. Though the struggle is great, there remain no fields of blood and tears, but the effect is in tremendous thought-waves that produce silent but sure revolution. The experiences of this summer of 1893 have been of such a nature as to challenge the best effort of brain and heart to account for its scenes, its deeds, assemblies, prophecies, hopes, and aspirations.

We have been obliged to surrender meager estimates of the value and breadth and meaning of life—of the relation of nations and the divided interests of men, and what, perhaps, many favorite notions of religion, of the immense value of one faith over the many. We may well believe that much narrowness of thought has been broadened, and many unworthy ideas rendered, without necessary confession of the same, and that as a whole, the people have more thoroughly organized thought toward progress, and the general betterment of the world. The will of the many, when condensed as a single purpose, or desire, especially if it be high and noble, does tend to sweep evil from its moorings and produce reform.

Arcadia, Wis.—Rev. T. G. Owen has resigned his ministry at Neilsville and returned to his work at this place, much to the joy of the people of Arcadia.

Humboldt, Ia.—The Unity Club of this place sends us a program from which we extract the following statement: "Unity Club, during the season of 1893-94, will study Geology and Social Science. Each evening's program will open with a roll-call and a response with an item of news, or a fact pertaining to either of the branches of the season's work. A geological paper not exceeding twenty minutes in length will be read by some member of the Club. Then will follow, under the leadership of Dr. G. Hardy Clark, a class exercise in the study of Mineralogy, given after the manner of an object lesson, with a specimen in the hand of each member of the class. It is hoped that the papers in Geology will state clearly and briefly the facts concerning the evening's topic and that alone. Opportunities for original thought will more readily be found in the other branch. Geikie's text-book is the work which the leader has most freely used in preparing his outlines in Geology, and it is desirable that each member have access to this or some equally good work on the subject. In Social Science there will be given at each meeting a paper not exceeding fifteen minutes in length, which will serve as an introduction to the half-hour discussion which will follow, and in which all are invited to participate. The entertainment section will interfere in no way with the regular work of the Club. All are cordially invited to work with us, and it is hoped that those accepting invitation will attend regularly."

From the program it appears that both subjects are to be discussed at the same time and place,—a somewhat unusual procedure: and we are interested to learn how it will work.

Philadelphia, Pa.—An interesting report comes to us of the "Evening Home and Library Association," Unitarian Chapel, located at Chestnut and Aspen streets, which at an annual expenditures of about $2,000 is carrying out a number of helpful works for the young people of the vicinity, including a manual training school, a library, a night school, in which individual instruction is given to a few of the older boys and young men who are unusually deficient in knowledge of one or all the common English branches, a coffee room, a cooking school and a stamp savings bank. The Hugh Bellas fund of $5,000 forms the basis of this work; for the rest voluntary subscriptions are relied upon.

Bedford, Mass.—We have received a handsome program of the service of installation by which Rev. Oliver Jay Fairfield was inducted into the First Parish of Bedford. Rev. Charles F. Dole preached the sermon, Rev. Grindall Reynolds gave the charge to the minister, Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke that to the people, Rev. B. R. Bulkeley gave the right hand of fellowship, Mr. Wm. H. Baldwin, President of the Young Men's Christian Union, of Boston, gave an address to the young, and other parts were taken by Rev. Carlton A. Staples, Rev. Edwin Smith, and Rev. James Salloway; Mr. Arthur C. Buttrick, of Boston, sang Schloesser's "He That Keepeth Israel."

THE COMMITTEE ON FELLOWSHIP OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

Mr. C. D. Chunn, a graduate of the Yale Theological School, having sustained a thorough examination covering all points bearing upon his qualifications for the work of the Unitarian ministry; and having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship that he is in all respects worthy of their approval, is hereby commended to the fellowship of our ministers and the confidence of our churches.

Count Up

the number of times you have to rub a garment to get it clean; multiply it by the number of garments washed in a year.

Then you can see just how many back-breaking rubs Pearline will save you, annually. You don't do the washing yourself? That doesn't make any difference. You need Pearline just the same. Every one of these tiresome rubs is wear and tear on the things that are washed. They suffer, even if you don't. Hundreds of millions of packages of Pearline have been consumed. Think of the number of useless and harmful rubs that have been saved to the women of America.

Beware
Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

GIFT BOOKS.

"Afloat and Ashore," By EDWARD EVERETT HALK, king among patriotic story writers. A capital story for Boys, in his best vein. The New York Sun calls it "A remarkably natural and interesting tale."

"In the City by the Lake," By BLANCH FEARING. A beautiful Souvenir of the World's Fair City. The two idyls of Chicago life in this volume, "The Shadow" and "The Slave Girl," really two divisions of one narrative, are full of thrilling interest, and contain vivid descriptions of real scenes and places about the giant metropolis of the West. The author has clothed the near and now with the dignity and beauty which other writers bestow upon things and people which have become history and myth. Even so unpoetical a thing as the Chicago River is touched poetically. Holiday edition bound in white and gold. No lovelier Christmas gift for your friend who has visited the World's Fair City, or who would like to have visited it but was unable. Dark cloth binding, $1.25; white and gold, $1.35.

"Art, Music and Nature," consisting of choice selections compiled by Mary E Pratt from the writings of PROF DAVID SWING, together with his portrait. The Inter Ocean calls it "A collection of literary gems in the highest and best sense of the term." Chicago Mail: "The work will find its way to popularity." New Orleans Picayune: "Charming in its make up, and printing and binding all that could be desired." Bound in white, green and gold. Price $1.

"Letters to a Little Girl," By MRS. HELEN E. STARBETT. A series of letters embodying, with all the charm of a story, important suggestions as to conduct, morals and manners. Miss Haskell, Principal of Monticello Seminary pronounces it "the book that all little girls should have." A boon to mothers and teachers. A great favorite with both young and old. Cloth, tastefully bound, with admirable portrait of the author, $1.25.

"Mother Goose's Christmas Party," by ABBY MORTON DIAZ. An ingenious story in rhyme. A charming gift for a child, or just the thing for amateur entertainments. Leading roles appropriate either for adults or children. Handsomely printed and bound in white, 50 cents; pamphlet edition, $1.50 per dozen.

Send 2 cents for circular of each book and complete catalogue to

SEARLE & GORTON, Publishers,
McCormick Block, Chicago.

ONE DOLLAR

Will buy that Entertaining and Safe Book,
A SLUMBER SONG,

by NINA LILLIAN MORGAN. An exquisite prose story for young people. Rev. Joseph Adams says of it: "If financially able, I would not hesitate to distribute gratuitously a million copies." Price, $1.00; white and gold, $1.25.

If you wish to spend less money for choice literature, send for THE ROSE BY THE KING'S DAUGHTER, by MAUD MENEFEE. A collection of charming allegories about plant life. The Sunday-school Times says "they have the Hans Andersen quality." Popular with all lovers of Nature, teaching morality by infusion. Price, 40 cents.

SLY AND HIS NEIGHBORS, by FRANCES POWER COBBE, best known of the English women writers. Powerfully written and embodying facts. Absorbingly interesting to young and old. The Chicago Times says of it: "Written with acute insight and obviously con amore." Illustrated. Price 50 cts.

ZAZ, by RUTH HAYS. Eloquenty written and an inspiration to patriotism. The Chicago Globe says of it that the author shows she "understands the art of telling a good story." Specially forceful in its character drawing. Read by young and old with equal delight. Price 40 cents.

GYPPY, by HELEN E. STARBETT. A very popular dog story that has at once become a classic. The St. Paul Pioneer Press says: "it will win its way into the hearts of all dog lovers." Illustrated. Price 50 cents.

OLD GRIP, THE CROW, by OLIVE THORNE MILLER. The "Black Beauty" of bird life. A crow's autobiography—humorous, pathetic, scientifically true. The Cupbearer calls it a story "all little folks will want to read. Get this book for the boys." Illustrated. Price 50 cents.

The Parliament of Religions.

Two New Works by JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

THE SEVEN GREAT RELIGIONS.

"The Lovers of the Light are One."

- I. Moses.
- II. Zoroaster.
- III. Confucius.
- IV. Buddha.
- V. Sokrates.
- VI. Jesus.
- VII. Mohammed.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

Mr. d Alexander Russell Webb Editor of the Modern World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Apropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

In some cases the stock is limited.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

New Occasions.

The Inter Ocean of November 4th says:

"Chicago has an admirable new magazine in the New Occasions, a monthly edited by Mr. B. F. Underwood, the noted editor and lecturer. The November issue is only the sixth number, but already it has impressed itself upon the more thoughtful of the reading public as a periodical of exceptional value. Mr. Underwood has found his title in the lines from Lowell's poem, 'The Present Crisis,' which run:

"New occasions teach new duties: time makes ancient good uncouth.

They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of truth.

"The magazine is devoted to the immediate questions of the hour—social, industrial, and political. Its contributors include the more able of thinking men and women, and Mr. Underwood's own vigorous, liberal, and profoundly interesting treatment of the topics most closely related to the life of the day is a valuable contribution to contemporary thought.

"Seldom has a new claimant for public attention so ably substantiated its claim for attention as does the New Occasions."

Beginning with the December number, each issue of "New Occasions" will contain one of the new series of lectures on "Life and the Conditions of Survival," prepared under the auspices of the Brooklyn Ethical Association. The lecture in the December number is by Dr. Lewis G. Janes, on Cosmic Evolution as Related to Ethics. Ten cents a number, $1 a year. Book catalogue free. Charles H. Kerr & Co., Publishers, 175 Monroe street, Chicago.

*Yea, Truth and Justice then
Will dawn return to men, Orbed in a rainbow; and, like glories wearing,
Mercy will sit between,
Throned in celestial sheen,
With radiant feet the tissued clouds down steering.
And Heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall.*

—Milton.

AS MOST of the Sunday schools to which UNITY goes have a special service on the Sunday before Christmas, we have omitted Mr. Fenn's lesson this week in order to make this a Christmas number.

THE patience of those who have been long looking for the promised Chorus of Faiths will be rewarded eventually. Delays, scarcely unforeseen, have interfered with its publication until this week. Those in near contact with the office will probably see it before Christmas morning. To the others we trust it will possess an interest not destroyed by the passing holiday excitement.

**

A NOTE of greeting comes from Mr. Hosmer, who is stopping for a few days at La Junta, Colo. He went forth from us to rest, and the thought that he was resting was some consolation for his absence. But we find he has been preaching and lecturing at La Junta and at Omaha, where he stopped for a week or two on his way to Colorado. Doubtless his word will be appreciated wherever it is uttered, but we hope he will not forego the rest he went forth to seek. We trust he is not like Holmes' Culprit who got so fond of the treadmill that when discharged he had "a treadmill of his own." His wisdom and devotion are so needed in our larger work that we are jealous of any smaller call upon it.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW, of Des Moines, Iowa, contains the following note about the two Hindu lecturers who recently spoke there. It would seem that the line between conservative and reformer is so strong that the Orthodox Christian at once shows a preference for the Orthodox Hindu over the representative of the Brahma Somaj:

The presence of a number of the clergymen of Des Moines was noticeable at at least one of the Vivekananda lectures. The absence of the ministers was equally noticeable at the Nagarkar addresses. Vivekananda was very bitter—some would say almost insulting—in some of his references to Christian preachers. Nagarkar was courteous to a degree that would have caused the ministers to warm to him—had they been present. These gentlemen missed a good deal, in the opinion of the laity, by not getting into the Indian atmosphere that for a couple of weeks has been hovering over Des Moines.

IN a sermon discussing the influence of the late Prof. Tyndall on religious thought, Rev. S. M. Crothers quoted some words from the scientist which are full of suggestions:

Spirit and matter have been presented to us in rudest contrast, the one all noble, the other all vile. But is this correct? Does it represent what our mightiest spiritual teacher would call the eternal fact of the universe? Suppose we had been impregnated with the notion of the poet Goethe instead of the notion of the poet Young, and had looked upon matter not as brute matter, but as the living garment of God. Would not then our attitude to religion be different? In many profoundly thoughtful minds such a revolution has already taken place. They degrade neither of the mysterious duality, but they exalt one of them from its abasement, and repeal the divorce between them.

A TWO VOLUME history of the Congress of Representative Women is promised. If this is to be a private venture edited so as to introduce the personal equation of its editor, its appearance is to be regarded as only the second best thing. What we want here as in the other congresses, first, is the raw material, without note or comment, from which the reader or subsequent editors will draw their own conclusions. The world will not hold the management guiltless if they permanently neglect to secure the full publication of the important series of meetings held under the auspices of the Columbian Exposition, without omissions or manipulations. The Board of that Exposition or the Congress of the United States should see to it, before it is too late, that the records are preserved.

IN discussing the propriety of a creed for the Ethical Societies in The Conservator, its editor, Mr. Traubel, speaks wisely, as follows:

A creed would break us to fragments over-night. What could the creed be? If a creed on labor, why not a creed on everything? . . . Dr. Coit argues that it is impossible to think that men holding two such opposed philosophies as, for instance, that of the single tax and that of private land-ownership, that of our present industrial system and that of the socialistic regime proposed as its substitute, should ever come together and remain as if working for a common cause. It is as if you expected two engines driving toward each other on the same track to save themselves from wreck or collision. But Dr. Colt is in error. While it is true that there are capitalists and workmen too angry and stupid to come to any understanding, there are others out of both classes who are willing to be questioned, and who agree that there are factors in the social fabric to be modified. There are workmen who do not proclaim all men of wealth robbers, and there are rich men who do not call workmen mudsills or anarchists.

A dozen men of equal power and equal fairness of mind, looking at a problem in sociology, will, ten chances to one, promulge twelve different theories by which to untie the knot. Organize these men into an ethical society. What can they do? Their work will witness to the world the advent of a fresh principle. They will investigate with ardor, they will search the wilderness, they will compare notes and mutually aid each other. The goal for all is truth. The lines of travel may differ, but they will converge. . . . What we need to acknowledge is the necessity of movement, the imperious declaration of growth, and the vital over-arching dictates of mental, moral, and physical integrity. . . . The societies must not promise to solve problems, but to speak for the spirit through which they may be solved. The individual will exercise his endeavor toward solution, and will gather ever new courage from the impress of his enlarged sympathies.

The italics are ours. These words have an application broader than the policy of the fraternity of Ethical societies.

Christmas Perplexities.

The complexities of modern life are alarming when they are not inspiring. The distractions of our day are made up of unappropriated blessings. What might discipline often defeats. The air is full of unuttered greetings and tremulous anticipations. Shop windows are burdened with the sweet temptations of the Christmas-tide. The evergreen serves trade before it is utilized by religion. It decorates the temples of commerce before it lends its suggestive presence at the altar. The glad Christmas time is upon us; but the times are also upon us which forbid gladness, rebuke jollity, and shame extravagance. Following hard upon our Exposition triumph and the national pride engendered by the same comes the humiliation of want, the pain of suffering, and the widely advertised fact that destitution in its grimmest form broods over the cities of our land. It is easy to enter into the Christmas joys. It would not be difficult to plead for pity in the interests of the suffering. The difficult task is to combine these two. Every child feels the pain of divided inclinations. The hoarded pennies that were meant to give joys at the home circle are wanted to make tolerable the Christmas in the home of some destitute laborer in their neighborhood, whose children will go to bed hungry and will wake up cold. It is a pity to let a single Christmas pass by without ringing the bells that speed the message of love and joy throughout the world. It would be a crime to turn a deaf ear to this cry of want at a time dedicated to the memory of the great helper, he who came to serve. How can we do these two things: make glad the hearts of the dear ones in the home circle, preserve the traditions of the merry Christmas tide at the fireside? at the same time walk through our sorrow-burdened streets with a clear conscience and an honest mind, and a heart responsive and sweet towards the less fortunate children not of our fireside?

We must do more than ring the changes on Bible texts. We must be careful lest our carolings become mockery, and our congratulations hollow. And we must be careful also lest our lives that should still move in radiance be draped in gloom, and the soul whose strength is measured by its buoyancy be handicapped by sorrow and distrust. The times are hard. On that account our hearts should be the more tender. Money is scarce. Let love be more abundant. How can we rise to this high adjustment?

A writer in the New York Herald of last year said that Paris requires forty thousand Christmas trees annually, but that the City of New York needed three times forty thousand, one hundred and twenty thousand, trees to supply its Christmas market; great cargoes being shipped all the way from Maine; while Maryland is in danger of losing from its forests entirely the beautiful, winsome, but slow-growing holly, because so many of the young trees are cut down or denuded for the Christmas market. This is one of the vandalisms of civilization, like unto that which is making extinct the buffalo, the deer, the wild turkey, and the prairie chicken in order that young gentlemen may perfect themselves in marksmanship and know the delights of killing; and that other, sadder vandalism which has denuded Florida of its birds of brilliant song and feather in order that women may decorate their hats with their cast-off plumage. This Christmas tree, in its developed American form, has become a thing of marvelous contrivance. Letting alone the small inventions covered by profitable patents in the way of Christmas tree candle-sticks, candles and tinsel, we read of a special Christmas-tree electric lamp with a complete system of wiring, and of trees arranged so that they revolve by electrical power; while the fruit of this tree has become so costly that it has become the center of the shop-keeper's expectations. The Christmas trade is the retailer's harvest. He begins to get ready for it in July, is content if during the rest of the year he barely pays expenses. The profit of his holiday trade, as he calls it, will make a respectable balance sheet for the year. If any one would know the commercial tendencies of the age, measure the money-spending appetite even of temperate and sober Americans, let him try if he can to get at some of the figures of the money invested this week in the non-essentials, the luxuries, aye, the extravagances and curses of life, under the guise of Christmas presents. How few will remark the irony,—a Christ-mass, a celebration of the lowly born, a festival of the peasant prophet, a commemoration of the stable scene, where in poverty, obscurity, and neglect was born that teacher who through life "had not where to lay his head," and who enforced his message of plain living, simple service, with a martyr's death. Ask our dry goods men, our furriers, jewelers, and book-sellers how your people honor the meek and lowly Nazarene and his birth celebration. They will tell you,—in costly attire, expensive jewelry, sumptuous books so elegantly bound that they will always be too nice to handle. But worse than this are the absolutely demoralizing fruits of the Christmas tree, the many costly cigar cases, and other implements and appurtenances of the nasty and expensive habit, the wine glasses, the sumptuous though vulgar articles of apparel that will reveal the vacant minds and silly ambitions of the young men who ape the English of it and the young women who reflect the Parisian modes in the weeks immediately following Christmas. There was an ostentatious note in a recent paper from a man who announced that he and his wife had agreed to cut down one-half of their family Christmas presents this year on account of the suffering in our city, and so sent his check for one hundred dollars to the relief committee. What about that other hundred dollars? Would it be a very great sacrifice if most of that had gone, too? Would the assurances of mutual love be less real, Christmas kisses be less sweet, the home fireside seem less cosy, and the abundance of the family heard be less appreciated? If the superfluities of life on the one hand were transferred wisely to the miseries of the other, our land would have a Christmas celebration more joyous than it has ever yet known. It would be a merry-making more abundant than the hearts of America have ever dreamed. Folks are starving, shivering in ill-fed and ill-clothed bodies, this week, within three miles of this place. Bear that in mind when you go to do your Christmas shopping this week. It may be hard on the retail stores, but it will be joy somewhere else. How are we to meet the miseries of the city? By raising ourselves to that plane of high thinking that will make plain living delightful. He is the happy man to-day who might have lived in a mansion but preferred to stay in the cottage that he might have the margin of difference in expense with which to ameliorate the severities of life. She is the happy woman who can afford to dress like a princess but prefers the artistic simplicity that is within reach of the mechanic's wife; for she has a margin of strength, time and purse to do something with. Two strains of inheritance belong to the American life of to-day, the value of which is immeasurable. The Quaker simplicity of the Pennsylvania heredity and the Puritan self-denial of New England. Happy is the life that, released from the narrowness of the creed and the tyranny of the form that bound these fore-elders of American life, still retains that love of simplicity, the habit of self-control, the potency of reserved force, of directed energy, which was their glory and the secret of their power.

In the face of the misery of to-day, then, it becomes us to prune our extravagance, to cut off our superfluity, to curb our indulgence, that the hungry may be fed and the naked be clothed and the ignorant be taught. Last week there were at least three saloons closed in Chicago, because poverty had reduced the patronage so that the proprietors could not pay their license money. How about the wine bills at the club houses of Chicago? the people who live east of Wabash avenue? Have they cut down their liquor bills? The tobacco indulgence of Chicago would carry abundance to the table of every worthily unemployed man in this city, and these Christmas days are good days to think about that. The noblest Christmas present you can make your wife, your children, yourself, is to dedicate this indulgence money to the cause of the suffering at once, renovating thereby the besooted chambers of your own lungs and making glad the indolent wall of somebody's else stomach.

At some other time we may have another word to say of this Christmas perplexity.

A Ministry of Thought by a Prophet of the Rational Faith.

We promised last week to give to our readers in this issue some further particulars of the life and death of our beloved yoke-fellow, John C. Learned. Through the kind assistance of his son, Henry Barrett Learned, we are able to give the following sketch, all too meager, were it not that the man was so well known and so much beloved that a fuller sketch seems scarcely necessary. Mr. Learned was descended in the eighth generation from William and Goodith Learned, the first of the name who came to America, probably in 1638. His ancestors were sturdy New England men, active in the war and peace activities of their times. Our friend was the second child of Calvin Learned and Hannah Dunster Barrett, and was born in Dublin, New Hampshire, August 7, 1834. His mother died before he was four years old and the child was brought up under a step-mother's care. John's boyish days were spent in hard work on the farm during the summers and attending the district school in the winter. He early came under the influence of the venerable Dr. Levi W. Leonard, who for thirty-five years was pastor of the Unitarian church in Dublin village. He was a scholarly man, a graduate of Harvard, a lover of books, a cultivator of flowers, a guide and friend to children. This friend of the boy furnished illustration to the man when in 1889 he published in the Christian Register a sketch entitled "Some Qualifications of a Unitarian Minister." By the time the young man was twenty-two years old he had taught several terms of district school and had already acquired the habit of high reading and close study. At this time a severe illness drove him westward, in company with an invalid companion, who soon died in Southwestern Missouri,—the young friend who was left carving with his own knife the headboard that enabled him years afterward to identify the spot and to return the sacred dust to the Eastern home. In 1856 our young man opened the "Ozark High School, for male and female," in Greene County, Missouri. Only those who know from experience and observation what a vital center of mental and moral life the old pioneer academy was in the early days of the West can form any estimate of the influence such a young man could and did exert, and the uneffaceable impression he left behind him. He had eighty-six pupils the first term, and taught everything, we suspect, from the multiplication table to the Greek grammar. The academy continued with marked success for two years and a half; through it Mr. Learned laid the foundations of tender friendships that continued to his dying day. Two days after his death a postal card was received from a small town in Arkansas. We are permitted to quote a sentence or two because they so touchingly connect the boy school-master on the frontier with the honored pastor of the metropolis, interpreting the intervening thirty-seven pregnant years:

KIND TEACHER: I have written two letters to you since receiving your last, but as I am anxious to hear from you I write this. . . . How are the children getting along educationally? Did you go to the World's Fair? Tell me lots of news. With regards to all, I am,

In the summer of 1859 Mr. Learned was again in the East, pursuing his studies. He passed his examination for Dartmouth College, but his life's work loomed before him. He was already twenty-five years of age, and instead of the college he entered the Harvard Divinity School, from which he graduated in 1862 in a class in which James de Normandie, Frederick May Holland and Samuel B. Stewart were members. After graduation Mr. Learned and Mr. Stewart spent six months in traveling abroad, not before the latter had accepted a call to the Unitarian Society at Exeter, N. H., which work he took up May 8, 1863. Next year he was married to Miss Tercelia Wakefield, of Reading, Mass. Six and a half happy years were spent in this academy town, where the example of his old preceptor, Dr. Leonard, brought forth fruit; and again we have a pastor who is a lover and cultivator of flowers, an inspirer and guide to young men and women, a minister of culture, and thereby all the more a minister of character.

But inherited tendencies already began to reveal themselves, and he had to flee the inhospitable climate of New England. He resigned his charge and came westward, leaving wife and two babies behind, not knowing what was in store for him, not doubting but what there was work for him somewhere. A year before a small band, an offshoot from Dr. Elliot's society in St. Louis, had built for themselves a little chapel in the newer part of the city. They were prompt to discover their man. On Easter day, 1870, began the auspicious pastorate which lasted through nearly twenty-three eventful, fertile and happy years. Of his work during these twenty-three years it is hardly necessary for us to speak. From his platform many of the leading voices of our country have been heard. In that modest chapel the great questions of the day, the deathless Scripture of all religions, the inspiring words of modern poet and prophet have been studied. His Unity Club, organized in 1883, was the first, so far as we know, to lay hold of Sunday evening as an opportune and providential time for mutual study of high classics. During the ten years of its life it has studied in successive seasons the writings of Emerson, Browning two years, Homer, Wordsworth, Shelley, Milton, Dante, and the Old Testament, and before us lies the program for the current year, which returns to Browning again,—twelve Sunday evenings' studies running fortnightly from October to March.

From 1878 to 1886, Mr. Learned was regularly connected with the Washington University as a teacher of metaphysics and political economy, taking the classes from the overburdened shoulders of the chancellor, Dr. Eliot. Last year again we find him back at work in the university as instructor in philosophy and political economy. His loyalty and zeal in this college task probably hastened his death.

On Sunday, Nov. 19, he took to his bed ill from a severe cold following swift upon a protracted attack of la grippe. The vulnerable spot in the otherwise magnificent body was soon found, and pneumonia, the "good angel" which he had often predicted would come and take him before the useless days would be reached, laid hold of him, and on Friday, Dec. 8, he breathed his last with his loving wife and three noble children at his side and a great city to mourn him. Mr. Learned was a diligent student of the best books. One said, "You were sure to find one or more of the latest things worth reading on his table." For eight years he was a member of the Board of Management of the Public Library, serving one half the time as Vice President, the remainder as President, two years as Chairman of the Book Committee. His records show that he solemnized one hundred and thirty-four marriages, officiated at two hundred and nine funerals, blessed the little ones in one hundred and eighty-two baptisms. Mr. Learned was for twenty continuous years Director of the Western Conference; much of that time he was also an active worker with the Sunday-school society. His leading of the second Summer Institute at Tower Hill and the course of lessons for the second year of the six years' course are fresh in the minds of our readers. And his contributions at Conferences innumerable, East and West, great and small, have become a necessary part of the history of Unitarianism and liberal thought in America.

An old and intelligent citizen of St. Louis said that he had never seen in that city so large an audience of such a high grade of character as that which assembled in the Church of the Unity at 2 o'clock on Monday, December the 11th. They came to pay their last tribute of respect to the faithful friend and great helper. The service was simple and brief. A couple of palm branches and a small cluster of white pinks were the only floral displays. On the platform sat Mr. Snyder, Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Gould, and Mr. Jones. The latter, his oldest comrade, yoke-fellow of twenty years in the work of the Western Conference Board and sixteen years on the editorial staff of UNITY, alone spoke.

How the memories rise, as we think of these twenty-three years' high warfare for freedom in religion and religion in freedom in the West. The present writer and Mr. Learned began their Western ministry in the same year, Mr. Learned beginning his work in April, Mr. Jones in June, 1870. What loving, loyal, and inspiring comradeship was that which rallied around the banner of the Western Unitarian Conference during these years. And now it must be sadly confessed that the old guard is gone. One by one have they fallen out by the way. The quaint and inspiring Herbert, the patient and unflinching Fisher, the gifted and splendid Maxon, and now John Learned, the reliable and the deliberate, have passed beyond. While Hunting, Miller, Effinger and Covell have laid down their active tasks as leaders of parishes; Hosmer, for the time being, has fled to the mountains "from whence cometh his strength," soon to renew, we trust, his active work among us; Gannett, removed beyond the old-time geographical limits, has laid down much of his responsibility here that he may take it up there; Simmons, the joy and inspiration of the Western Conference in his Wisconsin days, has become more and more imprisoned in his high work as pastor in the great metropolis of Minneapolis; and while the white-crowned patriarch of us all, once the mentor of the Western Conference, has just been receiving the congratulations of his seventieth birthday, as Robert Collyer of New York, not, alas, as the Robert Collyer of Chicago.

Surely this was a goodly company. Prophet souls were they, solicitous only that the truth might get full utterance; careless of consequences. We trust that they have fallen out by the way to make room for more competent banner-bearers. May their fellowship be as hearty, their comradeship as loving, their testimony as clear. Then through our tears we will try to sound the royal proclamation, "The King is dead! Long live the King!"

A Christmas Carol.

Not over great Jerusalem

Rested the mystic star of old,
But over little Bethlehem,
In holy legend we are told.

It passed the mighty of the earth,

The pride of wealth, the pomp of kings,

To mark a prophet's lowly birth,

And shame the scorn of common things.

Nor beat of drum, nor bugle cry

Announced the prophet's coming reign,

But "Glory be to God on high,

On earth be peace, good will to men."

The watching shepherds heard with awe,

And felt the brush of unseen wings,

While from afar the magi saw,

And joyful came with offerings.

Still go before us, mystic star,

Our dull and blinded eyes to clear,

We follow with the magi far,

And with the wond'ring shepherds hear.

Again the angel hosts draw nigh,

We sing with them the Christmas strain,

"All glory be to God on high,

On earth be peace, good will to men."

Christian and Atheist.

A STORY.

"I must ask you a plain question?"

"But," said the youth, hesitating in his reply, "I am afraid my answer would only bring trouble. I shall never force my opinions upon you."

"That may be, but I must know for myself. I wish an unequivocal answer. Into this relation I shall not go blindly. Do you believe in a personal God?"

The deep blue eyes of the young girl flashed. It was rather a large question to fall from two little red lips.

"Anna," said her lover, as the flush deepened upon his handsome cheeks,
"I have my convictions as well as you. Religion to me is the life-breath of the soul, out the thought-forms of religion, I plainly see, will perish.
The doctrine of a personal God will give place to the idea of moral impul-sion. The ethical authority of the universe—that to me is God!"

The young man evidently had his theory of religion.

"I could not pray to a moral idea."
Then again the blue eyes flashed their fire as she said, "I will never marry an atheist."

The young man's face grew pale,
as the words came low and stern:
"And I will never marry a bigot."

Thus a theologic quibble separated two fond lovers.

The maiden was serious, beautiful and intelligent. She was willing to forgive in her lover a certain amount of heresy: he might deride the doctrine of eternal pain, but she could not allow the denial of a personal God.

Her lover, though reared in an atmosphere intensely theological, had thought himself away from theology. He had come to think that no science of theology was possible, albeit a science of religion might be,
and he was as stubborn in his views
as Anna was in hers.

Anna passed her lover's home every morning on her way to the little district school, of which she was teacher, and occasionally, perforce, the lovers must meet. It was hard to pass each other with a cold bow. Things went on this way for a month or two.

Anna went to her church nearly every night, a revival was in progress, but never met her lover there, as he had ceased to attend the services.

Anna found that he had been cut socially by a number of the people.
He heard that the young minister who conducted the revival was very attentive to Anna. Their paths seemed rapidly to diverge.

Among the pupils who attended the district school was one of the larger boys, in whom Anna became much interested. He came from a family of very limited means, but it was evident that the intellectual thirst had awakened in him, and he had, if no brilliant powers, at least a sturdy persistence. (But is not persistence akin to genius?) He had been converted at the revival meeting then going on, which fact had deepened Anna's interest in him. She advised him to attend the neighboring High School, borrowing money to pay his board and tuition for a term or two. And the money she thought he could easily pay back by teaching district school in the winter. She thought that his class-leader or one of the well-to-do members of the church would lend him the money gladly. She encouraged him to try, and the boy set out, his face aglow with hope and joy.

Anna saw next day by his gloomy countenance that he had failed. The wealthy church member had turned away the boy with various pretexts.

But the next day he came early to the school house, his face all aflame, and told her he had the money.

"Who let you have the money?" inquired Anna.

The boy's eyes fell as he replied:
"He made me promise not to tell."

Anna congratulated her pupil, but wondered who his benefactor was.

Remaining after school was dismissed to put things to rights, she picked up an arithmetic that had fallen from a desk. As she laid it up a slip of paper fluttered to the floor. As Anna took up the paper she found it scribbled all over in a very stiff hand, with forms of prom-issory notes. One of these forms read in this way:

"One year after date, for value received, I promise to pay John Truman the sum of — with interest.

"CHARLES SAMPSON."

Her face turned scarlet, for, while Charles Sampson was the name of her favorite pupil, John Truman was the name of her lover. She knew now the name of the unknown benefactor.

That evening at the church the Rev. Mr. Singleton preached a per-fervid sermon on exaltation of faith.

After the service the minister and some of the members remained for a little chat, as was customary. The minister, who wanted the approval of the pretty school teacher, thought he saw a protest in her expressive blue eyes.

"That was a mighty strong sermon you gave us to-night, Brother Singleton. In these days o' works yer can't put on faith too thick." This remark came from Charlie Sampson's class-leader.

"But," said Anna, earnestly, "must not faith be joined with works?"

"Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," said the old class-leader.

"Yes," persisted Anna, "but to believe in Christ means to have a spirit of Christ, to copy his deeds. It is Christlikeness that saves us. Faith in Christ is goodness to one's brother, helping him"—here Anna hesitated, but finally blurted out—"to get an education if he is worthy and in earnest."

The old class-leader winced at this stroke, but growled out: "Morality is Godless."

"No," said Anna, "morality is God-full; service of man is worship of God," unconsciously using a phrase of her lover's.

"Be careful, Anna," said the young minister, coming to the help of his class leader, "be careful or you will be going over to the infidel's side."

The Rev. Mr. Singleton did not walk home with Anna that evening.
She walked alone, deeply pondering.
She had called her lover an atheist, but she herself had almost been called an infidel!

The next day the snow came down with ceaseless pour. Anna, finding no one to take her home, was plowing her way through the deep drifts.
A cutter, drawn by a gay-stepping horse, overtook her, and a voice whose tones were music said: "Why, Anna, this is too bad. You must let me take you home." She could not speak as she was lifted into the sleigh and tucked under the warm robes. John after a time even ventured to put a hand underneath the robes and clasp one of Anna's. It was not withdrawn.

"Anna," said John, "if I do not believe in a personal God I do believe in you."

"O John," sobbed Anna, "I am learning that sometimes atheist means Christian, and Christian atheist."
J. G. TOWNSEND.

The Golden Christmas Time.

Wherever sunshine smiles on earth,
Or murmuring waves their music pour,
Glad tidings of the Christ-child's birth
Will be repeated o'er and o'er.

The story is as welcome, then,
As some dear friend not seen for years;
It quickens all the sons of men
With gratitude that life endears!

From tall cathedral towers will sound—
Its melody of bells in tune,
While anthems float in bliss around—
As perfume haunts the heart of June.

In savage lands the news will spread,
And be to them a wonder-word,
Awaking souls as from the dead,
As seeds in spring to bloom are stirred.

By Ganges' banks, in India's clime,
Where babes were cast in offering wild,
Christmas renews the golden time
Of preciousness to every child.

In desert wastes, where Arabs rove
And only prize the baby boy,
As song of nightingale in grove,
Is told again sweet infant joy.

By Thames, by Rhine, by all the streams
That run thro' Christian lands afar,
There'll be the light of holy dreams—
Because of Christmas and its star.

Each little one will dearer be,
Since babe divine has made it dear,
And as the moon shines in the sea,
He will in them all bright appear.

The little waif that roams the street,
Homeless, neglected, poor, and lone,
Some tender kindness now will meet,
Whereby child-love to child is shown!

Rich songs will rise, and gifts of love
Be free as are the flowers of May;
Our earth will seem like heaven above,
On merry-hearted Christmas day!

Wherever feathery snow may fall,
Or breathes the rose in fragrance fair,
When Christmas comes on each to call—
He'll find the soul's sweet summer there!

WILLIAM BRUNTON.

M. J. Savage on the Value of Life.

I am one of those—I do not know that I have a great many companions—who believe that the gift of life, at least ninety-nine times in a hundred, is a good, and would be a good even if there were nothing beyond. I am grateful every moment of every day that I am alive,—no matter what is the end, no matter how much pain and disaster I may have to bear, no matter if I go into nothingness at the end. Even if these were the conditions, I should be glad that my eyes have opened even for a little while on this wonderful scene of the world under my feet and the heavens over my head. I would be glad that I had listened to the tones of music. I have had a half-hour of bird-song in a summer morning that would pay to overflowing for years of labor and pain. If you cannot estimate that kind of measurement, I am afraid that I cannot help you. I shall have to wait until you grow into an appreciation of it. Yes, I am glad that I am alive, no matter what the end is to be.

Correspondence

The Iowa State Conference.

EDITOR UNITY: May I ask for a little space in your columns to say a word or two about the recent conference in Iowa? In the report of that conference I stated that Mr. Forbush admitted that the American Unitarian Association gave money "where it was needless, and did more harm than good." Mr. Forbush writes me that he must have been misunderstood, as he did not intend to make that statement. It is quite true that he did not use the words of the report. What he said was that the association gave money where he did not think it advisable; or, to use his exact words, "It stood so upright that it leaned over backward." It was my inference that the money thus given, where he thought it unadvisable,—where the A. U. A. leaned over backward,—would do more harm than good. I knew that Mr. Forbush was employed especially to investigate the cases where help was asked, and I naturally assumed that his advice would be the wisest, and that money given more freely than he advised would be harmful, as notoriously is the case when help is given too lavishly.

But I am glad to set Mr. Forbush right with the readers of UNITY, and admit that I was wrong in assuming that his advice was the wisest. He writes me that the cases he had in mind when he said the Association overdid in the matter of giving—"stood so upright that it leaned over backwards"—were cases in which his advice had been disregarded and that of "local men" followed; and that in those cases no harm had resulted.

If I understand him rightly now, he wishes to say that, judging by results, the A. U. A. acted wisely in following the advice of "local men," when that advice differed from his own. But if this is what he means, I do not quite see why he should describe the Association as "leaning over backwards" in deviating from his advice. That description seems to assume that it stood upright only when following his advice, and therefore that his advice was the wisest.

But I will not venture again to infer a clear and consistent meaning from his words, lest I be called upon to retract once more. I will leave the readers of UNITY to infer any meaning they please, now that I have given them the revised version of his utterance.

There is, however, another word that I think it well to say about the matter touched upon in my report of the Iowa Conference. As Secretary of the Western Conference I feel it my duty to study the condition of the churches in our Conference; and if I find any obstacle to the harmonious action and free growth of those churches, I feel it my duty to point out that obstacle and try to remove it.

At the Iowa Conference I heard Mr. Forbush assert in his public address that the A. U. A. "leaned over backward" in its lavish benefactions to the churches of the West. And at the same time I heard the President of the State Conference report that they had returned the money given by the A. U. A. to their Conference, though that money had been so sorely needed for work that the people of the State had been urged to replace it at the sacrifice even of what are considered the indispensables of common life.

That seemed to me an unfortunate condition of affairs, when money was thus too lavishly given away in one quarter of our movement and thus sorely needed and yet not accepted in another quarter. I asked myself the cause of this lack of harmony, and the only answer I could find was that the Boston Association was regarded as an outside body and not an integral part of our organization. This answer was suggested to me by what the agent of that Association said about its feeling constrained to stand so upright that, in his opinion, it leaned over backward. And still more did its distrust of its own paid adviser and its rejection of his advice for that of the unpaid "local men" show that it felt itself and its agent outside of the organization here. Its separate headquarters, also, in a different part of the city, I found, was interpreted to mean that it did not recognize the local officers as the legitimate head of the movement in the West.

Now it does not really matter much whether this interpretation is right or wrong. The fact that it exists is a real obstacle to harmonious action and free growth here in the West. It seems to me that if the Boston Association really wishes to help this movement all it can, it must persuade the churches that it is acting as their representative head and not as an independent autocratic authority.

I am assured that it does wish to help the movement,—to be the representative of the churches,—and I am glad to believe that assurance. Its legal adviser informed me recently that some years ago it felt obliged by the words of its charter to refuse to give help to any organization that was not "pure Christianity," or to act through any organization that refused to be bound by those words. Of course that position would make it impossible for it to be the representative head of any growing body of independent churches and conferences. If we submitted to have our religion defined by the Boston Association, we should be assuming a new orthodoxy, to be felt as a galling yoke or explained away by juggling with words. But some of the directors of that Association tell me that now it is willing to help any free religious movement whether it call itself "pure Christianity" or not.

This latter position puts it now on practically the same level as our Western Conference. Two organizations, so nearly alike in objects, it seems to me, ought to be able to work in harmony. The churches of the Western Conference ought to be able to use the A. U. A. as its representative head, its publishing house, and its common hand for missionary work outside of the conferences. And the A. U. A. ought to be able to use the local officers for its agents and their offices for its headquarters. But that can be done only by a frank and cordial recognition of the complete autonomy of all the churches and all the conferences.

Perhaps I may be allowed to say a personal word in conclusion. I trust no one will think that I write this in any spirit of hostility to the Boston Association. I have only the most kindly feelings toward that brave organization which has so persistently striven to overtake its heretics. And I appreciate heartily the earnest desire of the men connected with it to do complete justice to the growing West, even though they have to "lean over backward," as their agent describes them as doing. And no one who knows me will think that I write to stir up strife. I have done all I could to allay needless strife since I have been connected with the movement, and I am trying now to remove the only cause of strife which I see remaining—the unfortunate attitude of the Association. I have no fears that anyone will think I am pleading for a position for myself. I did not accept my present post because I wished it, but because the friends of the movement thought they needed me, and I shall stay only as long as I think they need me. If my resignation would bring about harmony, I would gladly resign at once. But as long as I remain secretary I shall stand for the complete, uncompromising independence of every church and every conference. It would be far better for our movement to cut entirely loose from Boston than to yield one jot in our claim for freedom. We must be free—free to do our own work in our own way—or growth will cease and fossilization begin.

MR. HOSMER'S NEW CAROL.

Our Sunday school children will all be delighted to know that Mr. Hosmer has given us another Christmas carol. No poet of our little band understands so well as he how to touch the deepest thought in religion and still speak in the images of poetry and with a melody and rhythm that make the eyes of young and old kindle and their hearts to beat faster. This new carol will be found printed in full on another page. It was published and set to music in the English magazine of liberal faith called Light on the Way. We hope by another year to have copies of the carol with the music to use in our schools; but the poem itself will be excellent for the little ones to read or recite at their Christmas service.

HOME TRAVELS THROUGH BIBLE LANDS.

A little manual bearing this title has been prepared by Mr. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor, and published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society of Boston. It is tastily bound and beautifully printed, as nearly all the works issued by that society are. And its contents are quite up to the standard set by its mechanical excellence. In thirty-eight brief chapters it passes through Palestine, Assyria, Greece and Rome, in the footsteps of Bible writers. References are given to the best sources and a topic suggested for an essay or paper in connection with each chapter. The book is quite as well adapted to Unity work as to Sunday school studies, and can be safely recommended as the latest and best guide to those who wish an outline on this subject.

LESSONS ON THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

Mr. Fenn whom our Sunday Schools have learned to know and admire by his weekly lessons in the Six Years' Course, is also publishing a series of lessons on the book of Acts. Any school which wishes to study that interesting bit of doubtful Christian history will find the latest work of scholarship clearly set forth in those lessons. They are issued by the Eastern Sunday School Society, Mr. Fenn being broad enough to reach from East to West.

A Correction.

THROUGH an oversight of the proof-reader Rev. Joseph Cook was announced in the last number of UNITY as about to prepare the Fifth Year's lessons in the Six Years' Course of the Sunday School lessons published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society. We think no one would be more surprised at this announcement than Joseph Cook himself. It is quite certain that Rev. Joseph H. Crooker will, as he has agreed to do, provide us a more acceptable series of lessons on the Growth of Christianity than he of "Lady Macbeth's bloody hand" fame.

W. U. S. S. S.

The Western Unitarian Sunday School Society held its monthly meeting on Tuesday, Dec. 5. There were present President Gould and Messrs. Kerr and Scheible, Mesdames Leonard, Lord, and Perkins. Mr. Albert Scheible was elected Treasurer. Miss Lord reported the selection of lesson topics from "Noble Lives and Noble Deeds" for use in the second portion of the Fourth Year's Course.

The following is the list of twelve lessons; the Roman numerals indicating the number of the lesson in the series as published by the Boston Sunday School Society. The subject of the lesson and the individual who is chosen to illustrate it are grouped together:

1. Self-control.....Washington (I.)
2. Honesty.....Lincoln (III.)
3. Frankness.....Luther (VIII.)
4. Justice.....Garrison (IX.)
5. Simplicity.....Whittier (XII.)
6. Courtesy.....Emerson (XV.)
7. Spiritual-mindedness.....Channing (XVII.)
8. Conscientiousness.....Charles Sumner (XIX.)
9. Obedience.....Wm. Penn (XXII.)
10. Gratitude.....Theodore Parker (XXXII.)
11. Mercy.....Dorothea Dix (XXXV.)
12. Reverence.....Longfellow (XL.)

Sermonettes.

BY ALICE EWING LEWIS.

Since there are novelettes and histories, why not sermonettes? Indeed, were there to be a popular vote taken as to whether the word sermon and sermonize should be parted from their present affectionate attitude in the dictionary to make room between them for the word sermonette, I think it would be unanimously carried,—provided, of course, that the happy state of affairs suggested by the word sermonette were thenceforth to become a reality.

For, loath as they are to perceive such a condition of things, it must be admitted that the shepherds are not few who weekly observe the appearance in their flock, at the close of the service, which George Eliot describes as "that brisk and cheerful air which a sermon is often observed to produce when it is quite finished."

It is, of course, true that some of the divines who witness this spectacle look out through semi-transparent optimistic blindfolds, and in consequence believe the phenomenon to be the result of their own enlivening eloquence, but others, who see with unimpaired vision, suspect that the congregation look pleased because they are pleased—at the prospect of a whole week of life uninterrupted by sermons. Here they are under a great delusion. As if one could ever escape from sermons!

From the sort heard in churches we may indeed absent ourselves; but we all know, if we reflect for a moment, how everything about us admonishes in silent language. The slow, but persistent, growing plant chides our too easily discouraged efforts. Day following day and the seasons ever repeating themselves re-monstrate with us when we chafe at life's recurring routine. Did not Shakespeare himself see sermons in stones and books in the running brooks?

I transcribe with this a few of the sermons which forced themselves on my attention as I walked my daily paths; and since it is our fate to be begirt with sermons, as with the other ills of life, perhaps those whose diminutive dimensions permit us to readily see that they really have an end, will be looked upon as the lesser of the two evils. I call them sermonettes.

DID you ever notice the stony, unsympathetic gaze with which the occupants of a street car analyze the costumes of their vis-a-vis traveling companions?

It is because they are strangers. We never for a moment think of subjecting a friend or even a passing acquaintance to such critical scrutiny. And why this discrimination between the friend and the stranger? Because remnants of our animal descend still linger about us, of which this trait is one. The brute creation is notably inhospitable, not only to other triles, but to strange members of its own.

We are a trifle premature in felicitating ourselves on the distance that stretches between us and the inferior orders of life, on the supposition that we occupy a remote pinnacle all but out of sight of their valley; for Nature does nothing by jerks, her every act melts into the next by imperceptible gradations; and since she has not yet planed off from her human creation the last remnant of the bird's third eyelid—that little membrane visible in the corner of every one's eye—or effaced the final evidence of the ear muscles or the muscles that close the nostrils, such as is possessed in perfection by our water-dwelling relative, the seal, she is only pursuing her customary graduated actions and consistency when she refuses as yet to entirely efface all vestiges of the animal mind as well: and so while it is of course a truism that we should always act from the motive that virtue is its own reward, sometimes a lower impelling influence might also be the handmaiden of a great result.

Where we feel inclined to sneer, which would have the stronger restraining power, I wonder,—a recollection of the golden rule, or the reflection that the act of sneering is an inheritance from a very unaristocratic ancestor in his most unlovely mood? A suspiciously minded dog lifts his upper lip and shows his canine teeth; a sneering human does the same.

Bigotry, too, is a relic of the inhospitable animal nature, which is by no means absent from those who pride themselves on their advanced thought. I once heard a feminine member of one of the liberal churches remark: "I am thankful to say that I was never a communicant of any other religious organization, but was born into my wide faith of to-day." I will add, lest some one should dismiss this example as mere'y another instance of the proverbial feminine bias for her own belongings, that a masculine follower of the same belief was heard to ejaculate deprecatingly, after passing some Catholic Sisters of Charity, "A religion of pain!" None more than they of the larger faith should clearly perceive that belief is less a matter of option than of necessity, and necessity has so many guises that it is not difficult to understand that one unswervingly trained in any creed might grow to deem loyalty thereto a moral obligation.

If Darwinism demonstrates that men have been evolved out of brutes, the religion which it takes into account will also help men to bear in mind that they are now different from brutes.

The conscience, sense of duty,—the something, call it what one will, and which is higher than any faculty of animal creation, environed though it is by traits descended from it,—is the leaven that will leaven the whole mass.

Tennyson, in one of his latest poems, has well said:

"If my body comes from brutes, though somewhat finer than their own.

I am heir, and this my kingdom, shall the royal voice be mute?

No! but if the rebel subject seek to drag me from the throne,

Hold the scepter, Human Soul, and rule thy province of the brute."

Humanity, after one of its moral lapses, is far too ready to proceed on the theory that one might as well die for an old sheep as a lamb, and, thus arguing, continue from bad to worse.

There might be a show of logic in such a procedure, could life be appropriately compared to some beautiful specimen of ceramic art, like a rare vase, which, when nicked, is, in the eyes of connoisseurs, as thoroughly ruined as if it were totally shattered.

Life, on the contrary, may more fitly be likened to a mosaic, made up of countless beautiful elements, the marring or destruction of one of which in no way affects the separate pieces that remain.

This complex construction of life can be discerned without the aid of glasses, since at the outset it is patent to the most careless observer that life is three-fold,—mental, moral and physical; for do we not all know the physically perfect individual who is anything but a mental exemplar, or the person of brilliant mind whose moral character is by no means flawless?

And these three general divisions can be infinitely subdivided, for a man may be healthy, or clever, or good—any one or all of the three—with various degrees of reservation, and it would be as sensible for an invalid, because of his invalidism, to chloroform himself off the planet; or for a pupil, because he had no bent for mathematics, to eschew therefore all other branches of learning, for which he did possess a talent,—as for a wanderer from the way of rectitude to cut absolutely all acquaintance with the strait and narrow path, because he had once stepped aside.

In every soul there is some door through which the good finds ingress. For the good is like the north-creeping spring, which, in spite of all the barriers man can build, will not be hedged out. In the densest of his cities with gentle fingers she will force her way, painting here and there a grass-plot, planting a weed's fresh stalk in some pavement's crack, and breathing her balmy breath o'er all; while from a foul puddle will come the crooning of the frogs as melodiously as from a meadow-embosomed pool, and athwart the droning dust-laden air will fall the warble of a chance bluebird or a robin's carol.

There is a reverse side to this, too, and a breadth as well as a length; for when a frail son of humanity boasts a good quality, he is quite as apt to err by deeming that his possession of that virtue will cover a multitude of sins, as is his neighbor who lacks that saving grace to be deluded into believing that its absence in him renders inharmonious the whole plan of his nature; for we are all acquainted, are we not, with the pretty woman who, because she is endowed with the one item of physical beauty, seems to be under the impression that no grace of spirit is demanded of her; and with the individual skilled in some particular line of knowledge who assumes airs of superiority because of that accomplishment; aye, and with the saint who, because he is not tempted, looks askance at the sinner who is.

When we feel inclined to excuse in ourselves small derelictions because of some particular quality or other to which a reward of merit is attached, we should recollect that symmetry does not consist of a bulge here, and a depression there, but is, instead, a harmonious flow of outline,—like the mountains whose feet are on the earth and whose heads in the clouds,—and that the observation of the every-day duties and amenities of life are the stones that help build the temple of a beautiful character.

Every one has heard of that Australian weapon, the boomerang, whose peculiarity of taking effect on an object situated in an entirely different direction from that in which it is sent, sometimes results, if unskillfully handled, in recoiling on the sender himself.

Selfishness is a boomerang that is invariably unskillfully thrown, since it always recoils on the one from whom it emanates: for selfishness, which seeks to deprive others in order that it may itself possess, results, without exception, in robbing itself.

Of what? Well, perhaps not always of material things; of these many times it succeeds in possessing itself: but a habit once formed of desiring and expecting all the gifts of the world of matter runs out as well into the realm of mind and morals,—an ethereal region where the grasp of a hand of flesh and blood is unavailing to secure the blessing.

Humanity is too ready to believe that what has been should be henceforth and forevermore, and that because the so-called gifts of fortune have been granted it, not only should they continue, but intellectual attainments, peace of mind, respect of the world, and love of individuals should necessarily follow, and for the mere asking; and when these graces are withheld, too ready again to spend precious time, time that might be used in making advances toward the kingdom of the spirit, in bemoaning the dearth in their lives,—an attitude which unfits the one assuming it for any progression as completely as a paralytic stroke seizing a traveler incapacitates him for his onward journey.

The Gift That None Could See.

"There are silver pines on the window-pane,
A forest of them," said he;
"And a huntsman is there with a silver horn,
Which he bloweth right merrily.

"And there are a flock of silver ducks,
A-flying over his head,
And a silver sea and a silver hill
In the distance away," he said.

"And a l of this is on the window-pane,
My pretty mamma, true as true!"
She lovingly smiled, but she looked not up,
And faster her needle flew.

A dear little fellow the speaker was—
"Silver and jewels and gold,
Lilies and roses and honey-flowers,
In a sweet little bundle rolled.

He stood by the frosty window-pane
"Till he tired of the silver trees,
The huntsman blowing his silver horn,
The hills and the silver seas;

And he breathed on the flock of silver ducks,
"Till he melted them quite away;
And he saw the street, and the people pass—
And the morrow was Christmas day.

"The children are out and laugh and shout,
I know what it's for," said he;
"And they're dragging along, my pretty mamma,
A fir for a Christmas-tree."

He came and stood by his mother's side:
"To-night it is Christmas eve,
And there is a gift somewhere for me,
Gold mamma, do you believe?"

Still the needle sped in her slender hands:
"My little sweetheart," said she,
"The Christ-Child has planned this Christmas for you
His gift that you cannot see."

The boy looked up with a sweet, wise look
On his beautiful baby-face:
"Then my stocking I'll hang for the Christ-Child's gift
To-night, in the chimney-place."

On Christmas morning, the city through,
The children were queens and kings,
With their royal treasures bursting o'er
With wonderful, lovely things.

But the merriest child in the city full,
And the fullest of all with glee,
Was the one whom the dear Christ-Child had brought
The gift he could not see.

"Quite empty it looks, oh, my gold mamma, ^U
The stocking I hung last night!"
"So, then, it is full of the Christ-Child's gift,"
And she smiled 'til his face grew bright.

"Now, sweetheart," she said, with a patient look

On her delicate, weary face,
"I must go and carry my sewing home,
And leave thee a little space.

"Now stay with thy sweet thoughts, heart's delight.

And I soon will be back to thee."
"I'll play while you're gone, my pretty mamma,
With my gift that I cannot see."

He watched his mother pass down the street:
Then he looked at the window-pane,
Where a garden of new frost-flowers had bloomed,

While he on his bed had lain.

Then he tenderly took up his empty sock,
And quietly sat awhile,
Holding it fast, and eying it
With his innocent, trusting smile.

"I am tired of waiting," he said at last;
"I think I will go and meet
My pretty mamma, and come with her
A little way down the street.

"And I'll carry with me, to keep it safe,
My gift that I cannot see."
And down the street, 'mid the chattering crowd,

He trotted right merrily.

"And where are you going, dear little man?"
They called to him as he passed,
"That empty stocking why do you hold
In your little hand so fast?"

Then he looked at them with honest eyes,
And answered sturdily:
"My stocking is full to the top, kind sirs,
Of the gift that I cannot see."

They would stare and laugh, but he trudged along,

With his stocking fast in his hand:
"And I wonder why 'tis that the people all Seem not to understand!"

"Oh, my heart's little flower!" she cried to him,

A-hurrying down the street:
"And why are you out on the street alone?
And where are you going, my sweet?"

"I was coming to meet you, my pretty mamma,
With my gift that I cannot see;
But tell me why that the people laugh
And stare at my gift and me?"

Like the Maid to her Son, in the altar-piece,
So loving she looked and mild:
"Because, dear heart, of all you met,
Not one was a little child."

O thou who art grieving at Christmas-tide,
The lesson is meant for thee:
That thou may'st get Christ's loveliest gifts
In ways thou canst not see;

And how, although no earthly good
Seems into thy lot to fall,
Hast thou a trusting, child-like heart,
Thou hast the best of all.

—Mary E. Wilkins, in Wide Awake.

Christmas in a Convent.

It was a chill evening in November when Margery and Ethel were deposited by their guardian at the door of St. Agatha's. The wind whistled drearily through the leafless trees and the orphaned sisters shivered with cold and loneliness as they timidly clung to each other. But when the door was opened by the bright-faced novice to the warmth and cheer within, when they were ushered into the benign presence of Reverend Mother Benedicta and enfolded in her warm embrace, when she took them to the refectory and asked Sister Teresa to make them some tea, they began to feel at home. After supper the Reverend Mother led them to a large pleasant room where a fire glowed in the grate and four pretty girls sat beside it studying their lessons. At the Reverend Mother's approach all arose and were introduced to the newcomers. On one side of the long room were arranged six snowy cots, partially hidden by screens. "This is your dormitory," said the Reverend Mother. "Each child is expected to make her own bed and to make it neatly. The prayer bell is ringing. Being Protestants, you are, of course, excused from attending prayers, but don't forget to pray in your own way. Good night, dear children,"—and the gracious lady was gone. Sweet were the slumbers of the sisters that night. Like a haven of rest seemed that hallowed house in which peace and purity reigned supreme. They both learned to love the good nuns, and the Reverend Mother they almost worshiped. Serene, calm and dignified, she was an example of the old adage that "they best know how to rule who have learned to obey." The convent was a little world in itself. Life flowed on evenly and smoothly, for this community had solved the vexed problem of co-operation that is now agitating so many minds. "My" and "mine" were unknown words among the sisters, for all belonged to each, and each to all. "Will you bring our bonnet?" Margery overheard one sister ask another one day.

Few of the pupils went away for Christmas. The holidays were short, and many of the homes at a distance. Canadian winters are severe, and traveling hard. The nuns preferred that the pupils should remain, and they did their utmost to make the great festival one of joy and happiness to all under their charge. Margery and Ethel were many leagues from their native land, strangers and alone; therefore they resolved to celebrate the day with their new-found friends.

At five o'clock Christmas morning the bell rang, as usual, for matins, and at six pontifical high mass was celebrated in the convent chapel. First came the Archbishop in full canonicals of crimson and gold; then the procession of priests and white-robed acolytes; the incense bearer, wafting spicy fragrance around; the black-robed nuns, with downcast mien, their slender fingers telling their beads the while; the mistress of novices, followed by her white-veiled flock; the "Children of Mary," in blue dresses and broad white shoulder ribbons, with silver medals; the young Cæcilians, softly singing the "Adeste Fideles," to the accompaniment of the organ; the Guild of the Holy Angels, and, last, the little company of Puritans, who ought, doubtless, to have protested, by their absence, against such Popish pageantry: but they felt that "the Lord was in His Holy Place" just as truly among those devout souls as in a plain meeting-house. The altar was ablaze with lights, symbolical of Him who came to be the "light of the world," the air redolent of flowers, and faces radiant with spiritual joy.

After the service there was much hearty hand-clasping and wishing of Merry Christmases. Mother gave Margery and Ethel the religious kiss, saying, "I am glad you were with us this morning, children;" and after breakfast, which was a bountiful one, she invited them to ride with her to the city, where they visited many poor families, and left substantial mementos behind them. Among others, they visited Fogg's Alley, where lived the five little Fogs, who "did for themselves" and bravely fought the hard battle with poverty and want and misery. Their prematurely old faces brightened at the Reverend Mother's kindly greeting and well-filled basket, and many blessed the good nun as she went on her mission of mercy.

After the Christmas dinner had been disposed of, a dozen large sleighs were brought around, and, enveloped in furs and robes, a merry party of pupils and nuns set forth for St. Vincent's Orphanage, where the poor children were to be made happy by a Christmas tree, on which hung many gifts sent by the inmates of St. Agatha's. To Margery and Ethel the sight of several hundred children, motherless like themselves, was most pathetic. But the gorgeous tree, with its delicious fruit, gave unbounded joy to many little starved hearts that day. When the gifts were all distributed, the sleighs returned to St. Agatha's in time for the beautiful service of Benediction. Music, mirth, and dancing ended the day, and Margery and Ethel agreed that it was the happiest Christmas they had spent since dear mamma died.

Shoshonomi.

Shoshonomi is a lad of the Moqui tribe in Arizona, now a pupil at the government school in Keam's Canyon.

One day about a year ago he was keeping the sheep in a valley near the Mesa* of his people, as he had done many a day before. To Shoshonomi it was simply one cold day, when the rain made him wet and uncomfortable, and when the ground was moist and chill. To the almanac it was December 24. To you and me it was Christmas Eve.

All through the long summer day the sheep had been living as best they could on the sparse and withered herbage, but as soon as the autumn rains set in they were driven where they could revel in plenty of grass, and where there was plenty of water to drink.

All summer the men had been very careful of the sheep, never trusting them far from the Mesa unless under guard of a number of persons, because the Navajoes, a neighboring tribe, were constantly lying in wait to drive the stock away.

But now, when the pasturage was good nearer home, Shoshonomi alone was given the care of the flock, and he went with them wherever they could find abundance to eat.

It was growing quite dark, and he had rounded them up and started them back. The sun had almost gone down, and the chill day promised to end in a colder night.

Suddenly his dog whirled away from the sheep it had been driving, started with its sharpened ears standing upright, and barked fiercely out towards the valley. Shoshonomi knew some danger threatened, and he ran more swiftly about the edges of the flock. He hurried on, the dog following, but turning constantly and barking back there towards the gathering darkness.

At length Shoshonomi's ears told him of the danger his eyes could not see. A band of Navajoes were behind him on their ponies. They were creeping along the sandy bed of the creek, but as soon as they heard his cry for help they climbed the sloping, sandy bank and galloped straight toward him. He shouted again, long and loud; he heard their cry of warning to desist, he wept with vexation because the sheep were frightened and unruly; and then he abandoned them for the moment, darting into the shelter of sage brush and so escaping.

But Shoshonomi was a true Moqui. He was not afraid. After the Navajoes had driven the sheep away the little lad came out of the bushes and followed them. His dog kept close at his heels, and seemed to offer assistance with a mute devotion.

"I wish I had a lion's claw, or a panther's tooth," said Shoshonomi to himself. "Then I would pray."

For you must know the Moqui does not offer his prayers as you do. If he had had the panther's tooth or the claw of a mountain lion he would have stopped a moment, turned aside till his "heart was good," and then he would have laid them in some secure place where nothing could touch them till the sunshine came. He would have said nothing, even mentally; but to him this would have been a prayer to the Great Spirit for the speed, the tireless strength of the panther, that he might follow and overtake his enemy; and for the fierce courage and resistless power of the lion, that he might spring and punish them.

However, he ran along through the darkness, darting aside now and then as the needles of a yucca plant pierced his thin-clad limbs, following the sounds, and at last the scent of his sheep and their captors. It was a long, long chase.

He thought of the warm room in his father's stone house up there on the Mesa, where he could have been long ago if the sheep had been safe in the corral. He thought of the supper of dried meat and corn bread he would have eaten. And after a while, as he trotted on, never for a moment thinking of abandoning the chase, he remembered the comfortable bed of blankets and skins. It was so very weary and cold out here on the plain; it was so painful when the Spanish bayonet wounded him.

"If I were in bed I would cover up with all the blankets," said the patient pursuer. Not that he said these things in the language you and I use; but the thoughts which are the same in all languages, came to him.

Hours and hours he followed the Navajoes, first running, then walking warily when they slackened their gait. Away in the right they came to a "hogan," which is Navajo for "house," and here they stopped till morning. They built a fire, for an Indian can do that no matter what the weather may be. They killed one of Shoshonomi's sheep, and he lay on his face in the cold sand and watched them eat it.

Then they went to sleep in the "hogan," leaving the sheep to take care of themselves; for though they had no dogs with them they knew the weary animals would not go far.

But after an hour of waiting Shoshonomi felt that his time had come. He crept forward with his dog, trembling lest his humble friend should bark, and so undo him. But the dog seemed to have caught some of the stealthiness of the Indian, for he ran this way and that, forcing the sheep to rise, and turning them homeward; but he did not utter a sound.

It was a weary drive, for the sheep had been hard run, and they could not hasten. Once he sat down to rest, but when he rose his limbs were stiffened and pained him so much he did not try it again. Hour after hour he followed the sheep, urging them on, till he saw a great light in the east behind him; and there just before was the Mesa, and his home.

Driving was easier now. The sheep climbed the steep path to their fold, and just as the last one went in Shoshonomi saw the great red sun blazing across the valley.

He remembered the prayer emblems he had wished for. If he had had them, this moment would be the answering. And it somehow occurred to the boy that a prayer without emblems was quite as much of a prayer.

* * *

This Christmas Eve Shoshonomi is in the government school. He has learned to speak English quite readily, and has told his teacher many things from that other life. He can write some, and is fairly advanced in numbers. He sleeps in a comfortable bed—though no bed will ever be more comfortable than was that heap of blankets and furs in his father's stone house that Christmas.

* "Mesa" — pronounced "Mass," the flat tableland on the summit of high, precipitous rocks, many acres in extent.

But the lesson of lessons he has learned is the one that almost came to him that sunny morning as he stood by his rescued flock: If the heart be good the prayer is acceptable, even without any emblem.

An Old, Old Story, and How He Tells It.

Walter Scott somewhere speaks of the joy of dining with the Whigs, because they had not heard his old stories. But I go every year to Miss Wiltse's charming kindergarten in Cottage Place, under a bond to tell the same story which I told the year before. This is now, indeed, a story eighteen hundred and ninety-three years old. The great merit of it is that, in describing the birth of the baby boy at Bethlehem, and the presents which the oxen and the asses and the cows and the sheep and the goats and the hens and the ducks in and around the "courtly stable" made to him, you give imitations of the languages of those animals. Now you may say what you will about Darwinism, all children, before they acquire their own language, are greatly interested in the languages of beasts and birds. If they "assist" in the imitations of the story-teller, there is no harm, and the popularity of this account of the first Christmas morning is such that a repetition of it is demanded on the bills from year to year. After the story has been told and the children have given each other their presents, a mysterious door is opened, and other presents appear, which are provided by the kind overseer of all these schools,—sleds and skates and puzzles and dolls and cradles and everything that heart can wish, if the heart have not been throbbing more than six or seven years. And whoever wants to see the real joy of the Christmas season will see it nowhere more than at Miss Wiltse's school.

The Study Table

The New World.

The most interesting article in the New World for the autumn quarter is that of Wilhelm Bender, of the University of Bonn, on "The Relations of Religion and Morality." This is rather a philosophical than a sociological question; but in so far as the historical element enters the discussion it has to do with that which is of interest to the social scientist. The article covers twenty-six pages of the review, and here we can but touch upon its salient points. The author's thesis is that while they interact upon one another, religion and morality are by nature distinct, and he takes special pains to show that morality does not spring from and depend upon religion, but that, on the contrary, the former may exist quite apart from the latter, and he seems to think that morality has done far more to improve religion than religion has to improve morality. The topic is important and timely, and whether or not the reader agrees with the author, a perusal of his paper will repay one,—the discussion throughout being careful and scientific. For in the first place the author does what of course all should,—but few writers actually do,—he makes an earnest effort to define his terms. Inasmuch as religion is a term that generally goes undefined, we may be very thankful that it has commanded our author's best thought. His account of its genesis is summed up in the paragraph beginning on page 458: "Religion arises out of the general experience that, in following out our life aims and interacting with the outer world, we strike upon facts and elements, upon laws and rules which we cannot make serviceable to ourselves through the power of civilization, but which, on the contrary, in their predominance, oblige us to suit and subordinate ourselves and our life aims to them. [Should he not rather have said: "Which we cannot make serviceable to ourselves through the power of civilization except by suiting and subordinating ourselves and our life aims to them?"] These factors lead us at once to feel our weakness and dependence; they waken in us the need of help and salvation and concentrate desires and hopes and faiths upon them—the desire and the faith that, where our own insight and power fail, we may reckon upon the support of a general world-order in the fulfillment of our life-interests, so far as these do not run contrary. One may briefly say: Religion arises from the everywhere emerging contradiction between our power and our will; it arises from the experience of our dependence upon a general world-fate, and it consists, at first, in nothing else than the natural and inevitable desire that this may prove itself favorable to our undertakings. [Here again a correction suggests itself, to wit: that, if by experience our author means a conscious perception, he is going too fast in speaking of a "general world-fate." In order to express himself in terms applicable to the lowest as well as the highest forms of religion, should he not say that religious feeling is aroused by the awe of power external to ourselves, which we can neither understand nor control? To feel one's self—at least to recognize one's self—as dependent upon a general world-fate, is to have reached a pretty high level of thought and feeling. Does not the savage rather feel himself subject to various more or less independent superhuman powers, and seek to get the favor and help of one or more of them?] So long, then, as we have the ends and means of our undertakings in our power, the impulse of self-preservation does not necessarily take a religious form. But as soon as we strike the fact that the execution of our life-aims depends upon outer conditions which we can neither understand nor master, the impulse of self-preservation necessarily takes a religious guise,—that is to say, it completes its own insufficiency through the hope or the faith that the general order of things will favor our aims and somehow serve our advantage."

Thus deriving religion from man's relation to the power or powers that control the universe, our author proceeds to derive morality from man's relation to his fellow-man, showing how it is high or low, broad or narrow, according as the social organism is large or small, simple or complex. There are three essential features, our author says, in which the independence of religion and morality is made plain. "First: religious action, according to its nature, as desire, prayer, hope, and faith, is distinguished from the moral deed as from every other form of cultural action. Second: the religious act is connected with every activity, by no means only with the moral, or the expression of the fact that the result of our doings is always conditioned by the world-fate, as we may briefly call it. Third and finally: the religious act is called forth not only by moral, but also by specifically immoral efforts, as the history of all religions shows."

Taken as a whole, notwithstanding the qualifications suggested, it seems to us that the discussion referred to is one of the most pregnant that has seen the light for many a day. In it is much food for thought for philosopher, theologian, and anthropologist.

Another very interesting article is that of Rev. Edward H. Hall, who gives a masterly review of the progress of Unitarian thought under the title "The New Unitarianism," showing how modern Unitarianism has finally given up all forms of the doctrines of authority and supernaturalism. "To make my statement as definite as possible," he writes, "it stands for humanitarianism as against any conception of Christ or Christianity which removes them from the orderly sequence of human events: for rationalism, as against any theory of the Bible which denies its normal place in the world's literature and thought; for naturalism as against any known form of supernaturalism." It is to be regretted that a larger number of Unitarian ministers do not see as clearly as does Mr. Hall the logic of their position, and that when they see it they do not state their point of view more clearly to their congregations and to the world. We believe, however, that Mr. Hall's article will have a considerable influence in bringing about this desirable self-realization.

One of the editors, President Orello Cone, has an article on "Jesus' Self-Designation in the Synoptic Gospels," a subject which there are few scholars more competent to discuss. E. Amelineau, of the Collège de France, has an interesting examination of "The Role of the Demon in the Ancient Coptic Religions." Dr. Bartol writes charmingly on Channing, Taylor, Emerson and Brooks, under the title of "The Boston Pulpit." James Darmstetter, also of the Collège de France, has an article on Ernest Renan. As James M. Whiton writes on "A Way Out of the Trinitarian Controversy," we must suppose that this is still a living question to some persons.

The number also contains forty-nine pages of careful reviews, embracing twenty recent works, chiefly Biblical studies, but also including ethics and theology. It is this feature of the New World, in particular, which makes it a necessity to the liberal minister of America who would keep in touch with current scholarship.

As we write this, the number for the winter quarter is already at hand, containing an article by Julius Wellhausen, of Goettingen, on the "Babylonian Exile"; one on the "Peculiarities of John's Theology," by George B. Stevens, of Yale; one by Bernard Bosanquet on "Plato's Conception of the Good Life"; one on the "New Socialism and Economics," by William B. Weeden; one on the "Religion of the Chinese People," by C. de Harlez, of the University of Louvain; one by Professor Momerie on the "Ethics of Creeds"; one on "Heresy in Athens in the Time of Plato," by Prof. Tarbell, now of the University of Chicago; one on the "Ethical and Religious Import of Idealism," by the English scholar, May Sinclair—an indication that the New World is abreast of the times on the woman question: one on "Thoroughness in Theology," by Richard A. Armstrong; one on the "Parliament of Religions," by Professor Toy; and nearly sixty pages of book reviews. Of the more interesting of these articles we hope to speak at a later day. The titles and the names of the writers suggest a rich treat.

Other Magazines.

THE NON-SECTARIAN for November is largely given to the Parliament of Religions. Dr. Thomas and Rev. Chas. F. Bradley both have a word on the subject, the latter noticeable for that impressive earnestness which characterizes all Mr. Bradley's work. Mr. Allen's reply to Mr. Sheldon's recent utterance as to the reasonableness of devoting one's attention to modern spiritualism illustrates how men may continue to use a term controversially without much reference to its real meaning.

Both Professor James, quoted by Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Allen speak as though "psychic phenomena" were "beyond the explanation of science;" and the effort is made to show in what sense this is true, instead of promptly rescuing the term "science" from those who, whether counting themselves its friends or its enemies, would thus rob the great word of its comprehensiveness. The expression "beyond the explanation of science" is harmless, and may temporarily be true, if the emphasis is put on explanation, but where the emphasis is on science it is utterly misleading.

THE COSMOPOLITAN for November contains an article on costumes, illustrated by colored plates, which is indicative of its intention to be striking, at all events. Howells begins a new series of Altruriana, this time writing from the standpoint of the Altrurian. While a number of well-known names appear on the cover,—George Ebers, Mark Twain, Walter Besant, H. H. Boyesen, etc., including Adam Badeau,—the magazine nevertheless impresses one as a light one.

THE features of November's Review of Reviews are two studies of the Great Northwest,—one of its Possibilities, by S. A. Thompson; and the other of the Waterways for its service, by Emory R. Johnson,—an article on Lobengula, King of the Matabele; and a discussion of the future of silver production, by President Andrews. The first named of these articles is full and careful and well worth the attention of the economic student.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, 1893. Harper & Brothers, New York. Happy the boy or girl who has the weekly numbers of this delightful publication! Happier the boy or girl who has the bound volume also; and happiest he or she who carries one of the early volumes into the country every summer and gives it away at the summer's end to Tom, Dick or Harry, or Mchitable Ann. Then there is at least one more happy boy in the world and probably five or six, and girls as many. The volume for 1893 maintains the general character of the previous volumes. The illustrations are even better than usual, or they may seem to be so because "time's noblest offspring is the last." There is the usual proportion of continued stories and other matter. The great Exposition has left its sign and seal upon the volume, greatly to its advantage, and we have fresh assurance that the insubstantial pageant faded will leave more than a rack behind. It ought to be easier for boys and girls to be good now than it was formerly, they have so much more to make them happy and to keep them safe at home.

The golden rule of happiness is to be moderate in your expectations.

New Editions.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By Charles Reade. Illustrated from drawing by William Martin Johnson. 2 vols. Silk boards, 8vo, pp. 1,233. $8. New York: Harper & Brothers.

There is ground for a new hope of immortality in the new editions of good old books which are so much the habit of late times. What would Thoreau think of his magnificent re-uscitation? Harper & Brothers' edition of "The Cloister and the Hearth" competes with Dodd & Mead's, which is in four volumes with a soft, rough, canvas cloth upon the covers, very disagreeable to the touch, and a page led to the worst extremity. Harpers' edition is much more successful. Its general appearance is that of the illustrated "Ben Hur," a book a hundred times less deserving than this of the homage of the illustrator and the bookmaker. The page is that of "Ben Hur," and, as in that, the illustrations are marginal, breaking into the text as freely as need be. The illustrator of "Ben Hur" is the illustrator here also, but he has found his field less fertile than before. Certainly there is less variety here, but for this there is compensation in the greater elaboration of the illustrations. They are very happily conceived and their execution is most satisfactory. The novel is the masterpiece of Reade's great but irregular genius. The lovers of the novel are the parents of Erasmus, Reade starting from an historic fact in that particular. It is one of the great historic novels, remarkable for the complete assimilation of the historic matter with a story of surpassing interest and pathos, written in a style that is a constant pleasure to the mind.

UPLIFTS OF HEART AND WILL. By James H. West. 2d edition. Boston; Geo. H. Ellis. Cloth, 16mo, pp. 100. 30 cents.

The first edition of this little book met with such a measure of success that a second is now issued. The first one, we are told, went to England and Germany, to Japan and China, to India and Australia and the islands of the Pacific. Doubtless this new issue also will find many hearts to welcome it. Its aspirations are noble, its faith inspiring, and its helpfulness to devotion unquestioned.

It might better, in our opinion, have been called Prayers and Poems, but it is good under whatever name. Uplifts of eager heart and earnest will: Pulsings of soul.

Notes from the Field

Chicago.—The Board of Directors of the Western Unitarian Conference met at the headquarters Tuesday, Dec. 12. There were present Mrs. Anna B. McMahon, Messrs. Shorey, Jones, Effinger, Van Inwagen and Gould. On Mr. Jones' motion the following resolution was passed:

RESOLVED, That the Board of Directors of the Western Unitarian Conference hereby records its loving debt of gratitude to John C. Learned, who, for twenty consecutive years, occupied a place among us, during which time he was ever unflagging in his zeal, unflinching in his interest, unwavering in his faith; a vigilant champion of the methods that were most progressive and outspoken. During the darkest days of the Conference struggle for the doctrinal position to which it is committed, Mr. Learned and his Society were an unflinching source of strength. By his death we have lost a loving co-worker and a comrade most dear and genial.

RESOLVED, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the records of the Conference, that one be sent to the Board of Directors of the Church of the Unity, St. Louis, and to the bereaved family with whom we sympathize, and that a copy be published in UNITY.

The report of the Committee on the Apportionment of the Conference Expenses Among the Churches was received, and after some amendments was adopted. It was also voted that the treasurer send out the request for contributions as early as possible. The following Committee on Program was chosen by the Board: The Secretary, Messrs. Jones, Crothers and Fenn, and Mrs. Woolley. Letters of suggestion were received from Mrs. Woolley and Mr. Crothers, and were placed on file for further action. The Board adjourned subject to the call of the Committee on Program.

Chicago.—All Souls Church, at the close of its services last Sunday, adopted by a standing vote the following letter, which the Chairman of the Board of Trustees was instructed to forward. The letter was preceded by remarks from the pastor:

TO THE CHURCH OF THE UNITY, ST. LOUIS:
Dear Friends: We feel that we must send you some expression of our sorrow and sympathy in the great bereavement which has befallen you. To many of us in All Souls Church Mr. Learned seemed a near friend. We all loved and revered the noble man whose truth and steadfastness have been courage and inspiration to us through many seasons of trial. His life made it easier for all of us to be a little more loving and loyal in our own lives, and his death is our common loss. So in these sad hours we mourn with his dear ones and with you his people who so loved and honored him and who were blessed and honored by his high ministry.

December 17th, 1893.

On Dec. 7 at All Souls Church was held the first regular meeting of the Chicago Branch of the W. W. U. C., Mrs. Dow in the chair, and perhaps less than the average number of members present. After luncheon the meeting was called to order and the minutes of the last meeting read and approved. The usual collection for defraying expenses for printing programs and for postage was taken, resulting in $5.26. As Mr. Louis E. Frank was ill, his paper on "The Gambling Spirit" was read by Mrs. H. G. Solomon. Dr. Low, having misunderstood the time of meeting, was a few minutes late, and the time was filled by a few appropriate remarks from Mrs. West. Dr. Low led the very interesting and animated discussion, which was also participated in by Mesdames Boyeson, Gane, Anderson, Martin, Solomon, Effinger, Mann, Wilkinson, and Miss Brinkerhoff. Meeting adjourned at four.

BETHIA C. REED, Sec.

Geneva, Ill.—Mrs. Woolley preaches on Doubt next Sunday, and the following Sunday, Dec. 21, the Sunday school and church have Christmas services together. The society will give its annual sale and supper Dec. 20.

Des Moines, Iowa.—Mr. Nagarkar has gone from us, but we feel that he has left an influence behind which will long remain. His course of four lectures deepened in interest from the beginning to the end. Our dailies and weeklies have had much to say about him. At the close of the last lecture on "The Message of the Brahma Samaj" enthusiasm rose to white heat. There was suppressed emotion in many and tears in the eyes of some as they bade him good-by. We all felt the sweetness and beauty, as well as the strength of his personality, but I think we felt something more. We felt that he was the representative of a great and unknown people. The sense of an enlarged fellowship came sweeping over us, a new continent of the soul was discovered, and our eyes rested upon it with a gladness we could not express. And so this simple, earnest, unassuming man will long linger in our memories, making a bond between the Orient and Occident which must carry good to both. How genuine the enthusiasm is may be realized from the fact that one of our brightest young ladies is seriously contemplating going to India, to teach in the school for girls which it is now Mr. Nagarkar's intention to establish.—L. A. H.

Kalamazoo, Mich.—A tasty little folder comes from Kalamazoo, containing the calendar for the month of December, and showing the activity of the church in all its forms:—services morning and evening, religious study class, Women's Society, Young People's Guild, and Junior Guild. We are glad to learn that the money necessary to be raised in order to secure the generous gift is now practically in hand, so that the work can begin with the opening of spring. And along with their efforts to raise money for their new church, they have not forgotten the suffering poor. They are giving more money to charity this year than ever before. Miss Bartlett's work is eliciting praise even from our English papers, though there she is slightly disguised as Miss Bartlett, of Kalamazoo.

St. Louis, Mo.—At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the St. Louis Public Library the following resolutions were adopted in recognition of the distinguished services of the late Rev. J. C. Learned:

WHEREAS, The St. Louis Public Library has been so fortunate as to be among the many institutions and interests of the city that have profited by the self-sacrificing labors of the Rev. John C. Learned; therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is incumbent on this board to express its realization of the loss sustained by the community in the death of Mr. Learned and to bear public testimony to the great and peculiar value of the services rendered by him to the library.

Resolved, That the following succinct account of his connection with the library be spread on the records and published in the next annual report, and that a copy be sent to his family and to the city press.

For eight years, from 1884 to 1892, Mr. Learned was a member of the Board of Managers, serving half the time as Vice President and the remainder as President, with two years as chairman of the Book Committee.

As President he missed scarcely a meeting of any committee and brought to every department of the library the benefits of his practical sagacity, his extensive information and his untiring devotion to duty. In the Book Committee his services were especially valuable, and the strength of the collection in certain lines and its value as a whole are owing in no small degree to his varied learning and literary judgment.

His cheerfulness, his urbanity and his quiet humor made the meetings of the board and its committees hours of social recreation and spiritual refreshment which his coadjutors will always recall with the greatest pleasure. His genial nature and his loving acceptance of every duty of life gave him the peculiar power of elevating the routine of business and making the dull details interesting and informing.

The influence of his character and the charm of his manner were felt even by the humblest employes of the library, and his withdrawal from the board, followed by that complete severance that death alone could cause, is the greatest loss the institution has ever suffered. It is no consolation to think how many interests and individuals must say the same.

O. L. WHITEHEAD, President.
F. M. CRUNDEN, Secretary.

Oakland, Cal.—Rev. C. W. Wendte is giving a course of six Sunday evening lectures on "England,—Picturesque, Political, Educational, and Religious,—with A Glimpse of London," and "Memories of Scotland." They are illustrated with nearly 400 stereopticon views, and they call out large audiences. On December 3, when he preached on the subject, "What Is the Evidence that Jesus Ever Lived?" an eye-witness informs us that 2,000 persons were present.

Seattle, Wash.—Thanksgiving eve was appropriately spent at this place in an effort to increase the effectiveness of a scientific system of associated charities. The meeting was held in the Plymouth Congregational Church, and was addressed by Governor McGraw; Major Rinehart, the President of the Bureau of Associated Charities; Mr. Joseph Shippen; Mr. Melvin G. Winstock; and Rev. D. C. Garrett. In this good work Jews, Orthodox Christians, and Unitarians united.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation.—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

The Parliament of Religions.

Two New Works by JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

THE SEVEN GREAT RELIGIONS.

"The Lovers of the Light are One."

I. Moses. IV. Buddha.
II. Zoroaster. V. Sokrates.
III. Confucius. VI. Jesus.
VII. Mohammed.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'd Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

*O glad, exulting, culminating song!
A vigor more than earth's is in thy notes.
Marches of victory—man disenfranchised—
the conqueror at last.
Hymns to the universal God from universal man—all joy!
A reborn race appears—a perfect world.
all joy!
Women and men in wisdom, innocence and health—all joy!
War, sorrow, suffering gone—the rank earth purged—nothing but joy left.
Joy! joy! in freedom, worship, love! joy in the ecstasy of life!*
—Walt Whitman.

AFTER the article "Are We Just to the Orthodox?" was written, we were pleased to learn from an Oakland, Cal., paper that, at the joint Thanksgiving meeting of the Unitarian and Jewish societies, Rev. Chas. W. Wendte discussed a similar question.

THE last number of Old and New, the parish paper of the Unitarian Church at Davenport, Iowa, edited by A. M. Judy, has this to say concerning our recent comment upon the work in Iowa apropos to the annual meeting of the Iowa Conference:

There is truth in the complaint which the UNITY report of the Conference makes, that the American Unitarian Association has too much ignored the principles of our democratic polity in its dealings with the Western field. But it must be remembered that the Association is American, i. e., national, and by virtue of its title may rightly extend its jurisdiction to our field. It has right; as well as our own Association, and these we are bound to regard. How to properly co-ordinate and subordinate these respective rights is a problem to the solution of which the denomination should turn its serious, unprejudiced attention.

**
AT a meeting of the Ohio Universalist Ministerial Association last November Rev. C. C. Connor, of Hamilton, read an interesting paper on "Union of the Liberal Religious Forces," in which he said incidentally that the Unitarians were in the Universalist denominational press lustily decried as "unchristian in both faith and works." The address is reported in the Universalist, and its editor promptly protests against so much of the charge as we have put in italics. The distinction seems to us a good one; and as to the charge that Unitarians are un-Christian in faith we think it true of very many Unitarians and we should have no objection to finding it so of all.

THE New Year is at hand, and UNITY appeals to its friends to help it to a larger usefulness by procuring for it new subscriptions and patronizing its advertisers. Under present conditions we cannot publish half that is sent us for that purpose, simply from lack of space; and we cannot bear the expense of enlarging our paper as we should like to do until our subscription list is longer. Week after week the editor is obliged to leave out much that he would gladly put in, that he may make room for that which has already been waiting too long in the contributors' drawer. The present size of the paper is no longer adequate to the demands upon it. It cannot fitly represent the various phases of thought and life that demand recognition therein. Give us your help now and we shall the better be able to help you in the coming months. And meanwhile bear with us when we fail to publish what you (and we also) think should be in the paper.

THE Wisconsin Unitarian Conference at its last meeting at Janesville put itself in line with the previous action of the Unitarians in Illinois and Iowa, looking toward a union of forces among the liberal churches and liberal people of the West. The liberal ministers of Chicago and vicinity at their dinner last Monday discussed the possibility of such a union from a practical standpoint. Mr. Fenn leading in the discussion. The pressure is felt on every side. There is a practical paralysis in the liberal missionary fields of the West. The heart has gone out of the sectarian motive. Denominationalism masking under the guise of liberality is dying from being found out. An inspiration for the Church Universal is being distilled in these alembics of discontent. When an opportunity is given to wisely direct the energies of intelligent people on lines indicated by the following resolution passed by the Wisconsin brethren, then the world will be gladdened once more by the missionary zeal of a devout faith:

Rejoicing in the spirit and work of the World's Parliament of Religions, demonstrating as it did the moral and religious unity of the race, the Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies resolves: first, that, emphasizing the same spirit, we desire to work toward its realization in organized effort; second, to this end we desire to record our willingness to co-operate in any movement looking toward the establishment of the Church Universal.

THE December Freethinker's Magazine has among its editorial notes the following:

Dr. Paul Carus, who has gained recognition as a philosophical thinker of ability, discusses the effect upon religion of the Parliament of Religions, recently held in Chicago. In his opinion, the Parliament scouted the death-knell of traditionalism in Christianity. "From its date," he says, "we shall have to begin a new era in the evolution of man's religious life. The religion of the future will be that religion which can rid itself of all narrowness and of the Phariseism which takes it for granted that its own devotees alone are good and holy, while the virtues of others are but polished vices. There is but one religion, the religion of truth. There is but one piety, it is the love of truth. There is but one morality, it is the earnest desire of leading a life of truth. And the religion of the future can be only the Religion of Truth."

Elsewhere in the magazine, Mr. T. B. Wakeman quotes from the New York Sun these words:

If the so-called Parliament of Religions at Chicago is for any other purpose than to be a sensational side-show to the big Fair, it is a purely agnostic purpose. It is to destroy the old conviction that there is a single absolutely true and perfect religion revealed from God, and to substitute for it the agnostic theory that no religious belief is more than an expression of the universal and ceaseless effort of men to discover the undiscoverable.

Even in the second of these two utterances there is shown considerable appreciation of the meaning of the Parliament of Religions. It is to be regretted that the many contributors to the Free Thinker's Magazine who have been belittling the Parliament, including the one who quotes this last passage, have not spent some of the time thus employed in pondering what this means. To show that all forms of religion are more or less imperfect attempts to express man's relation to the great uncomprehended power that manifests itself in the life of the universe, is very different from showing that religion itself—man's attitude toward the life of the universe—is false.

OUR readers have been much interested in the triumphs of our Oriental friends since the close of the Parliament of Religions. Mozoomdar has reaped the honors and the opportunity that his genius deserves in and around Boston, and he is now on or beyond the Atlantic. Vivekananda has been finding more and more successfully a listening constituency in the West, and is now a much sought-for speaker on the lists of the Slayton Lecture Bureau. Mr. Nagarkar is putting his Southern blood to severest test by facing Western blizzards and Northern snows. He has been heard recently at Des Moines, Sioux City, Duluth and Minneapolis. Mr. Hirai is now in the East, and will probably be heard in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Washington before he returns. The engagements for the last two brethren have been largely made through the kindly offices of Mr. Gould, the Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference, aided by the UNITY influence, which has been freely given. Encouraged by the success of these gentlemen, we are now anxious to commend to our readers' attention another voice from the East, who as a spokesman of the "young men of the Orient" made a strong impression upon the Parliament, which impression was deepened by his subsequent address before the humane congress.

—Mr. Herant M. Kirétchyian. This young man is a child of the ancient Christian Church of Armenia, a graduate of Roberts College, Constantinople. He has been a close student of the Mohammedan religion and a loyal subject to the Sultan. He has a pleasing presence and an admirable speech. Now that his work is over at the World's Fair, he desires, if occasion should present itself, to spend some time in deepening the impression made upon the American mind by the Parliament of Religions and pushing forward the movement towards unity and harmony set going by that auspicious gathering. Mr. Kirétchyian speaks from the standpoint of undogmatic Christianity, and would feel equally at home on a Presbyterian, Unitarian, Roman Catholic or Pagan platform. He is one more advocate of universal religion. We hope that he will have a hearing before many of the churches and clubs interested in UNITY. Any communications concerning this matter will be attended to by the Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference, the Rev. A. W. Gould, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

A New Year Gift.

These times of strain bring the need of money into the foreground, and it is easy to discover the mean man who shuts his purse against all cries of need, but there is a meaner man than the money-miser, and he is the brain-miser. The man who will not give thought to the misery problems upon us; but who undertakes to buy relief from such obligations by giving money, is a poor benefactor. The poorest, meanest, and on that account the most cruel way of meeting the misery that now overlies our cities is by meeting it with money. The last thing these people need is money. It is possible to expend money for the relief of the poor so as to make it a curse to the poor. Woe to the man who takes the bread out of the orphan's mouth. Woe to him who in his sharp business transactions crowds the toiler to the wall, pins him to that wall with his iron barbs of profit, and then leaves him there. Woe to the capitalist who when he finds that he can make more by withdrawing his capital from that circulation which alone made it, than by allowing it to remain in the business at reduced profits, thus turning out of employment the very men upon whose shoulders he climbed into prosperity, and through the diligence of whose hands his accumulating percentages came.

But still greater woe to the man who puts bread into the orphan's mouth in such a way as to render him a double orphan, taking away his self-reliance, taking away the courage that fights to the end. Still greater woe to him who, having wronged the employe by his grasping methods, outwitted hands with brain, eases his conscience, satisfies his sense of respectability by throwing back 1 per cent. of the 10 per cent., perhaps, of illegitimate profit, into the charity fund, and then dismissing the case. Still greater woe to the capitalist who, having by means of his superior brains secured for himself a competency, now refuses to use those brains of his in the more inspiring task of devising means by which the unemployed can be employed again: finding a way of putting bread upon that man's table without de-vitalizing and de-humanizing. Are not those living in dreary acres of workingmen's cottages—dreary because the homes of enforced idleness—our brothers and sisters? Can they be fed from a crib like sheep? Can they be stanchioned like cattle, each to eat his portion and then to lie down and be satisfied until feeding time comes again? Indiscriminate charity has proven itself to be a greater scourge than famine. This blind gospel of pity, this churchly habit of buying heaven by giving alms, has made of Italy—the sunniest land of Europe, a land as bountiful as it is sunny—the swarming place of paupers, the paradise of beggars. This atoning for great money made, by free contributions of money to alleviate the misery which ought to be wiped out, remedied, has made Ireland what it is. This emergency has come upon this country through somebody's blundering or crime; some men, wittingly or unwittingly, are responsible for this stagnation and indolence, at a time when neither disease nor famine, neither blight nor pestilence has interfered with the legitimate activities of life to cause this present strain. Somebody, nay, many bodies, are responsible for this. They are most responsible to whom most is given. Let them not seek to palliate the suffering, but to remove the cause. And this cannot be done by starting soup houses, or encouraging, as one of our correspondents calls it, "chicken-pie charity." This same correspondent suggests that this principle of relieving first, investigating afterwards, is as dangerous and deceptive as the act of the man who, suffering the tortures of thirst adrift in his boat, determines to allay the same by drinking the salt water that rolls round him everywhere. What these men need is not money to buy bread, but work that will earn bread. And it is within the power of the people who made America's millions to find a way in which these men shall continue to toil; at least to the extent of winning the bare necessities of life. It is cruelty to take them out of the struggle for the next four months, because at the end of that time many of the sinews of the soul will be withered; courage, the toiler's only capital, will have taken flight. We have kept the man from starving, and have made an imbecile of him. We have saved the body and lost the soul; changed the workingman into a beggar. It is a small distance between thrift and squalor. It is on very long lines that the man has traveled out of the beast of prey who takes all he can get in the easiest way it is obtainable, to the man who prefers to starve rather than eat dishonorable bread, who would rather go hungry than beg. When a man has got to that regal position, in heaven's name let all be done to hold him there, to help him stay there.

And so we beg a New Year's gift of yourselves, for which there is no money substitute. We want an investment of brains. There is great need of skill. Business, not sentiment, is the demand now; it is not charity but justice, not pity but equity. And the men who have made the money out of these workingmen, live in houses built by them, traffic in goods manufactured by them, must turn in and by the power of their superior wisdom show these dependants the way out. Ours at the present time is no sewing-society problem. We cannot well delegate it to our wives and daughters. We must do it ourselves. The first thing and chief thing needed to meet this emergency, is brains, brains to cover our cities with a network of helpfulness as complete, self-correcting, adjustable and controllable as the mail delivery service. This could be done at less cost, fewer workers than the mail delivery. Who will say that it is not as important. The deserving poor, those who for the time being are meritorious dependents, can be found out, located, classified and treated, each case according to its needs, as a physician prescribes for his patients, not as the reckless Western farmer used to care for his cattle in winter: dump his fodder in piles in the open field, a wagon-load at a time, and then let the cattle fight it out; the steer with the sharpest horns getting the first and biggest meal, while the mild and dutiful cow, with a dependent calf, came in at the end to get what was left, and she had to be helped up in the spring. Under such a districting we may hope to see each home of misery endowed with its greatest need: a friend, a friend from the ranks of the more favored, a friend that proposes to see the family through, a friend that in the long run will win their confidence and not betray them. What they want is not alms, but this friend who will advise, find work, lend, and in the last extremity, give or get what will tide them over. When these home-makers are staid, and their calamities brought into a conscious relationship with a human providence that will prove to them to be divine providence, then we may be more able to cope wisely with that more perplexing, ever growing, ever menacing class of the professional malcontent; he who is scheming to live without work, the unsuccessful speculator in rags,—for that is what every professional beggar is. He, like the speculator, tries to get something for nothing. He hopes to cut across lots and come out ahead of the man who keeps on the main traveled road. The only difference between the speculator and this kind of a beggar is, the speculator succeeds and he does not. This class of men must be met with the sternness with which nature deals with such. It is kindness to such to be severe. A lazy man receives from God this alternative, work or starve, and men have no business to interfere with the divine method. God knows best in this matter.

We ask for a New Year investment of brains, of love which money cannot buy and which money cannot substitute. If every family in Chicago that is lifted above the physical wants enforced by this season were to start out to find one other family in distress, not to throw a turkey or a candy bag in at the door and say, "Happy New Year's," but to find them, to know them, to be patient with them, warn them, guide them, help them, and ultimately, of course, love them: every suffering home in our land would be lightened with a New Year's joy, and it would come out at the end of this season of pressure not weakened but strengthened. There are not miserable families enough in the United States to match the prosperous ones. Every sinner, every beggar, every dawdling drunkard, every shame shadowed sister might have, could have, ought to have at least some one friend who, though rejected and refused, would still continue to have a thought for him or her, to lay hold with something of the everlasting love of God that will not turn aside or be refused. Something like this is the solution of the so-called charity problem. We cannot help human beings in bundles. We must help them individually, one at a time. In the battle of life each one who falls has a wound of his own, peculiar, individual. It requires special treatment, a prescription that must not be duplicated. Only quacks ignore this fact, and expect to care for all the sick with one prescription. Let us have done with this quackery in philanthropy, rise above this periodic burst of sentimentalism that weeps over the miseries of winter in order that it may go jolly and careless all summer, and give at this New Year's time, that only thing we have to give that is unquestionably ours, ourselves.

Are We Just to the Orthodox?

In our correspondence column, under the heading "A Union Thanksgiving Service," appear the reasons of a Methodist minister for declining to unite with "liberal" churches in such a service.—upon which Mr. Foster has asked a comment from UNITY.

Such action as our correspondent here calls attention to must be distasteful to liberals; but are not we of the liberal faith inclined to address our criticism to the wrong point? It is sad that the Orthodox Christians for whom Dr. Rhea speaks should have such a narrow thought of the universe, such an inadequate conception of man's relation to the world and the World-Spirit. But, having that view, we can but commend Dr. Rhea for his consistency and honesty. He not only professes to believe the doctrines of his church, but by his words and actions he shows that he is trying to live up to (or down to) his belief. He does not mean to hold his creed—as do so many of the "liberal-orthodox"—in a Pickwickian sense; and for this loyalty to principle he deserves our respect.

Of course, it may be said that he is far from being truly consistent, inasmuch as he professes to take the Bible and the life of Jesus as therein set forth for his guide in life, and in his present action he really diverges widely from the true spirit of Jesus' teaching. But such inconsistency as this is inherent in the nature of the case. The New Testament itself does not give us a consistent picture of Jesus; and no one who accepts as a divinely inspired and infallible guide a whole literature, expressing the various thoughts of many different minds in successive ages of unequal culture.—giving to the expressions of the crude morality of the earliest day exactly the same authority as to the later expressions of the highest thought of the nation,—can possibly have a consistent theory of life. But Dr. Rhea has taken the most consistent course possible in the dilemma in which he is placed. Having, by the act of joining an orthodox church, accepted its interpretation of the teaching of the Bible as the true one, he purposes to live in accordance therewith, and,—quite naturally, as it seems to us,—objects to uniting in a public religious service with those whose life and work are given to the overthrow of what he regards as vital truth and as necessary to the final salvation of the soul. If the vicarious atonement and salvation by Christ alone are the essential truths of religion to Dr. Rhea, what common religious ground has he with a Unitarian? Should we be willing to unite in a service of thanksgiving with those whose reason for giving thanks was that God had confounded us and rendered the teaching to which our lives were devoted, futile? And are not the cases parallel? Is not one of the reasons for the liberal's thankfulness of heart, that the world is fast outgrowing the enervating and immoral superstition of the vicarious atonement and salvation through the blood of Christ alone? Certainly it is so with the writer. To him the doctrine named seems a damnable one. But he cannot reasonably, and does not, expect his Methodist brother to unite with him in his thankfulness that that false and pernicious doctrine is dying out.

It seems to us that in finding fault with the orthodox for illiberal action, we are often unjust, and show very little power of imagination. The spirit of the golden rule requires that we should put ourselves in the places of those whose conduct we would weigh; and this we fail to do. If we should try to follow Charles Reade's rule,—“Put yourself in his place,”—we should find that if the orthodox were sincere and consistent in the beliefs they profess to regard as cardinal, their actions would be far less liberal than as a rule they actually are. The fact is, that their conduct is generally much broader than their doctrine,— an evidence, it must be admitted, of very loose thinking on their part, or else of what is coming to be known as intellectual dishonesty. Liberal actions from subscribers to illiberal creeds or disciplines, is more pleasant than commendable; and when we do find a man who thinks clearly enough to see the inconsistency, and has the strength of mind to act in accordance with his profession, let us honor his moral integrity, even if we must regret his intellectual perversity. If there were more such men the progress of truth and righteousness would be more rapid. Their moral integrity would soon bring-out in strong relief the absurdity of their theological dogmas. It is a common saying that the best way to bring about the repeal of a bad law is to have it enforced; and in like manner, to effect the overthrow of false religious dogmas which have survived from a less enlightened era, it is only necessary that men should be earnest enough to try to carry them into practice.

Men and Things

IN the December Forum Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer says: The triumph of women in their detached existence in the Woman's Building at the World's Fair . . . does away with its farther necessity. Having proved what they can do together, women may now the more easily cease to treat themselves as a peculiar people. Henceforth they are human beings. Women's buildings, women's exhibits, may safely become things of the past. . . . After what has been achieved the self-consciousness of women will be lessened, and their sensitiveness about their own position, capacity and rights will be naturally outgrown. People will find less interest in these artificial classifications. Even at Chicago large numbers of women preferred to range their exhibits in the common hall rather than under feminine banes. Their demonstration of the needless of any special treatment of their sex must be reckoned one of the permanent gains for women from the Fair.

THE Woman's Temple, conducted by the Baptist City Mission of New York, besides holding numerous services every Sunday, has a kindergarten, a boys' brigade, a service for Hebrews, one for Italians, a hot-coffee stand, an employment bureau, a free dispensary, a wood-yard, a printing office, and many other forms of activity.

The Golden Age.

My friend, your golden age is gone:
But good men still can bring it back again;
Rather, if I must speak the truth, I'll say
The golden age of which the poet sings
In flattering phrase, this age at no time was
On earth one whit more than it is today;
And, if it ever was, 'twas only so As all good men can bring it back to-

In the Great Northwest.

So far as extent of territory is concerned there is a greater country upon our northwest borders than even the United States itself. From Vancouver to Winnipeg via the Canadian Pacific Railway the traveler gets suggestive glimpses of the bigness of this semi-foreign country so near our own doors. If the traveler has occasion to stop at a dozen or more places on the way and thereby comes into touch with the people, his experience and knowledge of these cousins over the border is significantly enlarged. The trip adds positive additions to one's geographical repertoire, not only of rivers and towns but of provinces and territorial divisions. Many people have heard, for instance, of the charming summer retreat at Banff, with its curative hot sulphur springs and its magnificent setting of massive mountain scenery. But suppose we wished to send a letter to Banff, would it not puzzle us to address it correctly without immediately previous and definite instruction? The question would be raised whether the address should read "British America," "Dominion of Canada" or "Northwest Territory." The Dominion of Canada is co-extensive with what the old geographers once included under the name British America. The subdivisions are provinces and territories. For instance, Vancouver and Victoria are in the province of British Columbia, and Banff and Calgary are in the territory of Alberta. Regina is in the territory of Assinabola, and Winnipeg is in the province of Manitoba. The provinces correspond to our state governments, with their own capitals and legislative houses. The territories are under the Dominion government, the executive representatives of which are the red-coated, double-spurred "mounted police," who add a picturesque feature to the streets of the territorial villages and towns. The people of this Northland are hearty livers. They eat and drink with a zest. Tea is the favorite beverage, but no hotel would be considered fully equipped that did not make special provision for the supply of other beverages besides tea, coffee and milk. Out-of-door sports, such as hunting, racing, and games of polo, enjoy the highest popular favor. The church is everywhere spoken of with deference and respect. People are members of a church and support it as a matter of course—much as they support a volunteer fire department.

Even in a large and bustling town like Winnipeg one is impressed by the Sabbath quiet of Sunday. The stores, shops, fruit stands are all practically closed. Even the street cars are given a Sunday rest. The Sunday quiet is not a loss in any real way, but is certainly a help to rest and refreshment of body and an opportunity for the quickening of heart and soul. Of course there is no Sunday newspaper, but there is one on Monday, it may be observed. The practical advantage of being a member of church is suggested by some of the newspaper advertisements. Young men advertising for rooms and board consider it in their favor to state that they are members of this or that church. Whether they expect special rates because they are Methodists or Episcopalians cannot by me be affirmed, but it is plain they consider it worth while to mention the fact. Here is a stretch of nearly 2,000 miles, from Victoria to Winnipeg, where there is not one Unitarian or Universalist Church. Liberal religion has here no local habitation and scarcely a name. There are many places where the lack is scarcely felt as a want. But in some of the larger places there is a field for our nimble-footed Postoffice mission epistle apostles, who, if rightly directed, will cheerfully cross the border and travel 1,000 miles on a two-cent fare. Calgary, Regina, Brandon, and Portage la Prairie, all thriving towns of from 4,000 to 6,000 population, are some of the places where such service might meet a grateful reward. Here is the land of ten-thousand-acre wheatfields and abundant harvests of breadstuffs. Here also ought to be other sowing than dry, conservative husks of spiritual truth. In Winnipeg it gave me great pleasure to meet with the Unitarian congregation of Icelanders one Sunday evening. The address, fortunately for me, if not for the majority of the congregation, was given in the language of the United States. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Petersen, speaks Icelandic, but he was absent from the pulpit on account of sickness. His place was supplied by his wife, who speaks English only. At Grand Forks, N. D., is another one of those surprises of brick and stone and bustling trade. Here is a town of metropolitan proportions, so new that its name has scarcely found a place in the most lately revised geographical text books. A Universalist church movement is here under way. The Sunday services are held in the Opera House and have drawn large congregations. At St. Cloud, Minn., where the Father of Waters is but a little boy in kilts, it was a pleasure greater than that given by the rich autumn colors of the oak and the maple to meet the genial smile of the Unitarian minister, Rev. Mr. Staples. With his gem of a church and the strong support which he has won for his constituency he may well look with eyes of genial sunshine upon the world about.

Minneapolis was my last stopping place before reaching the World's Fair City.—Minneapolis, the city that does more than any other towards answering the daily bread petition in the prayer universal. Rev. Dr. Shutter, of the Universalist Church, extends the right hand of fellowship. Not being able to meet the Unitarian pastor, Rev. Mr. Simons, the Unitarian Church here was studied only from the outside. It is centrally located, is solidly built of rugged red-tinted stone, and is evidently the home of a large and influential fellowship. NAPOLEON HOAGLAND.

How Do Unitarians Celebrate Christmas, and Why Do They Celebrate It at All?

Well, in our church, we have used for ten years the beautiful Christmas service in our "Unity Festival" book. Church and Sunday school unite in one common service. We link ourselves with the past of "Merrie England" by singing her quaint old carols. We sing "How Lovely Thy Tabernacles, Lord," and our hearts warm as at the touch of a dear old friend.

On Christmas, as on other festival days, the babies are brought for christening, and the elders are welcomed into the fellowship of labor for and good will to men.

Let me quote from our service:—
Holy and joyful is the Christmas festival
Wherein we call to mind Jesus of Nazareth
To rejoice in his birth, to give thanks for his goodness.

When a holy prophet appears on the earth,
And hath wrought righteousness,
And renews the faith and hope of men,
Teaching the truth which maketh free,
Then the people adore him with gladness,
They glorify his birth, deeds and life.

Is this sufficient answer to the question why do Unitarians celebrate Christmas?

The Future of Religious Evolution.

ADDRESS READ BEFORE THE CONGRESS OF EVOLUTIONISTS, CHICAGO, SEPT. 28, 1893, AT THE ART INSTITUTE.

BY E. P. POWELL.

The future of religion from the evolution standpoint is not fortuitous. It is a product of evolution and has never changed its specific nature. Local and temporary features arise, but they never have affected its inherent character or altered its purpose.

Religion arose in the primitive family as the care of the dead. Its object was to feed and nourish the departed members of the family. Death, with simple peoples, never has seemed to be anything but departure. Annihilation never entered the head of anything but a philosopher.

Religion thus at the outset involved two ideas, departed friends and immortality. Gradual elimination made gods of the heroic dead; and farther elimination, with the expanding views of science, left God and Immortality. These two ideas have accompanied all social progress and bottomed all civilization.

Religion—from religo, to bind together—had therefore as its object the perpetual union of the living and the departed. It was so important a matter, as the primitive families grew, that the household patriarchy was differentiated into two; the father and the priest; that is, the father, or patriarch of civil affairs, and the pope, or patriarch of spiritual affairs. This division of offices was at the dawn of history; it has never since failed to be an essential factor of history. It probably will never cease to be such.

Church and state have moved side by side: rarely ever free of jealousy; and not seldom antagonistic. Each, however, has touched the other at times helpfully. In great crises of the state the church has been its true friend. It saved Europe from barbarism after the dissolution of the Roman Empire; it equally saved us in the anarchy that followed our Revolution for Independence. It is but just that the state shall equally befriend the church.

The expansion of the original family into tribes was easily tallied by the development of tribal religions. National organizations were also no more speedy than the formation of national religions. The rise of internationalism is already anticipated by the rise of "the religion of humanity." A great exposition of the world's arts naturally included a great parliament of religions. Do not mistake history; the Church has always moved as fast as the State; sometimes faster. Our tyrants are not either the secular rulers or the priests; but ignorance and imperfection. So long as evolution goes on the two factors of progress, pari passu, are State and Church.

Dei gratia monarchy made vox populi vox Dei republicanism a deal of trouble; creating a sentiment of atheism, with a practice of agnosticism. The warfare of theology with science added to popular dissatisfaction, and led to a condemnatory judgment of religion. Liberal minds in the nineteenth century have steadily tended to desert the Church; if not to wish for its dissolution altogether. I have been accustomed to believe churches would gradually become transformed into teaching institutions.

If so it does not imply that the Church can be allowed to assume the control of State education. It must attend to its own business, that is, God and Immortality. These involve all of ethics, and conscience, and character. The offices of Church and State need never collide, nor should they coincide. The chief trouble has been that the Church has its eyes on the future, which it inclines to exaggerate at the cost of the present. It despises and then despairs of this world.

No great religion ever existed that did not become pessimistic. Optimism is, however, the highest social necessity. A progressive age cannot continue to exist with a pessimistic Church. The consequence would be nihilism and suicide. The phenomena of Ibsenism, Tolstoism, realism, belong to an age where the State is out-running the Church,—inducing an offclearing of old theology.

The new theology must have a new science; for all theology begins with cosmology, geology, astronomy and biology. The Mosaic yields to the Copernican and the Darwinian already. With this change of data it is possible, for the first time, to establish on the earth a religion of optimism. Mr. Mivart so denominates the theology of evolution. It dispenses with the Fall, and the failure of a creative plan; but it establishes a rise of life and love from the dawn of anthropoidal existence. Evolution begins with establishing our common brotherhood as children of an eternal and universal purpose; a purposing without beginning and without end. It knows only one law, that of progress, by obedience to the right; it has but one fear, that of stagnation and degeneration by disobedience.

The religion of evolution withdraws a part of the emphasis placed on duty toward the eternal, and lays larger emphasis on duty toward the temporal. On the whole I do not see in it anything not essentially involved in pure Christianity. Jesus rid of tradition is the Christ of evolution. The golden rule as much as natural selection is a law of nature. The parables are the enunciation of a religion of humanity. The church of the future will move alongside the state, as it always has done, but in the tide of hope and progress.

These two great factors of history will necessarily be perpetual, if each adheres to its own office. The state will tend at points to lapse into anarchy, and will be saved by the church; at other points the church will become arrested in development, only for the aid of the state. The two are complementary parts of the original family-unit of society. Neither can exist alone. Neither can absorb the other wisely. A state church is a lapse in evolution.

That the church of evolution will continue to build heathen temples, or Parthenons and mosques, I do not anticipate. Nor will it be, or seek to be, an owner of landed or other estates exempt from taxation. Its buildings will most probably be homes, asylums, retreats and schools. It does not belong to the church to teach agriculture, art, mechanics, commerce, economics, finance; which will constitute the burden of secular education. It will always emphasize the future and economics of the soul, while the State will emphasize the present and economics of the body. Therefore on no account will it do to allow the church to secure control of the common schools. The republic should be based on education; but not on that which the church will furnish. We do not ask the pope of evolution to pronounce a benediction on our secular efforts. There must be no cessation in the determination to complete a system of distinctively American education.

Our heredity from Europe comes strongest in church and school. We emancipated ourselves only in sociopolitical affairs. We left monarchy behind in the State, but brought along the monarchical schools. Our education was directly a descendant and heir of monastic institutions. Our colleges were religious schools, and our girls' seminaries were hardly transformed nunneries. We have never yet built an educational schedule coequal with the political; because we have abnormally endeavored to leave our higher education under church control, while the fundamental common schools have been secularized. Each State should proceed to complete its popular educational system as a unit from bottom to top; should, in fact, organize all the people in a scheme as perfect as the political. Begin in each State with the kindergarten, and move on up to the higher schools and the university of the State. At this point let all the citizens, graduating by a system of university extension, find at Washington a vast national university with such appliances for higher culture as exist nowhere else in the world. At no point would this system be else than a collateral of the political system; its object to make self-sustaining, honorable and wise citizens. I care not how liberal any church may be, how ethical and how progressive; it is not that organism which we call the nation. Let it do well its own correlative work. When the Church has no distinct office let it die.

Will the church of the future not pass largely into the hands of women? This is a problem also to be solved by evolution. There is nothing in history to indicate that this may not occur. Woman in the Church has occupied relatively about the same position that she has in the State. Nearly equal now in secular affairs, she is also nearly on a level in church affairs. The Church of the Roman Empire passed into a stage of this sort. Other national churches developed similar eras. It is altogether the more probable in our own history, because the latter part of the nineteenth century, in all its industrial and professional features, has eliminated the masculine in favor of the feminine. It is a feminine age by preference. Placed purely on the basis of the struggle for existence, the woman has many advantages over man in all church offices. Some half dozen of our denominations have, within the past twenty years, begun to give over the preaching as well as the ministering office to women. It must be borne in mind also that the Christian church had for its founder a man of that peculiar type, probably the most perfect type, in which feminine sentiment blended most completely with masculine vigor and force of character. The early church was nourished and nursed into strength not so much by its male disciples as by its female. It never has been able to completely secure its hold upon the populace without the exaltation of the Virgin Mother beside the spotless Son. And to-day the real Savior of the pitiful lower classes of humanity is Mary. In other words, the feminine spirit is needed to render the strength of the church most potent among the people.

Will the coming church be exclusive or inclusive, esoteric or exoteric? Will it be an organization for the saints, the elect, the chosen, or for the whole people,—in other words, the whole family of man, as it was at its inception? The tendency historically has always been for a priestly class to arise, claiming peculiar relations to the gods, and admitting only its believers and favorites to the privileges of light and love; and ready always to doom to eternal misery all its antagonists, or even half-way friends. The next stage of evolution has invariably been the decay of the church, partly by a natural process of dissolution, and partly by force of reform; giving rise to a new church with doctrines less artificial, and a sympathy more humane, and a philosophy more in accordance with advancing science. These eras of decay and reform have curiously been historically about five hundred years each. Dating from the Reformation of the sixteenth century the evolution of the present reform will be complete about the year 2000. In other words we are moving forward to the ripening of the great reformation of rationalism and modern science. Beginning with the announcement of the Copernican theory, this era passes on under the control of Darwin and Spencer. Evolution establishing a larger brotherhood of mankind, at the same time enlarges the idea of the fatherhood of God; and gives back to religion its old meaning of bind together, religo.

What will be the organic form of the evolving Church? Fusion would only be confusion. Progress has always depended on coition, in order to separation and duplication. Multiplication ends in unity; unity again ends in reduplication. Nothing is to be dreaded like stagnation. You must first make masses into men, in order to secure real unity and aggressive force. A thousand stoutly individualized persons are stronger than a million in a lump. Our sects do not do as much harm as we imagine. They made freedom possible. We had first to create the rights of the hundreds before we could have the rights of the units. Yet sects are ephemeral in their very nature, because begotten of a temporary need. They are excessively provoking; and sometimes must be helped to die out. But the great Parliament of Religions does not mean that we are to pool all our ideas and sympathies, and slough all our intense heredities. The tendency is toward a federation of States in Federal affairs. It is most likely we shall come to a federal union of independent sovereign churches. The central absolutism of the Papacy and the isolated non-orbital condition of Protestant sects are equally out of line with evolution. Politically we have invented a plan far ahead of either; a plan that sacrifices no valuable, and that combines for higher ends. The world's Church will probably hereafter be of the same sort.

This will not hinder our looking backward; nor in the least will it break historic connection with organicism or functioning of earlier ages. Jesus will remain as dear to the aspiring soul of the twentieth century as to the down-looking ascetic of the fifth; or to a Kempis and Pascal; or to the more outward-looking Luthers and Beechers. The Sermon on the Mount has the same sort of historic reality as the American Constitution. But to restore primitive Christianity would be, if possible, only a reversion and not evolution.

Our duty is not to work in the pell-mell of effort to harmonize Moses or even Jesus with modern ideas and methods; but to determine what the truth is, and apply the same unflinchingly to solve the problems of morals, education, politics, sociology. We must learn that religion once more requires close study and severe thinking, as well as emotion and sentiment. The chief trouble is our heredity of shiftless thinking. If we must conflict with organic Christianity it is not because it offers bad theology, but because the churches exist to-day with practically no theology at all. The creeds swing all the way from pole to equator; and the preachers do not even pretend to be true to what creeds they avow. Evolution comes forward as a very positive, aggressive, defined creed. It undertakes to demonstrate immortality and divine imminent universal life. It has decisive words on our duties and our lives. It weaves the Golden Rule into everyday being, from the begetting of children to the care of old age. That we shall be called to choose between Chicago and Jerusalem I not believe. Speeches made before the Parliament of Religions will not displace the Parables.

The morals of the coming Church are perhaps a matter of most import. Altruism has crowded out honor for ourselves; and in mediæval as well as modern piety it collapsed into the most intense selfishness. Evolution can never abandon the individual; it can never indorse absolutism. Paternalism in every department of life is passing away in favor of fraternalism. Primitive Christianity laid its emphasis on charity and chastity. These are properly both secular virtues; and must be given back to the care of the State. The Church has never been able to construct a wise system of either charity or chastity. Meanwhile, by assuming these to be peculiarly identified with religion, the secular organism has been left neglectful of decency and honor. So long as men do not profess religion, they hold themselves absolved of honor in social or sexual relations. It is in evolution to hand these virtues back to the state, and say: "Organize charity so that there shall be care and comfort for all; and as for purity, know that your governments will rot and your citizenship fail without it. The Church may advise on these points and help you to enforce the right." Piety covers only the one morality of loving our neighbors as ourselves because of our common childhood with the Soul Father. Our duty is to save ourselves, our whole full selves; to use ourselves without waste; to hold our faculties as trustees thereof, and not absolutist owners.

Religious evolution will constitute the same steady and sure, but slow, progressive change that we find in society and biological organisms. It is inconsistent with supernatural inspiration and authority. It is purely the natural flow of human sentiment on questions of tenderest import: following the enlightenment of the intellect by science. As we know more, we shall feel more honorably and act more purely. The making of man is a process but just begun. His hopes are not too vast. His immortality is not the greatest of his endowments or achievements.

Jesus and Modern Life.

EDITOR OF UNITY: In your issue of Nov. 16th my friend Mr. Fenn has a review of my last book, Jesus and Modern Life. It is a complimentary review; and I am glad he could say so many good things about it. But, in a wholly gentle and kindly way, he has put on my shoulders a few more "blunders" than I am quite willing to carry. I ask the privilege of unloading two or three of them.

1st. Of course, my reference to Paul as the author of the saying, "Who for the joy that was set before him," etc., is a slip of "popular" speech.

2d. But I cannot at all see how my reference to Psalm cxix. shows any thought of David's authorship lurking in my mind. If any one will take the trouble to read bottom of p. 46 and top of p. 47 he will see.

3d. As to whether belief in a future life is taught in the Old Testament: My first statement (p. 57, near top) is, "There is not a single clear trace," etc. I still think that is true. The passage in Is. xiv. 9, seq., is only a strong bit of poetry. There is nothing here that we would speak of as "a future life." It is that on nothingness. As to Saul and the Witch of Endor, it is a bit of local superstition which the teachers did not teach, but suppressed. In any case, it is not what we mean by "a future life."

I notice that the Rev. Edward H. Hall, in his volume of sermons just out (p. 202), says, after reviewing and quoting from the Old Testament, "The idea of the future life is absent then from the Old Testament." On the page preceding, he says, "It is wholly silent upon the subject."

4th. As to Jesus the Christ, Mr. Fenn is correct. If I had said generally instead of "everywhere," I should have been more nearly correct.

5th. In the last case, I must once more decline to shoulder the "slip" or blunder. I think the ordinary critical use of the word "authentic" carries the idea of a document's having a known and so a credible authorship. Now, as to the story of the woman in John viii., I hope it is true; but Mr. Fenn agrees with me that it does not belong in the fourth gospel. Unless, then, he knows the author, or at least that it is true, I should question his right to speak of it as authentic.

So, of the five "slips," I am ready to plead guilty as to only two. And they are the least of all.

I do not often reply to criticisms. If Mr. Fenn had said it was a bad book, I should not have replied now. It is only that I do not like to appear guilty of any more mistakes than ought really to be laid to my charge.

M. J. SAVAGE.

[If there is one thing that I detest more than almost anything else it is controversy, especially newspaper controversy, but since Mr. Savage's letter ought to be printed in justice to him, may I be allowed a few words in reply?

Of the five points made against his valuable book, two are admitted at once, but they are only trivial oversights, as, indeed, was said in the review. With regard to Ps. cxix. It is a little hard to be asked to read the passage upon which the criticism was based, as if I had not already done so. But, waiving this, what can we say as to the facts. Ps. cxix. is evidently of very late date; Cheyne (Bampton Lectures, p. 51) places it in the pre-Maccabean portion of the Greek period. At this time only a comparatively small portion of the Old Testament was unwritten, and not a "large part," as Mr. Savage says. Furthermore, there did exist at this time a book containing part of what we know as the Old Testament. The Torah in substantially its present form was undoubtedly in existence, and it is this "Law" which the Psalmist has in mind (cf. Ryle, O. T. Canon, p. 89). In the earlier prophetic books it is true that the "word of the Lord" has no reference to a book, and the use in cxix. 89 may be similar, but it seems reasonably certain that in the verse which Mr. Savage cites the word does refer to a book and that that book is the Torah. So Cheyne (Bampton Lectures, p. 348): "The 'lamp' of the sofer is not the 'spirit of man' (Prov. xx. 27), divine as this too may be, but that brighter light (Ps. cxix. 105) which includes the ancient 'wisdom' as a part of an already varied and comprehensive Bible." Mr. Savage's statement cannot be true of a Psalm so late as cxix., and to make it seemed to indicate that for the moment the author was giving the Psalm, unconsciously of course, a very early, if not a Davidic date.

The point of Mr. Savage's answer to the second criticism is that the state described in Isaiah and the Witch of Endor story is not "what we mean by a future life." It is true that our hopes have invested that term with the notion of desirableness, but that is only a derived sense, like the use of the word life to mean "life indeed." By future life is usually meant continued existence after death, without reference to desirableness or undesirableness, and that future life was believed in by the Jews: according to Dr. Toy it is a so "the old Semitic conception." That the quotation from Isaiah is poetry and that from Samuel is superstition does not at all affect the fact that the Jews as a people did believe in existence after death. The belief was never urged by the prophets because of the character of sheol, there were no rewards or punishments, and the practice of necromancy, which they steadfastly condemned, contributed to keep it in the background. Mr. Savage says (p. 57), "The Jews did not believe in any future life;" Dr. Schultz (O. T. Theology, II. p. 321) says, "The Hebrews, like all the civilized nations of antiquity, firmly believed in a continued existence after the death of the body." Mr. Savage says: "In the Old Testament there is not a single clear trace of any belief in any future life for men, with the one exception of the book of Daniel." Dr. Schultz says: "Even in the oldest parts of the Old Testament death is never thought of as being actually the complete end of existence." For reasons already given, the idea is not prominent in the Old Testament, or used for didactic purposes, but it was a belief of the Jews and there are traces of it in the Old Testament.

Mr. Savage's use of the word authentic is not quite accurate. The ordinary critical use of it is that given in the quotation from Bp. Watson in the Century Dictionary. "A genuine book is that which is written by the person whose name it bears. . . . An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact as they really happened. A book may be authentic without being genuine and genuine without being authentic." The Fourth Gospel, for instance, is probably not genuine, but it may be authentic nevertheless. This story of the woman taken in adultery, ascribed to John, is not genuine, but it may be a true story. I did not say it was authentic, but only that its excision from the Fourth Gospel, by no means proved that it was not. My position was that taken by Dr. Hurt (Introduction: Notes on Select Readings, p. 87): "The story itself has justly seemed to vouch for its own substantial truth, and the words in which it is clothed to harmonize with those of other Gospel narratives. These considerations are, however, independent of the question of Johannine authorship. They only suggest that the narrative had its origin within the circle of apostolic tradition." From Mr. Savage's point of view not a single story in Synoptics or Fourth Gospel could be termed "authentic," since we do not know that Matthew, Mark and Luke wrote the books which bear their names, nor do we know on other grounds that these (critically) anonymous stories are true.

It was certainly presumptuous to criticize the work of an older and better scholar than myself, but it has been shown, I hope, that there was foundation for the criticism. Yet it is unfortunate that the good points of the book were not more strongly emphasized, lest a false impression should be left as to its really great value.—W. W. FENN.]

A Union Thanksgiving Service.

EDITOR UNITY:—Permit me to call your attention to the following clipping in which an orthodox minister gives his reasons for not uniting with a liberal church of this city, that all might give thanks on a day set apart for the purpose. Such narrowness I cannot commend and it is just such actions of men professing to teach Christianity that shakes my faith in the church and its professions. I should like to hear you comment on the matter, editorially.

Yours truly,

F. E. FOSTER.

Iowa Falls, Iowa

Dr. Rhea, pastor of the Methodist Church, preached last Sabbath morning on the difference between Evangelical and Unevangelical churches, and the reasons why they could not consistently unite in religious services as churches or ministers. He showed that there were certain vital and essential doctrines taught by the evangelical churches, which are denied and opposed by what are called the liberal churches, and that the one is tearing down what the other is trying to build. He said he had no personal ill-feeling toward anyone, was glad to yield to every one the right of free thought upon all questions, and was anxious to hold friendly relations with all men, but could not consistently or conscientiously unite in a public religious service with anyone whose life and work were given to the overthrow of what he believed was vital truth, and as necessary to the final salvation of the soul. He also said that the pastors of the Congregational and Baptist churches had said to him that they held the same views on the subject and that he was right in the position he had taken concerning the proposed union service. He said he thought that if men would look at the question in an unbiased light they would reach the same conclusions. The Evangelical Alliance, embracing the Evangelical churches of all Christendom, does not admit Un-evangelical denominations to membership. The Y. M. C. A. requires its active members to be of some Evangelical church. He also said, that while the Evangelical churches were not agreed among themselves on many questions, they were not at variance on the vital and essential doctrines of salvation. The doctrine of future eternal punishment for the wicked is not to be believed as a condition of salvation, nor is it required by the Methodist church, but most Evangelical Christians accept it as taught in the Bible. "We are saved by faith alone" is Methodist teaching. Evangelical Christians teach the necessity of the new birth by regeneration, and the witness of the Holy Spirit in the believers' hearts, as a condition of acceptance with God, and a holy life growing out of such change of heart. They believe in the inspiration of the Bible and in the divinity of Christ. They hold that the only condition of salvation is faith in Christ and a holy life, growing out of the regeneration of the heart by the Spirit of God. So-called liberal Christians virtually deny these things and hold that there is really no such thing as being lost—and that it is in God's plan to finally bring all to Himself and to the fellowship of heaven, and that it is not possible for any soul to be finally lost and ruined. The discourse was kind in spirit and manner, and was free from personalities or denunciation, and was listened to attentively by all present.

John C. Learned.

DEAR UNITY: What a man was that! When I went to St. Louis with eyes half opened to the light, pastor of a Congregationalist church, but not orthodox enough to suit those of the old faith, Learned came to me as a real brother, and I learned to thoroughly honor him. He was clean cut morally and intellectually; sincere and unflinching in his devotion to right and truth. But his peculiarity was his modest aggressiveness. No man was nearer the front; but you never heard him shouting captain's orders. He was eminently a scholar, and he went through things: not all over the surface. If I were to live a thousand years I should treasure the memory of John Learned. Truly yours,
E. P. POWELL.

The Study Table

The Magazines.

THE START, Mr. Sidney H. Morse's long expected magazine of art, science and literature for young people, is now in the hands of its readers, and we trust that it gives all something of the pleasure it gives to us. Mr. Morse has the divine quality of perpetual youth; and this youthfulness of heart gives him a fitness for the editorial management of such an enterprise which nothing else could supply. For this reason we believe that as fast as it becomes known to the young minds of the land, The Start will become so strongly entrenched in their affections that no juvenile magazine—however much money and brains be expended upon it—will be able to supplant it. Others can select and write things that are entertaining to the young, but it takes a mind like his, with all the sympathy of the artist, to recognize in the written or spoken word that which speaks for the young—which is the boy's own utterance. Most of the present number has evidently been written by the editor himself or by real boys and girls, youths and maidens. There is in consequence a freshness and sincerity about it all that, while it has all the attraction of a self-revelation for the young, has hardly less charm and perhaps even greater value for older readers, in the insight it gives into what is too often a sealed book to the care-worn adult—the soul of a child. We have not space to speak of the illustrations and the special art instruction which make so large a feature of the magazine, but must be content to counsel our readers to get the January number and examine it for themselves. In view of the favorable welcome that has greeted the venture, the editor gives us reason to hope that the magazine may be a bi-monthly instead of a quarterly, although at the same price—50 cents a year.

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS for December contains,—besides character sketches of Serge Julich Vitti, the Russian Minister of Finance, and a member of the talented Dolgoruki family, Tom Mann, Carter Harrison, Benjamin Jowett, Charles Gounod and the well-beloved Louis Ruchonnet, twice President of Switzerland, who died last September,—a very brief but suggestive and inspiring article entitled, "Two Experiments: Abbotsholme and Bedalls," treating of the boys' schools of Dr. Cecil Reddie and Mr. J. H. Badley, in which the attempt is made to apply the new ideas of education, by giving much time to outdoor work and the training of eye and hand and applying the results of modern pedagogics to the methods of pursuing such of the old-fashioned studies as are retained.

THE FREETHINKER'S MAGAZINE for November contains an admirable view of the Progress of Evolutionary Thought, from the pen of B. F. Underwood, editor of New Occasions, who delivered it as his opening address at the recent Congress of Evolutionists, of which he was chairman. In the same number Mr. D. K. Tenney treats us to one of his characteristic papers, combining admirably sensible remarks with most extraordinary misstatements and nonsequiturs.

THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL has been given over by Mrs. Bundy into the hands of Mr. B. F. Underwood, who has for a considerable time contributed to the strength of the paper. The Religio-Philosophical Journal is the one paper controlled by spiritualists which, from its moderation and the high degree of ability shown by most of its writers, commands the respect of readers of all shades of belief. It is doing a good work in bringing to the front that which is most unquestionable in psychic phenomena and most urgently demands explanation. The theory of the spiritualists as to the cause of these unexplained phenomena is not allowed to distort the facts. Under its new management we expect it to continue upon the high plane upon which it has previously been conducted.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal for November 18 is mostly taken up with a very interesting account, apparently perfectly authenticated, of the wonderful case of Miss Mary Fancher, of Brooklyn, N. Y. For a single case it is the most many-sided illustration, known to us, of our ignorance of the nature of psychic phenomena.

IN THE Open Court for November 16, Mr. T. B. Wakeman has an article entitled "Cellular Genesis Explains Heredity." Although the work of a layman, it seems to us suggestive of lines of thought which biologists would do well to consider with some care.

IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY for December 14, H. Olerich has a remarkably good article on educational methods for the reformer.

"School Is Out!"

The village street is full of children
 Bounding along with joyous feet,
 Till the work-crowned folk, the burden-bearers.
 Feel the current of life they meet
 Enter their own like a matchless tonic,
 Putting the orderly pulse to rout,
 And waking the heart to youthful echoes
 That beat at the door of care and shout,
 "School is out!"
 Yet the tide is turned in the glorious morning
 And tends to the grander depths of the sea;
 The children front the tasks of the future;
 The toiler's pulse beats strong and free,
 Since the arm God needs, rest nerves and strengthens,
 And the cares of men gird earth about
 With a myriad sweet and kindly blessings;
 School calls again! Then hail the shout,
 "School is out!"

MARION LISLE.

Her Young Were Saved.

A herd of five thousand beeves were toiling over the lonely trail from New Mexico to Kansas, leaving behind them across the grassy plains and valleys a swarth as bare as if it had been swept by the fiery breath of a simoon.

Suddenly the leader of the herd, a huge steer, started back in terror, gave vent to a snort of warning, and moving to the right passed on. Those immediately in his rear turned to right or left, and their example was followed by each long-horned pilgrim as he reached the dreaded spot.

When the entire herd had passed, a wide, trampled track lay behind, but near the middle of this dusty space stood a luxuriant island of grass three feet in diameter.

A Lerdsmann rode up to the spot and dismounted, expecting to find a rattlesnake, a creature of which cattle as well as horses have an instinctive and well-founded dread. Instead of a serpent, however, the grass tuft contained only a harmless kildee plover, covering her nest, while her wings were kept in constant and violent motion. Seen indistinctly through the grass, she had evidently been mistaken by the steer for a rattlesnake.

She did not take flight, even at the cowboy, but valiantly pecked at his boot as he gently pushed her to one side to find that the nest contained four unfledged kildees. —Selected.

A Story About Venice.

Let me tell you a story about the pigeons of Venice. If you were there you could see, at 2 o'clock every afternoon, flocks and flocks of pigeons lighting on the pavement near the great church of St. Mark's. No one ever thinks of disturbing them; no boy or girl in Venice would dare to throw a stone at them. But the people, young and old, like to go at that hour to see the tame, beautiful birds.

What do they come for? To be fed. A great many years ago, in the early days of Venice, the people used to keep what they called movable stores in the great square. They were something like the fruit-stands at our corners, only they were dotted about in the square, and a large umbrella was spread over each. One man had four of these and was quite rich. He was a good, kind-hearted man, and liked to have the pigeons come down from their cotes away up in the high buildings and pick up the crumbs around his stores. The magistrates, seeing him so interested in the birds, allowed him a sum of money to buy food for them, and he was to feed them every day at a certain hour.

Why this was done we do not know, unless it was for the pleasure of having the birds around. For Venice is a strange city, built on a great many little islands; the streets are all water, and the people go about in boats. They never ride, and there are many persons there who never saw a horse or even a cow. They have a few dogs, and the government is so kind that they have water carried every morning to fill the vessels all over the city where the dogs may drink. Perhaps it was this same kindness that led them to provide for the pigeons.

After awhile there was a change in the government, and the birds were neglected. But they still had a friend. A kind woman, who lived near the great church, began to miss the birds. Her name was Signora Polcastro. She made up her mind that if there was no one else to feed them she would. She did this as long as she lived, and when she died it was found that she had left money enough in her will to feed the pigeons always.

So now, strangers who go to Venice can go out in the square any day at two o'clock and see the pigeons fed. They come by hundreds, and seem to enjoy their food and company very much. —M. S., in "The Angelus."

The Rabbit's Tracks.

The reason a rabbit makes but three tracks in the snow is thus explained: In a deep snow a rabbit cannot run because its body is too long and its legs are too short. Were it to attempt to leap with its high legs spread apart like a dog's, which are no longer, it would only flounder. To acquire greater momentum and speed through the snow, the rabbit places one hind foot upon the other and thus concentrating the strength of both hind legs at one point instead of two, it projects itself through the entangling drifts. Of course its fore feet are spread apart to receive the descending weight of the body, else it would tumble sidelong in the snow. As it leaps on to its forefeet, it quickly places its lapped hind paws in another spot, and pushing from behind makes another leap, and thus it goes on for a great distance. And this is the reason why a rabbit leaves only three tracks in the snow.

THE DEATH OF JESUS.

*Careless seems the great Avenger; history's pages but record
One death-grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systems and the Word;
Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne.—
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own.*

—Lowell.

Picture: The Crucifixion, by Michel Angelo (1457-1564).

The picture is as painful to see as the lesson is to study. It represents Jesus after death while darkness still covers the land. The right hand has the conventional gesture of blessing, the crown of thorns is still about the head. At the foot of the cross lies a skull, partly to denote the place of crucifixion—Golgotha, place of a skull—but mainly to illustrate an ancient legend. Tradition relates that Jesus, the second Adam, was crucified over the grave of the first Adam, thus signifying that as the latter brought all woe into the world by taking the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, so the former brought all blessing to men by means of the tree of the holy cross. It will be noticed that "the blood which brought salvation" is trickling down upon the skull. The cross is the Roman cross, with four ends, and the letters on the placard nailed to the upright stand for Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews. This picture has been chosen in preference to others because it shows the crucified in loneliness and darkness.

How did Jesus die?—He was crucified near Jerusalem on Friday of Passover week.

The place of crucifixion cannot now be determined. Perhaps the weight of opinion is in favor of the "northern extension of the Temple Hill Seen from the Mount of Olives and other points of good view, this hill looks strikingly like a skull with a great eyeless socket" (Broadus). The name Golgotha, an Aramaic word, is interpreted to mean "the place of a skull" (Matt. xxvii. 33) and was probably given because of the shape of the hill. The name Calvary (Luke xxiii. 33 A. V.) is due to an Englishing of the Latin word Calvaria, found in the Latin Bible, which means skull.

After Jesus had been condemned by Pilate and scourged by the Roman soldiers he was led forth with two others, malefactors, to the place of crucifixion. As was customary, he was compelled to bear part of his cross, probably the transverse piece or pieces, and to pass through a frequented part of the town as a warning to evil doers. On the way he seems to have sunk under the burden, and a certain Cyrenian, Simon by name, whose sons were afterwards well known in the church (Mark xv. 21), was impressed into service and obliged to shoulder the cross. To a multitude of women who followed with wailings and lamentations, apparently not because they knew or cared for him personally, but only because he was doomed to a horrible death, Jesus spoke of the days that were coming, in which fearful calamities should befall the city. After the arrival at Golgotha preparations were speedily made for the execution. The upright was set in place while the victim was bound or nailed to the transverse beam lying on the ground. Then with ropes and ladders the crosspiece was lifted into place and made fast by nails or cords. The body was hoisted on a little peg, that its unsupported weight might not tear the hands away from the nails. The feet were spiked to the cross, and there the victim was left to die. Over his head was placed the board, which had been borne before him on the death walk, inscribed with his name and offense. According to the Fourth Gospel this was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Although the precise words are not reported (since no two evangelists agree concerning them), the accusation is unmistakable. "King of the Jews." There seems to have been a kindly usage that the condemned should be given a stupefying draught (provided, it is said, by certain women of Jerusalem) to deaden his agony, but of this Jesus would not drink (Matt. xxvii. 34). Was it because he would not creep past death, but taste the whole of it, "fare like his peers, the heroes of old" (Browning's Prospice), or because he had a faint hope that at the supreme moment divine assistance might come? That he refused to lose consciousness accounts for the tradition of

THE SEVEN WORDS FROM THE CROSS.

(a) "Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do." It is unfortunate that there should be doubt about the genuineness and authenticity of this utterance. It is found only in Luke, and even there some manuscripts omit it. Moreover, it is found, with no variant, in Acts vii. 60, ascribed to Stephen: and tradition relates that James, brother of Jesus, died with a similar prayer. It is possible that the prayer of Stephen was put into the lips of Jesus because it was so tenderly beautiful, and also because it fell in with Luke's idea of relieving the Romans, so far as possible, from the guilt of the death of Jesus.

(b) "Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Luke xxiii. 43). According to Matthew and Mark both "robbers" who were crucified with him joined in the ridicule arising from Roman soldiers and those who despised his Messianic claims; but Luke has heard that one of the robbers afterward repented and begged to be remembered by Jesus when he should come into his kingdom, and that in reply Jesus gave the second word from the cross. It is altogether improbable that in such circumstances one of the malefactors believed in Jesus as the Christ, yet it may be that the request proffered in derision was taken by Jesus in earnest. There is a pathetic undertone in the answer of Jesus which is almost invariably overlooked. It reads as if he were wavering in his belief concerning himself.

As to the kingdom, of that I say nothing, to-day you and I will be together in the place of departed spirits, so much I can promise. As a Jew the malefactor probably expected to enter Paradise, and Jesus knew that he would be there too, but of the future he declined to speak. This word from the cross was the beginning of that awful loneliness and doubt which are to find expression presently in the bitter "Eloi."

(c) "Woman, behold thy son! Behold thy mother!" (John xix. 23, 27). Jesus had not seen very much of his mother during his public ministry. She had watched his course with surprise and alarm; he had refused to heed her restraint and had spoken slightly of human relationships. Let us confess frankly that Jesus' treatment of his mother detracts from our ideal of his character. It is not noble to spurn earthly relationships as Jesus is reported to have done (Matt. xii. 46-50). But now, as his dreams of Messiahship are fading away, the simple, tender, human feeling of the home in Nazareth comes back, and, forsaken by his disciples, he sees his mother there, weeping near the cross. She has not forsaken him: he might have known that she never would. And so he commends her to the loving care of the disciple John, the only one who has come to the cross, and him to her motherly care. It is hard to understand why he should have taken her from the care of her own sons and daughters, but possibly knowing them he was convinced that she would be happier with John than with her own children. This would gain in plausibility if we could be sure that Mary had no children of her own besides Jesus, and that "his brethren" were sons of Joseph by a former marriage.

(d) "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" (Matt. xxvii. 46; Mark xv. 34). This is the one dying cry of Jesus which seems to be past dispute. And how heart-rending it is! A man who has always been sure of God, who has felt his presence everywhere and always, and trusted gladly in his loving care, now feels in his extremest need that his God had forsaken him. Jesus has lost his God. It may be sufficient to say that this feeling of utter loneliness and dismay was due entirely to his great physical suffering, but great as his bodily agony must have been there is in this heart-broken cry a hint of infinitely greater mental torture. Did he now realize, or feel, that this Messianic belief of his had been only a dream? that this death which had seemed to him so certainly the will of God was really not His will at all? Is this the agonized cry of a disillusioned man? One shrinks from such an idea because of the horror it suggests, but it may be true nevertheless.

(e) "I thirst." (John xx. 28.) Matthew and Mark relate that the Roman soldiers, not understanding Aramaic, mistook Eli or Eloi for the name of Elijah, upon whom they thought he was calling for assistance. It would have been out of harmony with John's conception of Jesus to put such a despairing cry into his lips, and therefore he has the vinegar, or cheap sour wine, offered to Jesus in response to a particular request and fulfillment of prophecy (Psalms lxix. 21).

(f) "It is finished." (John xix. 30.) As one who has accomplished his work and has power to lay down his life

Jesus majestically dies. Such is the picture in the Fourth Gospel, but Matthew and Mark know only that after the "Eloi" Jesus gave one long and bitter cry and then died. The Synoptists are decidedly to be preferred to John.

(g) "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." (Luke xxiii. 46.) We can but hope that this was spoken by Jesus, for in that case we should know that the horror had rolled away and that his God-consciousness was once more unclouded. But the "great cry" of Matthew and Mark seems more credible.

We need only mention the remarkable events that are said to have attended the death of Jesus as the star and the chorus of angels marked his birth.

(a) Darkness. All the Synoptists say that from noon till 3 o'clock there was a great darkness over all the land. The newly recovered "Gospel of Peter" has the same tradition, and adds that many went about with lanterns thinking it was night. Our own surprise that nature should be blithe and gay when we are sorrowing (Emerson's Threnody) shows us how the legend arose. It is said that the darkness cannot have been due to an eclipse, and therefore, if believed at all, it must be as a supernatural occurrence.

(b) The veil of the temple was rent in twain. (Matt. xxvii. 51; Mark xv. 38; Luke xxiii. 45). The Christian idea which probably gave birth to the tradition is given in Hebrews (ix. 11-28; x. 19). The veil was drawn between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies and was passed through only once a year, by the High Priest on the day of Atonement.

(c) Earthquake (Matt. xxvii. 51). This also was viewed as purely supernatural.

(d) The Resurrection of Saints (Matt. xxvii. 53). There is an obscurity in the verse referred to, and it is possible that although the graves were opened by the earthquake, their occupants did not come forth till after the resurrection of Jesus.

(e) The Water and Blood (John xix. 34). Death came to Jesus sooner than it did to the malefactors and than was usual in the case of the crucified. To make sure that he was dead one of the soldiers is said to have thrust a spear into his side. The tradition that water and blood followed must be of comparatively late origin, since the two substances are symbols of the water of purification, by baptism, and the blood of redemption.

(f) The Centurion, according to all the Synoptists, was so overwhelmed by the extraordinary occurrences he had witnessed that he confessed, "Truly this was a son of God" (Matt. and Mark), or "a righteous man" (Luke).

What is the meaning of the death of Jesus?—Jesus was a martyr to a popular, although mistaken, idea of the Messiah, which he also shared.

It was incumbent upon the first Christians to find a satisfactory explanation for the death of Jesus, since God's permitting Him to be crucified seemed to refute decisively his Messianic claims. The theory that found most favor and that has prevailed in one form or another even to the present time, is based upon the sacrificial idea. But such an explanation must be false, for the notion that God cannot forgive the guilty without exacting penalty from the innocent is repugnant to every sentiment of justice and love and to the best teaching of Jesus himself. Moreover, it robs the death of Jesus of much of its heroic inspiration. When yearly, almost weekly, we hear of some man who bravely dies that he may save others, perhaps unknown to him, from physical death, why should we speak so fulsomely of one who gave up his life, not that a few but that millions might be saved, not from physical death but from inexpressible torments that last forever? The need of an explanation of the death of Jesus was felt because of the prevailing idea that in God's world goodness must be attended by prosperity and length of days. We have outgrown that notion, and hence the difficulty felt at first does not trouble us. Jesus died only as hundreds of other martyrs have died. Had he kept on preaching, he might have suffered violence at the hands of the Pharisees or of Herod, but the Romans would not have been likely to interfere with him. But when he laid hold upon the idea of the Messiah and assumed the authority of the Christ, death became inevitable. But the Messianic idea was only a popular Jewish delusion which he was not able wholly to cast off. He gave up his life because he was heroically, grandly true to a mistaken idea of the Messiah.

THE ANNUAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

Our Treasurer, Mr. Scheible, has been sending out letters to some of our schools, asking them to remember our society as generously as possible. And the earlier the gift is sent the more acceptable it will be. One contribution of fifteen dollars has already arrived from Mr. Gannett's school in Rochester. We hope the other schools will follow this good example. As fast as the money is received it will be acknowledged in this column.

THE BEGINNING OF CHRISTIANITY AS SHOWN IN THE GROWTH OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

This subject is admirably treated in a little manual prepared by W. H. and M. J. Savage, and recently published by the Unitarian Sunday-school Society of Boston. There are thirty-eight lessons; the first thirteen of which take up Paul's letters in the order in which they were written, as the earliest elements in the New Testament record. Then come the composition of the Gospels and the birth, youth and career of Jesus, ending with a few lessons on the later epistles and the Gospel of John, along with the growth of Dogma. This is the right way, and from the historian's point the only right way, to study the New Testament as a book. Of course if we wished to study the Growth of Christianity, we should have to begin with the Old Testament and the Apocalyptic literature and trace the development of the idea of the Kingdom of Heaven on Earth. Perhaps the one criticism that would be suggested to the casual reader is the inadequacy of the treatment of this Kingdom of Heaven.

But taking the book as a whole, it seems to us by far the best manual we have seen on its special subject.

LESSONS ON THE OLD TESTAMENT.

We are sorry that we cannot commend the weekly lessons on the Old Testament now being issued by the Eastern Sunday-school Society. Judging by the few numbers of the intermediate and advanced grades that have reached us, they are hopelessly antiquated in their standpoint. For example, in the lesson on the deluge the question is soberly discussed at considerable length whether the deluge was universal, and we are informed that "thoughtful men of all shades of religious opinion have latterly come to the opinion that the Noachian Deluge was only local:" and "the sons of God" and "the daughters of men," it is suggested, "probably mean the worshippers of God, or the race of Seth and Enos, and the women of the race of Cain." And Peikie's "Hours with the Bible" is the first of the four works to which the compiler refers the student. To be sure, the Advanced lesson on the same subject and on the same leaflet frankly calls the Deluge "another of the beautiful stories of man's childhood," and says that the "half-children of the gods correspond to the Greek heroes." But such contradiction hardly helps the usefulness of the lessons—unless, indeed, the plan is to keep the young from a too early knowledge of the truth about the Bible and have them learn in the Intermediate grade what they are to unlearn in the Advanced grade. But that plan seems to us a mistake.

Notes from the Field

Wisconsin Conference.—The fiftieth session of the Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies was held in All Souls Church, Janesville, Dec. 5-7, 1893. The opening sermon was delivered Tuesday evening by Rev. T. B. Forbush, of Chicago, the western agent of the A. U. A. "Jesus' Gospel of the Kingdom" was his subject. Its central principles were shown to be, God with us and personal righteousness because God is with us. It was a kingdom of character, the development of man's capabilities. It was life eternal, this striving to be perfect here. The form of Jesus' kingdom may be faulty, but the principles he enunciated are eternal.

Wednesday morning the devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. A. W. Gould, of Chicago, the Secretary of the Western Conference. The Hon. William Smith, of Janesville, gave an inspiring address of welcome, which was responded to in the same way by the Hon. H. M. Lewis, of Madison, the President of the Conference. The reports of officers and churches were in every way encouraging, eleven churches being represented. An invitation from the Minnesota Conference to meet with them in joint session at Winona in the spring was cordially and unanimously accepted.

Wednesday afternoon the papers and discussions of the Conference were begun with a thoughtful address by Rev. R. C. Douthit, of Baraboo, on "The Church and the Children." He thought the church could foster a better home life, better social conditions, better school life. Preachers should try to reach the children in sermon and service and to organize them in practical work for others. Rev. O. R. Washburn, the Universalist minister at Stoughton, took the topic "The Church and the Young People." He advocated clubs for girls and boys for debates, reading, refreshments, and general good times. The many religious questions of the time, springing from all sources, we should be able to help the young people answer. An animated discussion followed these papers, participated in by most of those present.

In the evening the high-water mark of the Conference was touched by Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago. His thrilling theme was "The Cause of the Toiler as Interpreted by the Pictures at the World's Fair." He showed how the artist helped us, interpreting nature and life: how the higher art puts on canvas the truths of human life. He went over the world's great pictures that illustrate man as a toiler, reproducing them in brilliant word painting, and sketching in many a lesson it behooves the world to learn.

Thursday morning the devotional service was conducted by the Rev. O. R. Washburn. Rev. C. F. Niles, of Menomonie, read a most valuable paper on "Unity Club Work," regarding it as a means of reaching those within and without the church. A Unity Club can be made the mediator between the Orthodox and Liberals, and should be put in line with church work. It should be intellectual and social in its aims and ends, but how these two can be worked together is always a problem. The work of the Club must always have reference to local conditions. The Rev. Sophie Gibb, of Janesville, then read an interesting paper on "The Church and the Community." She said the church is a servant, and the higher the work done the more the service rendered. Religion cannot be divorced in any sense from human interests. The great opportunities for work to-day were pointed out: work, not controversy, for we were to use the truth, not defend it. The discussion following these papers occupied every available minute.

Having considered the work of the church—for the children, the young people, the club, and the community—the church itself came in for its share of attention in the afternoon. "The Object of the Liberal Church" was the subject taken by Rev. A. W. Gould. He showed how it must stand for religion and for freedom in religion, not for a definite, final theology. The right and duty of private judgment was insisted on, and as evolution shows that advance comes by variation, so from our variety of opinions there must be constant growth. Two great objects served now are that we receive those who are outgrowing the old forms of religion and help to make that new theology necessitated by the change in the front of the universe. "The Obstacles of the Liberal Church" was the subject taken by the Rev. Lloyd Skinner of Eau Claire. As outlined, the obstacles were: people do not think, they do not feel the need of a rational yet reverent religion; they do not see that religion is not only the worship of God but also the love of Nature and the service of man; the prevalent religious conceptions are bound up with law, administration, and the existing order of society, so that in disturbing them we seem to strike at these: the name ordinarily chosen—Unitarian or Universalist—is faulty and unfortunate; our practices of playing cards, dancing, etc., prejudice people against us. Some of these obstacles we can overcome, some we cannot overcome, some we do not wish to overcome. Rev. J. F. Schindler, the Universalist minister at Racine, voiced the dream of those who are looking for a union of the Liberal forces, in an able paper entitled "The United Liberal Church." He said, to recognize and promote religious unity is a high moral duty. The puzzle to foreigners was the way the Unitarians and Universalists stood apart, and the only reason seemed to be that we distrust one another's motives.

Resolutions thanking the Janesville people for their hospitality were passed, and also the following: "Rejoicing in the spirit and work of the World's Parliament of Religions, demonstrating as it did the moral and religious unity of the race." The Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies: Resolves: First, That, emphasizing the same spirit, we desire to work towards its realization in organized effort. Second, To this end we desire to record our willingness to co-operate in any movement looking towards the establishment of the Church Universal."

The following officers were elected: President, Hon. H. M. Lewis, Madison; First Vice President, Hon. William Smith, Janesville; Second Vice President, Rev. C. F. Niles, Menomonie; Secretary, Rev. Lloyd Skinner, Eau Claire; Treasurer, R. Jackson, Baraboo; P. O. M. Secretary, Mrs. Minnie S. Savage, Evansville.

It was matter of serious regret that Rev. H. T. Secrist, of Milwaukee, was unable, through illness, to be present at the Conference, and especially to open the platform meeting of Thursday evening with his expected address, "The Foundations on which we Build." Rev. C. F. Niles spoke concerning "The Purpose for which we Exist," saying it was to discover the truth and incarnate that truth in life. All churches are striving for the same end, but others than our own are looking for truth in the past. While we do not reject the word of prophet, priest or church, we winnow it, a diting whatsoever reason bids. For us character is the final outcome. Rev. G. H. Clare, of Madison, though far from well, spoke a most fitting closing word for this helpful and inspiring session of our Conference. In the marvelous diction for which he is noted and with ringing rhetoric he portrayed "The Glories of our Gospel," showing how each purpose, as outlined by the previous speaker, was a halo of glory. So also the rescue of Jesus of Nazareth from the debris of dogma and the bringing in a purer conception of God. How our theology was the highest truth that has been revealed to man, but high as this revelation may be we still dream of higher and higher truth.

Whitewater, Wis.—The Universalist Society in this place is in an encouraging condition. Through the untiring and unselfish efforts of our pastor, Rev. Mr. F. W. Millar, much good is being accomplished. Never before in the history of our society has so friendly a feeling existed between all of the societies in our city as at present. Last year the Union Thanksgiving service was held in the Baptist Church, the Universalist minister preaching the sermon. This year the service was held in the Universalist Church, and the Methodist minister preached the sermon.

UNITY comes as a welcome visitor to many of our homes. Through UNITY we learned of Mr. B. B. Nagarkar's lectures, and were so fortunate as to secure him for one night in November. He delighted his audience, and has been urged to come to us again, which he has consented to do for two nights in January. Surely people are becoming more and more anxious and glad to hear the truth.

Milwaukee, Wis.—The Unity Club at this place is divided into several sections, one of which is making a study of evolution and has issued quite an elaborate little pamphlet on the subject. It has an illustration of the genealogical tree of life on the front page, and on the last page a tower representing the evolution of motive power, from women grinding at a mill to the triple expansion engine. Inside is a list of seven lectures by such persons as Cope and Fiske. And there are eight topics in as many months, taken from Romaine's "Darwin and After Darwin," and discussed by the members of the club. That is followed by a valuable list of the works on evolution in the Public Library of Milwaukee, with occasional notes, indicating the nature of the works. The program ought to be both interesting and profitable.

Cooksville, Wis.—Rev. O. R. Washburn, of Stoughton, preached here the evenings of Dec. 3 and Dec. 17, and will be here again after the holidays. There is some talk of a Sunday school, and it is hoped one may be formed.

Chicago, Ill.—On Monday, Dec. 18, eighteen gentlemen met in a private dining-room at the Wellington Hotel, under the auspices of the Chicago Liberal Ministers' League. Thanks to the care and good management of the Secretary, Rev. R. A. White, of the Englewood Universalist Church, those present were able to discuss an excellent dinner as well as plans for larger work; and it was agreed to meet at the same place in future. Rev. W. W. Fenn, of the First Unitarian Church, presented a plan of action, which was discussed at length by Messrs. Hirsch, Towne, Jones, Mangasarian, Blake, White, and Thomas, who presided. A committee consisting of one man from each of the bodies represented was appointed to perfect plans, and to this committee Mr. B. F. Underwood, editor of The Religio-Philosophical Journal and of New Occasions, a guest of the league, was added. The committee was directed to report to the next meeting, to be held at 1 p. m., Monday, January 8, 1894.

Saginaw, Mich.—Rev. Howard MacQueary has resigned the pastorate of this church to accept that at Erie, Pa.

St. Louis, Mo.—Mr. Learned's church is bravely bearing its loss, as the following circular shows:

CHURCH OF THE UNITY.

The Trustees of the Society of the Church of the Unity, having the assurance of continued and efficient help in supplying the pulpit, desire to inform its members and friends that it is their expectation that the Sunday services will be regularly maintained.

Believing as they do that the monument most acceptable to Mr. Learned and of the greatest credit to his friends and those who co-operated with him to be a living one, they ask of you that continued support which will insure the perpetuation of those ideas and the growth of that society to which he gave the best years of his life.

He stood pre-eminently for "freedom, fellowship and character in religion," and he never doubted the ultimate triumph of righteousness and truth over ungodliness and error. Let us by our works show our faith in the value of his teaching and example.

Dr. Snyder preached for the society on the 17th, the Western Secretary preaching in Dr. Snyder's church. On the 24th the Secretary preached in the Church of the Unity. The people of the latter church will hold a memorial service on the 31st, conducted wholly by themselves, in which a few of their number will speak fitting and loving words regarding the leader they have lost.

Meadville, Pa.—The article quoted in UNITY from the Independent, descriptive of the New Haven Social Science Club, might have been written concerning the Meadville "Round Table," which has been in operation much longer, and which brings together every month a score or more of men of various occupations, actively interested in all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the community and the State.

New York, N. Y.—At the monthly meeting of the liberal ministers of New York, Brooklyn, and neighborhood recently, we counted nineteen at table. The full list of members approaches thirty, and the attendance has steadily increased. The best of feeling evidently prevailed; and the usefulness of such occasional meetings of our liberal ministers, without regard to sectarian or other limitations, is beyond question.

Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, has been invited to be the principal speaker at the next meeting of the Unitarian Club, to be held Jan. 17.—Christian Register.

Syracuse, N. Y.—The following item, which was clipped from a Chicago paper, will be of interest to UNITY readers:

Oriental Buddhism was openly taught in a Christian pulpit in Syracuse last Sunday, when the pulpit of the May Memorial church, one of the most fashionable in the city, was occupied by Buroham Harding, of the New York Theosophical Society, who expounded the teachings of theosophy to a large audience. This is said to be the first instance of the sort in the world, and is a direct result of the Chicago Parliament of Religions.

Chino, Cal.—Revs. Mr. and Mrs. Pierce have been holding meetings here, and it is hoped that a liberal church will result.

Pasadena.—The Universalist Church has introduced the UNITY hymn book, a decided improvement over the hymnal formerly used.

Berkeley.—October 29, Mr. Wendte preached in exchange with the pastor. November 5 the annual meeting of the society was held, and the following gentlemen were elected trustees: N. S. Trowbridge, D. L. Bishop, J. L. Scotchler, J. G. Wright, Dr. J. Henry Senger, William Carey Jones, W. J. Trott. After the morning service, a forum meeting is now held, when topics are brought up and discussed. At the first one Mr. Gibson read a paper on "Cremation;" at the second one, Mr. Payne spoke on "Church Membership." November 26 a special Thanksgiving service was held, and the choir rendered extra music. The ladies will give a bazar from December 7 to 9, inclusive.

What one Grocer says:

—"I hire clerks who can sell the goods that I tell them to sell—and of course I tell them to sell the goods on which I make the most money. If they can't do it, I won't have them. That's what I hire them for." This is an actual fact related by a grocer to our salesman—and it's a common fact; we have it daily. So, when they tell you that some washing-powder is "the same as" or "as good as" Pearlina, it's because it pays a larger profit. Too large, altogether, if clerks can be hired to make people take things they don't want and know nothing of, instead of a tried and proved article like Pearlina.

The Parliament of Religions.

Two New Works by JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

THE SEVEN GREAT RELIGIONS.

"The Lovers of the Light are One."

- I. Moses.
- II. Zoroaster.
- III. Confucius.
- IV. Buddha.
- V. Sokrates.
- VI. Jesus.
- VII. Mohammed.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'd Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Appropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

"The Story of Teddy."

BY HELEN VAN-ANDESSON.

This book creates in every boy an appetite to be "good." Teddy is a glorious little chap, and every boy and girl in the land should read about him. "Jack" (Teddy's dog) ought to be held up as an example to all dogs everywhere. You will have to read the book to find out what happened to Charlie Barber. Bound in cloth, 80 cents, postpaid.

Published by F. M. HARLEY PUBLISHING COMPANY, 87 Washington Street, Chicago.

GIFT BOOKS.

"Afloat and Ashore," By EDWARD EVERETT HALE, king among patriotic story writers. A capital story for Boys, in his best vein. The New York Sun calls it "A remarkably natural and interesting tale."

"In the City by the Lake," By BLANCHÉ FRANKS. A Beautiful Souvenir of the World's Fair City. The two idyls of Chic go life in this volume, "The Shadow" and "The Slave Girl," really two divisions of one narrative, are full of thrilling interest, and contain vivid descriptions of real scenes and places about the great metropolis of the West. The author has clothed the facts and flow with the dignity and beauty which other writers bestow upon things and people which have become history and myth. Even so unpoetical a thing as the Chicago River is touched poetically. Holiday edition bound in white and gold. No lonelier Christmas gift for your friend who has visited the World's Fair City, or who would like to have visited it but was unable. Dark cloth binding, $1.25; white and gold, $1.35.

"Art, Music and Nature," consisting of choice selections compiled by Mary E. Pratt from the writings of PROF. DAVID SWING, together with his portrait. The Inter Ocean calls it "A collection of literary gems in the highest and best sense of the term." Chicago Mail—"The work will find its way to popularity." New Orleans Picayune—"Charming in its make up, and printing and binding all that could be desired." Bound in white, green and gold. Price $1.

"Letters to a Little Girl," By MRS. HELEN E. STARRETT. A series of letters embodying with all the charm of a story, important suggestions as to conduct, morals and manners. Miss Haske, Principal of Monticello Seminary, pronounces it "the book that all little girls should have." A boon to mothers and teachers. A great favorite with both young and old. Cloth, tasteful, bound, with admirable portrait of the author, $1.25.

"Mother Goose's Christmas Party," by ABBY MORTON DIAZ. An ingenious story in rhyme. A charming gift for a child, or just the thing for amateur entertainments. Leading roles appropriate either for adults or children. Handsomely printed and bound in white, 50 cents; pamphlet edition, $1.50 per dozen.

Send 2 cents for circular of each book and complete catalogue to

ONE DOLLAR

Will buy that Entertaining and Safe Book,

A SLUMBER SONG,

by NINA LILLIAN MORGAN. An exquisite prose story for young people. Rev. Joseph Adams says of it: "If financially able, I would not hesitate to distribute gratuitously a million copies." Price, $1.00; white and gold, $1.25.

If you wish to spend less money for choice literature, send for H. W. T. E. ROSE FOLIO THE KING'S DAUGHTER, by MAUDE MENYER. A collection of charming allegories about plant life. The Sunday-school Times says "they have the Hans Andersen quality." Popular with all lovers of Nature, teaching morality by infusion. Price, 40 cents.

SLY AND HIS NEIGHBORS, by FRANCES POWER COBBE, best known of the English women writers. Powerfully written and embodying facts. Absorbingly interesting to young and old. The Chicago Times says of it: "Written with a light and obviously com amore." Illustrated. Price 50 cts.

ZAY, by RUTH HAYS. Eloquenty written and an inspiration to patriotism. The Chicago Globe says of it that the author shows she "understands the art of telling a good story." Especially forceful in its character drawing. Read by young and old with equal delight. Price 40 cents.

GYPPY, by HELEN E. STARRETT. A very popular dog story that has at once become a classic. The St. Paul Pioneer Press says: "it will win its way into the hearts of all dog lovers." Illustrated. Price 50 cents.

OLD GRIP, THE CROW, by OLIVE THORNE MILLER. The "Black Beauty" of bird life. A dog's autobiography—humorous, pathetic, scientifically true. The Cyprean calls it a story "all the little folks will want to read. Get this book for the boys." Illustrated. Price 50 cents.

There are great truths that pitch their shining tents Outside our walls, and though but dimly seen

In the gray dawn, they will be manifest When the light widens into perfect day.

IN the reawakened appreciation of the Orient that has been brought to us in these days, it will not do for us to forget that there is value in the light that has broken upon the Occident. There is something stupidly conservative that has made of Asia the playground of famine, pestilence and superstition, and this was not on account of its superior spirituality, but because of its lack of spirit. True spirituality reveals itself in the powers of thought that exterminate lions, use flesh to fell forests, compel soil to yield corn instead of swamp grass.

ALL SOULS CHURCH was made beautiful with Christmas decorations of holly and palmettos presented to it by a loving sister and friend who is a loyal member of the Roman Catholic Church, and who celebrated her Christmas at its venerable shrine. Who will say that there is not a coming together, the unity found in the universality of ethics? The church that helps is not only open to all but is loved of all.

THERE can be little doubt that the Amherst self-government plan of college discipline is that which will obtain in the future. Its senate of students has recently suspended a number of undergraduates for a disgraceful escapade. To be thus condemned by one's fellows is a disgrace keenly felt by all subjected to it, whereas to be disciplined by the faculty is considered as something of a distinction by a certain class of young men.

WE call attention to the announcement in our Sunday School column of the course of lectures on the Stories of Genesis to be delivered by President Harper for the University Extension department of the University of Chicago. When given in New Haven, Philadelphia and Boston, they drew crowded houses and numbers had to be turned away. Whether or not President Harper entirely discards the supernatural method of interpretation,—as to which we can not at present speak, having neither heard nor read these lectures,—we know at least that he approaches the subject from the standpoint of the scholar, a standpoint which is necessarily more or less critical; and there can be no question as to the beneficial effect of such work in removing the childish prejudice and superstition with which so much of this noble literature is surrounded. The scholarship that is exerted in developing the deep human interest that belongs to the religious literature of the past is always welcome to the liberal religious thinker.

WITH the new year UNITY begins a series of sketches "By the Way," from the pen of "S. H. M.," whose words UNITY readers have learned to look for with very pleasant anticipations. His "Thumb-Nail Sketch," which appeared in UNITY at the time his "World's Fair Notes" were running, was widely copied all over the United States. The same artistic power by which a vivid picture—and one large with suggestion—is sketched with a few bold strokes, which made the Thumb-Nail Sketch so impressive, will be recognized in these sketches By the Way.

Another watchman has fallen. One who had ever stood upon the outer wall and was always quick to herald the approaching dawn, one who in the darkest night never doubted that such dawn would break,—William J. Potter, in the fresh ardor of what his friends called a renewed youth, has laid down his life without warning, without sickness, and we trust without pain. We hope one who has a better right to speak of Mr. Potter's life and work will estimate the same in a future number of UNITY. At this time we content ourselves by expressing our own love and admiration for the man, and regret that so clear a conscience and loyal an intellect should have passed away when his services seemed to be so much needed and the time seemed almost ripe for him to begin to gather the fruits of his long sowing

If the Free Religious Association which he served so eminently was a dream. It was a dream some day to come to fruition. While the silent clay was being prepared for the burial we were anxiously waiting to hear from our friend the result of a private meeting of the officers of the F. R. A. to be held in the parlors of Mr. Savage's church Dec. 11th, to "consider what the Free Religious Association could do to meet the new demands in this era of agitation for a new religious synthesis." To attend this meeting the present writer received an urgent letter from Mr. Potter under date of Dec. 1. A letter, warm, loving, and heroic. In this letter he says: "What I am longing to see, and nothing much short of this would much interest me, is a definite constructive movement towards organizing societies of the new Unity. The new and rising faith. The new universal religion." May we not hope that in death John C. Learned, William J. Potter, and their kindred speak more eloquently than when alive to those of us who are left to go forward, occupy the land they have pre-empted, and continue the work they have begun?

A great meeting has been held in Yokohama to listen to the reports of the Buddhists who have returned from the Parliament of Religions. Some fragments of this report have reached our shores, and our newspapers are having their amusement over it, and our orthodox friends, solicitous for the fame of supernatural Christianity, are having their opportunity to say, "I told you so." The priests report a "wonderful surprise" that greeted them when they found that they had been invited, not to the end that we might convert them, nor yet that their religion might be ridiculed, which was what they half suspected, but because "Western nations have come to realize the weakness and folly of Christianity, and they really wished to hear from us of our religion and to learn what the best religion is. There is no better place in the world to propagate the teachings of Buddhism than in America. Christianity is merely an adornment of society in America. It is deeply believed in by very few. The great majority of Christians drink and commit various gross sins, and live very dissolute lives, although it is a very common belief and serves as a social adornment. Its lack of power proves its weakness. The meetings showed the great superiority of Buddhism over Christianity, and the mere fact of calling the meetings showed that the Americans and other Western peoples had lost their faith in Christianity and were ready to accept the teachings of our superior religion." A newspaper comment before us, speaking of the address in full, which we have not seen, says that the report "illustrates the extent of the best Mongolian culture, the keenness of observation, the power of incisive thought, the philosophical egotism and the boundless faith which Oriental scholars and priests possess. The report, though distorted, is an instructive mirror in which we may see ourselves as others see us." Both the comment and the report illustrate the mental confusion that comes from the indefinite use of terms. What is the "Christianity" these people are talking about? What is the Buddhism which is offered as a substitute? There is a Buddhism that is nonprogressive, superstitious, while there are in Christianity and Buddhism as well as other religions elements of reverence, devotion, beauty and tenderness, of which we can never have too much, for which Asia as well as America and Europe await. The Parliament was a groping for this universal religion, the ethical religion of reason, law and evolution.

Books on the Parliament.*

Here are the forerunners of the great library of books upon the Parliament of Religions that is to appear. Mr. Mozoomdar went directly from Chicago to Boston after the Parliament. While there he completed and published a book entitled "Heart-Beats," prefaced by an interesting sketch of himself by S. J. Barrows, editor of the Christian Register. It is a book of the inner life, soul-food, of rare penetration and subtle power. It will always be associated with the Parliament, as witness to the fact that devout vision and trustfulness are by no means confined to the Christian name and its antecedents in modern any more than in ancient times.

The Theosophical Congress has set a good example to all the other congresses by publishing officially a full report of their meeting, which proved to be perhaps the most attractive of all the side congresses. Let other denominations hasten to do likewise. If nothing better can be done could there not be an inter-denominational syndicate organized to print uniformly the reports of the various denominational congresses? This would make a series of books which the serious-minded and cultivated of all denominations would be glad to possess. The financial success of such a scheme is assured beforehand. It only needs the necessary energy and sagacity to accomplish it.

Neely's History is a fat, clumsy volume of a thousand pages, thrown together in great haste in order to catch the first trade, but it contains so much good matter that $2.50 is well invested in it.

Dr. Barrows' two-volume work is of much better workmanship and is by far the most desirable book obtainable or likely to be for some time. But it is by no means the book we ought to have as a basis for all subsequent study, a store-house for future authors; nothing less than an unabridged record of all said and done, without note or comment, will satisfy the demand. The chronicler must precede the real historian. This book fails to be the adequate history of the Parliament on account of two serious interferences: the first interference is that of the commercial man. He clashes with the scholar all the way through. The book shows haste, incompleteness, and not always wise eliminations. It is filled with pictures not germane to the text, men who were not present at the meeting, idols and temples not relevant to the subject in hand, with no descriptive text whatsoever. This is an annoyance to the scholar, misleading to the superficial reader, but tempting to the large number of buyers represented by the last class. It looks too much like some of the old-fashioned books on Christian missions, and gives one an uneasy feeling lest he may come unexpectedly upon the good old picture of the Juggernaut crushing Pagan babies under its wheels. If the space given to this extraneous matter could have been given to a more satisfactory exhibit of those who were present and the constituency they represented, in some tabular form, it would have been better. Great pains were taken to secure a registration of those present during the seventeen days. The large number of cards thus secured by the registration bureau, duly classified and analytically studied, would have pointed to some interesting facts which we might have expected in such a work as this. There are occasional allusions made to "Ten Great Religions" represented in the Parliament. What were they? The student of this book and companion literature may be bothered to make out the list.

In the second place, consciously or unconsciously,—chiefly the latter, we think,—the theologian has interfered with the historian in this book. A doctrinal bias has colored the editing. The whole book is Christo-centric, while the Parliament was homo-centric, if the words are allowable. Not the supernatural Christ but the natural soul of man was the center round which the Parliament moved. Not so this so-called history.

The Chorus of Faith, like the book just referred to, is a book with a bias, a book compiled for a purpose. The difference between the two editors being apparently that the latter was conscious of his bias and confessed it. He meant to use the Parliament to teach a lesson and if possible to establish a principle,—viz: the kinship of all religions found in the universal brotherhood of man, the common inspirations of spirit; while the standpoint of interpretation of the other book, if we understand it, was some mystical power inherent in "Jesus Christ the Savior of the World." Both of these methods are entirely justified. Such books are desirable. Many more will be written. The thing to be said about the Parliament is, better and worse books there will be but a poor book about it there can scarcely be. The subject is too good to be spoiled, and our advice is, buy all the books there are concerning the Parliament and study them all. But if you can buy but one, buy Dr. Barrows' book. Meanwhile let us clamor for the true basis of all future books on the Parliament, an official-record report to be published under the direction of the Exposition management and to be distributed by the government to all the libraries of the world. This alone will be the fitting climax of the great Exposition. Emerson has said:

One accent of the Holy Ghost

The heedless world has never lost, and we believe he is right, but many half accents have been lost. The records of mind have often been obliterated to the permanent loss of the world. The best things said often go unpublished, and future ages will not hold the Columbian Exposition Management and the United States Government guiltless if they do not see an adequate publication of the records of that great six months Exposition of spiritual commodities made in the Art Institute on the Lake Front in the city of Chicago in the year 1893.

A Trifle in Criticism.

The learned and excellent reviewer of the Dial, in the last number of that excellent periodical, reviews the new novel, "Dodo," by E. F. Benson. In it we are told that Dodo "is a delightfully wicked creation," and that the book consists largely of a report of her conversations, of which he gives us a sample, as being "almost preternaturally clever." As I fear not many of the UNITY readers will read this book, although lured by the bait of "delightful wickedness," and as I know also they would dislike to miss anything which is really "preternaturally clever," I will transcribe for their benefit this precious morsel. Here it is, and if the rest of the volume is equally brilliant, I don't know but what we shall all be forced to peruse it, to the endangering of our morals:

"Yes, I know, but you do me an injustice. I shall be very good to him. I can't pretend that I am what is known as being in love with him,—in fact, I don't think I know what that means, except that people get in a very ridiculous state, and write sonnets to their mistress's front teeth, which reminds me that I am going to the dentist tomorrow. Come and hold my hand,—yes, and keep withered flowers and that sort of thing. Ah, Jack, I wish that I really knew what it did mean. It can't be all nonsense, because Chesterford's like that, and he is an honest man if you like. And I do respect and admire him very much, and I hope I shall make him happy, and I hear he's got a delightful new yacht: and, oh! do look at that Arbutnot girl opposite with a magenta hat. It seems to me inconceivably stupid to have a magenta hat. Really, she's a fool. She wants to attract attention, but she attracts the wrong sort."

Men and Things

WHY is religion without brotherly love like a personal devil?

Because there isn't any.

"It's a great secret," said the canny Scot, "but I'll tell you in confidence. The folk, I saw, maistly gave three-penny bits. Weel, when I got the money every Sabbath evening I carefully picked out the sma' coins and put them by. Noo, as there's only a limited number of three-penny pieces in a little place like this, and as I have maist o' them at present under lock and key, the folk maun give sixpences, at least, instead. Sae, that's the way the collections are doubled.

—Spare Moments.

ENVIRONMENT AND EVOLUTION.—A writer, in a paper before the French Academy, Jan. 2, 1891, states that rabbits which have been taken to the Pic du Midi Observatory (9,500 feet above the sea-level) have produced in seven years a race somewhat different from their original race in the surrounding plains. They are a little smaller, have less developed ears, and their fur coats are of a lighter color and very thick. Moreover, the consistence of their blood has undergone a notable change. It contains more iron, and possesses a greater power of absorption for oxygen. The writer goes on to say that "an anatomical change is thus produced by the environment: and no naturalist will doubt that, if the race continues to multiply for a great number of years in the same conditions, it will maintain its present characters or develop new ones on the same line, the more rapidly so if natural selection eliminates the less adapted individuals."

—Independent.

THE mechanism of the leg and foot of a chicken, or other bird that roosts on a limb, is a marvel of design. It often seems strange that a bird will sit on a roost and sleep all night without falling off, but the explanation is perfectly simple. The tendon of the leg of a bird that roosts is so arranged that when the leg is bent at the knee the claws are bound to contract, and thus hold with a sort of death-grip the limb round which they are placed. Put a chicken's feet on your wrist and then make the bird sit down, and you will have a practical illustration on your skin that you will remember for some time. By this singular arrangement, seen only in such birds as roost, they will rest comfortably, and never think of holding on; for it is impossible for them to let go till they stand up.

—The Myrtle.

If anyone is ill or in trouble in your family or among your friends, let the minister know of it. He has no other way of finding it out except by some accidental mention. Absence from church is not always a sign of trouble at home.—The Visitor.

Life and Death.

A seed fell into the Earth.
From where? That was something which no one knew, —
The Earth least of all, but she clasped it close
And warmed it through and through.
She fed it with dew and rain,
And the pulse of her throbbing heart
Beat through its coating of brown,
And made something within it start
And break through the dull cold form Which the Earth was blessing and brooding,
Till it left it, and left it in ruins,
Earth's tenderest care eluding.
Was this life? Was this death?
The Earth said death: she saw no gain.
But the Sun and the Air cried life!
For a plant arose where a seed had lain.
We weep when a life moves on
To a higher, invisible shore:
We cry, "This is death," and hear not those Who shout, "This is life! Oh, life evermore!"

JULIA M. PARSONS.

John C. Learned.

O, sad and sorrowing here this winter night,—
The winds moaning and shaking the window-panes,
I do bethink me of the friends of Light
Who, years ago, befriended me; the gains
That I, enriched, did count my certainities,
And heard and feel deep satisfaction in
As ever miser did with his pure gold.
Ah, none brought me a love more prized than his:
None gave a strength more equable and kin
To all one cherishes and fain would hold Eternally. The quiet humor sweet That played about the eye and used to greet
One when afar and bid him welcome home,
Still chiding him that he so long did ream:
It was all of a mingling, strengthening and good.
As one by one, companions of those years,
They fall away and disappear, I list Faint echoes from a land remote. Fain would I hear a voice declaring, "Dry your tears,
For we are separate as by a mist."
There nothing comes so tangible, my ears

Drink in the sound, yet somehow all my fears Go fleeing 'fore me when I think of souls
Transcending all of time and space;
great wholes
Of Truth, of Love, of Joy! It may not be
That the old Universe is prodigal,
Beyond all sense of reason, honor, too!
So much may daring sense of justice see.
This nobler faith and credence in the All
Be ours: abides always, the good, the true.

SIDNEY H. MORSE.

The Andover House.

If, as political economists and sociologists are now teaching, the one effective lever by which we may hope to lift the poverty-stricken masses into a happier condition, with a prospect of permanence, is an elevation of the standard of living, then the principle of the social settlement, or,
as it is generally designated, "college settlement,"—which seek to bring more of brightness and human interest into the lives of the poor, thus inevitably awakening the ambition of the younger generation for a higher life than that in which they find themselves,—is worthy of our hearty commendation and support.
We have recently received the report of the Andover House, located at No.
6 Rollins street, Boston, which has now been in existence about two years; and although it is too long to be set forth in UNITY, we believe that the interest of our readers is such that they will be glad to read what the Head of the House has to say under the subtitles which follow.
The motto of the report is a sentence of President W. J. Tucker's,—
"The theory of work is to be lavish of personal influence; to put a great deal of one's self into the thing one undertakes, whatever it may be."

The following extracts indicate the general line of thought and work:

THE NEIGHBORHOOD AND DISTRICT.

The neighborhood to which the residents particularly give their attention includes seven blocks lying between Washington street and Harrison avenue, together with certain outlying groups of houses. They find themselves also becoming more and more concerned with interests affecting the whole South End district. In the immediate neighborhood perhaps the most distinctive effort has been in the way of friendly visiting. In this visiting, while one great object is to learn more truly all out the actual life of poorer people, to make a careful and systematic study of it in fact, yet all formal and inquisitive methods have been avoided, and the effort has been to be perfectly simple and friendly.
People have not been called upon so frequently as to make the acquaintance commonplace, and the residents are not expected to be "visitors" in the professional sense of that term, going daily in a monotonous round from house to house. And yet a systematic plan for the neighborhood is followed, by which several groups of families that live near together have each become the particular care of one of the residents, who takes a personal interest not only in the individuals and families, but in the little group as a group, whatever there is that may hold it together.

He becomes to them adviser and helper. They learn to come to him and seek his advice and assistance.
He sees that the boys have good books to read, and he takes care in various ways that they have some wholesome and beneficial outlet for their activity. He has the girls provided for in the same way as far as possible. Occasionally he gives a highly appreciated "party" at the House, where old and young come in together.

In a less close way the residents are gradually becoming acquainted with many people here and there in the immediate neighborhood and throughout the surrounding district —people upon different grades of life, having varied interests. This kind of acquaintance was very largely increased through the connection of the residents with the South End Free Art Exhibition, at which some of them were present for a greater or less time every day during the four weeks while it was open. In all sorts of ways the men are becoming familiar with the past traditions and the present activities of the South End, with the public officers, with school teachers, with clergymen, with social workers, with trade-union leaders, and, largely through these friends, with leading local citizens, with workingmen and their families, and particularly with the boys, who one of these days will be themselves assuming the management of South End affairs. Among all these kinds of people there is, so far as can be known, entirely good feeling toward the House—though we may be glad to know that the House to most of these people stands for the men who live in it. Those of them who come to the House, in the main remember it as not anything else than a place where certain men live.

WITH REGARD TO RELIGIOUS WORK.

From January to April was held at the House at 8:30 on Sunday evening, a musical service consisting of hymns, anthems, an appropriate reading, and some collects from the prayer book. The musical help came from the Conservatory through Professor Hale, to whom we have been so much and so frequently indebted. There is great need in the South End for some popular service of this kind, which should be held in a large hall where people should feel perfectly free to enter. The service should be worshipful, but only as appealing to the simpler and deeper religious instincts of people, and should be absolutely without the taint of proselytism. Our own principle with regard to the respect paid to each different form of religious faith has been carefully held to—not at all as a policy but as a principle. As to undertaking definitely religious work our attitude has been exactly the same as with regard to every other kind of helpful effort; that is, it is our aim to work here as far as possible by co-operation with existing agencies rather than by inaugurating entirely new enterprises. The Andover House as such does not attempt to do the work of a church any more than it attempts to do the work of a charity board. To both of these kinds of work already organized in the district it gives its hearty sympathy and co-operation.

SOCIAL INVESTIGATION.

It has been by no means lost sight of during the year that men come to the Andover House to study as they work and to work as they study. It has been found constantly that work among the people brings with it not only an illumination as to the people's life but as to one's own life. One is shifted almost unwittingly into a new point of view, from which we cannot doubt, the various affairs of human existence are more clearly and truly understood, and from which as a point of departure for action one can move with a far clearer insight, a far deeper human feeling. But besides the various points of working-class life which have been touched and learned about through the particular social work of the House, the residents have followed out closely and systematically certain lines of investigation into social conditions. One has observed carefully the various forms of popular amusement which fill up so much of the leisure time of the working people and to so great a degree give quality to their lives. Another has sought to find exactly what the supply is of churches and church workers in those sections of the city where the working classes have their homes, and with the hope, also, of getting some senses of the social value of the church's activity among the poorer people of the city. Another has undertaken a thorough investigation of the cheap lodging-houses of Boston, which are to so large an extent a new and unknown land to the social student, except that it is well known that they are the resort and the breeding-place of pauperism and crime. This investigation will be continued through another year, and the result will be a brochure which will be, we feel sure, a distinct contribution to the study of social conditions. Still another has compiled the "Guide to Evening Classes," which has been sent to members of the Association, and has had a considerable sale at the bookstores. A careful statistical statement of the number of the unemployed in Boston has just been prepared by a resident and an associate worker of the House.

By the Way.

"Freddie" writes for a "Christmas overcoat." He is "ten years old and not particular about appearances, only so it's warm." The coat is taken to him. He has a mother, who "gets some sewing to do." She earns when she gets work, which is not always, by "working steady, 37½ cents a day—long days, some of them running away into the night." "Freddie has to go to school, so earns nothing." The older boy gets work off and on. "If it wasn't for the rent" they could manage—or, if the rent was "less," it would be better. But the two little rooms in which they "live, move, and have their being" are not comfortable. Dark, dingy, and cold. No sign of any modern convenience. Water and coal brought up four flights by hand. "Freddie keeps the pace as neat as he can, and gets the meals mostly, washes all the dishes, and never breaks one. He deserves the overcoat or anything else. I'm rather glad he has to go to school, for if he didn't he'd be earning $3 a week. He can always get work, but the schoolin' is so much better for him; and I think if we can shift till he gets an education he'll be a man."

"Freddie" comes in. The overcoat fits.

"Thanks! If I'd had it a week or so ago, when it was so cold. But may be there'll come cold weather again 'fore the winter's over."

Yes, they'd had a turkey sent in, and some other things, and, "with the overcoat, Christmas will go off jolly."

She lives alone. Has one neat little room. Conveniences all her own planning. The stove is polished and the floor is white and clean. There is one window. It has a lace curtain. There are tidies on the stand and rocking chair. She knit them. In person she is slight built, and is dressed neatly: her brown hair brushed down over her ears like George Eliot's. But then, she never heard of George Eliot. Has seen better days. Was the mother of four children. Three died, the other went to parts unknown seeking his fortune. Promised to return. "And he will return, for he never broke his promise; he will come with his fortune and mine.—How long? Twelve years now. But he'll come." Her wants are few. She supplies them by "doing mending" for the boys that have no homes. They keep her busy; more than she can do. She "sews buttons on for half a cent, and does lots of mending—well, for what they can pay. I've lots of friends among the boys and men who live in boarding houses, and I've learned them to bring all their mending before it gets too bad. A stitch in time saves nine, I tell them, and costs less. So I manage very well, and have quite a family. It all keeps me cheerful, and that's half the battle."

Three fellows have one room—none too big; none too clean; none too comfortable. A little stove, "bought second hand, cracked and smokes." Only one has had work for more than a month. The other two sit around, read and smoke. Saturday night the one with work brings home five dollars. Rent $1.50, $3.50 for coal, grub and tobacco. Couldn't drop the tobacco; could easier go without milk. "A pipe when you have to loaf keeps a fellow from committin' murder." By and by the others would have work, and the one now working may not have. Then he'll keep house, read and smoke. No relation. Just drifted together—birds of a feather. Pretty well posted, too, on matters in general. Have discussions on the best way to govern Chicago. Are down on turnstiles. Want elevated roads everywhere, and all roads to be run by the people. The city is in the hands of a mob—a mob of a few bloats who've got money and rule. If the people would turn out and do things—they'd soon straighten things. Gambling could n't be suppressed till you got rid of gamblers. "Must kill 'em off or stop breedin' 'em." But then, "what can you expect, when most the business's done by gambling? How else do millionaires get their millions? Earn it? Bah!"

These three are a conspiracy. Have designs on the world. Mean to take the world in hand. They don't cry with Hamlet, "Woe is me that ever I was born." They're glad of it. It gives them their opportunity to set the world right. They will do. When times are better they'll start a paper. "Not a newspaper. D—n the news! What we want is ideas—sense; show how things can be done. Everybody knows the news; that is, that things ain't done. What paper shows how? We'll do it."

Query: Are these the thinkers Emerson said the world must beware of?

Mortal or Immortal?

BY LOUISE NYDEGGER.

Mortal or immortal? Among the questions with which human reasoning has wrestled, there is perhaps none more ancient in its origin, none more universal in its interest, than this one. From the earliest ages of thinking mankind it has been asked in the most various ways and under the most various circumstances. Philosophers have contemplated it profoundly and sought its solution by all the arts of logic; it has been meditated in the quiet of a study or on long solitary walks. Some have voluntarily fixed their minds upon it, to others it has been suggested at some particular occasion.

One of the greatest philosophers of antiquity died conversing on it with his disciples. Thinking he had solved the question with positive proofs for his conclusion, his last moments in this life were radiant with the hope of entering soon into a pure spiritual state of eternal duration. To-day, after more than two thousand years of progress, with all that science has revealed and demonstrated, most of these proofs can no longer be admitted, though the sublimity of the discourse is still admired. Then another Master came with prophecies, even promises of an eternal life; and as his teaching was clad in a much more concrete form than the speculative thought of the Greek philosopher, it was more easily comprehended by the humble and the ignorant. The Christian belief in immortality soon spread among the nations, and was handed down through a long series of centuries until at the present time the majority of people consider the question solved beyond dispute by this assurance of eternal existence. But there is another class who, refusing to believe in anything beyond reality and reducing everything to the laws of matter and motion, deny the continuation of soul life in another world. Between these two extremes there are those who are satisfied neither with the evidence which the former draw from revealed religion nor with the materialism of the latter. From the fact that science, still in progress, has not yet explored and demonstrated all that we can ever hope to know, they infer that what is now unsolved and almost seems unsolvable, may yet be known clearly and positively.

The question did not originate in a philosopher's brain, when plunged the deepest in speculative thought,—it presented itself inevitably in the most solemn and the most awful situations of human life. More frequently than at any other time, it has been put with despairing or hopeful eagerness at the prospect of death or beside the lifeless body of a beloved one.

Ever since man began to be a thinking being, he sought to understand Nature and her phenomena around him, gaining twofold in this effort: on the one hand, the development of the intellectual faculties by exercising them: on the other, the knowledge obtained in their exercise. But go back to primitive man in the first period of his search for understanding. Of all the mysteries around him, that of death must have been the darkest, the most awe-inspiring, yet exactly the one he was most eager to penetrate. Accustomed to consider himself the center of all Nature, and expecting to continue forever in the present state of existence, he could not comprehend why life departed from the human body, leaving it to decay like that of animals, like the leaves that fell, like everything else that had served its time and was worn out and useless. He could not conceive that he should ever cease to be. To him, the idea of absolute destruction, of passing into nothingness, was full of horror. In this he already felt, perhaps, one of the fundamental laws of the universe, though he could not yet understand and formulate it,—the law of indestructibility of matter and energy. But, unable to rise above the concrete, ignorant of everything beyond his immediate experience, he could conceive no other way of continuation than by means of a personality, distinct and separate from everything around him. Either the body from which the mysterious and invisible life had fled was to be resumed and revived in another world, or he must be endowed with another body in order to continue existence. This seemed self-evident to him; no proofs and no arguments were needed, because doubt simply did not enter his mind.

His idea of the future life could not differ much from his perceptions of real life, except that hope pictured him the former with everything united that was agreeable to him in this world. By and by, as his intelligence and moral sense developed, the idea of retribution for good or evil done in this life, was added. With the progress of intellectual development, his conceptions of deity and future existence changed constantly, becoming more and more independent of what he saw around him in real life and more abstract in their character. The imagination, like all the other faculties, unfolded its power and became active, especially in the realms of the supernatural and the mysterious. Tradition came, and did her work in handing down from one generation to the other all the hope and aspiration concentrated in religious belief of those that preceded. The religious writings of every people deal largely with the life to come after death.

Then, at another period of development, doubt and the spirit of criticism came to play their important roles. Put on their guard by many errors of the past, men became less apt to take as self-evident what at first appeared to be so, and less inclined to believe without seeking a demonstration for believing. But such is the diversity of the human mind that arguments which convince some are rejected as unsatisfactory by others. The earth and almost all of her secrets have been explored, even from the distant stars man's search for knowledge has returned with success; but the mystery of death, so near to us, concerning all of us, is not yet explained in a way that all can admit. The certainty of the Christian's belief is built upon faith alone, and from this point the philosopher cannot reason. The conclusion of the materialist is drawn from science, and science is not yet at the end of her revelations. The evidence of facts and experience is wanting, because man's ingenuity has not yet penetrated the realms of the dead, neither have any of them returned hither to bear testimony of the state into which they passed.

Since we lack a positive and all-convincing evidence for belief in personal immortality, let us see if the idea of the cessation of personality is still so full of horror as it must have appeared to ancient man. Since that time man's attitude towards Nature has greatly changed. As a result of thought and investigation, he no longer considers himself as her center, for whom all else exists, but as part of her. He may think himself a noble part, but still a part is less than the whole. He has gained a fair insight into her workshop: his instruments have revealed him the infinitely small as well as the infinitely vast and distant. By tracing the relations of cause and effect, he has seen that life and not death is her principle and aim, that death everywhere means new life. A grain of corn is laid into the earth, but in order that a new plant may arise, it must first decay and then gradually give up its substance, its personality, to the germ of new life. Just from this fact, too, has been drawn the inference of eternal life to come out of death. As if this new plant was not destined in its turn to decay and pass away.

Let us go to the graves where our ancestors rest. Before they were brought here they had lived and toiled upon earth sixty, seventy, eighty years,—some more, some less. Small and weak they began life, mere tiny germs. The earth gave them sustenance, they built up their physical being and grew strong and large. Like the plant, they have had their season of growth, of maturity, and then of decay. Their bodies were given back to earth whence they had drawn every particle of their being. The substance which composed them had returned to its source and was assimilated by it to go forth again into new life substance of some kind. Just so the water passes from the ocean into clouds, and from them into the ocean again, after manifold transformations and wanderings, and after having been put to many uses. All Nature's movements are in circles and everything returns to its starting point. But just as part of the ocean is constantly distributed in rivers and lakes, just so a part of humanity is constantly upon the face of the earth until its time comes to return to the great source and to be replaced by the continuous flow of the life-stream.

An essential element of the life of these ancestors still courses among us. Each dying generation leaves behind it what its intellectual and muscular power achieved, the product of which we call civilization. The prominent factors in this product are immortalized by fame. But also the many thousands who passed into oblivion left, nevertheless, an important share in the same product. Humanity as a whole, and not single individuals, has brought civilization this far, and the great mass of humanity are ordinary beings. Even he who performed nothing but humble manual toil is not to be despised, for such is as necessary in the order of the whole as the more lofty occupations. If it were not for the labor of the many thousands, the thinking man could not sit apart, liberated as he is by these from drudgery, to dwell in the regions of intellect and speculative thought. Not only do they supply his physical wants, but he also needs them to convert into reality and usefulness the results of his thinking. A cultured mind can plan a bridge, a machine, a temple, but he depends upon the toil of the lower thousands to realize their construction. The scientist carries on his investigations with the aid of instruments that their labor furnished him.

Thus each one had an activity of some kind, more or less conducive to the general end and aim of all, until his or her strength was gradually spent. The brain grew weary and less fertile, and by and by lost its power of abstraction. The muscles were worn and acted no longer with the same vigor and promptitude. Mind and muscle had yielded all that they could yield. How perfectly natural that they should disappear and make way for the new vital current which was ready to replace them! But the life-force of the dying generation was left behind, not only in what their hands and minds had achieved; it throbs and pulsates also in the stream of the present, for those that took the places of the dead are of their own flesh and blood. The fluid that had become weak and sluggish in the former now courses with new vigor in the latter. Their forms and features, in renewed youth, are still upon earth, and will be transmitted through all the centuries to come. An even more intimate part of their personality still exists, in the shape of mental and moral qualities: for the laws of inheritance are as true there as they are for the physical being.

Among the dead may be many who spent a life of humble toil, but who possessed rich talents that for lack of opportunity remained undeveloped or were crushed by poverty. But of the same brain substance was given from parent to child. It may thus have passed through many generations until, at last, it found genial soil in which it could thrive and bear forth its fruit. Thus the many that pass away and are forgotten have their functions of importance that count high through all times, and one of these is the transmission of genius.

Considering death as a return of worn out substance to its source, there can be no idea of horror associated with it to an intelligent mind, even if there is no assurance of personal existence after this life by means of an immortal soul. Especially he who loves Nature and communicates intimately with her, cannot be horrified at the thought of finally mingling with her and being absorbed by her, while part of his mental and physical substance is still circulating upon earth as embodied in the works he left behind him. His ego had completed the circuit and returned to the starting point, the great All. In life he admired Nature's beauty and grandeur; by death he becomes one with her, indistinguishable from her. Thus we are assured, at least, that in no case can total annihilation be our destiny, for what is once created can never pass out of existence again; it can only be transformed. When we have grown weary in a life-time of continuous toil and struggle, the thought of such complete repose is consoling; and for those who are capable of rising above self there is a quiet satisfaction in the prospect of such a continuation among the living. Especially when we are oppressed with sorrow, the idea of passing into an unconsciousness, which means a cessation of all woes, is calming.

The eagerness of mankind to find assurances of an eternal life after death has yet another source than the love of self-preservation. Every being endowed with thought and feeling has a desire for happiness, the virtuous as well as the wicked; but as their conceptions of it differ, so do their means and ways of pursuing it. But life is such that no individual could yet pass his entire existence in unbroken happiness—if it is not troubled from without, it is from within, by the conflicts which grow out of the imperfections of human nature. Of course, not all have to undergo the same amount of sorrow, but every one knows of some struggle, disappointment or trial. If they do not come to him directly, he has hundreds of occasions to suffer them with some fellow-being. Pure, unmixed happiness is rare and transitory in this world, at least for those who do not consider it to be in mere material welfare. Thus the great majority reach the end of life with longings unappeased. But hope, that comforter and inspirator, which so often has sustained them, points beyond the mystery of the grave to another world. There the efforts and sacrifices that remained unrewarded here will be recompensed, the sorrow that was left unhealed will be soothed, the knowledge that was unattainable here, there it will come in floods of light. All contradictions will be reconciled, all wrongs redressed, all strife dissolved in everlasting harmony. The longings of the human heart for such a state of being have been interpreted as a prophecy of Heaven. Indeed, it is very reasonable to expect that this natural longing will find sometime, somewhere, a realization. But another interpretation may be given to it by those who believe that mankind is in constant progress, intellectual and moral. As man becomes more enlightened century after century, he will live more in conformity to natural law; as a consequence his existence upon earth will be more perfect and harmonious in every way, and the amount of happiness for every individual will increase in the same measure. All the wrongs and contradictions which now abound in life, making men miserable, were not put into it by Nature or any supernatural being. Man himself created them, they grow out of his many faults and weaknesses, and man himself can make them disappear again. If every individual would attempt to do it and link effort to effort, such a change could be accomplished in a short time. But as it is, those who are striving for good are always thwarted and counteracted by the wicked and even by the indifferent ones. As virtue and not wickedness sustains the mental and physical life of humanity, the former will survive in the end, if humanity is to continue its existence through a great length of time. Therefore it is probable that the state of being, for which the heart seems to have a prophetic yearning, will finally be established upon earth. Here again we have to rise above the idea of personality; for not we as individuals shall pass after death into that existence, but mankind as a whole will attain it, though it be in the distant future, but centuries count little where eternity is involved. Is it so difficult, then, to renounce that self in the contemplation of grander things and vaster interests? Those who are capable of doing it, will rejoice in the prospect of heaven upon earth and in the consciousness that they are hastening its coming by their struggle for good. For we know by the laws of inheritance that the efforts of one generation advance the succeeding ones, not only by what is achieved thereby but also in disposing them to continue these efforts in the same direction.

The answer to this question, "mortal or immortal?"—which has been repeated again and again in the calm words of philosophy and in the strains of agony,—is not of such vast importance to man as it has been made to appear by the idea of future retribution for good or evil done in this life. If we believe that moral order and justice prevail in the Universe, we see not even a necessity for such retribution, for by the laws of cause and effect evil is punished, just as certainly as good is rewarded, by its natural consequences. The effect may not always be immediate, nor apparent to our eyes; sometimes it even seems to be reversed; but that does not change the fundamental principle. Just this fact increases the merits of the moral man. Indeed, what kind of morality would that be which consisted in doing good with the certainty of reward, and in avoiding evil through fear of a scourge?

In looking forward too intently for a life to come there is danger, not only of falling into error and mysticism, but also of slighting duties near to us in real life. The present has problems the solution of which are of far more vital consequence to mankind than that of immortality. We feel this when we look upon the dark stream of ignorance, misery and crime that courses through humanity, and which means death in the direst sense of the word. How to make this disappear is a problem of stronger demands upon hard, earnest thinking than the attempt to lift the veil from death. Whether our knowledge will ever be extended beyond the things of this world, can neither be denied nor affirmed at present. The limits of the unknown have constantly receded before the progress of the mind—we cannot yet foresee whether they will once become fixed as the limits of the unknowable. In the meantime, a thinking mind will appease his desires for more understanding by the certainty which he can obtain, and renounce with patient resignation the curiosity which wants to go beyond that. The understanding of highest concern to every individual, that of his duties in this life, is found, not in the speculations about an infinite and unknown future, but in the needs of the present.

Correspondence

Churches Versus the Boston Society for Ethical Culture.

The question has often been asked, both jestingly and seriously, "What is there unique in the Boston Society for Ethical Culture? Why do not churches cover all the grand moral and religious needs of humanity?" To answer this question intelligently, inquirers must meet on common ground. That common ground is the love of perfection. Permit a reminiscence here.

In my early years I frequently experienced a sense of loneliness. I pondered how to harmonize the warring elements of religion. When invited to participate in the intellectual feasts of Harvard University, I grew less lonely, the vacuum in my life was filling, and at last, as I sailed for Germany, a new hope was born, a hope which has deepened into the realization of to-day. That hope developed from my vision of the church in '67.

Space forbids narration of the causes, but the picture I saw was this: Caste was present in the clergy who dared not be the prophets they would; again, in the lay people whose highest conception of brotherly love was the offering of material gift. Intellectual sectarianism was seen in the narrowness of investigation on the subjects of religion and ethics, so that a communicant of any one church was practically forced to close his ears to all truth outside, be it ancient or modern. The subordination of the ethical to the theological was too sadly disclosed by the fact that "church membership" might cover a multitude of sins, such as lottery, fashion, slander, hypocrisy. So the reform I prayed to inaugurate was practical,—nay, vital to the race.

For three years, from 1871 to 1874, I received the courteous attention of Divinity School professors, sharing every exercise of the students, except public debate and sermonizing. Finally, after a trip and study abroad, marriage and parentage also intervening, in 1881 I called for a novel assembly.

In Dorchester, my present home, I asked for a people who would associate on the basis of character, since that was "common ground." From this starting point, all could grow through investigation and brotherly love. Each would lend to others such weight of truth and love as he could attain, while the leader counted simply as one who offered his or her peculiar gift, the power to organize and speak.

In the process of evolution, incident to all life, dilemmas arose. I realized of course that warfare must be held with custom. The first that greeted me was formal organization. I established at once the claim that, while all varieties of outward government are essential to progress, yet they are but stepping stones, and should be withdrawn as soon as the summit of self-control shall be reached. I believe this is true of individual and association alike, and I trust, in the end, it will apply to national and race life.

In our Ethical Society, the vital relation of members as friends alone sustains it. This I conceive to be the ideal attitude, however long it may take to mould the parts into a perfect whole. It precludes the possibility of war, concerning which the distinguished thinker, Herbert Spencer, has lately written me. He says: "In efforts toward ethical culture, there is constantly overlooked the one effort more important than all others,—the effort to suppress militancy. Abundant proof exists that with war come all the vices, and with peace come all the virtues." But to proceed. After three years of prosperity, in which I christened (by my own formula) twenty children, and officiated at seven funerals, having had in charge some fifty families, a new break in custom was suggested, and then inaugurated.

I discovered that hymns and responsive services were ill adapted to opposites in theological and ethical belief. This knowledge was forced upon me by the fact that some kept silence at the hour when all should join in spoken aspiration. This led to the collation of hymns which I published in '84. But the greatest struggle was to come. Conservatism and radicalism, like the centripetal and centrifugal forces that they are, found it hard to maintain the desired equilibrium.

It was noised abroad that the woman preacher, at whose ordination hundreds were turned away, was "traitor" to the church! One clergyman, formerly of the place, had already advised "quiet parlor meetings," and though fed at Cambridge from the same table with herself, suggested that perhaps the lady was "entering a wedge" in the old meeting house on the hill! Another (Episcopalian) asked what "new truth" she had to teach. Several popular clergymen of Boston (now deceased) wrote personal messages, in which my thorough preparation was commended, while the hint was given that "health and sex" considerations might deter from a public ministry on the hill. All this, without a study of the earnest work we proposed to do!

Only when a deeper faith possessed my soul, so that I dared not accept the anthropomorphic deity of the churches, and only when my love of truth became so strong that I dared to think (if need be) that my small identity might be swallowed up in the large race life, did I meet my last great trial of misrepresentation!

Our society is religious, deeply religious. We are called otherwise only by the unthinking world. It is our devotion to the eternal principles of the universe that makes us emphasize the ethical law. We believe that, conforming to this, we pay profoundest respect to the "Power that works for righteousness." And we so worship that we see, in every human, ability to do likewise. We think no man or nation can exist without this faith, though imperfectly expressed.

We further believe it to be simple justice to the rising generation to lay before them the treasures of the Orient, so lately revealed by Sanscrit scholars, and in fact the gems of any nation under the sun, that pride and prejudice may find no place in their souls,—that, intellectually, they may know the why and wherefore of their belief, while every child of humanity shall stand to them an oracle of the divine! Let not Buddha and Zoroaster, Confucius, Socrates, Plato and Aristotle, those sweet, strong characters of long ago, be lost to memory when we breathe the no less winsome name of Jesus! Let our vision and our life grow!

In this spirit was our Society founded, and thus it continues! Based upon sincerity, its primary work is the building of character, the development of the homely virtues, or "flowers of the heart," as we express these to children. Our plan is to address the individual, and through him, in ever increasing circles, the home, the nation and the world!

Buddhism and Christianity.

EDITOR UNITY: It is stated that the representatives of some of the Eastern religions, while in Chicago, were questioned as to what their belief was concerning Christians and adherents of other religions—whether God would save them if they did not believe in Buddha or Mohammed. The Buddhist and Mohammedan priests both expressed their belief that infinite goodness would save them. They seem to attach a more beneficent character to Deity than some Christians do. That eminent churchman, St. Augustine, declared: "What is called the Christian religion has existed among the ancients, and was not absent from the beginning of the human race until Christ came in the flesh, from which time the true religion, which existed already, began to be called Christian." With equal truth it may be said that Judaism or Buddhism has existed from the beginning of the human race. What is surprising about the Buddhist religion is the fact that it has never persecuted. The Christian religion has no such beneficent record. Mackenzie, in his Royal Masonic Cyclopædia, estimates the lives sacrificed in the propagation of Christianity at a total of 26,100,000. His estimates are: holy wars, 17,600,000; Holy Inquisition, 5,000,000; religious massacres, 3,000,000; burnings, broilings, roastings, etc., 500,000. This is an appalling record. It is no wonder that an eminent Christian minister, in speaking of Buddha, at the Parliament of Religions, referred to him as wise and humane. Buddha lived only a few hundred years before Christ, yet the number of his adherents greatly exceed those of the latter, being nearly five hundred millions.

EDITOR UNITY: Please send me two copies of UNITY for Nov. 16, 1893, the number which contains Mr. Gannett's article about the August storm on the Sea Islands of South Carolina. I wrote an account myself, but this is far better.

Massachusetts people have responded generously to the call to aid the Sea Islands. The fund received at Dr. Hale's (Lend a Hand) office is something like $3,000.00, and many scattering contributions amount to at least $2,000.00 more. If only the other States would assist, Miss Barton's heavy labors would be lightened. She writes that "not one in fifty has bed, blanket, or cover, not one in a hundred has food for two days," except the rations she issued (one peck of grits and one pound of pork per week for a family of seven). Can you not do something through your paper to get assistance for the Red Cross work? Port Royal Island has been my home for many years. Please direct to DEATH A DELUSION: With an Account of some Personal Experiences on the Borderland between Sense and Soul. By John Page Hopps. London: Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 45. 2s.

This is another interesting little contribution to the literature of "Spiritualism" so called. The manner in which the subject is treated may be inferred from the author's mental attitude in regard to it. "I am well aware," he says, "of the feeling that exists against the whole subject, but I know nothing of closed or of improper questions; I do not believe we know everything yet; I call no fact 'common or unclean'; I deem nothing 'childish' or 'unworthy' which may lead to truth; and I take it to be the sign of truest wisdom when one is free from rash assumptions, hasty condemnations, and that worst of all bigotries, the bigotry of an uninformed prejudice. We are here in this world to seek for the truth, and no one can be a thorough seeker after the truth who is unprepared to go all the way with the thing that is, whatever it may be."

Though written entirely in letter form, a form not calculated to hold the attention readily, the interest is caught and held from beginning to end, and glimpses of many beautiful characters given between the lines.

THE REDEMPTION OF THE BRAHMAN.

A novel. By Richard Garbe. Chicago: Open Court Publishing Co. 1894. White cloth and gold, gilt top, 8vo, pp. 80. $1.00.

This daintily bound and neatly printed little volume pictures in a general way the present day-life of the caste-bound Hindus, brings out the privations and sufferings of those who have the misfortune to be widowed, and relates how a brilliant young Brahman who in his poverty was assisted by one of the merchant caste to pursue his studies, realized at length that he loved the merchant's daughter, and in the hour of the merchant's impending social and financial ruin because of his refusal to subject his daughter (who had been married in childhood to a youth who had never taken her to his home and who finally died at a distance from his virgin wife) to the rules of widowhood, declares his love, abjures his caste, and starts life afresh. The caste prejudices of the young Brahman have been undermined by a wise and humane English judge whom he has been instructing in the ancient language of his people. The story was originally published as a serial in The Open Court. Such glimpses as it gives of Indian life will give it a value to those who are not interested in the psychological development of the hero.

The Magazines.

TO ONE who has not direct access to all of the leading English magazines, it is hard to estimate the value of Littell's Living Age. Each week one may count on at least one strong article, whatever his special taste may be. The accounts of travelers in all parts of the world,—which appear in almost every issue, sometimes several the same week,—are often of great value to the student of social science, notwithstanding the fact—perhaps because of the fact—that they are rarely written from the ethnographer's standpoint. In a somewhat different line, one of the most suggestive essays that has appeared for many a day is the Spectator's review of Frederic Houssay's "The Industries of Animals," which was reproduced in Littell's of November 25th. The difference in the degree of intelligence and civilization (if we may thus use the expression) in different groups of the same species of animal, is one of the most marvelous facts which the careful observations of modern science is bringing to light. The old thought about instinct is now manifestly out of the question.

THE CYCLOPEDIA REVIEW OF CURRENT HISTORY for the third quarter of 1893 commands our admiration and gratitude even more than its predecessor. A quarterly review seems to be the ideal. It can give an amount of detail that would make an annual too cumbersome, while at the same time it does not appear so often as to preclude the busy man from attending to it. And this Cyclopedic certainly lives up to its opportunities. The place of honor in this number is given to the monetary question, but we are not sure that in this the editor has put his best foot forward. The account of the Franco-Siamese affair will, we think, be more highly appreciated,—perhaps because so many of us are particularly ignorant of the facts of which the French grab was the outcome, and are correspondingly anxious to learn what is so well told in the review. A special feature of the number is a sketch of Mr. Gladstone's public life; and in view of the fact that he began his parliamentary career about sixty years ago, this is very acceptable to the younger generations of his fellow beings.

CURRENT TOPICS is one of Chicago's institutions which we hardly dare call a stripling, not quite so old as that young giant, the University of Chicago, with which it is in a way associated. While it has not yet achieved such a wonderful success in its field as has the University in its, the magazine has some able contributors, and may yet attain the representative position in the West which it seeks to gain. The December number contains a symposium on the Parliament of Religions by some of the most prominent American ministers who took part in it, an article by Prof. Henry Drummond on "The Three Things that make up Life," a brief word on "Labor's Needs and W. T. Stead's Suggestions," by Thomas J. Morgan, the labor leader, and a number of other articles in prose and verse, three of which discuss subjects brought to mind by the recent assassination of Mayor Carter Harrison. Having spoken of its association with the University, it may be well to quote what the magazine itself has to say in reference to this:

Current Topics is devoted, first to the discussion of living issues, secondly to the publication of literary matter of general interest. It also wishes to aid in giving popular expression to the ideas for which the University of Chicago particularly stands; but it is in no sense an official publication of the University. Each writer of a signed article is alone responsible for all statements and for all expressions of opinion contained in his article.

LEND A HAND for December is devoted to the New England Conference of Charities, Corrections, and Philanthropy, of which it gives a very full report, taking about 160 pages. Of special interest to UNITY readers will be Dr. Chas. P. Worcester's discussion of the problem, "Institutions or Families?" in connection with the care of neglected children. Dr. Knight's address on the care of the feeble-minded, especially that part of it which had reference to moral imbeciles, and the discussion which followed, although sad reading, are of value to all students of human nature, as well as to those especially devoted to charitable work. Another subject, which was very fully discussed, was Probation in the case of those brought before the courts for law-breaking. As Massachusetts is the only State in which the probation officer has yet become an institution, its experience will prove valuable to all students of law and administration. This is the most valuable number of Lend a Hand that we have seen, and we question whether there is now to be had such another mine of practical and theoretical information for the charity-worker.

WORTHINGTON'S MAGAZINE, good from the start, gets better all the time. With its many well conducted departments, its essays and well told short stories, and its serial—it is an ideal family magazine. In this number Mary A. Livermore begins a very human, albeit somewhat sad story of American life, "One of the Forty-Niners," there is the usual number of pretty stories and of essays, S. G. W. Benjamin tells of the Life-Saving Service of the United States, there is a rather amateurish "Day with the Pueblos of Nambe," and the several departments are as usual ably represented by Walter Blackburn Harte, Lillian Whiting, Charlotte Perkins Stetson and Dr. Starr. One greets Mrs. Stetson's bright article on "The Modern Conscience" with the greater interest since reading the remarkably clever verse which she has just put forth in a little volume.

THE NEW EDUCATION is the name of a monthly magazine which aims to "unify" the teachings of home, kindergarten, and school. It appeals to parents as well as teachers and would guide both in their efforts to help the children grow in the right direction and develop into full efficiency all the possibilities of their being. It furnishes methodical courses of procedure, working programs, manual and intellectual occupations, stories, songs, games, studies of child-growth and child-nurture, discussions of various methods of training and teaching, of guiding the children in play and in work.

The subscription is $1 a year, and the publishers are Simpson & Co., 21 University place, New York.

THE CHURCH EXCHANGE is the name of a handsome little monthly published at Portland, in the interest of the Maine Unitarian Conference, which tells of the liberal religious thought and action of that territory. It is interesting to notice how similar the conditions are in this far Eastern field—which is largely a new country even to-day—to those which prevail in the West. We hope The Church Exchange will receive the support it needs to make it an effective agent in the spread of large religious truth.

THE COSMOPOLITAN for December is another World's Fair number, and contains some handsome illustrations. Walter Besant's "American Notes" are thoughtful and kindly, as well as interesting. It goes without saying that Mark Twain's "Traveling with a Reformer" has an abundance of humor.

NEW OCCASIONS, beginning with the December number, promises to have great value by reason of its regular publication of the addresses delivered before the Brooklyn Ethical Society and the discussions thereupon. The December number contains Dr. Janes' able and inspiring paper upon "Cosmic Evolution as Related to Ethics."

UNIVERSAL TRUTH, a monthly magazine of "Christian Science," has come to our exchange table. Its spirit seems to be sweet, but it does not impress us as scientific, or, if truth means correspondence to reality, as eminently true.

The Russians in Winter.

The Russians seek forgetfulness of the long cold winter by introducing into their houses every possible suggestion of summery fragrance and verdure. Creeping vines cluster and climb over trellised doorways and window-frames, and large sums of money are expended by the wealthy in the purchase of rare exotics, and the poor make sacrifices of other pleasures to enable them to fill every available spot with flower-pots.

When state balls occur in the Winter Palace of St. Petersburg, the banquet hall, which comfortably seats 3,000 people, is converted into a beautiful garden by means of trees brought from green-houses, and sitting beneath the leafy boughs the guests forget the cheerlessness without.

This Winter Palace is one of the largest and most noted palaces of the world. It is built in the form of a square, four hundred and fifty-five feet long and three hundred and fifty broad. When the Emperor occupies it, it is said to contain more than six thousand inhabitants. Its wonderfully beautiful halls are filled with the rarest statuary, gems, and pictures, together with tables and vases of malachite. Connected with the Winter Palace is the Hermitage, which was built by the Empress Catherine II., as a refuge from the cares of state, and contains forty rooms of paintings, a museum of statuary, arms, gems, and engravings, besides a theater.

The Russians envelop themselves so completely in fur or sheepskin as to defy the bitter cold. The shooaba, or cloak, extends from the head to the feet of the wearer, the sleeves covering the finger tips, and the collar is so made that it will completely cover the head. Their caps are also made of fur. This material, however, can only be afforded by the wealthy, the poorer classes contenting themselves with garments of sheepskin.

Double and triple windows, with little cones of salt placed between them in order to absorb the moisture, are used to exclude the cold, and although furnaces similar to our own are used in some of the wooden buildings of St. Petersburg and Moscow, the true Russian stove is constructed of bricks, and placed in the house in such a location as will warm several rooms at once. This stove resembles a large oven, and every morning a fire is kindled in it, and allowed to burn down to a bed of coal; the chimney is closed, and the port holes near the top of the stove are opened into the rooms. The hot air escapes in sufficient quantity to keep the house comfortable for twelve or fifteen hours. The "port holes" are never opened during the burning of the wood, so that there may be no danger from the escape of carbonic gas. The peasants use the top of the stove for a bed, as it is of sufficient size to accommodate three or four lodgers.

A great part of the winter's enjoyment is found in skating and riding on the ice. The river freezes about the 1st of November, and remains frozen until May. Considerable care is observed in regard to the condition of the ice. No one is permitted to venture upon it until it has been officially declared secure, and in the spring, when the ice melts, no boat can be launched without this same official permission.

When the river is opened—says the pleasant writer from whose book this article is gleaned—there is an elaborate ceremony, and a part of the performance includes taking a glass of water from the river, and presenting it to the Emperor. Formerly, his Majesty drank the water, and filled the glass with gold coin. It was observed that the size of the glass increased annually, until it assumed the proportions of a respectable flower-vase. The Imperial stomach could not hold so much water at once, and the Imperial purse objected to the price. A compromise was effected, by fixing a certain sum to be paid instead of filling the glass with gold.

A Tear.

Only a tear, but how much it expresses of love and sorrow, how much of hate and despair.

Like the sparkling dew drop, it "Mirrors both Heaven and Earth," and there lives not the Alchemist who, by trick of subtle science, can separate it into its component parts of emotion.

"Jesus wept!" How short the eloquent sentence, and what does it not suggest of gentleness and sympathy, and yet his simple "plan of salvation" is crystallized into these drops, and a Heaven has smiled out for ages from the shining depths.

Our Best.

"We have given of our best,
And our merry days are done,"
Lisp the little leaves that fall
Like rich jewels in the sun.

"Happy birds we've hushed to sleep;
Snowy lambs have sought our shade;
Many weary ones have joyed
In the shelter we have made."

"We have kept no songs of cheer
In our wee hearts hid away," Chirp the birds. "To earth and sky
We have told our joy all day.
Haply through the winter's gloom
Some sweet thought of us may glad Eyes that watch the falling snow,
While the winds are keen and sad."

"We have glided, oft unseen, Giving all the joy we could
To the parched and heated field,
To the silence of the wood,"
Softly chime the tinkling bells
Of the brooklets, silver-clear.

"We have given of our best Since the Father led us here."

Have we sung our songs of joy
Unto some sad heart below?
Kept no kindly word unsaid
In the past years' ebb and flow?
Have our cooling leaves of balm
Sheltered any weary guest?
Like the birds and leaves and brooks,
Have we given of our best?
Selected.

THE old is gone: 'tis wise and well
That old things fade and pass away.
Each yesterday's the half-grown bud
That bursts and blossoms in to-day;
And from to-day's imperfect will be born
The finer issue of to-morrow's morn.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

*No good thing is failure,
No evil thing success.*

—Gannett.

Picture: Easter Morning, by Ploekhorst.

"The Jews used to take so much care of the burial of men that they took down those that were condemned and crucified and buried them before the going down of the sun" (Joseph. Wars, iv. 2). Although it was customary for the Romans to leave the bodies on the cross, they were not unwilling to respect Jewish scruples, which would be especially strong on the day before the Sabbath, particularly the Sabbath in Passover Week. It is important to observe that all our sources are unanimous in testifying that Jesus was buried not by his avowed disciples, although certain women watched the interment (Matt., Mark, Luke), but by an otherwise unknown friend—Joseph of Arimathæa (Matt. xxviii. 57; Mark xv. 43; Luke xxiii. 50; John xix. 38). The burial was hastily done, since it was desirable to have the work over before the beginning of the Sabbath, and it was late in the afternoon before the bodies were taken down. Matthew has an account of a guarding of the tomb, apparently by a Roman guard, which may unhesitatingly be rejected as unhistorical, for the following reasons:

(a) It presupposes more jealous hostility on the part of the "chief priests and the Pharisees" than we have found actually to exist.

(b) It represents the Jews as pleading a prophecy by Jesus regarding his resurrection, of which the disciples appear to have been profoundly ignorant. If one thing is clear in these narratives it is that the disciples had absolutely no idea that Jesus would rise again. Can his enemies have understood him better than his dearest friends who had been with him constantly?

(c) The women who came to embalm the body know nothing of any watch about the tomb, but are anxious only lest they may not be able to roll away the stone.

(d) The bribing of the soldiers to give testimony which would have exposed them to severe punishment, from which it is incredible that the influence of the Sanhedrin could have secured them, bears evidence against the narrative.

(e) It is evident that the story was invented to account for and disprove the popular report that the disciples had stolen away the body. It is obvious, therefore, that this "must be referred to the category of unhistorical legend" (Meyer).

What discovery was made on Sunday morning?—Certain women found the tomb empty, and from this fact the report started that Jesus had risen from the dead.

Upon this point, also, all our authorities agree (Matt. xxviii. 6; Mark xvi. 6; Luke xxiv. 3; John xx. 2). Here then is a fact to be accounted for. The disciples explained it by alleging an actual resurrection from the dead. In support of this hypothesis, the following arguments, among others, have been adduced:

(a) The testimony of the disciples that they had actually seen Jesus alive after his crucifixion and burial. Let us, then, examine this testimony and see what it amounts to. For the sake of convenience, we may take the appearances as they are arranged by Robinson in his "Harmony of the Gospels," although the order and enumeration are given differently by others.

1. To the women returning from the sepulchre (Matt. xxviii. 9). Nothing is said about this appearance in Mark and Luke, which relate the visit of the women; and according to John and the (probably) spurious ending of Mark, Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene.

2. To Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre (John xx. 11-18; Mark xvi. 9). In Mark and Luke other women than the two Marys mentioned by Matthew visit the grave together, and there is not the faintest hint that all do not leave the sepulchre together. According to Matthew Jesus appeared to Mary Magdalene and the other Mary while on their way back to the city. John, however, brings Mary alone to the grave, where she has a revelation of the risen Jesus. Obviously our sources are at irreconcilable variance as to the first appearance of Jesus. Such contradictory testimony as this can win little credence. The only way to harmonize the accounts is to say that three or four women came very early to the grave, and finding it empty, all save Mary hastened back to the city to tell the disciples. While Mary was lingering near the sepulchre Jesus appeared to her, and while the other women were on the way to the city Jesus appeared also to them. Does not this, however, seem like an advocate's attempt to reconcile discordant witnesses by slurring points of disagreement?

3. To Peter, perhaps early in the afternoon (Luke xxiv. 34; 1 Cor. xv. 5). According to Luke this must have occurred on the first Easter Sunday, but besides its omission by the other Evangelists, we have to notice that Mark (xvi. 7) distinctly teaches that Jesus was to appear to Peter in Galilee, and Matthew knew of no appearances of Jesus to his disciples save in Galilee (xxviii. 7, 10).

4. To the two disciples going to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 13-35; Mark xvi. 12, 13). This is another of the Judean appearances which Matthew and the genuine Mark, with their Galilee cry, distinctly forbid. Moreover, in Mark the two were not believed by the others, who according to Luke greeted them first with the news of the Lord's resurrection (Luke xxiv. 34).

5. To the Apostles (except Thomas) assembled at evening (John xx. 19-24). Mark and Luke also knew of an appearance by Jesus to his disciples on Easter evening, but to the eleven (Mark xvi. 14; Luke xxiv. 33) and not to the ten. Paul says carelessly and with no distinct note of time that he appeared to the twelve, which is a manifest error, since Judas was dead and Matthias had not been chosen in his place (1 Cor. xv. 5).

6. To the apostles, Thomas being present, eight days afterwards at Jerusalem (John xx. 26-28). This assumes that the apostles remained in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, instead of going at once to Galilee, where alone it was promised that they should see him. Furthermore, according to Luke (in the Gospel, but not in the Acts), the ascension of Jesus occurred on the same day with the resurrection.

7. To seven of the apostles on the shore of the Lake of Tiberias (John xxi. 1-22). It is to be observed that of this appearance John says: "This is now the third time that Jesus was manifested to his disciples after that he was risen from the dead" (xxi. 14).

8. To the eleven apostles and to five hundred other brethren on a mountain in Galilee. If the two references in Matthew (xxviii. 16) and Paul (1 Cor. xv. 6) are to be combined as they are by Dr. Robinson, whose scheme we have been following, Matthew is certainly at fault in not mentioning the great company of believers. But there is no reason why the two should be combined: Of the five hundred brethren we know absolutely nothing; Matthew speaks only of the eleven, and adds with great significance that even then some of them doubted (xxviii. 17). Doubted after all the appearances that have been enumerated!

9. To James (1 Cor. xv. 7). There is no other evidence of this, and Paul is evidently only a hearsay witness.

10. To the eleven in Jerusalem (Acts i. 6-11; 1 Cor. xv. 7). There is, again, no good ground for identifying the two appearances. According to Luke, Jesus parted from his disciples near Jerusalem and ascended into heaven. In Matthew, however, who knows of no Jerusalem appearances to his disciples, the last interview with its "great commission" was on a mountain in Galilee. And, as we have already seen, in the Gospel Luke knows of no interval of forty days between resurrection and ascension, but puts both events on the same day.

From this survey of the evidence certain conclusions appear.

1. Unless we accept the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel, we have not a single direct, first-hand witness to the fact of the resurrection.

2. The disagreements in the testimony are so numerous that it cannot overcome the justifiable presumption against the resurrection. It should readily be admitted that perfect agreement among our witnesses would be far more suspicious than the existence of slight discrepancies, but only if the accounts are regarded as purely human in origin. The palpable disagreements pointed out prove that we have to do only with human testimony. Yet there is a natural presumption against the reality of an occurrence which, confessedly, is unique in the history of the world. The burden of proof rests not upon those who deny but upon those who affirm the resurrection of Jesus, and is the evidence given in the four Gospels sufficient to establish such an extraordinary event?

Two other important arguments should be noticed in favor of the resurrection.

1. The Testimony of Paul. It may be that ignorant Galilean fishermen were deceived, it is sometimes said.

but Paul was too acute and logical a reasoner, too thorough a scholar, to be deluded. But in answer to this it seems enough to say that Paul's belief in the resurrection was based solely upon the fact that Jesus had appeared to him alive on the Damascus road. But that fact could prove only that Jesus was still alive; and one might easily believe that who denied the resurrection, for immortality does not in the least depend upon resurrection. Granting the reality of Paul's vision, we must still insist that it has absolutely no bearing on the question whether the body of Jesus rose from the grave.

2. The Importance of the doctrine to the Church. It is sometimes alleged that the Christian church was based upon belief in the resurrection, and that consequently if that belief were vain, the church is based upon a falsehood. But the doctrine of the imminent second advent of Jesus was every whit as prominent in the early church, and we know that that was a pure delusion. It was belief in the resurrection that made the disciples strong. That belief they unquestionably held, but it was the belief that was potent. Whether or not a fact lay behind that belief is a question to be decided by the weight of evidence, and not merely by the belief of the disciples.

3. The Fitness of the resurrection in view of the character of Jesus. The uniqueness of the resurrection (so the argument runs) is only what might be expected in view of the unique personality of Jesus. But what ground is there for asserting the supernatural character of Jesus save the supernatural events related of him? This species of argument is reasoning in a circle: Jesus is established by miracles and then Jesus establishes miracles.

It appears, therefore, that the explanation which the disciples gave of the empty tomb is not warranted by the evidence or by other considerations. Is any other hypothesis possible? There are a few scholars who plead for the Reanimation Theory. It is contended that Jesus did not really die, but only swooned on the cross; and that in the tomb he returned to consciousness and arose. Then he went to Galilee, where his disciples actually saw him, but his system had been so shattered by the horrible experiences of Passover Week that he soon died in Galilee. This is very plausible, and it accounts both for the empty tomb and for the legends about his manifestations. The choice would probably lie between this theory and the one next to be mentioned.

In Mark (xvi. 1) and Luke (xxiv. 1) it is said that the women came on Sunday morning, bringing spices with which to anoint the body of Jesus. John, however, relates that Nicodemus brought a hundredweight of myrrh and aloes, and that he and Joseph wrapped the body in linen cloths, with the spices, and buried it (xix. 39). The women, therefore, must have been ignorant of this, else they would not have brought spices for the same purpose on Sunday. But the Synoptists said that the women watched the sepulchre till the body was buried and the stone was rolled before the opening. Either, therefore, the legend of the anointing in John is entirely unauthentic, or else the body was prepared for its final resting-place by Joseph and Nicodemus between the departure of the women on Friday evening and their return Sunday morn- ing. May not the order of events have been as follows? The body was hastily laid in a temporary tomb on Friday, since the approach of the Sabbath left no time for the usual anointing. Immediately after the Sabbath, that is after sunset on Saturday, Joseph and Nicodemus came, anointed the body for the grave, and carried it elsewhere for final burial. The women, knowing nothing of this, come in the early morning with their spices, and find the tomb vacant. Perhaps a figure vaguely seen in the dim light of morning was taken for the form of Jesus, but even without this the fact of the empty tomb might of itself be sufficient to give rise to all the rumors of appearance.

It should be mentioned that many critics hold to a vision, or spiritualist, hypothesis,—which accepts the reality of the appearances either as caused subjectively by supernatural will or vouchsafed objectively as the dead are believed to materialize nowadays. Obviously, however, this explanation would not account for the vacant tomb, which seems to be the one established fact in all the narratives.

If it be asked why Joseph and Nicodemus did not disclose the fact of the two-fold burial, several answers may be suggested. They did not belong to the immediate circle of the disciples, and consequently would not hear of the resurrection rumor till the disciples returned from Galilee, whither they had fled and where the belief grew to full proportions. They may not have cared to divulge a fact which would lessen the fame of Jesus, or perhaps they were not believed. It is certainly possible that the report referred to in Matthew (xxviii. 13) is an echo of statements made by Joseph and Nicodemus.

No good thing is failure.
No evil thing success.

Yet the life of Jesus, to human vision, had ended in failure. Belief in resurrection carried with it the reversal of the seeming verdict, and proclaimed success. But, although the body of Jesus has long ago become part of the dust of Palestine, he has triumphed by entering upon a larger life and by wielding an influence second to none in the history of the world.

Though he be dead, he is not dead,
Not gone, though fled,
Not lost, though vanished
Though he returns not, and though
He lies and molders low:
In the true creed,
He is yet risen indeed:
Christ is yet risen. (Clough.)

Questions.

The Burial.—Who took charge of the body of Jesus? Where were the immediate disciples of Jesus? Why was it needful that Jesus should be buried so quickly? Was the burial on Friday night thought to be final or only temporary? What are the arguments against the watching of the tomb?

The Resurrection.—What is the fact to be accounted for? What explanations have been offered? What can be said in favor of the disciples' theory of actual resurrection? "The resurrection of Jesus is the best attested fact in history"—Is this true? How much does Paul's testimony weigh? Between what two theories does the choice probably lie? Does the truth or falsity of the bodily resurrection of Jesus affect the idea of immortality?

Stories of Genesis.

The University Extension Division of the University of Chicago announces a course of twelve lectures, "Stories of Genesis," to be given by President Harper at the Memorial Baptist Church, Oakwood boulevard, near Cottage Grove avenue, on Saturday evenings at 8 o'clock, beginning Jan. 6, 1894. The program of dates and subjects follows: Jan. 6. The Creation of the World and the Institution of the Sabbath. Jan. 13. The Origin of Man and his first State of Innocence. Jan. 20. The Garden of Eden and the Beginnings of Sin. Jan. 27. Cain and Abel and the Beginnings of Civilization. Feb. 3. The Long-lived Antediluvians and the Demi-Gods and Heroes of other Nations. Feb. 10. The Sons of God and the Daughters of Men; Angels and Giants. Feb. 17. The Hebrew Stories of the Deluge. Feb. 24. The Deluge in Other Literatures and in History. Mar. 3. The Dispersion of Nations. Mar. 10. The Confusion of Tongues. Mar. 17. The Divine Element in the Stories of Genesis. Mar. 24. The Human Element in these Stories. Course tickets, $1.50. Single admission, 25 cents.

Notes from the Field

Grand Rapids, Mich.—The Thursday evening "Conference Meetings" are continued this year and are well attended. A printed program of the last four months of the year contains the subjects and the names of the speakers or essayists. We find such interesting topics as Ancient Monuments, Bible Study as Literature, The Divine in Man, Music as a Religious Expression, and Temperance. The meetings open with devotional services and then a talk or essay of twenty-five minutes by the leader, and then a few eight-minute talks by others.

Hinsdale, Ill.—All the activities of Unity Church seem to be going on quite as vigorously as when it had a minister. Its Unity Club is at work in two sections, one studying Hugo's "Les Miserables," and the other the Application of Science. A fraternity, which looks out for the social side of the church, has been recently organized, and the Sunday school has been reorganized and is doing good work. The church is still hearing candidates, Rev. E. M. Fairchild, a recent graduate of Andover, having been the last.

Jersey City, N. J.—The "settlement idea" is receiving new illustrations here. Two institutions have been at work some little time,—the Tabernacle Church and the People's Palace, under the guidance of Rev. Messrs. Scudder and Wells,—and now a Woman's Settlement, of which Miss Bradford, the sister of the well-known editor, is the head. One more minister to the higher needs of humanity.

Whitewater, Wis.—The Weekly Gazette, of this place, recently published as a supplement Rev. W. D. Cole's Thanksgiving sermon.

San Francisco, Cal.—Rev. Leslie W. Sprague preached recently on the unemployed, advising that they be set to work on public improvements.

Publisher's Notes

What They Say about Unity.

The editor of The Arena, of Boston, Mass., says he values it highly and reads it with much pleasure, and asked that the editor's works be sent him for review.

The President of the Unitarian Sunday School Society of Boston, Mass.:

UNITY is much improved by the new garments. If all spring styles of costume were as tasteful and attractive, the eye would have constant delight!

The manager of the Southern Unitarian:

You have an excellent paper and you are making it better all the time.

A lady in Allegany, N. Y.:

UNITY has led me from the gloom of Orthodox belief into the blessed light of your beautiful faith.

Similarly, a man in Monrovia, Cal.:

Dear little UNITY brought me out of the bondage of Calvinism, and I will always have a warm place for it in my affections. * * * Am now breathing a purer, sweeter and more exhilarating atmosphere.

A new friend in Cambridgeboro, Penn., ordering sample copies to be sent to four names, writes:

I like the ring of the metal in one stray copy which fell into my hands.

A correspondent in Perth, Ont.:

I love your simple creed. Theology is too complex: it can't explain the mystery behind the lovely flower, the work of the Creator, yet pretends to analyze God's personality.

An old friend at Quincy, Ill.:

Enclosed you will find two dollars,—one for the renewal of dear little UNITY. I would feel sad to keep house without it; it comes to me like a star of light. And I have been taking it ever since it was born. I can't boast of prompt payment, but have always paid. The other dollar I will donate to UNITY.

One of the ablest of the younger Unitarian ministers in Massachusetts:

I am heartily in sympathy with the spirit of UNITY, and would like to have it widely circulated among my people. If you could send me a few specimen copies for free distribution, I would be only too glad to urge upon my people the advantage of becoming regular readers of UNITY.

A lady in Quebec, Canada, writes:

I wish to add my humble congratulations to Mr. Jenkin L. Jones. I think he is to Chicago what Mr. Stead is to London. I hope UNITY will continue to prosper. I am sure it will, too. It has certainly helped me. I wish it all success. Though I belong to a different fold I am thoroughly in sympathy with it. Best Christmas wishes to all the staff.

A friend in Ontario:

Am pleased with its liberal religious sentiments. It grows. It has outgrown its child-clothes in being no longer exclusively Unitarian but also Humanitarian.

The bringing under the same law the present and the hereafter, the "here and the elsewhere," clearing religion of superstition, should commend itself to the multitudes who see the absurdities of orthodoxy, who are truly spiritual and earnestly for the right. Conscientious freethinkers should join the Free Church.

A faithful friend at Catskill, N. Y.:

In sending you an additional name for UNITY—see enclosed envelope addressed to subscription department—I cannot help testifying to my inexpressible satisfaction with the transformation the little paper has of late experienced.

It was only the virtue of its divine purpose and intrinsic excellence that made the paper endurable while in its former shabby, dingy dress and very imperfect make-up.

In its present form and dress and the vastly improved character of its present make-up, it has become such a precious jewel to my eyes and such a strength, enlightenment and solace to mind and soul, that I lack adequate words to express to you my hearty admiration for and profound joy in dear little UNITY.

For Nervous Debility

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

DR. A. E. BELL, Zanesville, O., says: "I have used it in my practice, and have found it very efficacious in the treatment of all nervous affections, especially nervous debility of business men; also in cerebral exhaustion it will act promptly and satisfactorily."

A Cultivated Taste

would naturally lead a person possessing it to prefer the best things obtainable and guard against imperfections. The Gail Borden Eagle-Brand Condensed Milk is unequalled in quality, as a trial will prove. For over 30 years the leading brand.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER.

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible: I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix: Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

any cyclopedia than I not submit to a similar test. It is easy to put merits and claims to the test.

Supplementing the English edition, especially treating American topics and living biography, we publish:

American supplement Over 3,800 pages.

American Supplement, edited by Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., and others, 5 volumes, 3,843 pages, and Index to entire work, 579 pages, the 6 volumes, bound in 3 volumes, cloth, price, $6.00; half Russia, $7.20.

Though the Britannica is complete in itself, this Supplement, from the hands of about 150 American scholars and writers of highest reputation is generally wanted.

Size: some customers at first thought object to the thickness of the volumes of this edition, but when they consider:

Even when bound in 24 volumes they are too large to hold in the hand, and must be consulted on a table; these volumes open just as readily as the others, being more flexible in fact, on account of the thinner paper; the cost of this is about half that of any 24 vol. edition; thus the objection quite disappears.

N.B. The above offer will not be repeated; order AT ONCE.

If you can't well spare the price of the set immediately, you may order the sample volume, or send us $1.00 on account, and we will agree to accept balance of payment for the set on its delivery within three months thereafter.

Any book supplied; the Britannica at one-sixth its former price is a fair illustration of what we are doing for book-buyers all along the line. Our publications not sold by dealers or agents; direct sales make the low prices possible. 160-page Catalogue sent for 2-cent stamp

*Still glides the stream, and shall forever glide;
The Form remains, the Function never dies;
While we, the brave, the mighty, and the wise,
We men, who in our morn of youth defied
The elements, must vanish—Be it so!
Enough, if something from our hands have power
To live, and act, and serve the future hour;
And if, as toward the silent tomb we go,
Through love, through hope, and faith's transcendent dower,
We feel that we are greater than we know.*
—Wordsworth.

PROFESSOR ALBION W. SMALL was greeted with a good audience at All Souls Church last Sunday night to listen to the first lecture in his course on Sociology. It was as good a sermon as lecture; a better lecture because a sermon. We hope more churches will try to use their Sunday evenings for the education of the people in the living questions of the day.

**

ONE of the results for the city of Chicago of the new University of Chicago is already apparent in the many University Extension courses offered. For the winter quarter some eighteen regular "class" courses are offered, including courses in psychology, political economy, civil government, modern history, Latin, German, French, literature, rhetoric and composition, public reading, mathematics, physics, astronomy, chemistry, geology, zoology, and botany. These are largely designed for teachers and other earnest students. In addition to these there are several lecture courses in the city already arranged for, including one to which we recently referred by President Harper, and the one on Social Science, at All Souls Church, by Head Professor Small.

**

WE cheerfully print in another column a correction from the officers of the Iowa Unitarian Conference. Not being present at the session we mistook the action of the Executive Committee for that of the Conference itself, and put a prospective inflection to what was technically only retrospective. The comment we made still stands in our judgment, and it is in accord with the spirit and temper of the Iowa work from its beginning as we understand it; the doing of their own work in their own way. We repeat the words in our editorial note of November 23d: "This is the first condition of power. And the sooner the other States in the West shall follow their example the sooner they will find the work growing on their hands."

**

WE print this week in our sermon department another prophecy. Another call of the spirit to religious unity. Mr. Roberts calls it a "dream," but it is more than a dream. It is beginning to be contemporary history. There are now churches that practically confess the unrimmed life so clearly stated and so eloquently urged. We hope our readers will give this sermon wide publicity, read it, lend it, send it, and then send for more. We wish it might be made into a little leaflet of envelope size, that it might borrow the wings of the personal correspondence of many of our readers. But there are so many of these things we want to do, and we have so little to do with, and so few to do it. When will the believers in the "Free Church of Humanity" begin to sacrifice for it? The age of prophecy is well nigh at an end. The age of action must soon set in.

AFTER eight years of diligent work the Rev. T. G. Milsted has severed his connection with Unity Church, Chicago. Mr. Milsted came to Chicago a young man, single and practically untried. He came to a pulpit made large and difficult by the creations of Robert Collyer. He goes away a matured man, married, widely known, and much respected in our city. It was not for Mr. Milsted to come into such close relations with UNITY and the work it represents as we had hoped, and as we think his power and convictions would have justified. But he has worked quietly in his own way, his work molded, as all our work is, by the subtle influences and entanglements that make this life mysterious, reverent, holy. With his beautiful, accomplished wife he goes to seek a year's rest and the enlarged culture that comes from travel. Mr. and Mrs. Milsted will sail this month for the older world. Their travels will reach from Skandnavia to Palestine. Europe, Asia, and Africa woo them and we trust will win them. UNITY joins with a host of friends in wishing them a joyous journey, and will welcome them back to the increased influence and the larger fellowship that will await them.

It is not what Unitarianism has stood for, nor what those who represent it stand for now, that leads a growing number of its friends, at least in the West, into a cheerful discontent under its limitations. It is the growing conviction that there is that to be, and that now is, in the way of a Liberal sentiment, a religious hospitality, which can never be identified with any one of its root movements, because it has many root movements each represented by a different word equally vital. The new liberal churches that are to grow in the future cannot be called exclusively Unitarian any more than Quaker, Universalist, Free Religious, or Independent, because all and not one of these, and many more forces are at work creating them. There is an inevitable synthesis taking place. That synthesis must have a name before it gets very much farther along. When people use a name with an apology or an explanation it is an indication that that name is inadequate. What we have said of the word "Unitarianism" is still truer of the word "Christianity." There is a bigger thing coming into the thought and love of intelligent people everywhere than "Christianity," and that is UNIVERSAL RELIGION.

The Books of 1893.

Looking over the literary field for the year past we find not a single work of fiction that promises even temporary notoriety, unless there are grounds for such hope in regard to the "Heavenly Twins," a book which our friends tell us must be read, but which we have not come to. Madame Sarah Grand, whoever she may be, may be the new name we have been looking for to continue the line of great novelists which seems to have stopped at Mrs. Humphrey Ward. Expectation has been on tiptoe looking for another promised book from Olive Schreiner, but it turns out to be but a slender collection of published, fugitive, and, most of them, earlier pieces; however, the world is glad to get anything from her pen, and it will continue to wait for that riper and richer book of which her "African Farm" and "Dreams" make such ample promise. In the realm of poetry the harvest seems to be almost as meager as that of fiction. James Whitcomb Riley seems to be well-nigh to the front of popularity among American poets to-day, and his star is still rising. He is so human, so domestic, so homely, so native to Western soil,—we are tempted to say so Hoosier-like,—that it would be a shame not to like him; nay, indeed one must be somewhat mean and sordid not to love him. But then what becomes of our propriety, our dignity, our good English and our relation to polite letters? We give all these questions up, but confess our delight that Riley has given us a new book this year, "Green Fields and Running Brooks," full of nonsense, fun and pathos, jingles that will delight the baby, and lines so searching that one at least ventured to bring them to his Sunday pulpit as Scripture, helpful in the hour of prayer and sermon,—and the bated breath and moistened eyes have justified the venture.

We wish we had more leisure, then we think we would know Edith Thomas better. We are sure she is worth the knowing. She follows after Helen Hunt and leads the singing sisterhood of America to-day. She stands half-way between Helen Hunt and Lucy Larcom, subtle and mystical, like the one, enamored of out-of-doors, in love with birds and flowers, converting them into easy parables, like the other. She has given us a sheaf of ripened corn the year gone, the pretty book entitled "Fair Shadow Land." Mrs. Martha P. Lowe, the widow of Chas. Lowe, of blessed memory among Unitarians, has given us a new and enlarged edition of "The Olive and the Pine." The book is divided, as the name might indicate, between Spain and New England. The long stretch from the old Castilian Knight to the quilting and the husking is reached by this book. At the last of the year we have an "Idyll of Greece" translated to us from the German of Gottfried Kinkel, a compatriot of Carl Schurz. So "Tanagra" becomes an idyll of liberty as well as an idyll of Greece. It is attractively illustrated by E. H. Blashfield. Of the life-helping kind, after the pattern of "Daily Strength for Daily Needs," a book which thus far has tempted many to imitate but inspired none to equal it, Emma Forbes Cary gives us this year a collection entitled "The Dayspring from on High." There is a tempting variety of sources, a provoking lack of index. The last, and probably the most respectable, contribution of poetry of 1893 is given us in the gathered poems of William Watson, the young English poet, who, during the year, has emerged again from under the cloud of ill-health. This is the poetry which must please, for it is the poetry of rhythm and melody, accompanied with delicacy of thought, more of Tennyson than Browning, and still a poet of the new day, one who consorts with scientists and is not afraid of science. William Watson is to be cultivated. His "Wordsworth's Grave" brought him immediate and merited fame. In connection with the study of the poetry of the year it is pleasant to know that Stopford Brooke has given us another primer, on the "Development of Theology as Illustrated by English Poetry." It is enough to say that it is like his others.

Alfred Church, who has made so many beautiful books for children, which the older people are sure to read, has given us another of his classical stories, entitled "Pictures from Greek Life and Story." The stately series entitled "Story of the Nations" has been enriched during the year by a volume on Parthia, by George Rawlinson, and we are impressed anew by the marvelous diligence and skill of this radical and scientific age in rediscovering lost nations and their mental and artistic treasures. Those who like such giants will be glad that the author of "Beacon Lights of History," Doctor John Lord, has told the story of Frederick the Great and Bismarck. The latter largely tells his own story in his famous speech before the German Reichstag. Helen Gardner seasons her dishes with both salt and pepper. She talks plain, always with noble intent, if not always wisely. Her "Facts and Fictions of Life," published by the Charles H. Kerr Company, is good reading for the dilettante, the men and women who live on the surface, the easy-going communicants at the tables of conventional piety and propriety. In popular science we have already referred to Professor Shaler's "The Interpretations of Nature." The Brooklyn Ethical Association, whose headquarters are in our brother Chadwick's church, and which does more than any society we know of to popularize the doctrine of evolution and to prove the spiritual and moral value of science and scientists, has given us another splendid volume of seventeen lectures under the general subject of Sociology. The closing lecture is by John Fiske. In this direction our readers are in danger of going farther and faring worse if they do not acquaint themselves with Mr. Gould's little book on "Beginnings." It is published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society. Many will steer clear of it because it is a "Sunday-school book," but it is not only good but necessary reading to grown-up folks, who would find foundations for their religious convictions in the nature of things, and who would fit their religious experiences into the law of evolution which obtains everywhere.

An original thinker never grows old. Some Ann Arbor workers have brought out in modern dress and with full introduction Rousseau's book on "The Social Contract; or, The Principles of Human Rights," a work one hundred and thirty years old. In memoriam volumes of sermons from Henry Doty Maxson and Frederick Frothingham, come to some of us like messages from the beyond, for between the weighty lines we see the radiant faces whose sincerity transfigured them before the transformation time came.

The higher criticism is breaking new ground in Biblical and theological fields, even to those who have accepted the rational theory of interpretation. Good work has been done in this direction this year by Doctor Cone of Buchtel College, Mr. Crooker, Mr. Sunderland, and Mr. Fenn, the first three having given us books on Bible or New Testament topics, while the last, Mr. Fenn, is giving us admirable food for thought through UNITY. Mr. Shutter, pastor of the Universalist church in Minneapolis, has given us a book with the startling title of "Wit and Humor of the Bible;" and why not? Must not the "Man of Sorrows" have been also the man of joys? The "Smiling Jesus" has scarcely yet appeared to the artists, but there must have been a smiling Jesus. His conquering powers must have been partly rooted in the geniality of his nature. The Bible as a human book has both wit and humor in it.

How unerring are the subtle laws that make history. Time discovers greatness. The verdict of everybody is safer than the verdict of anybody. Five new books on Lincoln last year, John T. Morse's two-volume life, M. Louise Putnam's "Children's Life of Abraham Lincoln," C. C. Coffin's "Lincoln," elegantly illustrated, written so as to attract the attention of boys of all ages, and Rensburg's study entitled, "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" As we said last week of the Parliament of Religions, there are better and worse books about Lincoln, but there are no poor books. The subject is so good that no author can wholly spoil it. The rule in this case is, "Buy all the books you can about Lincoln, read all of them, and get your children to read them."

From Lincoln it is easy to slip into the sympathies of Elizabeth Hyde Bottune, who has written of "First Days Among the Contrabands." It tells a simple story of a woman's labor along the battle line. She represented the best side of New England. She was backed by James Freeman Clarke and his parish. Read this book and realize how one woman's life was glorified by teaching a "nigger" school.

We must speak of the three notable contributions to English literature made during last year, and there has come within our range of vision none other that we dare speak of in this way. First, the dying gift of the lamented Symonds, the two-volume life of Michael Angelo. Either as a substitute for or as a supplement to Grimm's great life of the great artist and the greater man, this work has come to stay. Second, the charming, juicy, luscious, nutritious Letters of James Russell Lowell, by Charles Elliot Norton,—such fun and wisdom, so much information and learned lore given us unwittingly. We catch him at it when he thought nobody was looking. Happy is the man who possesses himself of this first edition, simply as a money investment. It is like Chicago real estate, sure to bring large profit if you hold on to it long enough. Third and last,—take it up gratefully, take it up tenderly,—another and a new volume of Emerson, the sage of America, the Zoroaster of the Western world, the prophet of universal religion. A new volume, the twelfth in the final edition, with the eighty pages of general index. We suspect that after the entire book crop of 1893 shall have become water-soaked and sunk to the bottom of the river of time, this book will be floating, and, in the main, legible.

William J. Potter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Another of our best and bravest gone! Another, who, for thirty years, has been identified with all that makes for Freedom, Fellowship and Character in religion,—unflinching in that cause, and gentle as he was unflinching. Another of whose spirit one may speak with reverence unre-served.

William Potter was a birthright Quaker who never lost the quiet mind and lighted face the birthright gave him, although he became a "hireling" minister and a Union soldier. Somehow the Friends' School opened into Harvard College, that into the Divinity School, and that into the New Bedford pulpit, where he was ordained a Unitarian minister in the "John Brown" days that heralded the outbreak of the war. When the draft summoned him in 1863, he welcomed it as the voice of the Spirit, a call to holy service, and his people furloughed him to go as chaplain to the camps. Soon after the war the little Unitarian world began to rock with its own freedom issues, and the men who voted for the limitations—mild, but intended and distinct—of a "Christian" preamble and article in the constitution of the National Unitarian Conference, carried the day. The Free Religious Association came promptly into being as a protest. (1867-8.) Octavius Frothingham was its president and orator; Francis Abbot bore the sword and blew the trumpet in his "Index"; Potter was the working secretary; such men as Emerson and Weiss, and Samuel Longfellow, and T. W. Higginson and George William Curtis, and such women as Lucretia Mott and Hannah Stevenson and Ednah Cheney, were members or speakers on its platform. Potter's period of active service outlasted that of nearly all of them; it lasted all his life. He was the planner of conventions, the official correspondent with the Orientals, the composer of differences, the filler-in of gaps, the ever patient scribe. As years went by both Abbot's editorship and Frothingham's presidency fell to him, and he discharged his new duties faithfully and well. It was by this long service in the Free Religious Association that his uneventful life has touched the world most widely. It has been from first to last a very quiet Association; a propaganda of ideals rather than ideas, of an intellectual attitude rather than a body of doctrine. It has been a champion of free exploration in religion, and of fellowship in spirit instead of in belief. But its aim has been too broad for party action and for definite campaigns, and its tone too mild for popularity. Its temper has been that of sympathetic criticism rather than aggression; its method that of evolution, not of revolution; and its influence has made not for new separations in religion, but for unity with independence. Only a still small voice, then, among the noises of the day, but it has had at least the permeative inreach of the still small voice. Its very name, like "Free-thinker," has become a standing criticism of the Churches. It has had much to do with the gradual broadening of Unitarianism and the steady growth of its faith in freedom. Its spirit has thoroughly leavened the Western Unitarian Conference and half converted even the Unitarian Associations of the East. And the World's Parliament of Religions only realized on the large scale the ideal which the prophetic Free Religious Association had been exemplifying for years in its modest conventions.

Of this Free Religious spirit and attitude William Potter, the born Quaker, was the truest, most consistent of interpreters. In the interest of larger fellowship, the fellowship in spirit instead of in belief, he openly resigned this "Christian" name, deeming it untruth to imply that Christianity was one with absolute religion, and injustice to claim as "Christian" those ideas and virtues which equally grace believers in other religions. Hence, by his Unitarian brethren he was reckoned radical of radicals, and subjected, not to ostracism—that is too strong a word,—but to continuous avoidance. For a while his name was dropped by the American Unitarian Association from its official year-book list of ministers,—though it has long been restored to the place he claimed there as his right,—and for the last twenty-five years probably not a dozen ministers have done themselves the honor, and their people the good, of offering exchange of pulpits to Mr. Potter.

As to his pulpit work, he might be called a typical preacher in a typical parish of the latter end of the nineteenth century. In a typical parish, because his people gave him perfect liberty of utterance. And a typical preacher in it, because of his stress on the faith of ethics and the faiths of evolution. He once told his people—it was in the sermon closing his twenty-fifth year of ministry to them: "It has sometimes seemed to me that, whatever the topic I treat, my sermons always come to this one goal—character, true and beneficent character,—this above all things, this forever and evermore" This was the flower, the test, the outcome of all religion to him. And as he had baptized his mind in the spirit of the new science—Darwin's book was published in the year he was ordained,—he could not but preach the faiths of evolution. The sermon just alluded to contains in serial form a statement of what he calls "my creed, mine, though not necessarily yours"; and it is so clear and strong and lofty a statement that in the West we printed it as a tract,* calling it by that very title, "The Faiths of Evolution." "God" was to him the Eternal Energy within and behind all phenomena, working in and through nature, vitalizing all organisms, "welling up within us also as the vitalizing force of our mental and moral perceptions, —the very power that constrained us within to follow the true and to do the humane and the right." This winter he has been giving in Boston a series of free Sunday afternoon lectures on the Twenty-third Psalm in the light of the nineteenth century,—an attempt and a title most characteristic of his mind. The spiritual quality in his thought, and the luminousness of it, combined with the absence of the picturesque, makes him a veritable Channing of these latter-day faiths. The book which his people printed a few years ago, "Twenty-five Sermons of Twenty-five Years," is one of the noblest outcomes of the Liberal pulpit.

* "Unity Short Tract, No. 6"; price 60 cts. a hundred copies.

But the man himself behind the thinker is what those who knew him all these years will most miss. What words were synonyms for "William Potter?" Transparency, truthfulness, justice of mind, serenity, gentleness, inflexibility of ideal. Not "courage," merely because he did what he did in such simplicity that you never thought of it as taking courage. And his face was the index of these qualities; it was luminous with the goodness shining through. The very limitations of his nature and his culture—on the side of art and poetry and organizing power, for instance—were the limitations of his Quaker birth-right, parts of the Quaker's single-mindedness. But during the last two or three years of his life there had come a strange belated spring in him of some of these very qualities, and friends had noticed with surprise a pliancy and spontaneity and playfulness in his mood, and a poetry in his utterance they had not known before. He seemed to have come out of his reserves,—out from that cloistered self in which to even those who knew him well he usually lived.

His New Bedford people were loyal to him throughout the long ministry,—long for changing days like these. The years grew until, nine years ago, they celebrated his five and twentieth anniversary; and still, but with decreasing health, the service lasted on. Midway in it a shadow fell upon his home,—the going from him and from his children of the lovely and gifted woman who shared his inmost life. At last, on Christmas day a year ago, he preached his farewell sermon,—but still the people would not let him wholly go. They did an original and blessed deed; settling a young minister, Paul Frothingham, in his place, they commissioned Mr. Potter, with a living salary for five years, to be their roving pastor, and carry his gospel and theirs to whatever part of the earth he would. The release from responsibility proved to be a new lease of strength. Last winter he and his word were welcomed in California; in the fall he conducted the Free Religious Association's meetings in Chicago; this winter he has been giving those lectures in Boston and Worcester on the twenty-third psalm,—lectures to be printed, we may hope; and had he lived he would probably have made Chicago the center of his Free Religious work in close affiliation with the Western Conference.

Had he lived! But without a moment's warning Death touched him on a Boston street one night, and only strangers watched the closing of his eyes. Save for the loneliness of it, how happy such a swift, unheralded escape into the Light!

Thy work abides, though thou hast passed from sight:
Unconsciously hast thou thy monument
From year to year built fair and permanent
In lives to which thine own was cheer and light.
Wisdom and meekness clothed thee with their might;
In thee the sage and saint were equal blent;
Strength, courage, tenderness dwelt in thy tent,
Thou soldier of the everlasting Right.
By so much as we mourn thee, we rejoice
That we have known thee in these earthly ways
And with thee striven for the things
unseen:
Still in our silences will speak thy voice
And thy dear memory inspire our days,
Till we too pass the veil that hangs between.

What We May Learn from the Artist.

The man in "business life" is very apt to hug the delusion that he of all others is the "busy" man of the world who may readily plead "want of time" to many of the social occasions that arise, while the artist may at any moment be solicited to engage in affairs not his own, or be intruded on in his retirement. The artist works when his inspiration comes, it is said, and "between times" has much time in which to "loaf and invite his soul," or otherwise, as the case may be. But it may be put down with assurance that no artist has ever had an "inspiration" that amounted to anything for which he has not already paid in advance by long hours of continuous labor. Nevertheless the artist learns what all men should learn, that "leisure" becomes a part of every man's best activity. Not to accomplish so many things, but those things which are superior, is the urgency that bids him fall in with the fate of each succeeding day and keep as sweet tempered as his mortal clay will allow, believing, if he shall never "hew to the mark" of his ambition, he will yet accomplish that whereunto he is sent.

BY THE WAY.

II.

"Yes, he drinks; but the poor man is that distracted and mortified he drowns his sorrow in that way."

"And leaves his children crying for the bread he can't furnish because he drinks—to drown sorrow, you say. One would suppose his sorrow, when he sees those little ones suffering for his neglect, would be all the keener."

"And so indeed it is; he has often said as much himself; but he can't help it."

"Oh, yes, he can."

"Oh, no, he can't."

She would not admit it, and she would not "listen to reason that was not reason," as she pronounced all reason to be which would bring a censure on the man she loved "in spite of it all." What this infatuation may be only a woman can tell, or nobody can.

But there they were, three children, the oldest nine, and the mother leaving them to go out house-cleaning when she could get the chance; for only so did she keep a very gaunt wolf at bay.

The husband "drowning his sorrow" sometimes with a part of the pittance she could earn.

He enters sober enough from a day's work,—a chance job; hands her the few pieces of silver; in all, 75 cents. She gives him an encouraging or grateful kiss. He smiles feebly; goes to his seat in one corner meekly, and the two-year-old crawls into his lap.

Some clothing has been brought for the children, and now one holds up first a pair of shoes, then a dress and a pair of mittens. He pays no attention.

"Let your father alone; don't you see he is that tired he can't be bothered now?"

He did not raise his eyes. A struggle was going on, evidently. He is thirty-five or forty Whoso predicts the future may be wrong or right.

"Certainly, they offered me food if I would work."

"Why did you refuse?"

"I did not; I only said I must have food before I could work."

"And they refused it?"

"Oh, yes; I suppose they had to. It was their rule."

"They set you to breaking stones?"

"They tried to do that; but I couldn't break the back of a mosquito."

"No, I have no parents nor any relatives that I know of. We did have some, but they all returned to the old country when I was a baby. So mother said."

"Then you are alone—"

"No, not exactly. There's another fellow who came with me two years ago from Missouri. We worked at the same place. Two months ago our pay fell off to $3 apiece, and now we are glad if we can get two days work a week. That will keep us from starving, anyway. But if that goes—well, we ain't the kind to borrow trouble. An overcoat? Yes, we will be glad of that. We can use it between us, for the two days he works I stay at home. Read? Yes; get library books."

"Oh, I'm well fixed now. But two weeks ago I was nigh kicking the bucket, and on purpose, for I did n't see a thing to live for. Well, I was going along—street, feeling pretty blue, as you may imagine. But when I came to a certain house and saw 'Room and Board' in the window, I hurried up the steps on a jump, rang the bell, and was shown in. A big, good-natured landlady came in and started back on seeing me, with a little scream. Then she asked what I wanted. I told her I wanted a room and board, but I did n't know how I was going to pay for it. Then she asked why I came in. I told her I did n't know. I felt I must somehow, and did it before I knew it almost. She looked at me a while and began to cry. Finally she wiped her eyes and said: 'You are just the image of my boy that died a while ago, and I understand if you don't why you came in here. The good angels did it.' Or something like that, she said. Anyway she gave me the room her boy used to have and a suit of his clothes, and they were an exact fit. She said all the pay she wanted was for me to do what he did, help her about the house and do chores. I was agreeable, and now it's just like a home.

The Thought Divine.

Two souls lay in the smile of heaven,
Bathed in that light divine;
Two souls that erstwhile strangers were,
Whom each as silver must refine,
Yet knew it not, till one fair even
From out the sunset glow
There flashed a golden chain of thought
That did all wrong forego,
But caught the good in each man's heart,
Then flung itself to God,
Who gently drew the chain of thought
To paths by angels trod.
And there they walked in converse bright—
Both souls—the weak, the strong—
Each aided by the faith in each
To live the good, forget the wrong.

Correspondence

The Iowa Conference.

EDITOR OF UNITY: Will you kindly allow space for the following explanation of the action of the Iowa Conference in returning $150 to the American Unitarian Association? This money had been applied for by the Executive Committee of the conference, but at a meeting of that committee, held May 19, 1893, the following action was taken, as recorded in the Secretary's minutes:

Considering the pressing demands upon the treasury of the American Unitarian Association, the Chairman of the Finance Committee, Rev. Mary A. Safford, volunteers to raise, if possible, the amount needed by our association within the limits of our own State. The Executive Committee sanctioned the proposition and instructed the Secretary to present the A. U. A. with the $150, provided the money could be raised within the State.

At the Conference, Nov. 15, 1893, the Finance Committee reported the money raised. The Conference, as a whole, took no action relative to the $150 except that of approving the work of the Executive Committee for the year.

The Conference does believe in raising its own missionary funds, so far as possible, because it believes that "to give is to live;" but neither the Executive nor the Iowa Conference has ever voted "to accept no more help in its missionary work from the A. U. A." The Conference would sincerely regret to hear any of its actions construed as indicating any antagonism to the Association. As the report of the Conference given in UNITY, Nov. 23, suggests such antagonism, this explanation is offered.

EDITOR UNITY: An inquiry comes to me from Kansas regarding the labor bureau referred to in a recent article. The gentleman's letter was unfortunately mislaid, and I take this method of replying.

The statement concerning the bureau was copied from Miss Field's article in the Chicago Tribune, and is all I know about the facts in the case. Doubtless my correspondent can procure information from any of the State officials. H. T. G.

The Study Table

A Primer of Philosophy.*

The handsome appearance of this little book disposes one at once in its favor. Binding and presswork are admirable, and the index and table of contents are just what they should be, enabling one to consult it with the least possible loss of time and effort. In his preface the author says that he "means by 'Primer' a presentation of the subject in the plainest and most lucid form in which he could put it." In the effort to do this for philosophy it seems to us that the author has succeeded remarkably well. In little more than 200 pages he has set forth the monistic positive philosophy in a way that cannot but be of service to all earnest students of philosophy. But more than this, he has so presented the general subject of philosophy as to render it not only an enduring, but even an inviting field of study to that great part of mankind that has not a strong natural taste for the abstruse because of its abstruseness and for intellectual gymnastics for their own sake. This is a work for which there has been great need. It sometimes seems as though the metaphysicians of the past had determined that philosophy should be understood by no one but themselves, and had therefore sought to make the subject as difficult as possible, first by the voluminousness of their discussions, and secondly by their abstruseness. That a philosophical student of the scholarship of Dr. Carus should reverse this precedent, and take sufficient time and pains to write briefly and, at the same time clearly, is cause for profound gratitude. As a result of such treatises as this we believe there will be a greatly increased interest in the study of philosophy, a subject from which the sanest minds have too long been alienated by the unwise treatment it has received at the hands of its professors.

Dr. Carus' fundamental proposition is that experience is the basis of philosophy, a thesis that very many will deny before they have read his discussion of experience who will admit it after they come to understand what he means thereby. He defines experience as the effect of events upon sentient beings—a very happy definition which he explains and defends in a masterly fashion. The discussion of this matter, which begins on the twenty-sixth page, and in which he points out the current ambiguity in the use of the term,—an ambiguity of which our greatest philosophers, not excepting Kant, have been guilty,—is very helpful, and is perhaps the strongest part of the book. His discussion of axioms is another valuable feature of the treatise, though perhaps somewhat more difficult to comprehend than his exposition of experience. His treatment of free will is very strong.

Of course the book is not without faults. Among minor ones we count the attempt to use the word "atsight" as a rendering for Anschauung. Had English been his mother tongue, we do not think our author would have made this attempt; and we say this in full consciousness of the fact that Dr. Carus has a masterly command of English, and uses it with a power possessed by few scholars of English and American birth.

His use of the word feeling,—particularly in the discussion of perceptions and consciousness, beginning on page 182, is unsatisfactory. This discussion seems to us the weakest part of the book. It would have been clearer had the section devoted to the definition of psychological terms (p. 189) preceded it; for the author is generally so careful in his use of terms that if you take his definitions you will accept his statements, and the opposition that will often suggest itself when he opens a subject will usually disappear when one has in mind the exact sense in which he uses his terms.

While speaking of defects it may be well to notice a typographical error which we recall, occurring in the fifth line of page 185—"bring" for being.

The author says that the book is not expressly designed to give instruction to beginners in philosophy, but that it is nevertheless eminently available for that purpose,—and in this judgment we concur. The tyro and the teacher, as well as the independent student, are under obligations to Dr. Carus for this excellent treatise. F. W. S.

THE MAKING OF A NEWSPAPER. Edited by Melville Phillips. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1893. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 316.

The sixteen articles of which this volume is composed "first appeared in Lippincott's Magazine, constituting therein the Journalist Series, the chief object of which was to afford the public a close and comprehensive view of various phases of newspaper life and work." They are admirably adapted to that purpose and make instructive, as well as very interesting, reading for all who are in any way connected with the press or interested in it. We commend the volume to all aspirants for a journalistic career. The first papers deal with such subjects as "Getting Out" the Paper," "The Managing Editor," "The History of a News Dispatch," and the like,—the more strictly professional topics,—while the later papers are, as a rule, of a more general character, containing reminiscences of the most eminent American editors and correspondents, with some accounts of the methods by which they have scored some one or more of their greatest successes. It goes without saying that a series of articles from the pens of Halstead, McClure, Cockerill, "Gath," Handy, Julius Chambers, John Russell Young, and others who have worked or are working beside them, is eminently readable; and we hope that the book will be widely read. Certainly no student of public life can afford to be ignorant of the manners and methods of the press, the influence of which, for good and for evil, is in our day so far-reaching.

POEMS HERE AT HOME. By James Whitcomb Riley. Pictures by E. W. Kimble. New York: The Century Co. Cloth, 12mo. $1.50.

"Everybody likes poetry," said Emerson; but it depends a good deal on the poetry whether it is liked or not. Mr. Whitcomb's poetry is having an enormous circulation and his readers include persons of the most liberal culture and those who have none at all. We have had, before now, the spectacle of a writer making a lucky hit with a piece of homely verse appealing to the common heart, and then going on for years "dropping his buckets into empty wells and growing old in drawing nothing up." Mr. Whitcomb's course has shown nothing of this ethical defect. He shows no signs of falling power or weak invention. Moreover he would have been a true poet and would have made a reputation if he had never written a dialect poem.

For witness of this read the first poem in his book, a sonnet, "When She Comes Home," an old favorite with many, who cannot read it without some of the symptoms it describes:

Tears—yes; and the ache here in the throat.

The book is a collection of pieces ranging all the way from grave to gay. The selection is admirable, and yet leaves one questioning why some things were omitted. Surely "Let's Go a Visiting Down to Grigsby's Station" is worthy of a place with "Nothin' to Say," "The Old Man and Jim," "At 'the Literary'" and "The Raggedy Man," admirable as all these are. Of the graver sort we have "The Absence of Little Wesley," in the dialect form; and in every-day English, "Bereaved," "Some Day," "The Dead Wife," and "Dead Selves." The humorous kind are the more numerous. But the laughter and tears are both in one cradle, as Beecher used to say, and one is always wakening the other. The making of the book is altogether beautiful. The only possible criticism on it is that its outward show is too supremely elegant for the homeliness of what we find within.

A STRING OF AMBER BEADS. By Martha Everts Holden ("Amber"). Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 1894. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 139; $1. Paper 50 cents.

The name of Amber is familiar to all readers of Chicago newspapers.

This book contains selections from the work of many years, short, sprightly articles upon a great variety of topics. Earnest, cheerful, unstudied, the every-day thoughts of an every-day woman, they will appeal to many readers. The book is very prettily gotten up by the publishers.

MARY. By Mrs. Molesworth. Illustrated by Leslie Brooke. New York and London: Macmillan & Co. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 204. $1.

The charming stories for children written by Mrs. Molesworth are known to all the world. A series of ten of them published by Macmillan come in a box at one dollar apiece. Of them Swinburne says: "Any chapter of the 'Cuckoo Clock,' or the enchanting Adventures of Herr Bobby is worth a shoal of the very best novels dealing with the characters and fortunes of mere results." "Mary" is written for very young children, and will captivate them like the others.

THE HOME; or, LIFE IN SWEDEN. By Frederika Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. 2 vols. cloth, gilt top, 12mo, pp. 329 and 335. $2.50.

This elegant edition of the well-known Swedish classic is issued by the Knickerbocker Press, and is heartily commended to the attention of those who are not already familiar with the writings of the gifted author.

SOME THINGS THAT CHILDREN SHOULD KNOW. By Blanche L. Delaplaine. 32mo pamphlet, 16 pages. Chas. H. Kerr & Co., 175 Monroe street, Chicago.

This helpful discussion of the delicate question which confronts all parents should be in the hands of all who have the care of the young. It not only states what all thinkers are beginning to realize, that the mystery of birth ought to be explained, in some degree, to children, but it suggests how this often difficult duty may be performed. The writer has done her work admirably.

The Magazines.

THE MONIST for the first quarter of 1894 contains an interesting paper by Prof. Richard Garbe on the "Connection Between Indian and Greek Philosophy;" four papers on Monism,—"A Monistic Theory of Mind," by Lester F. Ward; "The Unity of Thought and Thing," by Dr. Lewins; "The Subjective and Objective Relation," by G. M. McCrie, and "Monism and Henism," by the editor,—of which the first and the last two are worthy of study; a rather fantastic theory in "The Problem of Woman, from a Bio-Sociological Point of View," by G. Ferrero, who puts forth what he calls the law of non-labor; several articles of less general interest; and several brief reviews of interesting foreign books and publications,—notably those of the second volume of Max Nordau's Entartung, and Dr. Ernst Krause's book on The Troy Towns of Northern Europe (Die Trojeburgen Nordeuropa's).

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS for January is chiefly devoted to relief work. Dr. Gladden has an article treating of this subject; and the American editor, Dr. Shaw, presents reports of the method adopted this winter in some fifteen American cities.

VOLUME I. of the two-volume edition of the Funk & Wagnalls Standard Dictionary of the English language will be issued on Dec. 16. This volume has been four years in making; two hundred and thirty-eight editors and specialists have been employed upon it; and the cash outlay has been about a half million dollars. The advance orders for the work mount up into the tens of thousands. It has been granted an award at the Columbian Exposition.

AN astonishing proof of the popularity of the new book, "Samantha at the World's Fair," which was first issued by the Funk & Wagnalls Company on November 16th, is the fact that the fortieth thousand copies are now coming from the press. Such a record is seldom attained, particularly in so short a time, and more than assures the phenomenal success of the book.

The Dream of Religious Unity.

A SERMON PREACHED BY REV. JOHN E. ROBERTS BEFORE ALL SOULS CHURCH OF KANSAS CITY, MO., PUBLISHED BY THE CONGREGATION.

That they may all be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us—John xvii. 21.

Before the fraternity of religions was discovered or even dreamed of save by the noblest few, before the generic unity of mankind was known to be a fact, before science had revealed the laws of nature and shown the universe to be one, before the one-God concept had become a philosophical and moral necessity to thinking man, the sublime teacher of Judea saw afar the possible unity of religions, and prayed that it might be realized. When we remember the inveterate animosity that existed between the different sects of religion, the bitter and implacable hatred which each religiously cherished for the others, the hostility, jealousy, exclusiveness and intolerance common at that period to all religious parties and factions, the prophet's prayer seems wantonly sanguine and rashly prophetic.

The religious world was a chaos. Conflicting theories and hostile camps engendered discord and fanned the flames of strife. Religions were a system of standing armies snuffing the battle from afar. Fraternity, tolerance, sympathy, and co-operation none dreamed of—none save one. And this one, this brave and undaunted herald of the golden days, saw in vision the time when even religions should put away the blood-rusted sword and learn war no more.

Looking back to that day of the prophets and then at this day, with its comprehensive unities, one may see what a sublime opportunity religion lost. It might have been the potent agent for blending the thought and purpose of mankind and making real the brotherhood of men. It might have led forth the kingdom of God on the earth as the great teacher hoped. But though this was the dream of the great leaders in religion, yet the rank and file seem to have been incapable of embracing their high purpose and fulfilling their noble ambitions. Religions grew more arbitrary and exclusive. Mutual hatreds grew more intense, wars and persecutions more bitter.

Meanwhile the world's life was to be revolutionized by other and unexpected influences. The desirability of peaceful relations between the nations of the earth was a proposition that the interests of commerce first made and the enlightened moral sense ably seconded. The progress of science and discovery brought to the attention of the thinking world questions of universal importance, questions that admitted of no local or biased solution. The spirit of philanthropy widened and deepened until it began to be perceived that all human beings have equal and inviolable claims upon justice, both human and divine. After these mighty forces, commerce, science and philanthropy had wrought and revolutionized the world, factional religion found itself out of harmony with the spirit of the age and inadequate to the needs and longings of the spiritual life of men. Religions were in need of restatements to adjust them to the changed conditions of human life. The divine informing spirit of religion had outgrown the form. Multitudes of men were more religious than was religion itself. Minds were broader than creeds. Human hearts were more divine than theories of atonement. Truth was ampler and richer than Bibles. The Christ was coming again to the world, not in the clouds of heaven, with angel trumpeters proclaiming judgment to a doomed world, but in the tenderer sympathies, the truer humanity and the nobler spiritual purpose of thousands and thousands of the children of men.

Religion was not outgrown nor superseded nor disallowed by the intelligence of men, but many of its forms and statements and methods were. Its forms are local, temporary and pass away. Its informing spirit is eternal. Since man was man that spirit has impelled him to believe in and to seek after the Supreme One; nor have we any reason to infer that that search will cease so long as man is man.

It is inconceivable that the religions of the world should remain unaffected by the world's modern life. Forming as they do a large and corresponding part of that life, they must in one way or another respond to whatever alters or affects it. Until modern times the attitude of religion to change, discovery and improvement has been one of hostility and stubborn resistance. It has called honest criticism ungodly, science atheistic, and many things introduced for the betterment of man's physical condition it has pronounced interference with the designs of providence. Happily the spirit of hostility has passed away. And this change in the general attitude of religion to the non-religious forces of society constitutes the most remarkable of all the effects wrought upon it in modern times. For ages religion sought and kept the cloister and the cell; within their sheltered gloom visions were awaited and inspirations sought. Moreover its books were supernatural, its Christs were extrahuman, and its authority was attested by miracles that were exceptional, if they did not transgress and transcend natural laws. It worked from without. It was distinctively not of this world. It suffered no alliance with reason and sought no aid from the great forces of mind and heart that were steadily working to make the world new. All this has changed. Before the intelligent world religion lays claim to no authority not founded in reason and boasts of no sanctity not warranted by the rational order of the universe and the nature of man. It no longer resists science nor fears knowledge and light. It has taken its place as one of the great hierarchy of moral and spiritual forces whose united purpose is the lifting up of mankind.

A special phase of this stupendous change may be seen in the different character of the questions that occupy religious leaders. Until recently these questions have been wholly speculative and doctrinal.

It is difficult to realize that the Christian world was once divided into warring factions upon the question as to whether Jesus was made of the same substance as or of similar substance to that of God. Even speculative theology is at last more reverent than to make of the Infinite a plaything of logic and debating societies. The question of whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father or from the Father and the Son is not now of startling moment to the average man or woman. The questions relating to original sin, theories of atonement, and modes of baptism,—questions that never yet, as has been truthfully said, presented a practical difficulty to any earnest soul, are no longer of burning importance. They are like bunches of dried herbs, supposed to be medicinal, which some people gather in the autumn and hang up in the attic, and then forget until they bring in another bunch next autumn.

The questions of to-day are practical. They relate to human needs; they belong to the people. Theology-making is fast yielding to applied religion and applied ethics, which may be the same thing. The problem of poverty, the obligation of wealth, the care of destitute children,—these are problems that the spirit of true religion leads to and tries to solve. Religion is being adapted to the life that now is. It has set its feet upon the round earth. It no longer despairs of this world in which the Christ prayed that the will of God might be done as it is done in heaven.

There are some things already accomplished that presage religious unity. The scientific spirit is possessed by all seekers after truth. The laws of reason are recognized as universal. Truth is welcomed and held sacred. These form the rational basis for religious unity and contribute to its realization. The scientific spirit implies pains to investigate and open-mindedness. The laws of reason require that any rational conclusion sanctioned by clear thought is valid everywhere. Reason is one, and religion may claim no exemption from rules of evidence and laws of thought that rightly control the minds of men working in any other field. The sanctity of truth implies that all truth is of God, and wherever or by whomsoever found, it constitutes a veritable word of God. The scientist, though men may call him atheistic, is still a revealer. Humanity is a revealer, making more clear by its moral purposes and spirit longings the mind and will of God. Thus the real Bible, the true word of God, is an unfinished book, while every discoverer, every age, and every noble life contributes to its inexhaustible riches. I have stated these propositions in such a way that I believe no truly religious person of any name or faith would care to take exceptions to them.

The dream of religious unity does not imply nor require similarity of form in religious expression. It does not imply the organic unity of religious parties. There will always be diversity in all things external. Temperaments, tastes and manners differ. The Catholic worships best by means of some appeal to eye or ear. His worship is ornate, picturesque and dramatic. The Quaker worships best by plain words and few, or by silent contemplation of the invisible and unspeakable realities. Yet both worship, both feel after God. All forms are merely aids to the longing, yearning soul. Beneath or within the form, giving it potency, sanctity, and making it sublime, is the human soul. Above the form and embracing it is the longed for and answering Supreme. These two unite in all true worship. Could we rightly interpret it, the language at all altars is the same.

While organic unity is not desirable nor practicable generally, yet it will without question be achieved in certain cases in the interest of economy and effectiveness. Smaller communities, instead of having a number of churches with infrequent and irregular service by untrained ministers, will have one or two with both the intellectual and spiritual standard at least as high as the average in the community. The public ministrations of religion will be adapted to the needs and capacities of the community, rather than having the community adapted to the ambitions of mere sectarianism.

Under all the names and forms of religion there will be one controlling purpose, one comprehensive aim, the realization of the divine in man. This oneness of aim is the essence of religious unity. For this end all religions shall yet join, then shall they all be one. Belief will be solely an individual matter. Creed will be subordinate to character. The one requirement will be the desire to live a finer, higher life. The one duty will be service for others. In the spirit of religious unity the selfish seeking of heaven will disappear. The sectarian pride and ambition will disappear. Religious controversies and rivalries will cease. And the pride of opinion and prejudice of custom will no more stain the cheek of religion with tears of pity and shame.

It may transpire that in the interest of the spirit of religion a new church will grow up, a church without any of the limitations or peculiarities implied by each of the old names, a church born anew, born of the spirit of God, a church born of the deepening spirituality of the human soul, a church that shall be called not Unitarian, not Protestant, not Roman Catholic, not even Christian, but the Free Church of the world, a church in which no man shall say, I am a Jew or I am a Mohammedan, or I am a Christian, but a church in which all men shall say, we are brethren and God is our Father. A church in which the spirit of devotion is so commanding that all shall forget their differences of race, creed and title under the holy spell of worship. A church where no man shall be a stranger, a church in which each shall feel the spiritual uplift and hear the voiceless benediction of peace and say in their inmost heart, This, this is the house of God, the very gate of heaven.

Jesus' Christmas—in 1893.

TO THE CHILDREN OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

What would he do if he were here—
Jesus unto our hearts so dear ?

If Jesus were here, a little child,
Led by his mother Mary mild
And goodman Joseph, his father true (So good that he called God, "Father,"
too!),

If Jesus were here, I am sure that he Would be glad to see the Christmas Tree
With its candles bright and its glittering star,
And the children trooping from near and far
To his birthday party.

But then I know
(For do not the gospels tell us so ?)
If there was any forgotten child Who the glad day long had never smiled--

There might be ninety and nine so gay—
One little boy would steal away
Out in the darkness and snow and cold
To bring that child to the Christmas fold.

And what would you do if he were here—
This Nazareth boy to the world so
dear ?

Would you build him a throne by the Christmas tree
And round it solemnly bend the knee And sing: "How high and holy is He,
The only child of Deity?"
If you should—

I think his gentle eyes
Would rest on you in vast surprise;
You would hear his voice so tender and true

(Speaking just as he used to do)
"God's only child !

Then—who are you ?"

And, O, what shall we do to bring him
here—
The Christ-child unto our souls most
dear ?

We must be Christ-children too,
Helping the world in all we do,
Making father and mother glad
To see God's child in their girl or lad.
Then—this is the secret I have to tell—The dear Christ-child will be here to dwell
In the home and the town we love so well.
For it means the same to be tender and
true
In Nazareth and in Kalamazoo.

The Matsuyama Mirror.

Among the many marvelous things to be seen in this country of marvels that first attract the attention of the foreigner is the Japanese mirror. Its peculiarity consists in the fact that it is made of metal—generally of bronze—coated on the front with an amalgam of tin and quicksilver, and so highly polished that but for its weight it might be mistaken for an ordinary looking-glass. The back is adorned in relief with flowers, birds, or Japanese characters, which extend to the handle, and the general appearance is that of a handsome metal fan.

That which is most extraordinary about the mirror, however, is the quality it possesses of reflecting a luminous image of the design on the back. In other words, the sunlight seems to penetrate the metal and display the figures that are otherwise hidden from view. The attention of men of science has long been attracted to the phenomenon, but no explanation heretofore given has proved satisfactory. The consensus of opinion is that the effect is produced by an unequal convexity resulting from the manipulation of an iron tool accompanied by the application of mercury.

In connection with these mirrors, the Japanese have a pretty fairy tale, and because of the poetical thought it conveys, and the pleasure it may afford to young as well as old, I send you the following free translation as it has been given to me by one of the English residents here:

A long time ago there lived in a quiet spot a young man and his wife. They had one child, a daughter, to whom they were greatly attached, and their home was known as Matsuyama, a beautiful village in the province of Echigo. It so happened that the father was obliged to go to the great city of Tokio, the capital of Japan. The mother, never having been farther from home than the next town, could not help being frightened at the thought of her husband making such a long journey, yet she was proud of the fact, for he was the first man in all that country side who had been to the big town where lived the emperor.

At last the time arrived for his return, and dressing the baby in its best clothes and arraying herself in the pretty blue gown which she knew her husband liked, she waited to give him welcome. And when he came, how the little girl clapped her hands and laughed with delight over the beautiful toys her father brought. "And for you," he said to his wife, "I have brought this. It is called a mirror. Look and tell me what you see inside."

He gave to her a plain, white wooden box, in which on opening it she found a round piece of metal. One side was white like frosted silver and ornamented with raised figures of birds and flowers. The other was as bright as the clearest crystal. The young mother looked into it with delight and astonishment, for from its depths was looking at her with parted lips and bright eyes a smiling happy face.

"What do you see?" asked the husband, gratified at her astonishment. "I see a pretty woman looking at me. She moves her lips as if she was speaking, and—dear me, how odd, she has on a blue dress just like mine!" "Why, you silly woman, it's your own face that you see," said the husband, proud of knowing something that was new to his wife. "That round piece of metal is called a mirror, and everybody in the great city has one, although we have not seen them in this country place before."

The wife was charmed with the present. But the wonderful thing was far too precious for every day use, so she shut it up in its box again, putting it away carefully among her most valuable treasures.

Years passed on, and the husband and wife continued to live happily. The joy of their life was their little daughter, who as she grew up became the very image of her mother. The latter, mindful of her own passing vanity on finding herself so lovely, kept the mirror carefully concealed, fearing that the use of it might breed a spirit of pride in her little girl. She never spoke of it, and as for the father he had quite forgotten the circumstance. So it happened that the daughter grew up as simple as the mother had been, knowing nothing of her own good looks or of the mirror which would have reflected them.

After awhile, however, a terrible misfortune occurred in this happy little family. The good mother fell sick, and though waited upon with loving care by day and night, she grew worse and worse, until at last the sad announcement was made that she must die. Calling the girl to her, the mother said, "My darling child, I must soon pass away and leave you and your father alone, but I want from you a promise. Here is what is called a mirror," taking it from its hiding place and handing it to her daughter. "Promise me that you will look into this mirror every night and morning, for there you will see me and know that your mother is still watching over you."

The child promised with many tears, and the mother, being now calm and resigned, soon after died. Obedient and dutiful, the daughter never forgot her mother's last request, and each morning and evening took the mirror from its box and looked at it long and earnestly. There she saw, as she supposed, the bright and smiling vision of her lost mother. Not pale and sickly as in her last days, but the beautiful young mother of long ago. To her at night she told the story of the trials and difficulties of the day, and to her in the morning looked for sympathy and encouragement in whatever troubles might be in store for her.

So, day by day, she lived as if in her mother's sight, striving still to please her as she had done in her mother's lifetime, and careful always to avoid whatever might give her pain or grief. Her greatest joy was to look in the mirror and say, "Mother, I have been to-day what you would wish me to be if you were by my side."

Thus seeing his little daughter every night and morning looking into the mirror holding converse with it, her father one day asked her the reason for the strange behavior. "Why, father," she said, "I look into the mirror every day to see my dear mother and talk with her." Then she told him of her mother's dying wish and how she never had failed to fulfill it. Touched by so much simplicity and such faithful loving obedience, the father shed tears of pity and affection; but he could not find it in his heart to tell the child that the image she saw was only the reflection of her own sweet face, which by sympathy and association had become more and more like her dead mother's day by day. And so she lived on, happy in the thought that though absent in the flesh, the one she loved best was always present in the spirit and always looking on her from the depths of her cherished mirror.

WHEN Washington Irving used the phrase "the almighty dollar" he gave an undesirable but nevertheless accurate epitome of the life and aims of many Americans. But, perhaps, we ought not to set any geographical or national limits. It's about the same the world over, especially in civilized(?) countries. A Bombay dealer in curios shows beside a Chinese Joss marked "Heathen Idol," a $5 gold piece labeled "Christian Idol." The Celestial can evidently be sarcastic when he tries.

Lesson XVIII.

AN INVISIBLE COMPANION.

Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.

Matt. xxviii. 20.

When children are playing alone on the green

*In comes the playmate that never was seen,
When children are happy and lonely and good*

The Friend of the children comes out of the wood.

*Nobody heard him and nobody saw,
His is a picture you never could draw,
But he's sure to be present, abroad or at home,*

When children are happy and playing alone.

Robert Louis Stevenson.

Picture: The Unseen Jesus, by Hofmann.

The story of the picture is obvious. The scene is in a German home. The father and the mother, with their three children and the dear old grandmother, are gathered for family prayers. One of the volumes of the big family Bible has been taken from the shelf above the niche in the wall where the crucifix stands, and the father is reading. But, unseen by all, Jesus himself is in the room where two or three are gathered in his name, and with eyes bent upon the baby in the mother's arms stretches out his hands in invisible benediction. Their eyes do not see him, but he is there, and perhaps their hearts are burning within them while the Scriptures are read.

What was the manner of life of the Christians after the death of Jesus?

—They walked by faith, not by sight, and endured as seeing him who is invisible.

One of the most beautiful things about the life of the Christians as we find it described in the New Testament is their perfect trust in unseen influences, which were guiding them in perplexity and helping them in need (cf., e. g., Acts xiii. 1-4; xv. 28). Out of the invisible world where Jesus was came intimations in dreams and visions (Acts xvi. 9; xviii. 9), in promptings or restraints (Acts viii. 26; xvi. 6, 7), which were ascribed to the Holy Spirit, to angels, to the continued ministry of Jesus himself. This mental attitude is best expressed by Paul—"We walk by faith, not by sight." For usually in the New Testament faith means an obedient trust in things unseen. Christians were those who had faith in Jesus as the Christ, and during his absence they must keep their faith in him if they would enter his kingdom at the second advent. Moreover, many of the Jews who became Christians were deprived of much that had previously been precious and helpful—the temple with its altar, the priests with spoken assurances of forgiveness and blessing. To meet this need the epistle to the Hebrews was written by an unknown

Christian who sought to strengthen belief in an unseen temple, altar, priest, and offerings, which were the realities of which earthly things were only shadows, whose service of faith was better than that of sight in Jerusalem. Naturally this temper of mind was exposed to the very real dangers of other-worldliness to which, as we know, many of the Christians succumbed. Yet it fostered the imagination and so put the church in training for a purer idealism. One of the most distinctive faculties of man is his power to direct his energies toward the attainment of remote results which, as ideals, govern his life far more than considerations of present utility or apparent benefit. So, even by the delusion of the second advent, the noblest qualities of manhood were exercised.

Can this faith of the primitive Christians mean anything to us? Believing in the indefinite progress of man, we cherish the hope that at some time in the far distant future justice and love will be actually supreme in the world and the spiritual ideals of Jesus be realized in human society. This is our faith in the kingdom of God, based not upon the promise of Jesus but on the history of the world, which stimulates and strengthens. And if those who die live on in a world imperceptible by our senses in which Socrates continues his research into true and false knowledge, conversing with Orphæus and Hesiod and Homer, Ajax and Odysseus (Apology §41), then must Jesus be as eager to help men there as he was on the earth. And if in ways that the senses know not of, any suggestions of counsel or reassurance can come to men who are in spiritual sympathy with those who live unseen, or on the earth, those who look to Jesus, to the saints, to their friends, for help may receive it. Psychical research opens great possibilities and makes the faith of the Christians much more rational than it appeared a generation ago. The evidence is yet far from sufficient to warrant an affirmation, but it is more than sufficient to silence unthinking denial. Nobody can say that this picture does not represent an actual fact; on the other hand, no one has a right now to say that it does. But in a general sense, if not in this particular and personal way, religion has to do chiefly with the imagination, and "to walk by faith" is still the essence of the religious life. A religious man will not excuse himself for wrong-doing by pleading that everybody else acts in the same way, for, as a religious man, he owes allegiance to higher standards of morality than have yet been popularly accepted. He will not be discouraged by the victory of evil for the very heart of his religious belief is the faith that right must triumph in the end. For us, at any rate, religion must be life in the power of things unseen.

What was the early Jewish belief about a future life?—It was believed that at death all passed alike into sheol, an underground cavern, from which all that made life worth living was absent.

The course of Hebrew thought regarding the future cannot be traced with certainty. Yet we may venture to sketch it. According to ancient Semitic ideas there was, under the earth, a vast cavern whither the shades of the dead were gathered (cf. Is. xiv. 9). There all lived a colorless, monotonous existence from which those living on earth prayed to be kept. Long life was fervently desired, death was dreaded because of the nature of sheol. As the Messianic idea enlarged and the dream was indulged of a vast Jewish kingdom dominant in the world, the question arose whether the Jews who had been so unfortunate as to die before the coming of this kingdom were to have no share in its glory. This was answered by the teaching of the resurrection (D.n. xii. 2). All Israelites were to be brought from sheol up to the earth again, but the bad were to be put to shame and punished. Thus there came to be a division in sheol. Those of its inhabitants who were destined to a happy future on the earth were in better case already than the rest. For them sheol was a place of hope, for others there was despair mingled with regret. The colorless cavern has become bright on one side, lurid on the other.

What was the early Christian idea of the future?—The believer who died passed at once into the presence of Jesus and was forever with him sharing his joy.

It does not seem possible to bring all the New Testament writers into agreement on the subject of the future. In the book of Revelation, the picture is very distinct: Satan is bound; the believing dead are raised to live and reign with Christ a thousand years; then Satan is loosed and all the unrighteous forces of the world make war against the beloved city only to be overwhelmed by fire from heaven; then follows a second resurrection and the general judgment, after which all the ungodly, with death and hades (i. e. sheol), are cast into the lake of fire and the righteous who have believed in Christ enter upon their inheritance in the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. xx. and xxi.). Paul's thought as to the future marks by its different phases his spiritual growth. Yet two ideas seem to persist through the various forms: (1) the believer in Jesus went at death to be with his lord (Phil. i. 23) and (2) there was to be a passage of the body by the spirit. The latter idea takes sometimes a very high form: while Paul often speaks of the resurrection as a future event (1 Cor. xv. 52) he also views it as a spiritual experience (Col. iii. 1 (?); but the germs of the idea are in Rom. vi. 4, viii. 10, 11, by which the body becomes the friend of the spirit instead of its foe). The thought of Jesus concerning the future is quite obscure: we cannot be certain whether he believed in one resurrection or two, or indeed in any resurrection at all. He did believe, however, in a future life and in an eternal difference between righteous and unrighteous. But while his followers differed widely as to the details of the future not one of them doubted that for them it would be bright and glorious. Hence in the New Testament, never in the Old, the future life conceived of as something to be coveted or dreaded becomes a motive for holy living. Never except in a few of the most exalted utterances of Paul does the New Testament think of a final restoration of all souls to holiness and happiness, but the spirit of the New Testament has made us think of it and the ethical sense which created the idea of eternal punishment is rapidly abolishing it. If there be immortality for all there must ultimately be blessedness for all.

The present significance of the early Christian idea, these Lessons are not to discuss. Certainly what is true of Jesus must be true of all men. If he lives we shall live also; if he is happy those who have lived as he lived will be happy too, and spiritual gravitation may be trusted to bring all such together. For clear thinking, however, it is essential to discriminate between resurrection and immortality: the one implies cessation and renewal of life, the other unbroken continuance. With few exceptions, resurrection holds no place in the minds of modern thinkers, the only question concerns immortality. And granting the reality of future life at all, the questions are these: (a) Is immortality an acquirement or is it native to the soul? (b) Can a soul by continuance in evil-doing destroy itself? Is restoration or annihilation the end of those who continue in selfishness?

If we may not hold the hope of the early Christians so stoutly as they, we are at least free from terror. Whatever may await us in the future must be that which is best for us.

Questions.

The Picture.—What Scotch poem does this picture remind you of? What sort of home does this seem to be—rich or poor, peaceful or quarrelsome, happy or sad? Is it Roman Catholic or Protestant? Is there any possibility that the picture represents a fact? Does it illustrate an idea of primitive Christianity?

Faith and Sight.—What is the usual meaning of faith in the New Testament? What did walking by faith mean to Paul? What may it mean to us? "When you are in Rome do as the Romans do." Is this ethical? Would Paul have assented to the principle (cf. Rom. xii. 2)? Would Jesus?

The Future Life.—What was the Jewish idea of sheol? Distinguish between resurrection and immortality? How did the idea of resurrection arise among the Jews? How did it react upon the conception of sheol? What is certain about the belief of the Christians concerning the future? What discordant elements were in their thought? To what inconsistencies in the mind of Jesus do these correspond?

Sunday School Items.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF MANHOOD AND WOMANHOOD.

Mr. Mangasarian has kindly consented to write a short introduction to the twelve lessons from Noble Lives and Noble Deeds which are to form the concluding portion of our Fourth year. This introduction will be published in UNITY in a week or two, and will be reprinted in a cover to contain the twelve lessons. Those ordering the lessons will obtain them in this form without extra charge.

MR. GANNETT'S OLD TESTAMENT CHART.

We see that this little chart, which was published as a help to the third year in our Six Years' Course, has been recommended by the Eastern Sunday School Society for use with their Old Testament lessons. We are sure they will find it excellent. It is the best birds-eye view of the growth of the Old Testament we have ever seen. The chart, combined with his Three Stages of a Bible's Life, published as Unity Mission Tract No. 40, will enable a Sunday school class to get a clearer understanding of the Bible than all the ponderous commentaries of our theological schools can give. Indeed, the little tract has been reproduced by the English Sunday School Society as a series of lessons, and might well be used so in this country.

A SECULAR SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Sunday schools started a century ago with the attempt to teach the uneducated young the rudiments of a common school education, reading, writing and arithmetic, and not the catechism or the Bible. An attempt to do a similar thing has been successfully made in St. Louis. Prof. C. M. Woodward, known all over the world for his success in introducing and developing manual training in our public schools, determined something over a year ago to start a Sunday forenoon school for those who had to work hard all the week and yet wished to educate themselves better for the duties of life. This school is now in its second year and has an attendance of over fifty, with seven teachers. Algebra, geometry, arithmetic, chemistry, physics and similar studies are taught, with excellent results.

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahma leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fast-ing, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Part-ing, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

Notes from the Field

Sheffield, Ill.—Union Thanksgiving services were held here this year in the Unitarian Church, the Methodists and Congregationalists and their ministers joining in the meeting, and the Congregationalist clergyman preaching the sermon. This is an advance over last year, when the Unitarians and Congregationalists united in the latter church, but the Methodist minister refused to join with them. Mr. Hewitt and his people were also invited to assist at the dedication of the Congregational church a few Sundays ago and accepted the invitation.

Battle Creek, Mich.—One of the true churches of the West is the Independent Congregational Church of Battle Creek, which some ten or eleven years ago, under the pastorate of Rev. Reed Stuart, came out of its bondage to the Presbyterian creed into the freedom of untrammelled search for righteousness. Since 1888 it has continued its work under the Rev. W. D. Simonds. It is a strong church, and we believe our readers will be interested in its "Service of Consecration," which we give below :

ADMONITION.
 DEAR FRIENDS: We are commanded not to lay up treasures on the earth only, but to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

We are taught that the divinest law of life is to love God and our fellowmen; that the Lord requires nothing of us but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly.

We are persuaded that religion is best defined as being a passion for righteousness; that the religious life is not of necessity characterized by the observance of any forms or ceremonies, or by the acceptance of any formal statements of doctrine.

We do not, therefore, understand that by presenting yourselves here to-day you commit yourselves to any fixed intellectual creed, but only to a moral purpose, that purpose being to seek in the spirit and method of Jesus, to make the world better and happier.

FELLOWSHIP.
 Most gladly, dear friends, we welcome you to the fellowship of this church, believing that your aims and ours are one; that in mutual charity and love we shall together seek to promote the cause of truth and righteousness in the world.

And to this end may the kind Father bless our efforts to advance his kingdom and to make free his truth.

Pentwater, Mich.—This pleasant little town by the lake has quite a liberal element, and we learn that Rev. John Snyder, of St. Louis, held services here during his vacation last summer. He preached in the Baptist Church, which has since burned down—a judgment upon them, some of the good brothers may perhaps think. It is expected that a hall will be engaged for the services the coming summer.

Hobart, Ind.—This little town has not had services on Thanksgiving Day for many years, but this year the Unitarian church planned to have a Union Service in their church. They persuaded the stores and saloons to close, and then sent out invitations to all the families in town to join with them, and invited the three orthodox ministers to take part in the service. But one of the ministers immediately started a Union Service in his own church and invited the other two ministers to join with him. The orthodox people had their services, and so did the Unitarian, who put laymen on their program, when the ministers declined; and the latter had their church filled to the doors.

Cleveland, O.—From the monthly bulletin of Unity Church it appears that the young people are particularly well provided for, there being a Young Ladies' Circle, a Hand Club and Progress Club for their benefit.

Topeka, Kan.—Under the pastorate of Rev. Abram Wyman the Unitarian church at the above-mentioned place is hopeful and active. Besides the Sunday-school, there are two services on Sundays and some form of activity every Friday night,—a reception, a literary lecture, a musicale, or something of the kind. From the subjects announced in the monthly bulletin it is evident that Mr. Wyman's evening services are intended to enable outsiders to learn what Unitarianism is, while the morning sermons are devoted to the discussion of non-doctrinal topics. Two sermons a week in addition to the duties of an active parish, are much for one who has not a "barrel" to turn to, and we hope that our ardent young ministers who undertake such work will not overdo their strength.

Oklahoma City, Oklahoma Ty.—From the daily paper of this new city we clip the following note :

Under the energetic pastorate of Rev. C. H. Rogers, the recently organized Unitarian church of this city is making rapid growth in membership and influence. Rev. Rogers is an original thinker and forceful reasoner, which attracts to his church persons who admire a broad, liberal discussion of subjects, theological as well as secular. It is the intention of the Unitarian Society to organize a literary club in connection with the church, a feature of which will be a first-class scientific and literary library, and the brightest minds of the city will be invited into membership and to take part in the discussions which will be a prominent part of the work.

Oakland, Cal.—Christmas was celebrated in Mr. Wendte's Church on Sunday with a very elaborate musical program, rendered by a chorus choir and a Sunday school orchestra of twenty-five instruments in the morning, and by instrumental quartette and the chorus choir in the evening. Mr. Wendte gave an address at one service and read a story at the other.

What They Say About the Chorus of Faith.

Rev. W. I. Nichols, Philadelphia: I received last week from a friend a copy of your beautiful "Chorus of Faith." It is a fine thing and I hope will have a wide circulation. The introduction is excellent.

Mrs. Celia Parker Woolley, Geneva: Your book is a good one and I foresee that I shall make much use of it in the pulpit; and others will also, I have no doubt. I like your plain statement and purpose.

Miss Josephine C. Locke, Chicago: The "Chorus of Faith" is a jewel—a treasure. You certainly are inspired to say the right things in the right way, right time and right place. Pages 13, 14, 15 of the Introduction take the cake. That description of his reverence Bishop Shibata I shall always bless you for—so graphic, so humorous—just what I felt about him and could not voice.

Rev. F. L. Hosmer: I opened a package that came by to-day's mail, looking to see Dole's pamphlets; when lo, my two copies of the neat and attractive "Chorus of Faith" gleamed upon me. I've been able just only to glance through it; but reviewing it thus, a la Sidney Smith, I praise it! This will go where Barrows' bigger book will be kept out by the price, and it will sow good seed.

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Apropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation.—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

Are You Married?

It is the small annoyances that worry—sour milk over night, no milk-man in the morning; no cream for the coffee; no milk for the baby. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is always ready for use. Obtainable every where.

BLESSED BE DRUGGER.—A sermon by W. C. Gannett; white, hand-made paper cover, 10c. Unity Publishing Company, Chicago.

"Shave your Soap"

—so the soap makers say, especially if you're washing delicate things. Now, in the name of common sense, what's the use? When you can get Pearline, in powder form for this very reason, why do you want to work over soap, which, if it's good for anything, gets very hard and difficult to cut.

Besides, Pearline is vastly better than any powdered soap could be. It has all the good properties of any soap—and many more, too. There's something in it that does the work easily, but without harm—much more easily than any other way yet known.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

The Parliament of Religions.

Two New Works by JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

THE SEVEN GREAT RELIGIONS.

"The Lovers of the Light are One."

- I. Moses.
- II. Zoroaster.
- III. Confucius.
- IV. Buddha.
- V. Sokrates.
- VI. Jesus.
- VII. Mohammed.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'd Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

*"Let thy day be to thy night
A teller of good tidings. Let thy praise
Go up as birds go up that, when they wake,
Shake off the dew and soar.*

*So take Joy home,
And make a place in thy great heart for
her,
And give her time to grow, and cherish
her;
Then will she come, and oft will sing to thee,
When thou art working in the furrows;
ay,
Or weeding in the sacred hour of dawn.
It is a comely fashion to be glad,— Joy is the grace we say to God."*

WE have received an address on The Martyrs of the Liberal Faith, by Mr. M. M. Mangasarian, which is published by the Chicago Society for Ethical Culture and will be on sale at UNITY office. It deserves attention for the conscientious care with which the lecturer sought to avoid injustice to the mistaken zealots who sacrificed the martyrs to their diseased sense of duty.

**

NOW THAT the two homicidal
"cranks," Vaillant and Prendergast, have been found guilty and condemned to death, we believe that there will be strong protests against carrying the sentences into execution.
The difficulty which here confronts us—the unwillingness to put to death a man of whose sanity and responsibility there may be grave doubt—would be obviated if the death penalty were done away with, imprisonment substituted, and the pardoning power curtailed. That such men should be put in custody, whether sane or insane, is a proposition to which all must agree. But as long as we have the death penalty, reasonable conscientious scruples and sentimentality will combine to make it difficult to give society the protection it needs.

**

WE urge our readers to consult our club list and premium list in their own interest as well as ours. We have not given pages of our space to advertising our splendid offers. But we have nevertheless made very valuable offers, and offers which have rarely been equalled. To one who desires to take any of the leading magazines or weeklies we give the opportunity of getting it at the regular price, and without additional expense making a present to some friend of a year's subscription to UNITY, or by adding 25 or 50 cents to the regular price of the magazine he can get it and also have his subscription to UNITY renewed for a year,

—all by merely ordering the magazine through us. Or by getting a few new subscriptions at the regular rate, one of our present subscribers can get his paper next year free. Further than this, to present nearly 200 beautiful pictures of the World's Fair, neatly bound, and send UNITY to a new name for $1.25, is an offer that we are sure would bring us in many new subscriptions if the value of this book of views were known. And either UNITY or the rich volume containing an anthology of the noble utterances at the Parliament of Religions, "The Chorus of Faith," is worth the $1.25 for which a new subscriber may procure both.

THE reported movement by the Roman Catholics, with Mgr. Satolli and Cardinal Gibbons at their head, to obtain the appropriation of a portion of the public funds for the support of parish schools, seems to be quite without definite foundation, Cardinal Gibbons having expressly denied the part attributed to him in the movement. This might have been anticipated. The Roman church in America is far too wise to make a demonstration of this kind in the face of adverse popular opinion. What it does in this direction will not be done with the fanfare of trumpets and with colors flying; but quietly, here and there, where the opportunity offers. The Independent has undertaken to get the opinions of Romanist prelates on the subject, and publishes the replies of five archbishops, twenty-four bishops and several other prominent clergymen to a letter of inquiry which it sent out.
These answers, taken as a whole, are far from definite and leave us just where we were before, as far as obtaining an expression of the Roman Catholic policy is concerned. This also was to be expected. The intelligent American public, however, has little need to depend upon information of this kind. It knows fairly well what it may in general expect from the Church of Rome.

The Parliament's Challenge to the Unitarians.

Believing as we do that the Parliament was more than a passing compromise, a dramatic play in the religious history of the world, a spiritual sensation, we must take seriously to heart the prophecy we find in it. We believe it was an object lesson in church building. We think it pointed to the possibility to unite men of divers races and faiths in an actual fellowship, in working organizations, potent, inspiring, in short the Parliament of Religions predicted a movement that will undertake to organize a new church in the world; a church that will bear none of the existing denominational names in Christendom or out of it, but will be friendly and hospitable to all churches. We believe that there is a liberal church coming into being that will enlist the sympathies of the thoughtful and the dutiful who now perhaps stay outside of all churches because all of them are more or less allied by creed or by name to theological controversies in which they are not interested and that do not now represent vital interests. The most liberal of the Christian denominations have come into being on textual lines. They have fought the battle of doctrine with proof-texts. It has been a matter of chapter and verse. "How readest thou?" has been the appeal. The newer thought is indifferent of the lexicon. Religion no longer rests, for the thoughtful, on Greek roots or Hebrew vowels. All the existing denominations in Christendom and probably out of Christendom have been more allied with systems of theology. The new religion will be allied more to questions of anthropology. Ecclesiastical history is getting to be a study in archaeology, a study of old things. History is perennial and universal. Sociology is the new vehicle that is to convey gospel forces into power.

Who can fail to see what all this means to the Unitarians? If they are to wear the jewel called consistency the Parliament challenges them to take their own medicine. With uplifted fingers pointed to them it says: "Practice what you preach.

Dare to do what you predict others must do. Go to work and realize this prophecy. Put yourself in the way of co-operating with all those who thirst for the fellowship of universal religion. Put yourselves in line with the Church of the Future, and thus indeed represent the fellowship of Channing, Emerson, Parker, and Martineau." They who would belong more to the Unitarian movement must belong less to the Unitarian sect. The old controversy as to whether there are one or three persons in the Godhead has but little place in modern thought. Not unifold nor trifold but manifold is the Deity that challenges our reverence to-day. The Unitarian denomination that has been hesitating and halting along the cool and ragged edges of Christendom, missing the fervor and strength of its dogmatic heart, but dreading to trust the splendid inspirations of natural religion, of universal faith, is doomed. The sect will die in order that its spirit of individual responsibility and free inquiry may live. The Unitarian cannot go consistently to his inconsistent Methodist neighbor, his incoherent Baptist friend, and discontented Presbyterian acquaintance, and say, "Leave one sect for another, take off one denominational badge and put on another." But he can say, "Come, let us each have done with this labeling business. Let us both step out and on to a platform upon which neither Christianity, Buddhism, Brahminism nor Agnosticism has any pre-emption. On that broad plain of humanity, let us build a temple of universal religion dedicated to the inquiring spirit of progress, to the helpful services of love. We will sing and work and worship in chorus, but our chorus will not insist on uniforms. We will differ freely in our joyous union." Some such church as this already exists. It exists all over the world where commerce and science, letters and philanthropy have gone to break down the conceits of creed and the pretensions of sects. We believe that in the so-called Liberal forces of America—the Unitarian, Universalist, Reformed Jewish, Ethical Culture and Independent movements—there is found the material for the great prophetic Free Church of America. Democratic, progressive, helpful. A church where heresy-hunting will be absolutely impossible, because the spirit which makes heretics will be the central inspiration of its life,—the spirit of inquiry, the spirit of individual responsibility in matters of thought. It will find its cohesion in the emulation of the growing thought and purest lives of humanity. It will find its inspiration in hearing one another's burdens and its commission in promoting truth, righteousness and love in the world. The Parliament has thrown its challenge to the Unitarians of America and asks them to venture to live up to this standard. "If meat maketh my brother to offend, I will not eat meat; no, not while the world lasteth," said Paul. In that same spirit let Unitarians say, "If the word 'Unitarian' giveth offense, if it misinterprets us or we misinterpret it, we discard the word that we may cherish the thing."

Thus far the liberal forces are shy of each other. They are afraid of the disguised bishops at denominational headquarters, of the halting ones in the parishes. These terrors will continue until they are defied, and preacher and congregation together say, "Henceforth we take the open road." Our bishops are in front. The glimmering lights of the future guide us. We go to build the church of the twentieth century,—open temples of reason, holy shrines of helpfulness, confessionals where the soul will not be afraid to confess its ignorance, acknowledge its limitations,—where it will bend the knee to kiss the hem of the inevitable. There is the beginning place of prayer. From the touch of this hem will come in due time the courage to lift the eyes upward, and the soul will find to its delight that the inevitable is also the inflexible. That which at the lower hem is fate, at the upper end fringes the face of a benignant providence. Somebody must start, some church. Let the Unitarians dare, and here in Chicago, the scene of the Parliament triumphs. Chicago should become the cathedral city of the world for the world-religion that was here exemplified more forcibly than formulated. What better place to begin than in the West, where we have much to gain in the way of unhappy souls to make earnest and joyous, a great world of bigotry to ameliorate, a great country of wealth and intelligence to consecrate, and so little to lose in the way of influence, wealth, position, or reputation for soundness of faith even of the Unitarian kind.

For, as Lowell sang of Theodore Parker:

"From their orthodox kind of dissent we've often dissented."

"If the war must begin, let it begin here," said the grandfather of the same Theodore Parker on the Lexington green. And so we say that if the Parliament is to bear fruit in a visible movement toward a Free Church of universal religion, let it begin with the Western Unitarians. Let them stand up to be shot at, and run the risk of ridicule and defeat that the triumphs of life may come abundantly if not to them in a measure through them to others.

Let them change their organizations, if necessary, from technical to actual Unitarian churches. This is a high test placed upon their interest and sincerity in this matter. If they would win freedom even from a loved name, independency from the limitations even of a cause dear to them, in order that they may serve it better, they must sacrifice for it, win the transfiguration by climbing the mount. Let them realize the dream of a church which will be as closely and dearly related to the Japanese Hiral as to the Boston Savage, a church affiliated to Robert Collyer and to Mozoomdar, a church as open for fullest fellowship to Dhamapala as to Edward Everett Hale. Then we may look for a great passion to publish their word, a greater joy than ever in missionary activities. The church that lives for itself alone does not live as a church. It may be a club, a fashionable society, patron of music and oratory, weekly exhibitions of which it generously supports, but it is not a church. A church does not live unto itself. And even in these hungry days we must never forget that he is still a starveling whose heart goes un-fed and whose mind is not nourished. The charities of mind are ever in demand, aye, ever the most urgent.

"O Church of God! my life is lent
For yours, to spend and to be spent."

A Present Duty of Chicago Women.

The managers of the sewing-room for needy women at Harrison and Halsted streets, under the direction of the Emergency Relief Association and affiliated with the Woman's Club, says the most needed help to their enterprise is work. They have one hundred women at work at fifty cents a day, and are doing for these women the one thing really helpful, giving them the chance to help themselves. But as yet it has been hard to find enough sewing to keep them all busy. They have done some work for various hospitals and for the School Children's Aid Society, but if much more work were sent in to be done the enterprise would be on a more lasting basis and a larger number of those needy women could be employed.

Now I submit to all the kind-hearted housekeepers of Chicago who are anxious to help in alleviating the pitiful distress of this winter, that everyone of them has need of new household linen, bedding, and of many undergarments. Perhaps they have been accustomed to buy these ready-made "cheaper than they could make them," or, certainly, cheaper than they could have them made in the house. They have, perhaps, read Helen Campbell's disclosures of the way some of these garments are made by women at starvation prices in New York City, and perhaps they have debated within themselves whether it would be better for those poor needlewomen that all women should cease buying their product because it is ill-paid or to go on giving them a chance to do something rather than nothing at all. If every city woman had sought out a needy seamstress to do her work—and ceased buying the sweaters' goods—it would have solved the problem. But that it was clearly impracticable for most busy city women to do. Now, however, an organization has been formed, of unimpeachable standing, which is gathering together needy women to sew. If Chicago women would give their orders for all plain sewing—for plain undergarments, and, as the scheme is perfected, for boys' clothing and children's cloaks—to this Relief Association, they could wear the garments thus made without the haunting fear that they were made at starvation prices, under disgraceful and even infected conditions. Moreover, they could paraphrase in earnest the irreverent woman of fashion, who said that to know that her dress fitted well in the back gave her the peace that passeth understanding.

The Association, if encouragement were thus given it, could extend and make permanent a Co-operative Needle-Room, could buy materials at wholesale and furnish its customers with garments which, while costing perhaps more than those sold in the stores—but perhaps no more, since one profit would be eliminated,—would certainly still cost less than garments made at home out of material bought at retail. There would of course at first be many difficulties in the way of getting experienced cutters—and good workwomen—and of managing a sweater's business without sweating. But the women of Chicago have shown business ability that is equal to this, and with the co-operation of the factory inspectors, and even, let it be hoped, of some of the great retailers themselves, the Co-operative Needlework Association could banish the doleful Song of the Shirt from many tenements.

"Seam and gusset and band, Band and gusset and seam," might then sound in a well-appointed workroom, from women not "in womanly rags" and not
"With a voice of dolorous pitch—Would that its tones could reach the rich," but a happy Song of the Shirt.

Roads and Steeds.

Smooth is the shining path before us,
Straight it runs through the Arctic snow,
Clear and polished and hard as granite:
O'er it flashing our good steeds go.
White the prairie lies around us,
Level and bare as the boundless sea,
Here and there a bush for a way mark,
Hither and yon a sentinel tree.
Smoke curls up from the distant chimneys
Dotting the prairie here and there,
In and out by the straggling fences
Cattle are huddled, steaming the air.
Ring our bells in the silent snow fields,
Ring and echo the fields along,
Quick we flash by the crowded windows,
Floats behind us a time-worn song.
Boundless seems the space before us,
Lonely space upon either hand,
Lightning speed in our matchless horses,
Why should we ever come to a stand?
On and on we will go forever,
Circle the globe, and circle the spheres,
With roads and steeds so fairly mated.
We will ride and ride for a thousand years.

It Pays.

It pays to read the papers, especially your own family paper, for often in this way good business opportunities are brought to your attention. For instance, B. F. Johnson & Co., of Richmond, Va., are now advertising, offering paying positions to parties who engage with them, devoting all or any part of their time to their business interests. It might pay you to write to them.

MY SAINT.

TO THE REVEREND DR. JOHN S. LEE.

I know a good, brave man, whose locks are white
With frost of many winters: on his brow
Peace smiling sits: and thought with human love;
And in his deep blue eye the quiet self-respect
That upright living yields the pure in heart.
Fame has not crowned him victor in the fields
Of carnage, trade or party,—yet to me
He seems a being of the golden age
When men were knights of honor;
sage and seer,
His counsels swayed my little ones, as winds Stir the spring violets in meadows
sweet;
His blessing sanctified the solemn rite
That gave my lamb unto the stranger's
fold.
His saintly prayer above my precious dead
Was balm and healing to the bruised
heart.
His sun-bright spirit lit the farther shore.
And gave me farewells cruel fate denied.
His truth and kindness all his blessed days
Have honored manhood, and his Christly faith.
The good he wrought shall greet him when he goes
Smiling to other fields of happy toil—
Shall blossom round him in eternal joy
And charity and knowledge. Here
There will be lamentations and the tears
That never flow save for the great and good.
These shall make sweet the arid,
wasted soil
Of doubting hearts. His faithful work Shall praise him in the future of the race,
His children carry the white fire he made To frozen natures, dark and cheerless lives.
His spotless memory their anchor sheet
To whom fair justice veiled her loveliness,—
His life shall never fail them, or mislead:
When beat the surges of temptations dire
And faith in others perish utterly.
This one white life, a symbol of the next.
Shall live for man, his country and his God.

BY THE WAY.

III.

He came from Arizona to Chicago—out of work, and to see the Fair. How was he going to see it? Get a job inside the grounds. And he did. Got put on as a Columbian Guard. "Size, shape, good looks generally" did it. Saw some of the Fair; but not as much as he intended to; for, about as soon as he got his "suit paid for, they cut off the heads of about half of 'em; mine included." Since then? Well, he got pretty low down, even to begging. Slept anywhere he could crowd in when night came, or laid down on the grass on the Lake Front. Had had no trouble with the police, except once. Then a "cop" came along when he lay stretched out asleep and rapped him on the bottom of his feet. "Gee-whitkers! how it stung. I got up quicker, and was a mind to thrash the scoundrel. He deserved it, and I believe I could have done it. But I could n't thrash the whole city of Chicago, which would have backed him up, and so I chewed my tongue and thought better of it. But that ain't the way to treat a man, and Chicago should be ashamed to uphold such conduct. Suppose I was a tramp? Suppose I was tired out and threw myself down where I ought n't to? A decent man would n't treat another that way just because he was an officer and had the power. And shame, I say, on a community that'll uphold it! Suppose he had put a dynamite bomb under me and blown me to atoms. 'Twould n't o' hurt any worse. No, I've always been a law-abiding man, even though I have my opinion about the laws, and the men that execute them. I've thought a good deal over the matter. A man without work, food or shelter has a chance to think a good deal. I could give some of our law-makers at Washington, D. C., points would benefit them—if they had the wit to accept and appreciate them. I studied law once myself.

"Yes, I'm going back West again, as soon as I can. It is n't so easy getting away, though. If I foot it, I frighten all the women on the road. If I go aboard a train they put me off. If I go into a hotel in the city, they run me out. If I stop on the street corner, they order me to move on. If I lie down on a vacant spot of God's earth, I'm rapped over the feet. The only place where I'm not insulted or abused is in a saloon.

"No, I don't drink."

"Yah, you vas welcome to come in. There was mine frou, mine girls and mine kids. Yosef, you get up an' give the gentlemen a seat: an' you pour the beer for the gentlemen."

It is a cleanly room—the floor hardly dry after a good scrubbing. A few old prints in black and gilt frames are hung on the walls. The stove shines, and the "frou," seated in a high-back chair in the corner, with a white kerchief or shawl about her neck, crossing the front and tying around her waist, looking comfortable enough.

The large round table had been brought into the center of the room, and about it were grouped all the younger members of the family, the "girls" and the "kids," eight or ten in number, divided about equally. Perhaps it was five boys and four girls: the oldest a young lady with fine bright eyes and a good forehead. The forehead, in fact, was the distinguishing feature of the whole family. Broad and bulging. The little girl, six or seven, looked up from her picture book, her great eyes of brightest blue, set under a forehead of such smooth expanse one at once wondered what would she think of the world when she grew up!

The eldest boy was nineteen. The father said:

"Mine Wolfgang vas good for not much. He do the 'tings over all the vall—I guess vas porty goot, an' he learn the architect—he built the house vas in next yard. But he vas not much money to me yet."

The mother smiled, as Wolfgang did. It was the father's way. So many fathers mingle their praise of their boys with grains of discredit, as though they were afraid of spoiling them if they simply confessed the real pride in them. The way this Herr Steinberg said "mine Wolfgang" atoned, however, for the disparaging word, and his "not much money to me yet" was possibly intended as a reflection on himself as well.

Wolfgang was busy with some drawings that would have done credit to much older heads, and showed that he already had no little skill in his chosen profession.

A younger brother had covered every scrap of paper he could find with ships. Questioning him, it seemed, to a novice at any rate, that he had the navigation of the world in his grasp. He could tell all the different ships afloat, and give the names of most of them, naming also the nations to which they belonged.

"Yah, he vas goot at those. He go to sea some of these days in a tub; all same to him."

The 13-year-old girl was at her embroidery. One brother had constructed a rocking-chair, carving a little scroll on the top, and she was at the upholstery. It was a unique pattern. She was stitching on the back.

"I brought it from Shir-ma-nie"—to try to spell the word as the mother pronounced it. And the girl explains it was from a "very old water-color miniature her great-great-grandmother did."

Now, this family had not been much to school, but when the smallest boy with a big atlas spread before him asked a question, every one at the table was ready with the answer. And the conversation developed that they were well read in history, and knew of the poets: the architect often chiming in, "as Shakespeare has it," or "as Goethe puts it."

A thrifty, intelligent, industrious, educated and educating family, at home with themselves, and apparently with the world. All of them at work during the day. Pursuing their various avocations by night, resting so from the day's toil. Illustrating what their Goethe wrote :

Rest is not quitting
The busy career ;
Rest is the fitting
Of self to one's sphere.

One Solution of the Labor Problem.*

The last issue of Employer and Employed, published by the Association for the Promotion of Profit-Sharing, contains the story of the Leclair experiment, by Dr. Edward Everett Hale. Dr. Hale visited Leclair last February. He describes the town itself as very attractive. The site, covering 125 acres not far from St. Louis, was purchased in 1890 by the company manufacturing plumbers' supplies, of which Mr. N. O. Nelson is President. The houses, "not uniform in construction, but all pretty and artistic in design," are sold by the corporation outright to the workmen, not simply rented to them. The business was started in 1877 by Mr. Nelson in St. Louis. In 1886 he proposed the profit sharing innovation. By the original plan 6 per cent. of the profits was first set aside as interest on the capital invested, then 10 per cent. for a reserve fund, and 10 per cent. more for a provident fund. "The remainder was divided by an equal percentage between capital and labor." During the seven years of the experiment these wages dividends have averaged 8 per cent. They were originally payable in cash, "to make it clear that they meant money," although the employees had the option of taking the dividends in stock, to encourage co-operation. Now these dividends are payable only in stock. But when an employee leaves the company it buys his stock at par. The separate provident fund has been dropped. The employees maintain a co-operative store. All purchases must be paid for in cash. "The business of this store has steadily grown. It has paid 6 per cent. interest on the capital, and has returned an average of 15 per cent. on the purchases. It is conducted on the Rochdale plan of selling at the usual retail prices and returning the profit in proportion to the purchases." The experiment seems to stand well the test of the hard times. A proposition to take in sail, made by the management to the men last July, was accepted unanimously and "with cheers." The present arrangement is this: "Until the hard times are over, three-fourths of the present rate of wages and salaries will be paid in cash, and the other one-fourth will be paid at the end of this year if there is anything left after allowing 6 per cent. interest on capital for that part of the year during which full wages have been paid, and 4½ per cent. interest on that part of the year in which three-fourths wages have been paid. If not made good out of this year's profit, it will be made good out of any future year in which there is a profit above simple interest on capital."

This summary is taken from The Outlook.

A Good Example.

The Fourth Congregational Church of Hartford, Conn., is having a series of meetings in the interest of "working men," and with the hope of bringing them and the church nearer together. Last Sunday (Jan. 7) Rev. Perry Marshall, a former pastor of Unity Church of that city, spoke to an enthusiastic audience of several hundred people on "The Problem of the Age." The people did not fear to applaud at the beginning and end of the discourse, and at any place where they wished especially to show their approval. After the speaking, questions were asked and answered. Several persons at the close went forward to declare for the first time their faith in the speaker's teaching,—that in the "evolution of government" is great hope of preventing poverty; that monopolies by which millions are poured into the laps of the few must become more all-embracing until they shall finally pass over to the government, "for the people." The daily papers gave abstracts of the discourse, which thus obtained a wide hearing. The first Sunday in February, Rev. Graham Taylor, a former pastor of the Fourth Church, and now a professor in a Chicago college, is to be the speaker.

Certainly this move is in the right direction. Immediately after the death of Theodore Parker, Wendell Phillips, speaking in Music Hall to Parker's people, said: "The pulpit should use the day [Sunday] and opportunity for the training of the community in the whole encyclopædia of morals—social questions, sanitary matters, slavery, temperance, labor, the condition of women, the nature of government, responsibility to law, the right of a majority, and how far a minority may yield, marriage, health,—the entire list. For all these are moral questions and they are living questions, not metaphysics, not dogmas. . . . The pulpit, as seen in the north of Europe and in this country, is not built up of mahogany and paint. It is the life of earnest men, the example of the community; a forum to unfold, broaden, and help mankind. That is the pulpit. If this were recognized and acted upon, people would not desert the church, as they tend to do; or go, if at all, from a mere sense of duty; but would be drawn to the pulpit, as they are to the press and the theater, by a felt want." True, it is a much easier matter to "preach about the sins of the ancient Egyptians," and to lead a society for mutual admiration. M.

Correspondence

Ramabai.

DEAR UNITY: I sent to our friends at Sioux City a contradiction, as definite as I could make it, of a story which had been circulated there regarding the Pundita Ramabai. This story asserted that she was engaged in converting Hindu women to the Church of England, and that was the object of her school. As it happened, we knew the particular incident on which this story was founded. It is that of a girl who, after a good many turns of fortune, brought up in the English Government School, with which the Pundita has nothing to do. A good deal to the scandal of her friends, she was baptized in one of the English chapels there. But with this transaction Ramabai had no more connection than the teacher of a high school in Chicago has with the confirmation of any girl who has been in her school.

While such charges as this are occasionally made in American churches, another set of charges against Ramabai complain of her that there is no religion at all in her school, and that it is a school of atheism and what is called infidelity. She is thus between two fires. Neither of these fires seems to have hurt her so far, and I do not think that you and I suppose that they will hurt her. But I will thank UNITY to say to any of our friends who have sustained Ramabai heretofore that the spirit and wisdom and breadth of her administration since the school was opened have been such as to give new confidence to all her friends who have the pleasure of seeing her correspondence and reading the reports of the school. The school is attacked all the time, now by the missionaries, now by bigoted Brahmans, now by Tom, now by Dick, and now by Harry. All the same, it accommodates all the pupils whom it has room for, and it seems to satisfy those who have intrusted young people to its charge. It is just what it set out to be,—a school for child-widows. It appears to have the same religious influence that a good high school in one of our American cities has, and the teachers exercise just as much and just as little religious influence as do the teachers in such a school.

If anybody needs farther information and will address me or the general secretary of the Ramabai Association, we shall be glad to answer them. Mrs. Andrews, the chief of the Executive Committee, is at this moment in Poona, and as soon as her letters arrive, we shall have the view of an intelligent American lady on the position. Truly yours,

EDWARD E. HALE.

P. S. We publish almost every month, in Lend-a-Hand, the latest reports from the school.

Church-Door Pulpit

A Personal Tribute to John C. Learned.*

BY W. L. SHELDON.

It was one of the mild, warm days which came early last spring when we were together lying on the ground out under the open sky at Tower Grove Park. We were talking of death and eternity. Men will do that sometimes; although it was strange that we should have done so in the early spring. He said to me that he was perfectly ready to die. He did not think that it would give him the faintest uneasiness or concern if he knew he were to die on the ensuing day. He believed that his work was done. Few men can say at heart what he said. No matter what they look forward to or anticipate in that Beyond, they shrink back and cling to earth and say: "I do not want to go."

I think of that talk we had together because it was characteristic of the man. He was so calm, so steady, so fearless and so true. We who knew him did not want to have him go. We did not believe that his work was done. As though the work of a personality ever was done! He did not know, himself, the kind of an influence he was exerting. He had no clear appreciation why men clung to him and wanted so greatly that he should stay. No man ever has any measure of his own influence. Those who exert it the most are the least conscious of it. They seldom think about it at all, especially if it be the influence, not simply of an idea or of a teaching, but of a personality. But that was the influence of Mr. Learned.

It was two or three years ago, I believe, that I once remarked to a friend that when Mr. Learned came to die I would like to preach his funeral sermon. It was a strange thought on my part. It may have sounded cold and unfeeling; but it was with a sense of solemn awe that I made the remark. It came in those moods which men have when they feel themselves, as it were, in contact with something great, yes, with something almost divine. It was the kind of feeling which I used to have in walking up and down the aisles of the cathedrals in Europe, and I would say to myself, "If only now I could sit down and write out what is on my heart." It was the kind of awe I felt when standing on the Acropolis at Athens, or on the summit of the Mount of Olives and looking down on Jerusalem. It was a solemn, religious emotion. Men only are great, and not things. Mind and soul are what we care for in ourselves and in the universe. They alone call forth awe and the sense of sublimity. It is not nature as such that we are thinking of when we are looking at it, but rather the something which is akin to ourselves in nature. The stars are grand to us because the stars have a kinship with ourselves. We and they somehow are connected together. They all tell of life, but most of all they tell of mind and soul. And when one man calls forth that feeling in you it may be right to speak and endeavor to say what is on your heart. I revered this man as I revere no other living man on earth. He was my best example of living mind and soul. And so it was that he made me think of those of Athens and Jerusalem.

It is so grand, so helpful, so inspiring when you meet one man who does call forth your sense of awe and reverence. If that has been your good fortune, its influence will stay with you to the end of your days. You will care more for life; you will see more in life that is worth living. You will think less of death and have less fear of death. You will believe more in the human race. You will have more faith in nature and the universe. You will see even deeper into what is hidden behind or underneath or within that name of "God." I do not know how many others had this same feeling about that one man. We choose our ideals by instinct. It is the same instinct which leads us to choose our heroes, to recognize our ideals in living men. And so it was that I made my choice, and the instinct within me chose him as my ideal of incarnate, divine, pure manhood. And yet when now I sit down to think or say what has been on my heart in regard to him, to put into words what I have felt, to express those emotions which were, indeed, so eager to find expression, it would seem as though the thoughts would not come. My mind stands still. The words falter and I feel as though I had nothing to say. All that he was and did fuses together into a personality. I see his figure in my mind; the personality seems to go before me; the soul of the man is present to my consciousness, but I cannot describe it. It seems just a personality.

We have stood side by side, working together. We have been hand in hand at the same graves. We have talked together as few men ever talked together, expressing our hopes and our fears, our aspirations and our despondency. I talked to him as to no other living man. He was to me, as I presume he was to others, a kind of confessional. We felt that what we said to him would not be known to others. It was like talking to ourselves, and yet somehow while saying it to him we seemed to gather strength, merely by his listening to us, though he might give no answer. There was a peculiar strength in his look, because it all lay back in that personality. I have never been tempted to talk to others as I talked to him. We had brooded together over mankind and the universe,—in expressing to one another that sorrow of all sorrows, the depression over the condition of our human brotherhood, and on the slow, so slow, advance that the race of men seem to be making. We had talked of our care to uplift the race of men: to make them better, to lead them to care for the things that we cared for, to stir them to a love for the inner higher life, to make them want to be religious and to believe in an ideal form of religion.

Now that he is gone there is a sense of solitude for me which I have never felt before. The one man with whom I had communed as with my own soul is gone and is taking his rest. It was not that we talked together a great deal or saw each other often. It was simply that he was there and I always knew he was there, though I might not see him for weeks or months at a time—we rested on the bare fact of his presence. It sustained me almost as much even if he was not by. That did not always seem to matter. But so long as he was here we felt somehow that he was there to lean upon. I have never known an instance of his kind in all my personal experience, nor have I ever seen any example that was like it. He set all my rules, as it were, at defiance. It was impossible to judge of him and his work in the same way that we judge of the work of other men. He did it in a different way because he was a different kind of person. We think of him as the minister and leader of a church, but his congregation from Sunday to Sunday for many years would seem to have scarcely averaged above a hundred or a hundred and fifty people. And yet on the other hand I believe he has been of greater actual influence on our city than any other minister or clergyman who has ever been in St. Louis. He was not the minister only for that hundred people who listened to him on Sunday morning. They seemed to be only one minor portion of his parish. I have met with people who never went to his church, who scarcely ever saw him personally, but they would seem to say in their language about him. "He is our minister." When the solemn day came, they would call him in to say the last words over their dead. He stood for them. He represented them. He was their church. I believe that we might say that at least a thousand families in our city looked to him in that way. What other man has ever held that kind of a position in St. Louis? It is something so peculiar as almost to be baffling and unexplainable. He did not know of this himself. We knew it because we could see it all the time. His presence seems to be a kind of a pillar in the city on whom hundreds, if not thousands, of people leaned, who scarcely ever came in contact with that presence. But they drew strength from the bare fact that he was there. That was enough for them. They believed in him, they looked up to him. He was their man. Their cause was safe while he was at hand. They might go on about their business, doing their daily work, but they had the assurance that the something which they believed in and cared for, or felt they ought to believe in or care for, was represented by one man. They had a kind of sense of safety in it.

It has been said by those that loved him that it was within the walls of that little church that he exerted his influence. I hope they will pardon me in taking the contrary view; in assuming that what he did there was only a small portion, scarcely one-quarter of his work in St. Louis. That hundred people were not his church. Our city was his church, more than it has been the church of any other man I have known in St. Louis. He belonged to the city. He cared for its growth. He knew about it. He was interested in its institutions. I believe we owe the fact to him more than to any other man that within a few weeks we are to have a public library in St. Louis. We owe it to him more than any other man in our midst that so many thousands of persons in our city have come to believe that a man can be a true, noble man, whether he be orthodox or unorthodox, believer or unbeliever, so long as his aims have been true. He has been the one individual in St. Louis who has asserted that man could, and should, and must think for himself in order to be truly religious. It has been the weakness of the whole liberal movement in our country as well as in other countries that it had so few men to whom it could point with pride. It has had leaders, great thinkers, scholars, powerful characters, wonderful speakers, good reasoners. But the one thing it seemed to be lacking was men. Yet here was an instance to the contrary. This person did belong in the higher sense to the liberal movement. He stood ready to offer the hand of fellowship to the struggling soul in China or Japan or India or Africa though that soul had never heard of the Bible. He could say in his heart, "I am his brother."

He might have been atheist, as he was not; he might have been believer in Buddhism, as he was not; he might have belonged to the Hebrew faith, as he did not; he might have been an agnostic, as he was not; he might have been orthodox Christian, as he was not,—but all persons would have said just the same, "There is a man." And while he held out the hand of fellowship to Buddhist, Hebrew, Atheist, or Agnostic, those who could not feel the same spirit of sympathy still said of him, "There is a man." He made "Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion" respected in St. Louis. Alas that we appreciate so little what it meant to accomplish that one result.

The older I grow the less hope I have for the bare influence of ideas.

It may seem discouraging, but I cannot escape from the impression. There was a time when as a young man I believed with my whole soul in the dominant power of a thought. I had faith in truth's own power to conquer. That hope within me has been dying away. But another conviction has been taking its place which may or may not be encouraging to others. Human history does not seem to be changed mainly through ideas or principles. When on the other hand these ideas are connected with a great and true personality, then they triumph. Yet what triumphs is not the idea, but the personality. I doubt sometimes whether there ever will be any new thoughts given to the world. It has occurred to me that all the ideas which men will ever possess have already been expressed. They are incarnate in past literature. But with personality it is different. There we can anticipate an endlessly growing power. When that element is associated with a truth, it becomes an influence. This is why I have such a reverence for Mr. Learned.

He had grand thoughts, deep feelings, and yet those feelings and thoughts might have been uttered by some other man and not have had any kind of influence at all on this or any other community. We can listen to the utterance of a truth. We can read it in a book and it can pass through our minds without so much as leaving any consciousness of it or any recollection of it. Why? Because we are not interested in the man who tells it. But when that thought comes from a man who has deep personality it takes hold of our consciousness, roots itself there, and sometimes changes the whole course of our lives. That is what we call religious influence. It affects our motives and will-power, because along with the idea is imparted something of the other man's will-power and motive. It comes through his personality. This man had a way of leaving an impression upon you by the word he exchanged with you at the street corner. You went home feeling differently from what you did before. Those men are the creators in human history. Whatever comes from them is original with them. It is born out of their souls. There is little or no truth which ever comes to men in just one form. We all receive it differently. None of us ever think exactly alike. If two men utter what is considered the same thought to us, it will not come precisely as the same thought. It will have about it inevitably a tinge of the personality of the man who expresses it. It is not in the words he uses, but the impression we already have of him, which reacts on what he is saying and fixes the thought in our consciousness. The one hope for the future to me is in such personalities. Where they get their ideas from I do not care. Who inspired them or what stirred them is of small consequence.

But one man may be of more influence than ten thousand others who may be his equal intellectually, solely by that difference of character and personality.

You will perceive now what I mean in reference to the singular influence of this man who is gone from us. It explains why it was that his parish meant not one church but all St. Louis, why it was that he could have been speaking only to a hundred people every Sunday and still have been the leader of many thousands. The more I think of him, the more I lose faith in what is called "numbers." There are men who are writing books of which thousands of copies may be sold, and yet they will not in the end exert the influence which has come from this one man who never wrote a book and yet seemed so great and so strong. It was hard at first to appreciate the feeling which I met with in regard to him in other cities. We are accustomed to see the clergy gauged by the size of their churches, by their writings, the books they have published, the calls they have received elsewhere. This man wrote no books, did not have a large church, may have received no calls elsewhere,—and yet when I mentioned his name in other cities there was something peculiar, a kind of look of awe which came on the faces of the persons at the mention of his name. One clergyman in another large city said to me with a kind of reverence,—a man who has written books and is far more widely known,—"We all take off our caps to Learned." That is what I call grandeur. I wonder sometimes whether there is grandeur in anything else. Who cares for numbers and position and what men call "power" in contrast with an influence of this kind? It makes a man want to begin over again and try his life in a different way. It gives me a different measure of true success. What other kind of success after all is worth having? It is true now and then such an influence may also go with reputation and actual earthly power. But this is rare. Yet there is one parallel which has come to me again and again in the last few weeks; possibly it has come to others. Mr. Learned has seemed to me to have been to St. Louis what Phillips Brooks was to the United States,—not, however, as preacher, but as a man.

These two men each belonged to a church or a sect, and yet what has been said of the more widely known man is as true of the other. They seemed to belong still more to a kind of universal church. All classes of persons claimed them as theirs. I hope Mr. Learned's church will forgive me in saying that I do not think of him particularly as belonging to them. He was to me something broader than any sect. I cannot connect his personality with any denomination. He was more than anything else a disciple of Jesus, but to a degree he was a disciple of Buddha and

Sometimes I have wished that he could have known of the influence he was exerting; that he could have appreciated what he stood for and how men leaned upon him who never went to hear him. He said once, I believe, in former years, that he would like, just for once, to see that little church crowded full on Sunday morning at one of the regular services. I do not know that he ever had the experience. It was half my wish that he could have been there the last time when the church was crowded full and the people took leave of his earthly form. Yet, as we know, outside of that solemn group of people, was an invisible church of a multitude who could not have entered those doors because there would have been so many of them,—children and grown people, men and women of all races and all churches, whom he had been kind to and who looked up to him as a great and good man.

We speak of his personality; it is hard to define what we mean by that word, because we are conscious of it more by feeling than by thought. Men knew of it by the way it helped them. That was all. He had a peculiar method, although it was not a method but an instinct with him. He always knew what you were thinking, what was happening in your life, but you very rarely knew what he was thinking or what was happening in his life. He asked you questions about yourself, but he never encouraged you to ask questions about himself. He did not seem to be interested in that subject. He let you talk, tell your story, what you were thinking about it, how it was going with you, but you never knew how it was going with him inside of his soul. He never talked about that. I have wondered whether he even thought about it. He seemed to keep perfectly still as to what was going on in his own consciousness. Sometimes when he would have been questioning me and letting me unburden myself I have turned upon him playfully and asked him something. But I would get no reply. He would come back with another question about myself. That was my only satisfaction. Only great and deep men can do that kind of thing. Only grand characters are capable of suppressing themselves, or rather of being unconscious of themselves in that way. As I have said, it did not seem to be a method with him. It was his nature. What a multitude of persons in our city have unburdened their hearts to him. How few ever thought of letting him unburden his heart to them. They never thought about it because he was so full of thinking of them that he forgot to think of himself.

I do not say, of course, that he was an absolutely perfect and complete man. By no manner of means. That would be effusive eulogy. He had his weak side and strongside, though even upon that point men would differ. It always seemed to me, for example, that his nature or mind was not quite fully open to the great struggle and upheaval going on now in the understratum of society. He did not seem to comprehend the meaning of the great labor movement, at least in the way it impressed me. I used to wish he would see it and see the struggle himself in a different light. And yet now I am almost glad that he did not do so. It would have made him too perfect. I should have been afraid to go near him. There would have been something superhuman about him if he had had that other quality a so. The very lack, as it seemed to me after a fashion, drew me nearer to him. It would have been almost painful if he had been absolutely complete. But he had grown up in a different way, under a different line of influence. He came of an early class of men who made themselves, and they had such sublime faith in human nature that they believed all men could do the same if they only would. That faith in human nature led him perhaps to have less appreciation of the weaknesses of the under class. It was a noble thing and gave his character dignity and power. It made him in the supreme sense of the word an individualist. But his individualism came not from lack of sympathy, but from what I looked upon as perhaps a mistaken faith in the capacities of human nature.

But, on the other hand, I never knew of a man who was so capable of closing his eyes to the weaknesses of his immediate fellows in order to help them. He dealt with us personally just as though we were his equals and were as strong as he was. He never let us see that he did recognize our weaknesses. In rare moments I have discovered it in a sudden twinkle of the eye which he could not quite control. It is a power most rare and unusual,—the quality which more than anything else, perhaps, gave him his influence over the men with whom he was thrown most in contact. They somehow had the feeling that he always recognized what was in them. But it does take grandeur of character to be able to deal with human nature as though it had no weaknesses, when we know those weaknesses are there. He was one of the few men who had that power. He never let us know what he was thinking of us. He only gave us the impression that he had faith in us. It was that support which helped to make us stronger. We did not think of this when he was alive; but I believe it comes home to us now, to everyone of us who knew him.

I do not say that he was only a great personality, although that would have been enough in itself to have endowed him with grandeur. When I first knew him he impressed me as one of those highly cultivated men of rare education who have had unusual opportunities of study and travel, such as we would expect perhaps from the graduates of Oxford, in England. There seemed to be culture about his every movement and word and influence. He was an intellectual man. He did love thought and thinking. I remember the shock it gave me when he told me that he had not even been to college. It made me wish that I, too, had never been to college if I could be that kind of a man and exert that kind of an influence. There is something subtle and deep in that culture. It is of a kind which is becoming rarer and rarer. There will be little or none of it in the next century. It would be useless to try to get it in that way. You must be that kind of a man in the first place in order to be able to acquire culture in that fashion. Most men who seek it in a self-made form blunder at it, and you recognize the self-made element everywhere. He seemed to blend the qualities of a finished training and education along with the qualities of the self-made man. In this regard also I know of no other example of that kind; a man who could seem to have come from Oxford and never have had any kind of collegiate education at all! He is said to have regretted the fact. I think most of us who knew him would have regretted it still more if he had had it. We were contented with him in that respect as he was, and asked for no finer or higher form of culture. In this respect he seemed to be every year of his life a growing man.

Mr. Learned to me more than any other man resembled our own great Ralph Waldo Emerson. Again and again the two men have come to my mind at the same time. I never saw Emerson, though I have a very vivid impression of him. They seem to me to be very much alike. There was the same calm, sweet, gentle, lofty, peculiar simplicity about them; there was the same exquisite modesty and reserve in reference to themselves; there was the same intense sympathy with new thought and broader views of the world; there was the same disposition to let their ideas speak for themselves and refuse to make any effort to push their own personalities forward: there was the same sober fearlessness; the same aspiration for freedom of thinking; they were both intense individualists; they were each devoutly religious, yet each shrank from pronouncing the name of God too often lest they should weaken or mar its grandeur. They were each reverent without form. They would have each walked straight into the fiery furnace if loyalty to their convictions had required it of them,—and yet on the surface they were each apparently unaggressive.

But there was one great difference. Emerson, after all that can be said for and about him, seems to have been rather a cold man. Mr. Learned could be intellectual, and yet at the same time could be tender, oh, so tender! It was such a rare combination. Sometimes I have wondered what he would have been or done if he had had the thing we call "ambition," or if he had been able and disposed to push forward and be the leader. But all we can say is that without having pushed forward or had the thing we call "ambition" he ~~was~~ a leader. He and Emerson are the two men I fall back upon and lean upon for strength when I want hope and encouragement. They give me the assurance that we have had at least two persons who could be ideal men and yet think for themselves. There has been plenty of thinking for one's self, but, alas, so little of ideal manhood. This kind of a leadership can live and stay just the same after the presence of the man is gone from the earth. It does not require a lasting stay in this world. We only need to have had it so long that it shall have made one fixed expression. After that, it is indelible. Mr. Learned will be for me as much of a living force twenty years from now as he is to-day. An example is an example and absolutely never dies. A thought is far more liable to perish from the earth than the influence of one true personality.

It makes me look with less dread upon death even for those who are near and dear to us. Life is more deep, more grand, because it is short and comes to an end on earth. If it were not for death I do not think most of us would care to live. We should tire of existence itself. But the shortness of it all makes our thought of it intense and the fact of it precious. We want to crowd in it all that we truly can, to make of those sixty years as much as if we had six thousand. And I venture to say that if we had six thousand we should do less than if we had sixty. There is no true gauge or measurement as to what would be the right length of life, but the close of its days gives it a grand religious solemnity. It makes us pause and think, though it need not fill us with dread or dismay. As each man goes on in years he comes to realize how close together are life and death; how much they seem to belong together; how little of awfulness or terror there is about death. The time will come in the future when we shall take away those trappings of woe. We shall no longer read those mournful lines at the graves of men about the shortness and worthlessness of life. The black of mourning will be replaced by the pristine whiteness of simplicity and purity. We shall come to look upon death just as though we were lying down to sleep at the night, with the same calmness and composure, though we knew that we were not to waken upon earth again in the morning. We shrink from losing existence here, of having our presence or influence pass away, but we make the mistake in realizing that the determining fact is not length of life but the amount of personality we have developed and the influence we have been able to exert. When a personality becomes vivid, intense and strong it will leave such an indelible impression behind it that it will seem incapable of death, and men will feel as though it were left here although without bodily presence.

The passion of his nature was to get at God through rational conceptions. He was "God-intoxicated," like Spinoza and Emerson, but like them he was intensely, wholly rationalist, believing that all the deepest and best religious facts and truths could be discovered directly by the human mind. If ever his eye gleamed it was in telling of some one who was as it were beginning over again in shaking off anything like absolute authority over belief. It was in his method that he was so radical, not in his actual beliefs. There was something awe-inspiring in his fearlessness. I think if he had wanted to say anything in his pulpit on Sunday he would have said it, though he knew every person would rise and leave the church. "Whatever was rational was right" was the basis of his whole intellectual position. This trust in mind led him to think little of form and ceremony. On that side he was cold. The bare truth had warmth enough for him.

I do not say that he accomplished the main purpose of his life. No, that could not be. It would have been impossible. Men with his aims never accomplish their purposes, because the purposes have aimed so deep and so high. He was conscious of the fact that he could not achieve what he wanted to accomplish. It left a touch of sadness on his nature just as it leaves a touch of sadness on all such natures with such aims. They can never be quite buoyant and gay like the rest of the world, because they are all the time so conscious how far away from the ideal is this human world. He wanted to make men care for the things he cared for, to be interested in those supreme objects we call "religious." That was his one great ambition. He cared more for that than to simply set men's minds free from superstition or to give more enlightenment. He wanted to stir mankind and urge them on toward religious culture. The sorrow of all deep natures was his sorrow. But though it affected his spirit it never bent his will. He worked loyally, steadily, courageously, to the end. If he could not accomplish in one lifetime what we know can only be realized in ten thousand years, he would still do what little he could toward realizing that last great day. The imperfect success of the religious teacher is more sublime than the most complete success of the worldling. These spiritual natures are few and come seldom. But they make us think what we are here for, whenever we think of them. We often wonder why such men do not change other people more. But we forget how much we and others have been changed by them already without knowing it. If he had made everybody like himself then they would all have gone forward as missionaries in the same field of labor. When that kind of a man has lived his real mission work often mainly begins after he has passed away. Then comes the unconscious influence of the past. It builds and rebuilds. And so it will be with Mr. Learned. Here was a man who did have a great, great personality. He exerted a deep, deep influence. When we think of him we do want to live. It does not make us want to have a longer life, but it makes us want to be something more, to be somebody. We, too, would like to have that kind of personality, and to leave such an indelible impression. We shall care less and less as we think of it about the outward expression. We shall have a different gauge of success. We shall think less of numbers and of position, but we shall have more faith in life and think life more worth living.

There is something intensely sad in the fact that we fail to appreciate men and grasp their influence until after they are gone. We think to ourselves, "Oh, if they only could come back again, so that we could tell them at least how we now value them." But the experience is old as history. We see men and lives in true perspective only when their bodily presence is gone from earth and the memory is left with us. Then it all comes back complete,—not this thing, nor that thing, or the other thing, but everything. The little thing does not look great and the great little, as was the case when they were alive. We seem to see them now as they are. There is something sad about this, but it has its consolation.

I believe it was Plato who first conceived that sublime trinity, "The True, the Beautiful, and the Good." Once or twice or three times in our lives we meet a man who seems to illustrate that conception of Plato; to be the most complete example of its kind. Now and then we have the feeling at first, and later on we are disappointed and it dies away. But it is strengthening and inspiring if we can meet with such a man and he continues to hold that position for us. I did have this experience in the case of Mr. Learned. He more than any other was my idea of the true, the beautiful and the good. I felt that at the beginning. I feel it more to-day than on the first day we met. And so it is to me as though I had him with me still, even to the fact of his personality.

"Ashes to ashes and dust to dust" is what we say over the dead,—but the spirit unto us, for whom he lived and worked and died. Unto us the spirit, though unto earth the ashes.

Though dead, not dead.
Though gone, not fled.
In the great gospel and true creed
He is yet risen indeed.
He is yet risen.

Ashes to ashes and dust unto dust,
of the earth,—but the spirit unto us, the personality still left in our hearts, the force of character with us yet, and with the race of man for whom it lived, for whom it worked and on whom it has left an indelible though unrecorded impression, down to the end of all human history.

The Study Table

A New Poet.*

Not a few of us, perhaps, have now and then seen the name of Charlotte Perkins Stetson in a newspaper or magazine at the end of some bright verses or clear prose comment on men and things, but we believe that the little volume which lies before us is the first clear intimation that under the bright skies of California and amid the changing scenes, the glory and the squalor of life on the Pacific coast, there is ripening a strong, bright, earnest soul with the poet-fervor in her heart, and what is rarer, the power of poetic expression. Although there is extremely little distinct local color in the poems before us, there is a flavor of the time and place in which they were written which leads us to think that Mrs.
Stetson may yet be recognized as our American poet,—but if this be so, it is because the cosmopolitan spirit is the first fruit of our highest national character. For Mrs. Stetson's spirit is eminently cosmic.

We may not speak at as great length as we would of the charm and freshness, the humor and the pathos, the wit and wisdom, that are to be found in this little volume. And always the command of language is so full and the rhythm so free that we find it hard to realize that these songs of life were made, they seem to have sung themselves. Alike to the lover of music and to the lover of mankind, we commend this collection of poems in perfect confidence that they will heartily thank us for drawing their attention to these verses.

Those who have read Ralph Iron's writings will recognize a certain sympathy of thought between our author and Olive Schreiner; but it seems to us that Mrs. Stetson has a healthier, a sounder philosophy of life. Although she has evidently felt deeply the sorrows of life, and is strong in her denunciation of the wrong that is, and cutting in her satire upon the foibles we hug so fondly to our souls, yet she is blessed with a larger vision than is common, a deeper insight into the unity of all that is; and this as-suredness of the oneness of all being enables her to take up into her own life the strength and light and beauty of the universe, so that in the darkest hour she is not driven to despair, but only to work the harder for a fuller realization of life than man has yet attained.

We should be glad to exhibit in detail her wit and sarcasm, her discriminating grasp of what we call the woman question,—but we must content ourselves with one poem from each of the three divisions into which her volume, "In this Our World," is divided, viz.: The World, Woman, Our Human Kind.

Our first selection, illustrative of the author's wit and sarcasm, rather than of poetic power, is from the last division, and is entitled:—

SIMILAR CASES.

There was once a little animal,
No bigger than a fox,
And on five toes he scampered
Over tertiary rocks.

They called him Eohippus,
And they called him very small,
And they thought him of no value—
When they thought of him at all.
For the lumpy Dinosaur
And Coryphodont so slow
Were the heavy aristocracy
In days of long ago.

Said the little Eohippus,
"I am going to be a horse!
And on my middle finger-nails
To run my earthly course!
I'm going to have a flowing tail!
I'm going to have a mane!
I'm going to stand fourteen hands high
On the psychozotic plain!"

The Coryphodont was horrified,
The Dinosaur was shocked;
And they chased young Eohippus,
But he skipped away and mocked.

Then they laughed enormous laughter,
And they groaned enormous groans,
And they bade young Eohippus
Go and view his father's bones.
Said they: "You always were as small
And mean as now we see,
And therefore it is evident That you're always going to be!"

"What! Be a great, tall, handsome beast With hoofs to gallop on!
Why, you'd have to change your nature!"
Said the Toxolophodon.

They considered him disposed of,
And retired with gait serene—
That was the way they argued
In "the early Eocene."

There was once an Anthropoidal Ape.
Far smarter than the rest,
And every thing that they could do
He always did the best;
So they naturally disliked him,
And they gave him shoulders cool,
And when they had to mention him,
They said he was a fool.

Cried this pretentious Ape one day:
"I'm going to be a man!
And stand upright and hunt and fight
And conquer all I can!
I'm going to cut down forest trees
To make my houses higher!
I'm going to kill the mastodon!
I'm going to make a fire!"

Loud screamed the Anthropoidal Apes
With laughter wild and gay;
Then tried to catch that boastful one,
But he always got away.
So they yelled at him in chorus,
Which he minded not a whit;
And they pelted him with cocoanuts,
Which didn't seem to hit.

And then they gave him reasons,
Which they thought of much avail,

To prove how his preposterous
Attempt was sure to fail.
Said the sages: "In the first place,
The thing cannot be done!
And second, if it could be,
It would not be any fun!

"And third, and most conclusive,
And admitting no reply,
You would have to change your nature!
We should like to see you try!"
They chuckled then triumphantly,
These lean and hairy shapes,
For these things passed as arguments,
With the Anthropoidal Apes.

There was once a Neolithic man,
An enterprising wight,
Who made his chopping instruments
Unusually bright.
Unusually clever he,
Unusually brave,
And he drew delightful mammoths
On the borders of his cave.
To his Neo-ithic neighbors,
Who were startled and surprised,
Said he: "My friends, in course of time,
We shall be civilized!"

"We are going to live in cottles!
We are going to fight in wars!
We are going to eat three times a day,
Without the natural cause!
We are going to turn life upside down
About a thing called gold!
We are going to want the earth, and take
As much as we can hold!
We are going to wear great piles of stuff
Outside our proper skins;
We are going to have Diseases!
And Accomplishments!! And Sins!!!"

They all rose up in fury
Against this boastful friend;
For prehistoric patience
Cometh quickly to an end.
Said one: "This is chimerical!
Utopian! Absurd!"
Said another: "What a stupid life!
Too dull, upon my word!"
Cried all: "Before such things can come,
You idiotic child,
You must alter Human Nature!"
And they all sat back and smiled.

Thought they: "An answer to that last
It will be hard to find!"
It was a clinching argument
To the Neolithic Mind!

Our second selection is the third poem in the book:

A COMMON INFERENCE.

A night: mysterious, tender, quiet, deep;
Heavy with flowers; full of life asleep;
Thrilling with insect voices; thick with stars;
No clouds between the dewdrops and red Mars;
The small earth whirling softly on her way;
The moonbeams and the waterfalls at play;
A million million worlds that move in peace;
A million mighty laws that never cease:—
And one small ant heap, hidden by small weeds,
Rich with eggs, slaves, and store of millet seeds.
They sleep beneath the sod
And trust in God.

A day: all glorious, royal, blazing, bright;
Radiant with flowers, full of life and light;
Great fields of corn and sunshine; courteous trees,
Snow-sainted mountains; earth-embracing seas;
Wide golden deserts; slender silver streams;
Clear rainbows where the tossing fountain
gleams;
And everywhere in happiness and peace
A million forms of life that never cease:—
And one small ant heap, crushed by passing tread,
Hath scarce enough alive to mourn the dead!
They shriek beneath the sod,
"There is no God!"

*IN THIS OUR WORLD. Poems by Charlotte Perkins Stetson. Oakland, Cal.: McCombs & Vaughn. Paper, 16mo, pp. 120. 25 cents.

Our last selection is from the part entitled Woman :

MOTHER TO CHILD.

How best can I serve thee, my child, my child!
Flesh of my flesh and dear heart of my heart!
Once thou wast within me—I held thee, I fed thee—

By the force of my loving and longing I led thee—
Now we are apart!

I may blind thee with kisses and crush with embracing,
Thy warm mouth in my neck and our arms interlacing,
But here in my body my soul lives alone
And thou answerest me from a house of thine own—

That house which I builded!

Which we builded together, thy father and I!
In which thou must live, O my darling, and die!

Not one stone can I alter, no atom relay—
Not to save or defend thee or help thee to stay—

That gift is completed!

How best can I serve thee! O child, if they knew

How my heart aches with loving! How deep and how true.

How brave and enduring, how patient, how strong,

How longing for good and how fearful of wrong

Is the love of thy mother!

Could I crown thee with riches! Surround, overflow thee

With fame and with power till the whole world should know thee,

With wisdom and genius to hold the world still,

To bring laughter and tears, joy and pain, at thy will,—

Still—thou mightest not be happy!

Such have lived—and in sorrow! The greater the mind

The wider and deeper the grief it can find.
The richer, the gladder, the more thou canst feel

The keen stings that a lifetime is sure to reveal!

O my child! must thou suffer?

Is there no way my life can save thine from pain?

Is the love of a mother no possible gain?
No labor of Hercules—search for the Grail—
No way for this wonderful love to avail?

God in Heaven—O teach me!

My prayer has been answered. The pain thou must bear

Is the pain of the world's life which thy life must share.

Thou art one with the world—though I love thee the best;

And to save thee! from pain I must save all the rest—

Well—with God's help I'll do it.

Thou art one with the rest. I must love thee in them!

Thou wilt sin with the rest—and thy mother must stem

The world's sin. Thou wilt weep—and thy mother must dry

The tears of the world lest her darling should cry.

I will do it—God helping!

And I stand not alone. I will gather a band
Of all loving mothers from land unto land—
Our children are part of the world! Do ye hear?

They are one with the world—we must hold them all dear!

Love all for the child's sake!

For the sake of my child I must hasten to save
All the children on earth from the jail and the grave.

For so and so only I lighten the share
Of the pain of the world that my darling must bear—

Even so, and so only!

The book deserves a better setting than the ridiculously cheap (25 cents) paper binding in which it is put upon the market. The proof-reading is not what it should be. Its form indicates, we think, that the author has published the book herself, and that she could not afford to give it a handsomer form. If this be true, it is doubtless because she hoped to get for herself the profit that so often goes to the publisher; and we hope that the lovers of verse who delight in and would encourage the words and thought, of a high-hearted, gifted fellow-being will do their part toward enabling her to put her work before the world in a more worthy form. Athelwold.

Athelwold. By Amelie Rives. New York: Harper & Brothers. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 8vo, pp. 117. $1.00.

This volume almost makes us wish that Mrs. Chanler would devote herself to dramatic poetry to the exclusion of other forms of literary work. Her handling of blank verse is skillful, and as a whole the volume presents more of the graces and fewer of the faults of her characteristic style. The story told is of the undoing of Athelwold, the noble Thane of Edward, through beauty of woman, and love and kisses. The text is full of pith, and bristles with epigrams, many of which deserve to last. The work would be fully as strong and more acceptable to most readers if there were less of the long-drawn, sensuous kiss, which seems to be a sort of trade-mark—or birth-mark—of all of Mrs. Chanler's work.

The Magazines.

THE NON-SECTARIAN for January is a Jesus number, three out of the four original contributions of which it consists being specifically devoted to the man of Nazareth. The other is Merwin-Marie Snell's "Rome's Opportunity," in which he expressed the hope that the Papal Encyclical would take a broad view of Biblical criticism. The most important article, as it seems to us, is Rabbi Sale's "Who Is to Blame for the Crucifixion of Jesus?" in which he takes the ground that it was done by the Sadducees and the Romans, and that the Pharisees, who were most representative of the Jews of the time, were the friends of Jesus and the Christians and largely in agreement with them, although they did not regard the former as the Messiah. Whether or not Rabbi Sale is correct in every detail of his argument, his suggestion that it would be well to read the New Testament with a rabbinical commentary is, to say the least, a reasonable one, and there can be no doubt in the mind of any fair-minded student that the ethical teaching of Jesus was not a new thing under the sun, but was in substantial agreement with the best Jewish thought of his day. Most of those of us who have been brought up under Christian influences are still far from doing justice to the Jew of the first century, and it would be well for us if more such articles as this of Rabbi Sale's found their way to our reading tables.

TO THE FORUM Hon. David A. Wells contributes what is entitled, "The Teaching of Recent Economic Experience," in which he "lets himself go," and apparently gives vent to long pent-up disapproval of the methods and institutions of his native land. Universal suffrage seems to him a mistake. Rev. G. M. Royce discusses "The Decline of the American Pulpit," a title which seems to us to convey an untruth. Jacob A. Ries has "A Christmas Reminder of the Noblest Work in the World." Among the other contributions it is perhaps hardly necessary to state that there is a symposium on Foot-ball—from the standpoints of the physician and the educator.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY for January contains as its most noteworthy features (from our standpoint), "Ten Letters from Coleridge to Southey;" the discussion of an interesting topic, in "The Transmission of Learning Through the University," by Prof. Shaler; a sketch of General Armstrong, by J. H. Denison; and the first installment of Mrs. Deland's "Philip and His Wife," a story which, unlike "John Ward, Preacher," seems to be devoted to picturing the manifestation of selfishness in the conjugal state.

IN THE ARENA for January Hamlin Garland's discussion of "The Land Question and Its Relations to Art and Literature," which was originally delivered before the Actor's Order of Friendship in New York City, shows that this talented man can argue ably as well as describe vividly,—his exposition of the wide-reaching evil resulting from private land ownership being one of the most telling that has been put forth up to date.

Climbing.

While we climb from day to day,
There is many a little way
We can help each other upward, if we will;

For the paths are rough and steep,
And the right one hard to keep,
So let's try to help each other up the hill.

When we find temptation's rocks
In our path as stumbling blocks,
Let's not roll them in another fellow's way;

But, instead, let's always try Help the others pass them by,
And to make it smoother climbing every day.

Practical Benevolence.

A few winters ago little Benny Blank entered our schoolroom, and by his peculiar appearance attracted the attention of several of the teachers and elder boys who stood together in a friendly group, waiting the time for commencing the afternoon's duties.

It was no unusual thing to meet with children whose new dresses were made out of old ones, or the cut of whose garments bore evidence of originality of style and strange mingling of material; but Benny's suit was different from anything the group had looked upon before. His jacket, which served the father on week days and the son on Sundays, was made of moleskin, well stiffened with oil and dirt from the workshop, the sleeves being shortened to the length of Benny's arms by rolling them up. It reached below his knees, and was buttoned down before, to keep it in place as much as possible. But the space for the neck was rather wider than Benny's neck and one shoulder together, so that when the lad lodged the jacket on the right shoulder it was off the left, and when lodged on the left it was off the right. This inadaptability kept the little fellow in perpetual motion. His nether garments were tattered and spare, his legs without stockings, and his feet dodging in and out of a pair of old bluchers which corresponded in size with the jacket, and no doubt had to accompany that article both on week days and Sundays.

Our little friend, who was nine years old, carried above these symbols of poverty a most cheerful, interesting countenance, which, brightening up during the time he was questioned by the superintendent, bespoke the kind sympathies of those that were near.

To Benny's young heart the delights of the Sabbath-school were a new joy, and this first taste of its blessings created so strong a desire for more, that the most inclement weather did not keep him away from the class of that kind-hearted teacher who strove to win him for Christ.

It was in the depth of the severe winter alluded to, and on a Sunday, when the very few who braved the storm had to endure the unpleasantness of cold, drizzling snow and sleet from above, and deep, slushy mire from below, that a class of boys placed in the hands of their teacher a few shillings, with a respectful request that he would save it until they could make up a sufficient sum to buy Benny a suit of clothes. Of this kindly feeling working among the boys the superintendent was quite unaware, but it so happened that his address on that afternoon was on "Practical Benevolence;" and to his surprise, at the close of the school, several boys came to him from different classes saying they should be glad to do something for Benny. One proffered money, another would purchase a jacket, another a cap; and this was done without one class previously knowing anything of the intentions of the others. The boy's need, the weather, and the address had all so operated on their good nature that they could wait no longer, but must perform the kind deed at once. Then and there—that afternoon—there was a growth of benevolence ready to be gathered that cheered the hearts of the witnesses of this little incident, and was an offering acceptable to God, who loveth a cheerful giver.

On the following Sunday morning the first to greet me at school was my little friend Benny, who said: "Teacher, I've got some new clothes," and putting up first one foot and then the other, "see my new shoes." I said, "Now, Benny, how has all this come about?"

"Why, teacher called at our house during the week, and he told mother the boys in the school had given him some money towards buying me some new clothes, and he had brought two of his old coats to give her to make me a jacket; and I said, 'Mother, those coats will just fit father, I know;' and when father tried them on they did. And mother told teacher she had been saving some money to buy father a reach-me-down, and she thought he had better have teacher's coats, then he would have two, and she would buy me a new jacket instead. Then she asked teacher for the money the boys had sent; but he said, 'No; I will go with you to lay out the boys' money, and you can do what you like with your own.' So we all three went together, and mother and teacher bought the jacket and trousers, and teacher gave seven shillings for the shoes, and he gave me the stockings and the handkerchief, and one of the boys gave me the cap."

I said, "Benny, I have no doubt you feel very thankful to the boys for this kindness, and you must tell them so."

"Please, teacher, you tell them: I can't tell them well enough." It was quite evident he felt more than he could express.

It was my turn to give the afternoon's address, in the doing of which I tried my best to express Benny's thanks to the kind-hearted friends who had so seasonably clothed him; but my words were nothing near so forcible as Benny's look of gratitude. He felt it—he showed it, while goodness beamed in every countenance at this outcome of benevolence. All were happier for this act of kindness. They who had so cheerfully given, and he who had so thankfully received, were truly blessed in their deed.

The Reason Why.

"When I was at the party,"
Said Betty (aged just four),
"A little girl fell off her chair,
Right down upon the floor;
And all the other little girls
Began to laugh, but me,—
I did n't laugh a single bit,"
Said Betty, seriously.

"Why not?" her mother asked her,
Full of delight to find
That Betty—bless her little heart!—
Had been so sweetly kind;
"Why didn't you laugh, darling?
Or don't you like to tell?"
"I did n't laugh," said Betty,
"Cause it was me that fell!"

THE CHURCH IS THE BODY OF THE CHRIST.
Acts iv. 32—v. 11.

*When faith is lost, when honor dies,
The man is dead.*

—Whittier.

"I would have a woman as true as Death. At the first real lie which works from the heart outward, she should be tenderly chloroformed into a better world."
—Holmes.

Picture: The Death of Ananias, by Rafael.

The story of the picture is told in the lesson passage. We shall make use of it to illustrate certain characteristics of the early church.

What was an early ideal of the church?—The church was viewed as only an enlargement of the apostolic band, which, because of the unseen presence still with it and its animation by the spirit that was in Jesus, was called the body of Christ.

One ideal of the Church, found in the New Testament, holds it to be the body of the Christ; the Christ had become incarnate first in Jesus and afterward in the Church. What Jesus did in the world, that the church must do. Its power and its responsibilities were identical with his. "As thou didst send me into the world, even so sent I them into the world!" (John xvii. 18). The Church, according to this idea, is the continuation of the life of Jesus in the world, completing his thought, carrying on his work: it is the re-incarnation of the Christ spirit.

Even when this idea had not arisen, the enlarging Church was only the extension of the apostolic company seeking to observe the same manner of life as while Jesus was present in the flesh. He was still with them, though unseen, and all that was done was "in the name of the Lord Jesus" and by his power. With all its narrowness and hide-bound Judaism (of which more subsequently) the Church had a noble idealism in which lay its vitality. Our key to a right understanding of the history of the Jerusalem Church, not to speak of the churches established outside of Palestine, is full recognition of the fact that it was regarded as simply an enlargement of the apostolic company, with Jesus still in the midst.

What were some characteristics of the early church?—As befitting the body of the Christ, it was a church of equality, brotherly honor, purity and power.

(1) The Church of Equality. One of the most striking features of the church is its pure democracy. When a successor was to be chosen to Judas, the traitor, he was picked out by lot from two men selected by the entire company (Acts i. 15-26). When "deacons" were to be chosen, it was the whole multitude that chose the seven and brought them before the Apostles for formal recognition by the laying on of hands. Upon the Day of Pentecost, "not on one favored forehead fell" the flame of spiritual power, but upon each of the disciples sat a tongue of fire parting from the central flame in fulfillment, it is said, of the ancient promise, "I will pour forth of my spirit upon all flesh" (Acts ii. 1-21). All the disciples were kings and all were priests. The law of Jesus, "He that is greatest among you shall be servant of all," is the soul principle of democracy. There is not a hint of the primacy of Peter; at first, by virtue of his character, he took the lead, but after his baptism of Cornelius he seems to have fallen into disfavor. The Apostles are naturally the leading men in the growing community, but we soon find presbyters in existence (Acts xi. 30) who were probably chosen by the entire company of believers and corresponded closely to the modern parish committee. The early church was inspired by the democratic ideal.

(2) The Church of Brotherly Honor. There was but one purse among the Apostles while Jesus was with them, and consequently that ideal was recognized, although not fully, by the growing church. Hence we find what looks like a communistic church: the disciples put their possessions into a common fund from which all are supplied alike. But concerning this, four points are to be noted.

(a) It was voluntary and not required. This appears very clearly in the passage set for our study (cf. v. 4). Moreover, Mary, the mother of Mark, kept her home in Jerusalem (Acts. xii. 12).

(b) It was local and not universal. There is no evidence that communism prevailed anywhere except in Jerusalem. Paul did teach that whatever a disciple owned he held in trust for God, to minister to those in need, but he held it. Contributions are laid by on the first day of the week (1 Cor. xvi. 2); and in Thessalonica, Corinth and Ephesus Paul worked with his own hands to earn a livelihood, that no one might charge him with making his preaching a way of gain (1 Thess. ii. 9: 1 Cor. ix. 12-18; 2 Cor. xi. 9; Acts xx. 34).

(c) It proved a dismal failure in Jerusalem. One of the requirements laid down by the Council at Jerusalem was that the Gentile Christians should remember the poor (Gal. ii. 10). Particularly on the third missionary journey we find Paul solicitous for the impoverished disciples at Jerusalem, for whom he was making collections in the churches of Galatia, Macedonia, and Greece. Communism that is not self-supporting is of course a failure.

(d) It was based upon a false belief in the imminent second advent of Jesus. Why should men hold private property, or count it of any value, when Jesus was so soon to return for the purpose of establishing a kingdom of surpassing glory, in which all of the disciples who had given up houses and lands should be more than repaid for their sacrifices? Besides, there was a quick sympathy with those in need—which was so conspicuous in Jesus himself.

Thus the church was a church of brotherly honor: each man trusted his brother and counted his possessions as the common property of all.

(3) The Church of Purity. One of the very earliest glimpses of the church that we get from a non-Christian author is in a letter written by Pliny, governor of the Roman province of Pontus-Bithynia, about 112 A. D., to the Emperor Trajan asking instructions about the proper treatment of the Christians who had become so numerous in his province that the temples were deserted, the sacred rites neglected, and certain occupations connected with sacrifices had become unprofitable. In this letter he says that, as he had learned, "The Christians were accustomed to meet on a stated day before light and to sing responsively (?) a hymn to Christ as to a God, and to bind themselves by an oath not indeed for the commission of any crime, but to do no theft, robbery or adultery, not to break faith or refuse to return a deposit when called upon." (Cf. also The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles; The Epistle of Barnabas §§ 18, 19, Ep. to Diognetus §§ 5, 6.) This loftiness of ethical living was one of the best inheritances of the church from the nation in which it arose. The prophets of Israel had taught, as their chief message, the supremacy of righteousness. The picture which we have to-day discloses the strict ethical standard of the primitive church. Ananias had sought to get credit for giving the full price of his possession while he was keeping back part; he had violated the principle of honor among brethren: at the question of Peter he had put his acted lie into words, and the punishment of death came upon him as afterwards for the same offense upon his wife Sapphira. Whether or not the story be true to the fact concerns us very little, there may have been a basis of fact upon which the legend was reared, but the story has far outspread its foundations: what is of importance is the fact that this story was told and believed in the church. The very existence of the legend testifies to the ethical sentiment of the church which found nothing incredible in the statement that upon so trivial an offense (as it seems to us) so fearful a retribution followed.

(4) The Church of Power. Jesus had no power that was not the property of the church also. The disciples could do miracles of healing and of judgment because he could. All power was theirs because all power had been given over to him. We can hardly overestimate the effect of this belief upon the Christians: it prompted them to undertake tasks from which ordinary men would shrink, it filled them with enthusiastic daring and steadfast endurance. Because they believed themselves aided by supernatural power they were strong to undertake and to accomplish the seemingly impossible.

In these distinguishing marks of the church are the signs of its future success. The world had need of a purer ethical standard, based upon the brotherhood of all men, touched with the idealism of an unseen helper, aglow with the hope of a victorious future and presented by men who felt themselves commissioned by God and endowed with supernatural guidance and aid. But as in these characteristics the church was heir to prophetic Israel, so it was not without the heritage of legalism. Before the true Israel of the prophets, of whom Jesus was chief, could be carried to the world, the church had to escape from the body of its death, which was legalism. In our next-lesson we shall study the process by which the deliverance was brought about.

Questions.

The Picture.—Tell the story as it is given in the Acts of the Apostles. How many Apostles are represented here? Were there any others? Do you suppose that the story is true to fact? Is it true to the sentiment of the church?

The Ideal of the Church.—"The church is the body of the Christ." What did Paul really mean by this thought? Is the church to-day animated by the spirit that was in Jesus? "To be a Christian, one must be a Christ." Is this true? What is the church and what is it for?

The Characteristics of the Church.—Gibbon (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. xv.) mentions five causes for the success of the Christian church; (1) The zeal of the Christians. (2) The doctrine of a future life. (3) Miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church. (4) The pure and austere morals of the Christians. (5) The union and discipline of the Christian republic. How are these illustrated in our lesson to-day?

WHAT TO TELL THE CHILDREN ABOUT THE BIBLE LEGENDS.

This is the title of Unity Short Tract, No. 29. It is by the wise and witty editor of the Christian Register, Rev. S. J. Harrows, and it is so well appreciated by the public that a new edition has been found necessary. Mr. Barrows' advice to parents is to give the children other stories to compare with the Bible stories and show them that such stories are natural growths of the human mind in early times, and that their truth does not affect the truth of religion. We quite agree with this view. It is exactly the view of the little book called "Beginnings," in which every Bible story taken up has three or four similar stories placed beside it, and then the common origin of all of the stories is pointed out in the attempt of early man to understand this world. All of our Sunday-school teachers and all parents who are puzzled by this subject will find the right precepts laid down in this tract.

"GOD NEED N'T BE SO SCARED OF HIS SELF."

Here is a Sunday-school story that may not be very "goodie-goodie," but is certainly true to life and has a moral for us. It comes from the South, as its language shows. A lady had a very naughty little girl who behaved so badly at Sunday school that her mother threatened not to let her go at all if she did not behave better. Whereupon she retorted: "God need n't be so scared of his self; I don't like his old Sunday school, no how." I suspect God has been too "scared of his self" in a great many of our schools. If we would only contrive to interest the little ones we should have no trouble with their behavior, and they would like God and "his old Sunday school." The kindergarten methods would make their Sunday school the happiest hour of the day. And the Unitarian Sunday School Society of Boston has issued a manual to help our teachers to use these methods. The name of the book is Childhood's Morning, and it is prepared by Mrs. E. G. Mumford.

Notes from the Field

Chicago.—THIRD CHURCH.—A very pleasant company sat down to the well-filled tables in the vestry of the Third Church at its annual meeting Monday evening. And the reports that followed were as refreshing as the more material food. The Minister read his eleventh annual report, outlining in a simple, modest way the many-sided work of a city minister. That was succeeded by the Treasurer's report of something over $4,000 raised and spent, with a slight but satisfactory balance on the right side. Then came the report of the Sunday School Superintendent, Mrs. West, who noted among other things the long distances many of the pupils came, and who recommended Every Other Sunday as most useful and interesting. The school is growing, having increased fifteen per cent. this year. The Ladies' Aid Society is also increasing in attendance and in good works. But the King's Daughters had the most wonderful report of work done, of which only one small incidental item was 1,300 bouquets made and distributed during the vacation.

Hon. John A. Roche, who has recently moved from the West Side, presented his resignation, which was read and accepted, and Mr. A. M. Lewis was elected to fill his place. J. M. Wanzer and H. D. Hatch were re-elected as trustees for the next two years, and Mr. Marshall was also re-elected as Secretary and Treasurer. Thus the church set out hopefully on another year in its work of making the sweet calm of religion a present reality in the heart of the great rushing and roaring city.

Chicago.—The following correspondence was read from the pulpit of Unity Church, Sunday, Jan. 6.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30, 1893.

REV. THOMAS G. MILSTED:

Dear Sir,—At the annual meeting of Unity Church held on the eighteenth instant, at which your resignation as pastor was accepted, it was unanimously voted that a committee be appointed to express to you and to Mrs. Milsted the kind feeling of the church toward you, and their regret at the necessity of your departure.

The committee appointed for this purpose feel that, in expressing their own individual sentiment, they voice that of all the rest.

During your pastorate of eight years there has been, so far as known to us, only kindly feeling toward you, and whatever differences there may have been, we believe they have left no bitterness, nor weakened our mutual confidence in the earnest desire of all to further the highest interests of Unity Church and of the Unitarian faith.

You have come as a friend to the homes of all. In some you have spoken the words of benediction and of congratulation which belong to the marriage service. You have baptized the little ones. In the hour of sorrow you have comforted the mourners, and have said the last farewell over our dead.

You have preached earnestly from the pulpit. Since your marriage Mrs. Milsted, a true daughter of Unity Church, continuing what she had so well begun as child and maiden, in Sunday school and church, has been your worthy helpmate in all that relates to our common interest and fellowship.

She has filled with dignity and ability the not always easy office of pastor's wife, earning the respect and regard of all, both young and old.

The breaking of the ties between minister and people is always painful, and we think we speak for the whole congregation when we say that the necessity for separation is regretted by all.

You are about to enter on a year of foreign travel and observation. We trust that you will return to your native land with enlarged experience and fresh vigor, ready to enter upon some field of labor where you will reap the full reward of earnest striving in your chosen profession.

For ourselves individually, and in the name of Unity Church, we offer to you and to Mrs. Milsted our best wishes and a hearty and loving farewell.

SAMUEL S. GREELEY,
L. J. TILTON,
JOHN S. BREWER,
F. S. HEYWOOD,
MRS. W. M. INGLIS,

Committee.

CHICAGO, Jan. 2, 1894.

MR. SAMUEL S. GREELEY, Chairman of Committee on Resolutions:

DEAR SIR,—The kind message from your committee came duly to hand to-day. I appreciate the spirit which prompted it, and return in full measure all the good wishes it contains.

The happiness and prosperity of my eight years in Chicago have been exceptionally great: greater, perhaps, than will be my lot elsewhere.

The memory of the noble dead—now gone to their reward—who worshiped and labored with us in Unity Church, and the love I bear for others who, I trust, will be long spared, will always be a benediction to me.

Mrs. Milsted joins me in thanking the committee, both as individuals and as representatives of the church, for their love and good will, and in praying that the blessings you wish for us may also be your own. Cordially yours,
T. G. MILSTED.

Peoria, Ill.—The People's Church has been celebrating its first milestone with great rejoicing. Last Tuesday we had the first Sunday-school Christmas festival. School numbers over sixty. To-night the first annual supper was served, there were 250 at the tables, and many visitors who came in later to the other exercises. Speeches were made by many of the founders and guests—all of the most congratulatory and hopeful character. The church held its first annual election last Sunday. The board or council of ten that organized the church were retained, and six more elected to act with them. The feeling that a good year's history had been made seemed universal. Many highly complimentary remarks were made in regard to the faithful, self-denying work done by the minister and his wife—she being president of a very efficient Ladies' Society. They all feel that UNITY is their paper; the minister reads much from it in his work in the church. We have to overcome the present small pecuniary resources of the church and have a long list of subscribers.

Unity Hymns is a source of spiritual nourishment to all.

Streator, Ill.—The new movement here, called the Church of Good Will, is thriving wonderfully. The large audiences of three or four hundred show no signs of diminishing, and the organic life of the society is beginning to develop. A large and efficient Ladies' Society is doing excellent work, and a Sunday school has been started which already numbers a hundred in attendance and over that in membership. The fact that the church services are held in the evening down town in the Opera House has made the movement a popular one from the start, and has given Mr. Duncan a rare opportunity to reach the non-church-going people; and he is using the opportunity with remarkable wisdom and success.

Geneva, Ill.—A memorial service in honor of the first pastor of the church, Rev. Augustus H. Conant, was held Jan. 7, the fifty-second anniversary of his removal to Geneva. There were appropriate readings from Scripture and Whittier's "Eternal Goodness." The pastor gave a brief sketch of Mr. Conant's life, and then read one of his sermons, entitled "Present Rewards of Liberality." A pleasant surprise followed in the shape of a gift of a crayon portrait of Mr. Conant, executed by his granddaughter, Miss Louise Conant, of Rockford, and presented by Mr. Harvey in the name of Mrs. Conant and her family. The occasion was one of suitable and worthy recognition of the past labors of one of the bravest and best of the pioneers of liberal thought in the West.

Whitewater, Wis.—Some weeks ago the Universalists of this place ventured to invite Mr. Nagarkar to lecture there. He made such a favorable impression that he was invited to speak again in the regular lecture course on Tuesday evening, when he was welcomed by an audience of about six hundred. On the following evening he spoke in the Universalist Church on the message of the Brahma-Somaj. The liberal element in Whitewater think he has done so much good that they will try another "heathen" in the near future.

Plainview, Minn.—At this point Rev. F. C. Davis, of Winona, has done some effective missionary work. For more than a year he has gone there on week-days or Sundays, a opportunity has offered, and lectured and preached in the opera hall—always to large audiences and appreciative acceptance. In October he organized his constituency into a Liberal League, associated under the following pledge:

We, the undersigned, being desirous of maintaining individual independence in matters of religion, and of extending peace and good will among men, pledge such moral and financial support as we can consistently give to the Liberal League of Plainview, Minn. The object of the Liberal League shall be to bring into fraternal co-operation all those who favor rational and progressive standards of belief and conduct. The sole right to membership shall consist in willingness to assist in developing broader charity and loftier ideals.

On Dec. 13-17, Mr. Davis held a series of special services, which resulted in adding many to the membership—the list includes over a hundred persons. There are more to follow. On Monday evening, Dec. 19, the League held a social meeting, with collation. Nearly $40 was realized, which will be devoted to the benefit of the needy people of the village. Some persons may not think the Plainview Liberal League is a church, but it has all the features essential to a church, and is doing much good work that belongs within the province of the churches.—Liberal Co-Worker.

Winona, Minn.—The Winona Society is a growing Liberal center. The Spring session of the Conference is to be held here, and Minister Davis writes that it "will probably be an interstate, and if possible an inter-denominational, gathering. We shall invite and welcome representatives of all Liberal churches. Personally I hope the Universalist brethren will be here in force." Speaking of the Co-Worker Mr. Davis says: "I am pleased with the paper, and can only add anew—keep it before the people and Push Things."—Liberal Co-Worker.

Cincinnati, O.—We clip the following from the Cincinnati Tribune of Jan. 7:

The afternoons devoted to the report of the Religious News Committee, of the Unitarian Woman's Alliance, have always proved peculiarly interesting, it being the province of that committee to report whatever is new or striking in the religious world, and the meeting to be held to-morrow will prove no exception. Mrs. Robertson, wife of Judge C. D. Robertson, will read an able paper on the World's Parliament of Religions, and will be followed by Mrs. Bovill, Adjutant of the Salvation Army, who has been asked to be present and speak on the work of the Salvation Army in this city.

We also learn that Mr. Nagarkar gives three lectures, Jan. 12-15, under the auspices of the Woman's Alliance, the proceeds to go to the Free Kindergarten.

St. Louis, Mo.—The following item will be of interest to UNITY readers. It is clipped from the St. Louis Republic of Jan. 1:

IN MEMORY OF REV. J. C. LEARNED.
The Church of the Unity on Lafayette Park was completely filled yesterday at the service held in memory of the late pastor, Rev. John C. Learned. The program included two hymns, written by the deceased, in the singing of which all joined, the trio "Lift Thine Eyes," and the solo "I Go to Prove My Soul," finely rendered by Miss Emma Taussig. Between the singing, Edward S. Rowse, Professor C. M. Woodward, and Thomas Dimmock addressed the congregation. Mr. Rowse spoke on the history of the Church of the Unity and Mr. Learned's connection therewith, which extended over twenty-three years. He bore affectionate testimony to the many noble qualities of the deceased. Prof. Woodward gave personal recollections and reminiscences of the late minister, all tending to illustrate his exceptionally high character. Mr. Dimmock's essay was a masterpiece of diction, a loving tribute, such as only an appreciative heart could pay to the memory of a dear friend.

The services occupied exactly an hour and a half. They were peculiarly appropriate and deeply impressive. The entire proceedings, together with those of the funeral services some days ago, will be published in the form of a memorial pamphlet.

Mr. Duncan, of Streator, occupied the St. Louis pulpit Jan. 7, and Mr. Judy, of Davenport, Jan. 14, the Western Secretary preaching in Streator and Davenport on those dates.

Spokane, Wash.—Rev. A. G. Wilson has accepted the call extended to him by the church at this place, and is now filling the position left vacant by the resignation of Rev. E. M. Fairchild.

"I believe in earth—God's splendid ball,
 Fairest of all creation;
 I believe in Purgatory—that means all Meanness and irritation;
 I believe in Hell—alas, I do,
 The 'bad' are always in it;
 I believe in Heaven for me and you,
 And work and love shall win it."
 —By Whom?

THE FREE CHURCH AND WHAT IT WILL COST, the address by Rev. Charles F. Dole, which was recently published in our Church-Door Pulpit, and which made such an impression when it was first delivered at the Western Unitarian Conference last May, has now been published as Unity Mission No. 43, by the Unity Publishing Committee, and may be obtained at 175 Dearborn street, single copies at 5 cents, and ten for 25 cents.

PERHAPS the activity suggested in the article on Neighborhood Guilds in Country Villages, which appears in this issue, will do something to relieve the condition pictured in that other contribution, entitled "Isolation." We invite attention to both. The latter may lead the many of us who are more happily situated than "J. T. T." to feel as thankful as we should for our good fortune. And those of us who are looking for the means of brightening and elevating village life may well listen to the head of the Andover House, than whom few men in our country, if any, are better fitted to speak of the possibilities of the neighborhood guild.

THE Northwestern Congregationalist, published in Minneapolis, gives over its number of January 8 to a significant symposium of The Church and the Kingdom of God. Some thirty of the leading representatives of religion in its many phases have written concerning an article by President Gates, of Grinnell College, Iowa, taking the position that the Kingdom of God is of this world and that it is the business of the church to seek the salvation of society more than to concern itself about theological differences which are to be solved in the next world. The whole number is admirable reading, and is another indication of the trend of the times towards an unity found in ethics, a synthesis of love rather than an analysis of logic.

THE glory of the peristyle is gone. The loss is felt as a keen personal one by hundreds of thousands. But much of the beauty remains at Jackson Park. Throngs still flock to the attractive territory, particularly on Sunday. And still art, economy, ethics and religion cry out to men to stay the vandal hand, preserve what remains to some high uses. There must be resources within reach of science and energy to perpetuate in their essential beauty much of what remains worth saving at Jackson Park. Who will show the Park Commissioners how to make a "staff" that will last? The architects of the world are waiting for the man who will teach them to mold a substance while it is soft which will harden in due time and resist the tooth of time.

THE Year Book published by the A. U. A. for 1894 is at hand, so like preceding ones that it would be undistinguishable were it not for the calendar. Not even have the compilers yielded to the spirit of change enough to drop out the quarter of a page notice of the "Western Unitarian Association," whose president has been dead several years, the vacancy remaining unfilled, and the nominal secretary and treasurer of which has gone abroad, his vacancy being indicated in the place where he once was pastor. We are sure none will be more surprised to find this skeleton still above ground than those whose names appear as board of directors of an organization the active existence of which was limited to a few months and which has had no meeting for years, lacking vitality enough even to vote itself out of existence. We make timely note of this fact at the beginning of the year, thinking that perhaps by next year the condition of affairs may be understood by the editors of the Year Book, so that they may save the space in their Annual for 1895. We also notice the omission of the Free Church of Tacoma, although that society officially asked that its name be inserted in a separate list distinguishing it as an "Affiliated Society." The Board of Directors in refusing such reasonable and fraternal request seems to us to have committed one more of those mistakes for which the A. U. A. is historically famous. If the compilers of this Year Book assume any ecclesiastical authority in determining where the bounds of fellowship are to be drawn, we are sure that as soon as that fact is known many other societies will join the Tacoma Society in asking to be dropped from the list compiled under such assumption. If, on the other hand, they are but compilers of statistics, it seems to us that the spirit of "pure congregationalism" which Unitarians affect should compel them to respect the wishes of any society that desires any kind of fellowship or affiliation with the group of churches gathered in this movement.

A NATIONAL CONFERENCE for Good City Government is to held in Philadelphia January 25 and 26, to which invitations have been sent to all parts of the country. On the first day, besides the formal greetings, Hon. Carl Schurz, Dr. L. S. Rowe, Mrs. Jos. P. Mumford and Mr. W. H. Roome are to deliver addresses; Schurz on "The Relations of Civil Service Reform to Municipal Government," and Dr. Rowe on "Municipal Government as it Should Be and May Become." At the morning session the second day the conference will consider how to arouse public sentiment in favor of good city government, by means of education (Mr. Edwin D. Mead), by means of the churches (Dr. J. H. Ecob), by influence upon officials in office (Dr. Washington Gladden). At the afternoon session the subject will be how to bring public sentiment to bear upon the choice of good public officials, the several ways being discussed by Mr. A. B. Mason, Mr. S. B. Capen and Mr. Chas. Richardson. It is intended that all of the discussions shall be followed by debates to be carried on by the delegates in five minute speeches, and on Friday evening a public meeting is to be held, presided over by Hon. John Field, at which Theodore Roosevelt, Dr. Rainsford and Mr. S. B. Capen are to speak.

Remembrance.

There are many now missing from the list of names specially interesting to me in years past, awakening always expectation and delight. To Finley, Weiss, Wasson, Johnson, Longfellow, are now added Learned and Potter. There has probably been no period in the evolution of religious ideas when loyalty to truth for the truth's own sake, and heroism in defending it has reached a nobler mark than it did in the years when these men gave themselves to their special labors, or contributed their quotas to the Free Religious Society and the columns of the Radical Magazine. My own best knowledge of them came to me through my connection with that journal.

Everett Finley, less known than the others, dying young, was a man of such choice and splendid mold, he must have carried with him to realms beyond re-enforcements which would not fail of a glad recognition and welcome.

John Weiss was ever suggesting by his marvelous mind, while yet living in his veritable body of flesh, that he had access to all spiritual forces. All worlds attend on him. The universe was his familiar home. Once he said to a friend: "Dying is release to realities with which I am already familiar."

Samuel Johnson knew by native wit the trend of the whole spiritual creation and could interpret to you all the religions of the earth, and show also the universal religion streaming through them. More than any other was he the interpreter.

David Wasson built his sonnets and grand poems, as Angelo wrought his marbles, with a sense of largeness and world-significance. The earlier essays of Wasson in the Atlantic Monthly, and all his prose writings of later dates, like his "Secret of Power" in the The Radical, had the polish and force of pure intelligence. His was a master's hand. He was a man of great generosity and nobleness.

Samuel Longfellow, no less a poet in nature than his brother, shed the radiance of his clear and beautiful spirit on the time; less ambitious of labor, but steadfast and true.

William Potter, calm, serene; a summer-up of the case; like the justice on his bench, impartial; modest, retiring, but intrepid: firm to his convictions as the Gibraltar rock to its firm base.

John Learned, always a tower of strength! Not so much what he said, but the surety that went with it that he could and would stand and endure to the last. Whether the battle was with him or against him he remained at his post,—

"Stainless soldier on the walls."

And these men in worldly goods were comparatively poor,—some of them knew the bitterness of want that so often sours the mind and saps the spirit's power. But over their lives it gained no such mastery. They could put their poverty beneath them, and even make of it a throne.

The influence of the transcendental and radical school running along in the sixties was permeating and far-reaching, but not coming to the surface to vouch for itself in institutions or proselyting movements of newer creeds. Their thinking took not that direction. It was the Light spreading over the void, creating new worlds by suggestion to men and women that they might be free, self-reliant, reasonable, charitable, companionable. It was "Saadi's Thinking," as John Weiss sang it.

SUCH a noon as Thought has made!
In my soul no spot of shade;
Least and greatest lying plain.
Hope of mystery was vain.

* * *

Then let Thought be shed with air.
But in Daylight for its wear—
Colorless and limpid laws:
In them stars and twilights pause.

On Titles.

Our highly esteemed friend, the editor of The Reform Advocate, has a word to say in deprecation of the too general use of the title "Rabbi." The general spirit of this protest will doubtless appeal to most cultivated Americans, whose ears are constantly offended by hearing of "Colonel A" and "Captain B," "Doctor C" and "Professor D," when no one of these individuals has smelt gun powder or received an academic degree or been inside of university or college walls,—the probability being that "Colonel A" is simply a rich man, "Captain B" a more or less successful politician, "Doctor C" an apothecary's clerk, and "Professor D" either a grammar-school teacher or a dancing-master. Such an abuse of titles is enough to make one despise them, and will perhaps make it the object of one's ambition to be called "plain mister." But when our learned friend goes on to say that when a Jewish teacher is called Rabbi by Christians and Unitarians there is in this designation a covert hint of disrespect for him or his religion, we feel that he is seriously in error. The spirit of the prohibition of Jesus, found in Matt. xxiii. 7, 8, to which our friend refers, is as much (and as little) disregarded when the non-Jew calls the minister of his own church "Rev. Mr. E" or "Doctor" as when he calls a learned Jewish teacher "Rabbi"; and one might add that if the letter of the prohibition is to control, it is equally improper for one to call his neighbor Mr. H.—for master, doctor, and rabbi are similar designations of honor, and, literally taken, perhaps the former—which we contract into Mr. or mister—implies the greatest degree of subservience on the part of the speaker.

But of course the original meaning of these terms has little or nothing to do with their actual use. The Quaker, it is true, feels himself so bound by both the letter and the spirit of Jesus' words as to refrain from the use of any sort of title, and in strictness holds it his duty to address President Cleveland as Grover; his neighbor, though old enough to be his mother, as Mary Smith; the Marquis of Lorne as John Campbell, etc. But the majority of men in this day give a man a special designation simply because it is customary so to do, and because they know of no better way to address him. The fervent American republican who feels called upon to address England's Queen as Mrs. Victoria or the Earl of Derby as Mr. Stanley is justly felt to be acting very foolishly. To call the latter Lord Derby is no more a concession to the rightfulness of a privileged class than it is to call his younger son Master Stanley. It is simply the designation which custom has given; and the same is true of such titles as "Rev.," "Dr.," and "Rabbi." Why in England an M. D. should be addressed as "Dr.," while a D. C. L. or an LL. D. is called "Mr." is "one of those things no fellow can find out." It is the same custom which speaks of the country practitioner who is not an M. D. as "the doctor," while it designates the scholar, who may be Ph. D., LL. D., Litt. D., and have a number of other titles, as plain "Mister."

Our friend is wrong. Non-Jews address him as "Rabbi" because they suppose it to be the appropriate designation for the Jewish religious teacher. To most of them we think it means more than the "Rev." with which they address their own ministers, simply because it is generally understood that a Jewish rabbi must be what is called an educated man, whereas certain Christian denominations do not require any scholarship from their preachers. Thus, because it is not regarded as a "cheap" title, it ranks rather with the better use of Doctor, and, so far as it is anything more than a purely conventional address, it is a sincere tribute of respect to the scholarship of him who bears it. Will our neighbor tell us how the title should be used? We wish to be able to use it intelligently.

As to titles in general, it would probably be better if all the world followed the Quaker custom; but as that time has not yet come, the next best thing seems to be to use titles as discriminatingly as our knowledge will allow,—to call the man whose learning has won him that academic position, "Professor"; to call the man whose honorable service in the army has raised him to the command of a regiment, "Colonel"—and not "General" or "Captain"; to call him whose study and intellectual acquirements have won for him from a university or college that academic degree, "Doctor" or "Rabbi," as the case may be; and to be equally careful not to use any one of these or other titles where they do not belong.

Men and Things

THE higher education of woman in Germany is making a start with the founding of the first "gymnasium" for girls at Weimar, where Greek, Latin and mathematics will be taught. Princess Theresa of Bavaria has been one of the foremost spirits in promoting it.

WE believe in God, but not in an extra-mundane, an extra-human God, a mystical man-in-the-moon, the absent Father of his abandoned children. We believe in the indwelling presence of all-pervading Spirit. Not God there and man here, but God in man and man in God, inseparable and harmonious.—V. E. Southworth, in Character.

AT a meeting of the Zoological Society of London, Mr. Tegtmeier exhibited the feet of some Australian rabbits to show an adaptation which is being gradually brought about to a new mode of locomotion. The rabbits are becoming climbers, and often ascend trees in their search for food; their feet are said to be growing slihter and the claws longer and sharper.—Independent.

THE way in which common people read their Bibles is just like the way in which the old monks thought hedgehogs ate grapes. They rolled themselves (it was said) over and over, where the grapes lay on the ground. What fruit stuck to their spines they carried off and ate. So your hedgehoggy readers roll themselves over and over their Bibles, and declare that whatever sticks to their spines is scripture; and that nothing else is.—Ethics of the Dust.

NINE and ten shillings per week are the current wages in many agricultural districts; bread and lard is the staple diet; river water during the day and weak tea morning and night the usual drink. It would be difficult to discover where drunkenness comes in here. Ten shillings a week! Why, if a man spent the whole of it in beer he couldn't get drunk very often. Ten shillings a week is poverty, penury and dire distress. It is absurd to talk about distress under these circumstances being caused by drunkenness. It is well impossible for these people to be poorer than they are.—London Justice.

THERE is a tradition as to how a certain saint gained renown. She was frying fish in a convent, and was seized with a religious ecstasy, but such was her self-control she neither dropped the gridiron nor burned the fish. So, with the women of our time, the great truths they learn do not interfere with the small duties of life; and when the schools in New England were opened to women, the ducking-stool and the split sticks for the tongues of gossips disappeared.—Dr. Myra Knox, in Pacific Unitarian.

A YOUNG man, twenty-seven years old, sound and active, offers himself for sale to any person who will support his aged mother and prevent her eviction from a rear tenement at 203 Avenue A, New York. The offer was made Saturday, July 22, through the World, as a last effort to save his mother from being turned into the street penitence. They have always managed to scrape up the tribute to the landlord until this month. The young man is sober and industrious, willing to work at anything. This is a good chance for a plutocrat to secure a bargain. Prohibitionists will note there is no drink in this case of poverty.—Twentieth Century.

BOSTON seems likely to be well provided with college settlements. The Andover House, at the South End, was first in the field. The Girls' Settlement, on Tyler street, started last winter. The Epworth League Settlement, at the North End, maintained by Boston University students, was first planted at the West End, but two months ago was transplanted to 18 Charter street, near the old Copp's Hill burying ground. Some of the married theologues have established their wives as housekeepers, and thus a genuine home atmosphere is created. At present there are nine residents, five men and four women. They pay their own board and rent, and also contribute largely to the running expenses. The work is largely among the Italians and German Jews, for whom a half-dozen clubs and classes have already been formed. The need of learning Italian and the Jewish-German dialect is felt, and members of the settlement are hard at work at those languages. Assistant workers have been brought in from Boston and Harvard Universities, and from the churches. One woman gives all her time to visitation, and one man devotes himself to evangelistic work in low lodging-houses, which he terms "the neediest and filthiest work there is." Surely women engaged in such work should have a right to vote.—Woman's Journal.

Swan Song.

"Tis done!" For me the struggle and the strife are o'er;
And floating down the river, I look from shore to shore!
The bent and stately cedars fill my heart with peace,
The rustling, broad palmettoes speak
but of release,
The gently swaying rushes wave to me
"Adieu!"
And all the living creatures watch me out of view,
The trailing Spanish moss has whispered me "Farewell!"
Now in the river's motion I feel the ocean swell,
The mist comes up from westward, the sun is veiled and low, Farewell, farewell, O River, unto the sea I go.

GERTRUDE R. COLBORN.

Neighborhood Guilds in Country Villages.

The growth of great cities in this country, with all the progress which has accompanied it, has yet brought certain great groups of people into relations and conditions which bring serious injury to the individual, and are dangerous to society. The growth of cities is responsible for the crowded tenement house districts, where the working people are set off by themselves and left to their own devices; for the aristocratic quarters set off by themselves, where the rich live their life of money-getting or of idleness and indulgence; and for the dreary village communities, which, for hundreds of miles around our great cities, have yielded tribute of all their most enterprising spirits, drawn by the fascination of city life into the contest for the great stakes which it has to offer. When we consider that never yet in the history of civilization has the life of any great city been sufficiently sane and normal to secure its work done from generation to generation by its own native stock, the decay of life in our country villages becomes at least as important a matter as the threat of the submerged tenth in the cities. We must hope, I think, that there will be a reaction of some sort from the overwhelming tendency toward centralization. The polarity of the social body must somehow be restored. A civilization which compels a very large portion of the people to live in a landscape of brick walls, stone pavements and strips of sky, can hardly in the nature of things hope to continue.

The country villages, on the other hand, though they have the trees, the hills, and the broad horizon, present a social situation which in several respects approximates that of the working-class quarters in the cities.

In both cases men live in groups, isolated from most of the resources of modern civilization. In both cases life is largely drudgery. In both the specter of poverty is at the door. The farmers and the trade-unionists are learning that they have a common cause. In both sorts of community, life runs in a narrow circuit. There is little to stir the blood and stimulate the imagination.

Both are lacking in chances for education and for healthy amusement and recreation. The crowded city quarter is made up of those who have entered the lists for our fierce competitive struggle, and for some reason, often creditable to them, are beaten back. The country village is made up of those who are equally out of the fight, but because they have never tried.

Is it impossible to have again under modern conditions something like the old village life, so that the villages shall again become centers of interest, activity and enterprise, in and of themselves; so that the country village shall have something to set over against the fascination of the city; so that country village life will be far more free, more happy, more eventful? We believe this can be done for the depressed sections of our cities. I now suggest certain ways in which exactly the social work which is beginning to be done in the cities can be undertaken in our country villages.

In order not to make this a mere fancy sketch, one must know what persons are available in country villages to do the sort of social work that is needed. In the first place, here is the opportunity of the country parson to adapt himself to the modern needs of modern people, and bring back the old tradition of the minister knowing his flock and known of them, touching the life of every person in the community at each person's particular point of interest and of need. First as an opportunity, and presently as a sheer necessity, this sort of work is going to be the way out of sectarianism, bigotry and selfish competition among the different churches in our small places. If there are two parsons, or half a dozen, as there sometimes are in a little town, they must beat their spears into pruning-hooks, and undertake together the culture of the vineyard in which they are placed. Then there are the school teachers who will, with a little encouragement and direction, nearly always be found ready to work for the enlargement of life among their constituents.

Every Chautauqua circle or reading club of any sort ought to take on a missionary function, ought to feel itself called to an apostleship. Here, too, is a vision of light and hope for those young women, rather numerous in these days, who have been off to college, have drunk the inspiration of college life, and then have returned to their quiet homes with little or no prospect of the interesting, useful life upon which they see their classmates entering, in college settlements, college extension, working-girls' clubs, and all the other new kinds of social undertakings. These persons, as leaders, would organize the better element of the village for the work they seemed most capable of and which the conditions would most easily allow. This for the regular working staff of the neighborhood guild. Then visitors could come for awhile, as they do at the college settlements, and assist along the lines of their particular talents. Even the summer boarder could be turned to account and be kept from being merely a means of demoralization. As for the expense of whatever is undertaken, that would not be great to begin with, and ought to be met without difficulty by the village people. As soon as the guild has developed sufficiently to undertake some considerable enterprise, those who have gone away from the village to the city, and have become prosperous, should be laid under contribution.

About the first thing for the neighborhood guild to do is to organize some sort of a club among the boys and young men who hang about aimlessly in the evening. A room might be taken over one of the village stores, supplied with books and papers, and kept open on certain evenings for all who wished to come, both men and women, and on certain evenings for regular meetings of the club. A dozen things might be done to keep the club going. Tournaments with various games, debates, story telling, old-fashioned literary society meetings, singing classes, instruction in instrumental music for those who aspire to be members of the village band, military drill, dramatic clubs, and in fact anything that would catch the interest of the members and hold them together and prepare them to be interested in something better. So much for a beginning.

There might soon be arranged, under the auspices of the club and in its hall, a series of lectures and entertainments. The difficulty here would be, in the majority of villages, that the expense would be too great, but I believe the time is coming when this difficulty will not hold. In the first place, a great deal could be made of home talent. Even crude attempts on the part of the residents in the village to entertain their neighbors, would be far more highly appreciated than the more ambitious efforts of imported talent; but as to lectures, singers and musicians to be secured from out of town, there are more and more people who are willing to give their services outright, or at very moderate rates, for the sake of entertaining and instructing others. An organized neighborhood guild, working solely in the interest of the village with no ulterior motive, could with good right ask the services of thoroughly capable persons in connection with such a course. I heard awhile ago that one of our leading college presidents, whom perhaps I had better not name, said that wherever in the United States a goodly company of people wanted him to come and address them he felt it his duty and privilege to go, simply on condition of having his expenses paid. There are many people like him nowadays, and it would be one use of neighborhood guilds to make this sort of service more and more a common and understood thing.

Most useful work could be done in the study of every-day applied science. A women's meeting could be held occasionally at the club room, and under the direction of a suitable leader would easily become interested in the study of domestic economy,—the kitchen, the household and the nursery. Corresponding groups of men could be formed for the study of agricultural science. It is well known in our days that the only farmer who succeeds is the one who puts brains into farming, and an undertaking like this would be sure to be supported. It could enlarge its opportunities and usefulness by being a branch of the "County Farmers' Institute," and could make a point of keeping on file the publications of the State and the national agricultural bureaus.

Then there is the question of rural economics, which has of late come so much to the front. There are few places where men could not be brought together occasionally to discuss the economic conditions under which farming in these days is done. Out of such a group there might come a village board of trade which would give every encouragement to farmers in trying new experiments, and should attempt to secure the introduction of new industries into the village life. The study of village politics can be made a matter of real interest; and the better element of the town could be organized to secure good roads, which are so necessary to the life of a progressive village; a town water supply, wherever that is expedient; as well as various other undertakings in the line of municipal action for the improvement of the common life of the village.

What an opportunity there is in our country villages to discover to people the undiscovered world of nature. I lived for a short time in one of the beautiful intervals which run between the outer peaks of the White Mountains, where almost every day has its own particular glory; and yet there were very few people who had at all caught the spirit of the mountains. A village guild ought to be under a sort of knightly pledge to bring into the life of the village whatever there is of beauty in the landscape that surrounds it. By this I refer to the purely aesthetic study of nature. The scientific study of nature, with its materials everywhere ready to the hand of the country boy, is another almost untouched opportunity. Nature, as Stopford Brooke has well said, is the great inspirer of curiosity. Every turn of nature incites the active mind to ask "Why?" This most splendid of all scientific laboratories is accessible to the village guild more readily than to any other sort of educational institution. All of the things will soon necessitate a library, and a very useful library can soon be got together by the regular addition of a few books every year. Nearly every town in Massachusetts has a public library. Some day I hope the public library will be as essential a feature of village life as the village constable. After public libraries are in the villages, we shall want public art galleries. In these days, through the beautiful prints, both black-and-white and colored, which are now produced, the world's best art is beginning to be accessible everywhere. The first step toward the future art gallery would be to see to it that the walls of the guild room were adorned with pictures that were really artistic and inspiring. The village school house might well serve as the second section of the village art gallery.

A village guild must be absolutely democratic. It must be so democratic that it will take special pains to go out to meet those people who live off by themselves, who have been shunned and neglected. It must attack the problem of the country slums, for every village has a certain section which is in the way of becoming a slum. It must bring social classes together, for there are social classes even in the country village. It must set out in some way or other to bring everyone in the village into the healthful stream of the common life. Under this sort of treatment, the narrowness, penuriousness, envy, and tale-bearing, which make country life so often shrunken and embittered, would soon find themselves displaced by the expansive power of a new affection.

I said in the beginning that there was prospect of a renaissance of village life. The desertion of the city for the country for longer and longer periods during the summer is bringing people back again under the charm of nature. Farm industry is coming to have more of the scientific interest which other sorts of industry have. The economic conditions of the farmer's life are at present bad, but this state of things cannot possibly last. Already there is an increase in manufacturing in rural districts, particularly where water power can be combined with electricity. Electricity is the wizard power which holds within itself the possibility of a profound reorganization of industrial and social life. The steam engine brought in the factory system and the great congested city. The electric engine may, and many electricians believe it will, break up or at least greatly modify the factory system. The easy transfer of force from place to place both for manufacturing and transportation, through electricity, will relieve the necessity of having workmen crowded together in single great establishments, will allow them again to come and go each day in a smokeless atmosphere, with a view of nature all about them, and in sight of the eastern and western sky. We may then have again, as in the middle ages, workmen who will be artists and poets.

ROBERT A. WOODS.

"He Comforteth Me."

To make you know, dear reader, how natural it was that just this experience should come to me, I must tell you somewhat of my life, trusting to your understanding of my motive to free me from the charge of egotism. For years I have kept it as something too sacred to be given to the public, but now the Spirit says "Write," and I obey, believing, as it comforted me, so it will comfort others who sit by empty cradles, or weep in agony, as once I wept, over a new-made grave.

More than any other woman I ever knew I have craved motherhood. Have you ever read what Margaret Fuller said: "I have no child, and the woman in me has so craved this experience that it has seemed the want of it would paralyze me." I knew and understood this even as a girl, and more and more deeply as a woman, and, when my true love came, I accepted him as the father of my children no less than as my husband. In the second year of our marriage a beautiful baby-boy was born to us, and we thanked God and were glad. Then the years went by until he was in his thirteenth year and still no other came. It was the one disappointment of my married life, and, oh, how I longed and prayed for more. I have no words in which to tell of our joy when at last the promise was given and we knew we should have another child. All our hearts went out in thankfulness, and the months of waiting and preparation were a most holy time. Oh, it was so sacred, so beautiful, this working with God in creating an immortal soul! And when Baby came he "more than our hope fulfilled," for he was beautiful, oh, so beautiful in every way—the gladdest, happiest, brightest little boy, and, in a very peculiar and deep sense, he was "flesh of my flesh" and soul of my soul. He clung to me as babies seldom do even to their mothers. Before he was three days old he knew my voice and was uneasy if taken from me. His baby-heart was full of love and he learned so soon to express it. When but just past five months old he began calling "Mamma," and, oh, he grew so sweet and winsome—but with always a look on his little face that made me know he had not come to stay. I can not describe it, only it was a light, a glowing as of the soul shining through the flesh,—and he would be for hours looking up, cooing and laughing, and stretching out his little hands to some one I could not see, my baby! my baby! Yet I did not worry; I only thanked the dear Father for letting him come to me, and was happy with him every day. He was strong and well—never sick an hour until the last, when the tiny body could no longer hold the mind that grew so much too fast for it. During the eighteen days of his illness with brain fever, that look deepened and deepened until we held our breath in awe to see it. It was like nothing I ever saw in a human face before, and we shall always feel we know “what look the angels wear” from looking in our baby’s face. When the end came, it seemed as if our hearts must break. We never doubted God’s love and wisdom—we knew our baby was just the same still, but, oh, we wanted him always in our sight, and he had clung so closely to me all his little life (he was but eight months and twelve days old) that, try as I would, I could not make myself feel he could be happy away from me. It seemed to me he must want me just as he did before, just as I wanted him, and that hurt me so; always I could see the little hands stretching out for me, and hear the baby-voice calling pleadingly for “Mamma”—how could I bear not to answer it in the old way? I had yet to learn that, in very truth, there is no way to love—and I did learn it; for one morning, six weeks after we laid the little baby to rest, God “touched my eyes and they saw;” my baby nestled again in my bosom, my glad, happy baby, just as before, only more deeply glad and bright,—I saw him as plainly as I could see you if you came at this moment into the room; his little hands went patting, patting over my face and bosom, over his father’s face, just as before he called us by name—“Dear mamma and papa!” I cannot tell you of the sweet communion my soul held with his—he understood all my thoughts and gave instant answer to them. Do you remember what Miss Phelps says about talking in heaven and yet not knowing if she used any words? for there was no need of words when thought answered thought so surely! Just so I found it. Baby knew all and so did I.

It was my spirit-arms that held and caressed him, my spirit-life that kissed him over and over, but it was no less real than though it had been my arms and lips of flesh—it was more real, I think, for it was the real me with the touch of God upon me. He knew our need and He comforted us in this best of all ways, by showing us how truly our little one was yet with us—our own forever! It was not just for a moment. I do not know for how long, but, in the hush of the early morning, my soul met his soul with nothing between us. To my question “Baby, are you happy away from Mamma?” he answered by lifting his radiant face and letting me look long and deep into it, then nestled close down into my arms—and I knew that was still his resting place—he was not away from me—always near enough to love me—always clinging to me, mine! mine! Now I am as one who sings upon the mountain-top, and strong to carry the message of love to all who mourn. I know God is love, and what He does for us is the very best that can be done. I know, too, love can never lose its own; those who go before us are only behind the veil—not far away, unchanged in their love for us, and still needing the touch of our lives upon theirs to complete the measure of their happiness. So let us live bravely, cheerily, looking steadily upward, and the comfort shall be given according to our need. Death has no power to break these tender ties. Love’s chain is but extended, and, though the cradle may be empty, your child is still all your own, and shall still feel your tender cherishing.

Listen to the voice of God in your heart, and be led by it out of the heavy shadows into the blessed sunshine where Baby revels in a joy unknown to earth-life; and thus shall your sorrow become an “evangel of good” to all around you. F. S. K.

Isolation.

You who live in the heart of a great city can have no idea of the narrowness and the bigotry of country life, and to what great inconveniences the liberal-minded thinker is put. He has a hard time to think at all, surrounded as he is by dogmatic tendencies. If he expresses an opinion it is at once used to injure his business or profession. He is looked upon as a dangerous factor to these self-conceited dictators of personal fitness. The country liberal Christian is isolated from religious society, and from the environment of friends of like tendency. He knows no oneness of spirit, no worship at the public shrine, no spirited endeavor of richly laden movements, no one to reciprocate his feelings and desires. He is a lonely thinker; a poor secluded wanderer o’er life’s rugged plain, with few rich milestones, without the warming cadence of fellowship and companionship. His companions are his books and papers. But oftentimes he has no place in which to read and peruse them—the sanctity and the silence of home invaded, every inch of his liberty and freedom curtailed.

There are so many narrow-minded people who refuse to grant to others the same privileges they themselves enjoy, giving as a reason that they have God, truth and the Bible on their side, and that God demands sternness from them and it is well pleasing in His sight. With an impressionable nature, highly susceptible to the influences of religion, naturally a worshipper, but liberal-minded, having thrown off the shackles of credalism and dogmatism, no longer accepting the fundamental principles of Christianity, but desiring fellowship and worship, he lives a weary, sad life, lacking the enthusiasm of concerted endeavor. He can know no fulfillment of his extremely sensitive nature, no development of his religious sentiments, no uplifting. Cut off from the broad-minded, hedged in by the narrow limits of still narrower minds, eternal silence reigns in his atmosphere, everything is mute to his appeals. He can know no rapturous delight at the signs of assimilation. He is lonely in the extreme. His ideas and thoughts are so different from those of the rest of the community. They are so strange; it is a new language to most of his surroundings; there can be no reciprocity, no relating one’s self to his environment. He knows what it is to be in a strange land without shelter for his animating and predominating emotions. Profound silence reigns. You can have no idea of the bitterness and anguish of such conditions. They make life cool and sordid. He may struggle along as best he can, but his spiritual surroundings are most pitiable. There is strife and envy, contentions and quarrels, suspecting friends, meddlesome relatives, private conclaves; they look upon this person who dares think for himself as blasphemous, and something must be done to convince him of the error of his ways, even the preacher is taken into the confidence, a special sermon must be preached for his benefit. They cannot imagine that this poor, benighted soul can know any happiness or true religious emotions; that he can be otherwise than gloomy, full of doubts and fears, and most miserable. They cannot for one moment realize the depth of love, tenderness, kindness, and gentleness he is capable of reciprocating. How can a person who doubts the infallibility of the Bible, denies the miraculous conception of the Christ, live a pure, unselfish life,—is the uppermost in their minds? Morality goes for nothing in their estimation. Better be a follower of Christ, having obeyed the gospel, if you are of doubtful character, a whisky sot, etc., than be a good, pure man—moral without confessing Jesus. To hear these praters talk that the Christian, no matter how insignificant, is of more importance to the world and humanity than Prof. Wallace, Gerald Massey, Emerson, Paine, and Longfellow, is one of the sad things of this enlightened age. GOD ALL IN ALL.

The flowing soul, nor low nor high.
Is perfect here, is perfect there.
Each drop in ocean orbs the sky;
And seeing eyes make all things fair.

The evening clouds, the wayside flower,
Surpass the Andes and the rose;
And wrapped in every hasty hour
Is all the lengthened year bestows.

Therefore, erase thy false degrees;
From stock and stone strike stars and fire:

Lo, even in the "least of these"
Dwells that Lord-Christ whom ye desire.

From the Sunny South.*

Last evening Mary and I went to hear Gen. J. A. Gordon give a talk on the "Last Days of the Confederacy." I wished very much you could have heard it. It was largely reminiscent. He said the Confederacy got its death blows at Gettysburg and Vicksburg, at Appomattox and Greensburg.—Why did we invade Pennsylvania? Because we were hungry and her fields of waving grain, her stores filled with luxuries, were very inviting. We wanted our stomachs filled. Then there was a certain social reciprocity in it. We wished to return visits and we crossed the river merrily. We were going to plenty, but we recrossed with greater alacrity, for, though our reception at Gettysburg was warm, it was not encouraging. In our retreat I saw a Federal officer lying with his face turned up to the hot sun. He seemed to be dying. I stopped to give him a drink from my canteen. It was Gen. Barlow, of New York. He said: "I am paralyzed. Will you put your hand in my pocket and take out some letters?" I did so. He asked to look at the writing, then asked me to tear them up in his presence. He did not want them to fall into other hands. They were from his wife. I said, "General, I must put you in a more comfortable place," and carried him to a shady spot. He then asked me to send word to his wife, who was at Gen. Mead's headquarters. After we had retreated a little I sent a note to Mrs. Barlow by a flag of truce, saying her husband was on the field badly wounded—I did not say killed, though I was cer-

*The following extract from a private letter contains so much that will be pleasing reading to our readers that we print it, knowing that many will be glad, not only of the chief matters it contains, but also of the personal touch. Mrs. Jones and her daughter were hiding from Northern blasts at Jackson, Mississippi, when the lecture referred to was delivered. The incident referred to concerning Gen. Barlow is one of the most thrilling stories told at Gettysburg, one of the most chivalric deeds of the war.—Ed.

tain he must be dead then. Later a cousin of mine bearing the same name was killed in Georgia. Years after the war, at a dinner in Washington, I was introduced to a Gen. Barlow. I inquired whether he was any relation to the Gen. Barlow who was killed at Gettysburg. He replied, "I am the man, and are you any connection to Gen. Gordon who was on Lee's staff and afterward killed in Georgia?" I admitted I was that man, and a long, strong friendship was the result.

It was filled with anecdotes of such a nature, stories full of the humanities on both sides. He told how one night some one in the Federal lines struck up "Yankee Doodle" and it ran along the whole line. Then the Confederates took up "Dixie" and it was echoed all along. When all was still again some one took up the refrain of "Home, Sweet Home," and both armies joined in it, and then all was quiet.

He told of the trouble there was in keeping the men from holding intercourse with the opposition (he never used the word "enemy"). Finally Lee gave him orders to stop it if possible. That night he strolled along the banks of the Rapidan and saw a group of men; he went toward them, but they walked away. He called a "halt," inquired what they were doing. "Nothing." "What are you here for?" "Oh, just a little recreation, just looking around." "What is there over there in the tall grass?" "Nothing, General, really nothing." General Gordon walked over, and parting the tall grass found a naked man. He said: "I have orders to take every one found within our lines. You are my prisoner. I shall send you to Libby." Instantly the Confederates said: "You may punish us, General, but this man must go free. Our honor is at stake. We gave our word that he should go back, and he must." So the fellow swam back a good deal frightened.

He told of prayer meetings in camp and how one man entreated the Lord to "take a proper view of our side and give us the victory." He spoke of the sons of Erin, who love freedom and combat.

He paid a very high tribute to Gen. Grant. Told most feelingly of the interview between Grant and Lee. Repeated two of Lee's questions and Grant's replies. "Our swords and arms, General Grant?" "Oh, let the men keep them as souvenirs if they want them." "And our horses, General?" "Keep them to plow with." "The treaty closed, the war ended leaving no lingering bitterness," and, shaking the great flag behind him, he exclaimed: "Our patriotism purified, intensified!" He paid a glowing tribute to the flag—"our flag whose colors we have helped make brighter."

It was a talk well calculated to enlarge their horizon and lull sectional feeling.

He said that the cheerfulness and patience which the men manifested over privation was wonderful. One of the standing jokes was, "What a stringent is there that will reduce our stomachs to suit our rations?"

The whole spirit of the talk was thoroughly good, not a shadow of bitterness or overestimate of their side or belittling their adversary. I was glad I had heard it and only regretted that you and Richard could not hear it too. S. C. LI. J.

President Harper and Religion and Science.

EDITOR UNITY: In the lectures which Professor Harper is giving on "The Stories of Genesis" the old, old problem of "science and religion" is continually coming up. The statement is made that "the scientists have given up revelation." The sense in which the word "scientist" is used is one which makes the word applicable only to the student of physical things. The students of physical things were the first to attain the characteristics that make a man worthy of the name scientist. The results of the scientific investigation of physical things are trustworthy because the investigation is carried on by men who are trained into the scientific spirit. The minds of men to-day are made confident of truth by means of a knowledge that the truth has been arrived at by a scientific method. To set, then, the religionist over against the scientist is to make certain the defeat of the religionist, for a man who has not arrived at his conclusions by the scientific method, and is therefore not worthy of the title of scientist, is not competent to have an opinion. Religionists must be made scientists before the modern mind can be expected to put faith in religious teachers. The opinion of scientists in the field of physical things is worth little when given in regard to mental and spiritual things. The need is now great for men who can and will be scientists in the field of religion. Each theologian should become and always remain a scientist. The conflict must be between scientists of physical things and scientists of spiritual things. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear!"

Our Ten Greatest Contemporaries.

DEAR UNITY: Your readers once had a month's fun over a plebiscite as to the "Ten Greatest Novels." Is it time for another game of the kind? If so, possibly others may like to play it as our Emerson class did here last night. We are to read together this fall Emerson's "Representative Men." In connection with the first essay on "The Uses of Great Men," the members brought in written lists of "Our Ten Greatest Contemporaries,"—following Emerson's types as far as they go, but adding a few others, and limiting selections to Englishmen and Americans living within the last ten years: a limitation which barred out both Emerson and Darwin. Here is our result. It should be said that our class is a mixed one, mostly women, of many differing persuasions church-wise:

Greatest Philosopher.....	SPENCER Martineau, 2.	by 51 votes out of 54
Greatest Religious Leader.....	SPURGEON.	by 17 votes out of 65

The Study Table

The Son of a Prophet.*

"The Son of a Prophet" is declared by its author to be "an attempt to create the character which uttered itself in the Book of Job, and to trace certain conditions, political, intellectual and spiritual, which compelled this utterance." While we cannot fail to admire the earnestness of Mr. Jackson, nor to commend the courageous spirit with which he has persevered in his difficult undertaking, we are forced to say that he has fallen very far short of success. His efforts to portray the hero of the immortal poem will hardly satisfy those who are able to read the Book of Job intelligently; and as for the rest of mankind, the story is not sufficiently attractive to tempt them through the dreary wastes of dry learning with which the work abounds. In short, the book is neither instructive nor interesting, and the only definite result of reading it is a feeling of sadness that so much energy should be misspent and so much industry come to naught.

A work of fiction based upon Biblical events and introducing Biblical characters is a fit undertaking for the learning and talent of an Ebers; but we know of no other author alive to-day who is equal to it. Certain it is that Mr. Jackson has not mastered it. He brings to his task, it is true, a considerable knowledge of scriptural history and topography; but he is lacking in a correct understanding of the people whose national life he attempts to depict, and he fails properly to read their character or to estimate their conduct. For example, in the description of the banquet of the Israelites which was followed by the fatal after-dinner speech of Shammah, he says (p. 74): "Though the formal conference as to business had been held elsewhere, the commercial spirit was found to tinge the assembly to a degree that disappointed Shammah and Solomon. After the feasting, one and another had spoken in a tone which gave promise only of the modern Jew who controls the bourse of Europe." Our author has forgotten two important facts that he should have borne in mind, namely, first, that the "commercial spirit" of Israel did not begin to manifest itself until the reign of Solomon; and second, that the "modern Jew who controls the bourse of Europe" is largely the product of that Christian charity which banished Israel to the Ghetto, and therefore he could not have been foreshadowed in the time of David. Mr. Jackson has fallen into the error of assuming that an Israelite is, in his very essence, a tradesman. He does not recognize the application of the principle of evolution, which has determined the so-called "commercial instinct" of the Jew,—that it is only when the best merchant has the best chance of victory in the struggle for existence that the commercial spirit becomes a national trait. He appears to believe that God made the Israelite a merchant, and that he has merely lived out his destiny. Mr. Jackson furnishes another instance of his tendency to err in this regard on page 241, where little Benjamin proposes to spoil the Egyptians. The plan is shrewd enough to proceed from the offspring of a Gould, but it would hardly have emanated from the descendant of David's "mighty men."

Imagination and literary skill are essential to the construction of a good novel: and in these respects Mr. Jackson is deplorably deficient. In his eagerness to tell all that he knows, he has presented a narrative so confused and tedious that the mind of the reader is overburdened by the mere effort of intelligent perusal. The incidents are constrained and clumsy; and they are so palpably contrived with reference to their remote consequences that they fail to awaken feeling or to challenge thought. The characters are poorly drawn and crudely painted. They do not impress us as living persons, capable of thought and action, but as puppets which the author groups and postures as the exigencies of the plot may demand or his desire to thrust his learning upon our notice may suggest. The Deus ex machina is frequently invoked; and were it not that he often performs his kindly offices, the story would come to an abrupt and speedy ending. Chapter V. will be found to embody examples of these various defects; and it is open to the further criticism that it might have been wholly omitted without affecting in any manner the progress of the narrative or the development of the hero's character. It serves, however, to display the author's information concerning the worship of Baal and Astarte, and it was doubtless written for that purpose. It may be expected that after this summary of faults we shall add that of verbal inaccuracy and misuse; and not to disappoint our readers we cite the mathematical monstrosity "a conical cylinder" (page 47), where "truncated cone" was doubtless intended, and refer to the superfluous "s" in "cherubims," somewhere in the text. But these are minor errors, and could well be pardoned if the main features of the book were better wrought.

The author has injected a little of the supernatural into his tale, which materially detracts from the value of his composition. On page 82 occurs this passage: "Gad appeared before David and announced, as from the Lord, that he might choose between three dire calamities: seven years of famine, three months of flight before his enemies, or three days of pestilence."

"Let us fall into the hands of the Lord rather than of man," was the response of the humble king; and the pestilence came." As we read it this is an unequivocal statement that Shammah's plan and the king's action displeased Jehovah, and that a plague was actually sent by the Lord to punish the people for the iniquities of their leaders. We are bound therefore to regard Shammah's innovations as distasteful to Deity, and we need not marvel therefore at the many misfortunes that afterwards befell his house. But this introduction of the miraculous defeats the very purpose of the author, and interferes seriously with the correct portrayal of his hero.

We have very little sympathy with the idea that the Book of Job is the outcome of personal suffering; that the mind of its author was forged and fashioned by adversity, and that there was no broader back-ground for the composition than the trials of a single soul; nor do we agree with Mr. Jackson that the book was written during Jeroboam's reign. Upon the question of the date of the work there is considerable variety of opinion, but the best authorities, we think, assign the poem to the period of the captivity or thereafter. Certain it is that the contemplation of a nation's woes would have tended more to awaken thought upon the mystery of suffering than a series of personal calamities directly traceable to youthful enthusiasm, unrequited love and the machinations of a villain. The soul of the great poet who composed the work was stirred to its center, not by his own misery, but by the misfortunes of a people.

There is a certain analogy between the history of Job and that of the Israelites, up to the time of the captivity. Job was the servant of the Lord, as were likewise the Israelites. Job flourished and prospered, as did the Israelites. Job was deprived of his wealth and his children, but remained steadfast in his faith. The ancient Israelites, so their descendants were taught, never wavered in their allegiance to the Almighty, even when adversity overwhelmed them. Job was smitten with a foul disease; he was afflicted in his person, as the Israelites were afflicted when they became the captives of Babylon. As a matter of fact, Job's sufferings were intended to test his faith and trust in God, but he does not know it. So perhaps the Israelites were scourged to prove their loyalty to Jehovah. But the poem teaches that the motives and purposes of God are not to be questioned, nor are the means which he employs to be examined. Therefore let the stricken nation remain constant, without murmur or complaint. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," is as well suited for the consolation of a captive people as for the solace of a suffering individual. Finally, though God's purposes are not to be revealed, the Israelites may take comfort in the fact that after his sore trial Job was made whole, and his wealth was restored to him manifold. So the Israelites will be released from bondage and will re-enter upon their former positions. Viewed in this manner the Book of Job assumes grander proportions and stands in a more glorious perspective than if we regard it as the outcome of personal sorrow and misfortune. And thus we prefer to view it. L. A. E.

Science and a Future Life.*

These essays are written for the large number of men, including many of the noblest natures of our day, who have discarded "supernaturalism"; to whom the usual arguments for immortality are inconclusive; for whom human tenderness, relieving human suffering, is the only divine thing. We say farewell to our heart's beloved with anguish, pressed into the background of consciousness, as time goes on, by the duty of cheerfulness and activity we owe to others. "This world is sad enough at the best," we say, "let us not impose on others even the sight of our grief." But our pain is not lightened by any hope of future meeting, nor our remorse for sin and weakness allayed by any hope of an eternity in which to atone.

*SCIENCE AND A FUTURE LIFE, with Other Essays. By Frederic W. H. Myers. New York: Macmillan & Co., pp. 242.

Thus we welcome one to whom, like Mr. Myers, not only is the hope of man's survival after death the most momentous subject of human interest, but to whom scientific research in the domain of psychology offers positive, if as yet scanty, evidence of the reality of an unseen spiritual world.

If we survive death, then life is intelligible, then the pursuit of perfection is not a mocking ideal; "the next life, like this, will resemble wrestling rather than dancing," and will find its best delight in the possibility of progress, not attainable without effort so strenuous as may well resemble pain." But if we give up the hope of continued life, Mr. Myers believes, then pessimism is the only logical creed.

"The great majority of Continental savants and disciples of science have practically ceased to regard a future life as a possibility worth discussing. In England and America the case is different, but even here the belief in survival seems now to rest, not so much on any definite creed as on a temper of mind which in energetic Western races survives for some time the decay of definite dogma. I mean that view of the universe loosely styled optimism, but which some new term, bonism, might express with no greater barbarism in the form of the word and more accuracy in its meaning. These sanguine races, I say, still maintain their trust that the Cosmos, as a whole, is good, even when the definite beliefs on which this trust anciently rested have one by one been cut away." "One must needs feel sympathy for the various groups, semi-Christian, Theistic or Pantheistic, who are thus striving to support, on less and less substantive aliment, the spiritual life within. But, alas! no sooner have the Positivist school succeeded in reducing that aliment to a large H in Humanity—the spiritual equivalent of a straw per diem—than the optimistic temper is found to be starved out and the Western world to be gravitating toward the immemorial melancholy of the East."

Mr. Myers in another of the essays characterizes Positivism as "a religion consisting simply in the resolute maintenance of the traditional optimistic view when the supposed facts that made for optimism have all been abandoned. Never have we come nearer to the 'grin without the cat' of the popular fairy tale than in the brilliant paradoxes with which some kindly rhetorician—himself steeped in deserved prosperity—would fain persuade us that all in this sad world is well, since Auguste Comte has demonstrated that the effect of our deeds lives after us, so that what we used to call eternal death—the cessation, in point of fact, of our own existence—may just as well be considered as eternal life of a very superior description."

Mr. Myers essay on "Tennyson as Prophet" shows that the great poet had as little regard for "these blanched survivals of optimism" as he himself. "He is not afraid to set forth a naked despair as the inevitable outcome of a view of the world which omits a moral government or a human survival. A grave responsibility, which the clear-seeing poet would scarcely have undertaken, had not his own confidence in the happier interpretation been strong and assured."

Mr. Myers' own "confidence in the happier interpretation" rests, however, not on the intuitions of a poet, but upon scientific research. "The question of the survival of man is a branch of experimental Psychology." "I claim that there is, in fact, direct evidence for the exercise of some kind of influence by the surviving personalities of departed men." This evidence he finds in the actual observed phenomena of automatism, apparitions, telegraphy and the like. "I do not claim that all men ought to be convinced; but only that men whose minds are free from prepossession ought to feel that there is a case for further inquiry." This much many of Mr. Myers' readers, including myself, will grant him, and will add, that he has awakened a strong desire to know more of the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research.

It may be that we shall learn to feel that we rationalists have made a bogey of "supernaturalism" as unjustly as Voltaire made of Christianity a set of lies contrived by deliberate impostors. "Are there not seasons of spring in the spiritual world, and is this not one of them?" Have we not had in the Parliament of Religions "the exaltation which lifts into a high community: the words which stir the pulse like passion, and wet the eyes like joy, and with the impalpable breath of an inward murmur can make a sudden glory in the deep of the heart?"

Perhaps Mr. Myers indicates where we shall find scientific grounds for our spiritual faith.

The essays in this volume, except the memoir of Leopold, Duke of Albany, are really variations on the same theme,—the belief in immortality,—though they treat of Charles Darwin and Agnosticism, The Disenchantment of France, Tennyson as Prophet, Modern Poets and Cosmic Law. The essay on The Disenchantment of France is a masterly analysis of a certain temper, or distemper, of the modern mind which is found also outside of France. F. G. B.

THE BLIND AS SEEN THROUGH BLIND EYES. By Maurice de la Sizeranne. Authorized translation from the second French edition, by F. Park Lewis, M. D. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1893.

The loss of sight by accident or disease always excites the keenest sympathy among those who appreciate the blessings they enjoy in possessing a pair of serviceable eyes; and the overpowering sense of helplessness which seizes us at the very thought of the possibility of our suddenly becoming blind naturally creates a pathetic interest in those who actually suffer from this calamity. And yet, strange to say, there are but a very few who have taken the pains to realize, from direct investigation, the true condition, physical, mental and moral, of this rapidly increasing class of unfortunates. The blind of France alone number thirty-two thousand; there are two-hundred thousand in Europe, and nearly two millions throughout the globe.

In civilized countries the blind are not absolutely neglected, and their condition is neither so helpless nor so dependent as one would be disposed to imagine. They are educated; can read and write; engage in mathematical, philosophical and literary pursuits; many are proficient musicians, and the great majority are taught some trade by which they earn their own livelihood.

Who are the blind that are being educated; how they are educated; and what they are taught,—are matters very intelligently described by one of themselves in this highly interesting and suggestive book. The author, Maurice de la Sizeranne, is nobly born, and became blind when but nine years old. The work is translated from the French by Dr. F. P. Lewis, a member of the Board of Trustees of the New York Institution for the Blind. It will well repay one who is ignorant of the ways, qualifications and occupations of the blind to read this little volume of about one hundred and fifty pages.

Magazines.

THE COSMOPOLITAN for January has as one of its features, "The Young Man in Business," by Edward W. Bok, himself a very successful young man in business. While his advice is good as far as it goes, it does not seem to be of very great value, inasmuch as he has the usual blindness of the successful business man to the real source of his own success. The magazine also contains a very interesting and suggestive discussion by T. C. Crawford of the highly artistic pantomime recently produced in this country by the French company brought here by Mr. Edwin Cleary.

THE UNITARIAN for January contains the first half of Mrs. Sunderland's able and interesting address on the value of a Comparative Study of Religions, delivered before the Parliament of Religions last summer. It also contains an article by Prof. Bonet-Maury on the Stundists.

HOOD'S CALENDAR for 1894 is out. The sarsaparilla firm has become famous for the charming heads with which it has adorned its advertisements. This time it is not the usual child's face, but a charming picture of "Sweet Sixteen."

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'd Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

SUN.—The religion of Christ is a religion of motives, of purity of heart, and of humanity of purpose.

MON.—Ambition is, with some, the love of usefulness, not the love of power.

TUES.—High morality, like high art, must be always above the average reach of the great mass of men.

WED.—Self-importance in various forms is the dominant vice of the human character.

THURS.—Conscience is certainly not a separate faculty; it is an exercise of judgment.

FRI.—The prospect of an external reward is no part of any virtue either Christian or heathen.

SAT.—Religion should be practical, and faith, if it means anything, should mean good works.

Colors.

They say that the brilliant colors

We see in the evening skies,
The rich, warm glow of the ruby,
The forest's autumn dyes,
The carmine of the oak leaf.
The maple's golden hue,
The rose's blushing beauty,
The sky's celestial blue,—

The soft tints of yon painting, Wrought by a master's might,
Are but, like rainbow glories,
Reflections of the light.
To day I have been wondering
If we ourselves are, too,
Reflections of the sunlight,
God's sunlight, pure and true.

But in this land of sunshine,
Star of the western skies,
Are some who, like dull earth-clods,
Reflect no radiant dyes;
And yet, methinks, within them
Are jewels rich and bright,
Of rare and perfect luster,
If only brought to light.

And some, with frosty glitter,
Send back the brilliant light,
Like crystallized snow in winter,
Or diamonds cold and bright;
While some, like heavy storm-clouds,
Absorb each lustrous ray,
And give back no reflection,
But somber seem, and gray.

Like the iridescent opal,
Some hide in their own heart
The luster of the sunshine,
Or with a wondrous art
Send forth, in turn, each color,
Each radiant rainbow dye,
The changing leaf's rich crimson,
The azure of the sky.

Some, like the golden topaz,
Reflect with steady glow,
The light of truth and beauty,
Welcome where'er they go.
God send his glorious sunshine
Upon these hearts of ours,
That they may shine in beauty
Throughout our earthly hours!

An Oriental Story.

An Eastern king was once in need of a faithful servant and friend. He gave notice that he wanted a man to do a day's work, and two men came and asked to be employed. He engaged them both for certain fixed wages, and set them to work to fill a basket with water from a neighboring well, saying he would come in the evening and see their work. He then left them to themselves and went away.

After putting in one or two buckets, one of the men said:

"What is the good of doing this useless work? As soon as we put the water in on one side, it runs out on the other."

The other man answered:
"But we have our day's wages, haven't we? The use of the work is the master's business, not ours."

"I am not going to do such fool's work," replied the other, and, throwing down his bucket, he went away.

The other man continued his work till, about sunset, he exhausted the well. Looking down into it he saw something shining at the bottom. He let down his bucket once more and drew up a precious diamond ring.

"Now I see the use of pouring water into a basket," he exclaimed to himself. "If the bucket had brought up the ring before the well was dry, it would have been found in the basket. The labor was not useless, after all."

But he had yet to learn why the King had ordered this apparently useless task. It was to test their capacity for perfect obedience, without which no servant is reliable.

At this moment the King came up to him, and, as he bade the man keep the ring, he said:

"Thou hast been faithful in a little thing; now I see I can trust thee in great things. Henceforward thou shalt stand at my hand."

The Candle Fish.

Away off in the Pacific Ocean, lying on the western coast of British America, is Vancouver's Island. It is a bleak, cold, barren place, inhabited by Indians, who have few of the comforts and conveniences that make our homes so pleasant. But the loving All-Father, who looks with tender pity on all his creatures, has taught these poor savages to make the most of the few commodities found within their frozen domain. Their chief article of food is fish, which, during the less severe weather, abound in the bay called Nootka Sound, and are readily caught in common nets. There is one species known as the "Candle Fish," so fat that it is almost impossible either to broil or fry it, without having the whole mass converted into oil. But that is just the sort of food people need in such a climate to keep them from freezing. It is fuel taken internally—the oil consumed keeps up the combustion within, and fortifies the body against the piercing cold of those long, dreary winters.

But it is another use the natives make of these fish, that I want particularly to describe to my little readers. Just imagine one of these long, slender fish, after it has been thoroughly dried, having a wick of rush or pith run through the center, and while one end of the fish is stuck in the cleft of a billet of wood, the wick that protrudes at the other end, lighted as a candle! And thus one sees them in every house, burning steadily, till the fish is entirely consumed, giving out a clear, pleasant light, sufficient to read or sew by,—that is, if Vancouverians do such things,—at the same time rendering cheery and homelike their otherwise gloomy cabins, or "lodges," as they are called.

Regular sea-candles! are they not? Ready-made "dips," needing only a wick, for which the material is always at hand, and it can be applied in a trice, by means of a needle formed of a piece of hard wood, kept specially for "wicking" these novel candles. What a wonderful provision of nature, or of Nature's God, to meet the wants of these poor islanders! Nor can we regard as mere chance the instinct that sends annually to these cold, northern shores such myriads of little fish, too fat and oily to be eaten in milder climes, but furnishing the best sort of winter food, as well as light and heat, to the inhabitants of a bleak, frozen region, like Vancouver's Island.

During the mild weather, immense quantities of these fish are caught and laid by for winter use. A full supply of the best are first selected, and carefully packed away for food; then a goodly number are dried and "wicked" for candles; and all the rest are converted into oil by boiling and pressing. This oil is one of the table luxuries with which a native Vancouverian entertains his guests on festal occasions—a luxury, let me tell you, reader, vastly superior to ice-cream and bonbons, in a land where the frost-king reigns supreme two-thirds of the year, and stern old Boreas blows such piercing blasts as you never even dreamed of amid the warmth and cheer of your pleasant homes.

Picture: Stephen Preaching, by Fra Angelico (1387-1455).

What two classes were there of Jews and Jewish Christians? There were Palestinian Jews and Jews of the Dispersion, and the corresponding classes of Hebrew Christians and Hellenistic Christians.

According to some accounts Jesus had bidden the Apostles tarry in Jerusalem till the descent by the Holy Spirit and then go throughout all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. The Holy Spirit came on the day of Pentecost, but the Apostles showed no signs of leaving Jerusalem, nor did they go into all the world till they were shaken and driven out by persecution. As we find the church shortly after the death of Jesus it is nothing more than a Jewish sect, the one point of difference between Jews and Christians being that the former were still expecting the Messiah, while the latter believed that he had already come in the person of Jesus. The Christians went up to the temple to pray like the rest of their brethren, and their "Christianity" was only an appendage to their Judaism, mechanically added on, not a vital transformation of it. But fortunately there were two parties in the church as there were in contemporary Judaism.

For purposes of trade, and other reasons, many Jews had found homes outside of the Holy Land; we find them in the East, in Egypt, Greece, Italy, and throughout Asia Minor. These emigrant Jews are known as Jews of the Dispersion, and between them and the home-keeping Jews in Palestine there was always more or less friction. Even in Gentile communities, the Jews kept their separateness and observed the laws of Moses, but to heed or even to know the refinements of the Palestinian rabbis was obviously impracticable. Moreover those of the Dispersion were eager to commend their thought and customs to the people among whom they dwelt, and hence there was a natural reluctance to emphasize points of great difference. Besides, with all his rigidity, the Jew has shown always more plasticity than he is usually given credit for: he responds quickly and easily to a sympathetic environment, he absorbs the thought and life with which he comes in touch. Therefore not merely by necessity and accommodation, but also by sympathetic appreciation, the Jews of the Dispersion lost a great deal of the strict Palestinian rigor, and became liberal and tolerant. Now these Hellenists (as they were called) were matched by a liberal party among the home-staying Jews, but the tendency which was stronger and which ultimately prevailed was in the direction of narrowness and insistence upon trifles. The Hebrew Jews distrusted their Hellenistic brethren.

In the church there were representatives from both classes, and they brought with them their old antagonisms and suspicions. It is significant that the first dissension among the disciples in Jerusalem begins as "a murmuring by the Hellenists against the Hebrews because their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations" (Acts vi. 1). It appears that in the communistic community daily supplies were carried to those in need, and it may be that the Hebrew Christians neglected intentionally or thoughtlessly the Hellenists whom they disliked and suspected. Whether the complaints were well founded and the Hebrews were at fault, or whether the Hellenists were unduly exacting, and allowed their resentful watchfulness to exaggerate insignificant omissions, cannot be determined. In either case, the prompt action of the Apostles was eminently judicious. Calling all the disciples together they laid the case before them and counseled the election of seven men whose chief business should be to attend to this very thing. This is usually taken as a description of the rise of the diaconate in the church, although there is no hint in the narrative that it had any other design than to meet a temporary emergency. The Seven were chosen by the people and brought before the Apostles, who laid their hands upon them, not to impart the Spirit, for one of the qualifications was that the candidates should be full of the Spirit, but solely as an official recognition of their appointment by the church. The evidence is not sufficient to justify the frequent assumption that all of the Seven were Hellenists, although it is certain that Stephen and Philip were—the only two of whom we have any subsequent knowledge. The occasion of the first trouble in the church was "the daily visitation," but its real cause was the latent differences between Hebrew and Hellenistic believers.

Who were the opponents of the early church?—At first the Sadducees alone opposed the believers, but after the preaching of Stephen the Pharisees also were arrayed against them.

A key to the situation of the church in Jerusalem is the fact that the Pharisees, who in Galilee had been hostile to Jesus, appear now as the friends of his disciples in Jerusalem, while the Sadducees alone are enemies. This shows that the followers of Jesus had not apprehended clearly his real attitude toward Scribism, but were still good Pharisees in all outward observances. The Apostles were not thoughtful, logical men, but had been won to Jesus mainly by his attractive personality, and the bearing of his thought they had not seen, perhaps he himself had not seen, so clearly as the Galilean Pharisees. There was also another reason why the Pharisees were friendly and the Sadducees hostile to the new church. The staple of apostolic preaching was the resurrection of Jesus, and by proclaiming the actuality of one resurrection the Christian, were siding with the Pharisees against the Sadducees, "who say there is no resurrection." Nor was it particularly obnoxious to Pharisees that the Christians preached Jesus as the Messiah, for both Christians and Pharisees looked for the Messiah to appear immediately in glory to do the same work, only the Christians believed it would be Jesus returned, the Pharisees that it would be another coming for the first time. Hence it was the Sadducees and not the Pharisees who first made trouble for the church.

But with the preaching of Stephen the Pharisees joined the opposition. Although appointed to serve tables, Stephen did not therefore leave the word of God, but disputed in the synagogue of the Libertines, to which probably Saul also belonged. His teaching was so bold and radical that he was finally brought before the Sanhedrin on the charge of blasphemy.

What was the argument of Stephen's defense?—He showed by a rapid survey of the national history that God's revelation had not been confined to the temple or the holy land, and also that the people had been chronically unable to recognize their God-sent deliverers.

It was the proving of the latter point in a burst of indignant eloquence which brought the speech to an abrupt close, but the significance of the defense lies in the assertion of the needlessness of the temple as a means or condition of revelation. Before Abraham had even set foot in the Holy Land, while Moses was in the wilderness, each had received communications from God. Moreover, God had been most conspicuously with his people in days before the building of the temple, and, of even greater moment, the very temple itself had been condemned as the supposed abiding place of Him who dwelleth not in temples made with hands. Charged with teaching that the temple was to be destroyed and the customs of Moses changed, Stephen retorts that historically the temple had not been in existence during the days of plainest divine help and guidance, and that even Moses himself had been rejected as leader by the nation, even as Jesus had been cast out, of whom Moses had spoken aforetime.

As we read this speech, so sublime in its thought and so adroit in presentation, we feel ourselves in the presence of the same spirit that quickens the gospels. This man has laid hold upon the universal elements of the thought of Jesus, and preaches his constructive creative idea more clearly and logically than Jesus himself had done. The salvation of Christianity at that moment lay with the Hellenistic members of the Church of Jerusalem, whose spokesman Stephen was. He is one of the ignored prophets of the church, predecessor of Paul, who probably first learned from him the logical implications of the thought of Jesus.

Now, however, the word has been spoken which prophesies the escape of the church from its Jewish leading strings. Stephen alarmed the Pharisees, who joined forces with the Sadducees and began a persecution which resulted in driving out at least the Hellenistic members of the church. This is the first great crisis in ecclesiastical history, for those who were scattered abroad by reason of the persecution that arose after the death of Stephen went everywhere preaching the word. This shows that most if not all of them were Hellenists, and from the fact that the Apostles are said to have remained in Jerusalem it may be that the strict Hebrew Christians were forward in showing that they disapproved of the extreme position of Stephen and so cared. Stephen seems to have caused the final rupture between Hebrew and Hellenistic Christians: the former stayed in Jerusalem, growing ever nearer to the Pharisaic ideal, the latter went everywhere carrying a faith based upon the universal element in the mind of Jesus, which, under the inspiration and leadership of Paul, conquered the world.

Questions.

The Picture.—What two scenes in the life of Stephen are depicted? Who was Stephen? What office did he hold in the church? Who were the primitive "deacons"? Is this story intended to explain the origin of deacons?

Stephen the Hellenist.—Who were the Hellenists? "The Jews in Diaspora [the Dispersion] were real missionaries"—What effect had this upon the internal development and the outward extension of Christianity? Were there, properly speaking, any "Christians" at this time?

Stephen the Prophet.—Give a synopsis of Stephen's speech? What do you think about its authenticity? Would God have been less near to the people after the destruction of the temple than before? How does Stephen's thought stand related to that of James? of Paul? of Jesus himself?

The Hope of the Church.—What were the differences between the first disciples and their Jewish brethren? How does it happen that the Pharisees favor the church? What two parties were there in the church? In which party lay hope for the future?

Sunday School Items.

CONTRIBUTIONS FROM THE SCHOOLS.

Of course, every one knows that the income of our Sunday School Society is wholly from the contributions of schools and individuals, as we sell our publications at cost. Therefore, we hope all who have been helped by our books and lesson papers will feel like contributing what they can towards our work. The first contribution to come in, as we reported a week or two ago, was fifteen dollars from Mr. Gannett's School in Rochester. And now, the second school is the one at Hinsdale, that Mr. Gannett started five or six years ago. His schools seem to be of the right kind. The Hinsdale School sends us ten dollars. What school will be the third?

TAKE CARE OF THE PENNIES AND THE POUNDS WILL TAKE CARE OF THEMSELVES.

Our fathers used to tell us that this proverb was a wise one; and I think there is another proverb equally wise. It is this: Take care of the Sunday schools and the churches will take care of themselves. If it is n't a proverb it ought to be, for it is true, and I am sure Solomon would have put it in his list if he had known of it. If you have a vigorous, growing Sunday school you will not fail to have a strong, live church. And last Sunday I had the pleasure of seeing a Sunday school that numbered two hundred and fifty. It filled the room to the very walls on every side. The children were sitting all over the platform, too. I hardly dared to stir lest I should step on some small child. And they all listened so eagerly and looked so bright and so convinced of the truth of every word I said, that I felt that if I had to choose between the Sunday school and the church, it would be the Sunday school every time. Mr. Judy ought to tell us all the secret of his school—for it was at Davenport that I saw it. But perhaps one secret of it lies in a fact that Dr. Roundy told me about. The church started as a Sunday school twenty-five years ago. The Sunday school was well organized and flourishing before they thought of the church. They cared for the pennies and the pounds took care of themselves.

Notes from the Field

OUR readers—particularly ministers, secretaries, etc.—are requested to send us items concerning religious and social activities that come under their observation. We earnestly request that the sender reduce the necessary information to the fewest possible words and send it in the form in which he desires it to appear. Our space does not permit us to publish lengthy accounts, and so much of a miscellaneous character is sent us that we have not time to pick out the important items from masses of detail.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Beginning Jan. 14, Mr. Sunderland will give a series of six sermons on "Some of the Great Deal of the Past Year; with Lessons from their Lives," as follows: "General Armstrong and Hampton Institute; or the Educational Solution of the Negro Problem of the South." "Lucy Stone, and the New Day coming to Woman." "Gounod, the Great Musical Composer." Illustrated by Selections from his music. "Elizabeth P. Peabody, and the Modern Kindergarten Movement in Education." "Professor Tyndall, and the Relation of Science to Religion." "Edwin Booth; or Religion and the Theater." By request Mrs. Sunderland will repeat on Sunday evening, Jan. 14, the address which she gave at the World's Parliament of Religions on "The Value of a Comparative Study of Religions," and on Sunday evening, Jan. 21, her address in the Woman's Building of the World's Fair, on "The Influence of the Higher Education of Women upon Domestic Life."

Beginning with February Mr. Sunderland will exchange five Sunday evenings with Rev. Lee S. McColester, of Detroit, and Mr. McColester will repeat here a series of splendidly illustrated lectures on "The Abbeys and Cathedrals of Europe," which he has given with great success in Detroit. They are: "Kirks and Abbeys of Scotland." "Churches and Cathedrals of England." "Cathedrals of the Rhine." "Cathedrals of Florence, Milan and Venice." "Cathedrals of Pisa and Rome."

The program of the Ladies' Union till May is as follows: Jan. 24. "Unitarianism in America To-day." Mrs. Sunderland. "Sketches of recent and present Leaders." Mr. Sunderland. Feb. 7. "Rise and History of Universalism." Mrs. Barney. "Can Liberal Orthodoxy do the work of Unitarianism?" Mrs. Barney. April 18. "Unitarianism in Relation to Philosophy and Science." Mrs. Sunderland. "Unitarianism and Philanthropy." Mrs. Pettee. May 2. "Unitarianism in Literature." Dr. Lucinda M. Stone. "Duties and Responsibilities of Unitarians." Mrs. Lease.

The Students' Bible Class is devoting the year to a Comparative Study of Our Religious Denominations. The subjects (until June) are as follows: The Lutheran Church; The German and Dutch Reformed Churches; The Church of England; The Episcopal Church in America; The Presbyterian Church; The Congregational Church; The Baptist Church; The Methodist Church; The Universalist Church; The Unitarian Church; The Swedenborgian Church, or Church of the New Jerusalem; The Friends' or Quaker Church; The Moravian, Disciples and Christian Union Churches; The Adventist and Seventh Day Church; The Old Catholic Church; The Salvation Army; The Spiritualist Movement; The Theosophical Movement; The Christian Science Movement; The Ethical Culture Movement; The Future of Religious Denominations and Movements.

Sunday School meets at 12 m. in church parlors. Sewing School meets every Saturday afternoon from 2 till 4 o'clock in basement of church. Unity Club Lecture Course, as far as announced, is as follows: Jan. 22. Lecture. "A Trip through Northern Europe: Norway, Sweden and Russia." Illustrated with Lantern Views. Rev. Lee S. McColester, Detroit. Jan. 29. Musical Concert. In charge of Mr. E. N. Bilbie, Ann Arbor. Feb. 5. Lecture. Cardinal Newman. Rev. Fr. E. D. Kelly, Ann Arbor. Feb. 12. Paper. The Economic Evolution of Religious Ideas. P. of John Dewey, U. of M. Unity Club Socials will be held as follows: Jan. 15. Annual meeting, social and supper for church, Unity Club, etc. Feb. 26. Social. In charge of Misses Morley, Peckham and Childs. The King's Daughters' program is: Jan. 14. Paper. Biographical Sketch of Susan B. Anthony, and Sketch of her Work, Margaret Weideman. Feb. 11. Paper. College Settlements. Winifred Crain. That of the Young Men's Liberal Guild is: Jan. 19. Regular meeting. Feb. 16. Social of Guild and King's Daughters. Guild meetings held regularly once in four weeks, on Friday evening.

On Monday evening, Jan. 15, was held the General Annual Meeting, Social and Supper of the Church, Ladies' Union, Unity Club, Young Men's Guild, King's Daughters, Bible Class and Sunday School teachers and officers. Supper at 6 o'clock. Twenty-five cents charged for benefit of Ladies' Union. After supper, toasts, responses, music, etc. The Reading Room is well supplied with periodicals, is open on Sunday afternoons from 2 to 6, and is free to all. The Library is also free. Mr. and Mrs. Sunderland are at home to receive calls on Tuesday afternoons and evenings.

Davenport, Iowa.—The church here had a very successful fair on the 14th and 15th of December, clearing over six hundred dollars. Mr. Judy exchanged with Mr. Grumbine on a recent Sunday; and on the 14th of January he filled Mr. Learned's pulpit in St. Louis, to the acceptance of the people there. His own people, however, have no idea of giving him up, but are pushing steadily on in their efforts to raise the money to build a church worthy of this flourishing society, whose Sunday school alone numbers two hundred and fifty.

Decorah, Iowa.—Rev. B. A. Van Sluyters was ordained as minister of the Unitarian Church here on Tuesday evening, Jan 2, Mr. Judy, of Davenport, preaching the ordination sermon, and Mr. Harvey, of Des Moines, and Mr. Perkins, of Iowa City, assisting at the services. The afternoon and evening of the day following the ordination there were meetings in which the visiting clergymen took part.

Denver, Col.—A CHURCH WITHOUT A CREED.—This is the way one of our active churches seeks to lead in the way of practical efficiency:

"The First Unitarian Society" of Denver is a Church without a Creed. Its teachings are earnest and positive; but it recognizes the sanctity of individual convictions, and therefore leaves each member of its family free to formulate his own belief. It insists upon freedom in thought and in worship. It believes that rational men and women, while differing in thought, can unite in a common spirit and purpose. It believes the time has come when all earnest and thoughtful persons in this city, who have outgrown the restrictions of a creedal religion, who hold rational conceptions in ethics and in religion, and who are eager to establish better industrial, social, moral and religious conditions of life, should unite in hearty fellowship and co-operation. The purpose of this Church is, as far as possible, to bring all such persons within the shelter of a common home, which shall be a center of activities for individual culture and for public good.

This Society owns a large and substantial building in the heart of the city with rooms adapted for this work, built at a great cost of energy and money. It offers to donate this property to the honest thinkers and earnest workers of this city who are in harmony with this purpose, and who are willing to be one of a company to work for it.

Do you believe in the spirit and purpose of this Church thus defined, a Church devoted to highest thought and noblest service in this present moment of life? Will you accept this offer, become one of its family, enter into the enjoyment and use of its property, and work with it for Truth and for Humanity?

If so, please write your name and address as indicated below, and return this to the minister, N. A. Haskell, by the ushers of the church, by mail, or personally.

A noble appeal. Let other churches who seek to give homes to the homeless truthseekers try something like this. The above is printed on a slip for free distribution in the pews and elsewhere.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—Nagarkar's lectures here were a great success. In spite of the low price, we have made about two hundred dollars for the Free Kindergarten. The church was filled at each lecture by the best people of all denominations, all of whom were delighted. The advent here of this

"soul benighted" has marked quite an era.

Ithaca, N. Y.—The social given by the Unitarian and Liberal students at Barnes Hall last evening was very interesting and enjoyable. About sixty attended, among them Professor and Mrs. Oliver. It was decided to call the organization the Liberal Unity League. The next social will probably be given down town in conjunction with a Unitarian Church social. The League already has a strong membership and bids fair to become the leading society of its kind in the University.—The Cornell Daily Sun.

Milwaukee, Wis.—The Unitarian society at Milwaukee is to be congratulated upon having one of the most perfectly appointed and most beautiful churches in this country,—and that absolutely free from debt. But what is more important than the completeness of the society's material appointments, and even more important, as it seems to us, than its freedom from debt, is the fact that the society is now interesting the young, having an active, reasonably large and growing Sunday school. In their successful cultivation of this branch of church work Mr. Secrist and his wife have done and are doing a great deal for the society. Its promise is a bright one, and if in the day of its prosperity it can keep in touch with the common people its future will be a useful one.

Mukwonago, Wis.—The following item, which we take from the Liberal Co-Worker, may help to answer the question whether non-denominational Liberal church work is possible:

The Liberal Church at this place declines to be either exclusively a Universalist or a Unitarian Church: but it insists on being both. It has never cultivated any of the sectarian notions and sentiments which, by whatever name christened, ultimately narrow the sympathies and efforts of an institution. It is a truly liberal people who there greet the preacher ready for his best thought and his sincerest service for truth and righteousness. Whatever the label he wears, nobody is frightened. Is he a Universalist? All is satisfactory—if he is alive and progressive. Is he a Unitarian? All is equally satisfactory—if he is reverent and earnest. Is he an independent? It is well—if he is a thoughtful and sincere worker devoted to the moral and spiritual uplifting of mankind. The church at Mukwonago is an organized and successful fact which contradicts the claims of some that Universalists and Unitarians cannot go along together as one people peacefully and profitably. It has thus gone its way for years, and is going now. Rev. Mrs. Olympia Brown-Willis is the present minister. A Sunday-school of unusual numbers and activity is a specially interesting feature.

Moline, Ill.—The First Unitarian Society, of which Miss Hultin is minister, has gotten out a pretty and rather unique Sunday calendar, giving with each date a sentence selected from among the utterances of the Parliament of Religions,—the whole headed by three stanzas from Mr. Hosmer's Unitarian Congress hymn.

New Bedford, Mass.—A most fitting tribute to Mr. Potter comes to us from this city. By a happy chance, he who had been the light-bringer to this church for so many years preached a sermon on the "Sunshine of the Soul," only the Sunday before his sudden death. It was a beautiful picture of the light and gladness some men and women shed along their pathway—a delineation of his own life, though wholly unconscious. And the Sunday following his death Rev. Paul Frothingham, his successor, preached "In the Shadow," as he entitles it, a sermon touching with gentle and loving hands the loss they had met and reminding his people of the gentleness, simplicity, modesty and devotion to truth of "the Saint," and of his religion that was too great to be bound even by the limits of Christianity, so that "because he had so much religion, people thought he had none." And these two sermons—each of them so worthy and fitting—have been printed in a little book called Sunshine and Shadow. It is far more appropriate than lavish eulogy would have been, and is what this simple, modest man would not have objected to. It is a sunset gleam of his noble life.

Perry, Iowa.—This may still be called a missionary point, we are not yet self-sustaining. We now have our first regular minister, Rev. H. D. Stevens, formerly of Alton and Menomonic, has been here for nearly a year, with good results and increasing interest. In addition to his regular Sunday morning sermon, he has been giving Sunday evening discourses on Unitarian beliefs, the World's Parliament of Religions, Mr. Jones' new book "The Chorus of Faith," the current hard times, and other popular topics. He has just begun a series of ten sermons on evolution. The first one, delivered last Sunday evening, resulted in more than doubling our usual audience, and all were edified and pleased. Our Sunday school is held at noon, with an attendance of twenty-five to forty. An Emerson class is reading and discussing Emerson's essays. A magazine club is also to be started for the reading and discussion of the best in current literature. Mr. Stevens is also editing a half column in one of our local papers for the presentation of our views. We are also having a little course of lectures. Mr. Nagarkar was the first. We are at some disadvantage for we have to use an up-stairs hall that is used for other purposes during the week. With a church of our own much more might be accomplished.

Providence, R. I.—Bell Street Chapel: Sunday services, 3 p. m. All seats free. There will be a series of discourses upon "Human Growth," illustrated along the lines of political, racial, educational, philanthropic, scientific and religious evolution. Jan. 14, "The American Indian: His Wrongs, His Rights, and His Capabilities," Miss Alice C. Fletcher; Jan. 21, "The Education of the People," Mr. Edwin D. Mead, of Boston; Jan. 28, "Problems of Public Education," Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, of Cambridge. Friday night meetings: Jan. 12, study of George Eliot, "Romola." Papers and reading. Jan. 19, free discussion. Subject, "Ought the New Tariff Bill to Pass?" Negative. Hon. Edwin C. Pierce. Jan. 26, study of George Eliot, "Romola," Papers and reading.—Christian Register.

St. Cloud, Minn.—During the month of January Rev. C. J. Staples, of Unity Church, preaches on the following subjects: The Conquest of Self, Credulity and Incredulity, Getting Up in the World, and a Religion of Magic. That on the Conquest of Self has been printed in pamphlet form. The Emerson class meets Monday evening.

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Appropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahma leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fast-ing, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Part-ing, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon: more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation.—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

*Not to one church alone, but seven,
The voice prophetic came from heaven;
And unto each the promise came,
Diversified, but still the same:
For him that overcometh are
The new name written on the stone,
The raiment white, the crown, the throne.*
—Longfellow.

IN Kindly Light for Jan. 21 Rev. J. M. Scott has published his address entitled "How to Destroy the Tyranny of Party," a practical discourse on proportional representation. It would be well if our ministers more generally engaged in such practical studies in social science.

THE necessity which makes gregarious the lower animal makes social the higher. It is a law of the universe. The strongest no more than the weakest can reach their higher possibilities unless they recognize the fact that they cannot stand alone. If the pinch of these hard times will help enforce this lesson it will not be wholly a calamity.

UNITY goes into some four thousand homes and into the hands of at last twice as many individuals every week. Will not the members of this large parish warm their hearts with the thought of this subtle comradeship and renew their zeal in the support of this their silent pastor, and increase UNITY's efficiency, making it more and more a missionary of the coming church, a weekly tract in the interests of the gospel, of culture and of character, a preacher of the religion of humanity?

LET no one look upon this movement, felt in many quarters, towards the Free Church of universal religion, as an escape out of difficulties. He who is tired of the struggle of thought and the expense of co-operative work in the interest of things spiritual must not face in this direction, for he would be in the wrong line. He had better go over into Camp Conventional. He must worship at the Shrine Traditional. It is easier, safer, cheaper there. Here the demand is not only for money but for lives; not dollars but human blood, given freely for truth's sake. But such sacrifices carry with them inspiration, joy.

KEEP your eye on our club list and premium list. We are continually making better offers, and if your favorite magazine was not there last week it may be next. If we have omitted a magazine that you would like to club with, send word to us, or, better, to the magazine, and a clubbing arrangement may be effected. The paper edition of The Chorus of Faith offered as a premium is almost exhausted, and it is doubtful whether any more will be bound in that form, and if another paper edition is issued the price may be raised, as it is now too low. The book has met with an enthusiastic reception, and if you want to get a cheap edition it will be well for you to embrace our offer at once.

MANY years ago some professors of Andover sent a letter of inquiry to Prof. Ward, the great collector of specimens and maker of natural history cabinets for colleges, museums etc., asking him how much it would cost to secure a collection of natural history specimens that would "disprove the doctrine of evolution." The reply must have been an interesting one, for the only way such a collection could be made possible would be by reconstructing the universe and changing the way things have come to be. Such a task none but the habitues of a theological school would undertake, and even there the habit of constructing a theory and then fitting the universe into it is becoming less and less popular.

ALL SOULS CHURCH of Chicago started with the purpose of taking care of fifty families that were under the strain of the unemployed. For this purpose they selected a territory some three miles away from their own, rented a basement, and employed a superintendent. A part of their supplies come from the Central Bureau, some from donations from friends in the neighborhood, much of it from sources unexpected. Some friends from out of the city have taken this means of securing a distribution of their bounty where there will be the minimum liability of misapplied charity. All cases are investigated. Dr. Helen A. Heath, the superintendent in charge of the work, has a corps of eighteen friendly visitors, mostly from All Souls Church. More are needed. Any assistance will be gratefully received, and the thanks of the committee are hereby tendered to the UNITY friends who have lent a hand.

MR. SHELDON, whose kindling and truthful word of his friend, John C. Learned, was published in our issue of last week, has published a pamphlet of sixty-three pages containing "Thoughts from Mr. Learned's Writings." In his prefatory word he says, "I should want to have done this just for myself, even though the 'Thoughts' were not to be published, because I loved the man; but they will give help and strength to others, so I print them." "Are they good?" we asked of John Chadwick. "No," he said, "they are great; some of them sublime." The pamphlet is neatly printed and can be obtained through this office for ten cents. We know of one church that ordered a hundred and then offered them for sale at the church-door book-table, and the little book has gone into many families in that parish. It is a book that will give "daily strength for daily needs," yield high pulpit readings and make life better. From it we would like often to make quotations for these columns, and we may from time to time invite our dear old friend still to continue to contribute to our editorial columns. Our readers will gladly recognize his right to the editorial "L," which was his favorite sign, when appended to editorial notes which we may take from this source.

THE latest discussions among evolutionists that gather around the theories of Weisman give new emphasis at least to the value of spiritual environment. If acquired aptitudes are not transmissible through internal organisms, they are through external influence. And these are not limited by and perhaps are not chiefly from physical surroundings. The most potent environments that shape the destiny of a child are its immaterial ones. The pictures on the wall challenged the picture-making power in the artist's soul of the youth. How much of this there is in every life! More than we can ever estimate. Every noble biography is a blast of a bugle summoning young men and women to similar nobleness. Every noble deed is a challenge to selfishness. The final word expressed or unexpressed in every good Samaritan's tale is, "Go thou and do likewise." The Arabic proverb, "A fig-tree looking upon figs becometh fruitful," suggests truth of the higher environment too often overlooked. In our catalogue of forces the influence upon character of the permanent surroundings is great. The environment of hills, valleys and rivers, the influence of climate and altitude has something to do. But more than that is the influence upon the inner life of the man you once saw, the speech that was once heard, the book you chanced to read, the woman that once smiled upon you, the man whose lips once touched yours. Thus the responsibility of life is retained, and the cumulative value of character is proven whichever theory obtains. Let the teacher, the preacher, the worker in school and church take warning, and take heart and tend all the more to the high business in hand.

Pulpit Scriptures.

The church we dream of towards which these days are making important contributions, we have thought would have a new article of furniture, an essential, an inspiring equipment, novel in its character. The pulpit of such a church will be backed with a fitting book-case which will contain a noble collection of the available Scripture of the world; a library made up of the holy Bibles of the race, those inspired words of seers, saints and sages that have proven their soul-sustaining power, the accents of the Holy Ghost which the heedless world would not permit to be lost. In that book-case we would have the sacred books of the East as edited by Max Mueller and others of our own priceless Scriptures in their most approved and available form, the anthologies of prose and poetry from modern writers, Bible passages from Carlyle and Emerson, Goethe, Victor Hugo, Shakspeare, and George Eliot. In that anthology we would also have gleanings

"From the humbler poets
Whose songs have gushed from hearts
As showers from the clouds of summer,
Or tears from the eyelids start."

For it has often been proved by those who have dared to try such scripture on Sunday morning that—

"Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care;
And come like the benediction
That follows after prayer."

Such a book-case would be a rich treasury from which pastor and people would draw inspiration and guidance through the seven days of the week's study and toil. It would of itself become a sacred symbol that would suggest the noblest thoughts and awaken the broadest sympathy a human soul is capable of. Whoever would look intelligently upon those silent shelves bearing their choice burden, the limited but universal library of the soul, would find an uplift of heart like that which the true devotee feels when the host is elevated by priestly hands at the altar of the Catholic church. The divine would become visible. Holiness would once more be incarnated, and Emanuel, "God with us," be again manifested. In such a collection of holy Scripture we can see a choice and favorite volume, small but priceless, of selections from George Eliot, Emerson, Browning, and other masterful writers of modern English, which the loving care of some high copartners in the Unity Club work through a succession of years may select. When such a selection is made, and indeed many partial attempts in this direction have already been published, notably the search of the Rochester Unity Club last year for high Emerson sayings, and the publishing of the same, it will be found, I think, that these prophets of the nineteenth century have unwittingly won a place among the oracles of the most high. They are in the line of the deathless prophets, evangelists of the universal gospel because their souls were rooted in the Eternal goodness. Their hearts were stayed in the universal love. Their minds were enamored of the ethical unity that runs through all systems and binds all souls in one. It is not, then, as literature or as art that our Unity Clubs study these classics of the new day, but as Scripture that will interpret life, as something that will chasten ambitions, refine tastes, curb vaulting pride, reconcile to obscurity and to drudgery and rekindle youth's passion for the ideal.

And this suggestion of a Sacred Book Shelf turns out like many other apparent innovations, but a return to a venerable custom, an ancient thought. It is but an enlargement of the cabinet in which the sacred scrolls are kept in every Jewish synagogue. This is the truth that made sacred the "Ark of the Covenant," the place wherein was kept the Tables of the Law. Let the old sanctities be brought down to date. Then the Sunday readings of the minister will become indeed a ministry to souls. From such oracles will come the sentiments that will soothe and inspire, strengthen and restrain, chasten and sanctify.

Survival of the Unfittest.

In a recent issue of the Junior Golden Rule, the organ of the Junior Society of Christian Endeavor, is a little story, entitled "Are You as Thoughtful?" which is exceedingly choice reading in this latter end of the nineteenth century.

The mamma of two little girls had placed a box of candy on the table, saying, "You may each have one, no more;" but one of the little girls was soon found to have taken two candies. The mother talked to them so solemnly "that both little faces were wet with tears, and there was great sorrow." The story goes on to say: "In the evening, after tea, the good little twin was missed, and a search revealed her in a room all alone, crying bitterly. What do you think she was crying about? She said it was 'because she was afraid her dear little twin sister would n't go to heaven, because she took the candy that was n't hers.'" And the writer asks if the children "do not think she was a dear little Christian." If we grant that the baby was a little Christian, what can we say of the mother who had so slandered our dear Father in heaven that her innocent baby girl was crushed with sorrow for fear he would exclude her wee bit of a sister from heaven for taking one more candy than she had been permitted to have? What shall we say of the religious teachers of the mother, who was evidently but a little older child, who had taught her that God was such a monster? Perhaps they too were sincere, and were but a grade above the mother in intellect. What then shall we say of the so-called Church of God that teaches this horrible theology, and makes women and children all their lifetime subject to bondage through the fear of death? If there is any language strong enough to characterize it, I should be glad to be instructed in it, for with my present vocabulary I am powerless to express my feelings.

I do not care so much for the teaching applied to adults, but my whole soul rises up against embittering the few happy years of childhood with such defamatory views of God.

"I know this is unpopular; I know 'T is blasphemous; I know one may be damned

For hoping no one else may e'er be so," as poor Byron said so long ago, but I am forced to protest when the toddling infants are terrorized, even by model Sunday-school papers.

Men and Things

THE Chattanooga News remarks: "Rev. George Stewart, who said in a sermon at Chattanooga, recently that he would rather own stock in hell than in a theater, explains that hell is divinely appointed for the punishment of the wicked and is therefore a benevolent institution." Many of us, in our journey through this vale of tears, have at times been impressed with the necessity of a hell (for the other fellow), but its benevolent features have never occurred to us. Levy aside, Mr. Stewart's remark is rather coarse, and, in any but a man of his cloth, would be considered profane. Isn't there such a thing as pulpit profanity, anyhow? Preachers who stand in the pulpit and use such language should be repudiated. They are utterly unworthy of attention. They may make the unthinking laugh, but make the judicious grieve. —Exchange.

IN a guide book which has been printed abroad for the use of British tourists in the United States there is this advice:

The first requisite for the enjoyment of a tour in the United States is an absence of prejudice and a willingness to accommodate one's self to the customs of the country. The traveler should at the outset become reconciled to the absence of so witty on the part of those he considers his social inferiors, and if ready himself to be courteous, on a footing of equality, he will seldom meet any real impoliteness.

This is acceptable praise of the manners and customs of the Americans. The show of servility is as offensive to good taste as that of arrogance, and both of these unmanly traits are far too largely manifested in England. Both of them are despicable. We uphold that American manhood in which there are independence, dignity and respect for human nature. —New York Sun.

The Old Meeting House.

Still stands the ancient meeting house
Upon the village green,
And white above the circling trees
The belfry tower is seen.

Uncolored through the simple panes
The common sunlight pours,
No Gothic arches spring above
The latched and painted door.

There thresholds witness to the tread
Of feet long since at rest
In yonder fields of moss-grown slates,
With Bible texts impressed.

No more at rise and set of sun
Is heard the numbered toll
That spoke to all the country round
The passing of a soul:

Yet still with every new-born week,
Across the meadows fair
And over all the upland farms,
Sounds the old call to prayer.

I walked again the village street,
By absence made more dear,
That summer Sunday held the bloom
And fragrance of the year.

I followed with the worshippers,
The ancient house within;
For me, with all I saw and heard,
Was mingled what had been.

For deeper than the sermon's thought,
Above the words of prayer,
Sweeter than hymn and organ's breath,
My soul's communion there!

For memory had new-kindled love,
And love had quickened faith;
I lived that hour within a world
That knew not change and death.

In vain the pride of ritual art,
The pomps of worship, vain;
The village meeting house may shame
The incense breathing fan!

The inward more than outward is,
The soul than any shrine,
Alone can living love and trust
The altar make divine.

Long may the ancient meeting house
Rise from the village green,
And over all the country round
Its belfried tower be seen:

Still may the call to praise and prayer
Be heard each Sunday morn,
And bind in growing faith the past
With ages yet unborn!

BELIEF IN GOD.—Every thoughtful mind believes in God, out of which belief proceeds a theology. "That man believes in a God who feels himself in the presence of a Power which is not himself and is immeasurably above himself, a power in the contemplation of which he is absorbed."

—S., in Liberal Co-Worker.

THE less religion there is in a church, the more oysters and ice cream it takes to run it.

The World.

The world is well lost when the world is wrong,
No matter how men deride you.

For if you are patient and firm and strong
You will find it in time (though the time be long)
That the world wheels round beside you.

If you dare to sail first o'er a new-thought track,

For awhile it will scourge and scold you;
Then, coming abreast with a skillful tack,
It will clasp your hand and slap your back,
And vow it was there before you.

Ay, many an error the old world makes,
And many a sleepy blunder;
But ever and always at last it wakes,
With pitiless scorn for another's misdeeds,
And the fools who have followed go under.

The world means well, though it wander and stray

From the straight, short cut to duty;
So go ahead in that path, I say,
For after a while it will come your way
Bringing its pleasure and beauty.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

The Union of Liberal Religious Forces.

The Chicago Herald for Wednesday, Jan. 24th, gives three columns and a half, under the heading, "One Church for All," to the movement for a larger religious fellowship. On the first page it tells of the meeting held in the Art Institute last August in response to the invitations of Drs. Thomas, Hirsch, Crowe, and the editor of UNITY, to discuss the possibilities of united action by liberal religious and ethical societies, sets forth a few from among the hundred and odd favorable replies received to this proposition from liberal leaders throughout the United States, and mentions the appointment by the Art Institute Conference of a committee, including the gentlemen named above, Dr. Rexford, of Boston; Dr. Cave, of St. Louis; the late John C. Learned, and others, to formulate plans and call a meeting this spring. The article then goes on to outline the movement in a general way, and to report interviews with some of the prominent Chicago ministers interested in the plan. It says:

It was agreed that existing relations should not be disturbed. . . . It is not proposed that a revolution should at once be instituted, each one of the conference remaining loyal to his own denomination, but it was urged that where there were not enough of one kind of liberal religionists all the liberals should unite and found the sort of church outlined. The pastors of the old churches will be organizers of the new, and it is believed that in time the churches now established will become members of the new organization. . . . It was agreed among those at the conference that when it was learned that in a town or small city where there are not enough of one kind of liberals to form a church the promoters of the new church representing all the elements of liberalism should go into that town, unite all the elements, and organize one of the churches of the new sort. It is believed that the kind of liberality and the purposes represented in their constitution will appeal to all the liberals and their co-operation can easily be secured.

Dr. H. W. Thomas was interviewed, and is reported to have said:

The purpose of the plan is not to antagonize any denomination or sect. I have nothing to say against any of the existing churches. They are all doing what they can. But they are all denominational and require that all their members subscribe to a creed. The natural result is that they have become expensive and fashionable and, possibly unconsciously, have grown away from the people. They have become clubs and have afforded society for young people. This is all well enough and I have no fault to find with that. But, on the other hand, here are the two liberal churches, the Unitarian and the Universalist, each one carrying a creed. This branding the church limits it. These two churches appeal to the people whose liberality is exactly alike. I have for a long time felt that the field is not fully occupied and it is to fill this field that this movement is started. One-half the people don't go to church and this half is the liberal half.

The old religions have produced a race of doubters. Orthodoxy has failed to answer the questions of science. In this it has received its death blow. No one believes the old stories of Adam and Eve and of the rib, and on this the doctrines of the old theology rest. To answer these questions and to fill this field there is room for a great American church that will be so broad as to include everyone. We want no more denominations; there are too many now. There are enough roads we hope will lead to the same place, but if we could have a union of all these liberal elements it would, to say the least, be a great economy.

The longer I live the less I feel like disturbing anyone, and if anyone has a religion I would be the last to attack it. But there is great danger in the religious world, danger that comes through indifference. I think there is room for a church such as has been proposed in our discussion in every town of over 5,000 inhabitants in the Northwest. I have great hopes of success. I believe like Harriet Beecher Stowe, that "what ought to be will be."

Dr. Hirsch, of Sinai Congregation, The Reform Advocate, and the University of Chicago, is reported as follows:

The theory of bringing all liberal churches together meets my hearty approbation, but sometimes I fear that an effort to put it into practice will end only in a dream. I am associated with a number of well-known ministers in a work that we believe will bear good fruit. Dr. Jones invited me to participate in the movement, and probably he ought to explain its purposes. However, I have no objection to telling what we hope to do. The furtherance of liberal religious views is our first object, and naturally we will endeavor to help the liberal churches in small cities and in towns. Now you probably know that in many small places liberal church people have a hard time getting along. There may be half a dozen or more of these progressive church organizations in one town, all struggling to get on their feet, but neither of them strong enough to stand. There will be Universalists, Unitarians, liberal Jews and perhaps several other societies, all working earnestly, but not together. Now, those are the places where we expect to do a great deal of good. We will bring all those liberal-minded church workers under one roof, if possible, and send missionaries to preach to them if they cannot agree on a union preacher. I think we will do great good in such small cities, for small congregations are apt to get discouraged.

Now, in a large place like Chicago the conditions are different. Here the progressive churches are strong and few of them need such help as we will extend to the smaller societies, but, nevertheless, there is work to be done here, and important work it is. We hope to band all the liberal churches together as one great society which shall be a powerful factor in the community. The different denominational churches have such organizations, and why should not we? This central society, and I call it that because there is no intention, as far as I know, of giving it a distinctive church name, is the one that will give assistance to weak congregations in small cities and towns. Here in Chicago it will be an association of all the progressive churches, and when that association speaks it will be a power.

Now I believe there is one other object in view. We hope ultimately to establish a chair of religion in Chicago University, where the good things we all advocate may be taught to the students of that institution. I understand that a paper will be issued for circulation among the members of all our churches, and that the leading ministers associated with us will contribute to it regularly.

It is not the intention to break up any established congregations; certainly my own will not be disturbed. We will go on just as we are, only the churches that become members of the progressive society will work together to help weaker congregations, and endeavor to make ourselves a greater force for good in this community.

The Rev. James Vila Blake and the editor of UNITY were also interviewed. The former said: "I hope this dream will be realized. At least, the discussion will be a great benefit for the liberal churches. If it is successful it will be in the big what my church is in the small."

Space forbids us to quote the article in full, and we will conclude with the words of Professor Swing, as given by the reporter:

I would say that the movement is a worthy one. The men said to be connected with it guarantee that. Any movement headed by such men as Jones, Thomas, Hirsch and Mangasarian will be for good. The basis of all religion, of all churches, is righteousness and benevolence—that is, right living for one's self and right doing to others. Any organization formed by these men will teach those two cardinal principles. Such an organization of liberal churches as this will be of much service in a direct way to men who feel like withdrawing from the orthodox churches and do not know just what to do,—just where a liberal preacher is wanted.

No, there is little probability of my becoming connected with this movement. By taking care of myself I am able to do my Central Music Hall work, but I have no time to do anything else. That is the reason I have never met with these gentlemen before. But I believe they will do much good.

We believe that those of our readers who believe in the largest fellowship, will find much encouragement in the words of these religious leaders and in the fact that a great paper like the Chicago Herald, which takes pains to keep in touch with the thought of the day, should give its first page, and so much space to the discussion of this movement. The world is nearer ready for catholic religious fellowship than we dream.

The Sea Island Folk.

We quote the following extracts from letters of Miss Eden Murray, published from time to time in the First Parish Recorder, of Milton, Mass. Miss Murray has been living on St. Helena Island since 1852, and so knows these poor people very thoroughly and can set forth their life and their wants as few could. We trust that these bits of description will be interesting to our readers, some of whom have already contributed to supply the needs of these unfortunate. They still need help, and whatever may be contributed will be gladly received and forwarded by Mr. Gannett. (Address: W. C. Gannett, 15 Sibley Place, Rochester, N. Y.)

If you prefer to send down material, "Yankee beans," that means the ordinary white bean, would be a boon, as the people want very much to plant them in March. They would then be ripe about the middle or last part of May, sooner than any other crop can come in. It speaks well for the people that their principal anxiety is for next year's harvest. Every fiber of sweet potato is carefully preserved, every cotton-seed that the storm has spared picked and hoarded; and I am oftener asked for "rutabaga" seed than for food.

The mothers of families are only too thankful to get pieces.

* * *

The letter with the twenty-five dollars inclosed arrived safely to-day, and on Monday one poor woman, who with a gang of children has been living in a tent, will be able to begin her house. It will be only six feet by twelve in size, but it will be a warm shelter, and they will put up a mud chimney and be able to have a fire. I know of at least four families more who will be thankful for the help your kind gift will bring.

All our Northern friends are very good, so "feeling for us," the people say. The rations are getting short. "Not to say we satisfy by the rations; but then we ain't hollow, only seven head of children eat so much when no corn is in the house." They used to be proud of their crowds of sturdy youngsters, but that was when potato-hills were full and corn-heaps high.

We have adopted a suggestion of Miss Barton that the women, now so many are sewing for them, should sew for others; and, as we had had some material sent us, I proposed that they should meet on Wednesday of each week and sew, without pay of course.

I knew they would do it, but I did not expect that every woman would crave it as a boon, and feel hurt and aggrieved if not called upon.

* * *

I do not know whether you have heard of their custom of sleeping in a part of their clothes with an old dress on, kept to the purpose. When they hurried out in the night, they had on these dresses, and saved nothing else,—that is, those whose houses went down. That is why there is such a need of clothing. Had it been in the day-time, there would have been much more clothing saved.

The money sent has been a great comfort. To-day, for instance, it is pouring and blowing furiously, and as many as twenty mothers walked, some two, some four, and some even six miles, to get two quarts of hominy to give their children to-night and to-morrow. The rations are hoped for on Monday. It is such a comfort not to have to refuse them that I believe I am quite as grateful for Northern help as they are.

* * *

We hear many stories of distress, and I usually come down in the morning to find the porch full of applicants,—some for a dollar's worth of lumber to finish boarding up their houses, some for a day's work at fifty cents, some for a blanket for those who are families without one, some for food, too thankful for a quart or two of the monotonous "grits." There is scarcely any work, scarce any more, scarcely any provision among our six thousand people. I tell you that some had saved is almost gone. They depend more and more on the provisions that the Red Cross can afford to give: that is, one peck of grits and half a pound of salt pork weekly for a family of seven. Of course, this does not feed them; and what can we do but supplement it? If we could say, "Go to work"; but there is no work to be done. I only hope that there will be seed provided for the desolated fields. There are scarcely any sweet potatoes left to start the crop.

Substitution vs. Prohibition.

The New York City Vigilance League, of which Dr. Chas. H. Parkhurst is President, is about to open "C. V. L. Saloon, No. 1," of which the following description is given in the Voice:

"The 'C. V. L. Saloon, No. 1,' says The City Vigilant, the organ of the League, "will consist of a coffee-room and lunch counter. There will be a reading-room, supplied with the trades journals and papers which workingmen will care to read. There will also be a sales department for coal, wood, coffee, tea, and potatoes, at a fair price. It is a well-known fact that the poor pay most exorbitantly for these commodities when bought—as they almost always are—in small quantities; hence, the first object will be to offer the means of obtaining the prime necessities of life, food and shelter. The secondary object is the Tee-To-Tum idea."

It is proposed to make a social center for the neighborhood indicated. Some 62,000 people will be within the reach of its influences. All the rooms in the two upper stories are to be fitted up for lodging-rooms or to be rented to self-supporting workingmen. It is believed that within a year the project can be made to pay its own expenses.

The Untroubled Waters.

Among the low green foot-hills lies the quiet pool.

The great trees bend protectingly above it and shield it from the sun. The green grasses creep about its margin, and look into the clear waters that bathe their roots. Lilies lie motionless on its surface like white-sailed boats at rest. The soaring height is mirrored in its calm depths.

It is cool here. The sun's rays, softened by the foliage, fall in bright flecks and glints on the grassy banks, and the breath of the mountains is in the air. But down in the valley the books are dry, the breezes faint on the burning air, the foliage droops and withers under the fierce rays of the sun; neither shadow nor coolness is in the valley.

Does the tranquil pool know about the burning valley? Yes, the birds flying past have told the story of its suffering. The breezes returning exhausted to the mountain home have sighed as they repeated the tale.

But the pool is dreaming among its hills. The lilies float upon its surface like beautiful images from the dream. The shadow of the dragon fly skimming over its wave is not lighter than its fancies, yet they hold it like chains of ice. It will not waken though the birds sing and the height frowns upon it.

Will not the height send a wind to stir its waters to their depths and rouse it from its dreams? Sometime. But the pool grows daily more stagnant and its waters lose their power to refresh. If the wind come not soon it will come in vain.

The wind waits and the pool dreams.

The Study Table

Bradford's Pilgrim in Old England.*

This well-written and attractive book is in the form of eight lectures which were given at Andover Theological Seminary, and these facts indicate its religious spirit, which is broad Congregationalism, its literary excellence, which is brevity and brightness of statement, and also its limitations, which are the broken lines and detached views inevitable in the lecture. The title is more felicitous than exact. It is not exclusively of "Old England" that the author writes, while the largest part of the book is devoted rather to recent Congregationalism on British soil than to the Separatists of Pilgrim days.

A better title would have been, "The Congregationalists of To-day," for six of the eight lectures are chiefly or wholly devoted to recent times; and while the English brethren are more particularly described, still the American wing of the church is not neglected. And right here is the chief value of the book. It describes sympathetically, and with interesting details, the problem, the condition and the outlook of that form of non-conformity known as Congregationalism. Its greatest interest to the American lies here. In these pages, the preacher, the church life, the religious ideal of the communion of English Christians, are clearly portrayed. The second lecture traces briefly the rise and character of the Brownists or Separatists,—in itself an interesting sketch,—but no attempt is made toward original scholarship or fresh views. The more recent writers, such as Stoughton, Dexter, Dale and Fairbairn, are frequently, many will think too voluminously, quoted.

A rationalist in religion finds great pleasure in Dr. Bradford's attitude toward creed subscription. He rightly holds, as against the eminent Dr. Dexter, that the early New England churches were based on a covenant rather than bound by a creed; while his sympathies are decidedly with Dr. Calkins in his protest against the use of creeds as conditions of church membership. And to strengthen his position he appeals to the customs of the English churches, which have never used creeds as tests of fellowship and yet have maintained their evangelical character. These are his words:

The Congregational churches of England make no doctrinal test, but assume that those who they have reason to believe are honest will not seek church membership unless they are Christians. A majority of the Congregational churches in the United States require assent to doctrinal symbols from those wishing to enter their membership. The reason for the usage in the American churches is not difficult to find. The custom appeared soon after the beginning of the present century,—about the time of the Unitarian controversy. Originally no doctrinal tests were required in New England.

In this connection we may illustrate Dr. Bradford's real breadth and catholicity, and the tendency of the age as well, by another significant quotation from these pages:

In the old day the duty of man to man, and of brotherhood as founded on Fatherhood, had no place in the creeds, but if confessions were now written the doctrine of human brotherhood would have a conspicuous place.

Indeed, these words, and similar words by Edward Caird, in his great work on "The Evolution of Religion," are bright prophecies making glad the heart of every one who puts fraternity of spirit above orthodoxy of opinion.

This is, withal, a fresh, earnest, catholic volume, not free from slips in scholarship or the partiality of the advocate, but a manly and vigorous book, well worth reading, especially by those who wish to comprehend the present religious situation,—the forces and factors which constitute the spiritual evolution now in progress. THE SPIRITUAL LIFE: STUDIES OF DEVOTION AND WORSHIP. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1893. Cloth, 8vo, pp. 198.

In a series of six chapters, Howard N. Brown, Lewis G. Wilson, Francis Tiffany, Charles F. Dole, F. B. Hornbrooke and G. W. Cooke present phases of the spiritual life in the early church, Germany, Spain, the modern church, England and America. The purpose of the book is not critical or, primarily, to instruct, but to stimulate devotional thought. Incidentally also it reveals the one faith underlying many forms. All of the essays are good and quickening. A quotation from Mr. Tiffany's article will give the flavor of the book and indicate the use it is intended to serve.

And now, friends, suffer me in conclusion to say that I believe a great deal of Mystic reading, even of such ecstatic books as the Autobiography of St. Theresa, would prove an invaluable blessing to us cold New-Englanders. Inestimable spiritual realities underlie its wildest extravagances. We import into our frigid region the oranges and bananas of more tropical climes and they do our bodies good. Would it not do our souls equal good to import into them the tropical fruits and flowers of a more passionate, soul-inflaming type of piety? I know all about St. Theresa's extremes. We should guard ourselves against them. But I know equally all about our New England extremes; our restless weasel activities; our craze to be eternally running about doing good by imparting nothing; our devouring surface sense of the inestimable value to others of repose, literature, art, science, while, unhappily, never having a moment at our own disposal to taste and see how good they are ourselves; and I am sure all these extremes breed no end of shallowness, weariness of mind, and—nervous prostration. If we could only learn to make such devout use of New England's chief product—this same nervous prostration—as St. Theresa did, what a boon it might prove to us, and still more to our families and friends. [p. 96.]

I am sure Mr. Tiffany will accept an amendment and agree that the West can far surpass New England in its "chief product" and that Chicago is as good a market as Boston for tropical fruits. W. W. F.

ROMANCE OF THE INSECT WORLD. By L. N. Badenoch. With illustrations by Margaret J. Badenoch and others. New York and London: Macmillan & Co. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. 1893. Cloth and gold, gilt top, 8vo, pp. 341. $1.25.—One of the most intensely interesting books in the line of Natural Science with which it has been my good fortune to meet is the "Romance of the Insect World." The name is indeed well chosen. Every paragraph is brim full of the marvels of that world of tiny lives, the insect world, and the whole reads like one long romance. One is sorry when the end is reached.

Apart from the profound research on the part of the writer which the work exhibits, there is shown a quality rarely united, to any great extent, with the above,—namely, the ability to select from the vast array of facts at the author's command and to arrange in such manner as to keep the groundwork thoroughly scientific and yet avoid the tediousness of bare facts. This ability is shown in a marked degree. A wide-awake child would devour the work with avidity; every paragraph is a fairy-tale. The scientific mind would read and be filled anew with the spirit of reverence.

The book fills a need. One such book, read with open eyes, would do more for a child's mental growth than all the geography, so-called, of an ordinary school course. I speak of the book with reference to children more especially, because so little is done, even now, to open the little ones' eyes to the natural wonders about them, and they grow up, as we have done, with organs well nigh atrophied from lack of use. Childhood is, above all times, the time for the cultivation of the faculty of observation; and to what better use can this power be put than to the study of the perfect adaptation of ways and means in the lives of the creatures about them? It Pays.

It pays to read the papers, especially your own family paper, for often in this way good business opportunities are brought to your attention. For instance, B. F. Johnson & Co., of Richmond, Va., are now advertising, offering paying positions to parties who engage with them, devoting all or any part of their time to their business interests. It might pay you to write to them.

Church-Door Pulpit

Jesus and His Teaching.

A SERMON PREACHED AT DECORAH, IA., BY B. A. VAN SLUYTERS.

And one of the scribes came . . . and asked him. What commandment is the first of all? Jesus answered, "The first is, Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. The second is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—Mark xii. 29-31.

We assume that in Luke x. the same incident is described, where Jesus, upon receiving the answer, says to the questioner: "This do, and thou shalt live." The story is also told in Matthew xxii., where it appears that the lawyer did not put the question to learn anything of Jesus, but to find out whether he was versed in the law, as he went about teaching the people. From the questioning we may infer that Jesus has not had regular training under the supervision of the rabbis, i. e., we should say, Jesus was a self-educated man. Then, as now, those who have had a regular course in any school disparage and mistrust somewhat the knowledge of persons who have not had such opportunities. Thus the lawyer, being, perhaps, a graduate, to use a modern phrase, directed the question to test the knowledge of Jesus in the Scripture.

Jesus, by this time, had attracted the attention of the public, also the attention of the scribe, lawyers and priests. No man could safely teach in public unless he had sufficient knowledge of the law and the prophets. If a teacher could not pass examination (to modernize this much abused testing of one's knowledge) he was forbidden by public opinion to assume the dignity of the rabbinical office. If Jesus could not answer this test-question, directed perhaps with the intention to silence him, he would be seized as a false prophet and misleader of the people. Thus the motive that gave rise to the question was not the highest, although the lawyer may have thought that it was for the welfare of the people if this false teacher could be prevented from preaching any more of his heretical doctrines. The interpretation of the law by Jesus did not always coincide with the teachings of the scribes and the lawyers. Jesus even went so far, when he had occasion, as to denounce the lawyers, the appointed interpreters of the law. It is easy for us now to imagine the feeling of this lawyer toward Jesus, and knowing his disposition we can judge of the motive that led him to question Jesus.

It may be that he had also the desire to argue with Jesus about an important point. The lawyers enjoyed a good dispute; among themselves they would raise questions and discuss them pro and con, especially questions concerning the interpretation of the law. Different rabbis gave various interpretations, and the minor lights would shine with the light of the chosen leader. It may be that the lawyer was interested to know which leader was followed by Jesus. Little did he think that Jesus was his own master and needed not to follow anyone or anything else than his own inner light and wisdom.

It is singular that Jesus never refers to anyone as his leader. He does not profess to be a disciple of anybody. In an age when discipleship was rife, when everybody took sides on questions of importance or of no importance, it made little difference to Jesus; he stood aloof, joined no school of philosophers, no class of rabbis, but he put himself above them all, i. e., he judged them all, because he trusted his own higher self. That higher self was so sensitive to truth and right that he used it as an infallible guide. If a doctrine found no response in his own inner self he rejected it or deemed it of little importance. And any doctrine is of little importance to us if it does not find a response in our higher nature. Jesus says to his followers. Why judge ye not for yourselves? Let your inner light, your conscience and reason shine upon the various teachings of all these schools of thought and judge for yourself. Jesus never asked of truth, who said it or when was it spoken. No, he asked himself, is it true, does it correspond to my higher self? Truth was his authority, truth as it was reflected in his own soul. He never accepted any authority for truth but his own inner self. His nature was so pure and true that he could thus rely on its efficient recognition of truth whenever truth was presented to it. No person can be a full light unto himself until he is sufficiently developed to have the light shine within him, he must have sufficient courage to carry this light with him wherever he may go. I believe that everybody is capable of developing his nature to such sensitiveness that he can recognize truth instinctively as Jesus could. We should help one another in the cultivation of this truth-seeing power of the soul. Many of us have it developed in various degrees; in some it works very actively and spontaneously, while in others it is sluggish and lethargic. We can best develop it by use. Use it always, bring this power into activity every minute of our lives. In fact, it is our duty to do that. Do not let others judge truth for us, our own souls must be developed to fill that office. As the talent for music can be cultivated and developed in us, so this inner light can be made to shine clearer and to shine steadily.

Jesus shows by his answer that he is acquainted with the law, and I suppose the lawyer was surprised to hear such an answer. But he had the magnanimity of soul to acknowledge that the answer is a correct one. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, thy soul, strength and mind, and thy neighbor as thyself. The lawyer must have been astonished to hear Jesus say, This do. That was not the point at issue evidently. The lawyer perhaps thought it was nice enough as a matter of discussion, but to do that was something new. Jesus tells him he is not far from the kingdom of heaven because he knows the way that leads to it; he has to walk the way, however, before he can reach the heavenly dominions. To know is not sufficient, one had to do. It is not sufficient to know that we ought to love God and our fellow-men, we should put this knowledge into practice, transform it into life, have knowing become doing.

We can see that Jesus puts his whole soul into the answer. He does not quote Scripture only, but he gives language to his inner nature. He feels that love to God and love to man is his religion. Love is the key to the soul and the key-note of the Christian hymn.

It has been affirmed again and again that the teaching of Jesus is nothing new, and hardly an improvement upon what existed already in the world. Many of his expressions in which he gave utterance to his deeper feelings may be found in the rules of life of Roman, Greek, Parsee, and Chinese. Jesus quoted many fine passages from the Old Testament. The text of the morning, as quoted by Jesus, may be found, the first part in Deuteronomy (vi. 4, 5), and the other portion in Leviticus (xix. 18). But that is not derogatory to the religion of Jesus, rather it enhances its real value. It shows that he appreciated the good that already had found its way to the people. It showed again that what ancient sages and saints had said of truth found an echo in his own heart; he was truly in touch with humanity, and the same higher principles that ruled the lives of good men that were before him were found in his own soul. It showed that he received and made use of truth wherever he found it. It made little difference to him who had taught it. The only question was, is it related to man's higher nature. This was his test. But many, not understanding the deep and high humanity of Jesus, think to discredit his teaching by showing that he was simply a repeater of ancient truths. They forget that truth is always one, and that if Jesus taught truth it has to be at one with the highest teaching of other teachers of men. They cannot deny upon reflection that Jesus put new life and spirit into many so-called old truths. In their old form they had failed to take hold of the life of the people. He fired those old truths with a pure humanity after having rescued them from the dungeon of sophism and dogma.

It is surprising that truth, when it comes into the world before the world is ready to receive and to assimilate that particular truth, will be put into swaddling clothes, so to speak, to keep it from getting contaminated. But truth, if it is to be a power, needs to be free as the wind, the atmosphere of life should touch it if it shall influence life. If truth is put into swaddling clothes it cannot grow, but becomes dwarfed and perverted. The old Egyptians put the bodies of the dead into linen and buried them where little, if any, air could reach them. These bodies thus preserved are being discovered to-day, and we look upon the mummy as a curiosity. So truth has been preserved very often. Misguided people thought it had to be embalmed and wrapped up in formula and creed. By this process truth turned into a mummy, the life went out of it, and now, being shriveled and dwarfed, it can serve only as a curiosity to us and to coming generations. The reformers of the sixteenth century found many truths that had been transformed into mummies. To-day we find such mummies, and many people worship them. In the time of Jesus many such mummies were kept to inspire the people with awe and reverence. Blind leaders blinded the people, and blind people can be made to believe almost anything if they are also stupid. Jesus saw that many truths had been maltreated, had been stifled to death under a load of hair-splitting interpretations, and had been wound in the linens of ignorance and of prejudice. He threw away the incubrances and called the truths again to life. Thus resuscitated and kindled by his own inner life, he cast them as so many fire-brands among the people, where they began to kindle many hearts and to enlighten many dark minds. But more than that, he brought them before the world embodied in his own life and work. It is not so much his teaching as the power and influence of his immense personality that was the cause of the rapid spreading of Christianity. Abstract truth, theory, can be understood by the few trained minds only, but when theory becomes practice, when truth becomes flesh, then even the simplest mind can understand something of its marvellous beauty and stands in awe and reverence before the word that has become flesh.

That is the reason why Jesus has had so great an influence upon the lives of many men and women. Many a man whom religion could as yet not touch has bowed down admiringly before this pure life lived among the hills of Galilee.

The personality of Jesus did so fire the hearts and minds of the early Christian centuries that men were led to delfy him. They thought that a life so pure could not be lived in an age so corrupt: none but a god could live such a life. Little did they dream that that life is real humanity, and that we all have to strive to live the life of pure humanity. We cannot live the life of pure humanity until we have suppressed the brute in us, by casting out the tiger and the bear, and the fox and the swine that usurp the place of the man within us.

The ancient truths found in the life of Jesus their ordeal. His life was their test. Could they be lived in daily life, were they practicable, do they answer to the deepest instincts and the highest aspirations of man? Such questions are answered by the life of Jesus, by the life of pure humanity. By "pure humanity" I mean the constant triumph of the higher over the lower in man.

What was then the secret of Jesus' life? What is the fundamental element of pure humanity? How could Jesus fire these cold truths of old, and find a deep response in the hearts of other men and women? It was because he possessed a heart of a true man. The blood in the heart of a true man is love, love the life-giver and the life-sustainer of pure humanity. He loved his fellow men. Love was the tie that bound him to men and women far below him. He loved the sinner, went about doing good, and prayed for his enemies, while they put him ignominiously to death. Whence this power? Truly, it has been a mystery to many, and they have solved it only by saying that he must have been a god, because perhaps they did not sufficiently understand the love of pure humanity.

None of us embodies pure humanity, so few of us can understand all that pertains to that humanity, even its love. Not understanding such a life, many others think it incredulous and regard the life of Jesus as a beautiful myth. We can understand only what finds a response in our own hearts. A heart without music cannot understand or appreciate music. Paul says the carnal man cannot understand the spiritual man. So impure humanity cannot fully comprehend pure humanity. We can judge only the plane on which we live. Thus many not understanding the life of Jesus have called him either a god or a myth. According as we attain to pure humanity can we understand the life of Jesus. His was a life of love. Love was his strength, —his faith in man, even in the deepest fallen; it was his hope and striving after perfection. I say striving after perfection, for I regard it as an open question whether or not Jesus was perfect. If we cannot comprehend his love, how can we judge whether it is perfect or not? None of us knows fully what pure humanity is in its reality, none of us having experienced as yet that ideal state; so we are debarred from judging it. Moreover, if we study the records of Jesus' life closely, we shall find progress in his thought, which resulted from the expansion of his heart and mind in proportion as he grew older and came into contact with other people. This could not be if he were already perfect; the conclusion follows that he was not as yet perfect. And I personally like it better. I like to see him struggle onward and upward. It seems to bring him nearer to us, blood and flesh as we are blood and flesh. It subjects him to the same temptations, to the same vicissitudes of life. His overcoming them gives us courage and shows us that we also may overcome them. The story of the temptation reveals to us the fact that he could be tempted, and the agony in the garden teaches us of the struggle of the flesh against the spirit. But pure humanity was victorious. The battle between the animal and the man was fierce, the love of self and the love for fellow men were in deadly struggle, but the superior in worth proved the superior in strength. The man subdued the animal and the love for fellow men overcame the love of self. Pure humanity was saved and strengthened thereby.

Is it a wonder that many honor his words and reverence his life and almost worship his name? Is it marvellous that his life and death console many troubled hearts? Is it surprising that a great number of men and women regard him as the example? It may be that others have lived a life equal to his in heroism, self-denial and virtue, but it is certain that none among Christians has attained to the influence which streams continually from the life and words of Jesus. We should not worship him. God only is to be worshipped, and the Lord our God is one God, says Jesus. Many have fallen into the mistake of worshipping pure humanity, perhaps because Deity found as yet no response in their hearts. Man must worship something; if Deity seems too far removed from impure humanity, the next best thing to worship is pure humanity.

We should strive to attain to pure humanity and Jesus can be our guide. He need not be our only guide. Many others have lived nobly and died nobly. The army of noble martyrs, saints and heroes is large. They all may be so many examples to nobler living. But they got their incentive from Jesus, and we can go to him directly just as well. He teaches us to follow our inner light, let us follow it. He taught us to love our fellow men, let us try to love them. His life speaks to us of upward striving, let us strive after all that is true, pure and beautiful. He teaches us that we can overcome temptations by being true to our higher nature. Let us try to be true to ourselves and it must follow as the night the day, as Shakspeare says, we cannot then be false to any man.

We should thank God that such a personality as Jesus has influenced the course of events. The religion of love to God and love to man received impetus from him. The Reformers were kindled by his fire and we to-day enter into their labors and reap some of the harvest.

The life of Jesus shows us that his teachings may be at least partially embodied in actual life. He did not teach some impracticable theory. He makes it clear that his teachings were meant to become real life. His public life began with a beatitude and ended by a prayer for those who could not understand him and thus put him to death. Love was the motive power of Jesus' life. "He did for his enemies what many would not have done for friends." Well might the officer, when he saw Jesus dying on the cross, cry out: "Truly he is a son of God." Pure humanity is the son of God, is born of God. According as a man's life is inspired by pure love is he a true son of God. We are all sons and daughters of God, but only love can make us realize it. We do not realize this relationship. We speak of it and admire it as a doctrine, but very few know by experience what it really means. According as we have love in our hearts can we realize our relationship, and are we a revelation of God in the flesh.

God is Truth and Love and Righteousness; the more we embody these in our lives the more does God become incarnate in us, and if these are fully realized within us then we can say as Jesus said: "I and the Father are one." One in truth, one in love, one in righteousness, one in will. This, then, is our aim, to reach pure humanity. We should make the word of God flesh, have truth, love, purity, righteousness born into us, embody them in our lives, and we become like God, at one with Him. This is the true atonement, i. e., at-one-ment. One in will and in spirit. The human must become divine, and the divine must become human.

The abyss which exists in many hearts between God and man should be bridged, and love is the bridge. That is the reason why the religion of love is the highest religion possible. It unites man with man and man with God. This makes the religion of Jesus a universal religion. Its elements are found more or less expressed and defined in every other religion. The religion of love is for all tongues and people. It makes no difference to what race a man belongs or what name he gives to his religion. Jew or Christian, Buddhist or Brahmin, Mohammedan or Parsee, love God and thy neighbor as thyself and you fulfill the religion of love. Love should be the foundation upon which to build our religion. If we love God we shall love our fellow men. It is impossible to love him without loving our fellow men,—they are his image and are called with the same calling wherewith we have been called. To despise any of them is to despise God. The writer of the first epistle of John tells us: "If anyone says, I love God, and he hateth his brother, he is a liar." Strong language, but it is true. We should love God through our fellow men and our fellow men through God. In this ethics and religion become one.

EDITOR UNITY: In a recent issue of their paper the editors of the Outlook assert that a Presbyterian minister who believes in the theory of evolution, without "using it for attack upon the standards of the church," is not necessarily in danger of a charge of heresy; and that a Presbyterian layman who holds rationalistic views on miracles, etc., runs small risk of discipline. I hope for the honor of humanity that they are right, and that no case will ever arise to confute them. The dividing line between human beings and mere animals is but ill defined; but if there is any faculty that distinguishes us from brutes, it is that of reasoning. It is gratifying to know that a Presbyterian may, under certain conditions, be a man, without incurring the displeasure of his spiritual superiors. That assurance is fraught with great hopes for the future of our race.

I should like to submit a few inquiries to those who are learned in Presbyterian Church law. First, what is heresy? Second, may a man who "holds views" without proclaiming them be a heretic? Third, can a man be guilty of heresy without having been adjudged a heretic? Fourth, which is worse in the sight of God, heresy or dishonesty? Fifth, which is of more importance to man, the maintenance of church standards or the demonstration and publication of truth? If the worthy editors of the Outlook will enlighten me I shall be grateful.

Chicago. LEVI A. ELIEL.

[We fear that our correspondent will not find very many among our readers "who are learned in Presbyterian Church law," but perhaps the Outlook itself may answer him.—ED.]

The Prayer of Trust.

DEAR UNITY: Speaking of prayers for our little ones,—I am sure that Unitarians desire not only to be reverent themselves but to inculcate this spirit in their children. Unless a child is very wisely trained from his earliest ability to grasp an idea of spiritual things he will, as the unseen and the unknowable dawn upon him, be possessed by a spirit of fear. From this source spring most of the prayers of our children. "Save us," "Take care of us," "Forgive us (lest something befall us)," and so forth.

I had long been troubled as to any proper form for my children to use to express the right attitude towards the author of their being, and, not wishing mere lip service and vain repetition, had abstained from teaching them any words of prayer, but had tucked them in their little beds always with some assurance that no harm could ever come to them from the love and justice that rules the universe.

But once a little daughter came home from the Sunday school with this verse, "I will lay me down in peace and sleep, for thou alone, oh Lord, makest me to dwell in safety." There, thought I, is a prayer for my children. And it is a comfort to hear this same little girl repeat these words, but always adding in "perfect" safety, and to see her sweet smile of assurance as she sinks to rest. For this child is by nature very timid and dependent, and it has been a pleasure to see her faith grow that no real evil can come to what is right and true, and that even death, so horrible to the young, is but a change from one part of the Father's kingdom to another.

Blessings on the Unitarian Sunday school where a solid superstructure is reared in the minds of youth, and all the building upon it is such that it need never be torn down, and even the changes knowledge and time may make necessary can easily be engrafted upon the noble foundation.

Keep Trying.

If boys should get discouraged
At lessons or at work,
And say, "The e's no use trying,"
And all hard tasks should shirk,
And keep on shirking, shirking,
Till the boy become a man,
I wonder what the world would do
To carry out its plan?

The coward in the conflict
Gives up at first defeat;
If once repulsed, his courage
Lies shattered at his feet,
The brave heart wins the battle,
Because, through thick and thin,
He'll not give up as conquered,
He fights, and fights to win.

So, boys, don't get disheartened
Because at first you fail;
If you but keep on trying
At last you will prevail.
Be stubborn against failure,
Try and try again;
The boys who keep on trying,
Have made the world's best men.

About the Snow.

To the unobserving the fall of snow is a very commonplace affair, offering no food for thought.

The housekeeper dreads it; and thinks impatiently of the piazzas that are to be swept, the paths that are to be cleared and the amount of extra sweeping about the premises that every snowfall brings. Only the little street-sweeper in the great cities can see treasures in the snow.

But throughout tradition and literature are numberless proverbs which show the blessings of snow, and the wise farmer has long ago learned to expect full harvests from the ground which has been well blanketed in the season when all vegetation should be at rest. "For if the grass grow in Janiveer, it grows the worse for all the year," says an old proverb.

Scientific research has taught us that vegetation does not suffer so much from long-continued colds as from these open winters where there are many changes from thawing to freezing.

It is not from the cold that we protect our plants with straw so much as from the dangers of a warm season, which starts the sap to running and the plant to growing, only to cut it short by another frost. From a hygienic point of view, the blessing of a heavy snowfall was long ago recognized in the homely proverb which says that "A green Christmas makes a fat churchyard."

This has also been verified by science.
Frost and snow are Nature's own disinfectants. So long as the waste of summer remains seething in the sun, so long may we expect the miasmatic diseases of fall, and not until a generous snowfall covers the earth are all sources of danger safely buried to form the fertilizers of another season's vegetation. It is almost impossible to realize that snow is a very warm covering. The little rabbit in the woods makes his burrows deep down in the drifts, and like the Laplander in the Arctic regions creates warm and comfortable dwellings from it. The gray squirrel of our native woods is alive and frolicsome with the first snowfall, though he hides in his nest when the chill, sharp winds of winter are blowing.
In spite of all that so many naturalists have claimed, classing him among our hibernating animals, those who have known him in his woodland haunts year in and year out can testify that there is no creature who so enjoys a frolic in the snow in midwinter. He makes burrows in it, peering up like a prairie dog every now and then to see what is going on outside, and he manages to dig up his own treasure of nuts out of the frozen ground from under the snow.

Under the microscope, snow crystals assume myriads of geometric forms of marvellous beauty and wonderful regularity of figure. Often the form is stellar, with angles of sixty degrees, in obedience to the law governing the crystallization of water. Yet, beginning with this simple form,
there are almost infinite variations, making the crystals of snow worthy of the life study of meteorologists.
There is a pretty old couplet that corroborates in a popular way the blessing of snow to the farmer's fields:

Under the water, dearth.
Under the snow, bread.

No "Yard."

A country boy finds it hard to understand how a family can live without any "front yard," or any "back yard," or any land about the dwelling at all. To him the "yard" is more than the house.

It was there that he played in salutary dirt as a little child. There he keeps his dog, and ties up his steer-team and cleans his gun, now that he is older; and when he grows up and perhaps wanders away in the world he knows that the memory of the precious old dooryard will remain with him.

A dooryard, he would say, is a prime necessity of life.

But an official report shows that in the city of Boston there are nearly 18,000 families who have no yard at all—not a foot of ground upon which a child may sit, to say nothing of playing, on a sunny day—not even room enough upon which to stand a refuse-barrel.

The children of such yardless families must, when they go out at all, run upon the street. There numberless dangers, bodily and mortal, threaten them. Electric cars run over the little children while the mother works hard to do something to help to support them. Older children teach them to be profane and vicious. Their childish eyes are familiarized with the sight of drunkenness and crime.

For such a state of things the real-estate owners who, in their greed to obtain the largest possible return, build over every inch of ground, are in part responsible.

But all who, for reasons of mere caprice, because country ways are "slow," or for any reason except one of actual necessity, abandon the healthful country and betake themselves to the crowded city, have their share in the responsibility. If they themselves are not among the "yardless," they help to crowd others into such places. —Youth's Companion.

Lesson XXI.

THE GOSPEL AND THE GREEKS.

Acts xvii. 16-34.

*With him, with Zeus are filled
All paths we tread, and all the marts of men;
Filled, too, the sea, and every creek and bay;
And all in all things need we help of Zeus,
For we, too, are his offspring.*

Picture: Paul Preaching in Athens, by Raphael.

By whom was the Gospel carried to the Gentiles?—Chiefly by the Hellenist Christians and principally by Paul, a converted Pharisee, and his followers.

The persecution that followed the death of Stephen is a cardinal event in the history of the Christian church. Its most important results were the dispersion of the Hellenist Christians and the conversion of Paul. Emphasis must be laid again upon the fact that none of The Twelve take the initiative in missionary work outside of Jerusalem. They go out to investigate but not to evangelize. Chief among the traveling preachers was Philip, who is named next after Stephen in the list of deacons, and from whom, in his own house at Casarea, Luke gathered much of the material preserved in the third Gospel and the early chapters of Acts. Philip went first to Samaria, and after a successful mission there, which was formally approved by Peter and John, preached in the coast cities of Philistia, after converting an Ethiopian eunuch whom he met on the Gaza road. Shortly afterward, Peter took the daring step of baptizing a Roman centurion stationed at Casarea, and justified his action before the mother-church, which took it ill that a Gentile should be admitted to the church before becoming a Jew, by pleading that he had received a directing vision in Joppa and that in the house of Cornelius the Spirit had fallen upon the centurion and his friends—since baptism was the symbol of the Spirit's baptism, it was only fitting that the symbol should be administered after the occurrence of the thing symbolized. Doubt has often been expressed as to the authenticity of the Peter-Cornelius narrative, but without sufficient reason: Peter and the church may perfectly well have admitted in a particular instance what they would have objected to as a universal principle. But the man was already in prominent view who would preach openly and universally what the Jerusalem church tolerated tacitly and in particular cases—Saul, the Pharisee, foremost among the persecutors.

Of the life of Paul prior to his conversion we know very little. His father was a Pharisee who in some unknown way had obtained the privilege of Roman citizenship. Although born in Tarsus, an important commercial and intellectual center of Southern Asia Minor, Paul was "uncontaminated" by Greek influences, and at an early age was taken to Jerusalem that he might study in the school of Gamaliel. It was he who perceived more plainly than most of his contemporaries, even than the Christians themselves, the logical import of the Christian teaching. If Jesus was really the Messiah, the nation was heinously guilty before God in failing to discern its Christ, and the entire system of Phariseeism was radically untrue. For the people were seeking to fulfill the law that Messiah might come, but if Jesus was the Christ God had sent the deliverer to those who were still in their sins. While they were seeking to win his favor, he had testified that his favor was already theirs. Hence the life-word would be grace and not works of the law, belief in the constant favor (grace) of God unconditioned by strict performance of the requirements of the law. The disciples saw no reason why they could not be good Jews and good Christians at the same time, but Paul saw that the logical outcome of the preaching of Jesus as the Christ would be the destruction of Phariseeism. But if Jesus had been the Christ, God would not have allowed him to die ignominiously upon the cross. Hence "in all good conscience" Paul exerted himself to stamp out the dangerous heresy and became the leading spirit in persecution.

Yet Paul was too ardent, impulsive, emotional to be satisfied with the Phariseeism in which he outstripped his equals in age. His nature was cramped and stifled, there was no appeal to large principles, no incitement to generous ardor; the rites of Judaism could not control his passionate fervor. Characters like his, to which grandeur is so nigh and God so near, cannot be held in the leash of a "Thou shalt not." They must be sent freely afield by duty's clear "Thou must." In other words Paul needed a controlling inspiration, not restraint. The seventh of Romans shows how his nature beat against the bars of the cage in which he was held. Therefore Paul must have seen that in the belief of the Christians, if it were true, there was exactly what he needed, a freedom and enthusiasm which Phariseeism denied him. In Stephen and others whom he was foremost in persecuting, there was a peace which he had never found. Moreover, Paul was an intensely sympathetic man and the sufferings which he caused must have combined with his own inward conflict to raise the question whether after all Jesus was not the Christ. If he had really been raised from the dead as his followers claimed, then God had declared him the Messiah. Consequently for Paul everything depended upon the fact of the resurrection of Jesus. On his way to Damascus, after a toilsome journey, under the noonday glare of an Eastern sun, during which the whole question must have been agitating his mind, almost at the gate of the city, where he had planned to do deeds from which his tender spirit shrank, he had one of those visions, which seem to have occurred frequently in his career and are not unknown nowadays in men of his temperament, in which he actually saw and heard

Jesus in the glory of his risen life. Jesus had been raised from the dead, he was the Messiah, therefore Paul became a Christian. From the time of his conversion we hear very little of him till he was summoned about ten years afterward from Tarsus to Antioch to take charge of the church in the great Syrian metropolis. Under his leadership the center of activity was transferred from Jerusalem to Antioch and Christianity passed into its universal phase. The disciples were called Christians in Antioch; there they ceased to be thought of as a Jewish sect and were seen to have a distinctive life deserving a specific name.

What was the substance of Paul's preaching?—He emphasized the resurrection as proving the Messiahship of Jesus, the cross as a new means of reconciliation between God and man apart from the works of the law, the universality and sufficiency of Christianity.

(a) The Resurrection.—We have already seen why it was that the resurrection of Jesus assumed its prominent place in the teaching of Paul; without it his preaching was vain and Christianity was a wicked delusion. But because the resurrection was so important, Paul gave little or no thought to the historic Jesus and magnified instead the official Christ. His Epistles tell us nothing about the life of Jesus (except the last scenes of Passover week) and preserve few of his teachings. Wherever there was a church of Paul's founding, it was not the preacher of Nazareth but the risen Messiah that was honored. The effect of this upon the development of Christianity is patent: only recently has the real Jesus, hidden for nearly nineteen centuries, come into view.

(b) The Cross.—The disciples were forced to explain the cross; if Jesus were really the Messiah why had God suffered him to die so shamefully? Paul found his answer in the idea of sacrifice. The death of Jesus was not a purposeless incident in the career of Jesus, it was a divinely appointed sacrifice by which all who believed in Jesus were freed from the guilt of sin. So, in the hands of Paul, the death on the mount rose far above the Sermon on the Mount, and the bloody cross was exalted above the Golden Rule. Paul's thought has a legal cast; it is not vital. With him, righteousness means, ordinarily, legal acquittal by God, not, as with Jesus, purity of heart. Paul must bear most of the blame for the forensic character of Christianity. How wide and far he strayed from the simple thought of Jesus will appear if one take the trouble to read at a single sitting Romans v. 1-21 and Luke xv. 11-32.

Yet there was great virtue in this thought of Paul. For if the cross was a new means of reconciliation, then the Law had become needless; Gentiles who believed in Jesus were acquitted before God as fully as if they were Jews who had kept the whole law. The universal reach of sin was matched by the universal offer of reconciliation. As all men, being descended from Adam, were alike guilty before God because of his sin, so all men, whether Jews or Gentiles, who believed in Jesus entered a stream of righteousness and life flowing from the second Adam. It was by the thought of the cross that Paul was aided to rise above Jewish Christian particularism and become the apostle of the Gentiles.

(c) The Universality of the Gospel.—It was only natural that Paul should come into collision with the Jewish Christians, especially with James, the brother of Jesus, who became the leading man in the Jerusalem church and by his extreme devotion to the Law effectually drove out the free and large spirit of Jesus. Paul brought Christianity into the open, made it a living force in the affairs of men. But from one point of view the opponents of Paul were right. Without having its roots in Jewish righteousness, preached by a long line of noble prophets, Christianity was transformed as it came into contact with Greek and Roman thought into something marvelously unlike the ideas of Jesus. As Paul went from place to place, preaching, he imparted much but he acquired more. His preaching to the Greeks was fruitful, but their preaching to him was richer in consequences.

What was the effect upon Christian thought of Greek ideas?—When the Greek met the Gospel then came the Nicene creed.

Our picture shows us Paul preaching to the Athenians. The result of his work in what is for us, next to Jerusalem, the most notable city in the ancient world, was discouraging. Yet when the Gospel actually did come to the Greeks the result was a blending of the two streams, running one from Judea the other from Greece, which gave us the metaphysical Christianity we know so well. The Gospel converted the Greeks, but the Greeks perverted the Gospel. The method of dialectics superseded the insight of Jesus. The Pharisaism of metaphysical subtleties was as fatal as Jewish legalism to the prophetic spirit. Instead of the flower-field of Galilee the world was led to a fanciful text-book of botany.

For a discussion of the passage describing Paul's preaching in Athens reference may be made to Lesson xxv. of the Lessons on Acts, published by the Unitarian Sunday-school Society. For the Pauline transformation of Christianity see Dr. Cone's "The Gospel and its Earliest Interpretations," and for the Greek transformation, Dr. Hatch's Hibbert Lectures, 1888.

Questions.

The Picture.—How would Paul feel toward the beautiful temples and statues which he saw in Athens? Where is he preaching? Where was the sermon reported in Acts delivered?

The Apostle to the Gentiles.—What is known of the early life of Paul? By what name was he called? Where was he born? Where educated? Why did he oppose the Christians? Was he conscientious in doing so? Was it right? How was he converted? With what church is his name associated? What is the significance of the name "Christian" as applied to the disciples of Antioch?

The Gospel of Paul.—What three thoughts are prominent in Paul's preaching? Describe the worth and the danger of each. What was the reflex action of his missionary activity.

The Greek Transformation.—Is the Nicene creed Jewish or Greek? The words of Jesus have come to us only in the Greek tongue—what are the inferences from this fact? Have his thoughts come to us in a Greek dress? In what doctrine did the Greek belief in the immanence of God prevail in the church?

Sunday School Items.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

The third school to send in its contribution is the one at Geneva, which sends us five dollars. We might guess that it was a good school from its promptness, but we happen to know how excellent it is from several visits to it. But it has one advantage over most other schools. It has a working minister in it all the time. Rev. Mr. Eddowes is its superintendent, and he is one of those heretical ministers who believe that the Sunday school is the chief end of the church. He thinks the model church is one where ministers may come and go, and church services wax and wane, but where the Sunday school goes on forever and is always growing. So the school at Geneva has gone steadily on whether they had a minister or not, and often the preaching would go on without any minister. For a good Sunday school ought to produce ministers enough to run the church for a year or two at least. That is what the Geneva school has done.

THE SECOND HALF-YEAR IN OUR SIX YEARS' COURSE.

Next week's UNITY will contain the last number of Mr. Fenn's lessons on the Flowering of the Hebrew Religion. For those of our schools which are following the Six Years' Course we have arranged a series of Illustrations of Manhood and Womanhood, selected by Miss M. L. Lord from Noble Lives and Noble Deeds. That selection is as follows:

1. Self-control..... Washington
2. Honesty..... Lincoln
3. Frankness..... Luther
4. Justice..... Garrison
5. Simplicity..... Whittier
6. Courtesy..... Emerson
7. Spiritual-mindedness..... Caanning
8. Conscientiousness..... Charles Sumner
9. Obedience..... William Penn
10. Gratitude..... Theodore Parker
11. Mercy..... Dorothea Dix
12. Reverence..... Longfellow

Mr. M. M. Managasarian has kindly consented to write for the teachers some introductory hints, which will be found printed below. The set of twelve leaflets, put in a folder, containing these inspiring words, will be furnished for fifteen cents. A. W. G.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SELECTION OF NOBLE LIVES AND NOBLE DEEDS.

The Noble Lives and Noble Deeds series of lessons for use in the Sunday schools, is prepared with admirable judgment. On looking over the list of virtues I could not help thinking of the conversation reported by Plutarch between Socrates and Menon. He was asked by Socrates what virtue was; and, upon his answering quickly and glibly that virtue was "a different thing in boy and old man, and in man and woman, and in magistrate and private person, and in master and servant," said Socrates, "You were asked about one virtue, but you have raised up a whole swarm of them." We will not infer, however, as in the case of Menon, that the editors of the present series have named many because they knew not one.

The noble deed is inseparable from the noble character. "The beauty of holiness" is not visible except when it has become real in some human example. It is impossible to make any virtue completely intelligible to the child, unless we avail ourselves of an example; otherwise, as Coleridge has said, "We may as in a dream seem to know all, and then, as it were waking, find that we know nothing." It is by inspiring love for the honest, pure and brave character, that we can help the child to seek honesty and purity and courage.

The office of the teacher is to create men and women after the highest patterns which he brings to them; to help the boy and the girl to expand their best selves until they stand shoulder to shoulder with their hero and saint; to naturalize them in all the moods of the good and pure men and women; to stimulate them to seek that world of truth and beauty, the home of the men and women they admire and love.

There is a great difference between teaching and teaching. The moon gives light but not heat; a stove gives heat but not light; the sun gives both light and heat. That is the right method which, while it enlightens the mind, quickens also the conscience and the affections. The thought in the head becomes glowing, throbbing light in the heart. Religion or morality does not consist in merely teaching from a new text book, but in making all things sacred. It consists in making each step and study a developer of the mind, a key to a new power of the soul. "I make what is good pleasant to children," said the Spartan teacher. It is our fault if virtue is regarded by the child as something necessary but undesirable. The child who is forced to be good will take pleasure in being naughty. Virtue should not be presented as an unwelcome stranger whose acquaintance must be cultivated, but as a cherished, long expected angel-guest of the heart. This, however, cannot be done by any manual or text-book; only the living and loving teacher can do it.

The spiritualization of the child is the aim of moral education. To make a poet of the child, to help him idealize the real, to give him the power to see the beautiful everywhere, to help him to exclaim in the presence of the pure and high souls who have made life real and great, "Oh, how beautiful!"—is the special mission of the ethical school teacher.

Notes from the Field

Pomona, Cal.—Although no notes have been sent from here for some time, the church is neither dead nor sleeping. All its different departments are thoroughly alive. December 10 the society moved into the new church. The new building was opened with an appropriate service, the Universalists uniting with the Unitarians on the happy occasion. Addresses upon "The Signs of the Times" were made by Rev. Florence Lonsbury Pierce, Rev. Ada C. Bowles, and Rev. U. G. B. Pierce.

Long before the appointed time the church was crowded to its utmost capacity, and people stood during the entire service.

Since then the large audience called out by such subjects as "Why I Became a Unitarian," "What Is God?" "What Religion Owes to Science" (a sermon in honor of Prof. Tyndall), and "The Creed of Christ,"—show that the church was needed.

Sunday evenings at 6 Mrs. Pierce has a Young People's Study Class for the purpose of stimulating the thought of the young people upon the liberal thought. At present the class is using Savage's "Unitarian Catechism," supplemented by original questions and discussions. Much interest is manifested, and the work promises to fill a long-felt need.

The Unity Club is a source of pleasure and profit to all who attend. It is strictly a study class, the aim being to furnish food for earnest thought. No attempt is made to cater to those who will not work.

Denver, Col.—Unity Church of this city, under the leadership of its new pastor, Rev. N. A. Haskell, is alive in all that the word implies. Its Sunday School, including a class in evolution, its Unity Club, its branch of the Woman's Alliance, its Archaeological Society, its Library Circle, and its Ladies' Aid Society are all prosperous and well attended and each doing its work in its own way, thoroughly and effectively. About two months ago Mr. Haskell caused to be printed and circulated the statement and invitation recently published in UNITY. As a result many of the "unchurched" are coming in to find a home and welcome, as well as a groove in which to work within the society.

Chicago, Ills.—In the effort to make UNITY's limited space do justice to the news of the churches not quite so near home, we have quite omitted the report of the various activities centering in All Souls Church, which held its annual meeting on the 11th instant. But as the very brief and summary reports which are each year gathered together in the church annual would about fill UNITY, it is of course impossible to do justice to them here; and as a mere catalogue of the various classes, societies, charitable committees, etc., would only be an aggravation, such catalogue will not be given. Let it suffice to say that its former activities have been continued, with some modifications, and new ones have been begun. This was the writer's first experience of the pleasant home feeling one experiences in the cheerful auditorium of All Souls Church, which on occasion of the annual meeting is turned into a banquet hall, where hundreds assemble for what is one of the truest of communion services,—the annual church supper. After the meal came the reports and elections. Despite the hard times and the distractions of the World's Fair, the church appeared in excellent condition, having met its obligations and having raised a larger sum than ever before in its history. Besides the usual novel section (which is this year making a study of Middlemarch), philosophy section, Emerson section, and Browning section of the Unity Club, this so-called Lowell section has undertaken a study of the development of the Northwest. The special relief work undertaken by the church, made necessary by the unusually severe conditions of this winter, have already been alluded to in UNITY, as have also the university extension lectures on Sociology, by Head Professor Small, of the University of Chicago. S.

Englewood, Ill.—The formation of a "Boys' Brigade" is the most recent expression of the activity of the Englewood Universalist Church. It was to be organized Jan. 26.

Geneva, Ill.—This venerable church shows no signs of age in its organization. Besides its new and tasty parsonage and its Unity Club studying the newest subjects in the newest way, it has introduced the newest innovation in the way of taking up its collection. Each pew is provided with one or more tiny boxes, something like a toy bank; and into the slot the generous-hearted visitor drops his contribution without any noise or passing of ushers. The old lady who said that the passing of the contribution box was the only Christian thing about a Unitarian church, would think that this church had lost the last vestige of its claim to be called Christian. The pastor of this church, Mrs. Woolley, recently preached in Unity Church at St. Louis, giving the people there "a beautiful sermon," according to one of her hearers.

Decorah, Iowa.—Rev. R. A. Van Sluyters has been in Decorah for the past three months, and is now called for the year. He will be ordained in Unity Church Jan. 2, 1894. Christmas evening he spoke to the children of Jesus as a real child, and in the constant attention and bright faces was seen that he had won the approval of that most critical part of any church—the little children. Rev. J. B. Bidwell, who was minister of the Congregational Church in this place, thinks of withdrawing from the orthodox body and joining the Unitarians. He has been very successful in his ministry, and should he decide to cast in his lot with us we shall gain a gentleman of fine spirit and judgment, as well as a minister of established reputation. He is at present in Davenport, Iowa.

Ware, Mass.—We learn from Character, the monthly parish paper published by the Chas. A. Stevens Unity Club, that the Self-Culture Club has shown so much interest in the study of the Ethics of Citizenship as to increase the frequency of its meetings, which are now held weekly. Mr. Southworth believes strongly in a ministry of education, and in a recent sermon on "The Church a School" he gave emphatic utterance to this opinion, taking his text from Proverbs iv. 5.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Two pamphlet sermons come to us preached by Mr. Sunderland in November and December. One of them deals with "Rev. B. Fay Mills and the State University," showing strongly and clearly how un-American it is to have such meetings as he conducts held in State institutions. The other sermon is a brief account of his "Ministry of Fifteen Years in a College Town," and shows both directly and indirectly the incalculable good that is resulting from such a church in such a place, where the best young life of the country comes and goes in its annual stream. Every college town in our land ought to have such a church.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Dr. Shutter having become very much dissatisfied with the International Sunday school lessons, has begun the preparation of a series for the Church of the Redeemer, for the current year, on the Life and Teaching of Jesus. He proposes to insert an occasional special lesson on some topic of general or denominational interest. The lessons for January are published in The Church News, the monthly which he edits for the Young People's Association of his church. The titles and golden texts are as follows: The Nation's Hope. "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Micah iv. 3. The Coming of Christ. "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins."—Matt. i. 21. The Home of Jesus. "Is not this the carpenter?"—Mark vi. 3. Jesus in the Temple. "And Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man."—Luke ii. 52.

Cincinnati, O.—The series of addresses by Nagarkar of Bombay which have been given during the last four days in the Unitarian Church upon the Reading road, have called together audiences which occupied the full seating capacity of the church and have made a profound impression upon the thoughtful hearers, who represented all phases of faith—Catholic and Protestant, Jew and Christian. The speaker was a well-educated and cultivated Hindu, who had passed several of his years in schools which were under the charge of Orthodox Christians, and who, therefore, has had excellent opportunities for knowing Christian doctrine. Moreover, he is a deeply religious man, full of yearning for the coming of a better day in the popular faith, morals and social customs of India. And yet he has not joined a Christian sect, but finds in the fundamental truths of Hinduism, added to the ideas of modern science and philosophy, the body of spiritual doctrine which he and his associates believe will be the regeneration of his fatherland. Nagarkar came to the United States to represent in the Parliament of Religions a most interesting religious society, the Brahmo-Somaj, whose main ideas are those of the Unitarian Church of America. He is not a Theosophist, in the popular sense of the term, nor a Buddhist, but a rational Hindu theist.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

New York.—The Science Sermons Society, which holds its meetings at 7:30 Sunday evenings in the lecture room of the Unitarian Church, of which Rev. Robert Collyer is pastor, announces the following program for the period extending from Jan. 23 to March 4, inclusive: "Religion and Church as Necessary Social Factors," J. H. Duren Ward, B. D., Ph. D. "Locomotion, Its Modes and Significance to Life," Martin L. Holbrook, M. D. "Inebriety a Survival of the Race," T. D. Crothers, M. D. "Labor as a Factor in Evolution," David A. Gorton, M. D. "Cosmic Evolution and the Unemployed," Thaddæus B. Wake-man. "Protective Covering, Its Evolutionary History and Meaning," Mrs. Lizzie Cheney-Ward.

Tacoma, Wash.—The objects of the First Free Church of Tacoma are defined in the January bulletin to be: (1. The pursuit of truth by the method of freedom as opposed to the method of dogmatism or arbitrary authority, i. e., by the scientific method, including all its necessary results, whatever they may be; (2.) The realization both in the individual and in society of the highest moral ideal of humanity, and (3.) The universal dissemination of the spirit of justice, reverence and love. It is announced that half-hour religious services will be held every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock promptly, "to which all are invited, but attendance at these services is not made a test of fellowship." During January the discourses, delivered at 11:30, were on the subjects: "What Is Your Life?" "Our Attitude to Christianity;" "Christianity and the Religion of Jesus;" "The Religion of Jesus." Regular monthly meetings are held after the morning service the first Sunday of the month. A question box is in the vestibule, in which theological and ethical queries may be placed, to be answered from the platform the last Sunday of the month, at the close of the service. This seems to us an excellent idea. During January the Social Science Class, under the leadership of Mr. Walter J. Thompson, discussed Social Reform under the heads: I. The Theological Method; II. The Socialistic Method; III. The Scientific Method. There are also, a Pansy Club, for children under 12; a Young People's Fortnightly Club, for intellectual improvement and social intercourse; a Choir Guild, to further the musical interests of the church and for the mutual benefit of the members; a James Freeman Clarke Fraternity (chiefly literary); a Ladies' Friendly Society, for social, educational, and charitable interests; and a Post Office Mission (which would be glad to circulate UNITY and other ethical and liberal religious literature), whose secretary is Mrs. Hayden, 4810 Gove street.

THE COMMITTEE ON FELLOWSHIP OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

The Rev Walter Scott Vail, formerly of the Universalist Denomination, having sustained a thorough examination covering all points bearing upon his qualifications for the work of the Unitarian ministry; and having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship that he is in all respects worthy of their approval, is hereby commended to the fellowship of our ministers and the confidence of our church.

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,
Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix; Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation.—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

Mr. Alexander Russell Webb Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahmo leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fasting, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Parting, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

THE NEW WORLD.

A Quarterly Review of Religion, Ethics and Theology.

(200 pp., 8vo: issued the first of March, June, September, and December.)

EDITORIAL BOARD:

Professors C. C. EVERETT and C. H. TOY, of Harvard University, President ORELLO CONE, of Buchtel College, and Rev. N. P. GILMAN (the Managing Editor, to be addressed at No. 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.).

THE NEW WORLD, the one liberal theological review in America, applies to matters of religion, ethics and theology the principles of free and scientific discussion which have fully justified themselves in other quarters. The numbers already issued give proof of the fidelity and ability with which the promise of the editors has been fulfilled, to "discuss subjects lying in its important field in a liberal, constructive and progressive spirit without regard to sectarian lines." As the Christian Union, of New York, has declared, THE NEW WORLD has taken a "place at once in the front rank of periodical literature,—a place where it may be said to fill a void." It draws upon the ablest writers in Europe and America for scholarly articles of timely and permanent interest, and for thorough reviews of important books, to which a quarter part of its space is regularly devoted. Candid presentations of the great religions of the world by recognized authorities are a prominent feature, and Biblical study receives a large measure of attention. No theological periodical in the language has a stronger corps of contributors, and none is more indispensable to the liberal-minded clergy and the thoughtful laity.

Editorial

*Stronger than steel
Is the sword of the Spirit;
Sweifter than arrows
The light of the truth is;
Greater than anger
Is love, and subdueth!*

—Longfellow.

In the death of George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, journalism and American public spirit have lost a shining example.

AGAIN the horrible broken rope has appeared to make more ghastly the barbaric gallows. This time it was in Chicago, and the victim was one about whose criminality public sentiment was seriously divided. How long will the State continue to brutalize its citizens by such brutal exhibits?

WE have no regret that Corbett forgot his "dignity" in his assault on Mitchell, that he raved and danced around his victim like a mad bull, and almost ignored that delicate line prescribed by "gentlemen," and thus committed a foul. The whole business was foul. And Corbett stands out before the public in his proper character by such actions. Shame on all parties concerned! Shame for those who were trying to make this gladiatorial business respectable.

WE are in receipt of the November number of the Journal of the Maha-Bodhi Society, published in Calcutta and edited by Mr. Dhamapala, whose benignant presence at the Parliament of Religions left such a loving impression. It was evidently published before his return, but it contains extracts from American papers reporting the same and the addresses of the editor at San Francisco en route to his home. It contains matter which shows how the world is growing together, how like the best there is to the best here, and that a good thing anywhere is a good thing everywhere.

THE February number of To-Day, the attractive monthly edited and published by the Universalist brethren of Philadelphia, contains an article by Dr. Shutter on "The Poetic Elements of Jesus," in which he gives to Jesus the title of "The Divine Poet." The article indicates the growing sanity on this subject. Jesus must be interpreted by the poet and as a poet rather than by the theologian, and as a dogmatist, before he can find his true place in the history of the world and in the hearts of men. Dr. Shutter has written a book on "The Wit and Humor of the Bible." Let him give us a book on the poetry of the New Testament. Approached in this spirit what a treasure store will the book of Revelation become.

AMONG the many calendars for 1894 we have seen none we would so much like to distribute as that of the Humane Society, published in the Goddard Building, 19 Milk street, Boston. The good old family horse and the children feeding it grass is a picture from life, and the texts on the monthly pages make for the gospel of tenderness. Send for a copy, and note the items under the heading, "Murderous Millinery," "Mutilated for Life," etc., realize how much fashionable barbarity there is in the world, and do something to reduce the barbarity, strip the feathers of beautiful birds from your hats, and be ashamed to ride after a mutilated horse. A docked tail is a vulgarity. It is a violation of the moral sense.

THE last sensation in Chicago is the arraignment of Dr. Harper, President of the University of Chicago, for heresy, by Dr. Henson, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Chicago. The former is giving a series of lectures on the Genesis stories, in which, among other questionable utterances, he has compared the Cain and Abel story to the story of the wooden horse of Troy and that of Romulus and Remus at Rome. This the latter thinks poor Baptist theology, and thinks it time to call a halt. It is pitiable to see a man of Dr. Harper's position undertaking to palliate his utterances in public print in order to pacify the anxieties of a proverbial dogmatist. Dr. Harper argues that what he said is not as bad as it sounds. And there comes from other quarters the usual boast that the Baptists have no creed, and that nobody has power to declare what is orthodox or what is heterodox. And still Dr. Moxom has had to place himself among the Baptist subjects and Dr. Harper is brought to book, all of which goes to show that the theoretical and technically so-called "pure Congregationalism" does not practically obtain in the Baptist community. The popular estimate of their position and the true executive import of this body is not determined by the position of its individual churches or by its primitive records, but by the action and utterances of its later associations, publishing houses and leading men. The same is true of all the other religious bodies, Congregationalists, Universalists, and Unitarians, that boast of their congregational polity. Each of these bodies in case of distress or reproach will appeal to "pure Congregationalism" as a means of escape from responsibility, while still they proceed to work through those larger instrumentalities and confess the practical authority, in a score of practical ways, of these general conferences and associations,—although they would all be impossible under "pure Congregationalism." No body of people is more boastful of its pure Congregationalism than the Unitarians. The Christian Register in the last number has its leading editorial devoted to its favorite thesis, "Unitarian freedom." Its argument is based "on the entire and unquestioned freedom of every individual church," all of which is true. And still the organization that presumes to be the missionary arm of the Unitarian movement in America, that which shapes its policy and determines what names shall and shall not be entered into its list of ministers and of societies, is an organization which, according to its last Year Book, consists of some two hundred and seventy-two delegate societies; which, counting the full official representation of three delegates each, would give it a representative constituency of eight hundred and sixteen. But the same Year Book gives the names of about one thousand nine hundred and eighty-five life members, a membership secured by a money qualification which carries with it full voting power. When we remember that an overwhelming majority of these voting members live within a comparatively small section of the United States, some of the churches in and near Boston having a representation of from fifty upwards among this life list, and that according to the rulings of a recent

President of the A. U. A. the same person may poll his vote as a life member and a delegate member from one or more societies, it will be seen how far even the Unitarians of America, rightfully or wrongfully, have drifted from pure Congregationalism, or, rather, how dead a thing "pure Congregationalism" is in itself. There is a Baptist orthodoxy. There is a Unitarian orthodoxy, established not by the local societies, but by the national and other general organizations. These general organizations have uses, and those who serve them and are served by them should never shirk the responsibility of keeping them to their broadest and best, and not evade it under the elusive mantle of "pure Congregationalism."

Non-Theological Religion.

The Outlook for February 3 contains a timely editorial entitled "Can We Teach a Non-Theological Religion?" It is suggested by the discussion of the Bible in the public schools. To abandon all religious teachings in order to be free of theology suggests to the writer Mr. Huxley's simile, "It would be like burning a ship to get rid of the cock-roaches." The editor well says that what is true of schools is true of homes and churches. We are not among those who believe that theology is useless or necessarily an offense to the spiritual life, but we are of those who think that theology must ever be a matter of personal possession. It must be a private venture of the mind, a presumption of the intellect, a working hypothesis for the individual, if it is not to be a fetter or a pretense. But religion is a sentiment, an impulse. It is an attitude of the mind and not a conclusion, a passion for helpfulness, an appetite for co-operation. Religion in its evolution inevitably passes from a logical to an ethical basis, from a dogma to a purpose. Hence in its very nature religion is social; it is perfectly willing to recognize the unity of the spirit in the diversity of theology. So we believe not only in the possibility of a non-theological religion, but of a non-theological church, and that ten thousand people hopelessly estranged from the theological church will gladly hail the non-theological church, the home of those who lovingly differ concerning the insoluble questions of God, Incarnation, and Destiny, but who, with equal heartiness, lovingly agree in the desire to advance justice, to cultivate reverence, to increase love, and to promote righteousness in the world. To this church the great prophet souls of the race belong. To it all their great maxims and white deeds contribute. So forceful are the sentences referred to above that we allow our esteemed contemporary, The Outlook, to complete our editorial:

If Jesus Christ were the teacher of a theology, the simple fact that entirely honest disciples understand him so differently would constitute a fatal criticism of his teaching. The real explanation of these differences is not that he was obscure, or evasive, or used words with a double meaning, but that he was not teaching theology at all. He was inspiring religion, which is quite a different matter; and he inspired a religion so large, so vital, so comprehensively adapted to men of all epochs, all temperaments, and all stages of intellectual development, that it enters into and vitalizes every form of religious thought, as it does every form of religious ceremonial. Religion is the molten metal; theology is the mold into which it is run. The religion of Jesus Christ has been run into a great variety of theological molds.

This non-theological quality has characterized in all ages the highest forms of religious teaching. It is distinctive in all the best religious poetry. Charles Wesley was an Arminian, Toplady was a Calvinist; but one must go outside their familiar hymns to learn the fact. No one would guess that "Nearer, My God, to Thee" was written by a Unitarian, or "The Eternal Goodness" by a Quaker, or

"There's a wideness in God's mercy Like the wideness of the sea"

by a Roman Catholic. In the "Initiation" by Thomas a Kempis there is a mediæval flavor, but little, if any, sign of distinctive Roman Catholic theology; and as little of distinctive Anglican theology in the "Holy Living and Dying" of Jeremy Taylor. The greatest preacher of the last decade in this country was Phillips Brooks, and it was made a constant criticism of him, as it was his real glory, that one could not tell what was his theology. This was not because he was either timid or obscure, but because he was a teacher of religion, not of theology. Mr. Moody is also a great preacher, though of a widely different type; and though, doubtless, Mr. Moody's teaching is affected by his theology, he is not a teacher of theology, but a preacher of religion. His theology has to be deduced from his preaching; and if any one will take, as we have done, a volume of his sermons and attempt to deduce a comprehensive system of theology cut of them, he will find it only less difficult than to deduce such a system from Phillips Brooks' sermons or from the discourses of Jesus Christ. And when he has finished his task, the theology will be largely his own, read into the sermons, not deduced from them, still less explicitly taught by them. Most ministers have to put their religious teachings into theological forms; but that is their weakness, not their strength. And the more religious and the less theological their preaching, the more it emphasizes the spirit and the less it emphasizes the intellectual form, the more nearly it approaches the incomparable ideal which the Master has afforded.

How to inspire religion without teaching theology is another question, and to answer it requires much study, and more meditation. But that such non-theological teaching of religion is possible is demonstrated alike by the example of the greatest preachers, by the whole stream of Christian hymnody, and by the example of the Great Preacher.

Enthusiasm and Fanaticism.

Have you ever stood on a high mountain peak looking down into valleys and seen the little rivulets twine their silvery network around mount and mead? Have you ever drunk in the beauty of peaks framed by eternal ice and virgin snow? If so, you remember that in such moment, involuntarily, unconsciously, you turned around to communicate with your neighbor, if neighbor there was, to share with him your ecstasy. Even if the neighbor was a stranger to you, on those heights, under the inspiration of that moment, all conventionalities fell away, and stranger became friend at once. You communicated and intercommunicated soul's impression with soul's impression. Art to-day has caught this thought. The impressionists urge the right of art to see things as they impress the artists to be. But there is truth even in these exaggerations. Truth, vital truth, needs impressionist's communication, needs impassioned utterance, craves for fellow-men. That, the prophet feels. He does not speak as a dogmatist, but as one who has learned and wishes to teach. He is one that is thankful for information and for correction. He knows that soul needs contact with soul, as iron needs contact with iron, to be changed into keen steel. He is not satisfied with this intellectual jugglery of catching balls as they rebound, an exercise which requires merely skill and agility. He burns to teach and to learn because he knows that what he has seen is of vital importance to all humanity. Will you deny this latter proposition? The men with this proposition have made humanity. It is not the man with millions alone, it is not the man of intellectual power alone that lifts humanity upward. The millionaire is indebted to the poor thinker, and the intellectual giant is under obligations to the stupid enthusiast who goes about doing good to his fellow. What has made the strength of weak woman to face pestilence, to seek the battle-fields reeking with blood, sights from which woman would instinctively draw back? And this woman, as a mere frail woman, shrinks and draws back. But another influence urges, "go forward;" and its name is enthusiasm, its secret, love for fellow-man.

The true prophet loves mankind, and because he wishes mankind not to be yearning for flesh-pots of Egypt, but to be moving onward through hardships across the Jordan to the land of promise, he steps into the wilderness and asks that others follow him. Enthusiasm by our cynic friends is confounded with fanaticism. No one to-day wishes to be a fanatic. It seems to many of us that they lay themselves open to this impeachment if they use their influence to win preliminary, respectful hearing on the part of their own sons and daughters for their own views. Often we hear this piece of wisdom: The religious development of my children is their own care. I need not provide for the future. "Après nous le deluge!" Let the deluge come after us, is as pithy a statement of the fatal conceit as can well be imagined. "I have my own conviction; let them seek out their own also. I will not even bias them. As children I gave them birth, but when they grow up to manhood and womanhood, they may formulate their own philosophy of life; it is their own concern." Why does this man or woman so reason? Ah! they do not wish to bias their children. Unfortunately we began the execution of that wish too late; we have biased the child before it was born. Every father prejudices the child the moment he gives life to it, and so does the mother; this is the law of development. My child is my child, and ignorance, loud-mouthed, alone will overlook this eternal decree of creation. We have prejudiced our children in their passions and in their possibilities. We have hampered them by giving them face and form. You cannot begin with each generation the race anew; history works in each generation born to-day. The whole past is concentrated in the new-born babe entering this world at this moment with a protest against the rude interference with its rights, not to be prejudiced, not to be biased and not to be limited. You have biased that child by giving it, in the act of birth, a family. You have biased that child by giving it a language; sometimes it is "English as she is spoke," but it is English in this country. You give that child one nationality; you have in this limited it. All this eighteenth century twaddle or philosophy, that the man is born and then dwarfed by prejudice into member of family, nation and religion, is mere fallacy. Those that repeat this error to-day have slept for one hundred years intellectually. Now we are biased before birth; you cannot get over the fact. But in the higher things, you do not wish to bias your children in matters of religion. Our religion has been the mainstay of our years, provided it was not merely an intellectual toy. In days of sorrow it has spoken to us; when temptation allured us, it has stayed us; but you will not bias your child preliminarily to accept your maxims of life. Is that doing your duty? What, now, in religion is the prejudice that you create? It is the prejudice for the good. This religion of ours would influence us for the good, for the right: not for a dogma: not for a creed, but for duty and doing the right. Shall we in the name of liberalism be afraid of being classed among the fanatics? You will not prejudice your children in that direction, but you prejudice them in every other direction. You prejudice them—I am treading on dangerous ground now—in favor of exclusive "clubs." Father belongs to the club, mother belongs to it, and the boy must belong to it, too. In that direction you prejudice him; but you will not prejudice him in favor of belonging to a religious society. Now, if I had the choice between these two, I for my part should influence him to join a congregation.

Fanaticism is naturally distinct from true enthusiasm. Fanaticism is not the attitude of intellectualism, but it shares with it the conviction that the truth that we have is truth final. The fanatic does not desire to be corrected; truth has been revealed to him, and he is above learning anew. The fanatic and the intellectual cynic are birds of one feather. The fanatic speaks, but it is in order to domineer over men. The intellectual cynic, too, wishes to domineer; thus the fanatic occupies with him one and the same level. And finally, the fanatic would usurp a prerogative of superior enlightenment. "Forbid them!" says Joshua. The fanatic, beyond the necessity to be taught, believing the truth as he has taught it is final, would arrest all progress. No unofficial prophecy would he brook!

Enthusiasm may be likened to the breath of spring that kisses away the cold; the zephyr that after the winter has passed wafts with gentle puff over field and river. At its pleading, the prison house in which are confined the energies of nature is burst open. Out runs in gladness and new life the little rivulet, which wakes the fields as it bubbles from stone to stone in its onward course; out bursts the little flower, when the snow coverlet has been lifted, smiling and laughing its dewy tears that at last the sun has come, and flirting and toying with the soft zephyr that brought it freedom. Fanaticism may be compared to the storm of the desert, the simoom. It does not bring life; sweeping the desert and burying the unfortunate ones that cross its path, it dooms them: the simoom, hot, and dry, and barren, without pity, but with anger! Where simoom passes there stalks in its wake death; where zephyr blows, life buds up anew. Cynic intellectual indifference is the winter time; everything congealed, wasted; everything doomed; daylight curtailed, night lengthened out; cold, shivering, idle. Choose, then, which shall blow: blasts of winter, zephyrs of spring, or breath of simoom. Choose, act!

TWO SONNETS.

I.

Ah, dear old church, and art thou truly doomed?
And is the Master, God-Incarnate, too,
To fade from out our life? Can it be true
What he to-night did say? The future loomed
So grand, but, Son of God, Thou wast away,
And all my heart was sad and sorely pressed
With grief while he so earnestly confessed
His love for God and man with deep display
Of feeling. No, 'twas not that man ascends
'Gainst which I strove; 'tis that our God must yield
To theory, nor yet remain revealed Incarnate in the Christ. But love transcends
All poets' dreams or preachers' hopes, and so I'll wait in peace; God soon will let me know.

II.

Whence then the soul, the spirit, the divine,
In man? Are they too sprung from primal ooze
On ocean's brink? And must we, forsooth, choose
For parents variant likes and draw the line Against unlikes, and, speculating still,
Give our rash sense for order and for law
Of all God's world? What man indeed e'er saw
The building of the deeps? And whose the will
With love that fashioned all? What preacher, pray,
Has counseled with the Universe's Lord
And heard, " 'Twas thus and thus," and brought us word Straight from God's lips? Despite what men may say,
The final judgment only will be given
When God and man stand face to face in Heaven.

TWO SONNETS.

[In reply to Rev. E. J. V. Huiginn.]

I.

And is the church then "doomed" when larger light
Comes to the world from out God's loving heart?
I see it grow, and play a larger part
In human life, grown gladder at the sight!

And is God less "incarnate" when the bright

Sweet glory of the blessed Nazarene Spreads till mankind the Son of God is seen

Each, from the lowest, climbing toward the height.

Our God incarnate in the Christ remains;

But shall our Father limit to one stream

The life and truth and grace which from Him flow?

I see His light o'er all earth's hills and plains;

For Evolution is God's day, whose gleam

From twilight darkness to midday shall glow!

II.

"Whence then the soul?" The soul is all the way,—

God in the fire-mist and the ocean slime

Upon the shores of prehistoric time,
Guiding the climbing life no power could slay

Because the giant forces must obey
His present working. Till, when strikes the hour,

The life divine in mankind comes to flower,

And bended knees confess religion's sway.

How know we this? 'Tis God's own hand hath writ

The record of His working age by age,

And we, with reverent lips, the record read.

Shall guesses of earth's ignorant childhood sit

In judgment on God's own rock-written page?

Let man mistake, but God is truth indeed!

The St. Louis Working Girls' Free Library Association.

"Believing in the common sisterhood of all women, and that the unfortunate are entitled to the sympathy and service of the fortunate, this institution is established for the benefit of the young breadwinners of this city, especially for girls in factories whose social and educational advantages are small." So runs the opening sentence of its first printed report.

The idea of such an institution, originated in a circumstance so small, it is hardly worthy of recording except that it led to a greater. Carrying a basket of sweet, fresh flowers from a railway station to a church in a fashionable part of the city, the writer passed a great bagging mill just as the girls came trooping out after the day's work was over. They looked with longing eyes at her flowers. A group of them scurried up a side street and waylaid her with a mild "hold up." "Will you give us some flowers, please?" they asked eagerly. It did not require much time to conclude that the church decoration would go on just as well without the flowers. These girls would certainly appreciate them more than children who have them often. Besides, are we not ever giving to "him who hath." Looking into the earnest brown eyes, and blue, of those large Bohemian girls, and giving each a cluster of the fragrant blossoms, the thought fell like a benediction: Why not look into those eyes often and establish closer relation with them; be a "sister" with our orlers? They are, or were, so little known and know so little. This seemed Sunday school work without Sunday school limitations. These foreign girls had their own religious convictions and practices and did not need the writer's. But they did need kind instruction It should be given. But how? Having neither time, money nor talent to speak of, it seemed impossible to realize the idea. But the seed-thought germinated for a year, then grew. In 1886 the Board of Public Schools granted permission that one room in the Clinton School be used for a free evening school for girls employed during the day. The girls from one factory were invited. Thirty-four came the first night. They were not ideal girls, but were very real, and very earnest.

A course of study in a lecture form had been adopted as best suited to the needs of those who were so weary that the wonder was that they came at all. A bare minimum of them attend the public evening schools, four or five in a room full of sixty boys. One evening in each week, Monday, was devoted to lecture; health, dress, good deportment, food, books, etc., were discussed. Wednesdays, lessons in reading, spelling, practice with numbers in United States money, writing letters, geography and history combined, etc. On Friday nights sewing simple garments; and darning and mending were taught, with friendly suggestions as to mending and wearing whole clothes, etc., also, as to comfortable, durable garments.

A few books carried the first night became the nucleus of the first free library in St. Louis. Several large libraries there were with small fees, and several collections free, but with limitations as to membership. No unconditional offer of library privileges, that I know of, existed previously.

A small fund of a thousand dollars was furnished at the end of three years by ten benevolent gentlemen, by which it was possible to hire a house. Trusting to future assistance the present accommodations were secured at 1510 Lafayette avenue. During the entire seven years there have been three regular meetings each week from October to May, besides each Sunday, for distribution of books, and frequent summer meetings, varying numbers from ten to one hundred, the limit of accommodation, attending. Four thousand assemblies of young women, with always one or more leaders and teachers present, have occurred.

All idea of charity was carefully eliminated. These girls seemed entitled to all the opportunities offered without fee or special thanks. The institution was never called a "charity," though conducted by unpaid teachers. No salaries have ever been given except to a resident librarian, and that only a small sum.

Considering the monotony and routine which attends life passed between the factory and the tenement, and which partly explains some of the excesses shown by statistics (See Carroll D. Wright in the Report of the Labor Bureau for 1888), it was determined to throw into these lives as much of wholesome pleasure as possible, and perhaps thereby raise the standard of what constitutes pleasure. Frequent social meetings were held, games of various sorts introduced. A piano was secured, which has furnished unflinching pleasure; a monthly concert determined upon, kept up now nearly five years, with seventy-five or one hundred each meeting, giving a total of near ten thousand listeners in all. Such programs were provided on these occasions as would be offered to cultured friends in one's own home. Frequent outings to the country were afforded in the summer, the railroads giving transportation when asked. These delightful trips occur chiefly on Sunday, and at some risk of censure to the manager, but she believes that—

"The groves were God's first temples," and the days seem hallowed to holy and noble ends if,

"Through lowly grass and lofty trees, Through trembling leaf and balmy breeze," these toilers are brought nearer to Nature's heart. Lawn parties are also arranged at the country homes of friends. A regular distribution of flowers forms a part of the Sunday exercise during their season, when possible. Here friends aid by furnishing flowers.

In a word, the place is meant to be a center from which radiate good influences. The library has rather grown in excellence than in size, though it now contains more than two thousand carefully selected books of standard fiction and the best new books of American and English authors. It undertakes the two-fold aim of creating correct taste in reading, then furnishing the books. Too much cannot be said in favor of a popular free library; through it a'1 may obtain a liberal education. It is earnestly hoped that this one may be so extended as to include the factory boys and apprentices.

This institution, with its lectures, classes, concerts, and industrial branches, should be permanently located in the midst of the tenement region, and should be established in suitable quarters, with its advantages extended to a larger number than can now attend.

An annual report has been sent out from year to year setting forth the aims and methods adopted here,— which has probably helped other workers in similar lines, for numerous clubs, etc., have sprung into existence for similar purposes.

The endowment so much needed for executing plans already thought out has not yet come. But it surely will. The present writer, the manager, has been sadly hindered, but not handicapped, by lack of time to do the work that awaits the coming of willing hands. Teaching in the public schools constantly does not allow much time of strength for perfecting this work, and the increasing affairs and the importance of the work demand a larger outlay of money than there is at hand.

The resources are furnished mainly by private contributions. The proprietors of the large factories all endorse the institution and contribute generously. In this respect great progress has been made within a few years. One proprietor, an old gentleman now dead, decaed in 1885 he would not allow a visitor to go through his mills. The recent United States inspector had created a commotion, the girls were easily alarmed. The great army of them came from he knew not where, and went he knew not whither, nor could he concern himself about them. They did their work, he raised no questions. The plan proposed he thought a good one, if it were possible to get them together, but he had no idea it could be done.

This work is eminently one of personal service in behalf of girls in factories. During seven years of such service many noble traits have been discovered and encouraged. Many brave girls have needed a helping hand who would scorn charity.

A constant correspondence with these girls in the mills opens the way to much friendly service to the families of the self-respecting poor. Homes have been found for little children left motherless; brave girls have been encouraged through great trials; work obtained for many; good positions are readily obtained for girls belonging here. One proprietor writes: "The girls who attend your school are the very best in our factory." This, it is hoped, will be the result of the instruction given for faithfulness in work. Intelligence in all things, kind, peaceable manners, and the practice of the Golden Rule are elements needed in character building.

Alas, how many ills that afflict us to-day would be remedied if thrift, economy, intelligence, industry and modesty dwelt in every workingman's home. The culture and happiness of any home is never in advance of that of the woman at its head; as she is, so will her family be. Incalculable influences for good emanate from one good woman. If young women understood the simple and beautiful art of breadmaking and homekeeping, how greatly would the sum of human happiness be increased in every grade of society, and human misery lessened in the same degree. To this end a class has been started here to cultivate a taste for proficiency in domestic work, and great enthusiasm prevails within it. Of this branch Mrs. Stone will speak. A great effort has ever been made to convey to each girl some adequate idea of her own value to herself and to the community, that she may let no circumstance cheapen her own opinion of herself, but may ever maintain her self-respect. There is a club among the girls called the "Good Will." As the name indicates, disinterested good will and courtesy are inculcated. It is royally right to do an unreturning good at all times. Those who express gratitude for benefits received are urged to pass along the favor to the first one needing it, "as bread at a sacrament." Thus each girl goes forth, in greater or less degree, a missionary. For a more detailed account of this work reference may be made to the sixth annual report, which will be mailed free to any address on application.

A Liberal Congregationalist.

As coming from an "Orthodox" Congregational pulpit, the following extracts from a sermon of Rev. G. H. Marsh, of Cumberland, Wis., are especially worthy of notice. For this sermon Mr. Marsh took the broad text: "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold." (John x. 16.):

I don't want to know what you believe concerning total depravity, the destiny of the finally impenitent, baptism, the nature of the atonement, the eternal decrees, the origin of evil, or where Melchizedek came from.

'This is a practical world. I have no time to split hairs. I believe in God. I believe in Jesus of Nazareth. I believe that Christ, the incarnate deity, is the world's only hope. Propagate the teachings of Christ and there is not a wound that will remain unhealed.

Gladstone's memorable words will bear repetition. "Talk about the questions of the day, there is but one question, and that is the gospel. It can and will rectify everything that needs rectifying. My only hope for man's redemption is in bringing the human mind into contact with divine revelation." This is what the church is for, this is our mission. Although divided organically, I love to think of the church as a vast army, which indeed it is. In the armies of earth there is a great diversity, and yet there is unity. There are divisions, brigades, regiments, and companies; and these are made up of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, while these again are subdivided into various parts. Each part is essential to the whole, and each is doing its special work, while the whole is under the control of the general. In the same way

Like a mighty army moves the church of God;

Brothers, we are treading where the saints have trod;

We are not divided, all one body we,
One in hope and mission, one in charity.

Each denomination is doing a special work, and is prominently bringing to the front certain portions of the truth. No one church has all the truth, and I would be sorry to see the world left for one single sect to evangelize. If one church should get a monopoly in religion, it would be a one-sided affair. But we may have unity in diversity.

* * *

Oh, for the spirit of toleration and Christian charity! These graces may exist in every regenerate soul. They are not incompatible with loyalty to Christ and divine teaching. But, you say, if I believe as you believe am I not in danger of becoming too broad and liberal in my views? No, not while you take Christ, "the out and out liberal," as your example. While I believe with all my heart, as I do, in human depravity, the punishment of sin, the necessity of a Christ life on earth, Calvary and the glorious constellations of truth that cluster around the cross, I shall not go wrong theologically. The tragedy on Calvary is the central event of history. The pivot on which swings the destiny of man. The point where the thousand and one radiating lines of prophecy meet. Charity and liberality do not clash with the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, but bigotry and narrowness do.

* * *

This morning's text is a standing rebuke to that abominable sin of bigotry, which is the pest of the churches.

God is not eternally allied to any one particular sect or denomination. God is everywhere where the truth is proclaimed, and the truth is found whenever you search for it.

Seize upon truth wherever found,
On Christian or on Heathen ground,— Among your friends, among your foes;
The plant's divine where'er it grows.

Truth is immortal, and all the truth of every age and every clime, together with all who have loved the savior from every sect and denomination, shall be built up into a magnificent structure which shall redound to the glory of God, and be the glory and admiration of all the ages. This is the church of Christ, the foundation of which was laid before the foundation of the world. Oh! what a glorious company. All the great and good who have lived since the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy will be there. Every shade of religious belief will be there. All the true and Christ-like of every denomination will then have lost their denominational views, and Christ will be the name upon every tongue and the idol of every heart.

The Chicago Branch of the Woman's Western Unitarian Conference.

On February 1, 1894, at the Third Church, was held the second regular meeting of the Chicago branch of the W. W. U. C. Other duties having claimed Mrs. Dow, Mrs. West presided, and there were seventy-two members present.

After luncheon the meeting was called to order, and the minutes of the previous meeting read and approved. The subject for the afternoon's consideration was, "Religions: the Essentials and the Accessories." Miss M. L. Dunning, in a short paper, told us of "Brahmanism and Buddhism." Mrs. H. G. Solomon being too ill to be present, her interesting paper on "Judaism" was read by Mrs. Perkins, while Rev. Ida C. Hultin, of Moline, changing a little the title, gave us a thought-inspiring and very beautiful essay on "Some Tendencies in the Modern Religious Life." Miss Lord opened the discussion, followed by Mrs. Hayward, Mrs. M. T. Bowen (a guest from Minneapolis), Mrs. Mangasarian, and others. We were fortunate in having with us Rev. Helen G. Putnam, who carries the gospel of Love and Cheerfulness through Dakota, and she gave us an affecting account of her work among the scattered families of that region. The afternoon was one to be remembered by those present, who must have felt anew that to love the good and live the good is the supreme thing in religion.

OF one of the most radical and liberal preachers of to-day, but one whose sermons in one respect resemble those of the old regime, a lady in his congregation recently said that his sermons were as long as they were broad.

THE Catalogue for 1894 issued by Mr. John Lewis Childs, Seedsman and Florist, of Floral Park, N. Y., consists of about 200 pages, and is in the form of three distinct catalogues bound together, one representing Seeds, another Bulbs and Plants, and the third Nursery Stock. Its stipple lithograph cover and numerous colored plates are radiantly handsome. Each one of the thousand or more cuts is new and of a unique design. All the reading matter has also been rewritten so that the entire contents of this large Book-Catalogue, cuts, reading matter, designs and make-up is entirely new. The paper used is of a fine finish and the press-work is done in exquisite bronze violet and brown colors. It is the most charming Horticultural work ever issued.

The Study Table

The Life of Robert Rodolph Suffield.*

This is an intensely interesting account of the life of Mr. Suffield and of his labors, first as a Dominican missionary, then of his secession from Rome and his labors for many years as a Unitarian minister in different parts of England.

His father's family had once been Catholic—but his father called himself a liberal philosopher and his mother was a Protestant. At Cambridge he says he "was in constant intercourse with the Tractarians and Ecclesiologists, sharing all their sympathies," and urged to take Anglican orders. He left the University about Easter, 1843. In 1846 he became a communicant in the Roman Catholic Church. At first he thought "his happiness was perfect," save that he had "to pay the penalty of having been polluted with every kind of infidel thought and teaching." In 1850 he became a priest. For ten years he was a secular priest, and for another ten a Dominican. His chosen work was that of missions and retreats.

His power as a preacher was very great, and no Dominican missionary of that time exerted so wide an influence. His life was most austere, and his self-denial far beyond that required by his vows. For two or three years before the question of Papal infallibility began to be mooted he was troubled with doubts, which he resisted most strenuously. He writes: "Many a long evening have I sat in my garden at Bosworth, when a nightingale's song was the only voice to be heard, and prayed that I might die ere the illusion I had lived in and devoted my life to had utterly passed away." In his trouble of soul he wrote to Dr. Martineau, and the Doctor visited him. In due course of time he left the church, and was settled over a Unitarian society. But he felt no bitterness toward those he had left, and was wont to speak of his Catholic friends and superiors with the warmest praise to the end of his life. The whole account of his conversion to Rome, and of his secession, is fascinating in interest. The story is briefly told, and we cannot but wish he had himself written more at length of his life as a Dominican, and even given us a full autobiography. H. T. G.

some mostly forgotten poets," it contains no specimens of style. Much of the matter here given has previously appeared in the author's Hand-Book of English Literature, but some judgments have been revised and some names added. The notices average perhaps three pages. The author is to be commended for his modesty; he shows no undue certainty as to the finality of his judgments. On the contrary, he seems to take popular approval as his chief guide, and to be rather ill at ease where that awful potentate, Public Opinion, has not yet spoken decidedly. It is difficult not to take one who so plainly displays this spirit at his own estimate, and distrust his critical acumen; yet it should be said in justice to the author that many of his notices, brief as they are, show superior power of discrimination. Nevertheless we must confess that on the whole the book is unsatisfactory to us. We realize how difficult, if not impossible, it is to make a book of this size satisfactory; but why make books of this size?

In conclusion, it must be said that the book is far from a thing of beauty, and that its proof-reading is not what it should be. The slips on pages 25 and 39 lead one to fear that the dates, names, and titles which form so large a part of the body of the book may not be very reliable.

RACHEL STANWOOD. By Lucy Gibbons Morse. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, 16mo, pp. 441. $1.25.

This is a pleasing story of old anti-slavery days; the scene laid in New York, about ten years before the civil war. It will serve to give the young people, and it is to them it is especially adapted, a good idea of the time when the fugitive slave law was being enforced in the North. It is a love story of the better kind; and, as the young people will have them, it is better that they be given such as this, than many with which the press teems. They will enjoy it, and it will do them good. Many of their elders also will be pleased with it. H. T. G.

The Magazines.

THE POLITICAL SCIENCE QUARTERLY (Ginn & Co., Boston, New York and Chicago) for 1894 will be especially strong in subjects of sociological interest, both theoretical and practical. Prof. Franklin H. Giddings will deal with the former side, while on the latter will appear, among others, an elaborate historical sketch of "The Camorra, Mafia and Brigandage in Italy," by Signor I. Merlino, and a scientific study of "Indian Villages," by Prof. W. J. Ashley, of Harvard. In the field of economics and finance the volume will contain a study of "American Railway Statistics," by Prof. H. C. Adams, statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission; a comprehensive and critical survey of "British Local Finance," by Mr. G. H. Blunden, of the Imperial Tax Office, London, and articles dealing with "The Operation of the Interstate Commerce Law," "Government Aid to Telegraphs," and "Municipal Monopolies." On the side of public law, Prof. J. Franklin Jameson, of Brown University, has prepared a careful historical account of "The Standing Committee System in American Legislative Bodies," and Prof. Vautier, of Brussels, will present his review of the now completed "Constitutional Revision in Belgium." In the history of political science, the work of John Austin and Sir H. S. Maine will be critically reviewed by Profs. Dewey and Bastable respectively.

THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, for Feb. 3, contains an interesting and somewhat valuable discussion of a working hypothesis for psychic phenomena, a candid review by Mr. Walter Howell of Mr. Thomson Jay Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena."

THE Woman's Journal for January 27th contains a full and interesting account of the arguments for woman suffrage before the Massachusetts Legislature. All were good, and several, noticeably those of Mrs. E. D. Cheney and Miss Blackwell, were particularly well put.

Five Famous Etchings.

The Passenger Department of the New York Central has just issued a series of five beautiful etchings, which artistically outrank anything of the kind ever issued by any railroad company, while the absence of any advertising feature renders them suitable for hanging in your office, library, or home.

A brief description of each, with a glance at their titles, is all that is necessary to obtain a fair idea of the pictures.

No. 1 is "Washington Bridge," which spans the Harlem River at 181st street—one of the finest bridges in the world, and a marvel of engineering. In the distance is Highbridge, the Croton Viaduct. In the foreground a characteristic river scene, that will be recognized by any one at all familiar with the locality.

No. 2—"Rock of Ages, Niagara Falls," from a photograph by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A view that has been admired by every one who has seen it. The soft tones in which it is printed add greatly to the effect of the falling waters and spray.

No. 3—"Old Spring at West Point," also from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A romantic scene, recalling memories of summer days at the famous military academy.

No. 4—"999 and the De Witt Clinton." The famous Empire State Express Engine "999," which occasioned such widespread comment at the World's Fair, occupies the top half of the card, and below appears the old "De Witt Clinton," affording a truly remarkable example of the progress of railway science in the past fifty years.

No. 5—"Rounding The Nose, Mohawk Valley." One of the handsomest railroad pictures ever made. The scene is just below Little Falls.

These etchings are all printed on fine plate paper, 24x32 inches, suitable for framing. Copies of either of them can be procured at the office of W. B. Jerome, 97 Clark street, Chicago, for fifty cents, or will be mailed in a stiff tube, secure from injury, to any address postpaid, for seventy-five cents, in currency, stamps, express or postal money order, upon application to George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

Church-Door Pulpit

"As Natural as Life."*

BY THE REV. CHARLES G. AMES.

An elderly lady, whose life has been richly filled with beneficence, and whose spirit seems to be in joyous touch with everything true and beautiful and good, tells me that in her childhood she stood by her mother's knee and recited lessons from a catechism written by Dr. Channing. One question ran like this: "When I walk abroad, what do I see?" The answer was: "I see the blue sky, the bright sun, the grass waving in the breeze, the beautiful flowers and the singing birds." Then came the question, "Who made all those lovely and wonderful things?" The object was to direct the mind "through nature up to nature's God." Thus all common things were associated with the great and good and wise Author. The child was made aware of the spiritual order by means of the pleasant impressions made on the senses, just as the same child must have learned what love is through feeling the clasp of warm arms and seeing the smile of a kind face. And my friend remembers, at seventy, that as she stood by her mother, on a spring day, reciting this delightful lesson, "the roses were blooming under the window, the dandelions looked up from the grass, the purple martins warbled among the trees, and the catechism itself seemed to be a part of all the loveliness of the world." So her religious feelings opened like the flowers, and glad reverence for the Eternal was as spontaneous as affection for her mother. Faith, hope and love were not forced or artificial sentiments; they sung themselves to her young life just as the birds sang among the trees. It all seemed as natural as life. The receptive heart of the child was penetrated by a feeling far beyond anything in the catechism—a power too deep for words, too deep for thought; the feeling, the power and the "presence" which Word-worth tries to body forth in his poem on Tintern Abbey:

"A sense sublimè
Of something far more deeply inter-fused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting
suns,
And the round ocean, and the living
air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of
man,—
A motion and a spirit that impels
All living things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things."

It pleased me to learn that Samuel Longfellow was taught in his childhood from the same little book; and I remembered what Channing himself once said about his boyhood's walk on the shore of Narragansett Bay, where,

*A sermon, preached in the Church of the Disciples, Boston, Oct. 29, 1893.

"in reverential sympathy with the power around him, he became conscious of the power within." Why not? Is it not all one power? And there was something in the tone of the story which brought to mind the Galilean teacher who taught men to know the Heavenly Father by considering the lilies of the field and the fowls of the air. Perhaps Christianity has its strongest hold upon us in this very thing, that it does not draw any sharp dividing line between natural and supernatural, or physical and spiritual, but brings together heaven and earth, God and man, so that our common experiences shade off imperceptibly into the infinite mysteries, and the things seen and temporal blend with things unseen and eternal. And thus religion is as natural as life. What room is there for a non-natural religion?

But not all the catechisms have been so sweetly reasonable. Many of us came to our early thoughts and feelings about religious matters by no such loving and lovely approach. An impression was made upon us that the good life was very difficult and non-natural; that it was quite foreign to our interest in this world; that the world itself was evil and dangerous; that we were far away from God, and were somehow very much to blame for it. So there grew up in our minds a sad theory of a dislocated universe—a universe which was not a unity, a universe in which nature was profane, and man was alienated from his Maker. It looked as if life could only be interesting by being wicked.

I think the children were made to bear the iniquities of the older people by being obliged to look at everything through the obscuring haze of grown-up dogmatism. The conscious imperfection of all generations, which should have been a spur to progress, has been construed as a discouragement, and has descended like a deepening shadow on mankind. Certainly nothing sits so heavily upon us to keep us down as to be told at the very beginning of our life that we are fallen beings, disabled for all good, and inclined to all evil, with faculties untrustworthy and with all our proper relations disordered and disrupted. The doctrine of total depravity in its old form has indeed disappeared; but the blighting shadow of natural sinfulness still hangs over us; and I fear that very few children are taught from the start that they are the children and heirs of God.

Yet at this very point we can see the main difference between the old and new theologies. The Unitarians of Channing's time and earlier did not separate from Orthodoxy so much on account of their disbelief of the Three Persons in One God as because they had come to another theory about man. There had grown up in the New England churches a class of people who were tired of trying to pretending that they deserved endless damnation, tired of calling themselves miserable sinners. In dropping out of their minds the stern old dogmas of the fall, election, reprobation and a bloody propitiation for sin, they made room for a more rational and cheerful faith in the fatherly character of God, the loving brotherliness of Jesus, and the native dignity of man. And as the gloomy clouds lifted, the light shone more clearly for all the sects over the whole field of thought and reality, nature's loveliness was unveiled, God and man seemed nearer to each other, and death ceased to be looked upon as a curse or as a calamity. The pressure of a thousand atmospheres was taken from the children of many families; Sunday became a day of good cheer; they were no longer terrified at the name of God; they could play without dreading his frown; and those who were wisely instructed could see His smile in the light of day and trust His love in the soothing darkness of the night.

But as Lessing said in Germany a hundred years ago, "This is not an enlightened age; it is an age becoming enlightened." We have yet to clear our minds of a deal of fog; we have yet to open our eyes to the riches and glory of our inheritance, and to the immeasurable privilege of existence.

There ought to be, and therefore there must be, a way of taking our place and our part in this universe which would put us in harmony with all its facts and forces and laws,—in harmony with each other and with the whole order of things. Then we should realize the perfect will of the Creator and our own highest happiness.

How shall we come at this better way? Does it need any change in the order of the world? Or must there be a change in ourselves? Here is the answer of St. Paul: In order to realize the perfect will of God, "be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind." We must have an inward invigoration, a mental and moral unfolding, the development in ourselves of a deeper life, with higher principles and larger powers; we must let the divine powers have their way with us; in short, we must grow. We must advance in clearness and largeness of intelligence, in purity and nobleness of feeling, in steadiness and power of will: our proper nature must unfold into the image of God.

But one thing is better known in our time than it could be in the time of St. Paul: This growth of mind and heart and will is greatly helped by our coming into active and orderly relations with nature and with humanity. The forces of spiritual vitality are circulating forces: they are transmissible forces; they come to us through the media of heredity and environment. Our heredity includes all the past history of the race and its accumulated gains; our environment includes all our relationships with the world of nature and of man. God gives himself to us, not only by the direct influence of His spirit, but through the thousand channels opened by knowledge, affection and action. The transforming of our being and the renewing of our minds goes on by the help of the outward world; and we vibrate to the touch of human sympathies and to the throbbing of souls and stars. And this is the lesson of this morning: The more fully and vitally we are related to the rest of creation,—to nature and to humanity,—the more rich and complete will be our life. And we must turn our attention this way.

Religion is defined as the tie or bond which holds man to his Maker; but if he is held to his Maker through all these appointed relations, then religion includes every tie which binds him to the world of matter and of mind. What we call the physical is, therefore, a part or expression of the spiritual order, and the whole system of things, seen and unseen, is a unity and a harmony of which each one of us is meant to be an honorable part. Religion is, therefore, a feeling of this unity, a sense of this harmony, a glad acceptance of our place and our part in the whole. And sin is separation, a breach of the unities. The branch withers, if divided from the vine; no organ is sound, unless it shares the life of the body; no body is sound, unless it shares the life of nature; and nature, I think, is in good running order only because it is full of that wisdom, power, and goodness which we call God.

Let us go back for a moment to the little girl in the rural home, with her mother and the catechism, with the flowers and the birds. The book alone would not have done much for her, nor is it likely that the beauty of the world would have made such a deep and tender appeal, if there had been no atmosphere of human love. Nor would the human love alone give the great interpretation. All these factors wrought together, under the prompting of the unseen Spirit, to open the mind and heart of the child with transforming and renewing power. And is there any day of any life from which any one of these gracious helps is wholly absent? We may be dull, inert, unresponsive, torpid; but the sky bends above, human companionship is around, the word of truth is spoken in our ears or stored in our memory, and ever there is a still, small voice whispering of things unseen, and bidding us "be transformed by the renewing of our minds." Our noblest moods and deepest experiences, of joy or sorrow, seem to draw us, as with living cords, into universal sympathies and fellowships. How can we ever be alone and unrelated? The lesson of Channing's catechism comes simply to this: Accept the world as a whole; accept it as God's world and yours; and then you will be free to let your own life expand and enrich itself by taking possession of the particulars as fast as you are able.

This simple openness of mind and heart—this trusting, responsive, receptive attitude of the unspoiled child—holds in itself the secret of scholarship, the highest philosophy, and the wisdom of the angels. There is no other door into the kingdom, no other way into the spiritual order. It is the ground principle of honesty, or moral and intellectual rectitude, to let every fact of the world impress us at its full value; as it is also the part of self-respect and self-justice to meet all realities as if we ourselves were as real as any of them. At the heart's core of it all is a deep, instinctive faith in the universal order and the Power which is above all, through all, and in all. To submit our whole being to that Power in fearless, child-like confidence, at every stage of our history, is to be continuously transformed and renewed, re-created and born again.

One lesson we are ever learning—the lesson of unity in variety and variety in unity. Think how many features come together to make a face or a landscape, and what an assortment of objects we look upon whenever we open our eyes! The rocks are not like the streams; the forests are not like the fields; the hills are not like the plains; the birds are not like the flowers; the sky is not like the sea; the stars are not like the clouds; the night is not like the day.

Yet they all harmonize; they make up well into a composite whole; they belong to a large system; we could not spare one line or tint, one light or shadow. Every aspect of nature affects us in a way of its own; yet all aspects unite in a common impression, like the unlike words that make a sentence, or the consonant and vowel sounds that make a word. This silent and sublime symphony of creation is performed by a vast orchestra; each instrument supports every other; each separate note contributes to the completeness, and is both lost and found in the universal harmony. One breath sweeps through every pipe; one hand touches every key and string. And we are present at the mighty concert, and are a part of it.

Look a little closer, and you find unities within unities, and varieties within varieties. Study the rocks, their stratification, texture, and history, and your thoughts expand into the almost boundless fields of geology and mineralogy. Study the plants and their classification, with the processes of germination, growth, reproduction and decay, or the wonderful way in which they are fed from the mineral world that they may feed the animal world, and you will long to give a hundred years to the pursuit of botany alone. Study the forms and habits of the living creatures that fly or walk or crawl or swim, and you plunge into the exhaustless sciences of ornithology, zoology, ichthyology, entomology, comparative anatomy, and biological evolution. Or, if you look aloft, astronomy will take you quite off your feet, and every star will open for you a door into the infinite. But whether you look up through the telescope or down through the microscope, you find yourself exploring the same universe, finding everywhere one house with many mansions or apartments.

There are two ways of getting into intelligent relations with this universe in which we live. The senses of the scientific man are like doors opening outward, through which his mind goes forth to take possession of the world by observation and thought. But the senses of the poet, or the intuitionist, are like doors opening inward, through which the world enters to take possession of his mind. Both may be equally studious; but they come at facts and conclusions by different processes. One gets his pictures by the diligent use of eye and hand, so to speak; the other passively receives impressions, like the sensitive plate of the photographer. Neither of these men finds it easy to understand the other; and they belong to different schools of thought and feeling. In style and expression, they differ like mathematics and music; yet there is a point of view from which music is seen to rest on mathematics, or measurement; and to all-sided men, like Pythagoras, Plato or Goethe, the ordered movement of the stars is not unlike the ordered movement of an oratorio. Thus among all the varieties of mental method there is an underlying unity.

If we confine our attention to the human world, we shall find ourselves engaged in the same double-dealing; we shall find everywhere the variety, everywhere the unity. The homely proverb, "It takes all sorts to make a world," expresses the same truth with the apostolic saying, "We being many, are one." And everything we learn of nature outside of man seems like a parable, intended to illustrate and interpret man to himself. As in nature, every individual object or aspect comes in for a share in the greatness of all, and all facts are related as parts of the larger whole, so it must be with our individual human lives: each has a sanctity of its own, yet each is bound up and blended with all the rest. The democracy of humanity is the kingdom of God; but the King forever insists that it shall be a democracy, for it is His good pleasure to give the kingdom and the sovereignty to the least of these His children, that we may all reign together while we serve each other, and all serve while we reign.

What! shall we see the sun in every ray, and the earth in every grain of sand, and yet not see the divine light in every mind, and the divine love in every life, however obscured? The great world-forces—gravity, chemistry and electricity—are as busy in the grime and foulness as they are in the crystal and the whiteness of the lily; and why do we doubt that the spiritual forces are as busy in lives depressed by misfortune, or darkened by ignorance, or besotted by sin, as in the enlightenment of sages or the inspiration of saints? For the unity is unbroken; upward or downward, the scale is continuous. The one life is in the lowest forms as well as the highest; the one love fills the hells as well as the heavens. There is indeed a nobler kind of music,

"But in the mud and scum of things,
There always, always something sings."

We must make room in our minds, in our tastes, in our sympathies, in our religion, and in our lives, for all we can learn, both of nature and of humanity. We must multiply points of contact—thoughtful and loving contact—with these large, rich regions of God's creation. We ought to know that we live in them as truly as we live in our houses. When we realize this, perhaps we shall be more concerned to brighten and beautify our surroundings, to put away physical and social disorder and ugliness, to cheer the lives of our daily companions, and to uplift mankind to the levels of truth, justice and good will.

I do not think that the churches have ever realized the spiritual value of natural knowledge, of physical science, of good literature, and of intellectual culture. Every fact is a doorway into the temple of truth. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof." He is not to be put off with the meeting-houses and the Sundays, the hymns and the prayers. He will have also the homes and streets, the schools and courts, the markets and theaters, the railways and ships, the arts and sciences. All of these must be dedicated to Him by being devoted to human uses, to the welfare of his children. Whatever degrades humanity, whatever hurts the least of these, let it be accursed!

Religion will never grow robust and masterful unless it is nourished with a stronger diet. Piety remains puny when it is fed exclusively on emotional mush, and faith is feeble if it be not exercised in the open air of fact. Religion would appear to better advantage if it were to show itself in everyday clothes, in the common world, where men eat and drink, work and rest, buy and sell, read newspapers and watch the public games, talk politics and hold elections, succeed and fail, sin and suffer. In this wide and busy world of affairs, men do not hesitate to speak their minds and to act out all their innocent and lawful impulses, nor do they always hesitate to follow impulses that are neither innocent nor lawful.

Out of all this varied experience of good and evil, probably most of us win a certain kind of wisdom. In this practical school we acquire the greater part, and perhaps the most valuable part, of what we know, or think we know; and our theory of life and of the world is built of this experience-stuff, which comes nearer to nature, far more than of what we read in books or hear in churches.

And here comes in the difficulty and defect of the work of the preachers. We do not trust the child-heart in our hearers; we do not appeal directly to the original instincts of the soul: we speak of religion as if it were something foreign and imported, something which is not as natural as life, because a part of life and the very inmost part, but as something which must be inserted, or forced upon man from without. We have made spiritual instruction too much like those arbitrary and non-natural catechisms, which children swallowed with wry faces, taking them as medicine and not as food. It fails to connect itself with the actual experiences of men and women in the life they are obliged to live every day of the week. It points to a heaven that does not touch the earth, and to a God who does not dwell with men.

It is not chiefly by goody-goody talk of morals or of religion that the higher life of men is nourished and strengthened; it is by helping them to see and feel their relations to the large and beautiful order of nature and humanity, and to see in that order the kingdom of God. It is by clearing their vision and expanding their sympathy; by opening to them the reality and wonder of the world they already inhabit; by showing them that the inward and the outward are two sides of one great fact.

If a preacher might covet any gift of the Spirit, it should be the power to present to all men the way of life, so that it would seem like that shining ladder which Jacob saw in his dream, the foot of which rested on the earth, while the top of it reached to heaven—God's perpetual invitation to climb from where we are to where He means we shall be! Then our lowly starting place, the common earth, will be holy ground, and, like Jacob, we shall exclaim: "This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven!"

Correspondence

J. Vila Blake on Manual Training.

EDITOR UNITY: Sometimes one gets a book, looks at its title and author's name, lays it by for future reading, and it is unread for years, when one finds it a treasure neglected but not lost, for gold does not decay.

Years ago some one (probably Kerr & Co., the publishers) sent me a booklet of eighty pages, "Manual Teaching in Schools—by J. V. Blake." It slipped out of sight until lately, and I find it a work rich in suggestive thought, a rare combination of the ideal and the real, of insight in regard to a whole and harmonious education and of practical training in daily work.

Manual teaching is considered in crisp chapters, which show its economy, dignity, moral effect, health, and bearing on general culture, invention and production, and its use for girls as well as boys. On these and like topics suggestive facts emphasize fine statements.

Here is one of the chapters—poetic intuition and sagacious common sense rarely combined:

That both General and Special Education are useful: that one must not interfere with the other, and that this leads to Manual Training in Education.

If it be plain that the first object of education is to make complete men, and yet that there is a second end, namely, to produce special laborers of particular skill and great power, though limited in scope, it follows that we must think how to prevent the second aim from interfering with the first. This brings into view the subject of manual training in education. Little as yet the training of the hand has been given a place in the school house: but it belongs there; for the hand and the brain, the muscular and the nervous systems, the physical and the mental powers, stand so opposite to each other, though not opposed, are so different, yet each necessary, being the two great orders of faculty which make up the whole man, that to education of the hand, not indeed chiefly, yet fundamentally, we must look to obtain in one a more nobly grown human being and a skilled worker in a special art. For one mental exercise has something in it of all others, and one manual activity of all bodily motion. A poet will have something of the virtues of history, philosophy, science, politics, economics even, perhaps of mathematics: a machinist will have ex arte something of the benefits of the manual motions of carpentry, cabinet-making, tin work, tanning, plumbing and many other crafts. But the physical powers of a poet may be a sheer waste, the delicacies of whose possible fruits he may not even dream of; and the mind of the hand-worker may go through life with hardly the experience of an abstract thought or generalization, which, Emerson says, is "the influx of divinity into the mind, hence the thrill which attends it."

Therefore, if we aim to combine the two great ends of education, namely, whole development and special skill, we should begin with the broad distinction between body and mind: in other words, let us head-train the hand-worker and hand-train the head-worker. Manual training and head-training together form the only whole education.

The book is singularly suggestive and therefore valuable. Yours truly,

G. R. STEBBINS.

Childhood Visions.

O lost childhood! we have wandered far from thee,

Back let us take our straying way.

Wander knee-deep through fields of blushing clover,

And hear again with childish ears the sweet songs of May.

"Yes," and her chair creaked loudly and harshly as she rocked to and fro, "you never was what they might call pooty, but you're getting humbler every day." Her curious gray eyes peered over her glasses at the little figure before her, which shrunk visibly under her glance.

"Now don't run off and cry about it," as she saw the sensitive movement, "'Pooty is as pooty does,' you must know that."

But the little girl was out of hearing, carrying a new pain in her heart. Down the flower-bordered walk she rushed, thro' the creaking gray gate, past the long stretch of locust trees, across the little bridge which led to the wood beyond. Through it there flowed the brook whose voice was a consolation to her in all childhood sorrow. It had a low, cool murmur, which seemed to whisper of its love to the little nature-worshiper. On its banks the ferns swayed a welcome, and tall grasses, like stately ladies, seemed ever dipping a courtly bow. There she was queen. There, in her beauty-loving imagination, she was regal and beautiful, tall, with dark eyes that sparkled 'neath clustering curls.

The little unconscious soul had never thought of herself as ugly. The birds and flowers were beautiful and loved her. She had thought no further. She was a quiet little thing—this Hetty—who loved to roam the fields and woods, each season bringing to her untold delights. The Spring with its exquisite and ethereal chant of hope, its wild flowers, its seed-sowing, and its young lambs; the Summer with its roses and deep-voiced insects; the Fall with its treasures of nuts and bright-hued leaves, all were hers, in her childish egotism.

This afternoon she did not stop to watch the mist on the hills or gather the scarlet leaves under her feet, but flying swiftly she reached the brook. It was flowing so gently that its placid surface was smooth. Hetty leaned far over its brink. She pushed the straying locks from her brow and gazed anxiously and long. Down in the shadowy bottom she saw a little face looking back at her. She could see that it was colorless and thin, and that it lacked the dimpled loveliness of her little friend.

"And so I am homely. Old Miss Hubbel said so, and I never knew it before." Tears trembled in her eyes which made the flower she picked seem two—three flowers all growing on one stem.

"You are pretty," she whispered. "Your heart is deep blue. Your stamens are sunshine. Your petal tips are curled and dainty. Would I love you if you were homely? How I love pretty things and I like them because they are pretty."

A little bird rose with a flutter of black and scarlet and white plumage. It floated in the air and softly falling lit like a flower on a swaying stalk. The wind, just breathing, swung it to and fro, and with the motion there were shaken on the breeze drops of music so clear, so low, so sweet, that Hetty held her breath to listen. The silver notes held the liquid sound of the brook as it rippled over the white stones. It had caught the reed-like music of the wind. It was the bob-o'-link's own song of joy. The tears in Hetty's eyes welled over. It seemed to her that she should weep forever—her tears would flow on like the brook and drown her. Why should God make the whole world around her beautiful, and leave one little forlorn, ill-favored being in it? But as she lay there, sobbing and gazing at the brook, a white mist seemed to arise from its heart, and out of it there looked the sweetest face she had ever seen. A voice spoke to her in low, caressing accents.

"Hetty, my child! Do you grieve while yet so young? Life truly is full of perplexities, after we pass the milestone of childhood, but before that is reached we should be buoyant like the birds, fragrant with youth like the flowers, and ever busy and cheerful like the brook."

"O, but you are beautiful and a great lady. If you were a little plain child, you too would weep."

"Would you be beautiful and grown to womanhood?"

"I should be the happiest child in the world."

The lady of the brook smiled sadly. "You forget that you would be no longer a child," but she held towards her a glittering drop which grew larger and larger as Hetty gazed in it.

She saw herself in a brilliantly lighted hall, the center of all eyes, but was it she? That radiant creature with jewels in her hair and a song on her lips? Applause shook the house as the liquid notes ceased.

Again and again she saw herself appearing before them in response to the deafening ovation, her face beautiful with smiles. "Oh, here was happiness indeed," and as the thought breathed itself aloud the scene changed. A room richly furnished and dimly lighted, with the pall of loneliness over it. One screened corner alone seemed to breathe of simplicity and homeliness, for here were gathered the memories of a lifetime. A picture on the wall looked strangely familiar. Where had she seen that dim, shadowy wood with the peaceful cows standing knee deep in the lazy stream, and surely she had again and again seen her sweet mother rocking to and fro in that little wooden chair; but the Singer now was sitting there, the lovely smiling singer,—smiling no longer, but weeping as if from the depths of a homesick heart. Tears that seemed as if they would never cease—tears for her childhood—for her innocence—for the murmuring brook—for the sylvan charm of youth—for the long lost mother. These were vanished visions, and in their place were marshalled pride, ambition, envy, care, approaching age and the loneliness of genius. The bird's song of her childhood was drowned in the clanging noises of the city, and her tears flowed on, till Hetty, in yearning, cried: "O, how can you sorrow so? You are all that I wish to be, beautiful and great," and as she spoke the picture faded and she heard in her ears again the trill of the mounting bird and the tinkle of a distant cow bell and a little weed reached out a tiny hand and caressed her cheek, and she knew with an exceeding great gladness that she was yet a little merry child, and, though like the weed, she was plain and small, she could have within her the heart of the flower, breathing sweetness into others' lives.

Lesson XXII.

OTHER NEW TESTAMENT PHASES.

*O heart of mine, keep patience! Looking forth,
As from the Mount of Vision, I behold,
Pure, just and free, the Church of Christ on earth;
The martyr's dream, the golden age foretold!
And found at last, the mystic Graal I see.
Brimmed with His blessing, pass from lip to lip
In sacred pledge of human fellowship;
And over all the songs of angels hear;
Songs of the love that casteth out all fear;
Songs of the Gospel of Humanity!
Lo! in the midst, with the same look He rore,
Healing and blessing on Genesaret's shore, Folding together, with the all-tender might
Of His great love, the dark hands and the white, Stands the Consoler, soothing every pain, Making all burdens light, and breaking every chain.*

—Whittier.

Picture: Christus Consolator, by Ary Scheffer (1795-1858).

This picture illustrates well the artist's love of freedom and sympathy with human suffering. The central figure is not an exalted Christ, but the Son of man with the marks of his passion still visible. To him men and women of all ages and classes are looking for consolation and release. An interesting fact about this picture is that in an edition of the prayer-book, published in the North, but intended for circulation principally in the South, which contained it as frontispiece, the figure of the kneeling black slave was omitted [Lowell, essay on the American Tract Society; Whittier, "On a Prayer-book"]. Obviously the constructive thought of the picture is that Jesus is still active in human affairs, helping the world to a purer, freer humanity; and therefore it is an apt introduction to our brief study of the mystical and the Roman interpretations of Christianity, as seen in the New Testament.

What is the mystical interpretation of Christianity?—In the Johannine writings the Eternal Word, which dwelleth by measure in every man, is said to have received perfect and absolute incarnation in the person of Jesus, belief in whom is possible only to those in whom already the Word sufficiently dwells, but whose effect is more complete participation in the Eternal Truth and Life and Love.

In the Johannine books the Christ is regarded as a living, abiding presence in the hearts of those who believe in him. If one may use modern terminology, which does not, however, misrepresent primitive thought, the Christ is the divine ideal of the universe, which is of course a revelation of the nature of God. That divine ideal without which nothing was made, which is the substance of whatever exists, appeared in its completeness in Jesus, whose mission is therefore to help men understand themselves and realize in themselves and in the universe their highest ideals which are the product of "the Christ" within them. The words of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel are not to be conceived of as the utterances of an imperfect human being, the author intends them to be declarations of the Eternal Word, and whatever is said there of and by Jesus may with equal truth be said of and by every man to the degree that "the Christ" spirit is within and the divine ideal is realized in him. Hence the Christ, which is absolutely one with Jesus because perfectly embodied in him, is eternal life and truth, is one with God as a man's thought is one with himself; the progress of the world towards perfection is due to the presence in it of the Christ, which is "the central urge of every atom," and is only the advancing victory of the spirit that was without measure in Jesus. It follows, therefore, that Scheffer's picture is true to the mystical interpretation of Christianity as it appears in the Johannine books; whatever has been done or will be done for freedom, truth, love, the progress of man and the purifying of the world—everything is the work of Jesus the Christ.

It would carry us far beyond the narrow limits of a single lesson even to hint at the causes which brought about this interpretation of Christianity. That it does not at all represent the idea of Jesus may go almost without saying. We have already studied his notion of the Messiah and found it to be totally unlike this. Yet there is a prevailing tendency to disparage unduly the Fourth Gospel. It seems to contain a tradition of facts which is in some respects, though not on the whole, superior to that in the Synoptists, and its speeches preserve intimations of a side of Jesus' mind which is passed over almost in silence by the other evangelists. There undoubtedly was a touch of mysticism in Jesus which most of his followers were quite incapable of appreciating. In the Synoptists it appears in such passages as Matt. xi. 25-30, which have an unmistakably Johannine ring. Without venturing to speak positively, we may say that possibly the Fourth Gospel represents the more mystical teachings of Jesus in the form they came to assume after lying over fifty years in a mind prone to mysticism and subject during the latter part of the time to Alexandrine influence, as those teachings and the historical traditions were understood by a disciple of the apostle. Yet, while the Gospel is precious because it preserves a memory of the mystical side of Jesus, its words do not represent the thoughts of Jesus, and its fundamental conception was entirely foreign to him.

It must not be supposed, moreover, that in the Johannine writings alone of the New Testament books is the mystical interpretation of Christianity found. In Galatians, Paul says, "It is no more I that live, but Christ liveth in me"; the phrase "in Christ," by which he means participation in the stream of righteousness and life issuing from the second Adam and its fountain head, belongs to the same class of thought. And if one wish a modern expression of the idea, which reveals the reality underlying Scheffer's picture, given not by a mystic but by one of the most clear-eyed, sober-minded, unimpassioned of our thinkers, it may be found in the following extract: "What do I say then? That the man goes where his thought goes. Wherever his will tears down obstacles by whatever means, there goes the man. Wherever his wisdom carries light, wherever his fidelity keeps others faithful, or his goodness blesses the world, there lives the man." (Thoughts from the Writings of Rev. John C. Learned, p. 35). Now it is true that most of the gains hinted at in our picture which have come to our civilization have been championed by men who drew their inspiration not from the church or theologic Christ, but from the human Jesus who is said to have proclaimed as his mission "to preach good tidings to the poor,—to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised."

What is the Roman interpretation of Christianity?—Even in the New Testament are the beginnings of the idea that the church is a firmly compacted organization to which has been intrusted a deposit of truth, to whose officers is intrusted the communication of the spirit and which must be kept free from heresies and heretics.

This may rightfully be called the Roman view, since it emphasizes the Roman principle of organization. Jesus had no idea of instituting "an external and visible church whose sealing ordinances to the end of time should be baptism and the Lord's Supper," for to him the end of the age was very close at hand. The thought of "organizing" his disciples never entered his mind. In the early stages of Paul's career as a Christian, he, too, believed in the speedy return of Jesus, hence there was no need of a church organization planned to endure. But in the organization of little local communities, there was, apparently, a chief presbyter corresponding nearly to our Chairman of the Board of Trustees, who tended to become the executive officer of the church and who, in the course of time, through the enlarging demands of charity, discipline and missionary zeal, developed into the "bishop." As the position of the churches became more hazardous; the members of one church traveling to other cities would seek protection and shelter with the Christians there, hence letters of commendation and a closer brotherhood. Extravagances of doctrine accompanied frequently by immorality led to a closer defining of Christian belief, and this need, together with the dwindling survivors of the age of Jesus and the postponement of the second advent, brought about the formation of written records and the canon of scripture. In a few passages of the Acts we trace belief that the spirit belongs to the church and can be communicated only through the hands of an apostle (viii. 15-17, xix. 6; cf., however, x. 44 and the general notion that the imposition of hands means only formal acknowledgment of the choice of the church). In the Pastoral Epistles there is a nascent ecclesiasticism and there are abundant warnings against heresies and heretics (1 Tim. iii. 15; vi. 20; 2 Tim. i. 13, 14, etc.). In these epistles, too, faith seems to refer not to an attitude of mind but to a body or system of doctrine. It cannot be said that the Pastoral Epistles were written by Paul; nevertheless in his undoubtedly genuine letters are the roots of the subsequent development in the idea of the church as the body of Christ. The result of this unification of the churches was to make the church a potent factor in the politics and civilization of the world. And inasmuch as the changes suggested by the picture we are studying came about ultimately and permanently only as the product of the forces that in society shape gradually and almost imperceptibly towards a higher civilization, we may use the Christus Consolator to illustrate the Roman as well as the mystical interpretation of Christianity, for here Jesus is shown as an actual agent in practical human affairs.

We have thus looked very hastily and superficially at four interpretations of the message of Jesus found in the New Testament. Jesus was a son of the prophetic tendency in Israel; but in Paul the influence of Scribism was strong enough to transform the word of Jesus into a system of legalism remarkably inconsistent with Paul's own condemnation of the Law. Yet in his missionary travels, and particularly during his sojourn in Corinth and Ephesus, Paul certainly grew in the direction of the subsequent Greek transformation, intimations of which appear in his epistles and in the (probably) spurious Letters to the Ephesians and Colossians. In the non-Christian Jewish thought there are clear forerunners of the Johannine ideas, but it was only when Christianity was apperceived by a mind saturated with Greek ideas, and particularly with Alexandrine philosophy, that the thoughts of Jesus the Jew were changed into the metaphysics and mysticism of the Fourth Gospel. And as the churches attained prominence and incurred suspicion they were forced to a more stringent discipline and a closer organization, for which the Roman Empire furnished precedent. The chief object of these lessons has been to show that the thoughts of Jesus did not spring up supernaturally within him, but that he was a consummate representative of the best tendencies of his own time which descended from the prophets of Israel. Similarly his words fell not upon vacant minds, but into minds already formed by systems and principles which strove to adjust the new ideas into their environment with as little friction and disturbance as possible. In next year's course we shall study the development of tendencies whose beginnings we have already found in the New Testament.

For this lesson, the references are to Cone's The Gospel and its Earliest Interpretations and Hatch's Organization of the Early Christian Churches. Matheson's Spiritual Development of St. Paul is also to be commended.

Questions.

The Picture—Can you find any reason why one man in the picture is shown with his back turned upon Jesus? Try to imagine what Scheffer imagined each one of these persons might find to satisfy his, or her, needs in the words of Jesus.

The Mystical Interpretation.—What did Jesus mean by "the Christ?" What did Paul and "John"? The mystical side of Jesus—is it shown by the Synoptists? Which comes nearest to Jesus, Paul with his doctrine of faith or "John" and his message of love? (1 John iv. 16 and Rom. ii. 23-25.) What elements of mysticism were in Paul? Is there any mysticism in the Old Testament?

The Roman Interpretation.—What is the key-word to this phase of Christianity? Had Jesus an expectation that his followers would organize into a "Holy Catholic Church"? Are there any traces of the idea in Paul? Where is the tendency most apparent in the New Testament?

SOME MORE PENNIES AND POUNDS.

"A model church" is what some of our ministers call the church at Hobart, Ind.; and they call it so because it runs itself. It does not need a minister to wind it up every seven days. It goes steadily on, Sunday after Sunday, whether it has a minister or not.

I thought such a church was worth investigating, and so I went down there to study it. And I think I have found out the secret of its strength. It started as a Sunday school thirty years ago; and for ten years there was only the Sunday school, without any church. But twenty years ago the church came. They had taken care of the pennies and the pounds took care of themselves. And now they have their own church building with a service every evening and a Sunday school every morning. When I was there the Sunday school numbered 120, though the village has only about 1,500 people in all, with half a dozen other churches.

When I saw this school and the work it had accomplished, I asked myself why such a school could not be started in every town of the West where there are a dozen or half a dozen families of earnest parents who cannot bear to let their children grow up without any religious instruction, or to let them learn religious stories and beliefs which they will have to unlearn in later years? Why cannot the dozen, or two dozen, parents get together each Sunday and form the children into classes and teach them for an hour? It would help the children wonderfully. And I should not be surprised if it helped the parents almost as much; for the man or woman who tries to teach a class of bright children gets taught himself, whether they do or not.

Such a Sunday school would pay for itself as it went; and it would be sure to grow into a church sooner or later, and a church of the right kind, too,—one that did not run down and stop when the minister went off with the key. If UNITY reaches any such little group of parents, I hope they will try the experiment; and if they will write to the Headquarters we will give them all the help we can.

Notes from the Field

Chicago, Ill.—At All Souls Church, for February, the pastors' sermons are: "Francis Parkman, the Great American Story-Teller," "The President of a Distracted People," "The Self-Protecting and Self-Asserting God," and "The Contributions of Science to Religion." On Sunday evening, the 4th, Prof. Small lectures on "The New Social Method," and on the 11th he gives the last lecture of his course, on "The New Society." On the evening of the 18th Mr. V. R. Ghandi, of Bombay, a lawyer belonging to the Jain sect, begins a course of four lectures: I. Mysticism in India, or the Yoga Philosophy; II. Essential Philosophy of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism; III. India Under Hindu, Mohammedan, and English Rule; IV. The Religious Future of India. On the first and third Mondays of the week the Philosophy Section (now at work on Spencer's Justice, after which it has been proposed to take up Shaler's "Interpretations of Nature") meets, and alternately with it the novel section, studying Middlemarch. On Tuesdays the women of the parish meet for charitable work, after a reading from Shelley by the pastor, and a box lunch, 11 to 4; the young people's vocal class meets at 4; and the Emerson section and Browning section, alternately, at 8. On Wednesdays the reading room is open from 7 to 9 p. m.; and, on the 14th a Lincoln party, with supper, for the children of the Sunday school, at 5 p. m. Thursdays at 8 p. m. a course of lectures on Tennyson's "In Memoriam" are given by Eugene Parsons. On Fridays the pastor's class in religion is held at 8 p. m.; the reading room is open from 7 to 9 p. m.; and, beginning on the 9th, the Lowell section of the Unity Club takes up a course in the Early History of the Old Northwest: A. The French pathfinders; B. The Early Traders and Trading Posts, Detroit, Chicago, St. Paul, etc.; C. State-Makers, the First Territorial Governors of Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa and Minnesota. Saturdays at 10 the pastor's confirmation class.

Chicago, Ill.—At Sinai Temple, Jan. 22, a mass meeting attended by about 300 was held to organize the Chicago Section of the National Council of Jewish Women. Several prominent rabbis were present, including Messrs. Hirsch, Moses, Norden, Stolz and Levy. Mrs. H. Solomon, president of the council, set forth its purposes as (1) to awaken Jewish women and men to a better knowledge of their religion, by means of study in the council and by exerting an influence upon the Sabbath school; and (2) to further preventive philanthropy. Others followed Mrs. Solomon, and the section was formed, the officers being: President, Mrs. Conrad Witkowski; Vice Presidents, Mrs. Maurice Mayer, Miss Bertha Lceb, Mrs. I. G. Harris; Secretary, Miss Hannah May; Treasurer, Mrs. C. S. Stettauer.

Chicago, Ill.—Unity Church had the privilege of hearing, on Jan. 21, Rev. H. T. Secrist, of Milwaukee, who is rapidly becoming one of the leading preachers of that city. Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, formerly of Concord, Mass., is now filling Unity pulpit for the month of February. His reputation as an organizer of guilds has preceded him in the West and made him known by name to many of our workers.

Hinsdale, Ill.—At a church meeting on January 31 this society extended a unanimous call to Rev. C. F. Elliott, formerly pastor of the churches at Janesville, Wis., and at Jackson, Mich. The Hinsdale church is vigorous, harmonious and rapidly growing, and with its new minister it ought soon to become one of the most important churches of the West.

Moline, Ill.—Miss Hultin has received a very flattering call from the church in Troy, N. Y., but her people here are determined not to let her go, if they can help it. The deficit in the finances has been promptly made up and resolutions of warmest appreciation of her past services and her present sacrifice in staying have been unanimously passed; and it is understood that she will remain. Her departure would be a great loss, not only to Moline but to the whole Western work, where she has proved herself one of the ablest and most eloquent advocates of the larger faith.

Sheffield, Ill.—This church celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary, Jan. 28, by a special service; but the society shows all the vigor of youth. It has recently organized a Young People's Guild, that started with a membership of twenty-five and has now reached fifty-nine.

Princeton, Ill.—The People's Church is rapidly increasing in the size of its audiences lately. The hour of services has been changed from morning to afternoon, and that may have had something to do with the growth. But Mr. Skilling has been giving some very able and interesting sermons, so that when people have come once they have liked it so well that they have come again, and now the attendance is three times as great as it was at the beginning of the year.

Ithaca, N. Y.—We learn from Rev. J. M. Scott's Kindly Light, that the Herbert Spencer class after two years' faithful study of Spencer's philosophy, has resolved itself into "the class in Sociology," and will meet at 4:30 Sunday afternoon to study economics, which it designates as "the foundation of sociology."

New York, N. Y.—Mrs. B. Ward Dix, president of the Women's Alliance, gave last week at her Brooklyn home a delightful luncheon to Rev. Helen G. Putnam, missionary at large to North Dakota. Miss Putnam has just been making a tour in New England, speaking to Alliances, and telling the story of her work in the sparsely settled regions of the Far West, and has met everywhere with hearty interest and good will. Her work is, as she calls it, seed-sowing in virgin soil; and she finds numerous signs of a good crop of liberal ideas, the nursery of churches yet to be. On Monday she speaks at Trinity Church, Brooklyn.

The Unitarian Club dinner was an occasion of unusual interest. Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones came on from Chicago to be present, and both charmed, and if one may venture to say it, stirred up the company with his undiluted Western sentiments concerning the denominational name and a broad and inclusive religious platform. There were good speeches also by Rev. Merle St. C. Wright and Rev. Messrs. Williams and Chadwick. "Our Missionary Opportunity from a Layman's Point of View" was an able address by George W. Stone, of Wilmington, Del.—A. L., in Christian Register.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

Foolish Woman!

You can't spare the time to measure your Pearline? Well, that helps us, but it's lucky for you that an overdose of Pearline does no harm. It's only extravagance. Beware of a dose of the imitations.

You can get just as good work with enough Pearline as with too much. Use it as it ought to be used, and don't waste it, and you can't think that it's expensive. To get the best results from Pearline, use it just as directed. You'll save more of everything than with anything else. If your grocer sends you an imitation, return it, please. 288 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahmo leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fasting, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Parting, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

*Should Wrong prevail o'er all the earth,
'Twere nought if only we discern
The one great truth, which if we learn,
All else beside is little worth.*

*That Right, is that which must prevail,
If not here, there, if not now, then,
Is the one Truth which shall not fail,
For all the doubts and fears of men.*
—Lewis Morris.

LINCOLN, at the beginning of his administration, said to the man who came to condole with him on the difficulty of knowing what to do, "It is all as clear as a turn-pike road to me." The man who rests upon the eternal principles of justice always finds before him a turn-pike road. Whither it may lead he knows not nor cares much. He trusts it, and follows it from this end, which is clear, knowing that it cannot lead him to a false destination.

THE best way to honor one's grandmother is to live for one's grandchildren. To understand her one must live as she did: in the interest of the present and in the hope of the future.

WE are glad to see that Rev. W. D. P. Bliss, of the Boston "Church of the Carpenter," has been able to revive his Dawn, which now carries its message of Christian Socialism once more, and is a much handsomer sheet than before its suspension.

THE February Arena commends itself to us on account of the article on the Religion of Browning's Poetry by Mr. Savage and perhaps the still more timely symposium on the rational dress movement, amply illustrated. This is one of the emancipations much needed. When beauty joins with utility, as they do in most of these illustrations, the way of the reformer ought to be easy and the movement of the reform ought to be rapid.

DELIBERATION is one of the true methods of the philosopher. Mr. W. T. Harris is but little influenced by the hurrying spirit of the times. The last number of the Speculative Philosophy is the first to appear since September, 1892. This bears date December, 1893, and contains the usual solid material to the lovers of Kant, Plato, Aristotle and their modern interpreters and associates. The editor himself furnishes a paper on "Aristotle's Doctrine of Reason."

WITH each returning year the celebration of Lincoln's birthday becomes more and more significant. This is gratifying evidence that humanity still loves the hero and that the prophet is the man most loved by the race. At the Lincoln party of the All Souls Sunday school in Chicago this week the following stanza was sung by the children in connection with one of their familiar songs. It is good enough to help out our editorial note upon this great-hearted son of sorrow and giver of joy.

And one there is whose noble life
Sets all our hearts aflame;
Who freedom gave a million souls,
And saved our country's fame.
O Lincoln, patient, brave, and true,
God's noblest, rarest type of man,
With reverent pride we speak thy name,
The first American!

THE last appeal of conservatism is always to the historic sense. Any daring innovation or startling progress is solemnly summoned to confront the past, and a petition is sent up to be respectful to "historic continuity." But the surprising thing is that it is the radical and not the conservative who really conserves the past. As a matter of fact, it is the man with a forward look that lovingly turns his face backward to see what there is in the experience of the race to warrant his position. The autumn leaf painted in dying glories prates of historic relations, and pleads for continuity, but the new bud that is pushing its way at the base of this petition, draws its nourishment from the living past, and is so strong in the continuity that it is too busy to talk of creeds.

ONCE more we must call the attention of all who have business with us to the necessity of making remittances by check or money order, so that they may be protected against robbery or accident. Unity Publishing Company has been a considerable sufferer from postoffice robberies in the city of Chicago, and in addition to this its whole mail was recently stolen by an outside robber one Monday morning. If remitters would take proper precautions in sending money they would not suffer in such cases even if we did. But when cash, stamps or postal notes are sent, it is at the risk of he sender, and if we fail to receive the money we cannot well give credit on the score of good intentions.

THE decision of the Supreme Court of Indiana in the case of Haggart and Rathwall vs. Stehlin and Heidt is, indeed, a very important one, since it gives the right to individual property-owners to maintain suit to enjoin a saloon which so far disturbs the respectability of the neighborhood as to affect the selling and renting price of adjacent property. Points in the case seem to indicate that the decision goes even further than this, but in view of the facts in the case the other points touched upon would probably be regarded in most jurisdictions as obiter dicta. We congratulate the friends of temperance upon this victory over the saloon interest. Those who feel interested may obtain a summary of the case by applying to E. M. Goodwin, Secretary of the Anti-Liquor League, at 70 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Ind.

DR. ALBION W. SMALL, head professor of sociology in the University of Chicago, has just completed a course of six University Extension lectures, given at All Souls Church, on Sunday evenings. They have proved to be of remarkable interest. Dr. Small makes clean work. He blazes the way through a tangled thicket and enables one to make a straight road through the confusing wilderness of current discussion upon these subjects. His lectures are scarcely less a contribution to religion than to sociology, if, indeed, these are not nearly interchangeable terms. The churches reached by UNITY can do no better work than to give wider publicity to the words of Professor Small. He pleads wisely for a change of base in religion: less theology and more ethics. Christianity, he thinks, is properly an attempt to realize the kingdom of God here on earth more than in yonder heaven far away.

LAST Sunday an interesting experiment was inaugurated in Chicago. The various labor union interests and leaders have undertaken to establish what they have named the "Modern Church," a church without creed, collections, or pastor; a church which, at the present, will meet in Bricklayers' Hall, an attractive auditorium in a large building owned by the Bricklayers' Union and situated on the West Side. The opening sermon was preached by the editor of UNITY. The plan involves Sunday speaking by representatives of all faiths, including Catholics, Jews, Universalists, Unitarians and Orthodox Protestants. The scheme contemplates the early building of a church that will be the headquarters of seven-day activities. The audience last Sunday was large and the projectors enthusiastic. Perhaps the dream is too high to be realized; maybe the cost has not been adequately counted, but the prophecy is most significant, and surely defeat in this high aim is better than success on a lower plane. We will watch with interest the development of the experiment.

WE have no disposition to pose as the Russian Autocrat's defender, and we can but sympathize with the indignation expressed by Dr. Mills on another page against the barbarous cruelty and intolerance of the Russian Government. And yet, without giving any weight to the natural prejudice of a susceptible man who has received very kind and gracious personal treatment at the hands of the czar, we feel that it is one thing to condemn the wrong and another to denounce the man who does it. We may well remember, as Hood has told us in his "Lady's Dream," that —evil is wrought by want of thought

As well as by want of heart.

And we feel that the testimony of those who from careful investigation and personal knowledge are best fitted to speak of the Czar's personal character (many of these observers being strong and outspoken in their opposition to and denunciation of his policy) should give us pause, if, as seems to be the case, that testimony is uniformly to the effect that he is a good-hearted man and a hard-working and conscientious ruler. We confess that it is difficult for us, trained in the American school of religious tolerance and broad humanity, to reconcile the accounts of the man with his public actions. But for one thing we must remember that, however despotic the theory of a government, it is absolutely impossible that a ruler of a domain covering so large a portion of the earth and embracing so many millions of men, should be actually conversant with the details of administration; and therefore specific acts of cruelty in the execution of a decree are hardly to be attributed to the Autocrat. But, aside from this, the chief thing to be considered is the narrow prejudices in which this wrong-headed man has been educated. Paternalism and intolerance are so much a part of the Russian atmosphere, particularly of the Russian court, that it would be little less than a miracle were the Autocrat of all the Russias other than a despotic bigot.

If the liberal ministers of the United States will help us to the extent of giving a few minutes' attention each week to the matter, UNITY will do its part to put their best thoughts before the public in one of the most effective forms. What we propose is that each of our ministerial friends should select a nugget from his sermon of the previous week—that short passage which seems to him at the same time the strongest and the most capable of standing alone—and send it to UNITY, with his name and address, if he is willing that it should be published; the selection not to exceed seventy-five words. A few of these each week would be an attractive feature for UNITY, would give the minister an opportunity to let his light shine before men, and in the course of time would enable UNITY's constituency to gain a real insight into the minds and hearts of the religious workers of the day. We hope this will meet the favor of our ministerial readers. Of course we cannot promise to print all that we receive as fast as we receive it. Our space would not permit; we can only use a few at a time. And of course the selection must be made by the minister himself. The time that it would be necessary to give to the matter in UNITY office if the whole sermon were sent us to select from would be more than we could give.

If any man can make truth, righteousness and love atheistic, then there is no God worth honoring in the universe.

NO MAN is an infidel who believes in a single virtue, church member or not,—and before that was possible he was a child of God; and any virtue practiced is a form of enthusiasm, is a letter in the language of worship, is the germ which holds in it the potency of an elaborate ritual. We have not to create a sentiment but to organize and develop a sentiment which already exists.

THE new faith is not likely to die so long as it finds so much to do. The demand for it is everywhere. Give it the wings of courage, the spirit of self-sacrifice, and men will hear of it until the dire and irrational doctrines still written and preached are recalled and driven back into those obscure corners of ignorance and barbarism whence they emerged. L.

Consecration of Wealth.

While our papers are filled with grateful tributes to the philanthropist and capitalist, George W. Childs, it is a good time to remember the saying of Marcus Aurelius, "A man may live nobly in a palace." The story of Abraham Lincoln and the pine-knot fire is a good one, and it ought to be told so often that no boy without a whole shirt to his back will lose heart, but push on. But the story of the men of wealth, like George W. Childs and others, should be told so often that no son of pampered elegance will dare withdraw himself from the noble pursuits of life. Let none such imagine that they need not work. The extravagant sons of plenty need to be reminded that wealth brings its solemn responsibility. The outcome of the present sociological discussion will probably end in a consensus of opinion that accumulated capital, beyond a not very remote point, is a trust, and must be held as such if held at all with a clean conscience. And unless the possessor is willing to hold it in the spirit of a trustee, to be administered at his own discretion for the public weal, he is a defaulter to humanity and the Lord of the harvest. If he is incompetent to administer his wealth to the advancement of the race, be it inheritance or accumulation, he had better give some one who is the chance. If indeed he takes not the hint, the enlightened state may come in and demand of the unprofitable servant an account of his stewardship. The smart maxims of the exchange, which say "It's a poor man that cannot earn his own living, poor job that doesn't pay expenses, a mean undertaking that is not self-supporting," are themselves mean and untrue measures of the great work and the great workers of the world. It is a poor man, indeed, that does not in one way or another earn more than his own living; and it is a mean undertaking that does not in some way support more than itself or its patrons. It is said that Gibbon paid more than £10,000 for the raw material out of which he constructed his great work on the Roman Empire. When Robert Browning was a lad his father, a man of moderate income, gave him a choice of setting him up in business or giving him an education. He chose the latter. Far be it from me to insinuate that poverty can extinguish the Promethean spark in a poet's heart. The deathless songs of Burns, the uplifting lines of Whittier, disprove the assertion; but it is quite safe to say that such poetry as Robert Browning has given us, poetry impossible without leisure, culture and travel, would have been impossible, much of it, had not the money-making and poetry-loving John Kenyon; a kinsman of Mrs. Browning, left, at his death in 1856, £4,000 to Mrs. Browning and £6,500 to Mr. Browning, in round numbers, about $50,000 to the family; which, added to what was, at first at least, the very moderate earnings of their pen, rendered the remainder of their lives free from the carking anxieties about grocer bills and the problem of clothes and fuel. It was not given to John Kenyon to write much poetry that many people remember, though he tried to, but it was given him to enrich immeasurably English literature by the kindly way by which before and after his death he peiced out the brains of others with his money. His will contained the names of eighty legatees, most of them men of letters and of science, among whom were Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey and Barry Cornwall, as well as the Brownings. What an example is this son of the tropic zone—for he was born in Jamaica, West Indies—to the cold-blooded speculators of America who clink their dollars as they smile their pity over the helplessness of the only men who deal in imperishable things, they who alone cope successfully with oblivion. The nations of the world have been niggard towards the only things that make ultimately for the glory of the nation, and most backward of all the nations in this respect is the United States. Norway has a small pension always for three or four of her leading poets, and the Ibsen she would scarcely tolerate within her own borders she has helped support all these years with a poet's stipend while he has stayed away to sing the disgraces as well as the glories of Norway; he, of all her sons, making Norway famous, compelling the eyes of the civilized world to look towards her fiords, her snow gorges and her liberty-loving peasants.

When France found that she had a romantic youth who had secretly enlisted in a French regiment in order to secure free passage to India, where he expected to desert and go in search of some one who would help him decipher the manuscript brought home by the East India traders, which nobody in Europe could read, the Government met him at the place of embarkation with an honorable discharge, a free passage to India, and a small annual pension while he pursued his studies. That was probably the most profitable investment made in that decade, if not in the century. By that little act it puts all coming generations under a debt of gratitude to it, for it brought to the Western world again the precious Scripture of Zoroaster and his successors, the Zend-Avesta, a grand old bible. England has a provision by which a sum never to exceed £1,200, $6,000, may be expended by the Prime Minister to advance the cause of letters. When Matthew Arnold was drawing a salary of £700 as one of the school inspectors of the realm Mr. Gladstone added a pension of £250 that he might be more free to serve the cause for which he was so eminently fitted, and there were those in England who censured the waste. The Spectator, in 1883, commenting on this censure says, "It is the rarest thing in the world for the state to do anything for the poet, historian or discoverer. Still we are not without hope. Genius and service begins to be recognized by those who understand, and when the millions understand they will not be less grateful." It is said that in France little towns honored by the residence of a genius will move the market place or silence church bells rather than that he should be disturbed. This is true discrimination. In this country we pity a banker who fails, losing thereby perhaps a hundred or more thousand dollars; but what about the man who has started out to serve his day and generation, to tell the story of its heroes, to sing for it a noble song, to elevate its education, shape its institutions, ennoble its life, but fails, utterly fails because the grim goblin of starvation and nakedness drives him to meaner work. And perhaps that banker has helped drag him down. Who is most to be pitied? Oh, America, America! when will you awake to an appreciation of your real wealth-makers, to an understanding of what true wealth is? Now your wealthy people vie with each other in building palaces and calling them colleges; building noble facades and putting a lot of things behind them, and calling them museums, art galleries and raising high spires and calling them churches. But these do not make colleges or museums, art galleries or churches. They are made of brains, of hearts, of souls. The only investment that will bring them is an investment in men, men with courage, men with enthusiasm, men on fire from on high. Shame on the college that seeks a "hustler" for its president, a church which selects a minister because he is a "good beggar" and it is in debt. No wonder that our young men run to foot-ball and our young women to the trivialities of dress and the superficialities of life. What a glorious advantage he for whom the necessities of the body are provided might have in the world! The inheritor of wealth may begin where his father left off, convert his dollars into ideas, change material wealth into spiritual earnestness. There is always a chance for noble investments in these directions.

Lynch Law and the South.

The Independent for February has a series of articles on "Lynching, Its Cause and Cure," with special reference to negro lynching in the South, which is worth reading, though we fear that most will put the paper down with the same prejudices with which they took it up.

As regards the question proper, there can be little question that Dr. Hoss's view is the correct one; but the question of justice as between the races is not so easily answered. There is little room for doubt in the minds of those who are most conversant with the facts, that the Southern view that the life-blood of the offender is the only atonement for the violation of a woman's person, has very much to do with the matter in issue: when a white man violates a white woman (with or without her consent) one of her kinsmen shoots him; when a negro violates a white woman, her kinsmen in a body—that is, the men of her race—unite to hang the offender. Back of this lies the fact that human life is not valued as highly by the Southern people as it is in the North. Whether or not their conception of "honor" be a false one, the fact is that as a people they hold "honor" higher than life. This is seen not only in the matter of sex relations but also in the matter of indignities as between man and man.

It is a mistake to assume that the race question is at the bottom of lynching in the South. It is a very important element, of which we shall speak more at length before concluding, but it is not the bottom fact. The primary fact is that law and human life are subordinate, in the conception of the Southern people, to personal honor.

If a man has imputed cowardice to you, given you the lie in the presence of others, or called you by an opprobrious name, and will not apologize, or has tweaked your nose, you must kill him. Further than this, the Southern people are more clannish than those of the North. This is not only true of white over against black, or of South over against North, but also of one family as distinguished from another. The Southern gentleman will do more for his remote kindred than the Northern man thinks of doing. The Southern mountaineer makes his cousin's quarrel his own, and thus a vendetta arises. The Southern white man visits upon one negro a more severe punishment than would otherwise fall to his lot because of the indignity which another negro has put upon his race. Feeling that the negro race is far inferior to the white, and not having a very high regard for human life in the case of the latter, it is inevitable that he should hold the life of a negro in even less estimation. Thus the race feeling comes to play an important part in the sad phenomena of law-violation, but it must not be forgotten that though the part it plays is an important one it is still a subordinate one. This is seen when the large number of lynchings and other violations of law in the mountain section of the South, where the negro cuts no figure, is taken into account.

What is needed, then, is not vehement denunciations of the South for oppression of the negro,—which denunciation, by inflaming the passions of both races, only makes matters worse, and which because it is in the main unjust prevents those who do in a measure deserve it from realizing its partial truth,—but a campaign of education directed against the mistaken and eminently unchristian notion of honor which is primarily responsible for the disregard of human life and the violation of law which cast so dark a shadow upon our civilization.

Men and Things

WITH all due respect for brains, I think women cannot be too early taught to respect their own ten fingers.—Dinah Muloch Craik.

A STEAMER on rollers is the latest proposition in marine navigation. M. Bayin proposes thus to diminish the resistance of the water and to increase speed.

MISS KATHARINE PEARSON WOODS, of Baltimore, the author of "Mezzorott, Shoemaker," is a resident for the winter at Denison House, the college settlement for women on Tyler street, Boston. She has addressed several organizations on "Modern Social Movements," of which she has long been a close student.

THE time has come when all religious denominations must affirm that no public moneys shall be used for sectarian instruction; the time-honored principle of the separation of Church and State must be again emphasized. If a church is not willing to support its own schools, it cannot come to the State for aid. I would go so far in the application of this principle as to be willing to see all our churches taxed as is other property. We have no right to tax unbelievers that churches may be maintained; no more right than they would have to tax churches for the support of infidel clubs. Our public schools must be kept free from the touch of ecclesiastical control. No church has a right to use ecclesiastical pains and penalties to control the vote of American citizens.—Independent.

WHEN Linnæus first saw an English common with the gorse in full bloom, he burst into tears and fell on his knees and thanked God that he had been permitted to see so glorious a sight. The great naturalist had a passionate love for flowers, in illustration of which feeling a pretty incident is recorded. When choosing an object with which to connect his name, Linnæus did not select any of the gorgeous flowers of the tropics, or the grand pine trees of his native land, but rather a frail, trailing herb that reared its tiny pink bells some two or three inches above the moss and fallen fir needles in northern forests, and gave it the name of Linnæa borealis, by which it is still known. This plant became his badge and formed the device on his bookplate, with the motto, expressed in Latin: "So deep my love for flowers." —New Christian Advocate.

The New Light.

For if a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how shall he love God whom he hath not seen?

Long years—the slow-strung years of youth—a soul

Groped toward the face divine with eager love,

Yet blind in heart. For toward that blessed goal

Alone she pressed, her passion fixed above.

Though mortal men around her wept and bled,

They sang and smiled, they climbed to heaven or fell,

They clasped to heart the new-born and the dead,

They thought their thoughts, and heard their passing-bell—

Yet to her soul a single aim was known Amid this stress of life; self-centered, still

To choose the highest, purest for her own,

And scorn what seemed not suited to her will.

"'Tis not of God," she cried, "this sin and strife;

Man, self-condemned, destroys his nobler part;

I love his dreamed-of glory; but his life—

Too sordid, low, it falls to touch my heart.

"The love of God alone can be my stay,
Of law that binds me to the perfect right,

I hear the voice supreme, and I obey—
Sweet star of joy that leads me through the night."

So all her faith but shut her more away

From the deep founts of life; though earnest will

For man's subjection to the nobler sway

Grew flame in her, self-choice controlled her still.

And, like the Grecian youth, she bent her head

Away from sky and sun to mirrored gleam

Of her own form, nor knew the image dead

A pale reflection in a lifeless stream.

Till that almighty love whose kingdom spreads

Its all-benign redemption boundless wide,

And on the humble heart sweet influence sheds,

In human form stooped pitying to her side;

And sudden answering love hath laid her low

In childlike trust—then to her eyes unsealed,

Heedless of fainting rebel waves below,

In peace the Rock Eternal stands revealed.

And in her inmost veins she drinks the word:

"Who hath not loved the brother he hath known,

Loveth not God—though deep his heart be stirred,

The sight of God on him hath never shone.

"Some fitful gleams were thine, that thou wert bold

To think assured light; for eyeless pride

Delights in dusk. But, lowly now, behold

The perfect day shall in thy heart abide.

"For the enspiring Love thou hast adored

As holy law for will, dwells not apart;

Through all men is the living spirit poured

That draws with chains of fire thy rebel heart."

There is one thing in common aboard a train of cars—and that is, destination. All are bound somewhere. If the distance be long, and it is understood that "this car goes through," the travelers going through settle down resignedly, if not comfortably. But there is a good lady or an elderly gentleman seated not far away who is not going far. The frost on the window-panes is a real hindrance to their peace of mind. The lady will scratch a little spot with her finger-nails, and then rub the place with the end of her shawl until she has at least a peep into the outer world, which is very comforting. For, if the conductor should happen to forget, or she, being a trifle deaf, should not hear him when he called out her station, she could by means of this clearing on the window "see for herself when she was nearing home," and "if the conductor did not stop the train, get somebody to ring the bell."

"How far are you going, madam?"

"Only nigh onto sixty miles."

"Oh, well, you have an hour yet."

"Yes, I know; but I'm unused to keepin' time on a train, and it's always best to be on the lookout when you are in strange places. I wouldn't miss gettin' off at Woolcottsville for a small fortune. You see I'm a Woolcott; an' about everybody's a Woolcott there, with now and then a Brown or a Smith sprinkled in. It's to be a great day there to-morrow. The new church is to be dedicated, and my great-grandchild that's to be named after me is to be baptized. The whole town will be out, an' if I was missin',—well, it would spoil everything, for they're countin' on me, and will be at the depot, a crowd of them. I guess they would n't allow the train to go by, not if they could stop it. They have to signal sometimes, or it don't stop, I'm told. I believe we're gettin' there. No, I guess not either. I thought that was Josiah Woolcott's barn; but I see that it is n't. His has a gable on it.

"Woolcottsville is an old town?"

"Bless you, yes. Way back to the time of the Indians. My grandfather fought the red-skins a whole day and drove 'em off. He had several of the settlers to help him, but all allowed if Hiram Woolcott had n't planned the fight, and shown uncommon bravery, it might have turned out very different. He stood up face to face with the chief, 'Hawk-in-the-mud,' and held a parley. They all said the Indian's eye quailed. Grandfather stood six feet and two inches in his stockings. He was a very strong man, and never knew what fear was. The Woolcotts all have been a very brave family. It has often been remarked that I resemble my grandfather very much. But I guess my courage'd oozed at the sight of Indians. Mercy!—We must be gettin' near the station. No; that's Brandyville—and there's ten miles more to go."

"Any romances in your town?"

"Romances! Well, yes, I should say there was. It's all as romantic as a brand-new story. An' has been ever since the settlement was made. The second year one of the children was kidnapped, a boy ten year old. Nothin' was ever heard of him until twelve years after, when he came to town one day all in paint and feathers, bringin' an Indian girl with him. They'd traveled a hundred miles to give a warning to the white settlers, and did n't know they were comin' to his own folks. But his mother knew him as soon as she set eyes on him, and made him wash off the paint, and dress himself in some of his father's clothes. And they dressed up the Indian girl who, it is said, looked nowhere near as well as in her own blankets. But she took to civilized ways, learned to wash dishes, milk, and iron and churn as well as white folks.

"Well, the Browns of those days were a very proud set, and had high ideas for their son that was restored to them. They looked for a match with the Governor's daughter. But they must have been a blinded set not to have seen how matters stood. Everybody else saw clear enough that Alfred and Oena were already's good as man and wife. As soon as Oena—what a sweet name—could talk English enough to make herself understood, she said their vows were plighted before they left the Indian camp. This was her story:

"Alfred and Oena grow up together; love like brother and sister; then, love another way. Then, Alfred say to Oena,—‘Go with me to tell the white people your people will creep upon them some night and slay every one of them. Then you will be my bride.’ I suppose she didn’t exactly tell it in those words, but that’s the way grandmother always told it.

“Well, the Browns were in a towering rage when their Alfred confessed that it was all true. Said the father, ‘I had rather have never set eyes on you again.’ But the Smiths and the Woolcotts all sided with Alfred and Oena, and when Christmas came the Browns made the best of it and accepted the Indian girl as Alfred’s Christmas offering. And they do say some of the noblest of the Browns in the country are the linenal descendants of Alfred and Oena.”

“Woolcottsville!”

“The conductor kept a sharper lookout than I did after all. I do believe I should of rode by.”

A New England Snow Storm.

During my sojourn in Chicago this fall a friend said to me: “How I should like to see a New England snow-storm, and feel the restfulness of a Sabbath day such as I used to spend in my childhood.”

These words come back to me on this Sabbath day, as I sit beside the open fire-place in our low-posted, wide-spread cottage home in this quiet country town a thousand miles from that dear friend.

The snow has been falling gently and noiselessly all night. Mother Earth, so bare and brown yesterday, now has on a robe of purest white; the leafless trees have a feathery ridge of snow on every branch and twig; the stone walls are fast being covered with a white frosting, and only here and there can be seen bits of gray moss on their white surface. The irregular apple trees look grotesque, and the neighbors’ farm houses and outbuildings seem far away and indistinct in their outlines, seen through the whiteness of the storm.

Stillness reigns everywhere, only broken by the muffled sound of the “first bell” from the church tower a mile or more away, which marks the hour of half-past nine on a Sabbath morn. The bell “tolling in the people” calls in vain. No one passes our cottage. We must “look through nature up to nature’s God.”

I wish those who know nothing of the beauties of a country snowstorm, and those whose memory dimly pictures it, could look out across the fields, the meadows, past the ever-green thickets, to the hills and mountains in the distance, all white with their first snow. It seems fitting that Christmas should find us so, and that the many sleighbells should keep time to the merry music of the heart that every one should feel at Christmas time.

The “White City” (man’s handi-work) had its beauty, its charms. So, to the eyes that love it, the white country of God’s own building is also beautiful, and brings a sense of rest and peace. I am thankful I have seen and can enjoy both.

I like on such a day as this to sit with “my own” beside our home fire and feel that—

Home is where there’s one to love,

Home is where there’s one to love us;

that it is not merely four square walls. Home can mean so little or so much.

I do not forget the advantages of the city, where one can listen to lectures, concerts, sermons, and be hurried along in the ever moving crowd,—the greenhouses yield roses the year round,—but who shall say that we do not enjoy our chrysanthemums, geraniums, and spicy pinks as well?

Down in the cellar, in a dark closet, with the fruits and berries (canned in their seasons) are my hyacinths which are to brighten our home by-and-by with their beautiful blossoms and fragrance.

We miss, indeed, the inspiration which comes from listening to fine music and the grand uplifting thoughts of gifted men and women, but as we could not have these we have taken comfort in reading aloud that wonderful sermon of thanksgiving for the Parliament of Religions, by M. J. Savage. We have sung and played in our modest way our favorite hymns. We have written letters to the dear absent ones.

About us lie scattered, not the Sunday papers,—neither was our morning rest disturbed by a news-boy’s cry,—but the last magazine, our weekly papers, a book of Bayard Taylor’s which we are reading aloud, UNITY, The Unitarian, and other publications which we value and which help to keep the channel to the outside world open.

We have sat beside the open fire place watching the many dancing flames from the white birch wood; even the large gray cat, sleek and shiny, has come in to curl himself upon the hearthrug and enjoy the warmth. The day has been one of peace and rest, such as many a wanderer might crave. When night comes on we shall pile the wood higher upon the andirons and let the ruddy blaze shine forth to cheer the passer-by, if such there be. Instead of shutting out the world by drawing our curtains we shall—

Raise the curtains, let the brightness of your cheerful light shine forth;

To the passer in the darkness

It may be of vital worth.

Give a glimpse to lonely wanderer of your household full of joy;

It may rouse to new ambition

Some poor, tempted, friendless boy.

SARAH M. BAILEY.

The Czar’s Oppression.

During the last year there lived a few hundred inhabitants in the little town of Kroze, in Russia. They were a simple people. It did not take very much to make them happy. Their wants were not numerous. By industriously tilling the soil the men made a frugal livelihood and were happy with their wives and children. These poor peasants had a little church over which presided a parish priest. As far as they could be loyal to their consciences they tried to be loyal to their sovereign. But their religion did not please the great Czar. Last November he sent orders that their chapel be demolished. The distressed people watched their church for a month, night and day, endeavoring to prevent it. One day, while worshipping, a strong detachment of Cossacks fell upon and overpowered them. Some were killed outright and some were drowned while crossing the river. Many were cast into prisons. All who were caught were flogged with the knout. Two sick women died from this punishment and were not allowed before death to see a priest of their own faith.

The man who ordered these atrocities is that absolute despot, the Czar of Russia. He is the man who persecutes the Jews. He is the man who tears men and women from their families and sends them away to endure the horrors of a life-long exile in Siberia. He is the man by whom a T. Dewitt Talmage was feted and feasted and whom the latter praised in a sermon with fulsome eulogy.

We do not know what you think of this sounding the praise of Russia’s autocrat. We can express our opinion in short order. Rather than eulogize the Czar of Russia would we be banished from the presence of men. Rather would we bid adieu forever to father, mother, brother and sister. Rather than sing the praises of this monster would we lie down to our last sleep upon the cold, damp ground, with no friend near us to drop a tear, and with nothing over us but God’s clear sky.

G. W. MILLS, M. D.

In the little book “Pensees,” by the Queen of Roumania, she says: “It is better to have a physician for a confessor than a priest. You tell the priest that you detest mankind; he answers, ‘You are not a Christian.’ The physician gives you a dose of rhubarb, and you love your fellow-being. You tell the priest that you are tired of living. He answers ‘Suicide is a crime.’ The physician gives you a stimulant, and immediately you feel life supportable.”

“JOHNNY, add seven apples to two apples, and what will you have?”
“Colic, sir.”—Harper’s Bazar.

Danger at Sea.

Belios of wreck drift on the deep,

Dark threats of death to ships of state;

No chart their whereabouts can keep,

So dynamite must be their fate:

But worse than these are wrecks of creed,

That perished in past storm of years;

Still God’s broad highway they impede.

And are a source of woe and tears.

From port of present truth we sail

To cross with joy Hope’s boundless sea;

While ships with wind and tide prevail,

God save where drifting hulks may be!

Church-Door Pulpit

Tyndall.

A SERMON BY REV. REED STUART.

The law of the Lord is perfect.—Hebrew poetry.
 Whatsoever things are true.—New Testament.

The recent death of Tyndall, whose fame as a writer upon natural science and its relation to life and religion is world-wide, is sufficient in itself to arrest attention.

In our commercial and rapid age common events soon fade from view. We are like persons flying along in a railway train when objects follow each other in such quick succession that one soon erases the memory of another. In the old days, when emigrants followed a trail to California, the peaks of the Rocky Mountains would be in sight for weeks. Now a few hours are sufficient to carry the traveler beyond the point where they first appear on the one side until the point is reached where they disappear on the other. So are we being rapidly hurried forward by our flying age past many great events. Not much time is given for them to make an impression upon us. Even the great persons who seem so indispensable while they are with the world, are soon forgotten by it. It would surprise any one who would sit down and recall the long list of those who have made the latter half of this century glorious, with whom most of us now present have lived as contemporaries, who have disappeared from our sight. Writers, scientists, statesmen, warriors, how many of them whose names were sky-piercing a few years ago have now disappeared from our view.

It may be that these hurrying times are not wholly to blame for our forgetfulness. It may be that nature has made provision that no names should be so great as to hide humanity, or to give them a title upon all the future. The earth must be swept clean to make room for new forms of greatness. However this may be, the great do pass away. The younger Antonine in his day said that "great men, like great languages go out of fashion. Those who have been the wonder of their age and who shone with unusual luster soon become as a tale that is told and are swallowed up in oblivion. All this is Nature's method and Nature never does any mischief." It was easy to forget the dead in Shakspeare's time, for Hamlet expresses surprise that the King who had been dead two months was not forgotten, and he indulged the hope that a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year, that is, if he would build churches. In that weird story of Phra, the Phœnician, as often as the hero returned to life he wondered that the kings and warriors and lovers whom he had known before had so completely faded from remembrance. Each age, however, is sufficient to itself, and furnishes the kind of means needed to effect its purpose. Hence, when the great die we will mourn their loss, but we will not be hopeless, for we are assured that each coming emergency will meet its master. For every star that sets in the west another will rise in the east.

The great eloquence of Massillon was often employed in pronouncing funeral orations over France's royalty. Sometimes the discourse was much greater than the person whose praise was celebrated by it. As the river is more majestic than that which floats upon its surface, so often the on-rolling stream of eloquence was much grander than the king or count or ecclesiastic whose name was carried along by it. If this orator were present now such things would not occur. The theme would be equal to his greatest sentences. It would become a river which would easily sweep orator and eloquence and audience along with it. But he is not here, and in the absence of any one like him the fitting words of praise must remain unspoken. Nevertheless it seems appropriate that, while the death of this scientist is not asked to furnish the main theme of such unadorned words as are spoken here, it may be permitted, at least, to recall to our minds some things connected with his life.

One of the first things to be noted is the type of man to which he belonged. Providence has taken care that no part of nature shall be left unexamined and unreported. The universe is divided into departments, and every department has its bureau of investigation and information. Mind is one such department. Beauty is another. Government another. Morals is another. Religion is another. Still another is that nature which the senses apprehend,—all those forms of matter from atoms to worlds. Those departments have all been here, in some shape, since the beginning of history. Those whom Providence has fitted and commissioned to work in them have not always found the same thing nor made the same report in the different ages of the world, but all have found something, and all have made some report. All the way from Plato to Emerson, there have been those who sought to know the mind and its powers. From Homer and Virgil to Shakspeare and Tennyson; from Jubal and St. Cecilia to Beethoven and Mozart; from Parrhasius to Millais, there have been those who have tried to learn the laws of beauty in all its forms and interpret them to mankind. Government has been made a study all the way from that of the patriarchs on to that of republics. From those who saw no distinction between might and right, the department of morals moved until it set forth the Golden Rule. The bureau of religion has been making its reports all the way from fetishism to worship of the Infinite. All the way from Thales to Linnæus and Darwin, there have been those who have tried to find out the nature and meaning of things which the eye can see and the hand can touch and the ear can hear. It is to this last class that Tyndall belongs. When the cabinet for this century was being made up he was invited to a place in the department of science.

Of his fitness for the place there can be no doubt. He was fitted by temperament. He was born with a love for nature. Whoso would understand anything must draw very close to it. Sympathy will open doors which all other keys fail to unlock. Love defies locksmiths because the hearts on either side of the door are both beating to the same music. The Knight does not want to find the sleeping Beauty, any more than she longs to be found. So nature is a kind of enchanted castle in which beauty is imprisoned, and her doors are only opened to him who loves that which is within.

Whoever reads what this man of science has written will soon see that he was not lacking in this love. He laid his ear close to the heart of nature and she whispered her secrets to him. He found always the first and also the last meaning of things. They exist not only in certain definite and mathematical relations to each other, but they exist also for thought. The definite spoke to him of the indefinite; the finite of the infinite. He believed that science was practical, but he never lost sight of its ideal quality. It must be used to turn wheels, to light cities, to cure diseases, to minister in a thousand ways to the every-day welfare of man; but it may be used as a means of intellectual culture, ministering to the soul and unfolding its immense possibilities.

No one can charge him with lack of precision; some of the clearest utterances that can be found in the literature of science fell from his lips; and yet there is a certain glow and poetical fervor in what he says which cannot be found in the writings of others upon the same themes. No other one has written with greater precision upon chemistry; yet in the coming together of the atoms he sees something more than the prose fact. It is a marriage of the particles; a kind of sacrament; and he sings the epithalamium and flings roses to celebrate the union. He was called a materialist. But seeing the world as he saw it, this was a kind of high praise instead of a condemnation, for to him matter was not the brute thing that many had called it, but was sacred. It, too, was a manifestation of the "Power which is absolutely inscrutable to the mind of man." His materialism was more religious than the spiritualism of some of those who condemned him. When among the Alps he was always the man of science; but he was the man of science plus the man of poetry and religion. The size of a glacier is accurately measured. Its speed is determined by a series of experiments with mathematical exactness. The Weisshorn, the Matterhorn, the Jungfrau and the whole awful pageant of "Alps on Alps" thrusting their lonely white tops into the blue sky are described in such way that one hardly needs to go to Switzerland to see them. They are already before the eye on the printed page. And yet one does not know which is greater,—the mountains or this man's thought about them; about the universe of which they are a small part, and about the mystery of which they are a partial revelation. Sometimes in the very midst of accurate observations he is arrested by the meaning of it all and breaks out into a rhapsody which, without cutting loose from scientific accuracy, reaches the very pinnacle of poetry and religious feeling. Klopstock and Coleridge, amid the same scenes, never rose higher in reverent expression. Let us repeat some of these thoughts of his:

"Standing upon the weather-beaten spire of the Matterhorn, my thoughts naturally ran back to its possible growth and origin. Nor did they halt there, but wandered on through molten worlds to that nebulous haze which philosophers have regarded as the proximate source of all material things. Did that formless fog contain potentially the sadness with which I regarded the Matterhorn? Did the thought which now ran back to it simply return to its primeval home? * * * If the final goal of man has not yet been attained * * * who can say that such yearnings and questionings are not necessary to the opening of a finer vision, to the budding and growth of divine powers. Without this upward force could man have risen to his present height? When I look at the heavens and the earth * * * and ask myself, 'Is there no being in the universe that knows more about these matters than I do?' What is my answer?"

Let us find his answer in this:

"The day was perfect; not a cloud was to be seen, and the gauzy haze of the distant air, though sufficient to soften the outlines and enhance the coloring of the distant mountains, was far too thin to obscure them. Over the peaks and through the valleys the sunbeams poured, unimpeded save by the mountains themselves, which sent their shadows in bars of darkness through the illuminated air. I had never before witnessed a scene which affected me like this one. I opened my note book to make a few observations, but soon relinquished the attempt. There was something incongruous, if not profane, in allowing the scientific faculty to interfere where silent worship seemed the reasonable service."

Where can we find anything surpassing this as a sun-poem?

"As I looked over the wondrous scene I asked myself, How was this colossal work performed? Who chiseled these mighty and picturesque masses out of a mere protuberance of the earth. And the answer was at hand. Ever young, ever mighty—with the vigor of a thousand worlds still within him—the real sculptor was even then climbing up the eastern sky. It was he who raised aloft the waters which cut out these ravines; it was he who planted the glaciers on the mountain slopes, thus giving gravity a plough to open out the valleys; and it is he who, acting through the ages, will finally lay low these mighty monuments, rolling them gradually seaward, Sowing the seeds of continents to be; so that the people of an older earth may see mould spread and corn wave over the hidden rocks which at this moment bear the weight of the Jungfrau."

Thus his pages of science are also pages of poetry. His facts are constantly flaming up into great reverent thoughts.

Not that he was merely a speculator and weaver of theories. He was one of the most painstaking observers and careful experimenters. He spent five hours a day for twelve years in a private study of natural phenomena. He dealt with exact things,—drafting, surveying, triangulating. In chemistry, he taught Faraday some things he did not know. He made independent discoveries in thermo-dynamics. Yet he never halted with the fact until he had converted it into life. Nature was another inspired volume to him and he was constantly bending over its pages. Of him it may be said that "science was symbol and illustration" of life in all its various forms. The world was not a machine, but a wonderful living thing. Every particle of it was athrob with significance. Early in life as was written of another, Nature became his friend and guide, saying,

Here is a story book thy Father has written for thee.

Come wander with me, she said,
Into regions yet untrod;
And read what is still unread
In the manuscript of God.

And he wandered away and away
With Nature, the dear, old nurse,
Who sang to him night and day
The rhyme of the universe.

And whenever the way seemed long,
Or his heart began to fail,
She would sing a more wonderful song,
Or tell a more marvelous tale.

Less has been heard of this man and his work for the last decade than for the ten or fifteen years lying just back of it. But this is not because he and his works have declined in importance. It is not because he has ceased to affect thought. But it is being affected in a more silent way.

While a storm is raging it makes a strong and aggressive impression upon the earth. It is noticed by all. While the wind is coming, blast after blast threatening buildings and trees, while the rain is driven like bullets against the windows or is making the ground hiss by its down pour, and occasionally the darkness is rent by a vivid flash and the tumult for a moment is silenced by a peal of thunder which makes the foundations of the earth tremble, no one can remain unimpressed by it. Persons exclaim, What a storm that is! What a display of power! But after a time the uproar ceases and the earth and the human heart resume their accustomed duties. Yet the influence of the storm goes right along for many days, but in a gentler way. It is seen now as a secondary effect. Fear has given way to a kind of quiet joy. The lightning has burned up malaria. The wind has brought a new life from health-giving regions. The rain has made a deeper green in the grass and the gardens are flaunting richer colors.

Something like this has happened in the world of science. From 1860 until 1880 a storm was raging. The doctrine of evolution was trying to establish itself in the mind of mankind. The old doctrines were determined not to be displaced. The storm became a kind of battle. On the one side was force in motion. On the other force in rest. It was thought against establishment. It was the new against the old. It was science against ecclesiasticism. Thus the storm raged for twenty years. Some feared that nothing of church or religion would be left standing. But gradually the storm center moved forward and quiet returned. Now changed conditions appear. The church is still here, but it is in many ways a better church. The spiritual atmosphere has been much cleared. It is much easier to breathe than it was before.

For these changed conditions, along with others, Tyndall must be remembered with gratitude. Perhaps as much as any other one of this generation he has helped religion to free itself from superstition. He was well instructed, he was reverent, and he was always brave. His famous Belfast address marks an epoch in the long historic battle between science and superstition. Up to that time no word so clear and brave had been uttered. The gauntlet was hurled right into the midst of those who stood as the champions of the prevalent theology, and let who would take it up he did not retreat a single inch. If the age of miracles is not past, then let us have some performed, was his request. If God interferes with the order of the universe in answer to prayer, then have it done if you would silence those who deny it.

In 1858 in Switzerland, at the foot of the Rhone glacier, he met a stalwart young priest who had come thither to bless the mountains. As the official representative of the church he was deputed to make such arrangements with nature as would insure food for the herds and flocks that were to be pastured in the vicinity. At another time in the Tyrol a priest who feared the bursting of a glacier dam offered the sacrifice of the mass upon the ice to avert the calamity. As a Protestant, Tyndall smiled at such childish attempts to regulate the order of events. In 1865, however, England was invaded by the cattle plague and was threatened by the cholera, when an order was passed in council commanding a special form of prayer for the removal of the plague and the preservation of the country from the pestilence. To his mind the difference between the superstition of the simple priests of the Catholic church among the Alps and the educated bishops and clergymen of Protestant England was not sufficiently large to be detected with the naked eye. In substance he said as much. His attitude, as might have been expected, called forth the sharpest antagonism. Soon after came the famous "prayer test," familiar to all; a test which seems fair enough, but which never was accepted. But from all over the country, on both sides of the Atlantic, came a perfect blast of indignant protest. From elegant bishops in the great cities, down to the simple cross-roads preacher, there came answers to his daring proposition. It was thought he would not be able to withstand such a theological cyclone. But he did withstand it.

There is a story, that when Napoleon was crossing the Alps, a bugle was caught by an avalanche and swept down the mountain into the chasm below. As he felt he was going he placed the bugle to his lips and sounded the notes of "Forward;" but his comrades heard the tone become fainter and fainter until finally it ceased, silenced by the snow that piled upon him. Here the story is partly reversed. When the avalanche of tracts and sermons began to pour upon this man, he placed his bugle to his lips and blew a clear blast of "Onward." The more it raged and rushed the clearer grew his notes, until both continents heard its ringing sound.

Of course, in the heat of this debate, many severe epithets were directed toward him. Some of those who could not dislodge him from his position by argument tried to cover up their weakness by personal abuse. He was called an enemy of religion. But it could easily be proved from his writings that the charge was unfounded. His opposition was all confined to what his opponents called religion, but which he called superstition. He was called atheist, yet he said that "the scientific man has as little fellowship with the atheist who says there is no God, as with the theist who professes to know the mind of God." Accused of being a materialist, yet he said, "he bowed his head in the dust before the mystery of mind." Charged with irreverence and of ignoring religious feeling, yet he said that "reverence, wonder and awe are woven into the texture of man; to yield satisfaction to religious sentiment is the problem of problems of the present hour." His hostility was not directed against prayer, but against the kind of prayers that were offered and the objects sought to be gained by them. He said: "It is not my habit of mind to think otherwise than solemnly of the feeling which prompts prayer. It is a power which I should like to see guided, not extinguished—devoted to practicable objects instead of wasted upon air." Many other quotations might be made from his own words which would go to show that he had all the essentials of a religion in his thought and in his practice. His whole fault must be found in that his views of religion were different from the prevailing views of his age. His crime was that he did not agree with the church authorities. It was the same crime for which Jesus was crucified and Socrates was poisoned. But time has a slow but sure way of righting such things. The crime of one age has more than once become the glory of succeeding ages.

The controversy in which he took such active and such fearless part was, of course, only another form of the great historic battle. It has hardly ceased from the days of Luctetius onward. It has not been between science and religion, but between science and theology. The latter has always assumed the right to dictate to the former. In 1616 the teaching of Copernicus was condemned by the church. Before that Bruno had been burned for teaching that there are many worlds besides the earth. Galileo was made to recant those views of the universe which were not in harmony with theology. For saying that the laws of nature must be sought in nature and not in books, Campanella was imprisoned for twenty-seven years. So this war between natural law and church miracle which we have seen waged is only one campaign of the long conflict.

The war is not over yet. But it is being fought in a different field and by different warriors. It is not now between natural science and theology so much as between theology and literature. Now we do not hear any sermons or read any articles upon miracles or upon the reconciliation of Genesis and Geology. Historic criticism, or what is fact and what is fable in the Bible, is now the point of attack and defense. But we must not forget those who stood in the front in that former conflict and won such victories for rational religion.

That they were victories no one can doubt. Not mere verbal triumphs, either, such as logicians sometimes gain over their adversaries. But triumphs of reason. Evolution is now the almost universally accepted method to account for the origin and growth of all things. The belief in the reign of law is now so widespread that it would be difficult to find any well-informed person who would expect a miracle to be wrought in answer to prayer. Twenty-five years ago public prayer was often employed to avert or remove a public calamity. Now, in this respect, a great change is apparent. Last year, when the cholera threatened to invade America, the cities did not order days of prayer to ward it off. Instead of that they established a more rigid quarantine and cleaned their streets. A day of prayer was observed for the recovery of Garfield. It is the last of such occasions which the memory now recalls. The wounded President died in spite of the prayers, which may have done something to confirm the distrust, which was already in the mind, of the efficacy of such an agent in saving from death those whose blood is poisoned. We read now with a smile that when Halley's comet appeared in 1456, the Pope ordered the church bells of Europe to be rung to scare the monster away. An additional prayer was also ordered to assist the bells. The comet disappeared and the faithful thought that the noise and the prayers had driven it away. When some of our descendants read that we tried to drive the grasshoppers out of Minnesota and to end a long drought and to cure a fatal wound with prayer, the pitying smile will linger for a moment upon their faces.

Whether we shall ever have a religion which will yield to exact demonstration as do the problems of mathematics, we do not know. Probably not; there will always be a point where logic will halt and hope and imagination must plume themselves for an onward flight. But that we may have a religion full of all rational qualities seems to be assured. Its inferences will all proceed from reasonable premises. Its prophecies will all grow out of its experiences. It will repose where everything else reposes—upon the basis of natural law. As thus the worlds are sustained, the tides rise and recede, the snow falls and the rain, the clouds come and go, the mists veil the mountains and the thunder rolls amid the hills, the heart beats and the cheek flushes, golden hair covers the head of youth and white hair the head of age,—as all other things are moved and sustained by law, so will religion be created and sustained. Its miracles will be found in the constancy of seed time and harvest and in the steady flow of life through all things. Its sacraments will be the doing of duty. The laws will be its Providence. Its church will be the meeting place of great thoughts about God and great love for man. Its hopes, its prayers, its hymns will accord with nature. They will be as graceful as the curve of the sky, free as the flow of rivers and glad as the spring sunshine.

Such a religion can only give unbounded confidence to all who make it theirs. So sane, so grand, so far-reaching seems the Divine Order of the universe that all good must be contained in it. The same Power that fashions the cradle of man upon the earth fashions the grave. The love that bends over one bends over the other. Birth, life, death are natural steps in the order of Providence; and a life after death seems no more marvelous than the life before death. It fits well with that plan which, working through the ages, has formed the soul and inspired it with such mighty hopes.

The Study Table

A Sketch of the Apostolic Church.*

In one respect this little book reminds us forcibly of the Revised Version of the Old Testament, for its dangerous innovations are relegated to the margin instead of being welcomed frankly into the text. After acknowledging that the passage in Acts describing the "speaking with tongues" can have no other meaning than that the disciples were endowed with the power of speaking unlearned languages, the author goes on to say, in a foot note, that "The most simple and common explanation offered by those who cannot accept this as real history is," etc. (p. 74). In discussing the second visit of Paul to Jerusalem (Acts xi. 27-30) he says frankly, "A satisfactory explanation of this contradiction [with Paul's own account in Galatians] has not yet been made," and then comes a foot note—"Of course, for one who admits that it is possible for the author of the Acts to have made a mistake, the passage presents no difficulty," etc. (p. 116). Again, in the delicate matter of Paul's relation to the Law and its bearing upon the credibility of the Acts, he says in a foot note—"If the account in Acts xxi. 17-26 is true, etc. * * * Others may decide whether this is contradictory to Paul's principle as expressed in his authentic letters" (pp. 157, 158). It would have been very much better if the author had decided these questions for himself, and given us clearly and unmistakably his opinion as to the real value of his chief source, "The Acts of the Apostles." There is a provoking gingerliness about his handling of this critical problem: on p. 270 we learn that with the death of Paul we "leave sure history for the uncertain and conflicting traditions, etc."—does he mean to imply that the book of the Acts is sure history? On p. 65, speaking of the use of the Old Testament in the New he informs us that the writers "applied many passages to him [Jesus] which we, without their guidance, would not regard as real proofs of his Messiahship"—would he have us accept them as real proofs with their guidance? There are so many instances of indecision, stopping short of a seemingly irresistible conclusion and declining the responsibility of a positive opinion where traditional views are involved, that one becomes a trifle impatient, especially as in other cases the author goes beyond the limits of certainty. It may be that the Sergius Paulus referred to by Pliny as one of his authorities is the proconsul whom Paul met at Paphos, but our author is much surer about it (p. 120) than Lightfoot was and than the facts seem to warrant. Is it quite certain that Suetonius says, "The Emperor expelled the Jews from Rome some time between the years 48-51 A. D. (p. 51)? Moreover, our author's authority for the statement that in the second century, in Asia Minor, "the heathen temples were deserted, the animals of sacrifice remained unsold" (p. 195), must be Pliny, who testifies only to the condition of his own province of Pontus-Bithynia. Again, Mr. Thatcher says that during Paul's three years in Arabia "undoubtedly he spent his time there in preaching Christ" (p. 110) and for proof refers to p. 206, where he argues that unless Paul had been preaching before his first visit to Jerusalem his enemies might have contended that he began his work only with Peter's permission. But Paul's own account of his stay at Damascus, after his return, seems to prove that even if he had not preached in Arabia he had become conspicuous as a preacher in Damascus, and the Acts confirms this view (ix. 22-25, cf. also xxvi. 20). It cannot be denied that the "fighting with wild beasts at Ephesus" (1 Cor. xv. 32) may be taken literally, but in that case the omission of so frightful an experience from the catalogue of hardships in 2 Cor. xi. 25 is certainly remarkable. On p. 123 it is said that after being stoned the apostle withdrew to Lystra, when of course we should read to Derbe. On p. 163 we are told that "Asia was the name of the Roman province which was formed by the three ancient divisions, Lydia, Caria, and Lycia," where for Lycia we ought to substitute Mysia, as on p. 191. It would not be strange, however, if the latter blunder were a printer's error, like those on p. 272, where for 140 we should probably read 110 (?), and p. 307, where for 45 we should certainly read 35.

The style of the book is unusually clear and readable, but occasionally it is so loose as to be slipshod. It makes a reader rub his eyes to find such sentences as these in a book published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.: "There was nothing else so dangerous . . . than the proclamation of a Messiah" (p. 111). "All them that dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord" (p. 195). "The whole Old Dispensation, with all its authorities, were forever done away" (p. 291).

In signs and omens "men mark the hits but not the misses"; in reviewing a book like this the danger is of marking the misses and not the hits. From that danger this review has not escaped. What has been already said makes it evident that the book must be read with caution, but it certainly ought to be read. In many respects it is unsurpassed in its delineations of the apostolic age. In its grasp upon the general situation, upon the forces that were at work to make of Christianity a world religion, and especially in its presentation of "The Burning Question" in regard to Christianity and Judaism, this book has no equal (in like compass) that I know of in English. What if one find—

A fault to pardon in the drawing's lines, its body so to speak; its soul is right.

May I especially recommend this book to students who are following the Six Years' Course, in preparation for the closing lessons of the fourth year upon the general subject of the Apostolic Church? w. w. f.

"SERMONS FOR THE CHURCH." By Caleb Davis Bradlee, D. D. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1893. Cloth, 8vo, pp. 275. $1.25.

The twenty-five sermons which Dr. Bradlee has gathered into this volume are practical rather than doctrinal. They do not attempt the solution of difficult problems, but only the enforcement of plain duties. But though the emphasis is on life rather than on theological opinion, there is a theology implied as the basis of the exhortations. It is the theology of the early Unitarianism of New England. The preacher is evidently untroubled by Biblical criticism or scientific questioning. Pure religion can be obtained by the simple process of going back to the thought and practice of the primitive Christian church.

The point of view of the sermons may be learned from the following extract: "Let us go back to Nazareth, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, to all Judea and to all Syria, let us go back to the first Christian church, at its early start, and we will learn all that is necessary about the great Ruler of the heavens and the earth, while much that obscures our faith at the present hour will be entirely thrown into oblivion." Dr. Bradlee, with all his fine tolerance of disposition, distrusts the promise of a new theology, for, "the old discourse about God came through the Father by the Son, and was ratified as a complete revelation at the time of its grand, majestic, and final disclosure." He protests vigorously against any theory "that strives to emasculate the New Testament, that makes Jesus only one among many teachers, and not a perfect character that can never be copied."

Though one may well take exception to the intellectual attitude, the ethical and spiritual elements so predominate in these sermons as to give them real value. There are none of the "pale negations" or cold understatements supposed to be characteristic of Unitarian preaching. On the contrary, there is an evangelical fervor of appeal and a love of strong statement which sometimes borders on exaggeration. The style is often too diffuse for the printed page, but one can see that it would be effective from the pulpit.

The sermons are wholesome and helpful. The sermons on "The Coronation of Failure" and "Spiritual Climbing" will be especially remembered as giving the inspiration to renewed effort. S. M. C.

STUDIES OF TRAVEL: GREECE. Ditto: ITALY. By Edward A. Freeman. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1893. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 24mo, pp. 286 and 321. 75 cents each.—These papers, prepared by the great historian's daughter, are a republication of a series of papers contributed to the Saturday Review, the Guardian and the Pall Mall Gazette during the author's travels in Greece in 1877 and in Italy in 1881 and 1883. They may, perhaps, be regarded as the diversions of an historian. Full of rich allusion and keen comment they are highly suggestive to the general reader or to the historian, and have a special value for those who would themselves visit the remains of the early Greek and Italian civilization. Perhaps Freeman's greatest merit as an historian was that saneness and wholeness of view (if the expression be permissible) which would not permit the most famous period of the history of a place or people to obscure its less famous days. This is seen frequently in these papers, where he protests against the heedless destruction of the monuments of mediæval Greece in the effort to "restore" classical Greece. It also shows itself in the fondness with which he dwells on the neglected but important pre-Roman period of the Italian cities. We commend the books to lovers of history, archæology and travel.

TWO AND TWO MAKE FOUR. By Wm. T. Stead. Annual of the Review of Reviews for 1893. Paper, 1s.

Mr. Stead's story belongs to the "Looking Backward" order, and is devoted to showing how much might be done for society by a properly conducted daily paper, backed by great wealth. In it he sets forth not only the possibilities of his ideal Daily Paper, but also of the Civic Church. Everything centers about the paper, because he regards this as the age of journalism. Mr. Stead has shown himself an earnest reformer, and, we believe, a successful business man, and he is therefore entitled to a hearing, even though many of his ideas seem—and are—wildly visionary. Some of the suggestions in this book are very helpful; others are highly impracticable, if not undesirable. We shall not spoil the reader's possible enjoyment by telling the story upon which his ideas are strung. He himself figures in it under the name of Jasper Sterling. We think he has given us the key to his life,—that which is, in a way, at once its strength and its weakness,—in the statement somewhere made in this book, to the effect that nothing—be it good or be it evil—succeeds without sensationalism.

Of course the book was hastily written, and has many artistic blemishes. Like the old-fashioned story books which constantly drag a certain number of alleged nautical phrases into the conversation of their sailors, whether or not they are in place, Mr. Stead has put a few hoary expressions and peculiar modes of speech into the mouths of certain of his characters, which may at first surprise his American readers; but his English readers will understand at once—they are "Americanisms." Fortunately Mr. Stead has not consistently subjected his American characters to the use of these forms of speech. When they have thus declared their nationality and Mr. Stead gets interested in what he is making them say, this stage property is dropped, and they are permitted to talk English—at least such English as Mr. Stead himself uses. Now and again we find such abrupt transitions of thought as hint at a hasty "cutting" down of the original manuscript or else at a somewhat erratic working of the author's mind. But we must remember that this Christmas story was not put forth as a work of art, but that it is professedly a "purpose novel." F. W. S.

MONEY FOUND: RECOVERED FROM ITS HIDING PLACES, AND PUT INTO CIRCULATION THROUGH CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT BANKS. By Thomas E. Hill, author of the Hill Banking System. Revised edition, with a glossary of financial terms and general information relating to finance. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, 8vo, pp. 121. 75 cents.—The title indicates the character and purpose of this treatise. The book is fully indexed, and some twenty-five pages are given to the glossary and tables of information relating to finance. The tendency of the treatise is to attribute undue importance to financial systems in their influence upon the prosperity and happiness of the people, and accordingly to make extravagant claims for the results of his system. But disregarding this extravagance of the too enthusiastic reformer, it is well for us to examine fairly his plan,—which is that the national government should establish a large number of banks throughout the country, which should pay 3 per cent. on time deposits, and loan at 4 per cent. The author sets forth numerous advantages to come from this, but the chief are that confidence in the government would lead to the emptying of all the "old stockings" into the banks, and thus make all the currency in existence available, and that the result would be an active and elastic currency, conducing greatly to the stability of industry and commerce and the uniform prosperity of all classes. F. W. S.

EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYED for the first quarter of 1894 is an interesting magazine for all students of economic and social science. The report of the annual meeting of the Association for the Promotion of Profit-Sharing is interesting reading, as are also Mr. N. O. Nelson's paper "Through Profit-Sharing to Co-operation," and Mr. C. H. D'E. Leppington's "More than One Solution of the Labor Problem," which is taken from the Contemporary Review for last September. Mr. Nelson's utterances are especially deserving of attention because of his practical work. The N. O. Nelson Manufacturing Company, established in St. Louis, Mo., is a strong business house conducted on profit-sharing principles. During the business depression of last year it was thought wise to cut down expenses, and it was proposed by Mr. Nelson and agreed to by the men, that wages and profits should temporarily be reduced 25 per cent. October 1, after this reduction had continued three months, business justified a return to the former rates, and late in December it was announced that the business had so much improved that the one-fourth held back during the summer would be paid. Another feature of this number is a review of Prof. Gide's "Co-operative Movement in France During the Last Ten Years," which appeared in the Revue d'Economie Politique. From this it would appear that the French magazine L'Emancipation would be very useful to those who desire to study Co-operation and Profit-Sharing in that country in connection with other social questions.

Boxer and Dixie.

Can you guess to whom those names belong? No! Well, I will tell you—a dog and a cat. "Boxer" is the cutest little dog you ever saw. He is white, with light-brown ears, and one spot on his body. His tail—it is hardly any tail at all, so short and curled up like a pig's is it; but his eyes make up for the shortness of the tail, as they are large, and of beautiful dark color. He fairly talks with his eyes! Did you ever see a pair of speaking eyes? I have, and they are his, and quite as lovely as those in the head of a human being.

"Dixie" was a large white and gray cat, and those two animals were the best of friends. They would romp together, Dixie never getting vexed with Boxer, though he would pull her around by the ears or tail, just as he fancied.

These two playmates ate dinner together, too, but I am afraid that Boxer got the largest share, as he could eat so much faster; still Dixie had her share of bread and milk at supper, which Boxer did not. One day their dinner was all ready, so was Boxer, but Dixie was nowhere to be found. We called and called, still no Dixie came. We at last said, "Boxer, where is Dixie?" At this he pricked up his ears, and went to the door, as much as to say, "I am looking, but do not see her; do give me my dinner!" "No, not before Dixie comes—Go, fetch her, Boxer! go fetch Dixie."

With that he rushed into the yard, and presently we heard her mewing. Lo! there was Boxer dragging her in by the hind leg as fast as he could. He was so hungry that he could not possibly wait for her to take her own time. He had found her asleep, and must needs help her along faster than she felt like coming.

Four Dixie went off many years ago, and never came back. We are afraid some bad boy got hold of her, and killed her. Boxer is still with us, and has had several playmates since, though to none has he been so attached. He is just as smart and knowing as he ever was, though nearly nine years old.

Herb Molly.

In a corner of one of the great markets of Philadelphia a little stall was for years occupied by an old Scotch woman. She sold only heads of lettuce and herbs, but few as crisp and fresh were to be found in the city. Sometimes the other hucksters urged her to "spread out" into the larger vegetables.

"Na, na!" she would say. "I ken my salats an' my herbs. I dinna ken th' ither. I suld cheat or be cheated wi' them."

Herb Molly never wronged any one of a penny. Her sense of justice was so fine and so long proved that disputes in the market were brought to her to decide. Customers who stopped once to buy the fresh, crisp leaves from the tidy old body always came again. Something in the withered face which looked out from under the white cap went with them, and drew them to her again. More than one busy housekeeper would go a mile out of her way to buy from Old Molly.

"It's not only that her herbs are fresh and delicious," one said, "but it rests me to speak to her. She is only an ignorant woman, but so true, so friendly! It's the kindest soul in the world that looks out of her eyes."

In the twenty years during which she sat in the quiet corner she gradually became a power in the market. Noisy people lowered their voices in their bargaining when they spoke to her. Even Big Pete, the butcher and "rough," made her his confidante.

It was to Molly the women carried their troubles about sick babies and drunken husbands. It was Molly who coaxed Big Pete's boy to give up liquor, and who saved more than one girl in the market who was going astray. She lived alone. These rough folk were the only children she had. She had love enough in her old heart to mother them all.

But the thing which gave her such extraordinary power over them, was that God was so real to her.

"She don't preach," one woman said, "but Jesus is with her all the time. She talks to him, she knows him."

"I don't know notin' of priests or preachers." Big Pete used to say, "but I believe in Molly's God."

Molly died the other day. There was no notice in any paper to show that a power for good had gone silently out of the world. But her empty corner was swept and closed that day, and over every stall in the market hung a scrap of black. One man whom she had brought back to decency and happiness said:

"A woman may sit as a huckster in this market and yet be one of the angels of God."

That was her only funeral sermon.

An Easy Place.

A lad once stepped into our office in search of a situation. He was asked:

"Are you not now employed?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then why do you wish to change?"

"Oh, I want an easier place."

We had no place for him. No one wants a boy or man who is seeking an easy place; yet just here is the difficulty with thousands. They want easy work, and are afraid of earning more than their wages.

Will the boys let us advise them? Go in for the hard places; bend yourself to the task of showing how much you can do. Make yourself serviceable to your employer, at whatever cost of your own personal ease; and if you do this he will soon find that he cannot spare you; and when you have learned how to do work you may be set to teach others. Life is tollsome at best to most of us, but the easy places are at the end, not at the beginning of life's course.—Christian Herald.

LEMONS are used for soap in many countries where they grow. When, for instance, the men and women of the West Indies want to wash their hands, they squeeze the juice of a lemon over them and then rinse them briskly in water until they are clean. In countries where oranges grow in great plenty, country gentlemen use the cheapest kind for blacking their boots. The orange is cut in two and the juicy side of one half is rubbed on the soot of an iron pot and a bright polish at one appears.—American Youth.

The Sunday School

The Western Sunday School Society.

The Western Sunday School Society held its regular monthly meeting on Tuesday, Feb. 6. There were present Messrs. Gould, Kerr, Jones and Scheible; Mesdames Leonard, Lord and Perkins.

The Secretary's report was accepted, as was also the Treasurer's, which showed several annual contributions from Sunday schools.

The revision of the Service Book, Unity Service and Songs, was discussed, and it was suggested that it would be desirable, before publishing, to submit the revision to the criticism of interested and qualified friends.

The outline of the coming year's lessons, to be prepared by Rev. Joseph H. Crooker, was presented and considered. M. H. PERKINS, Sec'y.

BORROWING OUR LESSONS.

The Church News is the name of the parish paper published by the First Universalist Church of Minneapolis, one of the most enterprising of the liberal societies in the West. The January and February numbers of this periodical are especially interesting because of a new departure in Sunday-school work. The church has given up the International Lessons and is publishing a course of its own, a course which has now been adopted by the "Sunday School Association," as we learn from the February Church News. How admirable this new course is UNITY readers can easily understand from the fact that the lessons are largely made up from our publication, the January numbers being mostly from Gannett's Childhood of Jesus (Unity Sunday School Lessons, No. 17); while the four February numbers are reprinted almost verbatim from Mann's Studies of Jesus (Unity Sunday School Lessons, No. 13), and Horton's Noble Lives and Noble Deeds, issued by the Boston Unitarian Sunday School Society. We are glad to see our material put to such excellent use. The only criticism we have to make is that the reader of the February Church News would be sure to think that the lessons had been prepared expressly for that periodical by Rev. N. M. Mann, Mrs. Kate L. Brown, and Rev. Edward A. Horton.

Notes from the Field

Cleveland, Ohio.—On Feb 18 and 25 Rev. G. L. Cary, L. H. D., President of Meadville Theological School, will preach morning and evening on "The Birthright of the Race," "Ideals," "The Beauty of Self-Sacrifice," and "Proverbs." The Sunday school is engaged with Mr. Lenn's Lessons. The teachers' meeting is held Friday afternoon. This is the religious study class of the church, open to all who are interested in the cause. The young men's class, under Prof. Benjamin, is studying Hebrew History and Travel.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—Rev. H. Digby Johnston preached an inspiring New Year's sermon on the parable of the barren fig tree. The title of the sermon was itself enough to recommend it, and it has since been printed in pamphlet form. It is called, "Life, Not Death, Man's True Care."

Manistee, Mich.—Services were held in the church here on Jan. 28 by Rev. C. F. Elliott, and on Feb. 4 by the Western Secretary. At the latter date a meeting of those interested in liberal religion was held, and a committee of ten of the younger people appointed to canvass the city with a view to securing a minister and recommencing the regular services. The seats will be free now, and the income will be derived from weekly subscriptions. The committee took hold of the work enthusiastically, and there is little doubt that this beautiful church will soon be once more a center of intellectual and spiritual life for the community.

A. W. G.

Kalamazoo, Mich.—Mrs. Fannie Barrier Williams will occupy the pulpit here on Feb. 18. She is a colored woman of rare ability, who spoke with great acceptance in the World's Congress of Representative Women and in the Parliament of Religions, and she has filled other liberal pulpits successfully. The money for the new church has all been raised and the contract has now been let for erecting the building. The friends of Mr. and Mrs. Silas Hubbard recently presented them with an autograph quilt, as a slight testimonial of the debt of gratitude the church owed them. The presentation address was a graceful and ingenious poem by Miss Bartlett. She succeeded in getting in all the names of the donors without showing any traces of "patch-work" in the verse.

Baraboo, Wis.—This church, under the efficient charge of Rev. Robert C. Douthitt for several months past, has been moving along very satisfactorily, with good results and growing interest among our people. The Unity Club meets fortnightly. From a small beginning it has become quite strong, and much interest is manifested by the members. A look-up league was organized early in January, continuing with good indications of life and growth.

Duluth, Minn.—During the first three weeks in January the minister of the Unitarian church will preach on Sunday mornings in St. Paul, returning to Duluth in time for the evening service. There will be no morning service at the church on those Sundays. The Sunday school will meet as usual at 12 m., and the class in Comparative Religions at 7 p. m.

Mr. Southworth's evening subjects will be: The Religion of the Savage, The Religion of Greece, The Religion of Buddha, The Religion of Israel, The Religion of Jesus, and The Religion of the Future.

Detroit, Minn.—We learn that the liberal movement here is steadily growing. It still holds its meetings in a hall, but it has organized a good Sunday school and an active Ladies' Aid Society. And with Miss Putnam to preach for them every other Sunday they hardly feel the need of a settled minister.

St. Paul, Minn.—From the St. Paul Pioneer Press we quote the following editorial:

The announcement of the resignation of Rev. S. M. Crothers of Unity Church, with a view to accept a call to the leading Unitarian Church in Cambridge, Mass., will be received with general regret, not only by his own congregation, but by the community in general. They will be sorry to part with him, because he has long been recognized as a leader among the wholesome intellectual and moral forces which are enlisted on different sides of the grand work of education in St. Paul in its higher and nobler senses. He has turned away from so many brilliant and tempting inducements to leave St. Paul for rich and influential churches in the great centers, that it was hoped he might regard it as his duty to refuse all new offers that might come to him from whatever quarter. But it is impossible not to recognize the force of the consideration stated in his letter of resignation, which led him to accept a call from Cambridge. What he may be able to do for Unitarianism in such a center of intellectual activity is of small consequence to the Pioneer Press; but as representing all the influences that contribute to the material and social welfare of St. Paul, it expresses the general public feeling in saying that the departure of Mr. Crothers will be deeply regretted as a sensible loss to the city, and that even in Cambridge he will be a valuable acquisition to the intellectual elite of that great seat of culture.

The letter of resignation, to which it refers, is as follows:

With deep regret over the necessity of breaking the ties that have bound me here, I write to present my resignation of the pastorate of Unity Church, in order that I may accept a call which I have received from the First Parish Church of Cambridge, Mass.

I can here only indicate the considerations that have been decisive. I have long been convinced that there was the possibility of a work being done by the Unitarian minister in Cambridge of peculiar importance and urgency. To adequately impress any considerable portion of the young men at the university with the vital power of liberal religion would give to our cause the kind of re-enforcement it greatly needs. At no other point did it seem to me that there was such an opportunity to influence not simply the present, but also the future. So long as this, however, was simply a somewhat vague possibility and so long as I had no means of estimating my own fitness for such work I could easily put the matter aside. Last spring my answer to those who urged it upon me was, in effect, "I fully agree with your estimate of the importance of the work which might be done if you could find the right man to do it. I have, however, no sufficient evidence that it is my work."

Since my recent visit to Cambridge I am no longer able to say this. I see a definite work to be done, which seems to me to be of the utmost importance to our cause. It has come to me in a personal way, so that I must definitely accept or reject it. To reject it would be for me to reject the opportunity of doing the largest service which my own judgment tells me I could do for Unitarianism in America. My present decision is the result of the new evidence which has come to me and which appears to me to be conclusive.

I need not tell you at what cost this decision is made. During more than seven years I have received nothing but kindness at your hands. To part with friends such as I have found here would seem like sacrilege were I to do so for any reason that did not seem imperative. In presenting my resignation I would ask that it may take effect on the first of June of the present year.

I inclose a communication written before I received the formal call to Cambridge, and which gives more in detail my reasons for my present action.

With the deepest appreciation of all that binds me to St. Paul, I ask you to believe that it is nothing short of what seems to me a call to a more urgent and necessary work that moves me. Very sincerely,
S. M. CROTHERS.

Oakland, Cal.—From the weekly calendar of the First Unitarian Church we learn that Superintendent Wendte has now an assistant in his pastoral work. On the morning of Sunday, Feb. 4, Mrs. Eliza Tupper Wilkes preached what we take to be her inaugural sermon, Mr. Wendte preaching in the evening; and on the Wednesday following a reception was given to the new assistant pastor. The calendar is prefaced by selections from 2 Kings xxii. 12-15, and Rom. xvi. 1, referring to woman as prophet and minister.

St. Louis, Mo.—On Feb. 4 Rev. John C. Learned's widow occupied the pulpit which he had so long filled. From the St. Louis Republic we take the following abstract of her address:

I have chosen to-day as the subject for which I ask your attention, "The Ground of Our Faith, or, Why Have We Any Confidence in Things Unproved or Unprovable?" In what can we put the trust of our hearts when we are sore tired, and how may we gain a living faith sufficient to carry us through times of disquiet, distraction and gloom, to keep us steadfast when mysteries enshroud us, willing to live when released from all earthly service would be easier? The answer is faith, but to define it is as little possible as to tell what life is or to explain love. It eludes definition. It is more than expectation; it is more than hope. It is the assurance of things hoped for; the proving of things not seen. It is not knowledge, but rests on knowledge.

Mrs. Learned's talk dealt with faith, applying it to every-day life, and in conclusion she quoted:

A child's kiss set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad. A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich. A sick man helped by thee shall make thee strong. Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense of service which thou renderest.

The address was warmly received.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Unitarian Club of Philadelphia has recently removed its book-room to 1102 Walnut street; and on the afternoon of the 16th inst. the ladies of the House and Entertainment Committee entertained the members and friends of the club at a most enjoyable 5 o'clock tea. The regular meeting of the club was held on Thursday evening last, when "The Duties of Citizenship" were discussed by several speakers. President Harned spoke of "The Corruption of Politics," and introduced as the first speaker Mr. C. R. Woodruff, Secretary of the Municipal League, an organization formed to further the cause of good government by separating city politics from those of the State and nation. Mr. Woodruff said that the misgovernment of which we complain so justly is due primarily to the supineness of the people. It is the duty of every one of us to take as much interest in public affairs as in our own private business. A city is a great corporation, of which the citizens are the stockholders; and they should watch their municipal interests just as closely as they do those connected with banks or railroad companies. Mr. Lincoln L. Eyre, the next speaker, regretted the inapplicability of many of his remarks to the majority of the audience, because of the inability of women to vote. Still they are just as much interested in the question of good paving and clean streets, pure water and good light, as the men; and he rejoiced to see that many women are interesting themselves in civic affairs. Every inch of apathy on such subjects on the part of reputable citizens means a foot of ground for anarchy to stand on. We look anxiously in the morning paper for the latest news from the Sandwich Islands, and pay no attention to the defective paving or drainage of the street before our door, which may be breeding disease and bringing death to our children. And the trouble is largely because we will persist in electing to city offices men who are the tools of the self-constituted leaders of national parties, who take this means to pay their political debts and keep themselves in power, drawing from the office-holders they have placed in office the corruption fund which has come to be such a powerful factor in our politics. This condition of things is unknown in the country, and is possible only in the cities. The only remedy is to take city affairs entirely out of party politics by building up a strong municipal party, devoted exclusively to them.

Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, who, unexpectedly to himself and to the club, found it possible to be present, expressed his gratification that a Unitarian club, representing Unitarian churches, should give countenance to such a mundane subject, which, however, he rejoiced to believe, was rapidly becoming the real province of religion; for, when we are attending to the proper discharge of our homely daily duties, with a desire for the advancement of mankind, we are attending to our religious duties. The Old Testament prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and others, were really political reformers, who, like the young men to whom he had listened so gladly, saw the corruption that existed in the state, and set themselves to effect a reform. He rejoiced especially in the efforts that were being made to inculcate patriotism in the school children. It is well that they should be taught to love the flag of their country. But that is not enough. They should be made to feel that they are citizens of the world, and that there is something greater even than patriotism,—the love of the whole human family. When a man is wounded, the red-cross flag protects him, and is respected by all civilized nations. There should be a universal flag, which should protect humanity, irrespective of race, creed, or condition. The future historian will regard the year 1893 as the crowning year of the last decade of the nineteenth century, and the World's Parliament of Religions as the crowning glory of that year, making the commencement of a new era of "peace on earth, good will to men." Mr. Jones' address was listened to with great attention, and greeted with frequent outbursts of applause.—Christian Register.

Helena, Mont.—Rev. J. H. Crooker is preaching during February, morning and evening, on such inspiring themes as "The New Universe," "The More Glorious Humanity," "The Rediscovery of Jesus." The interest is unabated in his work. Rarely does a man of such exact scholarship have the gift of clear and eloquent statement which he possesses. He satisfies the requirements of the most fastidious, and yet has attractive and inspiring thought for the less cultivated.

New Haven, Conn.—Rev. Perry Marshall's lecture on The Problem of the Unemployed was enthusiastically received in the Church of the Messiah, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 6. Clergymen present expressed agreement with his views of the rationalization of monopolies, and a hope to hear from him often. The morning papers gave extended reports.

EIGHT-YEAR-OLD IDA, in search of a book to read, attracted by its bright binding, selected Pope's "Essay on Man." After vainly trying to read and comprehend it she laid it aside, saying with a sigh: "It may be easy on man, but it's hard on children."—Housekeeper's Weekly.

UNITY'S PREMIUM LIST

Apropos of the Fiftieth Birthday of the senior editor the publishers of UNITY are anxious to co-operate with its readers in making a push for doubling the constituency of UNITY, thus extending the influence of its editor, multiplying the usefulness of the paper, hastening the time when its dream of the Liberal Church of America will be realized,—a church creedless but not thoughtless, based on ethics, and open on all sides and from above to the thought of God and the inspirations of the God-serving, truth-seeking, and high living prophets of all ages.

To this end the undersigned solicits the co-operation of Pastors, Post-Office Workers, Study Classes, Unity Clubs, and all the forces that make for culture and for character everywhere. To this end we desire to secure an agent in every town who will make a thorough canvass in every parish.

In order to secure the co-operation of all of our readers we make the following offer of PREMIUMS, to hold good as long as the supply of stock holds out.

In some cases the stock is limited.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Saviour of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

M'd Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Moslem World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

The New Bible and Its New Uses,

By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER,

Author of "Jesus Brought Back," "Problems in American Society," Etc.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

CONTENTS.

Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible Claims for Itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix: Contradictions in the Gospels.

Mr. Crooker has brought to his work much original thought, a thorough knowledge of his subject, considerable analytical skill, a fair degree of logic, and almost a mastery of the art of presentation—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

He has been very successful, and his book is one especially to be recommended to those who have lost their faith in the old Bible of tradition and dogma, and need to be shown the substantial worth of what criticism leaves unharmed of literary value and spiritual quickening.—The New World.

—Emerson.

LOVERS of Emerson and believers in the doctrine of evolution will doubtless take much pleasure in reading Rev. E. M. Wheelock's presentation of the religion of nature, which appears in our Church-Door Pulpit under the title of "The Long Climb of Man." We hope that all will read it, for here, in a style strongly suggestive of Emerson, we have the truest religious thought of the last decade of this scientific age presented to us in the language of Emerson.

THERE is one feature in The Church News—the religious monthly which Dr. Shutter's church is publishing for the benefit of the Minneapolis Liberals—which always commands our admiration, and that is the form of the sermon. In these days of superabundant reading matter even an unusually strong sermon runs great risk of being passed over by the busy man—so many pages of solid reading matter look rather formidable. But one is pretty sure to read one of Dr. Shutter's sermons because the points stand out so clearly that you can get the outline of the sermon almost as easily as you can read the title. The heads and sub-heads stand out so that "he who runs may read," and this simple use of Roman and Arabic numerals, assisted by a liberal use of italics, enables one to get the outline of the sermon in two minutes. In preparing sermons for publication ministers would do much to gain a hearing for themselves by attending to such an apparently simple matter as this. We are aware, however, that it is by no means as simple as it looks, particularly when the line of thought is a close one and the address is originally written out in extenso.

JUST now there is another of the periodical spasms of anxiety about the name and being of God in Congressional circles, and Massachusetts leads the would-be pious campaign. Senator Frye and Representative Morse have introduced resolutions looking towards the introduction of God into the Constitution of the United States. These people would like to make of us a Christian nation by an act of Congress; legislate piety into our people. Granting for argument's sake that there is cause for this religious nervousness, the remedy proposed is childish. What imbecility of spirit is that that would undertake to stay the throne of the Eternal by a preamble! Chemistry cannot be made theistic by inscribing on the laboratory walls, "In God we trust," nor can astronomy be made devout by engraving a hymn upon the tube of the telescope. A pious creed does not necessarily make a pious church. The word "God" in the Constitution, or a Christian amendment to the same, will not change the prayerless hearts in the nation. The Government cannot be made theistic upon the adoption of a resolution by godless Senators and the approval of the same perhaps by a profane President. Let Massachusetts lead in some better way.

A GOOD-SIZED hall capable of seating five hundred people almost filled by men and women, young, middle-aged and old, and a patient musical genius on the platform at the piano or on his feet before a small blackboard—wherever he is, always active, and stimulating by his strong personality—this you may see any Friday night at Hull House. Mr. William L. Tomlins, the director of the Chicago Apollo Club, issued an announcement that he would direct from December to April a choral class especially for the working people. The news went rapidly through the poorer parts of Chicago—it was announced in the Trade and Labor Assembly, and now there are enrolled between five and six hundred members, who for twenty-five cents can have the chance of singing simple uplifting music every week. For the most part these are working men and women who have known little or no music. All that the good director assumes is a willingness on their part to attempt to sing, and the results so far go to prove the success of the plans. It is interesting to speak of the success of Mr. Tomlins' work in connection with the latest word from Mr. B. J. Lang: "Presupposing willingness on the part of an individual who has received nothing from music, I believe that he can acquire enough of it greatly to enrich and beautify his life."

We publish in another column further words from the bereaved parish at St. Paul. In the face of much that is artificial, conventional and sometimes something worse in the way of bitterness and unfair dealing between church and pastors in these days, it is also well to remember that there is nothing more tender, pure and helpful in modern society than the relation which often exists between a true man in the pulpit and the aspiring souls in the pews. The world offers to-day no freer, larger, more inspiring opportunity for a man or woman rightly qualified in head and heart than the opportunity of the Liberal pulpit, a church committed only to excellence, pledged to progress. Such a relation Mr. Crothers has sustained to the Unity Church of St. Paul, and the breaking of these home ties is pathetic, albeit they are broken by mutual consent and in the obvious interests of the cause for which they have both labored. In going to Cambridge Mr. Crothers goes to a large and important work. In leaving St. Paul he leaves a work scarcely less important. But we gladly give him leave of absence. Some years ago Father Alcott prophesied that the Mississippi Valley would have to send missionaries to Massachusetts inside of twenty-five years. If Mr. Crothers can consecrate the progress, simplicity and democracy, the wealth, culture and piety represented by Harvard College, he will indeed discharge a high, prophetic mission. We congratulate Cambridge, and congratulate also St. Paul that it has been given them to train a man for so important a field, and that it is now their opportunity to show that they have been worthy the ministrations of such a man, by living up to his standard when he is gone.

RABBI VOORSANGER preached at Palo Alto on Sunday not long since. Among his hearers was a student who had always shown great reluctance in church attendance, but had been persuaded to go on this occasion. As the congregation left the chapel he was heard to exclaim, "Golly, boys, I believe I am a Jew."—Pacific Unitarian.

The Reproach of "Breadth."

The Spectator for January 20th contains a smart article entitled "The Affectation of 'Breadth,'" in which in clever English it pokes fun at the Parliament of Religions, calling it a "sort of success of a bizarre idea." It seems to be pleased with the fact that "the Anglican Church, with its usual perfect decorum and good sense, stood silently aloof." It is not worth while to correct misrepresentation of facts in the article, still less is it worth while to try to answer the genteel cynicism of this representative of a type of culture to which enthusiasm is a prima facie evidence of vulgarity, and a hope for better things is taken as a reflection upon the culture of the victim of such hope. This writer assumes that the breadth manifested in Chicago last September was an "affectation," and under the guise of this assumption, unconsciously perhaps, makes an argument for stupidity, dogmatism and conservatism on the score that solid men, the true guardians of morals and religion, are generally found on the narrower side of all questions.

We will not stoop to defend the sincerity nor yet the intellectual integrity of those who entered into the spiritual life of the Parliament and who contributed to its intellectual strength; but it may be well in this connection to note the too common assumption, even among progressive people this side of London, that breadth is liable to carry with it a connotation of shallowness, that it is too frequently secured at the cost of profundity or of efficiency. Figures of speech are dangerous to profound thinking always; never more so than when terms of physics are called in to interpret metaphysical realities. So this identification of breadth with shallowness shows the tyranny of the shallow-pond figure. It is a pure assumption not justified by philosophy nor by history. The truth is that the ocean is deeper than the pond, as it is broader. The wide rivers are in the main deep rivers. Even the marsh, the favorite figure of shallowness, is profound in its deep-reaching moisture, its fertile soil and the abundant life it sustains. A broad thought cannot be broad unless it is deep as well. A great thought is cubical. It does strike out on long and inclusive lines because it has first struck down deep below the superficial distinctions, surface differences, transient barriers. It is a pure assumption that narrowness or bigotry or dogmatism find their roots in deep thought, still less in deep motives. The great thinkers of the world have all been open to the charge of breadth and have been suspected consequently, in their day, of being superficial, or at least being vague, and consequently impotent. Witness the contemporary estimate of Channing, Frederick Robertson, and Emerson. Witness further the corrective estimate of these men by subsequent observers. It is now recognized that these men held broad ideas because they had done deep thinking; their sympathies were wide because their thoughts were deep. The Parliament of Religions, which this representative of English culture, the Spectator, so jauntily disposes of as an indication of the "pulpiness of the modern brain," was anything but the result of superficial thinking or of a surface sensation. The distinctions and the antagonisms of centuries were opposed to it. The suspicions and the interests of the great organizations concerned were against it, but science, art, commerce, and letters had bored down through these strata and reached the subterranean spring that bespoke hidden connection, concealed communications. They have been intimating a common life underlying and permeating these differences, and so the Parliament was a reality.

Now that the Parliament is over with, there are those who were willing to believe in seventeen days of a Parliament but distrust the potency of the ideal for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. They were willing to approve and rejoice in this one passing demonstration of breadth, but distrust its potency as a working principle. They like a Parliament of Religions for the world, but do not know about it for the town in which they live or for the country they would organize in the interest of a better life.

UNITY has of late been a trial to some of its friends, who are afraid that it is becoming enamored of "bigness," too impatient with denominational and sectarian narrowness. In other words, they were afraid of breadth; fear it will paralyze something already vital, and disenchant something already enchanting. It is well that we should ever inquire into the reality of our pretensions. Hypocrisy is debilitating. If there is an "affectation of breadth," rather than breadth, it is to be deplored, dreaded, condemned, and will surely come to naught. Time will test and ultimately defeat all sham. Meanwhile it cannot be too clearly urged that wide forces are necessarily deep forces. Large plans are never in danger of being too large, but ever in danger of suffering at the hands of friends who are not large enough to trust them and to follow them to their logical conclusions.

Universalists, Reform Jews, Ethical Culture movements, Independent movements and Unitarians have boasted much of their liberality. But now, when asked to accept the logic of their own position and work together for the upbuilding of society, some are apprehensive lest their own vitality may suffer by a fuller application of their own principles. It is the old distrust of breadth. They are willing to be broad, but within "working limits;" which means, the safe limits of their own traditional names and denominational lines. But the profound things in their names and in their movements, the deep things in their respective messages, have been the universal things, the things they hold in common. When this common life is honestly recognized, and they try to work together, not apart, in every possible way, then they will demonstrate that breadth is depth, that openness is possible only to the profound, and that "big thoughts" are "holy thoughts" because they hold all smaller thoughts in their sacred embrace. The divine life is measureless. Let not the pond presume on the shallowness of the ocean, nor the babbling brook prate about the impotency of the silent Mississippi. Give us breadth and we will find that we have depth also. The great mind demands a great heart, and the great heart is impossible without great thoughts to feed it. The world is not yet in danger of suffering from too much breadth either in individual hearts or in co-operative organizations. Let no one be sneered out of his passion for Bigness. The immeasurable God sustains the immeasurable ideal.

The Consolation of Truth.

Liberalism is accused of coldness. It is said to be a religion without consolation. It can have, it is affirmed, no comfort for the heart crushed with sorrow.

On the other hand the old faith teaches a God of compassion, who walks forever over the world and never crushes a flower or a poor human heart. God, it is said, has a human side, and his tenderness and pity are revealed in Jesus, in whom he incarnates Himself. How many sorrowful millions have been consoled by this thought, and have laid their weary heads upon the divine consolation, as upon the softest pillow.

The old faith comes with its consolation to the bereaved. It affirms that our dear ones are alive and happy—that the babe which slips off mother's bosom slips on to God's. It tells its sorrowing mother that she need not go a mourning pilgrim around the earth, that her child is in the arms of the tender Savior—that he who said "Suffer the little children to come unto me," enfolds in his loving arms the loved and lost.

How many sorrowing mothers have constructed of these promises a ladder going up, with steps of light, from earth to heaven!

But we of the new faith cannot affirm the anthropomorphic God, a being who sympathizes like a mother with every sorrow that tears the human heart. For how can we teach a consolation that does not exist, and which, in the end, men will find to be only a delusion? But we do teach the purifying mission of sorrow, that the one who has bravely borne a personal sorrow becomes by reason of this experience a savior to others. It is by conflict, struggle, pain, that the human soul comes to crystalline purity. It is not simply the consolation of comfort that we need. We need the consolation of strength, of courage, so that we may stand up under our burden, and become the stronger thereby. "Every man shall bear his own burden," is the declaration of a great law. If in the hour of our sorrow a hand can touch ours, or a sympathetic heart be laid upon our own, it is well. But better still if we learn to bear our sorrow cheerfully and bravely, seeking to know its meaning, and find its lesson. The stern consolation of truth is in the end the real consolation.

To the bereaved we of the new faith cannot promise immortality—the personal continuance of our dear ones gone in another life. But we can show that death is a benignity as well as a necessity. Death could not come into the world because of the fault of the first man, but has always followed the footsteps of life. And to the thoughtful death is seen to be as beautiful and natural as life. Nor does death destroy all. Thought, beauty, affection survive the great change. The best in the dead lives in the living. In the hearts of the living are enshrined the memory, the virtues, the courage, the goodness of the dead. Was there ever a little babe that lingered for a moment on the breast of the mother but left something deathless behind it? We know that our beloved ones are beyond regret or pain, and it is our duty and joy to cultivate in ourselves the thoughts and deeds that made them lovable and strong. To look earnestly and truthfully at death, while it does not take away its pain, certainly gives us the greatest, the truest consolation. It is the consolation of the truth.

Men and Things

PROFESSOR HUXLEY replies pointedly to his critics in the preface of the fifth volume of his collected essays just published. After denying that he had gone out of his way to attack the Bible, or that he harbors any hatred of Christianity, he says of his scientific career: "I had set out on a journey with no other purpose than of exploring certain provinces of natural knowledge. I strayed no hair's breadth from the course which it was my right and duty to pursue, and yet I found that whatever route I took before long I came to a tall, formidable-looking fence. Confident as I have been in the existence of an ancient and indefeasible right of way, before me stood a thorny barrier with a notice-board of 'No thoroughfare, by order of Moses.' There seemed no way over, nor did the prospect of creeping around, as I saw some do, attract me, the only alternatives were either to give up the journey, which I was not minded to do, or break down the fence and go through it. One point became perfectly clear to me—namely: that Moses is not responsible for nine tenths of the Pentateuch: certainly not for the legends which have been made bugbears in science. In fact, the fence turned out to be a mere heap of dry sticks and brushwood, and one might walk through it with impunity, which I did."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

"DAH ain't eny doubt," remarked Uncle Eben, on his way home from church, "dat we am all sinners. But some ob us sut'n'y does hustle ter keep up dey're reppytation in dat line."—Washington Star.

"We Weep with Thee."

Dear Lord, when on these bitter, wintry nights,
Thy houseless, hungry, suffering poor we see,

Touched by a love and pity like to thine,
We weep o'er them with thee.

We hear the orphan's cry, the widow's moan,
The strong man's groan of bitter agony,
Who hears his shivering children cry for bread:
We weep o'er them with thee.

No close-drawn shades, no sounds of household mirth,
Can drown the tones that, like the moaning sea, Sound in our ears: "Oh, help us, Lord, to help
And succor them for thee."

Though sin and folly all too oft have brought Their wayward feet to such dread misery,
A deeper pity stirs our hearts, and still
We weep with them for thee.

Thou, who didst weep over Jerusalem,
Whose love the thief, the leper tenderly Forgave and healed—we, too, dear Lord,
Forgive,
And weep for them with thee.

And, 'mid our tears, we know this joy divine:
To feel that our heart's pain and sympathy
And sorrow for thy weak and suffering poor
Make us at one with thee.

Oh, never, while thy children suffer need;
Never, while sin brings grief and misery,
Can hearts that love and serve thee cease to bleed,
And weep for them with thee.

And still, when come the bitter, wintry nights,
And hungry, houseless, suffering men we see,
Stirred by a love and pity, like to thine,
We weep, dear Lord, with thee.

Augury.

A horseshoe nailed, for luck, upon a mast;
That mast, wave-bleached, upon the shore
was cast:

I saw, and thence no fetch I revered,
But safe through tempest to my haven steered.

The place with rose and myrtle was o'ergrown,
Yet Feud and Sorrow held it for their own.
A garden then I sowed without one fear—
Sowed fennel, yet lived griefless all the year.

Brave lines, long life, did my friend's hand display,

Not so mine own: yet mine is quick to-day,
Once more in his I read Fate's idle jest,
Then fold it down forever on his breast.

What Is It to Be Liberal?

"Faith, hope, charity, these three:
but the greatest of these is charity."

To rule out the above quotation, because the relegating of its source to the realm of the no longer-needed seems the only course to the extreme radical mind, is to distinctly overlook the truth of the statement itself. The lesson of charity seems to be the most difficult one for the human creature to learn, and the one which is latest evolved in his moral development.

"Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." All the accomplishment, learning and intellectual training that the human brain can sustain avails comparatively little for human good. If it is unable to perceive, and be applied to, human relations. In addition to the former, a determined cultivation of the spirit of toleration is requisite to contribute toward that broader personality, which is the ideal of to-day.

The modern spirit of freedom, due to the recent discoveries in natural phenomena, both of the laws of material substance and brain activity, does well to look beyond the intolerant dogmas of ages. It cannot content itself with old traditions and the say-so of intellects which had not the problems of our day to deal with. It must see and realize for itself whatever of truth it can find for the seeking. This attitude has given rise to a spirit of breadth and comprehensiveness, which contrasted with hard and fast traditional lines, is termed literalism.

The liberal mind is supposed to be emancipated from the ignorant superstitions of ages. This liberal attitude is due to the enlightenments of historic research, the light thrown on life by scientific discovery, the dawning of intellectual perception and the tendency to question and reason. Such an attitude is in a further stage of development, including as it does, a greater collection of data on which to form its judgments. It knows the old, it also knows the new. It has evolved out of the old, into the new. From the new standpoint the outlook is incomprehensibly broadened. The mind is expanded by the added activity with which the brain finds itself in contact. Such added comprehension tends to give a more discriminating judgment of all human relations. More elements are perceived, and their consequent interdependence more clearly apprehended.

There is an attitude, however, called liberal, which contains some of these characteristics without others. The attitude which arises from getting away from dogma merely, and which does not go far enough to see the former in its true relation, is apt to overrate the relative significance of old tradition. This condition is one of protest and impatience against what seems inane and childish, and which loses no opportunity to scathe the old, with undue vehemence. This attitude misses the very essence of liberalism, though it passes in current language and understanding as liberal. The mind that has emerged from what it is pleased to term benighted dogma, ought to realize, from the very fact of its emergence, the necessity for tolerating that from which it has just emerged. Else it cannot be said to have emerged. It knows the old, though it prefers the new. It should see the old in its due relations to other elements of life. It understands the old, also the new, and, understanding the new, should still bear with the old.

The spirit of bigoted, narrow intolerance shown by many so-called liberals toward the old standpoint, is as petty as it is unimportant, as uncalled-for as it is discourteous. It is in no whit different from the narrow spirit of bigoted intolerance which it condemns. It should have greater tolerance, from the fact that it understands the other standpoint, while the latter does not understand it. The education of the limited view is not to be brought about by contemptuous and irate scathing. It must be supplied with the new attitude; that must be presented in an attractive manner that will not contrast unfavorably with the still-clung-to old.

This is the true spirit of liberalism, —the charity for the views of others, even when there seems to be little excuse for their ignorance; the development of the moral perception to the extent of respecting the personality, if not the opinions, of others, in themselves. The spirit of toleration is true liberalism; not the mere kicking and cutting loose from old traditions, and the assumption of a so-called higher view. With the broader view should come the broader toleration. Increased understanding should imply increased charity. It is petty and limited, as well as discourteous, to call attention to small points of issue, which have relatively little importance, in discussions during the early stages of great questions of social advancement.

Let no one misunderstand the spirit of narrow intolerance which proceeds from so-called liberalism! Let not the idea of liberalism be understood in the bigoted sense which is merely the kicking of old dogmas. Liberals are often far from liberal. They lose no opportunity to cast slurs at those points from which they have evolved. Some liberals on the other hand are over liberal. They misconceive the meaning of toleration, and submit to the undue infliction of those who have little to say, or no idea of proper relations in saying it. With a true yearning for liberal charity, which is more Christian than the conduct of many who profess that title, they believe in giving every man his say, whether it is for general advantage or not. But society as a whole cannot be made to suffer for the sake of one misguided individual having a so-called freedom. Other liberals are isolated and indifferent. Those whose environment has been such as to keep them free from the old view, and to ground them in the spirit of the new, often fail to realize the importance of using their influence in the direction of the new. They lack moral earnestness in the line of putting forth their effort whatever it is. They sit still and do nothing. There are those to whom the term liberal would not be applied because of the fact that they are not intellectually developed beyond the old faith, the servants of which show far more of the essence and spirit of true liberalism in their moral regard and attitude towards their fellow-beings.

The just but lenient estimation of others' opinions, in cases where they are trying to the patience, is charity. It is the only basis of human activity. Lenience and forbearance are necessary at every turn, and the sooner they become the continuous mental habit the more the peace of the individual is secured. Life cannot go on without a certain amount of moral earnestness and mutual adaptability. Charity is a necessity of existence. The lack of charity is one of the moral drawbacks which wrangle society. It is not sentimentalism. It is not the attempt to keep up and help on the eternal survival of the unfit. It is not the blinking of social evils and blind ignoring of the only applicable remedy—the scientific spirit and educational influence. It is justice to the times, to self, and to others. It is the perception of the true relation which different elements bear to each other. It gives due credit to all, and does not unduly exaggerate the importance, or lack of it, of any element. We cannot afford to do without it. We cannot sustain the antagonizing attitude of others, nor our own sense of alienation. We live in society because our instincts crowd us into it. We must maintain a fair equilibrium between our tendency to individualism, and our co-operation toward the moral ideal. Society implies not merely toleration, but co-operation. Conventionality is the only safety for those untrained to recognize for themselves the mutual social obligation. The heterogeneous character of the social organism forces the observance of an external toleration which in many instances is far from being the result of their conscious intention. Enforced morality is one kind of a social safeguard. Spontaneous morality is a greater safeguard. The co-operating moral strength of its individuals constitutes the backbone of the social organism.

Thus it is that "the greatest of these is charity."

TWO PLOWED in a field. One plowed straight, keeping his eyes upon the ground. No weeds grew, and he gathered great stores of corn. When he died, his son inherited much land. He lived in comfort, and plowed in his father's fields. The other's furrows were not straight. At times he stopped to listen to the lark, or to admire a flower that grew upon a weed. He knew the names of the plants and their time of flowering. He knew the names of the stars, also. He died, owning no goods or lands. His son inherited his father's poverty. The son inherited also his father's love of nature. And he became a great artist, whose name and fame spread over two continents.—Berry Benson.

BY THE WAY.

Since Horace Greeley sent young men "West," it has generally been supposed that one must go West for a "boom," if he would find one; but going East, striking the "windy" city of Buffalo, here is a "boom" in agitation and expectation that will extend the city limits twenty miles. Years ago Dr. Chapin, with a flash of indignation at the vandalism and materialism of the times, exclaimed: "The time will come when you will cut down the cedars of Lebanon to make clothes-pins, and turn Niagara Falls into a washing machine." To all intents the prophecy is being fulfilled. Niagara has been tapped, and is to do untold-of service at grinding human grists. And all the distance—twenty miles away—city lots are being marked off and "real estate" looms in the horizon of all that class of speculators who believe it their bounden duty to provide for themselves and their posterity by the "rise" that is sure to fill their pockets and vaults, if they exercise a present "foresight" and get the start of their neighbors, buying "cheap" while others are "cudgeling their dull pates" for something to do. "I have bought ten lots for a song. Ten years more I will be the owner of property valued anywhere between one and two hundred thousand. That's what I call business."

How comforting the dream! How blessed the reality—if the boom works!

Great head; and what a heart for his "posterity."

He has so fixed things by the stroke of a pen and a few dollars to boot that many fellow mortals must pay tribute to him and his "heirs forever," for the privilege of having a home on the green earth. He and his afore-said heirs have nothing to do but wait and see their earthly salvation grow.

Blessed fix—for himself and heirs! Blessed, that is—"if."

Buffalo seems hardly a city; it isn't a village. There is a sort of betwixt and between air about it, with a touch of antiquity and a touch of the modern. Very excellent people I meet, but—is it a Rip Van Winkle sleep they are waking out of? Something like it. Not exactly "in it," as regards the newer spirit of these last few years of grace; not quite caught up with the times, but putting out a good foot foremost.

I gather from the papers that the city lost its charter some time since and is striving to get it back; the big fight for it is going on at Albany. The cry is for "home rule," which is always a cry of promise.

There is a "Liberal Club" which is discussing high themes in a careful way—summoning "men of note" only to do the opening address, and appointing only for the discussion such home talent as is known to be able at least, and probably interesting. It is, however, a "liberal" club, selecting a very wide range of topics, and listening respectfully and approvingly, it would seem, to some very surprising heresies. Recently Prof. Crawford H. Toy, of Cambridge, landed the discussion outside the historical religions, and the orthodoxy of the city was in no wise disturbed, but accepted "evolution" and the "scientific study of religion" fearlessly; "for why should we not," a clergyman of repute asked, "since we know all must end with Christ the Redeemer." Was this his way of saying all must end with truth?

The women of Buffalo are to be credited with "literary clubs" that are of real importance, if one may judge all by the quality of one. In the vicinity of Highland Park some thirty ladies meet in parlors Tuesday mornings to listen to essays on historical, biographical or political subjects. The other morning there were brief papers on Charles Sumner, Wm. H. Seward, Chief Justice Marshall and Salmon P. Chase. It lent an added charm to the estimate of Sumner to know that so enthusiastic an admirer and biographer of the great man was "born and raised" in the old Kentucky State. This lady placed Sumner foremost in the ranks of American statesman, and predicted, I believe, that his name would yet be a household word with the American people.

One seldom listens to papers with more matter or in better form. Preceding the reading there was ten minutes of "current topics," some eight or ten speakers briefly calling attention to public affairs of interest to them during the past week. It was an exceedingly interesting feature. All these ladies spoke with simplicity, directness and skill, while others, listening, plied their sewing, the whole session lasting two hours.

One cannot stay long in Buffalo without hearing of Dr. Slicer, the Unitarian preacher. Hearing him you are not surprised that he has fame as a preacher. His sermons are built up in a masterly way, adorned with apt and telling illustration, and are not without a poetry of diction that has been described as "Shakespearean." S. H. M.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES is not usually regarded as much of a fanatic. It is as a physician that he expresses his judgment on the use of tobacco. A young man had asked him four questions, and he answered them as follows:

1. A young man of good taste and good principle may safely go to see a good actor in a good play.
2. The best three books? The Bible, Shakespeare's plays and a good dictionary, say Worcester or Webster.
3. To obtain "real success?" Real work; concentration on some useful calling adapted to his abilities.
4. Shall he smoke? Certainly not. It is liable to injure the sight, to render the nerves unsteady, to enfeeble the will, and enslave the nature to an imperious habit likely to stand in the way of duty to be performed.—The Independent.

The Greatness of Sympathy.

In journeying over this vast and glorious plain called Life, charmed by the wondrous medley of its crowded scenes and incidents, and weighing in Utility's exacting scales each winged and freighted moment as it flies, we spur Ambition on through human strife and din of men in their mad race for worldly place and power until in fancy we have scaled Distinction's lofty height, and won for our adorning the glittering jewel, Fame.

Exalted thus, through self-esteem, above the common lot, and by blind Fortune blest, we chase with keen delight the dancing bubble Joy, but find, alas! such bubbles, too, will burst. Then seeing how uncertain each step we take in Life, we pause and pausing meditate. And peering through the gathering mists and gloom of days agone, we faintly see in fancy the struggling forms of men less fortunate than we, perchance to recognize amid the restless throng the time-changed face of some old bosom friend.

'Tis then, by fellow-feeling moved and with a willing heart, we lend a hand to some poor, obscure friend who, burdened with the cares of Life, has fallen by the wayside in distress. And then the rapture of not having lived for self alone brings in its wake new joys of Life we never knew before.

Our seeming sorrows fade from view, and through some wondrous change return clad in the robes of Joy!

The Sound of a Sunbeam.

One of the most wonderful discoveries in science that have been made within the last year or two is the fact that a beam of light produces sound. A beam of sunlight is thrown through a lens on a glass vessel that contains lamp-black, colored silk or worsted, or other substances. A disk, having slits or openings cut in it, is made to revolve swiftly in this beam of light, so as to cut it up, thus making alternate flashes of light and shadow. On putting the ear to the glass vessel strange sounds are heard so long as the flashing beam is falling on the vessel. Recently a more wonderful discovery has been made. A beam of sunlight is caused to pass through a prism, so as to produce what is called the solar spectrum, or rainbow. The disk is turned, and the colored light of the rainbow is made to break through it. Now place the ear to the vessel containing the silk, wool, or other material. As the colored lights of the spectrum fall upon it sounds will be given by different parts of the spectrum, and there will be silence in other parts. For instance, if the vessel contains red worsted, and the green light flashes upon it, loud sounds will be given. Only feeble sounds will be heard if the red and blue parts of the rainbow fall upon the vessel, and the other colors make no sound at all. Green silk gives sound best in a red light. Every kind of material gives more or less sound in different colors, and utters no sound in others.

Art's Education.

From a very interesting report of Mr. Sidney H. Morse's illustrated lecture on "The Sculptor's Art," to which the Syracuse (N. Y.) Standard gives a column, we extract this word of wisdom and encouragement:

The ways of doing things are more interesting than the things that get done. You may pass the finished work at a glance, but to see the worker at his work one would loiter when he should be on his way. This should be no surprise when we reflect that the thing done is seldom a complete satisfaction even to the doer. Yet in the doing of even a poor thing much good is done if one has wrought with an ideal aim. Our honest efforts are always valuable. They present certain stages of our growth, our intellectual, spiritual, or aesthetic gain. So we look forward to fuller and better expression. "When I see all England, France, and Germany has done," said Montesquieu, "I am filled with admiration; but I am not disheartened. I also am a painter in the making—why despair?" There is more to us than shows. All education is but the clearing the way for the exercise of faculties we already possess. No one is satisfied. We are better than we do—better than we look.

"THERE are times," said the man with the oratorical manner, "when we are overwhelmed with humiliation at the powerlessness of the human mind." "That's very true," was the reply. "I am often made to feel so." "Indeed?" "Yes, I have a four-year-old daughter who asks questions."—Washington Star.

The Study Table

Universal Truth as Found in the Older Eddas.

"Coming events throw their shadows before them." Not so. But they have been prepared by unseen power long before they came to happen. All things of importance which take place among us have had a road laid out before them by innumerable facts all working toward the same aim. Thus the never-broken connection between past, present and future is kept up. Thus the laws of existence act in unchangeable order. The American nation, the most free-minded, the most impartial of all, has reached to the point in the history of its evolution, where it must stand still in the midst of its practical life and listen to the voices from within. It has excelled in creating outward forms; it must make a halt and assure itself, that with its forms and contents are corresponding.

It might look to some as if all the congresses of this summer were almost too much at once, as if things were forced ahead. But it may be that those congresses were a true expression of the overwhelming desire awakening in this nation of finding itself not only as a nation achieving great things in practical life, but as a nation which has commenced life on the inheritance of centuries of civilization. And the past summer, in gathering together elements from all the world, will bring to Americans just the result which was needed.

What the Bible has been to humanity, what Homer was to the southern nations in their childhood, the old and the young Edda have been to the Teutonic nations. Our forefathers' longing for the best their soul could conceive, generations striving to reach onward step by step, is laid down in this Cyclus of poetry. We, their descendants, behold our own image, when we look at theirs as it is preserved in the Eddas; in the immeasurable depths of those sagas we find revealed the wisdom and love guiding the race from eternity. We who know those books take them in hands as sacred treasures, and we feel surprised—nay, we deplore it deeply—that a nation so universal in its tendency, so impartially impressed by true beauty, should remain unacquainted with such treasures.

Certainly, the old tale about the loss suffered by human kind, when under the construction of the tower of Babel all tongues were mixed, seems to come true, since the difference of language has power to withhold from our mind the access to even the greatest. Still all things will come out right, the path along which the spirit is leading mankind is the only one suitable for us. The difference of languages affords a working-field for the human spirit, which it needs. Whenever the time is ready, the day will come when "the spirit shall fill all flesh" and the same tongue shall be spoken by all. But till then we must welcome every true translation which gives to us the ideas of our forefathers, from which our own ideas are born. During the past summer more attention than ever before was paid to the fact that it was Norsemen who first discovered America, and to the still more important fact that the character of the old Norsemen has to some degree stamped the American nation, and that the understanding of this relationship will be of mutual benefit to both Americans and Scandinavians.

Now, in true connection with the spirit of the past summer, the inheritance of the American nation, the sagas of old as written down in "The Eddas" are for the first time presented to Americans in their own language, in such a shape that they become accessible to even a non-scientific reader. From all the old Gothic sagas such facts are gathered together and given in connection with the tales of the Eddas, which present them in a fuller light. This book is intended to become a popular book, to be read in our homes, by our youths, and in our higher schools.

Miss Marie Bjerckness, daughter of the celebrated O. A. Bjerckness, professor in the University of Christiania, Norway, has just completed the translation of "The Eddas," a translation which represents four years' work. P. A. Conradi, an ardent scholar of the science of comparative religion, has written an introduction to it, which aims to guide those who are unacquainted with our forefathers' way of expressing their thoughts.

The modern scholar will in those songs find outlined the creed of all churches, the belief of all ages.

The first of all gods, Odin, the father of wisdom, sings of himself:—

I know I hung on Igdraeyl's ash
Nine nights windy and long:
Wounded with spears, offered to Odin,
I offered myself to myself,
High up in that tree of which no one knows
From what roots it sprouts.

None gave me bread, nor a horn to drink,
But downward searching I saw:
Signs of Runer thus I learned—
Wailing I learned them and fell to the ground.

Nine mighty songs I learned from the son
Of famous Bolthom, Bestla's father:
A draught I drank of the minstrel-mead,
Drawn from the kettle Odrere.

Then I thrived, grew mighty and wise:
Words led words to other words,
Deeds led deeds to other deeds.

This is the redeemer on the cross:
the highest truth found through the deepest suffering.

Among the wisdom speeches of Odin is:—

Wealth will vanish, friends will die,
At last one dies himself;
But he whose name is fraught with fame
Will never die.

Another one:—

The soul's alone knows what lies near our hearts,
Alone it knows our feelings,
Nothing is worse for the high-minded man
Than not to be pleased with himself.

* Our forefathers considered man composed of body, soul and heart. "The soul is in the blood."

The temperance sentiment is not alone of to-day, for the old Edda says:—

Heavier burden no man can bear,
Than hearty beer bibbing;
For beer is not so good as said
For the sons of men.
Beer is not as good as said
For the human races,
The more one drinks the less one knows
Of his mind and senses.

Those who feel universal unity as a law for all existence, can only feel thankful at receiving this gift to Americans, and hope that it may become widely known. N. B. M.

The Magazines.

IN THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS for February the most noteworthy original article is Mr. Grant Allen's character sketch of Professor Tyndall. It is not, however, the original articles that give this unique publication its chief value, but what its name indicates, its reviews of the contents of other periodicals, its index to the contents of the periodicals of Europe and America, and, not to be overlooked, its brief notices of the books of the month. For these it is very valuable.

THE London Humanitarian for February contains three somewhat notable features, a feeling account of the Women's Trades Union League from the pen of Rev. Stopford Brooke, an interview with Alfred Russell Wallace on Heredity and Pre-Natal Influences, and a sketch entitled "Parallels," by Frank Thatcher, which contains an intimation of the editor's way of regarding marriage.

THE SILVER CROSS, for February, came out in a beautiful new dress, similar to that of The Outlook, with numerous illustrations. If we mistake not there is a marked internal improvement, as well as an external one.

UNITY takes pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of the Public Ledger Almanac for 1894, one of the most interesting features of which is the account of the admirable Drexel Institute.

Correspondence

Great Men of To-day.

EDITOR UNITY: I proposed to our club, which has just been reading "Heroes and Hero Worship," to vote on our greatest contemporaries, according to Mr. Gannett's classification, and though we extended the time to twenty years instead of ten, it is curious to note that our list agrees with the Rochester Club's list in every name except Miss Anthony's and Browning's, and Tennyson had nearly as many votes as Browning in the Rochester Club. General Booth and William Lloyd Garrison divide the honors equally as social reformer.

There were nineteen votes, and here are the winning names, with the number of votes they received:

Greatest Philosopher, Herbert Spencer.....	16
Greatest Religious Leader, Spurgeon.....	10
Greatest Skeptic, Ingersoll.....	16
Greatest Poet, Tennyson.....	14
Greatest Statesman, Gladstone....	11
Greatest Man of Letters, Lowell..	8
Greatest Man of Science, Huxley..	6
Greatest Man of Business, Gould..	12
Greatest Inventor, Edison.....	19
Greatest Social Reformer, Booth..	5
Greatest Social Reformer, Garrison.....	5

Our club members had none of them, except myself, seen the results of the Rochester Club's voting.

The Long Climb of Man.*

BY REV. E. M. WHELOCK.

"The word became flesh."—John i. 14.

There is a story widely current that once a little Hebrew, of mean presence but splendid courage, stood on the Hill of Mars in the Hellenic city, and declared to scoffing Greeks that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men." It goes without saying that such an utterance was received with scorn by the polished Athenians, who could not conceive that their favored race, standing on the pinnacle of culture, was of the same blood as the "outer barbarians." So the sturdy "apostle of the Gentiles" found little favor with the worshippers of the "unknown God."

Yet in that day the brave avowal of Paul was scarcely more abhorrent to the proud exclusiveness of Grecian thought than are the teachings of science to-day to the belated religionist; for while the dauntless Hebrew simply declared the brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God, science to-day teaches the universal touch and clasp of all organic life, saying in vivid words that in the one loom of a common origin hath time woven all the forms of life; these forms being the sign-posts and mile-stones along the organic march of man. Star-dust, monad, fish, bird and beast are all steps in the stairway which reaches from clod to cloud and terminates in soul! The worm at our feet is climbing the transfigured mount!

Every animal has been melted in the vital crucible from which man is made. Each form he uses is a way-side inn along the upward journey of the soul. His outward shell passed through every animal and vegetable body before it took on the human appearance, as in lower nature an analogous chemistry evolves electric bodies and wings from eggs and worms. When matter became organic, man was envisaged, for his psychic nature was once enshrined in flint and platinum; when the spine appeared he was already in view. To become a self-conscious spirit the psyche must first pass through every expression of life from landscape to skyscape; from the glow-worm to the star; from the daisy to the sun; from simia to seraph; from dust to Deity! This measureless cycle is all synthesized in man, who attains self-consciousness only after a countless series of evolutions. The stone becomes a plant, the plant a beast, the beast a man, the man a spirit, the spirit a god. "I said, Ye are Gods," was the large utterance of the Hebrew seer; or, as our Emerson has it, And the poor grass will plot and plan What it will do when it is man.

Said Christna to his disciple: "Both I and thou have passed through many births; I know of my own, but thou knowest not thine." Mineral, vegetable and animal structures, nay, atmospheres, planets and suns, are nothing else than so many means and tendencies to man on different stages of his transit. Creation is the coming and becoming of man. The world is here because there is an infinite reason for its existence; it is man at last that comes of it. The event reveals the design. Not a wind blew but sang of this wonder that should be. Not a river ran but hastened to have its water turned into the red wine of his blood, and to run again, burdened with the message of the Infinite, in his veins. He stands at the center, and feels all things as a dilation of his own being. He soars with the lark, crawls with the lizard, and shines with the gem or star. Man is nature become self-conscious, and thinking aloud. The Cosmos is annexed to him. He folds round heaven and hell with equal arms. The world is because he is. The reason of everything it contains is written in the book of human nature. The Cosmos is minimized in him. Animal forms are the fetal and infant entities of man. Begotten as we by the one life, its children as we, the Will that sent them out on the infinite sea will take care that they land on the other side—the side of self-consciousness and the ripened evolution of man.

It is the human idea that crystallizes the snowflake, veins the leaf, and paints the flower. These objects once carried our lives, and left them higher than they found them. Through all nature one glowing purpose runs—the building up of man. There is nothing in the world but the human, actual or potential. Says the Kabbala: "If man did not exist there could be no world." He is the brother of all things even as God is the father. Though the earth incessantly revolves, yet he is always at the top. Each of the various types in the mineral, plant and animal realms elaborates its mite of the vital principle; and, rising in the stately miracle of life, passes it on to a higher form. In the primal cell is purpose, aim, tendency. No atom can slip from the ligature of law. Prick the skin that is nearest, or the nebula that is farthest, and you draw the life-blood of law. Thought thinks in the atom; each molecule has a brain; each brain cell has a memory of its own; and the forces of nature are the fingers of God. All thoughts are things, and all things have thoughts. The laws of the universe are circular, and from any arc may be computed the sweep of the circumference. To explore the creation man needs no wings. Let him seat himself on the earth at his feet, and as his eyes open the whole Cosmos will swing into his sight. Time and space are the immeasurable continents, and matter the equally measureless content of creative investiture; thus all things wait on man to serve him in his fates.

He is made of the same stuff as the oyster he eats or the corn he hoes. All the animals are on the King's highway, only at indefinite distances behind us. We are all interlinked in origin, in life, and in destiny. If man is a philosopher he is also a polyp, and many a horse is wiser than his groom. Often the dog in a man is the best part of him. The sage who would disprove his ascent from the ape, still shows in his argument the claws, tricks and tail of his noble ancestor. All creatures and all plants are on the same road. Our kindred stand at every mile-stone, and from the herded beast to Humboldt, from the saurian to Shakespeare, from the stone to the star, is but a step. The circumference of man is the universe, the center of the universe is man. He is the microcosm of the macrocosm. The dog is a barking man; the tree is a rooted man. He has cloaked himself with each astral fossil stored up in the etheric envelope of the earth.

Upon molecular life, which is the mineral; growth life, which is the vegetable; and instinctive life, which is the animal,—is founded a life of life, which is mind. The face of man thus travels through the universe, and love and intelligence look out from things with an infinite variety, according to their capacities. He cannot travel beyond himself, for the world is still within the compass of his being. The heights of Zion and the abysses of Gehenna are within him, and he is a pipe that runs with every wine. There was neither fiend nor angel in the universe till man appeared. He infolds the angel and he "plays the devil." There is no hell for man, except the hell in man, made by man. The wise man recognizes his own species wherever life is seen; this is true to the very mire. The advent of man is the universe beckoning to the atom to come up among the gods.

His eyes dismount the highest star; He is, in little, all the spheres.

Animals are plants loosened a little at the roots, while the fibers of man run down every sweet and bitter thing, from the metal to the gas, from the violet to the vine. His body rolls along with the orb, kneaded together out of her juices and her clay. He is as much harnessed to matter as fish and dog, only with a larger arc. He stands waist deep in matter, as in a swamp. He is glued to nature. He is caught, like the bedraggled fly, in the viscid fluidity of things. Both his feet branch down into roots that share the universal life with the toad and the tree. His heart beats in the slender pulsations of the jelly fish. He has worn in his evolution the whole vesture of life, a vesture woven without seam from top to bottom, stretching from pit to pinnacle, from angle-worm to angel, from sponge to spirit, from protoplasm to prophet!

Step by step, through ages measureless by time, from particle and spicule, from cell and protoplasm, from plant, polyp, and quadrumanes have we scaled creation's altar stairs. In us are sun and moon, snow and mountain ranges, bud and flower. Many mothers fashion for one child, who yet, in his oneness, comprises myriads. There is nothing but is related to us, tree, sea-shell or crystal, the running river or the waving corn—the roots of all things are in man. Whatever is found as form in nature is present by form in him. The lower creation is planted permanently in man. He has distanced whatever is behind him, yet carries it all in him. He incorporates each fruit, root and grain, and is "stuccoed all over with quadrupeds and birds." In his natural degree he is the measure of the material cosmos, for he has grown from the star-fish and the chickweed, and "he has prowled, fanged and four-footed, in the woods." Just as the stone feels its way to the flower, and as the acorn out of soils and sunbeams fashions the oak, does the animated dust climb at last to the human brain, and the fluent mountains melt into man.

But slowly does the body forget its heredity. The animal is horsed on man. The old bruteness lurks in each cerebellum; it plucks from the soul her wings and leaves her all a worm. If the animal man looks at the universe at all it is through a Jewish pin-hole. The slice of beef on the rich man's table has a history that goes back to the dawn of creation, and so has the needle that sews the poor man's rags together. The pauper is brother to the prince. The life of the race circulates in each individual, and the disease of the individual is in the blood of the race. The world is in man as much as man is in the world. This truth is as far above the thought of the priesthoods as the blue sky is above the reach of one's hand, yet it is in the world, and in it stands the new time. As the Jewish hierarchy slumbered while the star-led Magi worshiped at the feet of the chosen Babe, so sleep those who now represent the ecclesiasticism of the hour. Of all classes the priest is the most stupid; he is born with the blinkers on, and speaks to men out of the windows of Noah's Ark! The Hebrew myths are to him the rim of the universe, beyond which lies the yawning gulf of perdition. Such men talk of "losing their souls!"—it might be a task first to find them. Once men were hairy folk, standing in pelts; and still in their tangle of religions the ape stands, made as a god! But why worship records, while the open Word forms daily for the open soul?

Man is the wandering Jew in whose ear the fiat rings forever, "Move on!" He is the tree Igdrasil, whose roots are in Hela, whose trunk is in the lower natures, whose fruit is passion from the blood of instinct, and whose branches wave in the air-deeps of the world's breath. He is the Midgard serpent in whom end and beginning meet, and who hoops the whole world. He is the true Ark of Noah, in which all the lower natures are housed. He travels with a whole menagerie in his cerebellum, and in him the Creator brings all his dumb creatures under one roof. When the animals came to Adam to be named, each, as he drew near, brought to Adam a token of himself—a token which the baby-man had dropped as he passed that way long years ago.

The sap of the tree foretells his blood, and the hoof of the quadruped prefigures his hand. Every atom avows life—human life—the kingdom of God in leasts. Man has touched every spherule. The circle of his arm is the girdle of creation. His electric wires have compressed the earth until the elbows of the nations touch, and the winged heels of Mercury come tardy off beside the feet Ariel of Edison and Bell. He is the Proteus that slips from form to form. All history lies under his hat, and he is the trustee of every past age. Religion is born from him. He makes his Deity in his own image, and from his own heart and brain are shed the Bibles of the race, as the leaves are shed from the tree. He is animated oxygen, breathing granite, living clay. He was predicted in the crystal and prefigured in the plant. Prediction grew into prophecy in reptile and bird. Prophecy rose into assurance in the ape. Assurance ripens into fulfillment in man.

"Man doth usurp all space, Stares thee, in rock, bush, river, in the face.

'Tis no sea thou seest in the sea,
'Tis but a disguised humanity."

Science watches the Monad through all its masks and detects through all the troops of organic forms the Eternal Unity. All feet fit into that footstep, and all things have passed that way.

Plato learned in Egypt that nature is all one piece. All her varied wardrobe is cut from the same cloth. The Unity is so unbroken that the merest gnat carries on his back the key to the universe. A drop of maple syrup and a drop of human blood have their origin in the same corpuscle. The fungus and the oak on which it grows, the animalcule and the scientist who studies it, are one. The sun has no fuel that the earth cannot duplicate. The slime pushes up into the lily; the dunghill is transformed into the grape vine; from the refuse of the sink and the sewer come the tint of the pink and the odor of the rose. Filth and fertility are the same word. So we climb the creative ladder from weed to man.

And more or less bulk signifies nothing. The orb is but an astral grain. The atom is as large as the Alp. The revolving moon and the falling apple move by the same law.

The smallest sin helps to warp the earth's axis. Infinitesimals are as huge as infinites. The world is wrapped up in the particle. The drop balances the sea. The globe is but an enlarged globule. The mite is mighty, and the sand-grain a masterpiece like the sun. In every cob-web there is room for a planet. Through the egg and the orb stream the same laws, and the blood globules in our veins dance to the same tune as asteroid and star.

If the lenses of our eyes were differently adjusted the whole universe might come within our plane of vision, and the spaces between the planets be no greater than the intervals between adjacent grains of sand. The air-bubble then becomes the star cluster, and in a glass of water behold the galaxy!

"'Tis from the world of little things
The ever-greatening cosmos springs.
The heaving earth, its rounded sphere Began between a smile and star."

From one minute cell another proceeds; from them others, and the result is a lily, an oak, a tadpole or a poet. The universe is one; it has no outside, and in its unity all is taken up. The energy that grouped the atoms of the sand-grain welded on the same anvil the star. God's word is written in full on every mustard seed. Ourselves and all we touch is, when we look with equal eyes, "God manifest in the flesh." The law that shapes the star-mist into suns outworks the frost-forest on our window panes. A pebble is a microcosm. The molds of the stars are used in forming the rain drops, and through each cubic foot of earth shoots the axis of the globe.

"The eye reads omens where it goes,
And speaks all languages the rose;
And striving to be man, the worm
Mounts through all the spires of form."

Spirit is the great life on which matter rests as rests the ponderous globe on the free and fluid ether. Spirit impregnates matter; matter embodies spirit. Nature is the revelation of spirit in space; history the revelation of spirit in time. Spirit sleeps in the stone, grows in the plant, stirs in the animal, wakes in the man, and will work on until the present chaos and old night are taken up into the higher evolution. The mind occupies every corpuscle. Spirit precedes time and space, builds its own structure and makes its own environment. The moral sense has its beginnings in the lower animals, just as the whale has its hind legs inside the skin, and its teeth that never cut the gums.

The Psyche is present even in the lowest forms. It exists, but for want of fitting organs it is too dim for our faculties to ken, and increase in mind-force only takes place with ascent of organism. The pebble climbs to a rose, and the rose to a soul. Cosmic unity runs on the broad roadway of law through all the worlds.

Man has the planet for his pedestal. The gases gather to compose his form and the winds hold him in solution. "He knows," said Emerson, "of ox, mastodon and plant, because he has just come out of them, and part of the egg-shell still adheres. The plowman, the plow and the furrow are all of one stuff." It is true, man has traveled on the protoplastic railroad over all chasms and up all grades from microbes to poets. Every step he takes is locked with the last and the next. The ends of the earth are brought together to be built into the temple of his body. He passes through the fingers of every herb and is enriched by each. He drinks the atmosphere with the planet dissolved in it. In the stone or plant is the Psyche first imprisoned that, later on, is to resound through history and push the nations to their goal. In every form alike the Eternal God-seed comes and goes.

The animal is without self-consciousness. He is tied hand and foot to his instincts. He cannot turn round in his track and face himself. But man's self detaches itself to look itself in the face. The animal, while he knows, does not know that he knows. He sees, but does not see that he sees. He acts, but does not react. Man alone has the faculty that looks before and after. He alone has spirituality, and lower forms are but the stuttering prophecy of that unmatched perfection. He is the goal to which all uses run; the harbor where the world's freights come to shore. God made man in his own image, and then he made the universe in the image of man. Man is conscious nature; nature is unconscious man. Her effort is to evolve her own God, who is man. The God of nature is always man. To bring her stupid deity to his senses, she cuffs and beats him as the angry fishermen of Naples do the images of their saints in stormy weather.

Our systems are charged in every fiber with the eternity behind us, and what was done a million of ages gone, when the crystal dreamed of the flower, is vital in us to-day. In us unite zoophyte and fish, mound and mammal, and we confess it in bone and function. The mouse is our fellow creature. The worms are our poor relations. Nothing walks or creeps or grows which we have not been in turn. The rock is man stratified; the plant, man vegetating; the reptile, man wriggling and squirming; to-morrow it will fly, walk or swim; the day after it will wear a necktie or bonnet. Our Psyche fits on and wears each coat in nature's wardrobe before it assumes the human incarnation. The unconscious effort and aspiration of all lower life is to reach the human organism. Never was the thought of man absent from nature. She was carrying him from the first in her bosom. He is thus a universal form from the complex of life, and the cosmos crosses him by its lines through every nerve. The laws that hold the world in their orbits are in the mind of man. The desire for a sentient life shows itself in everything from a seed to a sun, and it is a reflection of the divine will that the universe should continue. Things that have life are alive, whether they be atoms or orbs. Every particle in nature is a life, and there is not a finger-breadth of empty space beneath the dome of the sky.

In this universe the meanest thing does not stand isolated and forlorn. The brutes are kith and kin to these who rule over them. They are the steps of our ascending pathway through nature, and each lower form proffers its torch to light up some obscure chamber in the faculties of man. The universe runs manward from its source. Scales change to feathers, gills to lungs, fins to hands, matter to force, atoms to thought, dust to mind, sap to soul. Humanity, by its principles, extends through the realms of beasts and fishes, herbs and stones, and even through the winds and fluid worlds. There is no escape anywhere from man; if we fly to the uttermost parts of the earth on wings of the morning, if we ascend into heaven or make our beds in hades, still he is there. The universe is swallowed up in him. Thought is its cradle and its grave. By man all things are spread abroad. He barks in the dog, grows in the tree, murmurs in the passing brook, and his pulse vibrates to the stupendous movement of all the starry scheme.

He is Atlas with the globe on his shoulders. He is the philosopher's stone transmuting coarse matter into creative forces. He is the king of nature, for he knows himself in the midst of a universe that does not yet know itself. All through nebulous and planetary life there was one determined upward movement until man was reached. Form after form was flung aside, one creation after another left stranded until the human appeared. From the appearance of the first and faintest organism, man was ideally present on earth, involved in the anatomical snarl. He is brother to the blossom and the tree, and with the same pigment nature paints the apple's and the maiden's cheek. From one form to another the monad has passed on. It was once encased in stone; then it crept out of its prison as a lichen or a moss. From change to change it climbed until its physical form became that of a man.

In these lengthened processes of evolution the mystic advance of man has drawn into the various lines of the organisms through which he has passed, the whole cosmos by minutenesses, till each one holds, mirrored in his structure, constituents and images of the Universal All. I, that to-day am man, was yesterday a pine; the day before I sparkled in the crystal or the spar; before that I slept in the world-egg of stone; before that, again, I was a rapid, sparkling sprite of the ether and the day, winged but unsouled, and hungry for incarnation; for the Psyche desires birth and enmeshment, and the soul craves organization. Each form I use is but the inn where I tarry for a night; for the soul is an incurable nomad, dwelling always in tents. All things strive to ascend, and ascend by striving, so at last we work out the beast and let the tiger die. Tusks change to teeth, and the lion's paw and the jaw of the shark become the tools of culture. Evil in nature is unsubject force, not yet responsive to the human sway. But all evil is self-limited; the sands of the Sahara are held in check by the waters of the Mediterranean, and when carried too far, pain becomes its own anodyne. Evolution is the steady play of the Eternal Will through all these turning and belted worlds, and the death of Pan is his re-birth into humanity.

The primal nucleoid holds the soul seed of man—the offspring of dust and of spirit. In every type the soul-force has a corresponding material house—"to every seed its own body." The forms which he inhabits at any epoch in his organic march, are only the record of his spirit's unfolding up to that date. A death is a birth; a corpse is a seed; a cadaver is a genesis, and every green grave is a cradle; "from form to form he maketh haste."

If God is great, He is also little. He dwells in the small man-seed by powers of fate, and weaves upon it shape on shape in being's loom. He is dim in rock, flower and bird. In human flesh he is most himself, and in human eyes we look most closely into the eyes of God. God is not a mind, but the cause of a mind; not a spirit, but the cause of a spirit; He is felt and known as the only creative life, and man as the creaturely form in which that life becomes fully expressed and glorified. Each human innermost is a gemmule of God; and over every cradle shines the "star in the east." The Creation is that God the One may become God the Many. Man stands in the doorway of the planet; God can enter nature only through him. He unbinds himself in man and gives his being outness and relief. The evolution of man is the slow growth of the divine in us from infancy and nonage to kingship and rule. The road is a long one. Man lurks in the lichen and sleeps in the stone. Nature has cunningly wiredrawn him through all her products from flower-bud to planet-bud, from the airy cope to the granite calyx of the globe.

In man the divine impersonal becomes personified. The Psyche is the God-element which, divided from Deity, is yet divine and human. The scale of humanity ranges from atom to archangel; hunger for food is at one pole, and at the other hunger for God. Evolution moving backward does not leave us in the lap of the monkey, — it traces us to the Infinite arms. The long evolving chain stretches not only from protoplasm to man, but from spirit to spirit. The way we have come hints at the way we are to go. The road behind us begins with the Infinite; vanward it ends only with the Infinite again. God creates Himself in man. Man completes himself in God. Man finds being in God; God attains existence in man. The universe is intelligence infinitely individualized. The creation is a thought discreted from the thinker's mind. It is the separateness of the personal entity or soul from the aggregate of soul in the cosmos. Nature holds the seeds and forms of all life in potency; in this way the primal slim; becomes fish, bird, mammal, man; but all this stream of existence flows from the divine life, through every ancestral link, and is God's from end to end. An infinite force from first to last propels the eternal whole. Nature streams perpetually from God; every atom, even of her chaos, is penetrated by an adequate mind; every granule is impeded and winged. Man has been crystallized, metallized, herbed and incarnated. He will be unbeasted, humanized, godded. In his spiritual deeps all gospels lie in germ. Space and matter, irrespective of him, are so flimsy that thought goes through them as if there was nothing there. Time is not heard unless ticking in ourselves.

In the primal medley or chaos, creator and creature, God and man, are mingled and indistinguishable. All things are confusedly blent. It is a potpourri. The entire scope of evolution is to reduce this chaos to order; to lift this mute, melancholy and prostrate universe into human personality. To evolve at length a self-conscious personality is the end in view of the entire process. Thus "the word becomes flesh."

The wiser ancients knew the great law which Darwin has but restated. They knew, for instance, that the psychic outline of man was latent in the horse, and was preparing for evolution. This knowledge they expressed in the myth of the centaurs. It is a parable of evolution. So the mermaid, the siren, the sphinx, are similar parables. Those human-headed gods, with bodies of reptile, fish, bird or beast, are the pictures or object lessons by which the Magi of the East taught the truth of the evolutionary ascent of the germ of man. The Cosmos is God disappearing in material life to emerge as man — God lost in the forest of forms, till found again in the human advent. Nature is the involution of spirit in matter. History is the evolution of the godhead. Each little child, like the holy babe of Bethlehem, intercedes for every person born; for God without and God within are one; the sorrow of the world is the cross of God; the son of man is evolution; and in the feeblest little babe in the manger of poverty is the Lord from the skies!

Man always was—in God,—but to attain personal existence he had to be "created," that is, distanced from the Creator. So he was wire drawn through all forms and strained and sifted through a thousand organisms. He is veiled in matter and divided from the Infinite by the whole breadth of the creation, that he may individualize, and by the long climb of evolution gain for his personal being fixity and place. In itself the Psyche is an unbounded force, seeking constant expansion and overflow. The long series of forms through which it ascends, furnish the curbing power that it needs to compress its action into orderly channels, and to endow it at length with self-control. Spirit must mount on the shoulders of matter, for man is a perpetual becoming, and matter is the vehicle of all becoming. Before a seed can grow it must be taken from the shelf and planted in the soil; so nature furnishes the soil for the growth of the soul. Man's spiritual destiny is so sublime, his final blending with the divine so intimate and complete, that he needs all this preliminary experience of mineral, vegetable and animal existence to give him the alphabet of self-consciousness, and to render him at last solidaire with God. The Word became flesh that finally the flesh might become the Word, and the glory of the Word which was made flesh, shall be in the flesh of all those who are the servants of the Word.

The Sunday School

A Lincoln Party.

All Souls Sunday School gave its children a Lincoln party on Wednesday last, thus honoring two saints at the one time, St. Valentine and St. Lincoln. An early supper for the children was followed by a delightfully arranged program, consisting of tableaux from the life of Lincoln, alternating with quotations from his own words or from those of his eulogists. The scenes portrayed were of his childhood and early manhood, ranging from his school days to his first speech. All were good, but the applause that followed the effort at poetry-making proved that Tommy had captured the audience by his rendition of

"Abraham Lincoln — his name and pen — I will be good, but God knows when."

Quotations and anecdotes were given by both classes and guests, that part of Lowell's Commemoration Ode referring to the "First American" being recited in concert by one of the older classes. Reminiscences were given by the few that remembered him, and best of all the pastor drew many sweet and valuable lessons from his life for the inspiration of the children, old and young.

The exercises of the evening came to a close by the singing of a familiar hymn which had for a new and fitting climax the verse already printed in the editorial column of last week.

Sermons dedicated to the Parliament of Religions by JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Several thousand copies were sold during the sessions of the Parliament of Religions. Besides the sermon thought these little books give in a small space an outline of the life and teachings of each of the great prophets.

Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Ceylon, writes: "Jenkin Lloyd Jones deserves the thanks of the followers of the gentle teacher of Asia for bringing out in pamphlet form the Life and Teachings of that Savior of humanity to suit the minds of the American student of religion. I recommend it heartily."

Mr. Alexander Russell Webb, Editor of the Muslim World, writes: "I have just finished your most excellent lecture entitled 'Mohammed, the Prophet of Arabia.' It is the fairest and most truthful composition I have seen in the English language not made by a Mohammedan. Your mind has risen above the prejudices that Christians usually entertain towards Islam and its teacher. I congratulate you sincerely on having made a bold and effective stand in favor of truth."

Contented Jim.

Everything pleased our neighbor Jim,
When it rained

He never complained,

But said wet weather suited him.

"There never is too much rain for me,

And this is something like," said he.

When earth was dry as a powder mill,
He did not sigh

Because it was dry,

But said if he could have his will

It would be his chief supreme delight

To live where the sun shone day and night.

When winter came, with its snow and ice,

He did not scold

Because it was cold,

But said: "Now this is real nice;

If ever from home I'm forced to go,

I'll move up North with the Esquimaux."

A cyclone whirled along its track;

And did him harm—

It broke his arm,

And stripped the coat from off his back:

"And I would give another limb

To see such a blow again," said Jim.

And when at length his years were told,

And his body bent,

And his strength all spent,

And Jim was very weak and old:

"I long have wanted to know," he said,

"How it feels to die"—and Jim was dead.

The Angel of death had summoned him

To heaven, or—well,

I cannot tell;

But I knew that the climate suited Jim:

And cold or hot, it mattered not—

It was to him the long-sought spot.

—O. F. Pearre, in American Youth.

Narrow, but Useful.

The good lady was going around among a lot of poor people distributing all manner of old clothes, which was gratefully received, when she met a newspaper man looking for a killing case.

"Charity covereth a multitude of sins," he said, sarcastically.

"Well, that isn't what I'm looking for," she responded.

"No?" And he looked surprised.

"No," she said, "my mission is a little narrower than that. We cut it down to charity covereth a multitude of skins."

Crumbs of Truth.

A young girl once heard a bit of wisdom from the lips of a very aged woman—a woman who had rounded the full term of ninety years, and with eyes still bright and clear looked out upon the inrolling waters of eternity. The girl was impressed by the emphasis with which the venerable dame said to her: "Bessie, never insist on having the last word." The determination to have the final word leads to more quarrels and more bitterness of feeling at home than almost anything else in domestic life. The fact is that one may so control her tongue and her eyes that she may allow her opponent the pleasure of this coveted concluding thrust and yet placidly retain her own opinion, and, in the homely colloquial parlance of the up-country, where one finds strong-willed people living together in great peace with the most pronounced diversity of characteristics, "do as she's a mind to."

Another bit of wisdom may be condensed into a pithy sentence. Avoid explanations. In some families nothing is taken for granted. Every action, every decision, every new departure, every acceptance or rejection of an invitation, must be endlessly talked and fussed over, explained, and re-explained. In that way lie all sorts of stumbling-blocks. As a rule, beyond your parents or your husband there is nobody who has the right to demand of you explanations at each step of your onward path. Don't give them. Establish a reputation for keeping your own council. It will serve you well in many a crisis, and be no end of a comfort.

Again, don't be forever setting people right. There is a household fiend with a memory for dates and details who can never sit still and hear papa say that he went down town on Monday, at eight, without correcting the statement with the remark that the hour was half-past. If mamma happens to allude to Cousin Jenny's visit as having occurred last Thursday, this wasplike impersonation of accuracy interposes with the statement that it was Friday, not Thursday, which brought Cousin Jane. A dozen times a day exasperating frictions are caused by needless corrections of this sort, referring to matters where exactness is not really imperative, the affairs in question being unimportant, and no violation of truth being for an instant intended. Silence is golden in nearly every instance where a defect obtains in the home economy. To abstain from superfluous apologies is also the habit of discretion. There should seldom be the occasion for apology in the household, where all would do well and wisely to be constantly gentle and courteous.

Exchange.

The Poppy Land Limited Express.

The first train starts at 6 p. m.

For the land where the poppy grows,

The mother dear is the engineer,

And the passenger laughs and crows.

The palace car is the mother's arms,

The whistle, a low sweet strain.

The passenger winks and nods and blinks,

And goes to sleep in the train.

At 8 p. m. the next train starts

For the poppy land afar;

The summons clear falls on the ear,

"All aboard for the sleeping car."

"But what is the fare to poppy land?"

I hope it is not dear."

The fare is this, a hug and a kiss,

And 'tis paid to the engineer.

So I ask of Him who children took

On his knee in kindness great,

"Take charge, I pray, of the trains each day,

That leave between 6 and 8.

"Keep watch o'er the passengers," thus

I pray.

"For to me they are very dear,

And special ward, O gracious Lord,

O'er the gentle engineer."

Notes from the Field

Philadelphia, Pa.—Report for first six months of the Minster Street Neighborhood Guild. Adopted by the Advisory Board. The work of the Minster Street Neighborhood Guild began July 1, 1893, by securing the premises 618 and 620 Minster street. The house 618 Minster street has been refitted for the residence of the head worker, and Mr. Daniel with his family are now living in it. This house is situated on a narrow lane among the people whom we are trying to benefit. This means continuous work and no retreat and a close contact with the people. Here there is an important element of success—a permanent home. Next door is a small church, the basement of which has been refitted for the use of the children who crowd it every night.

These two properties have been secured by Mrs. Daniel and she gives their use to the Guild without expectation of rent or any emolument. It is expected, however, that taxes, water rent and such ground rents as are standing be met by the Guild and charged to the current expenses of the Guild. Also such repairs as are necessary to keep the building in a fair condition for the use for which it is designed.

Over 250 children have been gathered who meet from time to time for definite work. A few have been formed into a singing class who train for choir singing. Another group has been organized for the cultivation of humane feelings towards dumb creatures and our weaker neighbors. Still another group meets for sewing and the learning of household industries. Another group have calisthenic exercises, while a few boys have formed a class for drilling. A temperance society is also being formed. Quite a number use the library faithfully.

The Guild room is open every week-day evening, and the young people gather for amusement and instruction. This keeps them from the streets, and to many it is the only bright and attractive place they have, and is a refuge outside their narrow and cheerless homes to which they are glad to come.

The amusements are a good in themselves, but the room serves also as a recruiting station from which they are drafted into something else of an educational character.

One important part of our work is to influence the children to attend the neighboring public schools and all institutions already provided for them. It is gratifying to meet the children who now go to school and were influenced to do so through the work of the Guild.

On Sunday night the children gather in the upper part of the church for moral instruction. The room is well filled and the improvement is marked. The children are taught to sing and the lantern aids in imparting instruction.

Progress has been made in sanitary matters. Nuisances have been abolished and street cleaning and the gathering of garbage and ashes have been insisted upon and now there is a tolerable service performed. This had been neglected for months prior to our coming, but began soon after we became co-laborers and co-sufferers with the people of the neighborhood. It is one of the gratifying results of a family living on the ground.

We have enlisted workers who come each week for specific work. Faithful work has been done by these friends and they have learned to love and grow enthusiastic in the work.

From July 1 to December 31, 1893, there have been sent to Mr. Daniel $430.55 in response to appeals made in The Nazarene. This is the only source of income, as there is no assured support of any character.

Owing to the newness of the work a great deal of this sum had to be spent in securing the proper machinery. A very large portion was spent in relieving laboring men and artisans out of employment who gave their labor in return, and thus was not only distress relieved, but a machinery secured for work among the youth which in turn will do good service for many years to come and will prevent pauperism. The details of the expenditures of this sum of $430.55 is given in an annexed financial statement.

It might, however, be here stated that of this sum of $430.55, Mr. Daniel received for the support of his family $50 in July and $14.63 in August. The balance went for the ordinary current expenses and the placing of the work in good running order. Mr. Daniel suggested at the outset that $50 per month should be set aside for the family use, but so urgent were other matters that this could not be done at this stage of the work. But as the main first cost is now out of the way, the support of the head worker may become possible.

In so brief a report no justice can be done to so varied and in many respects unique a work, but in brief we can report progress and the Guild has come to stay.

Hobart, Ind.—The church here is twenty years old next summer, and is planning to celebrate its twentieth birthday; and it will be a celebration worth attending, if it is carried out with the tact and skill that mark its regular management.

Cleveland, Ohio.—The Unity Club of this city gave its dramatic entertainment very successfully. The Ladies' Societies of Unity Church are actively engaged in discussing and doing philanthropic work for some of the various charitable institutions of the city. Many warm garments have been made by willing fingers for needy women and their little ones.

Cherokee, Iowa.—Miss Safford and Miss Gordon, the indefatigable ministers of Sioux City, who seem to have taken all of this northwestern corner of Iowa for their parish, have been keeping up the work here. In spite of the hard times a valuable lot has been bought and almost wholly paid for, and besides that the money for a modest church has been raised, the material bought, and the work begun. The people hope to get into their own church home by May.

Decorah, Iowa.—The following letter of correction ought to have been printed earlier. The omission was accidental:

DEAR UNITY—IN UNITY'S notice of the ordination exercises in this place there were two mistakes. One was the omission of the name of Rev. T. B. Forbush, who took part; the other in speaking of the church as a Unitarian church, while really it is an advance guard to the movement you are so nobly working for. We aim to leave unity behind, and work for "unity" in its most comprehensive sense, and

I bid you a sincere God-speed in your efforts. Let our banner be broad enough to cover the world. That has been my motto for years. Fraternally,
L. A. WEISER.

Decorah, Iowa.

Humbolt, Iowa.—A musical event of considerable interest has just occurred in this city in the presentation of the cantata, "David, the Shepherd Boy," by Unity Church choir and orchestra. The choir consists of twenty voices and the orchestra of eight pieces. C. H. Brown, Jr., as David; Mrs. Clara Berkhimer Drake, as Abigail; W. W. Sterns, as Saul; Miss Charlie Welch, as Michael; Mrs. D. F. Coyle, as Jonathan, and G. H. Shellenberger, as Samuel, won frequent applause and ably sustained their reputations as accomplished musicians. The choir and orchestra are permanent features of Unity Church, and the society feels a just pride in their efforts.

Miss Safford, of Sioux City, recently preached here, exchanging with Mr. Byrnes, who took her place in the Cherokee and Washta pulpit for the day. She was welcomed back to her old home by an audience which filled the church to the very doors.

Sturgis, Mich.—Last Sunday evening the Unitarian Society here commemorated the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. Short speeches and papers were given presenting Lincoln as the lawyer, the orator, the statesman, the family man and humorist, the philosopher and religious man, and as compared with Washington. Three of the speakers were members of the Presbyterian Church. The church was crowded, many standing the whole evening. Audiences have increased during the winter; also Sunday school.

St. Paul, Minn.—At the close of the service, Sunday, February 11th, a meeting of the society was held at which Mr. Crothers' resignation was accepted and the following expression of regard and regret was adopted:

We wish to express our sorrow at the great personal loss it brings us, and our deep sense of obligation for what he has done during the seven years he has been our pastor. Under his ministrations our society has had a steady and vigorous growth, that gave encouragement for the present and the greatest promise for the future. His influence has strengthened those who were already members of the society, and joined to us many who never before had been attracted to the cause of liberal religion. A number of societies in this and neighboring States owe their existence to his zeal. But greater than the loss of our pastor do we feel to be the loss of the friend who has ever been ready in time of trouble to speak that rare word which alone could comfort, to give counsel and aid to those in need. Nor do we forget how much he has contributed to our social gatherings from his ever ready store of wisdom and humor. It will ever be a satisfaction to us to remember that our relations with Mr. Crothers were only those of mutual cordiality and good-will, and that they have been ended only that he may continue his career in another field of usefulness to which his duty calls him, and to which he takes with him our best wishes and most affectionate God-speed.

The loss to us of the ministry of Mrs. Crothers, supplementing as it does beneficently the pastorate of her husband, will be heart-felt. Our gratitude and love will go with her also to the new field of duty.

Helena, Mont.—In addition to his morning services Mr. Crocker has given a course of "Words to Young People," Sunday evenings: "Some Foundations," "Life Motives," "Success in Life," and "What Religion?" There is in Helena a very well planned associated charities organization at work in the city this winter, in which the Unitarians are actively interested, Mr. Crocker being one of the executive committee.

Sioux Falls, S. Dak.—Mrs. Wilkes, who has gone to Oakland, Cal., to act as Mr. Wendte's assistant, preached here the Sunday before she left. Since then the church has been closed till the 11th, when the Western Secretary held services morning and evening. But the society continues its organization. The Ladies' Unity Circle has held its regular weekly meetings and socials, and the Sunday school has also continued its sessions; and it is hoped that by another year at least the people may find some one to fill this beautiful church every Sunday.

Austin, Tex.—All goes well here. The congregation is increasing steadily in numbers. The record of attendance shows an increase of about fifty per cent. over that of a year ago. Reports of Mr. Wheelock's sermons are published every week. They vary in subject and treatment, but are of uniform excellence. The sermon contributed by him to this number of our paper, it is needless to say, is not such a sermon as gets preached every Sunday. When George MacDonald on his visit to America preached for Dr. Bellows in All Souls Church, New York, some of his hearers said it thundered and others said "an angel spoke to them." Like all original and unusual preaching, Mr. Wheelock's will meet with the same double commentary.—South-ern Unitarian.

San Francisco, Cal.—One of the most interesting,—nay, portentous occasions of the present time is thus described by the Pacific Unitarian :—

On Monday evening, Jan. 15, the Clericus, an organization of Episcopal ministers, and the Church Club, composed of laymen, united in a dinner to which were invited the leading local scientists, and clergymen and laymen of other denominations, including Presbyterians, Methodists, Unitarians and Jews. The Occidental Hotel was the scene of the unusual event and about a hundred gentlemen were at table. During the excellent dinner good music floated through the room and airs from "Robin Hood" and other operas fell pleasantly on the happy company. "Evolution" was the subject of discussion and the first speaker was Professor Joseph Le Conte of the University of California, probably the most dearly loved man on the Pacific coast. He spoke with characteristic modesty, yet with firm and confident tones as to the truth of evolution, treating it as no longer a theory but as a law, at least as clearly established as the law of gravitation.

Professor Jordan, of Stanford University, followed in an address of equal positiveness, made especially interesting by his allusion to Agassiz, whose pupil he, as well as Le Conte, had been.

Rev. Dr. Robert Mackenzie, Presbyterian, was the next speaker. He said the church was ready to accept the doctrine of evolution provided that Herbert Spencer's "Unknownable" should be admitted to be God.

President Kellogg, of the University of California, a self-styled conservative, saw no reason for denying the truth of evolution, and did not consider that it was in conflict with religion.

Rabbi Voorsanger spoke forcibly, confessing himself a thorough evolutionist and claiming that religion and science had no connection. They both dealt with truth, but their language was not the same.

Rev. Dr. Stebbins made an eloquent speech, which we print on another page.

Rev. Mr. Miel and Rev. Mr. Foute, of the Episcopal Church, spoke in commendation of the position assumed by the other speakers. Their addresses were tinged with pleasant and seemed to express the cordial and friendly air that prevailed.

Bishop Nichols and Bishop Goodwill (of the Methodist Church) were present at the dinner, but were obliged to leave before the speaking began, to meet an appointment previously made.

THE PACIFIC UNITARIAN CONFERENCE will be held in San Francisco, April 10, 11, and 12, so as to immediately precede the Midwinter Fair Religious Congress, which is to be held April 16-21.

Sacramento, Ca.—Since our last writing directors for 1894 have been elected as follows: Dr. H. L. Nichols, Dr. C. F. Milliken, C. C. Olney, J. L. Whitbeck, W. C. Fitch, Henry Burnham, F. F. Thomson.

The report of the treasurer showed that over $1,700 had been raised to defray expenses during the year 1893, and that almost enough subscriptions had been secured to carry the society through the year 1894.

Early in January Rabbi Elzas preached for Mr. Horner, and was liked very much by our people. The fraternal relations established between the Unitarian and Hebrew congregations while Rabbi Levy was here are continued under Rabbi Elzas, late of Toronto.

The Woman's Society, organized early in January, gave its first supper January 27th, netting a profit of over $15.

Mr. Horner preached a sermon on "Eternal Punishment," January 21st, which was published in part in the Record-Union. The arguments used by Mr. Horner seemed very offensive to many of the admirers of that ancient doctrine, and immediately a lengthy criticism came out signed by the Lutheran minister, the spirit of which was its own condemnation. He said: "There is nothing 'horrible' in the doctrine which is upheld by the word of God to the Christian believer. * * Others may fear it, and consider it 'horrible,' but never the Christian." Mr. Horner continued the subject last Sunday evening, and again it was published in the Record-Union. In the sermon Mr. Horner said: "If reason outside of the Christian pale would not blaspheme God by making him the author of eternal woe to the great majority of the children of men, and inside of that pale does make it both reasonable and just, then God deliver me from Christianity!"

—Pacific Unitarian.

Pasadena, Cal.—Rev. Dr. Conger is improving in health, but is hardly able to resume his pastoral duties yet. Meanwhile Miss Kollock is carrying on the earnest work of the large parish with admirable success. Rev. C. W. Wendte, in the February Pacific Unitarian, is authority for the statement that "the society has adopted the following condition of membership: 'Any person of good character interested in the welfare of this church may become a member by signing its by-laws'"—than which, he adds, no broader platform can be desired.

Pomona, Cal.—The Women's Parliament of Southern California held its fourth session in Pomona, January 30 and 31. The topics were—1. Education: The Kindergarten and the High School. 2. The Poverty Problem. 3. Occupations for women. 4. The Home.

Santa Barbara, Cal.—Rev. F. L. Hosmer, who has been spending part of the winter in California and has recently been in Redlands and San Diego, preached here on the 8th and 15th.

San Diego, Cal.—Rev. J. Frederic Dutton's congregations have averaged 150 and are increasing, and it is hoped that he will become the regular pastor of the society. During Superintendent Wendte's visit to the city $329.00, a deferred payment on its debt to the Unitarian Loan Fund, was raised,—the Pacific Unitarian Conference contributing $100.00. We would repeat that

San Diego is a very important station for the cultivation and propagation of liberal religious thought, and if any of our readers can give at all, they could not well give in a better religious cause than that of extricating the San Diego society from its depressing burden of debt. San Diego is a city with a future; as Rev. Mr. Dutton puts it, its church is "next to heaven;" and it has an excellent church plant; but the collapse of one of the mischievous booms that curse our fast growing towns has left the society with debts that are almost more than it can struggle along under, and although its position is better than it was a year ago, there is still room to do much for it.

Worcester (Mass.) Conference.—The twenty-seventh annual meeting was held with the Church of the Unity, Worcester, Wednesday evening and Thursday, January 24 and 25. The conference opened with a sermon by Rev. Minot J. Savage, on "Religion in the Light of Modern Thought." He had the closest attention of the large audience that filled the church, for over an hour. It was a sermon of great breadth, simplicity, beauty, and power. Never perhaps did the speaker rise to greater heights, and never was he listened to with more sympathy and delight. Twice he was heartily applauded. It seemed to some as if Mr. Savage ought to be released from his parish part of every year, and sent forth to proclaim the great message throughout the land.

The sessions of the conference on Thursday opened with a devotional meeting, which was conducted by Rev. George S. Ball. The addresses that followed during the day were upon "The World's Parliament of Religions." The first address was by Rev. William S. Heywood, who brought out in strong relief the chief points of this most significant gathering.

Rev. Grindall Reynolds, Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, spoke particularly of the necessity of sustaining our own work, and emphasized the fact that the Parliament made it more than ever evident how necessary our position is. It was one of his very best addresses, and made a deep impression.

In the afternoon Dr. G. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University, was the first speaker. He spoke from the point of view of education. First, the Congress suggested a more rational and pedagogic basis for missionary work. The method of conquest should yield to that of growth and sympathy. A good pedagogic missionary should not only know, but ally himself with the best forces to be found in other faiths, and might begin by making men better Mohammedans, Buddhists, etc., and then go on to build on that foundation. It never was so clear that missionaries should be trained in comparative religions. Christianity must make its conquests, as it did in the presence of Paganism, by incorporating what is best in that which it would overcome, and by learning, if it can, temperance from Mohammedans, civil virtue from Confucians, and mildness from Buddhists. Secondly, the Congress reveals still more closely the new situation, too little realized, in which Christianity finds itself. People are crowding and mixing in the world as never before. Creeds and races hitherto isolated are becoming comparative in every sense. The chief ethnic Bibles are accessi-

Mozoomdar's Book

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The "idea" in this remarkable book may be best briefly stated by combining a saying of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahmoo leader, with a sentence or two from the author's Introduction: "Was not Jesus Christ an Asiatic? He and his disciples were Asiatics, and all the agencies primarily employed for the propagation of the gospel were Asiatic. In fact, Christianity was founded and developed by Asiatics in Asia. . . . Yet the Christ that has been brought to us in India is an Englishman, with English manners and customs about him and with the temper and spirit of an Englishman in him. Hence it is that the Hindu people shrink back. . . . Go to the rising sun in the East, not to the setting sun in the West, if you wish to see Christ in the plenitude of his glory and in the fullness and freshness of the primitive dispensation. In England and Europe we find apostolical Christianity almost gone; there we find the life of Christ formulated into lifeless forms and antiquated symbols. . . . Look at this picture and that: this is the Christ of the East, and that of the West. When we speak of the Western Christ, we speak of the incarnation of theology, formalism, ethical and physical force. When we speak of an Eastern Christ, we speak of the incarnation of unbounded love and grace."

Thirteen Chapters, viz., The Bathing, Fasting, Praying, Teaching, Rebuking, Weeping, Pilgrimage, Trusting, Healing, Feasting, Parting, Dying, and Reigning Christ.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon; more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

It is a stroke of genius. It contains a whole philosophy of Christianity. Jesus was an Oriental. He is only to be rightly interpreted by the Oriental mind. This fascinating book comes as a revelation of essential Christianity.—The Critic.

ble. Science is drawing in her lines in the study of man. A new reverence is felt for all nature. Psychology is finding new and deeper truths in Christianity, and seems big with a new revelation for conscience, mind, heart and will. The Higher Criticism reconciles large areas of the highest culture and scholarship with Christianity. A greater Christendom already seems to loom before us. Thirdly, the Congress has brought out in clear perspective, like a composite photograph, certain great common traits: first, the strength and universality of the religious impulse, from the mere sensus numinis of lower faiths, the love of nature, the awe of the forest, sea, mountains, storms, up to the highest sense of the unity of the soul with God; second, the universality of a belief in an All-Father of love and good will, as well as of law. How rare atheism really is, and how, when it exists, it is a product of bad pedagogy. Men thought they conferred honor upon God by demonstrating his existence instead of leaving it to the dim and all-controlling region of feeling and faith. Again, the brotherhood of man seems more real and less dreamy. If progress in history is measured by progress in toleration, how great the progress of those seventeen days! So, again, morals as the best fruit of a religious life was emphasized with a unanimity which was revolutionary to those who were reared in an atmosphere where "works" were subordinate to faith. Perhaps a higher virtue and a higher ethics are waiting to be evolved. If there is to be a higher cosmic faith toward which all others tend, it will not come by selections from ethnic Bibles, but only by new and higher thought and life, up to the very top of our own faith. Then and there the particular faith will open into the large, universal, cosmic faith. It steadies the nerves a little in some moods to feel that, if our bark sink, it is to another sea.

The last address was delivered by Rev. James C. Duncan, who set forth the meaning of the Parliament in a very strong and clear way. It has refuted the charge of materialism: it has put an end to all heresy-hunting, and heralds the day of international understanding and of universal faith.

The discussions of the day were all on a high plane, and, together with the sermon, made a notable meeting of the conference.

The President, Hon. E. B. Stoddard, after having served seven years, and the Secretary, Rev. Austin S. Garver, after a service of ten years, both begged to be relieved of further official duty, and appreciative resolutions, expressing the thanks of the conference, were passed. The officers elected for the ensuing year are the following: President, Charles H. Blood, Fitchburg; Vice Presidents, Rev. George S. Ball, Upton, Mr. John C. Otis, Worcester; Secretary, Rev. James C. Duncan, Clinton; Treasurer, Mr. Edward F. Tolman, Worcester. Directors: Jonathan Smith, Esq., Clinton; Mrs. J. L. Stone, Marlboro; Mrs. W. S. Heywood, Sterling; H. E. Sweet, Uxbridge; Rev. A. F. Bailey, Barre; Rev. W. F. Greenman, Fitchburg.

The attendance at the meetings was very large from first to last. The hospitality of the Church of the Unity was unbounded, and was acknowledged by a hearty vote of thanks.—Christian Register

Comprising all of the

Really Distinct

Varieties

of these charming garden flowers, selected by careful comparison from our trials of nearly one hundred varieties—including

"Emily Henderson"

THE QUEEN OF WHITE SWEET PEAS.

A gloriously beautiful acquisition of American origin. Absolutely pure white, as clear as alabaster and as lustrous as satin. The flowers, of remarkable substance, are borne on long stiff stems, are extra large, with broad round standards that stand up boldly without reflex or curl.

The plants are robust, compact and branching, producing such a prodigious abundance of flowers that the plants appear as if covered with snow. From one plant, specially cultivated, we have cut in one season the seemingly incredible number of 1,035 sprays of bloom! In earliness it outrivals all competitors by nearly two weeks, and continues a veritable "cut-and-come-again" to the end of Autumn.
