*Onward and ever on,
Till the voice of despair is stilled,
Till the harem of peace is won,
And the purpose of God fulfilled.*
—Mis: Monroe's Commemoration Ode.

It is fitting that the great series of congresses to be held during the World's Fair should be inaugurated next week by the women; for they who have so long been kept in the background have by their energy, wisdom, and zeal fairly won their right to this post of honor.

THE one ambition to provide the wherewith to sustain life is as paralyzing to the poor man as it is to the rich. Selfishness is a curse all along the line, and the law of love and service holds the laborer's happiness in its grasp just as firmly as it does that of the millionaire.

ALAS for him who, seeing the value of a dollar, fails to see the value of a kind word! His business vision will soon be blurred and success will bring to him no triumphs. Spiritual vision is as necessary in trade as in the legislative hall or in the pulpit. The spiritual commodities of kindness, forbearance and courtesy are counting-room necessities.

THE gospel of free thought will never convert the world from the pulpit; the power must come from the counting-room, from the manufacturing shop. When our business men come to feel that they are called to free the world from superstition, to lift it out of poverty, to cement it with love, then and not until then may the kingdom of God, the republic of the spirit, be expected.

OUR "field" is the world, and we solicit notes of progress and activity from anywhere along the advance line. A venture in Australia strengthens the purposes of the lonely toiler in Oregon, and a failure in Yucatan may start a saving wave of sympathy from the shores of Labrador. Give to UNITY the good news from everywhere. And it is sometimes good to know of brave sailors who have gone down with their flag flying. There are triumphs in defeats.

SCIENCE will one day emphasize more the measureless power of environment as a modifier of unfortunate heredity, and the possibility of correcting ante-natal biases by post-natal discipline; of rearranging the cellular tissue of the brain, if that is what is needed by training. Gentle women have been made of the daughters of violent mothers. Patient and sober sons have grown up to rebuke rash and dissolute fathers. The misfortunes of birth may be largely overcome by the good fortunes of life.

ARE there any Unitarian churches within the limits of the Western Unitarian Conference that do not claim to be Free churches, undogmatic in their fellowship, progressive in their methods? All these churches will also admit that there are Free churches within this territory identical with them in spirit and aim, that are not Unitarian in name and antecedent. Would not this conference be coming not only to itself, but to its own, if it called itself the Western Conference of Liberal or Free Churches? Perhaps some day it will rise to its mission, opportunity and calling in some such way as that; not until the word movement will be emphasized more than the word Unitarian in the phrase that bespeaks its prophet traditions and the prophetic element in its inheritance. America is making its church. We will not wait for it, but work for it.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, whose name must be dear to every truth-lover, an inspiration to sincerity, and a rebuke to all half-heartedness and halting compromises of statements however innocent, writes to the editor of the Free Church Record, as published in the April number, as follows:

I fervently hope that your new Free Church will prove to be strong to live and become the Star of the West. From my soul I sympathize with your movement, and congratulate you and your new society on the boldness, the beauty, and the truth of your new position, "broader than Christian, broader than Unitarian, namely, Human; preferring strict loyalty to truth to the advantages of association unethically acquired." I pray you stand fast by those principles with all the immobility of your own Mt. Tacoma! For they are the foundation of the moral universe itself, and on them you dedicate yourself to the Eternal God. May your brave little company of truth-lovers and truth-servers prove to be that city set on a hill which cannot be hid. I greet you and them with joy, love, and hope, for our cause is one.

How do you like our new dress? Suggestions are in order.

ON BROADENING LINES.

In donning a new dress UNITY enters, it is hoped, on a new lease of life. With no regret for the past, with encouragement for the present, and with high faith for the future, there seems every reason why our weekly message should continue to go forth gathering added strength and resolution for all the duties new and old that shall crowd upon us. The time is opportune for new consecration and high resolves. These Columbian days bring each its fresh suggestion, luring the whole world even into broader, happier paths; making it seem for each and all worth while to widen private and public horizons, to enter into the more blessed bonds of universal and intimate brotherhood. It is the whole of mankind that comes to our doors; all races, all religions, all manner of arts, all discoveries of science, all customs and fashions show forth the varying expressions of human worth and intelligence. But like the architectural beauty of the White City itself, the varieties blend into one pleasing unity of life and being. It is one race, with one aspiration, with one destiny.

UNITY would be false to itself, false to the hour and the inspiration did it fail to catch new life, new vigor from these manifold assurances of wisest co operation, united with fraternal rivalries and emulation.

Carrying our thought still into the religious life of the world, we shall continue our plea for larger boundaries, our determination to more and more bespeak for ourselves and our friends wisdom and charity to make yet broader and broader the lines of human activity and fellowship.

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast."

At the same time UNITY knows that there will be battles to fight, victories to be won. We shall not shrink from speaking our fullest, frankest word. But that word, however plain, however uncompromising it shall be, shall carry, we in all sincerity trust, no suggestion of other than friendliest relation with all opposing honesty. Only one thing is forever intolerable, and that is insincerity. All else one must welcome, differ how widely it may from the conviction he is alone able to cherish.

We want to succeed, but in the future as in the past, we will take counsel of principle, not expediency. Bright as the sky appears, we know full well 'tis as yet only the dawn of the new day that we behold. We press still forward, nothing doubting, to the more gracious time prophesied when religious bigotries, bitternesses, hatreds, shall have been banished never to return. This we do not expect by ignoring honest differences, but by respecting them, giving them free play and a fair field, with no Odium Theologicum attached to any minority or majority opinion.

In another column will be found our reconstructed staff of Editorial Contributors, with a business word in connection therewith. In that list our readers will miss some of the familiar names; those of tried and true friends, who, from remoteness, preoccupation, or other reasons, have felt compelled to withhold their names from the list of those who will try to regularly enrich our columns. In place of these names our readers will rejoice with us in the discovery of new names that will indicate that slowly UNITY is reaching the constituency for whose sake it came into being, the progressive mind, the devout thinker, the free spirit, not in one communion alone, but in all the different sections of the liberal movement in religion.

We welcome our genial friend and neighbor, Dr. Thomas, the pastor of the People's Church of Chicago, a man whose heart is ever on the sunward side, an heroic representative of the independent movement in religion, which already represents a considerable organized constituency and an immense unorganized element. This element is unrelated to the Unitarian and Universalist tradition, and has but little interest in the machinery of these denominations. But it is intimately related with the fundamental principles and prophetic inspirations of these two movements, and it is to bring a large contribution to the Liberal Church of the future, and is a part of the constituency UNITY would fain represent and serve. Dr. Thomas writes: "I shall be glad to be counted in the fellowship you represent, and will willingly do what I can to help the cause; for I am coming to feel more and more that we are one in spirit and working for the same great end."

Equally cordial is the acceptance of Dr. Canfield, pastor of St. Paul's Church. The Universalists have their contribution to make to the coming church. They are a part of the forces that are making for the Free Church, the Liberal Church of America. Dr. Canfield's own words are his best introduction.

The prospective UNITY meets with my hearty sympathy and approval. I shall be glad to join hands with you in the great enterprise of providing a working hypothesis which will help to bring order and harmony into our chaotic liberalism. Thirty years of work and observation have convinced me that we can scarcely hope for much further progress until we coalesce, at least so far as to present more of a united front to the outside world. To organize liberty and individuality is a difficult task, but whoever succeeds in doing it will be a greater religious benefactor than Martin Luther or John Calvin, or even Channing or Ballou. We can at least help to prepare the way for him.

Equally cordial are the words of Mr. Mangasarian, representative of the Ethical Culture Society. Ethics is the cornerstone of the coming temple: that which makes for the betterment of man undoubtedly contributes to the glory of God. Mr. Mangasarian says: "You say 'we want to emphasize not our differences but our harmonies.' Surely our differences are insignificant; in spirit we are one, in purpose we are one, in the hope of a larger tomorrow we are one, and it is well that we should draw closer to one another, and give to one another the comradeship of spirit. I like UNITY exceedingly and feel that it has a mission. It is with great pleasure that I accept your invitation to come on the editorial staff."

We place also, for the first time, on the list of our editorial contributors, the names of Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer of Providence, R. I., Mrs. Hattie Tyng Griswold of Columbus, Wis., Mrs. Florence G. Buckstaff, of Oshkosh, Wis., and Sidney H. Morse of Chicago, names so familiar to our readers that they need no introduction. They are of the UNITY household by the law of natural selection and divine appointment. If Mrs. Spencer was to be labeled at all, the name of the Free Religious Association would perhaps best fit her. The next two represent the religiousness of literature, the preaching potency in culture, the piety of the humanities. Mr. Morse begins in this number some art notes from the World's Fair, and so far as space admits he will help us interpret the world of art, and enlist it in the service of religion.

As to our relation to the Unitarians of America, it will remain the same as ever. With them always in their makings for freedom, fellowship and character in religion, but never forgetting that the movement for truth, righteousness, and love is not coterminous with their name. We may find within their ranks, as within other ranks, antagonism which it will be our duty to oppose and counteract. The same relations of intimate comradeship as have heretofore existed between UNITY and the Western Unitarian Conference we hope will continue. Domiciled together, justifying the intimacy by the exchange of mutual courtesies, we will continue to be its news-gatherer and messenger, which service we will be glad to render to all the other activities represented. We hope for a union by confederation of existing forces, not a destruction of existing organization. We will aim to criticize by creation.

Together we will seek to keep step with advancing thought, to unite reason and reverence, free thought and helpfulness, to discover, teach, and increase the unity among those who would serve character and not creed, and find their adequate bond of union in loving service to the cause of truth, righteousness, and love in the needy world. Will you help us?

THE SOCIAL OPPORTUNITY OF MRS. CLEVELAND;

OR,

THE HERO AS SOCIETY WOMAN.

American society leaders have had two emphatic warnings. Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Whitney, on whom rested a large part of the social burdens of Washington for a few years, were both crushed by it.

The demands of formal society in any city where there are "four hundred" or more people to call upon, receive calls from, send invitations to and accept or refuse invitations from, are a tax upon physical and nervous strength which brings no adequate return.

The objects of these formalities are the broadening of sympathies which results from the contact with different types of personality, and the attendant opportunities to select from the mass of society those congenial units who may become real friends. The latter object is too often defeated by the very complexity of society itself, which leaves no time to cultivate intimacies. The first could be attained in some other way than by house-to-house calling and crowded receptions.

Here is the great opportunity for the "Hero as Society Woman," in Carlylese. She must be a social genius. Mrs. Cleveland is everywhere credited with being this. She, or some leader of society in Washington or New York, could set an example which would be copied from Bangor to Spokane. She must aim at simplicity, and at the substitution for empty social forms of forms which she shall devise and which shall be useful and elevating.

A suggestion of the method of this reform is not original with me. It is that all the society people in a city or a "set" build a club house, which shall be a social clearing house. Weekly or fortnightly receptions could take the place of calls and "at homes," and leave the remaining days for home, children, friends, study, charity, etc. The club house will naturally be the center of literary, artistic, charitable, and educational clubs, as well as smaller social clubs. The members will unite in pursuit of some worthy aim other than the display of costumes and furniture. Men and women will both belong to the club, with both separate and common parlors. Strangers coming to live in the city will be carefully looked after.*

Society women now have often to deny themselves culture, benevolence, and intimate society of dear friends on account of the undue pressure of formal life. The new century must see a new departure. F. G. B.

NOBLE LIVES AND NOBLE DEEDS.†

This is one of the best series of character lessons yet published by either our Eastern or Western Sunday School Society; best by its plan. The plan is to concentrate each lesson-topic, as self-control, honor, courage, etc., upon some one or two noble persons who in life have royally illustrated that especial virtue. Each lesson thus becomes a little biography, and this two-page biography is long enough to show an outline of the life, with interesting anecdotes. To this outline many other suggestions, questions and references are added. Thus No. 1 is in topic "Self-Control;" the noble life is "Washington." No. 2, in topic, "Concentration;" the noble life, "Mary Carpenter." No. 3 is "Honesty," with "Abraham Lincoln" to illustrate it. No. 4, "Duty," and "Sir Walter Scott." No. 14, "Honor," and "Chevalier Bayard." No. 16, "Affection," and "St. Francis." No. 26, "Ambition," and "Havelock" (this is one of the best). No. 31, "Courage," and "Dr. Kane." No. 35, "Mercy," and "Dorothea Dix." Of the forty lessons these named seemed to us, in an hour's reading, among the best. Twenty-three friends have taken part in the making, most of them contributing a single lesson; but Mrs. Kate G. Wells gives five, and the earnest secretary, Mr. Horton, a round dozen. They are by no means equally well done. "Good" and "fairly good," we say, as we pass along; yet very few suggest that the writer said to himself: "Let me try to make this a little masterpiece." It would have been well worth while to say exactly that and to write and rewrite, touch and retouch, until each virtue stood out a clear-cut, shining, not-to-be-forgotten face. Now and then the fitting of the life and topic seems to fail; you see the face, but not the special virtue in it which it is meant to illustrate. But the plan of the lesson is good enough and new enough to dim all blemishes and earn our hearty welcome for the series. In the Western "six years' course," the subject plotted for the last part of the fourth year (which is next year) is called "Illustrations of Manhood and Womanhood;" and we are not likely to make anything as good as these lessons to fill that niche. This last sentence, however, suggests a final wonder—how is it that, out of forty noble lives in such a course, but four are women's lives?

REBUKED.

I am so tired!

There lies my bow unstrung,
Nor strength have I to string it o'er again,
To fix the arrow, or to sight the mark
I've missed so oft. Why should I longer strive?—

But trail my bow behind me in the dust,
Unstrung,—so tired, so tired am I.

Without my window in the summer air
A spider weaves his web. Would I had marked

The times he's strove to fling the slender thread

From point to point and fasten it. The wind,

That wanton, breaks the airy thing
Each time, and once a bird's swift wing Severed the dainty bridge but just complete.

Oh, meanest creature thou!

Shall I, a prince of God's own royal line,
Be shamed by thee? My bow again I'll bend

With newer strength; more taut shall be
The string, my sight more keen, more fixed and true

My aim;—and higher place the mark!

Then when 'tis time, I pray

The cord may snap with clear resounding twang,

Just as an arrow speeds to highest flight!

SUNDAY AT THE GATES.

Closed are the gates?

Oh, open the gates!

O impious deed, O action rude,
To close from view one day in seven
The fairest scene 'neath the blue heaven!
Yea, open the gates

Full wide! No son of man exclude.

Behold what man creates!

What folly hideth this display
Of human worth each seventh day;

This glory of the nations;

The e choice abbreviations

Of all the earth's industrial life;

This outcome of a noble strife?

Yea, open the gates:

To the equal fates.

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

Phillips was a born fighter, but he fought on the side of the weak and oppressed. Extravagant of statement, doubtless, as popular orators are wont to be; hurling his bolts red hot and flaming at a shining mark. "Men blame us," he said, "for the bitterness of our language and the personality of our attacks. It results from our position. The great mass of the people can never be made to stay and argue a long question. They must be made to feel it through their idols." As illustration, when he went to Music Hall to deliver his famous phillippic against Webster, who had given his support to the Fugitive Slave bill, he knew he must conquer his audience at the start. Calmly he stepped to the front of the platform to begin his speech with the words, "The infamous Webster." Unperturbed, he paused till the fury of the galleries, where the opposing forces gathered, had spent itself. Then, in louder tones, he repeated the same words. Again and again was the battle renewed, but every time Phillips' voice grew louder and sterner, while the mad response of the audience grew weaker and weaker. The enemy had shouted itself hoarse. Phillips then went on to tell why, in his opinion, Daniel Webster had made himself "infamous."

He had grown familiar with mobs, had faced a great number of them, and had nearly always emerged from the conflict victorious. Hissing, eggs, boulders at the beginning; salvos of applause at the end!

On one occasion in Boston his audience was more than ever determined he should not be heard. The moment he uttered a word the noise began. At length he shouted: "Then I will talk to the country," and dropping his voice until it was possible only for the reporters in front of him to hear, he went serenely on with his speech. Gradually the tumult ceased, and men began leaning forward, the rioters with others, if possible, to catch his words. Then gradually he raised his voice to the natural pitch. As often as the disturbance was renewed he "talked to the country." Of course he won the fight.

But I remember one fight he did not win. It was in Cincinnati just before the war. The mob, as usual, had possession of the gallery. From the beginning he was met with interruptions of every description. Eggs began flying through the air. One struck him full on his white bosom. He used his handkerchief, but his speech did not falter. Then a stone as large as one's fist came whirring down and struck the floor at his feet. Still undaunted he stooped and picked the ugly missile up and held it aloft toward the gallery from whence it came. Gazing an instant, he said, amidst profound silence: "The man who threw this boulder did not aim to hit me. He aimed it at an idea; but you can't hit ideas with boulders." The applause that thundered from every part of the house seemed to extinguish the mob's spirit and determine the victory for the orator. But the orator was there to speak his entire mind. The very next sentence lashed the galleries again to fury. Down the stairs the mob, howling, rushed, the cry of "Go for him" heard above the din. A tragic end appeared to be imminent. Phillips, pale but defiant, advanced to the front of the platform. Friends came rapidly from the rear to bodily carry him beyond the reach of danger. Meanwhile the progress of the mob up the aisle had been stayed by the stubborn resistance of one gray-haired old man. He had wrenched a chair from its place and turned on the enemy with such effect that needed time had been gained. The lights were turned off; the lecturer was defeated.

The career of Phillips furnishes a unique chapter in American history. Whatever his merits or demerits as a reformer, he was always a free citizen, above party and creed, neither holding nor seeking office, a believer in the common people—educated by agitation. A gentleman, an aristocrat by birth, and yet a democrat to the core.

THE AMERICAN SUNDAY.

The issue involved in the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday goes deeper than is commonly supposed. The question is not whether the observance of Sunday as a day of rest, that is, as a holiday, is or is not in harmony with Christian tradition, or the present prevailing desire of the Christian church. The state, which appoints the seventh-day rest, conforming to Jewish or Christian practice, does so, not in behalf of and for the purpose of promoting the Christian religion, but solely because the people of the country generally desire a recurring rest day, and have no objection to taking the one the prevailing religious denominations have chosen. Any other day than Sunday would serve as well; it is simply a consideration of expediency. The government here is supposed to be "a government of the people, by the people, for the people," and what the people desire is always in order, save only that the people's will, expressed by the majority, shall never trespass on the reserved rights of the minority; among which is the right of exemption from all religious interference—a right secured by the Constitutional provision that no form of religion shall be established. The desire of the framers of that instrument is perfectly clear and explicit, and yet the power of Christian zealots has been able from the very beginning of the republic to get engrafted into every State constitution throughout the Union laws that compel the observance of Christian commands and ceremonies. The appointment of chaplains in the two houses of Congress and in the Legislatures of the several States is but one illustration of many that could be given. What are these acts but the establishment of religion in the state; invasions of personal liberty which the Christian church has instigated and continually advocates? The Sunday rest-day, it has converted into a sectarian religious day, and in every State the statutes bristle with penalties for the secular offender. Yet there is not the least warrant in the Constitution for any other than a purely secular day, a day in which the people all may rest from their labors and enjoy themselves, or enrich their lives in whatsoever ways their judgment and discretion shall urge, barring only one thing—they are not to interfere, by the nature of their festivities, with one another. They are to be considerate and mindful of one another and create no disturbance. That is all. That is the whole of it. There is not the slightest obligation to go to church, or refrain from going to a theater or a fair. Do as you please. The church may not say to the theater on that day, "I am holier than thou. I open my doors; you close yours." Not to the Fair, the World's Fair or any other: "Close your gates that people may come to the Christian house of prayer." No; the theater, the Fair, can as well retort by a like demand on the church. But every such demand from whatever source is out of place. The one injunction on which all the people can agree is this: On this universal Rest-day go and do what you please, only let not your going or doing interfere with the same privilege to others—a privilege, a right withheld from no one.

If Christianity cannot hold its own against theater, fair, picnic, or whatever else, under this equal ruling, so much the worse for the Christian gospel. At any rate it should have no backing from the state.

One would suppose that this plain truth should be pretty well understood and accepted by this time. Perhaps it is, but the whole career of the Christian churches, with rare exceptions, shows only a determination to set at naught or reverse the plan of religious liberty which the Constitution ordained.

Twenty years ago their leading representatives solemnly proclaimed: "First, a nation is the creature of God; second, it is clothed with authority derived from God; third, it is under the dominion of Jesus Christ, the appointed ruler of nations; fourth, it is subject to the Bible, with special revelation of the moral law."

These propositions were deliberately set forth in a call issued for a national convention, whose business it should be to propose and secure, if possible, the adoption by the States of the following "amendment" to the National Constitution:

"We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as of supreme authority, in order to constitute a Christian government, and in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the inalienable rights and blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to ourselves, our posterity, and all the inhabitants of the land, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America."

"Nothing can be plainer," as Francis E. Abbot pointed out at the time, "than that the contemplated change, if made, would involve a political revolution of the most sweeping and profound character. It would be the overthrow of the Free Republic and the erection of a Christian Theocracy in its stead."

The call was signed by William Strong, United States Supreme Court, and by a long list of vice presidents, including judges, governors, college presidents, professors, bishops, clergymen and ministers of every leading Protestant denomination, not omitting the Universalist, which was represented by "the Rev. A. A. Minor, D. D., President of Tufts College, Mass.," and the Unitarian, represented by the Rev. A. D. Mayo, D. D., one of many "gentlemen of Cincinnati concurring in the foregoing call."

As we remember, this "call" did not provoke a very exciting discussion at the time outside the circle of those immediately interested in the project. And if the project itself has slumbered since then, no one witnessing the extreme partisan, sectarian bias of leading Christian churches and ministers in this last year of grace, can for a moment doubt that it needs only the opportune moment to reanimate the old endeavor and bring it to the front as a great controlling feature of some State or national campaign. That the undertaking will ever be accomplished we do not believe. The whole country, it seems to us, is under too much headway in the opposite direction. Yet vigilance and steady effort in the education of the masses in liberal principles is strictly in order.

In his discourse at the time, which discourse should continue to be a tract for the times, Dr. Abbot did not mince his words nor disguise his horror of the proposed "amendment." He met the four propositions by declaring: "Here are four immeasurable, unfathomable falsehoods." Instead of their being true he proclaimed the following: "1. A nation is the creature of man. 2. It is clothed with no authority not derived from himself. 3. It is not under the dominion of Jesus Christ. 4. It is no more subject to the Bible than it is to the Koran or the Book of Mormon. These counter propositions are all implied in the saying of the Declaration of Independence that governments 'derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.' The proposed 'amendment' involves the overthrow of the Declaration of Independence, root and branch, and the erection in its stead of the dismal catechism of the Westminster Assembly as the law of the land."

These judges and bishops and honorable senators of twenty years ago fully understood the meaning of their amendment. They comprehended the situation perfectly. Witness their own account as embodied in their "call." They therein proceed to say that "up to the time of the adoption of the Constitution acknowledgments of the Christian religion were made by all the States. And in the actual administration of the National Government the principle is admitted. But the fundamental law of the nation, the Constitution of the United States, on which our government rests, and according to which it is to be administered, fails to make fully and explicitly any such acknowledgment. This failure has fostered among us mischievous ideas like the following: The Nation, as such, has no relations to God; its authority has no higher source than the will of the people; government is instituted only for the lower wants of man; the state goes beyond its sphere when it educates religiously, or legislates against profanity or Sabbath desecration."

Exactly so. And the business of all believers in and defenders of the Constitution as it stands, forbidding the union of church and state, is to see to it that the state shall not in the future "go beyond its sphere," neither to "educate religiously" nor to "legislate against Sabbath desecration," and whenever and wherever it has so done in times past, that it speedily retrace its steps. Let Sunday be a holiday, a rest-day for a free people. Let it become entirely an American Sunday, observed in a truly American fashion.

A BREATH FROM THE SOUTH.

DEAR UNITY: Parting with our good friends at Orlando, taking a farewell look at Lake Minnie, with its vividly reflected little world aglow with the morning sunlight, we set our faces homeward, leaving behind us the matins of the mocking-bird and the vespers of the mosquito, though truth to tell, the latter troubled us but little, while the former were a continual delight. The day was hot and dusty, and we wisely, like good travelers, ameliorated our discomfort by studying the ever-varying panorama from the car windows—the groves of stately pines; the lakes, large and small, which abound in Florida, and from which the natives draw much of their subsistence; men, boys, and portly "aunties," the latter with heads enveloped in huge calico sunbonnets, a protection from both mosquito and sun, dotted the banks, rod in hand and line in water, patiently waiting for a nibble; the flora, much of it new to our Northern eyes; the swamps, with their bare-kneed cypress trees festooned with Spanish moss swaying gently to and fro in the breeze, and the canopy of finely cut bright green leaves lifting themselves out of their gray drapery toward the blue sky above. Now and then we would come to a cut through the swamp, making a cleared waterway or canal through the dense forest of cypress and moss. Here we would catch sight of a dugout, with its solitary dark fisherman plying what we concluded to be the avocation of the cabin dwellers when orange picking and packing was over, and we mused on the past of this land and its future. What will the next decade bring to Florida? All along the line of the road, in the midst of young orange groves, little hamlets were springing up of one-storied frame dwellings with their galerie (as indispensable to a Southern house as a chimney to a Northern one), in the vicinity of a lake or stream, often built around a little lake, that evidently the center of attraction. The country is very flat and very white, for the soil is white sand, which, though it looks uninviting to the agriculturist, forms a fine contrast to the dark glossy green of the orange leaves and evidently the soil in which its roots revel. Grass gets no root hold here, and a green sward is only the result of care and cost, though the woods are gay with flowers. Only sour oranges remain hanging upon the trees until summer, when they will yield a grateful flavor to the drink of the thirsty inhabitants. Florida's rainy season is summer time.

Evening brought us to Jacksonville, where we bade our companion, who took a more direct northerly course, good-by. We were content to retire early, though not to sleep, as we had hoped. The air seemed full of martial music and cheers until a late hour, which were wafted in at our open window. At the depot next morning there were hearty leave-takings among elderly gentlemen and everybody seemed to be either "Colonel," "Major," or "General," save the women and negroes, and we learned there had been a Confederate reunion in the city.

Thursday was as uncomfortably warm as its predecessor, the scenery more varied, the land more undulating, but we missed the lakes or ponds; the woods, however, were filled with a great profusion of flowers, white, red, purple and yellow. We crossed the Suwanee River, though we saw nothing of "the ole' folks at home," however, the train newsboy informed us, with as much pride, possibly more, even, than a Boston boy might evince in heralding his nativity on Beacon Hill, that "I was born on this rivah."

Dawn next day brought us into Pass Christian, which we found even more beautiful and attractive than we left it eight years ago. This coast town, with its miles of shell road skirting the Gulf on one side, with wharfs, bath houses, trees, resting places, and vast expanse of water, and on the other inviting residences, beautifully cultivated grounds filled with semi-tropical fruits, flowers, and foliage, its wealth of magnolia and live oak trees, its fragrance of roses, its background of Georgia pines, its living interest of humanity—humanity in holiday mood mostly. Little wonder that it is becoming a gay resort the year round—Chicago and the North in winter, New Orleans and the South in summer. Here we stopped only for "How do you do," "Good-by," and a deep draught of beauty, and on to New Orleans—that city so full of oldness, bygone mingled with the freshness and life of to-day, a city peculiarly itself, always interesting, always fascinating, with its French Market, St. Louis Cathedral, and Ursula Convent, with their surroundings and history, the shrines of St. Roch, and numerous monuments. A little one visiting the city for the first time exclaimed in front of the Margaret monument, that beautiful tribute to a hard-working, large-hearted woman, "Why, papa, how many monuments New Orleans has. They even erect them to women," testimonies to a love of the noble in the people.

Sunday morning we went to the quaint little Unitarian church, so permeated with the life and labors of Rev. Theodore Clapp, who gave of himself so largely—not to his own little flock, but to the whole city—gave himself so grandly that when an Eastern brother said to him, after one of those terrible ravages of yellow fever, when he hurried back to the plague-stricken city from an intended summer rest and labored incessantly with the suffering: "You have done nobly, my brother, and you will surely get you reward." "Get my reward! Why, I am getting my reward all the time," replied the great-hearted Clapp.

What a strange medley church history is. When we go back to the planting of Presbyterianism in New Orleans and find that as usual the ambitious little movement begged all it could and then finished up by running deeply, irrevocably into debt and then extricated itself by getting through the Louisiana Legislature a lottery which they sold for $25,000, and then sold the property to a munificent Jew whom they knew they could trust to pay the $20,000 still due and allow them the free use of the property, which he did, though of course he would have been excluded from their communion had he desired it. Yet out of all this faithlessness there came to this city, through this church, this man who held sway so long by the power of his humanity, his devotion to man, his faith in the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, all men, and it was this very spirit, this very loyalty, that transferred him from the narrower to the broader faith and gave to the city its Unitarian Church, which we found rejoicing in a young man who had come for a year at least. They had been ministered unto so long from "day unto day" by "visiting brethren," that a whole man, all their own, was something to hold a jubilee over, and they opened the Southern Conference with his installation. We felt constrained to tarry, at least, to the opening, though it interfered with other plans, and we had stopped merely to give a word of greeting and good-fellowship to the young man and woman who had left home and home folk, congenial surroundings and associations and bravely faced this call to labor earnestly, devotedly, for people who need them; their bouyancy, hope, faith in the future of this band of faithful, determined men and women. The society, on its part, has entered heartily into the work of helpfulness, the Lend a Hand has beautified the social rooms and the parish is full of projects of improvement and furtherance of vigorous work. The church was beautifully decorated with a profusion of flowers for the installation. On one side of the pulpit a large portrait, on the other a marble bust of Theodore Clapp, belonging, not to the church, as we could but feel they ought, but to two of his parishioners. We use the present tense, for he still ministers unto them.

"What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent."

Mr. Fenn came, with the strength and freshness of our Fair city upon him, and delighted everybody with the vigor and scholarship of his installation sermon. The next morning we enjoyed the devotional meeting, led by the new pastor, and the business session, deeply regretting our inability to tarry longer and see and hear more of the brethren in this interesting field. As we listened to the reports from the various churches and missions, there came to us these lines of Lowell;

"Endurance is the crown; quality,
And patience all the passions of great hearts;
These are their stay, and when the leaven world
Sets its hard face against their faithful thought,
And brute strength, like a scornful conqueror,
Clangs his huge mace down in the other scale,
The ins, tired soul but flings his patience in,
And slowly that outweighs the ponderous globe."

Then, amid heat and dust, we took the I. C. limited for home. How we longed for a bracing breeze from Lake Michigan. We were heated through and through; went to our berth fairly sweltering. The next evening we were welcomed at Oakland with, "I've a close carriage here waiting. Muffle up well. Worst blizzard we have had for some time. Awfully cold." And we were whirled through wind and sleet into the hospitable atmosphere of All Souls, with its warmth, its glow, its homeliness, into its home.

MR. GOULD'S RESOLUTION.

To the Editor of Unity:

All who are in the vanguard of Unitarianism must agree that the aim of Rev. A. W. Gould, as set forth in his "open letter" in UNITY for April 13 is grand and inspiring. But is it realizable? Over against the "no narrower sense" in which certain men and organizations hold the name Unitarian stands, its actual established sense, the sense it received in 1865, when the die of Unitarianism was cast, when it became another of the Christian sects. The name Unitarian implies "anti-Trinitarian" and "Christian," whatever else it may represent. These are its ineffaceable features, and with these freedom, true, freedom, is incompatible. Hence since the broad sense which the W. U. C. proposes to attach to the name Unitarian, cannot in the nature of things be the sense which the whole denomination will accept, what other rational, practical, alternative is there but to say to the denomination, "We recognize the established significance of the name Unitarian, we would gladly indorse a new and broader statement of its meaning; but since we cannot carry the whole denomination in this effort, we frankly reject it because we cannot give our assent to the limitations which inhere in the name.

Until this logical and consistent position is taken, the conflict between words and ideas cannot end. Two principles are at war with each other, authority and freedom, and between them must every man choose; both cannot be held logically and consistently, for they are mutually exclusive. The spirit of the W. U. C. is inspiring to a degree, but it cherishes the vain expectation that the name Unitarian will yet be made to mean just what the conference desires it should imply. Therefore, to use an old illustration, seeing that the Great Eastern cannot be made to go the way of the conference row-boat, let the conference cut the cord that connects it with the Great Eastern and steer its skiff its own way.

To be able to call one's boat one's own and to steer it "toward one's highest ideals" is far nobler than dodging behind the Great Eastern, however handsomely equipped she may be.

Better it is to run the risk of being capsized in the free church wherry than to follow in the wake of the Unitarian steamer when her flag and her course are not such as the free soul respects. Courage and conscience—these are the needs of the hour.

NOT INSTITUTIONS, BUT HOMES.

Being the Fourth in the Course on "Applied Religion," Preached in All Souls Church, Chicago, by Jenkin Lloyd Jones.

God setteth the solitary in families.—Psalms lxxviii. 6.

The boast of modern society is the amount expended in benevolent purposes. Our cities point with pride to their charitable "institutions." Our own city is justly proud in the possession of many such institutions, generously planned, nobly built, comfortably supported, many of them backed by substantial endowments. A report of the Chicago charities for the year 1891, prepared by the Illinois Conference of Charities and Corrections, has a map of the city of Chicago upon which the locations of the permanently located institutions of the city are marked with red numbers. Forty-two such are indicated. Eleven of them are asylums for children, in the way of permanent "Homes." Seven more are classed under the head of "Industrial Schools." The eleven asylums for children sheltered during the year 1891, 3,164 different children for a longer or shorter period, at a total cost of $103,747, or an average cost per child of a little over $32. The seven "industrial schools," four of which are boarding or home schools, accommodated 2,507 children at a total of $103,748, or over $40 per child. This does not count the 217 children given shelter in day nurseries, or the children, of whom there are perhaps not a thousand, placed in homes by other institutions. Altogether, this expensive and elaborate machinery, with its fifteen or more permanent buildings, many of them reared on very costly ground, gave temporary shelter to about 5,000 children in the city of Chicago. In that same year there were arrested in the city 12,871 minors, 240 of them under 10 years of age, at a cost of $25 each.

Let me not chill the humane efforts or discount the generous impulses of this city. Let me not be ungrateful for the amount of love given to these little ones who seem to have been thrown upon a loveless world. It is not that these massive buildings, with their "modern improvements," well heated and well ventilated, and in the main well managed, are not much better than something worse. They are providential shelters that have soothed the breaking hearts of little ones and eased the way of thousands along the sad, rebellious paths of premature death. They have taken the hands of thousands more and tried to lead them into ways of industry and into habits of usefulness, making of them self-reliant and self-supporting men and women.

But I believe there is a more excellent way. These institutions will some day appear as cruel, unnatural and monstrous as now seem the old alms-houses, poor-houses and pauper barracks of a century ago. These institutions are unscientific and unnatural, and consequently fall under such artificial conditions to build up character. A beautiful institution may be a miserable place for the plastic soul of a child. The more excellent its management, the more methodic the administration, the less play is there for individual peculiarities, the less need of self-administration, personal responsibility and direction. I know not which to pity the more, the boy who knows not where his to-morrow's dinner is to come from, through whose tattered clothes the cruel winter winds find easy access to an underfed body and cause it to shiver like an aspen leaf in the summer breeze, or that other boy, dressed in uniform, at least when he goes to meeting, who is scrubbed by rule, fed from a printed bill of fare, who always knows on what days bean or potato soup is to be expected; who knows which are pie and which are pudding days; the boy who is marched to the table, marched to his play-ground, marched to his bed, and who is sure that he will have a methodic funeral if he dies. I say I know not which of these two boys to pity the more, but I suspect that the chances of the former boy to a useful manhood are greater than those of the latter. I have nothing to say against this method in institutions. If institutions are to be maintained, they can be maintained in no other way. All I say is that the military standard is not the one that fits for life. I pity the men who live in barracks, except when called thereto by a high necessity and permeated with a noble cause that leads to self-forgetfulness.

* * * * *

All this would be very ungracious talk did I not frankly confess that these institutions are better than something worse—the exponents of the better side of society, hopeful harbingers of better things, and did I not in the second place believe and insist that there is a better way already feasible, the practicality of which is demonstrated. This way, for the sake of convenience, I will call the Philadelphia method. Ten years ago and more, a few of the philanthropic and progressive women of Philadelphia, who made it their business to co-operate with the institutions for the relief of children in that city, probably no other city in America has brought these institutions to such perfection, grew sick at heart over the pale children, the premature little men and women, the artificial conditions which these institutions necessitated, and their poor results and unsatisfying outcome. For the truth must be confessed, a truth well established by the statistics of institutions in Europe and America, the children who come out of these institutions do not yield very encouraging results. The pliable, obedient, well-ordered child in the institution who, for from one to ten years has handed over his own will to the matron, who has had his clothes fitted to him, his food prepared for him, his days mapped out for him, enters life with a paralyzed will. He goes into the world, it may be, with a somewhat trained head and somewhat skilled fingers, but without a trained will. He has not been toughened by hard knocks, disciplined by mistakes all his own, and above all, he has not caught the esprit de corps, the enthusiasm that comes from the struggle of life, from winning his own friends and struggling for his own money.

These Philadelphia women sought a more excellent way. They organized under a State law the "Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania." They said, "Not institutions, but Homes;" other things being equal, "Not city, but country;" and, to begin with at least, "Not Charity with a capital C, but business: not charity, but justice all around." These women did not ask for a dollar to put into brick and mortar. They coveted no city real estate. They established no soup houses. They bought no cots and made no beds. They simply sought desk room for a very few skillful agents. They constituted themselves a transplanting bureau, transferring children who were homeless and friendless from the close and artificial confinement of the city to the simple but wholesome homes of industrious mechanics and farmers, and there paying for their board, getting family surroundings at lower rates than the child could be maintained at in the institutions of the city. Ten years ago these women found children confined in the poor-houses all over the State of Pennsylvania. They secured the passage of a law making it a punishable crime to confine children in any poor-house in the State for more than sixty days, and then they said to the reformatories and county commissioners, "Give us the custody of these children. Pay us what it costs you to keep them and we will find them boarding places in the homes of good, hard-working farmers, where the child will find his way back into normal relations. We will not give these children away. We will not tempt selfish men and women to adopt them for the work they will get out of them. At first it will be a purely business relation." From the start they found in the State of Pennsylvania ten times as many chances as they could utilize for boarding children at $1.75 per week in good, kind country and village homes. Having thus made a beginning in rescuing children from the alms-houses and reformatories of the State, they continued their work in providing for the inevitable stream of helpless and dependent children that come from the police courts, from the sin-stricken and death-stricken parentage of a great city, and at last they found themselves rescuing children from the institutions of Philadelphia, saving the children from the asylums for children, and they have absolutely closed up some of the established institutions of that city. These voluntarily went out of business because they had nothing so good to offer the homeless boy and girl as a chance to live in the clean home of a Chester County Quaker, where he would have to eat in the kitchen, and perhaps sleep in the attic, but where he could play with the dog, go get the cows, watch the calves, hunt hens' eggs, begin to be useful, and where, very likely, at the end of six months, the good Quaker wife would come to the conclusion that Johnny had better stay. The family would relinquish his board money and get a paper from the committee that Johnny should not be taken away so long as his stay was mutually agreeable. All this while Johnny is under the eye of some benevolent member of this "Aid Society," nearly all of whom, I believe, are women, as they ought to be. At the end of a year he may be adopted by the family, though that is a privilege granted hesitatingly, and only after abundant proof that the love life, which alone justifies such a transaction, is well started. Over five years ago I spent two days in investigating the workings of this society. Last summer I visited their rooms again and found the same undramatic, inconspicuous, silent but divine work going on with increasing confidence and widening success, and the possibilities for placing these dependent children of the public in unquestionably wholesome private families, most of them industrious, hard-working, poor, industrious farmers and mechanics, at $1.75 to $2 per week, exceeding their demand a hundred-fold. Who will say that such a home, where the child will grow up surrounded by the environments from which he must eventually wring his living, if he is to be an honest man, is not better than any modern, steam-heated "Home," with a capital "H," ever can be, where the child becomes accustomed to conveniences and luxuries which it cannot hope to enjoy when once outside the "institution."

I do not urge this family method of helpfulness for its economy, but for its humanity, for its manifest sense and for its boundless possibilities. But it has its economic phase of much interest. Society divides itself for present purposes into three quite clearly defined classes, viz: First, the unfortunate, dependent class who, for good reasons, are unable to provide for themselves. This class certainly includes the children, the sick and the very aged. Second, a wealthy class who hold an unearned increment as well as a benevolent purpose, who have money but no time or place with which they may help the needy. Third, the self-supporting industrial class who would like to help or care for these dependent ones if they could afford it. They have labor and house and heart-room which they would be glad to put to bread-winning service for themselves and others. It is the existence of this class, and its availability for charitable purposes, that is almost entirely ignored in our philanthropic schemes. All over our country there are those who would be glad of the opportunity to earn a little money in this way. Chicago spent in 1891, in round numbers, $104,000 upon her asylums for children, without counting her permanent investments. How many comforts, how much light that would have carried into one thousand poor farmers' homes who would have been glad to board, the whole year round, one of these unfortunate children for $104, or $2 per week. There are plenty of farmers in Illinois who, with the raw food material at hand, would realize from one such child more income than from any other one source on his farm, and he would be able to give in return to the child what the best city institution ever reared could not give it. The city is constantly robbing the country of its intelligence and its health. Without that constant stream of energy from the farm, this and every other metropolis would collapse. It would wither from inanity. Its manhood would disappear and its womanhood would be lost in the labyrinths of social form and nerveless etiquette. Let the city send back some of its well-earned money, some of its surplus funds. Let what is now being piled up into stone walls in the name of charity be invested in the honest homes of the sturdy and industrious men and women on the farms. Let us pay them for reconstructing the image we have deformed, restoring the outlines that we in the city have defaced, thereby giving them a chance to train up another set of toilers in their fields and kitchens and send back a percentage of them able to cope with the temptations and competitions of the city. Oh, if we can give nothing else to the orphan child let us give it sunshine, give it the cheapest of blessings, plenty of out-of-doors. Let the little one who misses the mother heart know the sweet companionship of the farm-yard, the beauties of the meadow, and the glories of the forest and the orchard.

I have been talking chiefly about child-helping institutions, but the principle is equally applicable to all the institutions where there is no need of expert professional skill, such as in hospitals, schools for the feeble-minded and the deaf mute. But even in these, the cruel classification should be ignored as soon as possible.

The best educated blind people are those who have taken their chances in the public school, who have seen with their ears and through the kindly eyes of their classmates, of whom there are always willing ones for such uses. Our institutions of charity, so-called, represent at best the cruel kindness of the thoughtless and the selfish, those who buy themselves free from the law of mutual service with money. Most of the institutions we are proud of represent a pathos unspeakable. The inmates represent a "happy family" more miserable than that exhibited at the circus. Take our most popular ones, such as the "Old People's Homes." Why should old age be made such an instrument of mockery? What cruel law of kindness is this that shuts sixty or a hundred septuagenarians off by themselves where they must shout in each other's deaf ears and where there must be a universal anxiety about spectacles? It is because it is the best we can do now, but it is not so good as what we shall someday learn to do. In 1891 Chicago had 869 inmates in six different old people's institutions, and it cost to keep them, without making any allowance for the valuable properties involved, which must amount to several millions, $588,244. What comfortable homes with pleasant people might be secured where every old lady would be "grandma" to somebody and every old man "grandpa" to something, if that money were taken outside this noisy city into the beautiful homes of Lake, McHenry, or Kane Counties. If there is cruelty in these, the tenderest nuances of our institution of charity, how much more cruel is the grouping of people by virtue of their misfortunes, their mistakes and their crimes. What inhumanity there is in these names, if not in these things: "Erring Women's Home," "Foundling's Home," "Home for the Friendless," "Home for Incurables," "Home for Crippled Children," what sarcasm in such uses of the word "home." Who are you who are not in an "erring woman's home?" Who am I that should pronounce any soul "friendless" and should proceed to corral such and call the corral a "home," instead of helping each to where he may make friends if he has none? Where is the line crossing which we become "old people?" I believe it is fixed at sixty years in the charters of some of our institutions, but what of those senile people at forty? and those like Gladstone and Martineau, youthful at eighty? Let us scatter and not congregate these unfortunates so that the divine law of helpfulness, the natural exchange of strength and weakness, the human sympathies, may have their legitimate play. Let us not multiply arbitrary distinctions and magnify accidental differences.

These artificial contrivances have other dangers. It is thus we generate the thing we would cure. Pauperism and dependency grow like weeds in a garden upon our institutional systems. When Kings County, New York, built a noble palace for its pauper children the number suddenly sprang up from 300 to 1,400 applicants. Build this year an institution for 300 crippled children, and it will be filled by next year. Build an annex for 300 one-legged boys, and promptly they will be forthcoming. Put an annex on the other side for one-armed girls, and it would not be long before it also will be filled. Our so-called charitable "institutions" put a premium on dependence instead of being a challenge to self-reliance as they ought to be. Chris Berger, a valiant comrade of mine in the army, came home with his left hand gone and the thumb off his right hand, and instead of going to a "Soldiers' Home," as he might, he went to his family. Wife and children became left hand and thumb to him. So with them "Chris" was almost as good as new, and he went on with that stump of a hand, plowing and teaming, working and planning, and every farmer for miles around was ready to help out "Chris," and he is to-day an independent farmer in Wisconsin. If he had gone to one of the many "Soldiers' Homes" he would have been an unhappy imbecile all these years. The unkindest cut the Government ever gave to its citizen soldiers are these falsely called "Homes," where brave men are allowed to rot in their debauchery. One half of the amount of money invested would have paid for the board and washing of every one of the soldiers who ought not to be neglected. Not institutions, but homes for them as for others. Not more money, but more brains do we want. This higher charity will recognize the cruelty, the brutality of thus robbing people of their wills, robbing children of their individuality. I did and do love and revere the blue that marks the guardian of the best nation on the globe, but oh, how sick I became of three years of uniform, and how my soul leaped up when once more I found myself dressed as an individual with other responsibilities and privileges than that of "covering my file leader, touching elbows to the right, and keeping the regulation step." I look for the new philanthropy that will demolish our institutions, use the money to put our unfortunates, particularly our unfortunate children, into homes, not for "charity's sake," not, at first, for love but for money, fair exchange on business terms.

Charles L. Brace, of blessed memory in New York city, inaugurated a holy work when he gathered the refuse children of New York together, washed and clothed them, brought them West in train-loads and scattered them through the farmer homes of Iowa, Minnesota, and Illinois. This had its dangers. There were some sad consequences, but a child had better be lost on the prairie than in the slums of New York. There was more show for him in the hands of a brutal farmer than in the den of thieves from which he was gathered. But this Philadelphia plan avoids most of these dangers. It does not give over the children. The officers of the society watch over them, and will relinquish their trust only into the arms of greater love than theirs, and a nearer care than they can exercise.

The great objection to this movement is the crowning argument for it. It means greater personal attention. It means work, love-work, work that will bring no credit, offer no tangible results. The ambition that makes a good institution, clean walls, prompt discipline, gay uniform, the martial bearing and military step and all that, is left out of this method. Let it go, we have had enough of it; too much of it! There is rising in this dawn of the twentieth century a new and a providential class of workers who are about to learn a truer incentive to work than this external parade. It was no mere chance that led to the organization of this Philadelphia society by a body of women, liberal, progressive women at that. Such women are the predestined almoners of the new charity. The exigencies of American life and the triumph of inventions are fast making a leisure class for us here, a class of people who may have some part of every day for themselves if they will, and some portion of every week for the public weal, if they will, and that class is made up of the women of our communities. Into their hands must we intrust much, not all, of this work. When the stone walls, with their cruel exclusions, fall from between the unfortunate dependents of society and the world, there will be built around them a living wall of mother hearts, they will be woven into the sacred tissue of human society. The final completion of this home-making will be intrusted to the hands of her who first built the fire on the hearthstone. When woman comes to her majority and seeks and accepts her share of this common trust, then men will intrust her with the revenues she has aided in gathering. She will see to it that "even the solitary are set in families." City money and country willingness, love and opportunity, will combine in reclaiming the dependent back into independence. Then the country will become the natural asylum of the sick and the poor, and the city will rightly bear its full share of the burden. Let the city pay the country for the work which it now does so poorly itself. Five years ago there were over 300 women in the State of Pennsylvania engaged in this divine farming, and only three or four of them received salaries. I presume it is now managed in the same way.

Let us not go begging of the poor farmers to take care of our paupers, but ask them to co-operate with us in the mutual work of giving homes to the homeless, making love and wisdom do the work which to-day is imperfectly done by brick and mortar. This will be a slow and difficult task. There will be objections, disappointments, failures, but we must remember that we are not supplanting a faultless system, we can scarcely do less or poorer than we are doing now. We may and ought to do much better. When the church comes down to live on the earth, and with Jesus welcomes the little ones as members of the heavenly kingdom, then we may begin to do some good in the world on lines that will last.

"About seven or eight months ago I was attacked by a cough, and at once began to take a medicine much advertised as an expectorant, and continued using it until I had taken about six bottles. Instead of giving me relief, it only made me worse. I tried several other remedies, but all in vain, and I don't think I had three whole nights' rest during my illness. I began to think that had laid hold of me, and my hopes of recovery were all gone. I was a mere skeleton, but a friend of mine, who had been some time away, called to see me. He recommended me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and kindly sending me a bottle, I took it, but with little hopes of recovery. I am thankful, however, to say that it cured me, and I am to-day enjoying the best of health."—J. Wilmot Payne, Monrovia, Liberia.

Each year there come in contributions from churches and individuals at the assembling of the Conference in annual meeting, and the Treasurer will await these. It would be a great convenience to him, however, if these could be sent somewhat sooner, or if he could be notified beforehand of the amounts to be expected from the respective churches having yet made no contribution.

Chicago: W. U. C. Directors' Meeting. A meeting of the Directors of the Western Unitarian Conference was held at 175 Dearborn street at 2:30 p. m., April 25. Present, Messrs. Blake, Gould, Hosmer, Van Inwagen, West, and Miss Hultin. Several resident members were out of the city, including President Shorey. Mr. Van Inwagen was called to the chair. The monthly report of Treasurer Leonard was read by the Secretary, including a letter received by Mr. Leonard from Rev. J. L. Jones, accompanying the latter's payment on Endowment-Fund subscription, stating that said payment was made under protest, and asking that the letter be read at the Directors' meeting. As the Board has hitherto declined to act on the point raised, leaving it to the action of the Conference in annual meeting, no action was taken on the letter.

The Secretary, as chairman of the committee on the Conference program, made a final report. Some discussion as to the best arrangement of some parts of the program followed. It was voted that to the note* ordered at the last meeting to be inserted upon the program, there be added the following:

"By instruction of the Board of Directors, at the meeting of April 25, four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon (May 17) is fixed for the above purpose."

Mr. Gould, as chairman of the committee on the World's Fair exhibit, reported the Unitarian booth as nearly ready for use, and also read letters from Secretary Reynolds, of Boston, in regard to the contribution of the A. U. A. to the exhibit and in defraying the expenses involved. At Mr. Gould's suggestion the Directors voted a present appropriation of $75. Adjourned on Monday, May 15, at 2:30 p. m. F. L. HOSMER, Sec'y.

*N. B. The note here referred to reads thus: "The Secretary has received official information from some members of the Conference that the resolution, supplementary to the Cincinnati resolution, passed at the last meeting of the Conference, will be brought up for further consideration during the coming meeting, and the Business Committee will provide a suitable time for it."

11:45 a. m. Election of officers and other business.

Notice to Delegates and Attendants: Delegate, and attendants at the meetings will report, upon arrival, at Unity Church, Dearborn Avenue, corner of Walton Place. Take either the Clark Street or State Street cars to the North Side, stopping at Walton Place.

Owing to the unusual demand already made upon private hospitality in the city, by reason of the World's Fair, arrangements have been made to secure comfortable accommodations for those so desiring; and a list of these, with prices, will be shown at the church. Lunch will be served each day in the church parlors.

It will prove a mutual accommodation if friends coming to the conference will send their names beforehand to "Unity Church Committee, the Plaza Hotel."

NOTE.—Delegate Membership in the Western Unitarian Conference shall be acquired by certificate of appointment by any religious society or organization that shall have, during the previous year, contributed not less than $10 to the Conference. Such society or organization may be so represented by three general delegates, and one additional delegate for each thirty families connected with such society or church. And such delegates, together with all officers of the Conference, the officers of the State Conferences within its limits, of the Sunday-school Society, of the Women's Western Conference, and all missionaries at work within its limits, alone have the right to vote.

Delegate Membership in the Women's Western Unitarian Conference shall be acquired by certificate of appointment by any religious society or organization that shall have, during the previous year, contributed not less than $5 dollars to the Conference; and such society or organization may be represented by two general delegates.

Weirs, N. H.—The sixteenth annual Grove Meeting at this place will begin on Sunday, July 31, and end on Sunday, Aug. 7. As usual, besides the best Unitarian speakers, ministers of several denominations will be invited in the interests of a broad religious fellowship.

Greeley, Col.—The fourth annual session of the Rocky Mountain Conference of Liberal Christian Churches was held at the Unitarian Church at Greeley, Colo., April 28, 29, and 30. Friday evening the opening services were conducted by Rev. R. E. Blount, of Greeley, and Rev. W. R. G. Mellen, of Colorado Springs. The sermon, "Has Religion a Future?" was delivered by Rev. T. B. Forbush, of Chicago. Saturday morning, reports of Secretary and Treasurer, appointment of committees, and reports from the churches of the conference was followed by a discussion of "Missionary Means and Methods," opened by Mr. Forbush. The following officers were elected: President, F. E. Smith, Greeley; Vice Presidents, Ivers Phillips, Boulder, and Mrs. C. W. Burrage, Canon City; Secretary, C. E. Montague, Denver; Treasurer, F. Shepard, Denver.

Directors: W. C. Selleck, Denver; Mrs. David Utter, Salt Lake City; Mrs. J. T. Lincoln, Longmont; Rev. W. R. G. Mellen, Colorado Springs; Rev. J. H. Crooker, Helena; Mrs. H. R. Wilson, Denver; Mrs. C. B. Sanborn, Greeley; Rev. G. H. Taylor, Rocky Ford.

Saturday, p. m.—Reports from woman's societies, branch alliances, and the Postoffice Mission were given. A paper, "Sunday-school Mission Work in a Large City," by Mrs. H. R. Wilson, was read and discussed.

At six o'clock a supper was served in Odd Fellows' Hall by the ladies of Unity Circle. More than one hundred persons partook, and enjoyed the social and informal reception that occupied the time till the opening of the evening session. There the discussion upon "The Church and Social Reforms" was opened by Rev. S. A. Elliot, of Denver, followed by Senator David Boyd and Dr. H. R. Wilson.

The Sunday morning service was opened by Mr. Blount and Rev. S. Peebles of Glenwood Springs. The sermon, "The True Line of Religious Progress," by Rev. S. A. Elliot, was delivered to a large audience.

Sunday afternoon the Sunday-school session was most interesting. Three papers were read, each followed by an animated discussion, "The Sunday-school and what it should stand for," by C. E. Montague, of Denver; "Sunday-school Work," by Mrs. C. B. Sanborn, of Greeley; and "The Relation of the Church and the Sunday-school," by Miss G. E. Watson, of Denver. The work laid out for Sunday evening was partly omitted for lack of time.

Rev. G. H. Taylor, of Rocky Ford, gave the only address, the subject of which was "The Man or the Machine."

"The Conference has been thoroughly enjoyable," was a remark often heard among those who had been fortunate enough to attend.

S. E. H.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa.—Sunday, May 1, marked the fourth anniversary of Rev. J. H. Palmer as minister of the Universalist Church. The Gazette published the sermon in full, with words of praise and warm recognition of Mr. Palmer's work.

World's Fair Notes

Ten days since the President "touched the button" and said (in substance): "The Columbian Exhibition is ready. The gates are open. Enter, behold, admire, be proud!"

What is the fact to-day?

The buildings are up—most of them.

The exhibits are mostly there. One-fourth, perhaps, are in place.

This much is an easy discovery.

The growler has his opportunity.

He drags himself around through the mud and cries: "What a fraud!"

The man who goes there cheerfully and takes things resignedly behaves better and fares better.

This man can only wonder.

As he gradually acquaints himself with the vast scope of the undertaking he marvels that so much has been accomplished.

One of two things were possible.

Either a far less splendid result, complete at the hour the "button" was sprung, or the grand scheme of building and display that has been adopted, to be finished on time, if possible, if not, then as soon thereafter as possible.

Let those grumble who will. For one, I would say: "Well done, faithful servants; you made the right choice. Before the summer is on, the world will applaud you."

And to all visitors: Go! go early. Take it leisurely. If you hurry, you will miss much and tire yourselves out ere the day is half done.

You may merely walk about your first day and view things from the outside. The White City seen from without is a vision for a lifetime. Where else in the world has the genius of man brought to view as by magic such a scene of marvelous beauty? In what other land, in what other age, has it been excelled?

If you surmise that this is extravagance, pay your money and go within the gates.

Don't bother much with "guides." Just wander. Chance on things. In true Columbian style make voyages of discovery!

Enter the first door!

Surprises await you.

Already you will find there all you can crowd into your first week's entertainment.

To me it is most interesting to see the workers at their work—opening boxes of mystery. They are a tableaux, a study; these fixers and arrangers there hustling, competent and cross—some of them.

I like to stand and watch them.

They are living pictures; good in tone, never out of drawing.

The United States Government Museum is by this date quite in order. It offers a liberal education by itself.

Go into the apartment of fine arts where France is unpacking what we expect will prove to be the finest display of sculpture in the whole art exhibit. All is confusion, but it is a most promising confusion. What workers these Frenchmen be!

Germany, Holland and Austria have their affairs in better shape.

Germany with her war paintings, triumphal processions, portraits and busts of her emperors and warriors gives to her exhibit a warlike tone. Emperor William III appears with great frequency. His face, imperious, impetuous, open, frank; but not masterful like that of his rejected Bismarck.

Pass on and you shall see how the better things of Germany, like the better things everywhere, do not obtrude. The searching eye must find them out.

Otto Friedrich sends you his painting of the "Death of Dante." This alone repays you for your hour with Germany.

Holland sends the unique paintings of Artz. See one "daub" of a girl asleep on the side of the hill; another of a boy prone on the grass, his head raised.

"Daubs?"

Retreat a few paces; view them now from your seat. Do you say they are not great? This Artz shows how to do things without doing them.

Then there is Vos. Watch for everything Hubert Vos has done in oil or pastel.

The display of American sculpture is already interesting.

French's figure of "Death" arresting the young sculptor's work is beautiful, grandly impressive! It is the work of a master.

Notice Dallin's "Signal of Peace." Simply an Indian on horseback. So chaste is Dallin's art you may not feel its power at first. It does not assail your senses. It waits on your intelligence. Dallin is a son of Utah. A young man, a diligent, truthful worker. His work should make Utah a State.

LITTLE BROWN HANDS.

They drive home the cows from the pasture,
Up through the long shady lane.
Where the quail whistles low in the wheat field
All yellow with ripening grain.

They find, in the thick waving grasses,
Where the scarlet-tipped strawberry grows,
They gather the earliest snowdrops
And the first crimson buds of the rose.

They toss the hay in the meadow,
They gather the elder blooms white,
They find where the wild grapes purple
In the soft-tinted autumn light.

They know where the apples hang ripest
Red and amber as Italy's wines,
They know where the fruit is the thickest
On the long, thorny blackberry vines.

Those who toil bravely are strongest;
The humble and poor become great,
And from these brown-handed children
Shall grow mighty rulers of state.

The pen of the author and statesman,
The noble and wise of the land;
The sword and the chisel and pallet,
Shall be held in the little brown hand.

THE INDIAN LEGEND OF THE ARBUTUS.

Many of the dear little children of the kindergarten have heard the story of the little Indian boy Hiawatha, the son of West Wind; how his wrinkled old grandmother rocked him in his linden cradle lined with softest moss and rushes, and told him wonderful stories of the shining stars, of the broad white road in heaven, and of the rainbow where the lilies, the roses, and all the lovely flowers that have faded on earth, blossom again.

On the shore of that same shining Big Sea Water, where so often the little Hiawatha watched the silver moon as it rose from the rippling waves before the door of the wigwam, grows that sweetest and daintiest of all wild flowers—the trailing arbutus, its rosy-tinted waxen petals bringing to us the fragrant breath of Spring herself; and this is the story the Indians tell of it:

Many, many moons ago, they say, there lived an old, old man all alone in his wigwam among the dark pines and firs. His long hair and beard were white as the snow that covered everything, and he was dressed in the skin of the bear to keep him warm, for all the world was winter then. The little brooks were locked fast with Jack Frost's strongest chains; the wind moaned through the trees, and not even a squirrel or a blue jay dared venture out.

The old man went about searching everywhere for some bits of wood to keep a fire in his wigwam, but he could find none. Then in despair he went back, and called to the Great Spirit to send him some warmth that he might not die. And as he sat there, stretching out his hands over the few coals that were left of his fire, the door of his tent was pushed aside and in came the most beautiful maiden! Her cheeks looked as if the pinkest wild roses were blooming there, her eyes were dark-blue, like clear skies at twilight, and shining like stars, and her hair was brown as the October chestnuts, and it touched the ground as she walked. Her dress was made of sweet grasses and ferns, and on her feet she wore the most beautiful white satin slippers in the world, for they were made of a shining white lily. Her breath was like the south wind when it blows over a field of clover, and it made the tent as warm and fragrant as a June day.

The old man said to her: "My daughter, I am glad to see you; but tell me who you are, that you come to my lodge dressed so strangely? Sit here and tell me of your country and your nation, and I will tell you of my wonderful deeds."

So the maiden sat down upon a mat of rushes, and the old man began: "I am all-powerful. I breathe, and the rivers and lakes are locked fast in icy chains."

"I breathe," said the maiden, "and the violet, the wind-flower, and all the lovely sisterhood spring up to greet me."

"I shake my white locks," said the old man, "and snow covers the ground."

"I shake my curls," said the maiden, "and from the clouds falls the warm rain, each little drop bringing freshness from heaven to the tiny roots that are waiting for it."

The old man said, "As I walk through the trees, at my command each leaf falls to the ground, the squirrels and beavers hide away in their holes, and from the lakes and rivers the wild geese and herons leave their nests among the reeds and rushes, and fly southward."

The maiden said, "At my coming the flowers lift up their heads, the trees put on their dresses of tender green, the little brooks sing as they ripple over the pebbles, and the blue-birds, the robins, and the merry voices of children join in their song."

So they talked until, as it grew warmer and warmer in the tent, the old man's eyes grew heavy, and at last he slept. Then the maiden knelt beside him and waved her hands gently above his head, and he began to grow smaller. A tiny stream of water flowed from his mouth, and soon there was nothing but a small mass on the ground, and his clothing had all turned to green leaves. Then the maiden took from her dress the most lovely white flowers and hid them all about under the green leaves. As she breathed on them she said: "I give thee my most precious treasure and my sweetest breath, and all who would pick thee must do so on bended knee."

Then the maiden floated away through the woods and plains with a step so light that she seemed a bit of thistle-down blown by the wind; but wherever her foot touched the ground, there, and nowhere else, sprang up the rosy and white clusters of the fragrant arbutus.—Helen M. Perkins, in the Kindergarten.

ESSENTIALS OF CHARACTER.

JUSTICE.

"Stand fast to justice when ye bear witness before God, though it be against yourselves, or your parents, or your kindred."

A UNIVERSAL SENSE OF FAIRNESS.—There is a sense of justice which is born with every human soul, and even a dog will fight more bravely for a bone which he thinks is his own than for one which he would like to gnaw, but upon which he has no claim. Whenever this sense of justice can act unhindered by the baser motives that tend to crowd it aside, it will lift us into the region of God's righteousness.

This sense of justice or fairness ought to be cultivated in all our relations in life. It should begin with our earliest years, for justice between boy and boy and man and man is the ground of true life.

IN THE HOME justice requires exact fairness toward every member of it. Do not take the things of your smaller brothers and sisters because you are stronger, nor from the older members of the household because they will not resent it. Be fair, be manly, and ask no more than justice even from indulgent parents. It will help you in all places in life if you have learned in your own homes to give and take exact justice. Do not try to get things by teasing. It isn't fair; it isn't manly.

ON THE PLAY-GROUND one of the most frequent cries is "play fair," and it ought to be heeded. No game is good where cheating is practiced. Give the smallest child or the clumsiest player a fair chance. Don't hide the toy you may have broken. "Own up." That is the only fair way. Divide things with an even hand. Don't sneer at an awkward player. It isn't fair. Give him a chance to do his best.

IN THE SCHOOL-ROOM the boy or girl who loves fairness will not annoy the teacher. It isn't fair; will not slyly eat things in school hours; will not take or give "prompts;" they are not fair. Be frank, open, manly, in all your school life.

IN SOCIAL LIFE justice is so important that the government establishes courts to maintain it, and builds prisons to punish those who violate it. Only where strict justice is maintained is the best development possible, for only there are men encouraged to do their best. In the intercourse of friends and acquaintances the government does not attempt to maintain justice. That must be done by ourselves, but it is just as necessary for the truest and best society. Be just in your judgments of people, and in order to do so, try to see things from their standpoint.

IN BUSINESS LIFE justice is of prime importance. The common term of the street for justice in trade is "squareness." The boy who is "square" in his trades with the other boys, who gives each one full value for what he receives from him, will be like'y to do the same in business when he becomes a man; and though a kind of success may come to the boy or the man whose sharp practices take unfair advantage of his fellows, the best success never comes from such dealings, and he whose every action is "square" builds both a good business and a noble character.

In its highest development the justice of man is akin to the justice of God. His eternal fairness is the foundation of all our trust. Our justice is but the imitation of his. The more we practice justice the more we shall reverence God, for we shall see Him more clearly.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward. And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes canvassed. Special inducements to agents will be given on correspondence. Subscriptions $1 per annum. Send all remittances to

Sing to my soul, renew its languishing faith and hope,

*Rouse up my slow belief, give me some

Joy! joy! in freedom, worship, love! joy in the ecstasy of life!

—From Walt Whitman's "Mystic Trumpeter."

CONTENTIONS and strife concerning great principles ultimately fall back into the common human heart, to quicken intelligence, widen knowledge, and to mellow with patience the human soul.

Hugo, as quoted by the Liberal Co-Worker, says that "to be pointed at is diminutive of the anathema." But time tires these pointing fingers, and at last they fall nerveless, while the man or woman thus ostracized, if unmindful of the pointing, contributes to the cause that triumphs forever.
Principles are tireless.

WE commend to our gentlemen readers to visit, while at the Fair, the Liberty bell to be found in the W.
C. T. U. exhibit at the Woman's Building, which bears the following inscription:

"This bell, cast in the city of Tokyo, December 10, 1892, by Tsuda Sen, is made from the metal of tobacco pipes of more than a thousand men, once slaves, now freemen."

A CORRESPONDENT writes concerning the present interest in the Free Church manifesting itself all along the line of Liberal thought, "What is most needed now is close thinking.
Few people have that power." Perhaps fewer people still deem it necessary in matters of religion. They assume that the intentions and the feelings are adequate, forgetting that both intentions and feelings are dependent upon clear thought.

THE Liberal C.-Worker says: "Not to exclude but to include is our cry and call." "Every one who puts up a fence, fences out more than he fences in." Such sayings as these must not become trite until they are tried, tested and applied. Victor Hugo says: "Rheumatism and easy circumstances are fond of keeping each other company." Churches, denominations and nations as well as individuals often suffer rheumatic troubles from their over-desire for ease, peace and prosperous condition.

THAT is a beautiful picture of the true minister given in the sweet and touching story by Barrie, "The Little Minister:" He who "carries the people's troubles in one hand and the people's joys in the other; these keep him erect like a woman between her pan and pitcher." The minister who carries his people's concern in one hand, and his own concern in the other, be they joys or sorrows, is very like to eventually grow awry in the spinal column. The minister who serves himself is a contradiction.

He may preach, but he is not a minister.

THE name of Noyes is again heard throughout the land. The American Board is agitated with the problem that disturbed it three years ago, viz.: Is this man, who has some faint hope that the Pagan who has had no chance on this side of the grave may have a chance of hearing of Jesus on the other side of the grave and winning salvation thereby, a fit missionary to go among the heathen as a representative of that Board? These questions have less and less interest to the public. They provoke a smile, but no anxiety.
The Congregationalists are, in public opinion, in a more awkward situation than the heathen. Whichever way things go in the politics of this denomination, the world will have more and more hope for the benighted in and out of Christendom, and will hold out the light more and more lovingly for the guidance of the bewildered, be they Pagan or Christian bigots and sinners.

DR. BARTOL says that "To discover and establish the fact that all denominations, Christian and Pagan, like rivers to the sea, run from and into the common heart, is the tendency of our time." This truth is most true when the word "heart" includes the mind. All these were born of human thought and must be eventually tested in the crucible of thought. The thinking of the elder and the Eastern man will eventually come to be tested by the thought of the younger and Western man.

DID you ever think of UNITY's potency as a tract? For $1 you get the equivalent of a book with twelve hundred and fifty pages, a tract more than twelve pages long, at the cost of a little less than a cent. Is it not worth while for church trustees to think of this as one way of propagating their principles and supplementing their pastors? What better use of missionary money could be suggested than the placing of twenty-five, fifty, or a hundred copies of UNITY on their tract shelf every Sunday? What a splendid opportunity for distributing our word during the World's Fair. We would like to place two hundred copies each week at the Unitarian stand in the Liberal Art Building, to be handed out as bread cast upon the waters to the inquiring visitors. One hundred dollars would enable us to do this. This would distribute one hundred and twenty-five thousand pages of our thought. Is there a purseholder somewhere who would like to become a missionary to the world at large in this way?

NOR to anticipate the report of the Menominee Congress, we can but echo some of the hopeful strains there heard by the editor, who was present during the Thursday session. Unitarianism as one factor of the Free Church movement, a contributor willing and fertile to the great Liberal religious cause, was there exemplified. Mrs. Gibbs, pastor of All Souls Church at Janesville, read a ringing plea for the Free Church, and it is seldom the lot of Conferences to listen to finer addresses than those which followed the paper, by Messrs. Chunn of Luverne and Schindler of Racine. The Eau Claire society has recently so amended its constitution as to put themselves in line with this non-sectarian search for the people in the interests of religion, not in any way thereby disqualifying themselves from co-operating with Unitarian work and workers. There is something inspiring in this tendency to lay aside loved words in order that they may ever remain; discarding them as badges, that they may come back as inspirations.

WE go to press too soon to speak of the gatherings of the women host—a World's Congress of representative women now in session. The two great halls of Columbus and Washington and seven or eight minor ones will be occupied simultaneously. And the program of all the meetings from May 15 to 21 inclusive contains fifty-six closely printed pages. Its breadth and depth is inspiring. On Thursday, while the Baptist women will be in session in Hall IV., the Universalist women will be occupying Hall XXIV, and the Catholic women Hall XXVI. These last named sisters will discuss among other topics, the "Intellectual Woman of the Early Church," "The Progressive Catholic Woman." On Friday in Hall III. the Unitarian women will gather. On this program we notice names from the far East and the far West, women who have believed in women's organizations, and those who have not believed in them. May the great privilege and high opportunities make these women as thoughtful as they are active; modest as they are courageous. Great things have been done by them; greater things must yet be done by them before they can take their place in the world of thought and morals. On Sunday, the 2nd, there will be great religious services conducted entirely by women. The nominal Western Unitarian Conference will be held in Unity Church this week, but the Conference that will represent its principles in greater numbers, and perhaps with more ability, and probably with as much courage, will be held at the same time in the many halls of the Art Building.

CAN there be a doubt as to the beauty and excellence of the moral verities, the eternal truths of religion? Can there even be a strife or confusion among men regarding the principles of righteousness and justice, of kindness and virtue? These essentials of religion have a tendency to unite, to draw all men together and to make them indeed a common band of brothers. Wherever religion in its essential purity has asserted itself, there dogmatic differences, forms and ceremonies, texts and articles have fallen away, and men have come to regard each other as the members of one family, as the children of one God, who is the one common Father. He who has once realized in thought the full purport of belief in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man cannot lend himself to the maintenance of partition-walls and barriers between man and man.—Rabbi Sale, in the Non-Sectarian.

"WHAT a fool he must be who thinks that his El Dorado is anywhere but where he lives."—Thoreau.

"NOT NOMINATED IN THE BOND."

The Directory of the World's Fair voted last Friday, twenty-seven to seven, to open the grounds of the Exposition to the public, on May 21, admitting the public at half price. This step is justified on the theory that Congress controls the Exposition, but not the park, nor buildings not under the general management, such as the State and foreign buildings, etc. The Directory claims that by keeping the buildings which contain the exhibits closed they abide by the bond. Technically it would seem as though they had the best of the argument; but, anxious as we are to have the privileges of this greatest triumph of the human mind in the way of its external projection, available to the greatest number for the longest time possible, we can have but little enthusiasm for this clever strategy; nor even for that which, with more plausibility, argues that Congress in withholding a portion of the appropriation for other purposes has violated its side of the contract, thus leaving the Directory free to disregard the obligation on the other side. This is too grave a question to be settled by technicalities. Unless there is conscience, courage and self-denial enough on the part of those who believe in the religiousness of the Fair, and the cathedral-like service it might render on Sunday, to discharge every letter of the contract with Congress by handing back the full amount of its donation, taking their risks as to whether the Sunday receipts will refund the money or not, we would prefer to have the gates remain closed to the end, grim witnesses to the superstition and bigotry on the one hand, the confusion, cupidity and selfishness on the other, which mark our transitional age. The struggle between liberal and evangelical religion, between natural and supernatural piety, focalizes itself at the gates of the World's Fair to-day. However the question may be temporarily settled, there can be no doubt as to the final outcome. This agitation will prove a striking contribution to free thought; and the agitators who have worked so hard to force a Christian dogma against the consciences, the intelligence and the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the citizens of the world, have been the most effective missionaries for rational religion that the world has known for many a year.

We trust that the friends of reason will not resort to tactics or to expedients, thus dwarfing the spirit by an appeal to the letter. Let the high issue be kept on high grounds. Let the honor of free thought be kept unsullied, and the religion of character be vindicated by the conduct of its devotees. Are there not free people enough in the United States to pledge the World's Fair Directory a guarantee fund of $2,000,000 as an indemnity for any loss that may accrue from the full restoration to Congress of all money received under the obnoxious, and, to our mind, unconstitutional conditions which dictate the Sunday closing? Then let the highest use of the whole magnificent exhibit be sought. This is not only a national but an international question. It is not fair to expect Chicago capitalists and the Chicago directors, who have already borne such burdens so heroically and triumphantly, to carry in addition this profound perplexity and high responsibility. Where are the liberal-minded men of fortune who live in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, London, Paris, Berlin, Constantinople and Bombay? Are they not interested and responsible in this great struggle between natural and supernatural piety? Between provincial and universal religion? Surely the Jew and the Mohammedan, the Parsee, as well as the liberated Christian, are interested in this struggle for freedom, in this attempt to establish the sanctity of nature, and the sacredness of nineteenth century revelations. Who will start this guarantee fund, and with organized enthusiasm speedily bring to the Directory and the Commission the only condition upon which, as it now seems to us, they can in all honor open the gates? Let the subscriptions come from all over the world in sums of from 25 cents to $50,000. This is the way to vote at once for freedom and for honor. This Guarantee Fund would also be an element in the discussion, a consideration in logic, an argument which would carry weight.

This appeal to the "Bond" is too easy a way out of many conscience problems. Many things are quite "legal" and seem to be very "good business" that represent a sad lack of chivalry, very poor comradeship, and a low standard of that ethics that has a care for honor, and is solicitous for the "other one's rights." The disposition to take advantage of a situation which ought not to be, of an opportunity which should not have existence, is too prevalent in the Church as out of it.

It is pathetic to read, in the diaries of Columbus, such records as the following: "Sailed this day nineteen leagues, and determined to count less than the true number, that the crew be not dismayed if the voyage prove to be long." Day by day he records this prudent device. John Fiske estimates that his aggregated lies probably amounted to about five hundred and twenty-five miles. Alas! how many causes are sustained in popular estimation by such sedatives. The so-called "faith of Christendom" to-day, the assumed "peace of the Church," would fain find its lodgment on this expedient of short mileage; some double interpretation of an Andover creed; some apologetic explanation of the theory of errancy of the Bible; some transient reconciliation between Genesis and geology; some fortunate explanation that proves that words do not mean what they say, or that they do not say what they mean. The first of all the integrities to be maintained is the integrity of language; and speech is to be interpreted by the popular intelligence, the idiom of the people, the vernacular of everyday life, and not by the refinings of the dictionary or the subtlety of the jurist. Portia, not Shylock, strained the bond; she was up to the "tricks of her trade." Shylock had, at least, the integrity of speech on his side, the ingenuousness which makes words a medium of communication, a vehicle of thought.

Do we want an open church? Let us say so and work for it in open ways. Do we want open gates at the Fair? If so, let us seek it in open ways. Let us secure them by honorable means, if at all. Let us not ask the Directory to compromise themselves now by evading the consequences of their action. But let us help them to correct the mistake which, under the circumstances, was excusable, by enabling them to hand back to Congress the trust which ought never to have been accepted, which now embarrasses and enslaves them. LET US RAISE THE MONEY!!

MEANING OF WORSHIP.

The worship of mankind is deeply pathetic; and it must be so to those who have reflected how profoundly man's religious beliefs and life have entered into the history of the world. We have read lately of the dedication of the Mormon Temple at Salt Lake; a million dollars, and long years of toil, and sacrifices many, went to make that great structure possible. A delusion, do you say? Yes, in part; but a religious delusion, and so true to that people that they have given and suffered for forty years for its realization. Go where you will, and along the shores of oceans, in cities and country, there are the temples erected by the toil of man in the name of some religion—heathen, Jewish, Christian, Mohammedan, or some sect of these faiths. One can hardly estimate the learning, the libraries, the sermons, the teachings, and the work done and the sufferings endured, in the cause of religion. And pathetic, sorrowful, indescribably sad the persecutions, the wars, and the crimes of our world in the blind or mistaken service of religion!

I think it was the strong John Adams who once said, "This would be a very good world if there were no religions in it." He was thinking, perhaps, of the bigotries, the narrowness, the prejudices, the crimes in the name of Christ; and when one reflects upon such dark pages of history, he could almost wish there were no such thing as religion.

But such a wish is not of possible realization while man is man; nor could one seriously make such a wish when one reflects what man and the world would be without religion,—man without a rational and moral nature, and life without meaning, end, or hope. When one thinks of the struggles and sufferings and cruelties of government, one could almost wish there were no such thing as governments; but that, again, would leave man a savage, or reduce him to the plane of the animal. When one sees the struggles and the fierce competitions of business, sees the poor often robbed and crushed, he might almost wish that business were not; the abuses of sex relations and the falseness of tongues might lead to the wish that these, too, were not; that the world and man had never been.

In the transition from the lower to the higher conception of worship, the civilized world has passed away from the old and brutal ideas of human sacrifices, and of the offerings of blood; and in the further progress must be left behind the related heathen doctrine that the literal blood of Christ was offered as a penal satisfaction to justice, or to reconcile an angry God. And with this is passing away the idea of official worship that has dominated the minds of men for so many centuries—the idea that God is seated on a great throne, as a mighty king, and must be approached and worshiped through the meditations of an appointed priesthood.

When the divinity of man is confessed, when man is seen as the child of God, worship will be joyful, and theology will hasten to declare the glory of man as well as the glory of God; and the glory of God will be seen in the greatness of man, and not, as once, in making man little and mean, a despised worm of the dust, that God might appear great.

Now we see the dignity and value of worship; it is the glad recognition and joyful expression of the greatness of man as related to God; it is the soul's reverence and tribute in the presence of worth, of all that is worthy in itself, in humanity and God. And not to have and to cultivate such a generous appreciation and longing to become like, and in one's measure to be, the true, the beautiful, the good, is a loss, a neglect, a deficiency in the education or culture of one's being.

Emerson says, "The happiest man is he who learns from nature the lesson of worship;" and Carlyle says, "That loyalty, discipleship—all that was ever meant by hero-worship—lives perennially in the human heart." Man dwells in a great world of beauty, of uses, of reason, and moral principles; there is in man that which corresponds to all these properties and qualities; and the fullness, the joy of life, is in the soul's consciousness of sharing in and being a part of all the wonderful wealth of its great place and home in the universe.

That is worship, holiness; that is to walk with tenderness amidst the flowers, and with reverence beneath the stars. That is to live the great life of nature, of man, of God; to move along with days and nights and seasons and years, to journey with the millions from the cradle to the grave; to laugh, to weep, to work, to wait, to pray; to stand for the right, to pity the erring, to help the needy, to lift up the fallen; to love God and man—and go at last in faith and hope from the worship of earth to the worship of heaven! H. W. T.

"THE LIBERAL CO-WORKER."

Some eighteen years ago George W. Cooke, who has since won fame and position in the East as the author of the best interpretative book of Emerson yet published, and other worthy volumes, started in Wisconsin the Liberal Worker, a little missionary sheet published weekly. In many respects it was a remarkable venture, doomed, of course, at its birth, to outward failure, but it was the able John the Baptist preparing the way. And now, on the same soil, in very much the same form, comes another venture with the same name, plus the prefix "co." What suggestive evolution. Then it was a call for Liberal workers. Now it is a call for Liberal co-workers. This admirably printed sheet of eight pages, promised monthly at 50 cents a year, is published in Racine, with Rev. J. F. Schindler, pastor of the Universalist Church, as editor. Henry T. Secrist, pastor of the Unitarian Church at Milwaukee, is an intimate associate in the venture. Its immediate hope is to unite the Liberal elements in Wisconsin—Unitarian, Universalist, and the unnamed outside both these circles—in co-operative work. Its ultimate hope is to "broaden us all in our thought and our sympathy, and augment the Liberal cause by the freest, fullest, sincerest co-operation" everywhere.

We, who have had fifteen years of experience, are touched with the pathos of the confidence of these brave young brothers that there is an unoccupied field, and that success awaits them. Yea, surely, there is something better than success awaiting them. Pains and disappointments, perchance, will subsoil the fields they had only meant to enrich with a little top dressing.

This is one more straw that indicates the flowing stream that is to carry with it the divisions and subdivisions, the labels and sect badges among the sons of Liberty, as it bears along toward that Open church, that Free home, the school of character, the sanctuary of the searcher.

The Non-Sectarian in St. Louis, the Universalist Monthly in Newark, the Free Church Record at Tacoma, the Liberal Co-Worker at Racine, and UNITY at Chicago, so far as we are able to understand the fundamental inspiration of each, are identical in purpose, working for the same ends, groping for the same constituency. One can but wish that these disconnected ventures might pool their interests, join their energies, and thus make strong one common organ that would become the loved visitor to the widened circle. To this end UNITY would gladly lend itself even to the extent of sinking its individuality, merging its name, motto and life in the bigger and better thing.

But such wishing should not blind us to the fact that the law that gives these being must be respected. There is a local coloring, a flavor of personality, that justifies all these ventures. Let us coexist for a while, work for and with each other, urged to our best by divine rivalries until the laws of natural selection, the survival of the fittest combining with what is true in the old Oriental principle of metempsychosis, or the transmigration of soul, will have their play, and the worthy organ be established here in the West that will teach the multitude the holiness of liberty and the liberty of holiness. Welcome, Co-Worker. We ask a place in your working band.

Men and Things

The Public School Art League has already shown evidence of its zeal and skill in some of the Boston school-rooms. A description of one of these may interest those people who look forward to seeing similar work accomplished in other cities. This particular room in the English High School building is called the "Roman Room." Its walls are deep Pompeian red, an effective background for pictures and statuary. The pictures include large framed photographs of the Arch of Constantine, the Colosseum at Rome, the exterior and the interior of St. Peter's, and the Temple of Vesta. The statuary consists of busts of Virgil and of Cæsar, a cast of Eros, and a figure of the Marble Faun. To the classicism of the room an American touch is added by the placing of a bust of Franklin draped with the State and National flags over the teacher's desk. An "American Room" in another school has a buff background, a bust of Washington, portraits of Longfellow, Whittier, and Bryant, a photogravure from Bronzck's "Columbus before the Court of Ferdinand and Isabella," together with one or two Renaissance reliefs and casts. The contrast between these rooms and the usual bare, expressionless school-rooms is remarkable.—The Home-Maker.

A MAY TIME PICTURE.

From cushions of crimson the sun arose beaming
With gladness and light on the beautiful earth;
She waved her green banners all daintily gleaming
With the buds and the flowers to which May time gives birth.
The snowy-crowned peaks of the mountains reflected
The rainbow-hued tints that the sunlight found there,
And into the picture a beauty projected
As bright and as grand as the morning was fair.

Oh, beautiful May time! Oh, crimsonhued morning!
What poet or painter can picture thy charms?
The earth, like a maiden for bridal adorning,
The sun, like the lover who woos to his arms,
The flower-dotted prairie, the glimmering river,
The deep azure sky and the sun's golden light,
The lovely green trees with their leaves
all a-quiver,
And the glittering mountains so stately and white!

But over the brightness a shadow is stealing,
The tops of the mountains are hidden in haze,
And soon o'er the valley, like chariots wheeling,
The wind-wafted storm clouds obscure the sun's rays.
We sigh that the beauty and gladness are fading:
We count not the blessings the shadows may bear;
Forget that the power directing the shading
May hold for our winning the crown victors wear.

But dark grow the heavens, and low clouds hang o'er us;
When, oh, what a happy, unlooked-for surprise!
All, all of the beauties of May time before us Receive new enchantment direct from the skies.
For out of the gloom and the somber-ness sailing—
As hopes pure and bright of our sorrows are born—
To drape the fair earth in a soft bridal veiling,
The white, fleecy snowflakes the picture adorn.

The cloud passes by, and the sun's thrilling kisses

Descend to the gladdened and jubilant
earth,
And whispers of beauty, contentment,
and blisses
Are caught in the winged warblers' singing and mirth.
Oh, beautiful May time, and beautiful morning,
The morn of the day, and the morn
of the year,
How full and complete in thy lovely adorning
The lights and the shadows have made thee appear!

Edward Everett Hale on Admission to the Unitarian Ministry.

The following letter has appeared in the Christian Register and in the Christian Union. It will also be of interest to many of our readers who may not have seen it. It was written by Dr. Hale in reply to a young man in an orthodox theological school, and afterwards published as a matter of wider interest. As Chairman of the Council of the National Unitarian Conference, his letter may be said to carry official weight, though in the Unitarian fellowship no "final authorities" are recognized; while Dr. Hale's life-long identification with, and well-known prominence in and service to this fellowship, give his personal word a widely representative character and value. The Christian Union remarks that there is no other fellowship of churches which does not make theological belief a condition of recognition in its ministry. F. L. H.

MY DEAR MR. FAIRCHILD: It seems to me proper that you should have in writing the substance of what I said to you yesterday. You are at liberty to show this letter to any of your friends whose position is at all like your own. For my part, I will have it printed somewhere, so that it may be understood to be an official statement.

If you, or any gentleman who has spent a fit time in preparation for the ministry, wishes to obtain a license to preach without committing himself to any written dogmatic statement, you have simply to apply to the Fellowship Committee of the Unitarian Church. This board for New England now consists of Rev. D.
Munro Wilson, Quincy, Mass.; Rev.
Austin S. Garver, Worcester, Mass.; and Rev. William L. Chaffin, North Easton, Mass. Before that committee you will have to present credentials of moral character, and no person could receive any certificate from that committee where there should be the slightest doubt upon that point. You should also present a certificate of church membership; and you should show, in whatever way, that your wish to enter the ministry is one which has been tested by some years of preparation, and is not a sudden impulse.

Satisfying the committee on these points, you will receive their license, without any reference to your present theological convictions.

I inclose on another page the constitution of the committee, from which you will see that they understand perfectly well that they have no right to press an inquiry as to a verbal statement of doctrine made by any person whom they license. In pure Congregationalism no one has that right but the church to whom a man is to minister. I do not hesitate to say that the committee would give the license which I suppose you seek to a man who believed in the Thirty-nine Articles, in the Nicene Creed, and in the constitution of the Episcopal Church, if only he showed the devotion to the ministry which we require, and could produce the certificate of good moral character. Of course, I do not mean that the committee would recommend such a person as the minister of a Unitarian church. I mean simply that officially it has no occasion or need to inquire what are his theories as to church government or as to dogma.

I mean to be distinctly understood as saying that the application for a license to our committee involves no pledge to preach what is called Unitarianism, or any particular dogma which is supposed to be attached to our communion. Simply, we have no written creed, and we do not stand for any. Our business is to bring in the kingdom of God. And our Fellowship Committee will license any preacher who is in earnest for that purpose, so far as to give him the permission, for the year which his license covers, to preach in any pulpit where people will ask him. After that, it is for that people to say whether they do or do not approve of his doctrine.

As I said to you yesterday, it seems to me that an application for this license is much the most manly and intelligent course for a person who does not wish to place himself under the restrictions of any written creed, be it new or be it old.

I hope I have not spoken dogmatically; I have not meant to. I have a right, however, to remember that in my official position I represent the oldest Congregational Churches in existence. The conference which has done me the honor to make me the chairman of its executive is a conference which embraces the church formed at Scrooby in 1602, the church formed in Salem in 1630, the church formed in Dorchester in England in 1630, the First Church in Boston, the First Church in Watertown, the First Church in Roxbury—in fact, almost every church which was in existence when Congregation-alism took its name and its order.
With great respect, yours truly,

E. E. HALE,
Chairman of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches.

DEAD FAITHS.

How sad the days when a faith was dying,
Dying as only our old faiths die;
Not with moans and sighs did we watch it passing,
But with stony heart and a fearless eye.
How the heart was wrung when a doubt first entered,
How deeper the hurt when the doubt remained,
How sad the rending of ties that bound us
To thoughts and hopes in the soul ingrained.
But the old faith passed; like a wraith it vanished
In the clear, full light of the new day's dawn,
And one sad day, from the soul's recesses,
With timorous fear we felt it was gone.
But out from the graves of old faiths perished,
Grand and fairer the new faiths rise;
And still from the pangs of cruel transition,
Great new glories assail our eyes.
To the living soul no truth can be final,
And wider we range with the changing years.
But the lesser is ever lost in the greater;
Eternity beckons and laughs at Time's fears.

ETHICS OF ART.

[From a paper read before the World's Fair branch of All Souls Unity Club.]

Let us think a little about art and its mission in the world, even if we do not know a great deal about it from the standpoint of the artist or the connoisseur. We all know a good picture when we see one, or fine and true form when we see it, but the reason of this lies in the truth of the objects themselves. This much, at least, we have learned, and we know—that the highest and best in art is that which appeals to the most ignorant of us; a child can tell when a line is true or false. So these true things in art hold and thrill us; they have feeling, artists would say: we will say a soul of life, a truth which makes itself felt. We have only to come into the presence of greatness or genius with simplicity, with inward truth, to appreciate it and be benefited by it. Emerson quaintly relates of himself: "I remember when in my younger days I had heard of the wonders of Italian painting, I fancied the pictures would be great strangers, some surprising combination of color and form, a foreign wonder, barbaric pearl and gold, like the spontoons and standards of the militia which plays such pranks in the eyes and imaginations of schoolboys. I was to see and acquire I knew not what. When I came at last to Rome and saw with my eyes the pictures, I found that genius had left to novices the gay and fantastic and ostentatious, and itself pierced directly to the simple and the true: that it was familiar and sincere." Further on he says: "The Transfiguration, by Raphael, is an eminent example of this peculiar merit. A calm, benignant beauty shines over all this picture and goes directly to the heart. It seems almost to call you by name. The sweet and sublime face of Jesus is beyond all praise, yet how it disappoints all florid expectations, this familiar, simple, home-speaking countenance, as if one should meet a friend."

If one's heart is touched by a picture, no matter what the art critics may say, be sure that picture had in it a message for us. As in pictures, so with the best books. The author does not aspire to the grand or great or unusual, but takes the common and familiar life and things about us; sometimes the lowliest and meanest forms of it, but by separating and lifting it up to view it is clothed most unexpectedly with dignity and nobility. This is one of the missions of art. We are surrounded by beauty on every hand; some have eyes to see it and some have not. Pictures are only little bits of this beauty, this often common and familiar beauty, but they confine it, they compel our gaze, and then our thought, as mere contemplation of it in a general way has not the power to do. But while the artist has captured this bit of beauty, he has done something more; that is, if he have the creative power of genius he has constructed something, and something which, while it holds us in thrall, is full of suggestion; it in turn creates within our souls a new world of wonder, of thought, and of knowledge, for something new has been revealed to us.

Another mission of art to us is that of a teacher of history—a truer history than we are apt to find in the printed pages of books so called. This fact gives peculiar value to the rudest attempts at art which reach back into the childhood of the race. They denote the growth, the stature of that nation at that time. Another beautiful lesson we may learn from art is its sympathy. It is the cord of gold which binds together in one common humanity all the nations of the earth. One may talk or write of Italian art, of English or German or French or Spanish or American art, and each of these may differ in their methods, and each be a wonderful study in itself, but after all, they all tell of our common humanity, its loves, its woes, its passions, its events. The artist is compelled to gather his symbols from common nature and from common men and their common life. Art speaks a universal language. It is like true religion. In it there is neither Jew nor Gentile, bond nor free, rich nor poor. It breaks all barriers down, and when it lifts up to view a grand or noble theme, all hearts own its power and bend before its sway. But there is still another thought about art which comes to me with peculiar power at this time; it is the beautiful hope as well as thought that in the coming time there will no longer be a division between use and beauty, but each will interpenetrate each and efface all separating lines, and the most useful will become the most beautiful. We who feel our ignorance in this great realm and our littleness in the presence of such high themes may comfort ourselves with the thought that the best of beauty lies in a finer charm than the most skillful lines or color may possess, or that the rules of art may ever impart, a radiation subtle as the influences of character and penetrating as expression in music, a divinely felt spiritual force which finds its way into the deepest attributes of our natures if we are only simple and sincere. Thus do we become inheritors of all the best of all the ages and of all the nations. Thus are we true learners in the realm of art. There is still a thought that has a peculiar charm; it is the fact that all these wonderful achievements have been the outgrowth of human necessity and have been wrought by the human hand.

The ideals which were born in the brain of the artist would have perished still-born had not his hand possessed the cunning to portray them. Like bright-hued dreams they would have melted and faded away unseen, unsung, without the human hand. How closely it knits use and beauty! how it unites the artist and the artisan! In contemplating a great achievement the thought of the human hands which wrought it possesses a thrilling charm. In the stately cathedral, the marvellous bridge, the stupendous machine—all seem almost sentient with the human hands which made them, and we are brought in closer fellowship and sympathy with our fellowmen.

So all honor to the human hand! And here they come to this great World's Fair exhibit with these varied works of their hands. To all we extend welcome; we clasp their hands in fellowship and loving wonder, and it will be hard to say unto whom, artist or artisan, shall be given the greater reverence.

SWEET EVENTIDE.

Sweet eventide, sweet eventide,
That calls me to my Father's side,
And bids me then in silence wait
My spirit there to elevate.
And when my heart is troubled much,
My soul is longing for his touch;
'Tis then his presence comes to me
And fills me with his ecstasy.
Sweet eventide, sweet eventide,
O, that in love I may abide!
Then, as the shadows deeper grow,
Love's peace may bring its overflow;
And when these mortal eyes shall close,
My soul arise to its repose.
Then God within shall shine as day
And be the light in death's dark way.

PRAYER.

This is the day of sifting out the transient elements of religion. In this sifting process, prayer has been summoned to show cause why it should longer have place in human affairs. There is skepticism upon the subject. This skepticism is one of the results of an absorbing interest in physical science and material achievement. There is a tendency to undervalue what goes under the name of intuition, imagination, and sentiment, and prayer issues from this ethereal quarter of the soul.

We want to reverse our point of view and look at prayer, not with reference to changing the infinite will, but in reference to changing the finite will. I shall not argue much for the reasonableness of prayer, but rather to show what it is, and what part it plays in the human life. What it ought to be may be shown in a measure by what it ought not to be. It ought not to be an instrument of covetousness. It is the selfish intent that makes so much praying seem foolish and paltry. On the other hand let us beware of laudation. Beware of overmuch confession and self-abasement. Above all things, in all places let the prayer be a sincere effort of the soul. I am afraid no one who is in the habit of praying in public is always quite true to himself. Sorry exercise is it when praying is merely perfunctory. Some people call on a minister to ask a blessing as they would call on a servant to carve a roast. No man is always in praying mood. Let us be honest in this matter of public prayer, for God knows with what manner of mind we pray.

Expressed in general terms, let me call prayer the soul's sincere effort at communion with the creative Heart of things. It is a mood of earnest longing, drawing the individual out of self into that larger self it conceives to be divine. Every deed wrought out of a high and unselfish aspiration of the soul is a prayer. Let our prayer be a cutting loose from mean motives and selfish desires. Let us pray as Socrates did: "Ye gods, grant me to become beautiful in the inner man, and that whatever outward things I may have may be in harmony with those within." The upward seeking wish of earnest prayer is the prediction of its fulfillment.

Prayer nurtures devotion and the sense of duty to lift the life to higher levels. Prayer will not change the current of divine life, but we use it as the pilot turns his wheel, to change the direction of our life, to guide and keep it in the mighty current that is ever sweeping onward for law and order. I have observed that those who have the clearest vision of spiritual things and the finest hold on spiritual life, believe most in prayer. Let us not vex ourselves too much with philosophical speculation. Call prayer a mere sentiment, if you will. Send-ment is as much a fact as a whirling sun, and has its law as well. The upward yearning of prayer is a law of the soul no less than gravitation is a law of the body.—George W. Buckley.

DISAPPOINTMENTS — HIS-APPOINTMENTS.

"Learn to spell the word disappointments in a new way, substituting an 'H' in place of the 'D' in the beginning of the word, so that in place of disappointments it reads His-appointments."

This was the "golden text" for the day, and I read it with a growing sense of its deep meaning as applied to the petty details of every-day life, as well as to the real trials and sorrows. "What if all these are but His-appointments after all!" I cried, and how the shadows lifted with the thought. His-appointments, when our plans fail; His-appointments, when our hopes come back to us empty and broken! The appointments of the wise, loving Father who "knoweth our need" and wants us to have only what is for our true good! It is a grand thought and may become a real working force for good in daily life, helping us each to "keep quietly to God" and think rightly of all life's meaning and uses.

It is like a strong hand to lead us steadily on and up as we walk faint and weary amid the shadows.

If all our petty plans succeeded—if life brought us no disappointments, no discipline such as only sorrow rightly borne can give; if for us there was only the placid light of worldly prosperity—we should be but weak, untried children at best, content to remain upon the lowlands, and never climb the glorious heights to catch the broader view. It is only when we have gained the mountain top that the full beauty and splendor, the depth and sublimity, of life bursts upon us; only then that we can read God's purposes and get our souls in tune to work with Him. The way may be rugged and steep, but it pays to climb. It is not easy to bear losses and disappointments. We are all grievously hurt when our plans miscarry and our hopes fail; but all this is in the way of true growth, and out of it shall come the "peaceful fruits of righteousness" if we try to have it so. There is no cloud which has not a blessing back of it if we have but patience and humility to seek and find it.

Life's discipline is stern and hard, but blessed. The trials, nay the very sorrows, which seem to us hardest to bear, and from which we shrink with vain pleading, are the ones we could least of all afford to miss. "Show me the love in it," the wise soul cries when the heavy blows fall, and Jacob-like it wrestles until, in the light which dawns out of the blackness of woe and agony, the blessing is given, and the man, born anew through the holy baptism, arises and goes forward, no longer doubting, but trustful, full of the peace which "passeth understanding"—strong to help wherever there is need—a child of the father rejoicing in his heritage.

"I was a mature woman and had been disciplined by sorrow," said dear old Mother Bickerdyke to me, when I spoke in wonder at the greatness of her heroic work upon the battlefield and in the hospital. "My own sorrows had taught me how to lighten the sorrows of others, and, by suffering, my heart had been made tender for all who suffered. I only did my duty." But she did it as she could not have done it had she not learned to spell her disappointments in the new way, "with an 'H' in place of the 'D.'"

It was said of Dorothy Dix, who had little but hardship and disappointment in her girlhood, "The iron in her own soul, the hardship and privation of her earlier years was transmuted into gold for other children." She, too, learned to spell in the new way, as thousands of noble men and women are doing day by day, as we all must do before we can live up to the ideal set for us by our "Elder Brother." EARNEST.

One Way
to fill a barrel with water, is to use a sieve. You can do it—but it takes patience and hard work.

So you can wash clothes with soap and a wash-board—but it isn't the best way. It's slow work—hard work, costly work. It wears out the things you're trying to get clean.

The best and easiest way is to use Pearline. That does the washing while you're doing something else—does it without any of the clumsy rubbing that takes so much time and makes so much wear and tear.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE! Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 250 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

"THESE TWO GREAT THEMES."

Not a few of our readers will remember the name of James H. West, he of the Geneva Church in Illinois, he of the book, "Uplifts of Heart and Will." During these later years he has been living again in the old homes eastward, editing, amid other work, a little paper called "Evolution." From a sermon, a "Memorial of Two Happy Years," just past, with the church in Leicester, Mass., we borrow some passages filled with the old "uplift."

I. First of all, friends, and foremost, I have preached unto you, steadfastly and growingly, the reality of God—the helpfulness of God; and helpfulness in God.

But always the new idea of God.

At times, in other years, as I have looked out upon the world and seen its great need; seen how the sublime fact "Religion" is despoiled, how the transcendent idea "God" is degraded, I have wondered that wise men, reverent men, have longer cared to continue to cluster the mighty universe's ten thousand uplifting influences, and interpret them theologically,—continue to call them God; though indeed it is true that of late years, more and more, thoughtful, studious, reverent men and women are coming to hold, no longer a heedless, unreasoning, but really an "intelligent" reverence for the One unfathomed yet everywhere manifest Beauty and Power which is the life and soul of all the mighty host of gracious universal influences of which I have spoken. I have felt, at times, that these almost entirely new conceptions, if bearing an entirely new name, might strike the hearts and minds of men with truer accent and sublimer force.

But however that might be, I have cared, and do care, to have the divine Fact, the spiritual Reality within all earth's high influences, in some way recognized,—and potently! more potently than nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand even of ostensibly "religious" people yet do recognize the divine Fact. For, certainly, God is the All-helpfulness. The progressive, on-leading influences of the natural world, the divine impulses to the Blessed Rest surging higher yet than in any outer Nature in the souls of men, are the expression of that Power which, in its onward, transforming, ever-heightening manifestations has brought into marvelous being, from out of the primeval chaos, through the lapse of undreamed of ages, not only all the external order and magnificence of the worlds, but also all human aspiration and good-will, all human homes and societies, all earthly governments and laws, together with all those high ideals of love and morality, the most exalted, which to day are the hope and life of the world, and which are especially the Message of our Liberal Faith.

The wise man, the truly, highly, deeply religious man, does not ask any longer, as church and council and individual religionists in the past have so largely and persistently asked, that God—this Mystery of immanent Over-soul, this Universe-Power of wondrous, ever-developing Beneficence and Growth—shall be weighed and sifted and analyzed and diagnosed, and named in formal phrase and in detail. Does God himself care very much, think you, what we call him? The Fact—the deep, immanent Fact—is here, and there and everywhere! And the Fact is more than the name. But in the souls of men I would have eternally present a consciousness of this Power's unceasing nearness, a consciousness of its ever-indwelling grace and uplifting possibilities, a consciousness of its mightiness to save—if we but work with it, co-operate with it, trust it, love it in the right way. The idea, God, in its nobler, its truer aspects, is a helpful and exalting energy in the human soul. Men who miss it—many of them even so-called "religious" men—are men working in the dark. How they can work at all they alone know.

God is the Spirit-life of the worlds. God is our life! And when we know of God most, then would we embrace God the most, striving most to be "one" with God. For thus only do we enter into peace.

II. Again, I have preached unceasingly belief also in Man;—belief in the divine possibilities of man,—in man's unmeasured might; man's inherent oneness of nature with deity.

A youthful painter found one day
In the streets of Rome a child at play;
And moved by the beauty that it bore,
The heavenly look its features wore,
On a canvas radiant and grand
He painted its face with a master hand.

Year after year on his wall it hung:
'Twas ever joyful and always young,
Driving away all thought of gloom
As the painter toiled in his lonely room.

But the painter's locks grew thin and gray;

His young ambition had passed away;
He looked for years, in many a place,
To find a contrast to that sweet face.
Through haunts of vice in the night he strayed

To find some ruin that crime had made;
And at last, in a prison-cell, he caught
A glimpse of the hideous face he sought.

On a canvas, weird and wild, but grand,
He painted the features with a master hand.

That loathsome wretch in a dungeon low,

With the face of a fiend and the look of woe,

Ruined by revels and stained by sin,
A pitiful wreck of what once he had been,

Hated, and shunned, and without a home—

Was the child that played in the streets of Rome!

Pitiful poem! Pitiful poem, we say. Yet every equally loathsome wretch that treads Boston and New York streets to-day, or slinks down yonder Mechanic street, Worcester, was once a laughing, innocent babe, with infinite possibilities in him. And the instilling, into his young soul, in the right way, of Moral Purpose, and of self-recognition and self-reverence—the binding of him, with links of love, to the pure heart of the pure, to the strong heart of the strong, to the Moral Core of things, would have been growth and blessing to him forever. But somebody, who knew better, or who ought to have known better, simply failed in duty! Society failed in duty. Religion failed in duty. And in a hundred ways we fail: in a hundred ways society and religion fail.

Who shall spur us up? What shall spur us up? Around about us, always, is blessing; and we let it pass us, and let it pass the world by! The good forces of the world-energy are never absent from us. Beckoning voices ceaselessly call—speaking of man's possible high dignity; of his wondrous opportunities; of his unlimited power, under due self-recognition. Yet man's height of attainment and height of happiness depend altogether on the use he makes of the faculties which are his: on the use he makes of the blessings and means of progress which are his. And so it will always be.

So this also, friends, I have preached to you!—man's possibilities of loss as well as of gain. The divine, on-working spirit of things will not, never does, never can, forsake us. But (so to speak), by not recognizing ourselves aright, and thus failing to urge ourselves on to the Blessed Best, we may flee from the Great Good, and from the healthful results of "harmony." Nature grants us light: we have our choice whether we will walk in the darkness, or in the light which she gives. Here is the blessing of the sun; but we may shut ourselves in a dark room, or put out our eyes. Here are the laws of health, which we may follow—or disobey; the laws of our moral nature, of uprightness, of justice, of personal purity—all of which we may abuse or neglect. Here is our sense of the beautiful, of the ideal, through which our souls may be educated, enlarged, made glorious, made to rejoice in the light and manifest beauty of the world. We may see beauty, we may find helpfulness and uplifting, in every rising sun, in the red of every western sky, in the tree and the flower and the ocean. Said Tennyson of his dead Arthur:

His voice is on the rolling air,
I hear him where the waters run,
He standeth in the rising sun,
And in the setting he is fair.

So may we say of the world-spirit. And all things call us on to recognize the divine around us and the divine within us—God in man, and we as men and women in God! * * *

Friends, it remains only for the world more and more to search out, that it may thus more and more purify, its ideas of God and man, of morality and real human need, in order for it to "worship" aright, reverence the proper things, labor for the needful results. Then, with such reverence and worship and labor as that which I foresee, will the universe blossom out indeed, for every one of us, into the house of the one only living, eternal, love-deserving deity—the Spirit God of the throbbing worlds. Then will human life be seen to be meaningful and progressive and prophetic of a sublime future. Then will all our souls be filled with true uplifting zeal, both for ourselves and for all about us. Religion will mean something to us. It will compel activity. It will compel the realization of an ideal morality. It will force upon the world the conviction that the universe is on the side of right; the conviction that men cannot fight the Highest things and the Best things, and come off victors; that they cannot prostitute their intelligence, their honor, their virtue, their spiritual nature, and meet anything but defeat—dust and ashes, anguish and suffering.

Let us have our part in all this! Yes, even though we ourselves may never live to see the Greater Good on earth.

The Study Table

LOUIS AGASSIZ.*

This work is an interesting summary of the events in the life of Agassiz, and incidentally an analysis of his character and a sketch of his work in science. It is not intended to take the place of the elaborate life written by his wife, but rather to interest a new class of readers, particularly the young, in his character and in his scientific work. Nothing could be of greater benefit to the youth of to-day than to awaken their interest in the study of natural history, and this book is well calculated to do that, and to inspire admiration for this new hero, who had "no time to make money," but who gave himself with such boundless enthusiasm to his work for science and education. His genius for teaching was as remarkable as his achievements in study and in scientific investigation. Not the least of his benefits to his time were the scholars he trained to continue his work, and the wide general interest he awakened in scientific inquiry. The sacrifices he made for science, and the heroic labors he underwent in her service, will be a revelation to the easy-going students of this generation, and the wide results of his labors and their influence upon the world may well be an inspiration to all strenuous laborers in whatever department of the world's work. Browning's words apply to Agassiz as well as to any man of his day:

*Life and Works of Louis Agassiz, by Charles Frederick Holder, LL.D. In the Leaders of Science Series, published by G. P. Putnam & Sons, New York.

"One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward;
Never doubted clouds would break;
Never dreamed, though right was worsted,
Wrong would triumph;
Held we fall to rise again; are baffled to fight better, Sleep to wake."

H. T. G.

"HEROIC HAPPENINGS, TOLD IN VERSE AND STORY." BY Eldridge S. Brooks. Illustrated. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Cloth, pp. 227. Price $4.

The author of this book is also the author of "Historic Boys" and "Historic Girls," and one who knows those two books takes up the new one with anticipations of pleasure. The handsome binding, heavy, good paper, clear print, and many illustrations add to the attractiveness.

Beginning with "The Last Conquistador," a story of Spanish Louisiana in 1810, and ending with a poem on Decoration Day, the book holds some twenty stories and poems that thrill one with their heroism. Most of these are of "ye olden time," but quite as good in their noble lesson for these modern times. "The Boy of Genoa" tells of Columbus in his early years. "On the Deck of the Orient," the true story of Casablanca, gives a much nobler version of the story than does Mrs. Hemans' well-known poem. "Twixt Ebb and Flood" tells of the brave doings of a young Canadian lad in 1689, whereby a whole colony was saved from an attack by the "salvages," and "The Penitence of Origen" holds a lesson for us all.

Mr. Brooks has not chosen all of his stories from those that "ended well," and so does not make success, as the world counts success, a condition of heroism, as young persons are apt to think. The keynote to his thought in the matter is the closing stanza of his poem, "Scævola"—the young Roman who held his hand in the flame to show he had no fear of pain or death, and thereby saved his people:

"Then deem it not a wasted life
When striving seemeth vain;
Hold fast, brave heart, thy nobler part:
Life's loss is oft-times gain.

"For faith, and truth, and trust are strong;
God's fire burns deep, but kills the wrong,
And clears the evil stain.
Rise from the rod,
Proud sons of God,
Kings over death and pain!"

It is ever well to keep high ideals before our young people, and this beautiful "Heroic Happenings" helps to do this in an attractive way, and ought to be widely read. J. S.

The seventeenth year book of the State Reformatory at Elmira, N. Y., just issued, is a volume of intense interest to any one whose attention has been fixed upon the problem of penal legislation. The experiment then being tried, if it can longer be called an experiment, is one of supreme importance. Given such superintendents as Mr. Brockway, such reformatories would certainly succeed, but in the hands of ordinary prison officials many failures would doubtless result.

But this one institution is a great object lesson, and the world will learn much from it as such. From the classes of young men now studying social science in our institutions of learning, at some future time may be evolved the necessary superintendents for the coming reformatories which shall replace the present prisons throughout the land. Such students should make a careful study of these year books. They will find them not only fascinating but inspiring. Present space will not allow of a digest of the interesting facts and figures of this volume, but we may refer to it more at length at another time.

"The First Millennial Faith." By the author of "Not on Calvary." Price 50 cents. Saalfield & Fitch, Publishers, 12 Bible House, New York City.

It is with a strange feeling that a liberal thinker of the nineteenth century reads such a little book as "The First Millennial Faith"—a book which has for its motive the restoration of the doctrine of Christ's atonement that was held during the first thousand years of the existence of Christianity—viz., the personality of Satan, to whom God conceded the right and title to the appellation—the Prince of this World; the appearance of Christ as the champion of the human race, who gave his life as a ransom to save them from the clutches of this arch-fiend.

Such doctrines are so totally at variance with the whole trend of modern thought that we fear that this little volume will meet with quite a limited circulation.

Notes from the Field

ILLINOIS CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES AND CORRECTION.

CHICAGO, April 28, 1893.

The articles of organization of the Illinois Conference of Charities and Correction require the Executive Committee to make, first, a list of the institutions which are members of the conference, and which in the judgment of the committee are entitled to public confidence; and second, to issue certificates of confidence, upon application, to the solicitors of such societies. The conference at its last annual meeting, March 11, ordered the Executive Committee to proceed at once to carry out the provisions of that article. The committee have, therefore, prepared such a list and also a form of certificate of confidence.

The object of this certificate is twofold: First, to prevent imposition by unauthorized individuals soliciting contributions; second, to increase public confidence in authorized agents and reputable and worthy organizations. It has long been felt, and has received frequent utterance at our conferences and elsewhere, that there is an increasing want of confidence in solicitors, that the generous supporters of organized philanthropy stand greatly in need of some safeguard against imposture, and that the plan now offered will afford great relief, as this certificate will be called for by every one appealed to for a contribution, and will, when presented, at once set at rest any misgivings. No charge will be made for these certificates, for which application should be made to the Secretary, 101 Washington street, Room 37, accompanied with adequate references and indorsements.

Chicago.—There has been delay in the preparation of the denominational exhibits at the World's Fair, as well as in the other departments within the Liberal Arts building. The Unitarians were, we believe, the first to have their quarters in order, and the exhibit, so far as received, has been put in place. It will be a point of interest to those within the fellowship as well as to those without. The committee have secured the services of Mrs. Celia P. Woolley as person in charge for the first month, who will dispense hospitality and answer such inquiries as may be made touching the exhibit and the fellowship of churches which it represents. Mrs. Woolley will be assisted by her son, Mr.

Harry Woolley. Credit is due to the builder and contractor, Mr. C. C. Fowler, of All Souls Church, for the personal interest and care which he has given to the building, including the original designs. The little "Parthenon" will not suffer by comparison with the neighboring denominational booths. The English exhibit, which is on the way, is daily looked for. By invoice received, it will contain a full set of the publications of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, photographs of well-known preachers, and other matter of interest.

The newly furnished headquarters have a pleasant and very appropriate addition in the busts which Mr. Sidney H. Morse, the artist, has kindly placed on exhibition there at the suggestion of the Secretary. Some visitors will see his admirable small bust of Emerson for the first time; while the Carlyle and Parker will be new to more. His Parker is considered, by some who knew him well, to be one of the best likenesses of the great Music-Hall preacher. There will also be some later work of Mr. Morse to be seen. A look into his studio shows that he has not been idle these last two or three years.

At the dedication of the Woman's Building, on the opening day of the World's Fair, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, President of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, offered the prayer, having beforehand been asked to do this. It was not so long as that in the opening ceremonies of the Fair, nor was it beforehand set up in type for the evening papers; but we have good assurance that in this matter we are not heard for our "much speaking," as some ancient "heathen" were said to have thought, and as not a few modern Christian preachers would seem to think. We can well believe that both ancient and modern history, as such, are not unknown to the Lord, and that the details of Columbus' voyage of discovery and of the rapid growth of the United States, including Chicago, have come within the range of the all seeing eye. Perhaps the language of public prayer should pass free of remark, so much lying in the spirit rather than the letter; but the prayer in the opening ceremonies of the Fair, as printed in the papers, was not strikingly marked by a non nobis Domine strain.

Mr. Blake and Mr. Fenn exchanged pulpits on last Sunday. On the Sunday before Mr. Milsted exchanged with Mr. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor.

Seattle, Wash.—The meager reports received of the meeting of the "Pacific Northwest Conference of Unitarians, Liberal (Christian and Independent Churches," held at this place May 3-5, tells us that the last word in the above title was added, after full discussion at this meeting, in order to make it possible for the Free Church at Tacoma to work with them. Mr. Chadwick, who was present, was charged with the greetings of that body to the Western Conference now in session.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—Since the resignation of Rev. Mila F. Tupper, April 1, the pulpit of the Unitarian Church has been supplied by various ministers: twice by Rev. George B. Penney, by Rev. George W. Buckley, of Sturgis, and by our Western Secretary, Mr. Hosmer. Rev. John Snyder, of St. Louis, preached on last Sunday.

Abroad—At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall, London, May 25, Rev. Richard A. Armstrong will read a paper upon "Our Relation to the New Orthodoxy," and Rev. Marion Murdoch, now of Manchester New College, will read a paper upon "Women's Work in the Church." Both papers will be followed by a general discussion. On the evening of the same day a conversazione will take place at the Royal Institute of Water Color Painters. On the evening of May 23, Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will give the first "Essex Hall Lecture" on "The Development of Theology as Illustrated in English Poetry from 1780 to 1830." Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, is to preach the annual sermon.

WORLD'S FAIR NOTES.

"Such uncouthness interpreteth? Do not believe it, sir."

That striding, uncouth, amazonian portrayal of Chicago, lustily crying, "I will," seen everywhere in windows and on clocks, the women of Chicago do properly resent. Some of the men say, "Yes, we know, but then—that is Chicago 'getting there.'"

But the women are right, as they are aptest to be in divinations of this sort.

This "Chicago" has no Future. There is no gleam of hope in countenance or form to be a consolation to any soul.

"Getting there?"
Getting where?

Nobody need care.
Only—may she go a long way and stay there.

It is pleasant to remember that the sculptor was not responsible for the design.

Fronting the Administration Building, with McMonnies' fountain between, stands French's Republic, noble and tranquil, serene and modest: competent for loftiest ideals.

The Fountain is, perhaps, the boldest thing on the grounds. Picturesque, with a wild freedom and power that seems to say, "I came from the Alway back of me, and Alway will I abide. For ages and æons have I seen 'the same old human race, the same within, without,' and am satisfied to continue my mad play."

McMonnies can model with a grand sweep of the imagination.

One likes yet to wander, letting the eye that catches things on the wing, as it were, guide him.

Yes, that is Ben Franklin on the Electricity Building, fifteen feet high, by Carl Rohlsmith. Standing there so high, Franklin can almost reach any kite he ever flew. Quite like himself—a realistic old fellow who could serve the Republic in many ways, besides teaching the saving of pennies. Mr. Rohlsmith has original touch and plenty of nerve.

In front of the Administration building is to stand a Columbus, by Miss Lawrence. The praise of it that has arrived in advance of its placement makes one desire to see it.

By the time the Fair is over there will be countless "counterfeit presentments" of the great navigator, and it will be still harder to say which is the most original and base counterfeit of them all.

One new one has been set up down town, near the Auditorium. There must be some merit in it, for the big dailies that have praised so many trashy things are just now criticising it with no let-up or mercy.

Here is a chance for posterity to pass verdict. If it has no other merit, this statue years hence will have an historical interest attaching to it. "It was put up 100 years ago at the time of the great Columbian Fair." Some wag (if wags are then in fashion) may add: "They thought that a great show, didn't they? How the world has jogged on."

There is the old cracked Liberty bell. Pennsylvania has it as a great attraction in her building. Not exactly a work of art, but just a quiet reminder of what the whole Fair means. Once so jubilant, ringing: "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land, to all the inhabitants thereof!" If one should listen with an attent ear he might catch yet other words like these: "Liberty to get, not only inside the gates of a Sunday, but into all the buildings thereof. Why keep the people without with only a 'Wild West' show?" Again: "Liberty not to be swindled at restaurants."

Have you been into the New York? Have you seen her Banqueting Hall? My! but that's a place for the Four Hundred. Magnificent! Yes, but not so cosy when you're weary: so home-like and restful. I'd rather sit me a few minutes by the open fireplace in the Wisconsin than feast my eyes on so much gilt and gorgeousness. But—everybody to his or her taste.

Now, if you have entered the Fine Arts Building, you will find the rooms are being got pretty well in order. It is curious—just the atmosphere as you pass from one nationality to another: Canada, Great Britain, United States, France. You soon, without noticing any inscription or asking a guide, learn to distinguish. England with a certain heaviness but with grand themes, and some thoroughly honest and effective work. France, brilliant, deft, seizing salient points. You noticed it the moment you cross her threshold.

In the rotunda welcoming you are the Dubois statues, "Military Courage," "Charity," and three others.

Space and careful setting: How cool and immortal all seems. The painters of France in the apartments beyond are not so absolutely in the front rank. Yet hereabouts one may "loaf and invite his soul" for a week, and then sigh for a small eternity. If you stray, curious for contrast, into the "United States," you will not be cast down. The painters of America go well to the front. Whistler returns like a prodigal son, only not bringing odors of corn husk and swine's flesh. His fine work he has not brought from afar. It is his own. Out of self he spins style, technique and all.

"Technique!"
How many a soul lies buried under that? S. H. M.

FIRST UP.

A brave little dandelion woke from his nap
And hunted around in the dark for his cap;
"I'm certain," he muttered, "it ought to be here,
In the very same corner I left it last year."
He poked all about in the dirt and the dark
For the same little hat that he wore in the Ark—
For fashions may vary with people and clime,
But dandelions wear the same hats all the time.

"What's o'clock?" And he paused while he counted the fuzz
That had crept through his locks, as old age always does;
Then he settled himself to pluck out the old feathers
That had done so much service in all sorts of weathers.

Rather frowzy he looked getting into his hat,
But he knew that the rains would take care of all that
If he only were up; so he pulled on his boots,
And began to push up from his tough little roots;

Kept pushing, still cheerful, still hopeful, till—push!
He rose to the surface close by the old bush.
With the frost scarcely out and the ground hardly mellow,
Here he is on the top now, the brave little fellow!

The first dandelion! Well may we delight,
And call all the children to see the glad sight!

For of all the bright prophets of hope and of spring,
The golden-crowned dandelion surely is king!

ONLY A LITTLE CHILD.

Only an uninteresting, ragged, dirty little newsboy, one of the hundreds, and it was not until looking into his bright blue eyes that the uninviting appearance of dirty clothes, shrill, thin voice, strained by constant screaming, was forgotten; and one realized this was really a beautiful child.

"Herald?" and a pleading, anxious look in the face seemed to say, "Please buy!" A glance at the bundle of papers under the arm showed fortune was going against the little paper peddler on this stormy night, and one felt impelled to buy of the poor little wail.

Only a few hours later there was an interesting case received into the children's ward of the city hospital. A little newsboy all broken and bandaged lay suffering upon one of the iron cots; and this was the record of the case given by one in charge.

"The little news'y" was a support of a mother who was a drunkard. If the child failed to bring home what money she thought sufficient, she was very abusive. On the night of the storm the child reached his attic to find his mother half-crazed with drink, and in a fury over the small amount of money he brought with him. She took the little human mite in her strong arms and tried to thrust him through the attic window. She succeeded in cutting him badly with the broken glass, but he saved himself from falling to the pavement far below. As he crawled back the same frenzied act was repeated. Again he saved himself; then when he was once more within her reach, she took him and threw him to the floor and jumped upon him. By this time the commotion brought other occupants of the tenement to the spot and they rescued the child and handed the woman over to the police. The child, supposed to be dying, was taken to the hospital. When the physician sat beside him, after he regained consciousness, the doctor had said: "Your mother abused you terribly, didn't she?" The little lad made no reply. The remark was repeated, and the little fellow said:

"Look here, now! don't you say anything against my mother! She'd be all right if it wa'n't for the whisky." And the boy absolutely refused to give any testimony against the miserable creature who so dishonors the name of woman.

What words can paint the heroism of that grand little fellow half so vividly as the simple patience and forgiveness of his attitude toward the fallen one. There is, in the incident from life among the lowly, to me a wonderful lesson. It also gives me a new reverence for childhood. We can learn from these little ones. The soul is in closer communion with the divine before we harden with years in the battle of life.—The Housekeeper.

A BIRD'S SAVING BANK.

In California, the woodpecker stores acorns away, although he never eats them. He bores several holes, differing slightly in size, in the fall of the year, invariably in a pine tree. Then he finds an acorn, which he adjusts to one of the holes prepared for its reception. But he does not eat the acorn; for, as a rule, he is not a vegetarian. His object in storing away the acorns exhibits foresight and knowledge of results more akin to reason than to instinct. The succeeding winter the acorn remains intact, but, becoming saturated, is predisposed to decay, when it is attacked by maggots who seem to delight in this special food. It is then the woodpecker reaps the harvest his wisdom has provided, at a time when, the ground being covered with snow, he would experience a difficulty otherwise in obtaining suitable or palatable food. It is a subject of speculation why the redwood cedar or the sugar-pine is invariably selected. It is not probable that the insect the woodpecker is so fond of is found only on the outside of two trees; but true it is that in Calaveras, Mariposa, and other districts of California, trees of this kind may be frequently seen covered all over their trunks with acorns, when there is not an oak-tree within several miles.—The Examiner.

LITTLE KINDNESSES.

Hurrying howeward one night were two roughly dressed masons, tin pails in hand, jabbering noisily. They had purchased some apples at a street corner, and were fast grinding them between their teeth. They soon overtook an old man in working clothes. He was weary with hod-carrying, his step was not as firm as the sturdy men who passed him, and he answered their greeting, "Ah, boys, you are too young and spry to take my pace, I reckon?" "Yes, Bill, we are in a hurry for supper." Thrusting his hand into his pocket, he threw an apple to him, saying, "Here, take this, 'twill cheer ye till ye get home." The act cheered him. The expression on his face showed that, and I fancied his step was a little firmer. It was a little act, but a thoughtful and timely one.—Selected.

DEAR little Grace at the window stood
Watching that winter night
The great round moon in the far blue sky
Where it shone so big and bright,
Till a cloud swept over its shining face.
Then she turned with a little pout:
"I wanted to look at the moon," she said,
"But somebody's blowed it out!"

—Wide Awake.

ESSENTIALS OF CHARACTER.

XI.

USEFULNESS.

"Usefulness is the measure of the value of all that we have, and all that we do."

MAKE USEFULNESS THE TEST. We should continually apply to the things which we possess, and to the things we do, the test of usefulness. Many times the thoughtless deed that hurts somebody would be left undone if the doer had stopped to think: "What is the value of this to myself or to others?" Let children begin early to apply this test. And not only test their actions but begin to think of useful things that they may do for others.

Boys and girls are apt to think that their time of usefulness is by and by, when they are grown up, and it hardly ever occurs to them that even the smallest of them can be useful now. Everyone desires to be of some use in the world. What, then, can children do that will make them useful to others? Let us look for the places where little children and larger boys and girls can be helpful.

IN THE HOME. Let us begin at home, where all that is best in our lives begins. There the smallest child in the Sunday school may be very helpful if he will only think to stop teasing for what he is told he ought not to have; if he will try to be very quiet when some one has a headache and wants to rest; if he will gather up all his playthings when he is through with them, and put them out of other people's way; if he will think not to scatter his food on the floor; if he will think always to put his cap in the proper place; if he will think not to interrupt older people when they are busy. Then as he grows older he can be useful by caring for younger children, putting away clothing, bringing slippers, papers, books, saving father and mother many steps, and sometimes earning money by the work he does. Let the class discuss the things that they have done or can do at home.

IN THE SCHOOL-ROOM. Boys and girls are apt to think that in the school-room they are simply to receive and not to give; but the best work can be done only in that school where all help. The teacher alone cannot maintain the best order, the pupils must help to do that for themselves. Then if the teacher is relieved from the work of maintaining order she can do much more for the pupils in other ways. By prompt obedience, by attention to lessons, and by kindness and courtesy boys and girls can be useful in making school life a great deal better for themselves and their teachers.

THE PLAYGROUND, too, is a place to be useful. You think that is the place for fun, not for usefulness? Well, then, be useful by making it full of the best of fun for every one. Do not make your fun at the expense of another boy's hardship. Do not play at games that hurt the smaller or weaker ones. If you bring kindness and thoughtfulness to the playground you may be useful to all there and at the same time enjoy yourself more than the selfish and thoughtless do.

Do not be ashamed of doing the smallest thing that is helpful to others. The opportunities for great usefulness come rarely, but the smaller things are always at hand, and he who does them constantly is of great usefulness; and sometimes when the great opportunity comes it is only the one who has trained himself in the little things that have come before who is master of the situation. Be kind, be true, be faithful to all who have any claim upon you. Do not miss the smallest chance to do a favor to those who need your help, and you cannot fail to become useful men and women, and of such the world has great need.

H. C. McDOUGAL.

EVERY discovery which shows us that our world is vaster in space and older in time than we thought puts the Creator of this world farther off without diminishing His greatness; the progress of knowledge forces us every day to lengthen the chain of causes before arriving at the First Cause. Humanity becomes long-sighted as it grows older; Renan will have left it a little more so than he found it. The object looked at has changed neither its dimensions nor its position because the sight of the eye has been modified so as to place it at a greater distance.—Revue des Deux Mondes.

"I was glad to hear the other day that Higginson and Brown were gone to Ktaadn; it must be so much better to go to than a Woman's Rights or Abolition Convention; better still, to the delectable, primitive mounts within you, which you have dreamed of from your youth up, and seen, perhaps, in the horizon, but never climbed."

"HAPPY the man who observes the heavenly and terrestrial law in proportion; whose every faculty, from the soles of his feet to the crown of his head, obeys the law of its level; who neither stoops nor goes on tip-toe, but lives a balanced life, acceptable to nature and to God."

"If for a moment we make way with our petty selves, wish no ill to anything, apprehend no ill, cease to be but as the crystal which reflects a ray—what shall we not reflect! what a universe will appear crystallized and radiant around us!"—Thoreau.

"WHEN we are weary with travel we lay down our load and rest by the wayside. So, when we are weary with the burden of life, why do we not lay down this load of falsehoods which we have volunteered to sustain, and be refreshed as never mortal was? Let the beautiful laws prevail. Let us not weary ourselves by resisting them."—Thoreau.

"AND how does Charlie like going to school?" kindly inquired the good man of the 6-year-old boy, who was waiting with a tin can in his hand the advent of another boy. "I like goin' well enough," replied the embryo statesman, ingenuously, "but I don't like stayin' after I get there."

Rivers—How are you getting along with that little pamphlet of yours on "How to See the World's Fair in a Week?" Banks (wiping the perspiration from his face)—I've thrown it aside, Rivers, and I'm working now on a big book entitled "How to Get a Glimpse of the World's Fair in Six Months."

TWO MEN discussing the wonders of modern science. Said one: "Look at astronomy, now. Men have learned the distances to the stars and have even found out the substance they are made of." "Yes," said the other, "but the strangest of all to me is how they have found out all their names."

A POOR Irishman, passing through a village near Chester, Pa., saw a crowd approaching, which made him inquire what was the matter. He was answered, "A man is going to be buried." "Oh," replied he, "I'll stop to see that, for we carry them in the old country."

The origin of man's tools, language, law, God, prayer, heaven, priests and temples is outlined and discussed. Arranged in twenty-two lessons.

21. In the Home. By W. C. Gannett. 15 cents each; $1.25 per doz.

These lessons follow No. 20 for the last part of the same school year. They are designed to teach a child's duties toward others of the household.

HORRORS OF DYSPEPSIA

Mr. J. L. MONTGOMERY,

Ex-Clerk Circuit Court, and Editor "Democrat," Marshall, Ill.

Suffered as only a Dyspeptic can Suffer.

Had given up all Hope of ever being Cured.

NOW EATS THREE MEALS A DAY,

THE RESULT OF TAKING

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

The strongest recommendation this wonderful medicine has, comes from those who have been cured by taking it. Read what Mr. MONTGOMERY says:—

"I was raised on a farm, and was, up to six years ago, always used to manual labor, and plenty of fresh air. At that time, however, I changed my occupation, went into an office, and it was but a little while after that when my appetite almost wholly disappeared. My digestion was not good, and I had given up hope of ever being cured. For two years I suffered untold pain and agony, such as only a dyspeptic can suffer. At last I began to take Ayer's Sarsaparilla for this complaint, and by the time I had used six bottles I was as well as ever. The cure was most effectual. I can now eat my three meals a day, sleep soundly, and am never bothered with symptoms of dyspepsia. Ayer's Sarsaparilla indeed cures. It cured me, and if anyone will take it according to directions, it will cure him. I believe that this medicine will cure the most aggravated or chronic case of dyspepsia or indigestion on record, and I can recommend it most heartily and confidently to all who will use it."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Cures others, will cure you

22. The Ethics of School Life. By Juniata Stafford. 15 cents; $1.25 per doz.

Designed to occupy the concluding part of the second year in the six years' course. Treats of the relations of the school and the home; of vacation rights and duties, of books and good reading. Twelve lessons. Adapted to all ages.

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward. And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes canvassed. FOR the sixteenth time we offer to our readers the annual Western Conference number of UNITY. It has been our custom from the beginning to turn over one issue of our paper to the officials of the Western Conference and associate organizations, that they may present to their constituencies the annual reports of their officers, and such other gleanings from the proceedings of the anniversary week as space permits. Owing to the exceptional pressure and distractions of the week, caused by the many meetings of the multiform Woman Congress, running parallel with the meetings at Unity Church, in the Art Palace, it was found impossible to present in worthy shape the reports in the regular weekly issue of last week. And so at a late moment it was found necessary to combine two weeks' issue in one. Hence we present this double number, which represents a Conference that, in attendance, spirit and outcome, must become historic in the history of religious progress and freedom; meetings that must delight and encourage the readers of UNITY. Next week the editor will again be on the tripod, and, from time to time, he will try to prolong some of the helpful notes sounded, and conserve some of the vital energy generated at these meetings. Meanwhile, we commend to our readers, casual and regular, the cause which UNITY represents—the cause of Liberal religion on its working as well as thinking side. And we commend to you UNITY itself. It awaits your endorsement of its last adventure. It solicits your subscription and co-operation. It offers to make its weekly visit throughout the year for one-third the price of the standard religious weeklies. Can we have a movement along the whole line?

THE report of the Treasurer of the W. U. C. showed thirty-eight churches entitled to be represented by delegates at the annual meetings—this number having contributed to the support of the Conference the past year. The report of the Committee on Credentials showed thirty churches thus represented, which should be added to the State conferences. But there were attendants from other churches also, including several ministers. Of the latter some were from other fellowships, and were taking their first inside view of the Conference. The impressions of at least one of these might be quoted to the credit of the Conference.

* *

THE Wednesday evening meeting of the Western Conference was prophetic both in the topic discussed and the personality of those taking part. One minister, two college professors, the lecturer of the Ethical Society, and Miss Addams, of the Hull House, the unordained minister of the uneclesiastical church of human helpfulness that is to be. Mr. Gould's paper will see the light in our columns eventually. Professor Laughlin's rebuke to the indifference of ministers to the facts related to the social and economic questions of the day, Prof. Hale's plea for thorough training for the ministry, Mr. Mangasarian's illuminating words as to the essential intimacy between religion and all the interests of life, and Miss Addams' clear sense, penetrating insight, and frank criticism must all go unreported. They must be entrusted to the safe keeping of the minds that heard them and the lives that were impressed by them.

THE Western Conference has heretofore welcomed not a few wise men and women from the East, who have added interest to the programs of its annual meetings. We were glad again to welcome John W. Chadwick and to give a first welcome to Charles F. Dole. Mr. Dole's contribution to the Conference delighted everybody. His presentation of the Free Church in "Texas City" was picture-like in its clearness and charm. We have never listened to an address more illustrative of "sweet reasonableness." Henceforth "Texas City" will be a real place to those who heard the address, and it will be Mr. Dole's Texas City. Its people will be the people he told us about. Their Free Church, and how they came to have it, will furnish suggestion and hint for other places. After all, human nature is marvelously like.

THE contribution in the "Church-Door Pulpit" in our last issue, entitled "Two Great Themes," was wrongly credited in our table of contents to W. C. G. instead of to J. H. West, to whom the high thoughts belonged. Our readers are always glad to hear from either.

KERSEY FELL, of Bloomington, is a name familiar to those who have labored in connection with the Western and Illinois Unitarian Conferences. For many years he remained the first and only President of the latter organization; and now, in the ripeness of a serene old age, he has gone to his rest and his reward. The benedictions of a loyal, loving life fall upon us who remain. His faithfulness increases our faith. When such veterans as Fathers Fell and Benneson, mentioned elsewhere, are mustered out we turn wistfully to the younger men and ask, Who will step into the vacant place?

WE give the following note deserved place in our editorial columns and join in the tribute therein paid:

"DEAR UNITY: I wish to record friendship's tribute to the memory of Mr. Robert S. Benneson, who left us last Sunday morning, the 14th inst. Though venerable in years, yet vigorous in mind and youthful in spirits, his departure was unexpected, his illness brief and painless. Trustfully and serenely as he had lived, with no fear of death, he passed into the Beyond. A warm-hearted, faithful friend; truly the minister's friend; truly the friend of the Church. He was one of the pioneers of this city—one of the founders of the Unitarian Church here. His sunny courage and helpfulness have supported it through the vicissitudes and emergencies of its more than fifty years; his love for it and fidelity to it have never failed. He was an ardent friend of the cause of Liberal Religion here at the West, ever interested in its progress, ever ready to give generous aid to its work. His cheery, hopeful spirit, his genial presence, his helpful hand, will be missed. His love and the memory of his faithfulness brighten the hour of our bereavement.

THE CONFERENCE OF 1893.

The thirty-ninth annual meeting of the Western Unitarian Conference has passed into history. That word "thirty-ninth" carries significance in the story of any Western movement or organization. It means a rootedness and organic life which only time can give. Never before had an annual meeting to compete with such rival attractions, offered not only by the World's Fair but also by the Women's Congress—a series of meetings of marked significance and commanding interest throughout the week. Many women prominent in our Western Unitarian fellowship, not to speak of their sisters from the East, were upon the program of the Congress. In view of these facts the Conference attendance was good, and at some of the sessions unusually large. The delegate attendance was exceptionally large. The combination of interests brought the more friends to the meetings at Unity Church, if it also took them away for parts of the time.

It is not our purpose to speak here of the thought values of the several sessions, but rather of the general spirit pervading them. That spirit was, all in all, one of earnestness and good comradeship. It was understood beforehand that there would be a discussion in regard to the effect of the so-called supplementary resolution of last year upon the open basis of the Conference. Such a discussion was made necessary by letters received the past year from certain subscribers to the Endowment Fund, which letters the Board of Directors had referred to the Conference for answer. It was also wise, by reason of the fact that there has existed a difference of view, both within and without the Conference, as to the real significance of the resolution of last year. In the program, by instruction of the Directors, a time had been assigned for the consideration of the letters from subscribers to the Endowment Fund; and the whole program was so arranged as to leave time for a free exchange of views in regard to the supplementary resolution, to the end that the Conference might take such action as should seem to it best. The discussion of these related matters came into three separate sessions of the Conference, and occupied, altogether, several hours; but under the circumstances it was time well spent. The final outcome will be seen in the resolution recorded in the general report of the assistant secretary. The Conference by a practically unanimous vote (there was but one dissenting voice, and that on other grounds than want of sympathy with the open fellowship expressed in the resolution) put its own interpretation upon the resolution of last year, and that interpretation will henceforth have authority and vindicate the continued non-creedal position of the Conference. The unanimity with which the Conference expressed itself was doubtless due to the growing mutual understanding of those who have been looked upon as representing divergent tendencies of thought. There was manifest no air of triumph or of defeat. The various angles of view seemed at last to bring in full vision the action finally taken as the right thing to do. The discussion was earnest and dignified in the main, and courtesy was not forgotten in the earnestness of debate. All in all, the Western Conference seems now in condition for more united and efficient work than ever before.

The resolution in regard to the autonomy of our churches, and reaffirming the purpose of the Conference, as expressed in its Constitution, "to be the promotion of the welfare and work of the several societies that compose it," was readily passed without dissent, as was to be expected of a group of churches wherein the free congregational polity has been one of the most cherished traditions.

In speaking of the spirit of the meetings one cannot leave unmentioned the attentive hospitality of the ladies of Unity Church. The lunches so bountifully served each day not only refreshed the outward life but were opportunities of inward joy and satisfaction in the renewal of old acquaintance and the making of new. This breaking of bread together carried a benediction of its own.

THE THOUGHT OF THE CONFERENCE.

"With broader view, comes loftier goal."

There was no ecclesiasticism in this Conference, yet it was the most ecclesiastical conference, in a broad sense, that we have had. The borders of the church that is to be, the conditions of the new church, the principles of the free church, were the themes of the most striking papers, and this was the vital theme in the minds of those who listened.

From the standpoint of the speakers there was a glance at the crumbling creeds of the excluding sects, and at the masses of the unchurched who have ceased to care whether there be any church at all. Doubtless we expect too much from both these quarters. The exclusive spirit finds too much to enjoy in the select company of its chosen fellowships, to be willing for a long time yet to "open the gates on Sunday," or any day; to throw down its barriers for the unlabeled multitudes to pass over at pleasure. On the other hand, the masses love their unchartered freedom, and its full enjoyment in their thought does not lie in the direction of altars and shrines and sermons. As Miss Addams said, preaching tires them. What if the people's church should destroy the preacher's vocation? Some think it will. What matter? Something better takes its place. No one believes that religion will be eradicated from the nature of man.

We have scholars among us, but most of the papers were free from any suggestion of erudition. There were no exegetical essays. There were allusions to the literature of the Bible and to the doctrine of inspiration, but its pages were not cited as a proof of truth or as any authority for belief. Not the special or supernatural in religion are we seeking, but the natural and universal. Jesus is mentioned as symbol, or type, or example; but no longer as master or Lord. Prayers and benedictions are no longer made valid by closing "in his name." Jesus was a man of men, but no mediator or substitute for any rejection of or offense against God.

The thought of the whole series of meetings, business or literary, was large and forward-looking. The conclusion was strong that if the pulpit and the ministry are to hold their place and influence, it must raise, not lower, their requirements. Nothing short of the highest standard and the best attainments can enable the minister to meet the demands and cope with the great questions of the time. L.

WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

Address of D. L. Shorey at the Opening of the Western Unitarian Conference, May 17, 1893.

DEAR FRIENDS: The church which Robert Collyer founded, and to which he gave the flower of his life, is a fit place for the meeting of this Conference. His benignant influence abides here, and will long abide, surviving the fateful changes of time.

The duties of the President of the Conference, as I know from long experience, are light. The great work is done by our ministers in their several parishes; and especially by the Secretary, who is by far the most important executive officer in the Conference. I shall not anticipate his interesting report, which will be read to you in a few minutes.

We meet this morning, as we and our predecessors have met in our May meeting for forty years, to greet old friends and new, and to consider how the high purposes of the Unitarian movement in the West, so far as it is intrusted to our counsel and guidance, may be best promoted.

The object of the Conference, as declared in the charter which constitutes its fundamental law, is "The transaction of business pertaining to the general interests of the societies connected with the Conference." As a corporate body the Conference has a right to pass by-laws not inconsistent with its charter. Such by-laws continue in operation through successive years and until they are modified or repealed. No resolution of the Conference has such continuing operation. As an expression of the aggregate opinion of different minds with differing intellectual habits, powers and acquisitions, at the best, it can only serve, or be intended to serve, a temporary purpose. The claim that any resolution of a former session expressing an opinion doctrinal, religious or ethical, is binding on the Conference, individually or collectively, ought not to have any support in a Unitarian body.

The societies referred to in the charter, and which this Conference represents, are Unitarian churches and other associations in affiliation with such churches. Each conference annually renewed, as a delegate body, has to determine in the spirit of its charter how it can best promote the interests of the several societies it represents.

I think we all recognize the feeling of comradeship that these annual meetings have generally tended to foster. If there have been any unhappy exceptions, I venture to express the hope that the time has now come for a revival of the fraternal feeling which is needed to unite and impel the Unitarian movement in the West.

We have no new method to seek—we have only to logically follow the method of free examination transmitted to us by Unitarian ancestors in the faith that enlightened reason leads to all the truth that man can know.

The high themes that you will discuss and hear discussed at this Conference will tend to sympathy of feeling, harmony of opinion, unity of action, and to a higher ideal of life in all the parishes to which you will return, and in the communities of which they are a part.

It is a mistake to suppose that Unitarians do not desire to have, and do not, in fact, have, as much real harmony of opinion as is to be found in any of the creed-bound churches.

I invite you to a free discussion of all the questions that may arise at this session of the Conference, and to that frank and honest exchange of opinion which, like fair trading, benefits all the parties to the exchange. I invite you especially to the consideration of those larger questions which, outrunning denominational lines, concern the well-being of the entire community. Such question was considered at our last annual session in the resolution recommending an open Fair on Sunday during the World's Columbian Exposition. It was fitting that this Conference at that session, in view of the approaching reunion of the great religious bodies of the world in "The World's Congress Auxiliary," should earnestly and unanimously declare itself in favor of an open Fair on Sunday. Christian hospitality could not do less, and I venture to say as a question of law, morals and religion that the resolution was entirely right. Jackson Park had been purchased and improved by means of equal taxation and dedicated to the common use and enjoyment of the people forever. For many years it has been the custom of a large part of the people, and especially those who live in crowded apartments in crowded streets, singly and in family groups, to spend their Sundays during the heated term in the open park by the cool lake. To most of them it was their only opportunity to get any summer outing whatever. Nothing could be more innocent than those Sunday gatherings in the park, where, under elevating influences, order and decency prevailed without a fault. The same classes of people, who have heretofore visited the park on Sunday for the same prudential reasons, would continue to visit the exhibition on the same days. Most of them cannot afford to take the time from their week day employment to see the Exposition. Any one may verify this statement by talking with the first group of mechanics or laborers he meets.

The General Assembly went to the limits of discretion when it authorized the Park Commissioners to divert this park temporarily to the uses of the Columbian Exposition. The people, doubtless, have cheerfully acquiesced in that diversion to the extent necessary for the uses of the Exposition and no further. The closing of the park on Sunday is not only not necessary to the uses of the Exposition, but detrimental thereto. Leaving out of view the question of revenue as affected by the closing of the Fair on Sunday, such closing impairs its most important educational influence to the extent that it deprives a large part of the people of their best, and to many their only, opportunity to study the exhibits.

The closing of the Exhibition on Sundays is, in my opinion, as illegal as it is unwise, ungenerous and unjust. The United States does not own a foot of land in Jackson Park, and for the purpose in question has absolutely no jurisdiction whatever. Sunday legislation, so far as it is valid at all, is exclusively a question for State legislation. Of course it follows that if Congress cannot make a valid law on the subject, it cannot give to a national commission, a creature of Congress, the power to make a rule having the force of law in Jackson Park, or anywhere else in the State of Illinois. The rule of the National Commission, then, closing the Exhibition on Sundays, is void. It does not appear that any damage can arise, legal or otherwise, from violating this void condition in regard to the closing of the Fair on Sunday. Yet the action of the Illinois directors yesterday in voting to return to the General Government on demand the money received will meet the approval of all lovers of good faith.

The resolution of this Conference in favor of an open Fair on Sunday, has, I understand, not only the support of all the liberal churches in this country, but also that of the representative men in many other great religious bodies who think that the cause of religion is not well served by the injustice of closing the Fair, and that it would be better served by keeping it open as parks, libraries and art galleries are kept open on Sundays from Boston to San Francisco.

Report of the Secretary, F. L. Hosmer.
To the Western Unitarian Conference—
Fellow-workers and Friends:

The Report which I herewith submit covers the period from Sept. 1, when I began my work as Secretary, to May 1, with which date we have been accustomed to close our financial year. Though it is a report of but eight months, it will be understood that these are the most active months in our working year. Let me speak first of my

WORK IN THE FIELD.

From the entrance upon my office I have aimed to answer all calls made upon me, whether from individual churches or from the local conferences. It has been my steadfast policy, so far as lay in my power, to bring the Headquarters into increasingly active and helpful relationship with the entire constituency of the Conference. I have regretfully declined several calls upon my services, both from local conferences and individual churches, by reason of my inability to be in two places at once. In spite of this human limitation, however, I am able to report in these eight months thirty-five Sunday services which I have wholly conducted, besides some half-dozen in which I have taken part. I have also preached ten times on week-days, have given four evening lectures, have participated in five State conferences, three "religious councils," two church dedications, five installations and ordinations, and, in connection with these and other occasions, have made some twenty addresses, not to speak of such small contributions to the common fund of discussion as I have been able to make while in attendance upon our religious gatherings. When I add that this service has been scattered over a field reaching from Cleveland to Sioux City, and from Alton to Duluth, you will readily comprehend the distances traveled by night and by day, and the cost of passage involved, even when the latter is halved by the courtesies of the railroad companies to the minister in the discharge of his professional duties. I am glad to say, however, that our Treasurer's report will show that this cost, in round figures $300, has been about balanced by the money which has been paid your Secretary in the supply of pulpits. Only four Sundays during these eight months has he been simply a listener in the congregation, and but two week-days, when in Chicago, has he been absent from the central office; and one of these was a local holiday, and on the other he was out upon business connected with the Conference. His has comprised his part in such hospitality as belongs to the place, together with those personal consultations and that wider correspondence which are parts of his official duty. This correspondence, whose involved labor escapes representation by postage-stamp statistics, has been with church committees, with students in our theological schools at home and abroad, with unemployed ministers desiring pulpits, and others seeking a change of field, and, in some seven or eight instances, with ministers in other fellowships looking toward enlistment in our own. It is one of the unpleasant features of the office that the conditions of the field and the smallness of our means have compelled me, as I fear, to seem sometimes indifferent to applications and inquiries thus made; but those who understand the situation will not so judge me. I have conscientiously abstained from assurance and even encouragement which I felt were likely to end in disappointment for journeys undertaken and money spent. Perhaps with a smaller bump of caution I should have acted more wisely, and—perhaps not! In respect of our free churches, of whatever name, this wide Western field is not "ripe for the harvest," multitudinous representations at our denominational conventions to the contrary, notwithstanding. It is only ready for the planting; and those who would plant must come equipped with something of spiritual insight and constructive power, with an earnest and steadfast purpose, and with patience to endure. For such there is a success to be vindicated at last, though its realization may seem long delayed. The influence of wise and faithful work in the early stages of a movement abides, like a root that reaches to hidden water-courses. There is an out-of-sight period in the story of every finally strong and permanent organization—a laying of foundations, without which no structure can long stand. Nothing, it seems to me, is more deceptive, and therefore more to be taken for the little it is worth, than the touch-and-go reports of new movements that at best are still tentative, catalogued as if they were established churches, to swell the figures of our denominational extension. Such representations captivate the audiences at our denominational dress-parades, but they do not mislead those who know the difficulty of all pioneer work. There is a wide difference between organizing churches and establishing churches—a difference indeed as wide as that between the spiritual education of men and the listing of names in an ordinary revival movement. No church is really established until it stands in its own strength, financially and otherwise, with reasonable assurance of continuance under another ministry when its present leader passes from it. It has often seemed to me that it would be well if in our year-books there were some indication by which mission stations, denominationally aided churches, and wholly self-supporting churches should be readily distinguished. This would, at a glance, give a truer expression of our collective strength throughout the field, and of the actual gains made from year to year, and would have, I am sure, in many ways a wholesome effect.

NEW LEASE OF HEADQUARTERS.

In view of the fact that our lease of the present headquarters was to expire May 1, the question of re-leasing the same or removing to some more advantageous place was discussed at the February meeting of the Directors. Mr. Van Inwagen and your secretary were appointed a committee to investigate and make report. After careful investigation the committee, at a subsequent meeting called for the purpose, reported in favor of retaining the present quarters, as on the whole better adapted to our needs than any to be obtained at like rental. These could be released for two years at the slight advance of $5 a month. The committee also recommended for Conference use the appropriation of the room thitherto sub-rented to Charles H. Kerr & Company, in view of the already crowded space for the different departments of our central office, not to speak of the desirability of more commodious quarters for the reception of guests during the World's Fair. Happily this arrangement gave no disappointment to Mr. Kerr, whose business had outgrown the space once adequate to his need, and who already was contemplating a change of location. The report of the committee was adopted by the Board. The Secretary urged the renovation of the headquarters, suggesting that contributions therefor be solicited from Chicago friends. Mrs. Celia P. Woolley was appointed in charge of this matter, with privilege to associate with her one from each of our local churches. To these ladies, among whom should be specially mentioned Mrs. E. A. West, we owe the greatly improved looks of the central office; to them and to the friends whose contributions, above $200 altogether, made the improvement possible. We shall now be able to make our Western office a bureau of information and an attractive place of rendezvous for such friends and strangers as shall avail themselves of our ready hospitality. We shall be especially glad during these months of the World's Fair to welcome friends within the various folds of liberal faith, of whatsoever name, for whom the motto of our Conference seal, Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion, holds an ideal to cherish and strive for. Such accommodation and service as our rooms afford are freely offered to all such while in the city. The office will be found open daily, excepting Sunday, from 8 o'clock in the morning until 5 o'clock in the afternoon. In the absence of the secretaries the office-boy will be in attendance.

To turn again to the general field. Short as is the period covered by this report, it has been marked by

CHANGES WITHIN THE CONFERENCE limits probably unprecedented in number during the same length of time. S. A. Eliot has left Denver (if we may include this point within the field) for Brooklyn, N. Y. We have lost, to New England's gain, H. C. MacDougal from Madison, L. R. Daniels from Big Rapids, Mich., Enoch Powell from Topeka, and O. J. Fairfield from the movement at Youngstown, O., to which he had come equipped with scholarly preparation and a devout spirit. We have not lost, I need not remind you, S. M. Crothers to New England, though we shall continue to lend him now and then to Boston, as heretofore. U. G. B. Pierce and wife (both ordained ministers) have been obliged to leave their brief but promising ministry at Decorah, Ia., for a climate less trying to his health. This, fortunately for that congregation, has been found in Pomona, Cal. Though still happily within the Conference limits, H. D.

Stevens has resigned at Menomonie, Wis., and taken charge of the new movement at Perry, Ia.; Mrs. Wilkes has left her excellent work at Luverne, with the more kindly air of the Pacific coast in view, but could not find it in her heart to resist the appeal of the earnest little band at St. Anthony Park, Minn., where she has tarried to labor through these months; Miss Tucker has withdrawn from the joint parish of Midland and Mt. Pleasant, Mich.; Lloyd Skinner has left Lincoln, Neb., for Eau Claire, Wis.; W. F. Place has exchanged Arcadia, Wis., for Decorah, Iowa; V. P. Brown has retired from the pulpit at Buda, Ill., which is now supplied on Sunday afternoons by J. O. M. Hewitt, of Sheffield, while pastoral service is still rendered by the minister emeritus, Father Covel, who ranks us all in years and the deserved regard they have brought. G. B. Penny has resigned at Geneva, S. B. Loomis at Monmouth, Mila F. Tupper at Grand Rapids, and C. F. Niles at West Superior, though we hold them yet with us. G. H. Rice has left Marietta, Ohio.

To balance our loss of those who have gone from the Conference limits, we have welcomed F. C. Southworth from the Cambridge Divinity School to Duluth; George H. Clare to Madison; F. W. N. Hugenholtz, Jr., to Hillside, Wis.; C. E. Perkins to Iowa City; L. H. Soughton, to Baraboo; W. M. Backus to Alton; J. H. Mueller to Bloomington; M. W. Chunn to Luverne and Rock Rapids; F. M. Aunks to Sherwood and Athens, Mich.; and F. E. Matlock to Miner, Minn. Of these the last four have come to us from the (orthodox) Congregationalist ministry, and Mr. Backus from the Universalist. Unity Church, Cleveland, awaits from across the sea the return of Marion Murdoch and Florence Buck to begin in September the work to which they have been called. C. H. Rogers has organized an "All Souls' Church" at Arkansas City, Kan., with promise of continued growth. The "People's Association" of Princeton, Ill., while not enrolled in our Conference list, has always been to us as one of our own family, and we rejoice with it in the coming of its young minister, G. W. Skilling, at whose ordination and installation in December your Secretary gave the right hand of fellowship. The "People's Church" of Peoria, recently organized by R. B. Marsh, formerly of the Universalist church of that city, though not identified with us formally, is not apart from us in spirit, and deserves our recognition as a new movement of the free congregational polity that is the cherished tradition of our Unitarian fellowship.

I have spoken of the ministerial changes within our Conference limits during the eight months covered by my report—and the extension of the eight months to the past year would keep the proportion—as probably unprecedented in number during an equal period. Whether this fact is due to mere chance coincidence and has no special significance, or is indicative of insidious influences at work, weakening the mutual ties that bind the minister and his congregation, I leave to your judgment, who are equally interested with myself in our Western fellowship and its work. The fact is at least suggestive, and deserves careful thought. We all of us agree, I doubt not, in the general principle that however the case may be in the more strongly organized ecclesiastical bodies, in our scattered independent congregations short pastorates do not make for stability and strength. No man can do his best—unless that best is a rather shallow best—in any pastorate until he comes to know the people he would minister to and the character and needs of the community at large. Till then he must waste more or less force in experiment. And no congregation can take in the real merit and helpfulness of any pulpit appeal—no matter how simple, provided only it be sincere and touch the things of daily life and conduct—apart from some close knowledge of and confidence in the life that stands behind that appeal and is its best commentary and interpreter. Personality is more than pulpit pyrotechnics. I doubt if the latter ever really saved a soul, in the gospel sense or any other. But life, individual and collective, has been steadily lifted by what the great apostle, with characteristic modesty, called the "foolishness of preaching," when backed by recognized worth of character and the daily walk among men. To his help or his hindrance the preacher is himself half of every real sermon he preaches; and this half only a growing knowledge of the man in the community can supply. We may well deprecate, therefore, any tendency to the hasty forming and the easy breaking of these relations of minister and people, and look with alarm upon any influences at work among us to this end. Under our free congregationalism such influences can have no other effect than to weaken our ministry and disintegrate the churches.

I have said that it has been my policy, so far as lay in my power, to bring the Headquarters into increasingly active and helpful relationship with the entire constituency of the Conference. And this leads me to speak in my Report of a principle or view which many of you most experienced in our Western field will share with me, and which has been

A STEADILY GROWING CONVICTION with me for years. When our Western Conference first opened a central office here in Chicago, with such modest functions as it was able then to assume, it was a wise leading, born of the consciousness of growing power and prophetic of larger things. The increasing frequency of our annual meetings in the city, until we came by tacit expectation and consent to hold such meetings regularly in Chicago, marked the growing sense of organic life and a constituency naturally grouped about a common center. For several years this center of growing organic life was the naturally accepted channel of communication and missionary work by the older and stronger Unitarian organization in the East, with its endowment funds and its annual receipts from the churches of the fellowship for missionary purposes. There was felt some difference of atmosphere, and there was at times mutual criticism; but this was natural under the circumstances, and it was probably beneficial all round, and made for the outward and inward growth of the general fellowship, and of those principles and ideas whose development and spread that fellowship existed to promote. With whatever friction there was at times, there was coming to be, beneath it all, the recognition of natural geographical centers and a growing sense of allied forces working from these. Of the change that has taken place, and of the alleged reasons for that change, I have neither time nor the wish to speak in this connection; still less have I the wish, now or at any time, to speak with any unkindness of action honestly, if unwisely, taken. But I do wish to say, now and here, speaking with such claim as twenty years of active service and some study of the problems in this Western field may have entitled me to, that there can be no worse mistake on the part of the American Unitarian Association than to ignore, instead of contributing to develop, these great local centers that become Bostons to the new growths of our Unitarian movement in the newer New-Englands of the West, and to attempt a policy of holding scattered churches in direct connection with a remote and never-visited office, rather than with those nearer points which are the natural centers of religious life and thought, as they are also of social and commercial life to the region about them. Federation, not centralization, belongs to the genius of free congregationalism; and this should be the large policy of the Unitarian movement in this country, if ever that movement is to become national and really American.

And in this connection I have a word to say which concerns us of the West. The responsibility for tendencies and conditions to which I have just referred, lies in no small measure at our own doors. It may be better for our action if we see it wholly there. Our Western churches are not awake to the opportunities of the field about them and the demands of the hour. They are not taking vigorously in hand the work given them to do and which they of all can best do. Our associated policy, if it have conscious direction enough to be dignified with that name, is feeble and inefficient. Even our stronger churches in numbers, financial ability, and social influence, seem more like moons than suns, shining by a sort of reflected denominational light rather than with the kindling illumination of central fires. The provincial spirit is upon too much of our church life and associated action. Why, for example, to speak plainly, but in all courtesy and kindness, why should the four churches here in Chicago, the metropolis of this great Northern Mississippi Valley, with its business energy, its growing intellectual life, its accumulating wealth, art, educational interests, collect and send money to Boston to be sent back to them again for missionary work at their very doors? Is there not something provincial in this? And why this circumlocution office, when, as we all well know, the more direct the contact in all philanthropic and educational activity, the more is enthusiasm kindled and that activity enlarged. And what I say of this center is in proportion true of other great cities of the West; of St. Louis, of St. Paul and Minneapolis, of Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit and elsewhere. Sometime the men and women in our pews will ask themselves these questions, and they will apply the same methods and show the same energy, self-reliance and practical judgment in religious matters which they use in their business affairs. Then there will come a new era in our Western church life and its development. The Unitarian movement will not be represented by one building alone, and that at the extreme East where the movement began a full century ago; but there will be federated centers, kindred activities housed and homed and with a generous and efficient local support.

But it will be said: Do not the Eastern churches through the American Unitarian Association send more money to this Western field than is received in return from it? Yes; many fold more. Is not the balance greatly in their favor, then? In this respect, yes again. But I am talking now not of amounts and balances. I am talking of methods, and of methods in the best carrying-on of work that we all desire to promote, both East and West. I take it that this is the spirit which prompts the contributions of our Eastern churches, and not simply to maintain any one particular method or policy, or to vindicate the supremacy of any organization. And I do believe that the methods largely existing in our Western field to-day are not calculated to develop self-reliance in our weaker churches, or the sense of direct personal responsibility in our stronger churches, without which our growth can be only spasmodic and along no definite lines. Not until the Western churches take in hand, more directly than now, the work that properly belongs to them, will that work be done with efficiency. When this work is so taken in hand, there will come thousands in money where now there come lagging hundreds; for the responsibility will quicken conscious power. Let us keep in fellowship touch with the Association that has done so much and will continue to do much in promoting a higher Christianity and a more rational religion both East and West. Let us contribute a moiety to it in token of that fellowship and in recognition of that service. Let us maintain delegate representation in it. But let us have our own treasury; for he who gives his purse to another, cripples his self-direction and comes short of his proper accomplishment. The spirit of dependence is not the spirit of power.

I cannot close my report without a word, if you will allow me, in regard to the feeling during the past year among some within and without our Conference concerning the passage of the so-called supplementary resolution at the last annual meeting. My own vote was cast against that resolution. But I ascribed to those who voted differently the same honesty of motive that I claimed for myself; and I accepted the action of the majority as the expression of that conference, and in spirit and purpose contemplating no narrowing of our basis either of fellowship or associated work. Otherwise I could not have taken the office to which our Board of Directors unanimously invited me in their autograph letter. I am glad to say to-day that I have yet to see any instance or intimation that my interpretation was a mistaken one. My personal sympathies and position have been well known and understood; yet by none, I may add here, have I been more cordially welcomed and supported the past year than by those who were identified with the passage of the resolution referred to. But we are a band of brothers and sisters in a cause in which we are all at heart one. We create our atmosphere, below and above all formal resolutions, by the spirit we show and the work we do; and that atmosphere, and not our resolutions, will in the long run draw or repel. All conscious attempts to set up fences, as the records of the past show, have resulted not in keeping the vulgar from coming in, but in sending the saints out. And because we are at heart one, I hope at this conference we can say the word all together that shall ease honest scruples of conscience, heal all hurts, and give us the sense of togetherness, with faces forward and hand in hand. To this matter your attention will be called during these sessions.

I recall that first morning in September when I entered upon my office and received installation in the welcome of my predecessor, Mr. Effinger, whose spirit through the years of his secretaryship has made it both easier and harder for another to follow him. I desire personally, and as your Secretary, to recognize here the services of Mrs. Marion H. Perkins, of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, who has been largely the caretaker at our headquarters, and in my frequent absences afield has received friends and answered inquiries for both Conferences. I wish also to express my appreciation of the confidence and co-operation shown me in these past months by brother (and sister) ministers and by our churches in the work I have tried with them to do. The circumstances under which I was prevailed upon to take the secretaryship are well known to the Board of Directors. Had I not come to the office from a fourteen-years pastorate reluctantly laid down for needed rest, or had the work been less a strain than in some ways I have felt it to be, I might feel it my duty to serve you longer as Secretary, if so desired. But I feel it necessary to withdraw my name as a candidate for re-election, and this I now do; though I shall gladly complete my year of service if this be the wish of the Conference.

MYRON LEONARD, Treas.

Proceedings of the Thirty-ninth Annual Session of the Western Unitarian Conference.

The meetings were all held in Unity Church. Rev. S. M. Crothers preached the opening sermon before the Conference, on Tuesday evening, May 16, taking for his subject "Three Types of Religion." The sermon will be found in full in the Conference number of UNITY.

The business session of Wednesday morning opened at 10 o'clock with the address of President Shorey. Rev. L. A. Harvey, of Des Moines, was chosen assistant secretary. Secretary Hosmer then read his annual report. This was followed by the annual report of the treasurer, Myron Leonard. The latter showed a deficit of $184 for the year, which sum was promptly raised, Mr. E. S. Rowse, of St. Louis, leading off with $50. The report upon the Endowment Fund showed that, of the $26,000 subscribed, about $20,000 has been paid either in cash or notes, and yields an income. By the terms of the subscription the contributions are payable by May 1, 1894.

Rev. T. B. Forbush, Western Superintendent of the A. U. A., reported for the work in his field. He reported six new churches organized within the limits of the Conference, six or seven missions started, fifty churches and twenty missions aided by the A. U. A. It has been a year of strengthening churches already established; the new churches therefore were comparatively few. He emphasized the fact that the association seeks to stimulate the local churches and develop local centers. Its policy, so far as possible, is to do its work through the State conferences. The informal reports of the different State conferences, announced upon the program, were passed by, the hour having arrived for the paper upon "The Free Church, and What It Will Cost," by Rev. C. F. Dole, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.

The following resolution, brought eastward by Mr. Chadwick, was read by Secretary Hosmer:

Resolved, That the Pacific Northwest Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian and Independent Churches, in session at Seattle, Wash., send by the hand of the Rev. John W. Chadwick, to the Western Unitarian Conference soon to meet in Chicago, greeting of fellowship and sympathy in the work of extending liberal religious thought, and promoting the kingdom of heaven among men.

This greeting from the farther West was received with manifest pleasure. Mr. Chadwick, in a brief word upon the Pacific Northwest Conference, whose recent session he attended, stated that the words, "and Independent Churches," had been added to the name to include the Tacoma Church, and organizations and societies in general sympathy with this Conference, though not bearing the Unitarian name.

Moved, that the President appoint the usual committee, for which time was asked, to report at the afternoon session.

The Conference then listened to Mr. Dole's address. It was given without notes, but it is hoped that it may be written out for publication. It was a picture-like and persuasive treatment of the subject, and charmed all who heard it. A recess of one hour was taken for lunch, served by the ladies of the church in the parlors below.

At 2 o'clock President Shorey called the Conference to order and announced the following committees: On Credentials, Joseph H. Hosmer, H. T. Root; on Business, W. W. Fenn, E. S. Rowse, C. H. S. Mixer, J. D. Ludden, Mary A. Safford, Mrs. E. A. West. The discussion of Mr. Dole's paper, and of the general questions involved, was led by those appointed upon the program: Revs. Dr. H. W. Thomas, John W. Chadwick and Arthur M. Judy. Various speakers followed, including Messrs. Hugenholtz, Crothers, Forbush, Fenn, and Mangasarian.

The Committee on Credentials reported thirty churches represented, besides the State conferences.

At 4:20 Mr. Fenn, Chairman of the Business Committee, stated that as the hour had arrived for taking up the "special business" marked upon the program, he would read the resolution offered by A. W. Gould. It was the purpose of this resolution to remove the misunderstandings which the passage of the supplementary resolution of last May had caused. He thought, however, that the remonstrance from All Souls Church, Chicago, which the directors had been informed would be presented, should first be read. Dr. Shears, of All Souls Church, stated that that church had no remonstrance to present. The remonstrance came from subscribers to the Endowment Fund. It was voted to hear this remonstrance, which was presented by Miss Louise M. Dunning. It set forth the fact that many subscribers to the fund felt that the supplementary resolution so far changed the basis of fellowship that they ought not to give further installments until the Conference stood again clearly where, in the judgment of the contributors, it stood when the pledges were given. Some felt further that the money already given on the basis of the Cincinnati resolution could not rightfully be retained when that basis was modified, as to them it now seemed. The remonstrance was courteous and dignified in tone.

The Conference then moved to consider the resolution prepared by Mr. Gould, which read as follows:

Resolved, That we hail the approaching congress of religions as a great step toward the recognition of that kinship which unites all religions into one vast family; and that we rejoice at the increasing signs that men are outgrowing their old dogmatic divisions, and coming to see that religion is something which transcends all names; and that we hold the name of "Unitarian" in no narrower sense than as marking part of a world-wide movement toward a clearer conception and larger recognition of the fundamental unity underlying all religion, and the inalienable right of all human beings to freedom of thought in religion; and that we renew our welcome to all who wish to join us in our labors, limiting our fellowship and our work by no lines of doctrinal belief.

Mr. Gould said that as a Conference we had been misunderstood by our friends, and it behooved us to remove that misunderstanding.

Mr. Judy moved to amend the resolution by adding the following preamble: "WHEREAS, It has been understood by some persons that the supplementary resolution of 1892 limits our fellowship by a doctrinal test, therefore, be it resolved." A motion to lay this amendment on the table was lost. It was moved (by Mr. Judy) that the following be substituted for the resolution of Mr. Gould, namely, the foregoing preamble: "WHEREAS, etc." followed by "Resolved, That we renew our welcome to all who wish to join us in our labors, limiting our fellowship and our work by no lines of doctrinal belief." This was laid upon the table. Adjourned.

The evening session was one of marked interest. It opened with a paper by A. W. Gould upon "The Relation of the Pulpit to the Social and Economic Questions of the Day." This was followed by a discussion of the general subject by Professor Laughlin and Professor Hale, of the Chicago University; Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, and Mr. Mangasarian, of the Ethical Culture Society. All these were announced upon the program.

The devotional meeting on Thursday morning was conducted by Elinor E. Gordon and Mrs. E. T. Wilkes. The Sunday-school Society occupied the time until 12 o'clock according to the program. The Conference then went into business session. Arthur M. Judy was first given the floor. If ever there was a time in the history of the Western Conference, he said earnestly, when the best in our natures should assert itself, that time was now. E. S. Rowse, of St. Louis, moved that Mr. Judy's resolution of yesterday be taken from the table. Mr. Crothers moved as a substitute for Mr. Judy's resolution:

WHEREAS, A number of the subscribers to the Endowment Fund of the Western Conference have presented a remonstrance to the Conference, in which they protest against what they consider the narrowing of the basis of the Conference, brought about by the passage of the so-called supplementary resolution in May, 1892, therefore,

Resolved, That the attention of the remonstrants be called to the fact that the Conference has no power, except by amendment to its articles of incorporation, to change its basis expressly stated in its Constitution; namely, the particular object of the Western Unitarian Conference shall be the transaction of business pertaining to the general interests of the societies connected with the Conference.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the subscriptions have been made under the stress of peculiar circumstances, and inasmuch as there have been misapprehensions in regard to the power of the Conference to determine the basis of its work and fellowship by majority vote at its annual meeting, the Conference hereby instructs the Board of Directors to authorize the Treasurer to release any subscribers who state in writing their desire to be released from any legal obligations they may have incurred by their subscriptions.

Mr. Crothers was followed by W. C. Gannett and others. An intermission of one hour was taken for lunch.

The Conference came together at two o'clock. Several spoke upon the substitute of Mr. Crothers, including J. L. Jones, E. A. West, L. J. Duncan, H. T. Root, and others. Mr. Crothers was given leave to withdraw the second part of his resolution, in order that each part might be voted upon separately. After further debate, in which several participated, Mr. Crothers was asked to withdraw the first part of his resolution, in order that a vote might first be taken upon that of Mr. Judy. This courtesy was shown, and the resolution of Mr. Judy was passed with but one dissenting vote. The following resolution was offered by Mr. Crothers, the same being a modified form of one presented by Mr. Duncan, and adopted: "Resolved, That the Western Unitarian Conference, maintaining the principles of congregational autonomy, reaffirms its purpose to be the promotion of the welfare and work of the several societies that compose it."

The Business Committee presented the following nominations: President, Hon. D. L. Shorey; Secretary, F. L. Hosmer; Treasurer (Mr. Leonard having declined re-election), James Van Inwagen; Directors for three years, T. G. Milsted, J. V. Blake, S. M. Crothers, W. C. Gannett, J. C. Learned, D. L. Shorey, Mrs. Anna B. McMahon. The nominations were confirmed by the Conference. Mr. Hosmer had withdrawn his name as a candidate, but he stood ready to complete his official year (Sept. 1), and the matter of the secretaryship was referred beyond this to the Board of Directors. By a rising vote the Conference expressed its thanks to the ladies of Unity Church for their generous hospitality. Adjourned.

The service in the evening was a fitting close to a conference marked by earnest thought and renewed fellowship. The sermon of Mr. Chadwick on "The Wandering Jew" was characteristic of this poet-preacher, in its range of thought, its broad sympathies and its literary charm.

LEON A. HARVEY,
Assistant Secretary.

WOMEN'S WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

MAY 16, 1893.

For the second time your present secretary brings you her annual report. A year ago she had several new things to say. There was in the first place a rearranging of the working force, whereby the services of two secretaries were made available—one for continuous service, and the other for a portion only of the time. It was the first year in which our new venture of "Religious Councils" had been tried. There were those and other new interests to report a year ago. For the year just closing the work has been essentially the same in outline and direction as the previous one. The office work has been a little more exacting than at first—more correspondence having been the result of our various activities. The Postoffice Mission work will be reported by our Postoffice Mission Secretary, who has had a busy and profitable year. The Loan Library has not been used as much as formerly—not as much as its value demands. The study classes of the past winter, having been engaged for most of the time on topics outside of denominational lines, have not found on our shelves the reference books required.

The plan made at the beginning of the season regarding "Religious Councils" was not carried out as fully as proposed. Both in the city and at distant points the activities centering in Columbian clubs, where preparations for intelligent observation of the Fair were making demands on the time, pushed aside for the time being, in a few cases, the "Council." This is as it should be. It will prove time well spent.

Our first council for the year was held in Decorah, Iowa, and was one long to be remembered as an especially happy season. Mr. Hosmer and Mr. Forbush gave their time and strength to this meeting. Mrs. Wilkinson and Mrs. Mary Newberry Adams told of the many wise and profitable labors of the Women's Auxiliary toward forming the Congress just (this week) inaugurated. To Mrs. Florence Lounsbury Pierce is due the credit of making our Decorah meeting the success it was. The one shadow on our visit was the inevitable separation of the pastor and his wife from the friends they had made in their brief sojourn in Decorah.

Athens, Mich., was the second place to entertain us, and in spite of March weather, Mr. Hosmer, Mr. Aunks, and Miss Tupper made their own promises good and also filled the places of those who were detained. The Sherwood dedication followed immediately and was a most delightful day. This in turn was succeeded by a council of one day at Sturgis. Mr. Forbush arrived in time to take part in this last session, but Mr. Jones and Mr. Fenn were detained by sickness. By the time that a busy and tired quartette of ministers had completed this itinerary they were in doubt as to whether they were circuit riders or Unitarian divines. The President and Secretary have been present at all of these councils.

Much work has come to the headquarters growing out of the World's Fair activities. The latest work of this kind accomplished by our conference is the joint meeting of the National Alliance of Unitarian and other Christian women and the Women's Western Unitarian Conference. The programme is completed, is published, and on Friday of this week in Hall III. of the Memorial Art Palace we will bring you the fruits of our joint labor. We offer you such a list of speakers as must insure a large attendance.

Some work is still to be planned for the September meeting. When that is accomplished we will have completed a year of unusual and exacting labors. It is believed that these labors will have abundant and profitable results.

With a wealth of topics and speakers inviting us to the congress every day this week, with the present riches pressing and crowding on every hand, with the question always presenting itself—which speaker shall I hear, which forego?—can I turn your thoughts for one moment away from the present to the prospects of the coming year? My word will be from the Treasurer's standpoint. We have kept financially a very even pace with last year. Our cash received varies only slightly from the last report, our expenditures very nearly the same.

Last year's generosity has helped us to this creditable showing. We come again with all our debts paid and a balance in the treasury. This balance is what is troubling me. It is small, and, from the point of view of prudence, is most comforting to report. An individual who has no reserve fund we condemn as a spendthrift. An organization aiming to be a missionary body, it seems, ought to keep this reserve at a minimum. We asked you last year to make your contributions reach one thousand dollars. Our appeal was answered generously, but did not reach the mark set. I fear we are not good beggars, but if you could be made to see as we can what beautiful and helpful things we might do with two or three hundred dollars more in the treasury, I feel sure that you would not leave this building until you had passed along some of that "unearned increment" to those less favored than yourselves. If our contributions increase yearly even by small additions we will by and by reach the point we are aiming at now. But by that time, if we are true to our traditions, our stake will have been moved forward and still forward, so that the "unreached ideal" will still lead us on.

Let us hope that your zeal may realize these expectations.

MARION H. PERKINS, Sec.

Report of Postoffice Mission.

Again the claims of the workers in the field of the Postoffice Mission are presented for your consideration, and it is with renewed faith and hope for future usefulness that the following reports are given.

Father Brown is still at his post in Lawrence, Kan., and says: "I have distributed 10,200 tracts and sermons, and under the miscellaneous head are several on civil service reform and temperance, including the excellent tract, 'Don't Smoke,' by Rev. A. A. Livermore. This ought to have a wide circulation. The sermon on 'Temperance,' by Rev. Brooke Herford, has done good service. Nearly four-fifths of the papers, tracts, etc., have been sent to people in Kansas. I have paid nothing during the year for advertising; my work has advertised itself. Having lived in Kansas more than thirty-six years, and knowing personally a great many of its citizens, I have never been at a loss as to whom I should send papers, etc., selected from my large assortment. Of the good seed I have sown, doubtless some has fallen by the wayside, some been sown on stony ground, some among thorns and briars; yet some, I think the greater part, has been sown on good grounds and yielded a manifold harvest. The religious literature which has been furnished me gratuitously by the A.

U. A. and W. W. U. C., and by many individuals interested in the cause of our Postoffice Mission, has been distributed with care and discrimination; I have never sent away a sermon without fully knowing its contents, or without considering its adaptation to the mental, moral and spiritual wants of the person to whom I sent it. Let me, in conclusion, say to all the friends of the Postoffice Mission that I hope to continue my work through another year. In order to do this I must be furnished with means as ample as those of the past year. The friends of the Postoffice Mission are many and well able to sustain it. They can and must increase its usefulness and efficiency year by year. Having now no funds on hand to begin another year's work, I hope for a quick and generous response. As the years pass this mission work grows upon my hands; it also cheers my heart; it affords me a sphere of action and useful labor which I am reluctant to give up."

From Assonet, Mass., comes word of 573 tracts and sermons distributed, 105 papers, 8 books and 4 subscriptions to UNITY. The work has cost $14.46, and $25 being received from correspondents.

At Cleveland, Ohio, Mrs. Johnson has fifty enrolled correspondents, and has sent about 2,684 tracts; $27.63 has been spent and $12.96 received from those benefited. Mrs. Johnson tells us that in the four years of her work she has had but two reports of the literature not being satisfactory and helpful.

Sixteen names are on Miss Gould's books at Davenport, Iowa, and 2,121 tracts and sermons and 341 papers have been distributed; $62.89 the amount expended, $22.88 received from correspondents, $59 from other sources. As to organizing and spreading, Miss Gould suggests "cooperation of P. O. M. Secretaries. Special meetings for discussion at the Conference."

Mrs. Savage, of Evansville, Wis., sends to thirty-nine people and has distributed 808 sermons and tracts and 72 papers. With State advertising the year's work has cost $30.48; contribution of $50 from a correspondent. The Register is regularly sent to four people, one book lent and two given.

Mrs. Kellogg writes from Fay, Kansas: "I have found it impossible to add to my work even the mite keeping the records would make. The good Father knows, those who have been helped through my efforts know, will it matter if the figures cannot be given? Besides the distinctly Unitarian publications, I have used Youth's Companion, Union Signal, Humanity and Health, Wives and Daughters, and The Christian at Work regularly, and have received between $1 and $2 from parishioners."

Mrs. Miller, of Geneseo, Illinois, has thirty names on her list, and the sermons sent number 618, the papers 1,178. Work has cost $93.85, and $34.50 contributed by correspondents, many of whom write of being helped by the literature. Forty books have been given away. Miss Carr, at Geneva, Ill., has distributed about 300 sermons and papers, the receivers in turn doing their best to circulate them "where they cannot fail to liberalize people and make them think." Miss Long also has two parishioners, and writes: "At present I am more interested in Mr Jones' practical sermons that have been coming out in UNITY, especially the one on 'Tobacco.' I hope much from it as an influence on those whose great desire is to uplift humanity."

Mrs. Warren presides over the mission at Hinsdale, and reports about 536 tracts and 85 papers sent, work costing $3.61.

Mrs. Williams at Kalamazoo, has twenty-six parishioners; $4 has been spent, and $1 received from correspondent. Miss French at Kenosha, has sent 80 tracts, mostly "Unity Missions," and Mr. Savage's sermons, besides 256 papers; $5.30 spent; $4 received.

Twenty-eight names enrolled at Marshfield, Wis.; received from Mrs. Heywood, 255 sermons and 49 papers; cost of work being $5.30.

Miss Pervier, of Mineral, Ill., writes: "I almost dread to make out a report of my work, because it is so small as to be scarcely worthy of notice, but yet not too small to be done, for if only one life was enlarged or lifted there would be no estimating the good done. I know many have been helped greatly. Souls have been fed, hearts have been rested, and brains been set to work. I do not know that many Unitarians have been made, though a few have become enthusiastic ones. I have no sympathy with this desire to 'let go' because large results are not attained. If we could only make people feel that soul culture is a paying business there would be no temptation to let go. Besides that included in the report I have mailed six copies of Powell's 'Liberty and Life,' two of 'Evolution and Immortality,' one 'Faith That Makes Faithful.'" The first is very popular, the latter is a gem."

Miss Hilton, at Riverside, Ill., thinks "shorter tracts are needed, more simple and direct, with more arousing and strength-giving qualities, more aim to help rather than so much to instruct." Miss Hilton also says, "Organize P. O. M. workers and parishioners into a society to meet annually, with the W. W. U. C. to give experiences, compare what is being done for the broad cause and to have a strong, encouraging, social time."

Mrs. Crossman, at Rochester, N. Y., sends regularly to twenty-five parishioners and uses more of Mr. Gannett's and Mr. Savage's sermons than others; $12.63 spent and $1.59 received.

Mrs. Partridge guides the mission at St. Anthony Park, Minn. She would suggest that ministers influence their churches to feel the duty of helping this branch of church work.

The six earnest workers at St. Louis, Mo., are responsible for 389 readers, to whom they have sent literature to the extent of 10,759. Some advertising is done, and $77.16 spent in furthering the work. Correspondents have contributed $4.50, and gladly pass on to others the material so helpful to them. Mrs. Keyser continues her work in the city; has carried to the hospitals 1,544 sermons and magazines. Miss Waters, the present secretary, thinks the best way to spread the mission is to advertise early in the year in weekly papers of a large circulation and give a postoffice box and number for the address, rather than the name of a secretary; it inspires more confidence and will call forth more applications from business men and women.

Sioux Falls, S. D., and Toledo, Ohio, have faithful leaders and circulate considerable literature.

Mr. Wimbish, of St. Paul, Minn., gives attention to 130 friends, has sent 6,013 sermons and papers, spent $82.46, and received $7.18, and has lent, perhaps, 15 books. A large number of his correspondents write of the great help the liberal literature has been to them, and gladly pass it on.

Aberdeen, S. Dak., Alton, Ill., Baraboo, Wis., are all centers of work. Mr. Covell, of Buda, Ill., writes: "Of course the fruit will be to individual souls; may never show itself in clubs, circles, churches, but it will get into the great life currents of the world and accomplish its destiny."

A friend sends the following extract from the letter of an orthodox minister: "I fully indorse all that the Unitarians believe and teach, and am favorably impressed by their liberality and tolerance with others of differing faith. I fully realize the need of a church that will embrace all true Christians, with the Christian character and morality as the only test of membership, regardless of individual views."

Miss Dunning, Secretary at All Souls, Chicago, has a list of forty-nine names, to whom she has sent 133 sermons and papers.

The Third Church has since February done mission work. Miss Marshall, Secretary of the Branch Alliance, reports lending a hand to twelve people; Mr. Savage's and Mr. Blake's sermons sent and several copies of Register and UNITY. No advertising has been done, and the expense has been 85 cents for postage. Miss Finch, Chairman of the Publishing Committee, sent 824 of Mr. Blake's sermons to other workers. Individuals have distributed UNITY, Register, and 375 tracts and sermons. We are permitted to note the following in reference to the benefit derived from Mr. Blake's sermons: "I found much satisfaction and delight in reading that 'Happiness from Thoughts' and 'Natural Religion.' The series, 'Religion and the Bible,' 'What Is Religion?' 'Religion and Ethics,' all contained answers to questions that have at some time or other arisen in my mind."

At Headquarters the correspondence is mostly with the workers at various points, but there are about thirty to whom we send sermons and miscellaneous literature. Three hundred and two letters have been written and 290 received. The committee at Unity Church, Boston, have, with their usual generosity, given us 600 copies of Mr. Savage's sermons. Mr. Chadwick's people have also most cordially contributed from 400 to 500 copies as we desired. Ten copies of "Every Other Sunday" are sent to our younger friends, and one little lad in Dakota writes us how much he likes it, and after reading he carries it to his cousin that she, too, may enjoy it.

We have been very much interested in the labors of a friend in a neighboring State, who has been patiently trying to help her townspeople to a larger life. In her last letter she wrote: "We have a sermon read three Sunday evenings in succession and the fourth have a 'Song Service.' I labored hard to secure this last, but finally succeeded, and now all enjoy it. We open with a song, then a chapter in the bible; all repeat the Lord's prayer, another song, then a poem (quite an innovation, I assure you), another song, another poem, or some reading, and so on. I feel quite elated that they have at last become convinced that it is not actually sinful to read a beautiful poem upon Sunday evening. A few weeks ago I read Mr. Jones' sermon, 'Faithfulness.' After the service one lady, a strict Baptist, amused me exceedingly by saying: 'If you read many more sermons like that I am afraid you will make me a Unitarian.' Everyone liked that sermon. Somehow Mr. Jones has a way of appealing directly to one's personality, and even people of poorest education can understand him." There was left from last year $15.79 of the money Mr. Gannett gave for Unity Mission and Short Tracts, and 94 cents of the money for postage; so up to date the account stands:

Proceedings of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference.

The twelfth annual meeting of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference was opened Tuesday morning at 9:30 by a devotional meeting led by Mrs. Mary McDowell, of Toronto. The address of the President, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, was followed by that of the Secretary and Treasurer, Mrs. Marion H. Perkins. The Secretary's report showed a good year's work, and the Treasurer reported a satisfactory balance in the treasury. Following these came reports from the various branches, Chicago being reported by Mrs. H. H. Badger, and St. Louis by Mrs. Waters. Both branches were in a flourishing condition, and reported good work accomplished in the study classes.

Fraternal greetings and statements of work accomplished were made by Mrs. Fifield for the National Alliance, by Mrs. R. H. Davis for the New York League, and by Mrs. B. Ward Dix, President of the Alliance, who suggested a plan of co-operative work in keeping lists of Postoffice Mission correspondents.

A report of the Religious Council held at Decorah, Iowa, was read by Mrs. E. A. Holway, and was full of suggestion as to the value of the meeting.

Mrs. S. C. L. Jones spoke of the brave, self-denying work being done on the prairies of Dakota by Rev. Helen G. Putnam, and moved that $50 be sent from the treasury of the Women's Conference to assist in the work she is doing. Carried.

The nominating committee reported for officers and directors for the coming year the following names:

President, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, Moline; Vice President, Mrs. J. C. Learned, St. Louis; Secretary and Treasurer, Mrs. Marion H. Perkins, Chicago; Secretary Postoffice Mission, Mrs. B. C. Reed, Chicago.

Directors—to May, 1896: Miss S. A. Brown, Lawrence, Kan.; Mrs. B. C. Reed, Chicago; Mrs. R. E. Damon, St. Louis, Mo.; Mrs. M. S. Savage, Evansville, Wis.; Mrs. V. Richardson, Princeton, Ill.; Mrs. I. G.

Temple, Hinsdale; Mrs. E. A. West, Chicago.

To fill vacancies for one year, Mrs. F. G. Howe, Chicago, and Mrs. E. E. Woodman, St. Paul; the Religious Study Class Committee, the P. O. Mission, and Literature Committee to continue the same as last year.

Miss Tupper reported a union of Liberal women from St. Paul and vicinity as doing a grand work.

After the noon adjournment for lunch the afternoon session was opened by a brief address from Miss Hultin, who called upon Mr. Hosmer to speak his word as to the value of the religious councils, he having been present at several of them. He felt them to be a great help to those who were otherwise deprived of church services. He found the appreciation of the people almost pathetic. In doing this work, he said, one must realize that they were seed-sowing, without much hope of immediate harvest. The printed word was good and valuable, but the living voice has its own especial and pre-eminent value. All religious work, he said, is a work of faith.

After the annual subscriptions were called for and partially collected, the special literary part of the programme was taken up. This consisted of a paper upon the subject, "The Effect of Liberal Thought Upon the Character and Work of Women," by Mila F. Tupper, which was supplemented by discussion of sub-topics, "Its Effect Upon the Happiness of Women," "Upon the Devotional Spirit of Women," and "Upon Her Practical Activities," by, respectively, Mrs. Woolley, Mrs. Gibb, and Mrs. Gannett. The papers were all valuable and entertaining. The concluding exercise was a poem from Mrs. Alice Williams Brotherton, so full of beauty as to form a fitting close to a most inspiring day.

SOPHIA H. BADGER.

THE WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

Address of Rev. A. W. Gould, President of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society.

For twenty years the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society has been doing what it could to help the world in the right direction. It has been a pioneer in its way. It has been the first to introduce into its service the great thoughts and inspiring sayings that are to be found outside of the Bible as well as in it. Mr. Blake's Sunday-school services have gone forth on a fruitful mission. And it is deemed wise to prepare a new and improved edition. To improve it thoroughly will require about five hundred dollars. Nearly half of that sum has already been subscribed by three or four schools, which simply advance the money they would pay for the new work. When a sufficient number of schools have signified their willingness to enter into this arrangement the work will be republished and sent forth on a new career of usefulness.

Another pioneer work is the six years' course. It was a large and novel conception. The schools have taken more and more interest in it each year. The first year lay in absolutely untrodden ways, and the second, though touched by modern scholarship, had not yet been reduced to a suitable form for Sunday-school work. The third year has been finished, and we are now entering upon the fourth. Mr. Fenn, of the Church of the Messiah, has kindly consented to prepare that subject—"The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion"—and to conduct the Sunday-school Institute during the first two weeks of August in Unity Hall, near the gates of the World's Fair. We hope larger numbers than ever of our teachers will come to the institute this year, combining it with the Fair.

The Sunday school does not make money by its publications. Its income is wholly from the gifts of the Sunday schools and from the dues of its annual and life members. The number of schools contributing is steadily increasing, and the amount is also increasing. But not all the schools who use our books are helping us to pay our Secretary and the rent of our headquarters. We have made both ends meet this last year; but we have not been able to issue the first year's work of our six years' course in permanent form, owing to lack of the necessary funds. Therefore, while acknowledging the generosity of the many schools which has made our existence possible, we would urge upon the other schools to also do their share. And we would urge all Sunday-school workers to help us by letting us know of any topics or methods that they find useful, that we may impart them to all the schools. It is our object to make this society a sort of distributing center. The best thoughts shall be gathered here from the few who are able to give us the best, and then they shall be sent forth to all our schools. But such a distributing center can exist only when having a generous support, both intellectual and financial.

Proceedings of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL MEETING, MAY 18, 1893.

President A. W. Gould of Hinsdale, in his opening address, set forth the present condition of the society and the hopes of things to be accomplished during the coming year. The first volume of the "Six Years' Course on Beginnings," now nearly ready for the press, will be published in time for the opening of Sunday schools in the fall, it is hoped. But even more important than the publication of this book was considered the amending and enlarging of the "Sunday-school Service Book." A revision and extension of both services and songs have been in contemplation for some time, and Mr. Blake has already begun the work of revising. On recommendation of the Nominating Committee, Miss E. E. Gordon Chairman, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: A. W. Gould President, Ellen T. Leonard Vice President, Marion H. Perkins Secretary and Treasurer; Directors, for three years, W. C. Gannett, Rochester; Mrs. Ellen T. Leonard, Chicago, Mrs. Geo. Patten, Geneva; Samuel Sewell, St. Paul.

The special program, the symposium called "A Sunday-school Experience Meeting," was the literary feature of the meeting. The papers, as many as could be obtained, will be printed in this or succeeding numbers of UNITY.

The hour was so full of good things that could not, for lack of time, be discussed that the listeners went away from the meeting disappointed on account of its brevity.

Pledges were given for the purchase of at least five hundred copies of the new service book when it shall be ready for sale.

M. H. PERKINS, Secretary.

THIS somewhat paradoxical theory upon which the officers of the Auxiliary Congresses have been working was abundantly vindicated during Conference week, viz: the more meetings there are to be attended at the same time the more people will there be in attendance at each one of them. While the attendance at the Western Conference was creditable all the way through, the two dozen or more Halls and Committee rooms in the Art Building were crowded to the full by the various Women Congresses in session. For once the reportorial power of the great blanket-sheet dailies was wholly inadequate, and great meetings with brilliant speakers went by each day without a mention in the columns of the Chicago dailies next morning. If this is true of these papers, the limitations of our little weekly will be accepted by our readers with more patience. To our readers the joint meetings of the Unitarian Women organization of the East, West and far West, held under the auspices of the Woman's Congress, in the Art Palace, Friday forenoon and evening, were of great interest. But, we cannot speak of it in this number except to say that it nobly justified itself, both in its program and its attendance. The audiences would have delighted similar meetings at the biennial session of the National Conference at Saratoga in numbers. In diversity of attendance, intellectual alertness, curiosity, and unpremeditated enthusiasm, it far exceeded such a meeting. At another time we may be able to speak more in detail of these meetings.

Church-Door Pulpit

THREE TYPES OF RELIGION.

THE CONFERENCE SERMON, BY S. M. CROTHERS.

Hebrews X., 11. "Every priest, indeed, standeth day by day ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices.

Psalms XL., 7-9.

Then said I, Lo, I come:
In the volume of the book it is written of me,
I delight to do thy will, O my God;
Yea, thy law is written in my heart.
I have preached righteousness in the great congregation;

Lo, I will not refrain my lips,
O Lord, thou knowest.

Ecclesiastes VII., 25. "Then I turned about, and my heart was set to know, and to search out, and to seek wisdom, and the reason of things."

Most of our judgments in matters of religion are impaired by our imperfect classification. We accept sectarian divisions as final, and are confused by superficial resemblances and differences. We must learn a lesson from the man of science. He finds that he is able to make progress only when he gives up the artificial for the natural classification. He ignores what may seem most important to the untrained eye, and seeks what is truly characteristic.

In like manner, when we consider religion as a great elemental force, an ineradicable impulse in human nature, we see certain types persisting through all changes of creed.

The first type is that of the priest. We see the priest at the very dawn of history, and whether we turn to the book of Genesis or to the pages of Homer, we find the same characteristics which belong to him to-day. The priest is the guardian of the sacred things. To him all times and places are not alike; his piety is not shocked by the thought of vast spaces where God is not. It is enough for him that in one place the Divine glory shines. Thither he turns with solemn anticipation. What if the universe be profane, and life a brutal battle, so long as the sanctuary is inviolate. He looks abroad and sees evil triumphant; gross darkness is over the world. All the more beautiful by contrast is the holy place. Whether it be the holy mountain which the desert wanderer worships from afar, or the holy stone; or the holy tree, symbol of everlasting life; or the temple built by pious hands; each must have its priest. He is the sworn servant of the sanctities, and would give his life to protect them from any defiling touch.

It is characteristic of the priest that he loves repetition. The rhythmic chant is the natural expression of his emotion. The restless thinker is ever seeking for a new idea, and is never so glad as when he feels the thrill of discovery, but there is a sacred monotony dear to the priestly heart. He never tires of a familiar refrain. He loves to tell "the old, old story," which becomes more sweet with all the associations which it gathers to itself. We often talk slightingly of dead and empty forms, as if thereby we described the liturgical element in worship. Ah, but to the true priest, and to those who come under his influence, the words so often repeated are not dead but are all alive.

Shakspeare, who interpreted the thoughts of all men, entered into the priest's mind. The priest repeats himself, as does the true lover, because "love alters not."

What's new to speak, what new to register,

That may express my love or thy dear merit?

Nothing. * * * But yet, like prayers divine,

I must each day say o'er the very same; Counting no old thing old, thou mine,

I thine,
Even as when first I hallowed thy fair name,

So that eternal love in love's fresh case Weighs not the dust and injury of age.

Only by recognizing this changeless loyalty of love can we do justice to the conservatism of priesthoods. Students of civilization tell us that the cult survives the creed. Words and forms remain long after their original meanings have been forgotten. But the new meanings may be as vital as the old; and the new faith may make noble use of the old shrines. The epistle to the Hebrews finely touches upon the characteristic love of the priest for repetition when it says: "Every priest standeth day by day, ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices." The writer illuminates another point when he says: "Every priest has compassion on the ignorant and erring." We know the charm which the priestly service has for people of the finest culture, for the priest cares for the beautiful and knows the influence of music and architecture; but he touches even more intimately the other extreme of society. The sluggish mind can not readily grasp a new idea, and the dull conscience is not easily moved by reason. But day by day the priest stands with the same symbols of a love divine, and those who cannot understand, come vaguely to feel a sanctity that rebukes the sin, and a compassion which welcomes the sinner. And when they are tired and disheartened they turn to the priest, and in his words of absolute find rest for their souls.

And so it happens that amid religious revolutions, the priest of a faith discredited in the centers of thought, still finds multitudes who cling to him. After Christianity had conquered in the capitals of the world the men of the heath still worshiped at their old altars. And to-day, in spite of all iconoclastic forms, the peasant loves "the priest, and the bell, and the holy well."

But, however necessary the mission of the priest may be, he is not the sole minister of religion. Breaking in upon the sacred chant we hear a new voice, clear, strong, thrilling. Hear the cry which startles the worshiper and frightens the priest: "Lo, I come. In the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O, God! I have proclaimed righteousness in the great congregation." Who is this who dares cry aloud with such insistent emphasis upon his individuality? He speaks like a man in haste, who must deliver a message which burns like fire. He is a man with a burden upon his heart; in his tones there is a mingling of agony and exultation.

He is the prophet, and his religion is the religion of private and public righteousness. God does not care for sacrifices, he says, and is not pleased by long prayers; but he has given us a duty to do, and the time is short for its fulfillment. Both the priest and the prophet see in light a symbol of the divine reality; but the light which the priest adores is that which shines on the altar when all else is dark. He follows "the kindly light amid the encircling gloom," but it has nothing in common with the "garish day." The prophet cries, "My God is a consuming fire." This lurid flame shall consume every refuge of lies, every stronghold of oppression. It shall consume your altar, oh, priest, if you think by repeating holy words to atone for neglecting holy deeds!

God is not simply in the past—God is in the spirit of righteous revolution to-day. "He shall overturn and overturn till he whose right it is shall come." The prophet and the priest both believe in holiness, but the priest says, "All ye who love the holy things turn aside from the rude world; come seek with me the place where all is pure." The prophet says, "I will not turn aside, I will not refrain my lips; I will speak aloud in the great congregation; I will say to men 'you must not seek some holy place far from the world's work and the world's sorrow. Your part is to go out into the world and make it holy.' 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me to preach good tidings to the poor.' The mission of religion is to destroy the oppressor; it is to break every bond. So the prophet sees before him some specific work to be done; that is God's work because it is right, and all the passion of his soul goes out to that. His voice is rude and harsh some times; he casts aside impatiently many a sacred form; he tries everything by this one standard of the right. He says, "Now is the axe laid at the root of the tree, and every tree that bringeth not forth fruit shall be cut down and cast into the fire."

All the forms, all the usages, all the sacred things which show no fruit in practical well-doing, these the prophets say but cumber the ground, because God loves mercy and not sacrifice, righteousness and not the repetition of sacred words. And the priest never yet understood the prophet. Whenever the prophet has come, whether in Judea and Samaria; whether in the decaying empire where Chrysostom stood, strong in the sense of truth; whether in Florence when Savonarola preached, or in America when Theodore Parker found all righteousness waiting to be done and religion lagging in the work, and denounced the church in the name of the living God; whenever the prophet with his burning word comes, the priest, even the good priest, is frightened at it. The prophet is come to overturn; even of that prophet of Nazareth speaking words not simply of truth and righteousness, but of grace and love, even of him the priests said (and many of those priests I doubt not were true men and reverent) he blasphemeth, he comes to destroy our temple.

But just as the priest does not readily understand the prophet, so there is another kind of religious teacher whom the prophet, intent upon his work of practical reform, does not understand. Listen to this third man of religion. "Then I turned, and my heart was set to know and to search out and to seek wisdom, and to know the reason of things." Beyond the religion of the priest and the prophet there comes the religion of the philosopher—the cool, critical observer of the world. The prophet says: "All the world is divided into two armies; on one side is the right and on the other side the wrong, and we must choose this day between them, and, having chosen, we must fight to the end. We cannot be indifferent, cannot stand aside." When the fervent appeal comes, the philosopher says: "But I must stand aside. I am not so sure that all things are thus divided into the absolutely good and the absolutely bad; and if they were divided, I want to know both the evil and the good. I want to know the reason of things. You say, good prophet, that this world suffers simply because men are wicked; it is a matter of human will. Here are evils, you say, all around you, and if you but will you may destroy them all, and you are impatient until all men join your party, speak your word; then you say we will drive out the evil, and the blessed day of peace and justice will come in at once. Every prophet has said that, every reformer has said that, that there is just one root of all evil in society, and if we can strike at that, striking at the root of the tree, then the good time, the millennium of peace will come. The Hebrew prophets thought that the triumph of Jerusalem was at hand and with it the triumph of righteousness. The early Christian prophets thought that even in their generation the final victory was to come, and Christ was to appear in the clouds, and all would be well. But the philosopher says: "I must look into this; I must trace these evils further than to that specific source you see. I see something besides this personal element or this moral element in the world. There are impersonal forces; there are laws which have been from the very beginning and are involved in the nature of the universe itself, and I see the same phenomena generation after generation. You denounce evil. I must study it, and to study it I must not take sides, I must not have my brain afire even with righteous indignation; I must study it as the physician studies the disease, not impatient with the disease, not hating or blaming his patient, but studying all. I must see just how far, if at all, the disease may be alleviated; I must have time, by reserving my judgment, to determine whether some of the things you call evil are evil after all. So, good prophet, I cannot join you; I cannot go forth on the fiery crusade under your leadership when you call. I am only standing apart studying the reason of things, seeking to know and to understand before I act, and there are some times and places where I shall refuse to act at all because I do not know." Here are a new set of virtues unknown either to the priest or to the prophet—tolerance, impartiality, the reserve of judgment, the judicial attitude toward all things. And the philosopher says that many times the prophet has failed because he has generalized hastily; things have not come to pass as he thought they would come to pass, because there are other forces that have been working and bringing to naught his predictions.

To the prophet there are three distinct periods of time—yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow. Yesterday was full of superstition and injustice; it is the land of bondage from which we are fleeing. To-day is the battlefield: to-morrow the final victory will come. But the philosopher sees vast periods of time, both before and after. Yesterday, he says, was not all evil. It was itself the result of what had gone before. Only when you go back to "the day before yesterday," from which it emerged, will you do justice to it. And to-morrow is not a finality, for there must come a "day after to-morrow." When your cause has triumphed, new forces will come into the field to challenge its dominion. When all comes to pass which you predict, then must it be seen that "the end is not yet."

The prophet, in the intensity of his zeal, gathers around him a party, and believes that the future is in the hands of this "saving remnant." If you read the Hebrew prophets you will find how they became impatient with the slow march of events. They could not trust the people as a whole, governed, as they were, by so many motives, and so many of those motives low and mean; but they said a remnant shall be left and that remnant shall accomplish the renovation of the world. The philosopher says: "I do not believe that; it is not the remnant that does the world's work. The future of any nation or any civilization depends upon the sum total of all the lives and all the thoughts of the people; it depends not simply upon the finest minds or the truest consciences, but it is the average man who is after all to do the work."

"The World Soul knows his own affair,
Fore-looking when he would prepare
For the next ages men of mould,
Well embodied, well ensouled;
He cools the present's fiery glow,
Sets the life pulse strong, but slow."

And the prophet does not understand the philosopher. He seems cold and indifferent. It is only after time has passed and wisdom is justified of her children that we begin to realize that the philosophers have had a real religion. They have taken the wider view of life, they have seen the great forces that govern all, they have traced the law running through unconscious and conscious being, and they have felt a great awe, which has grown into worship. They have worshiped not the little god enshrined in some one temple, not the god of hosts leading one nation to victory, but the One in All. The law behind all life, the universal power, they recognize and they adore. The way of God is in the sanctuary, the priest says. "God's way," says the philosopher, "is upon the great deep."

Now, what shall we say in regard to these three types of religion? Shall we say that one type not only follows another, but destroys necessarily its predecessors? Originally there was the religion of the priest; then came the religion of the prophet, and at last, as we grow in wisdom, there will come to us the religion of clear thinking, from which the prophet's fire and the priest's sanctity have departed: we will see great laws, irresistible forces; will be thrilled with cosmic emotion; but we, ourselves, will be dwarfed. We will hear no voice which appeals directly to us, saying, this one thing do, this one way follow. I think rather that the problem of the church and the problem of the individual is to reconcile these three elements. The true religion must be the religion of the priest, the prophet, and the philosopher in one. The religion of the priest finds its great word in sanctity; the religion of the prophet in righteousness; the religion of the philosopher in truth. And the church must say to the philosopher, "We have need of you. The time has passed when we would restrict your freedom. We rather look to you as guide and discoverer, and we say to you, 'Hold fast the truth, hold fast the liberty by which alone truth can be found;' but we ask you to remember that the most sublime truth and the truth nearest us is one that involves the element of right and wrong. We want you to see what the greatest philosopher of modern times saw when he said that there were but two things before which he bowed: one was the starry heaven and the other was the moral law." So we say to the philosopher, "We need you; we need your clear thought, but we need it for a purpose; we need it to illuminate our conduct, to help us in the struggle of our daily life."

So the church must say to the prophet, to the reformer: "We need you. We need you, with your clear conscience, with your sense of the demands of the present time; we need you to right the wrong; we need you to lead in the battle which is before us." But we ask you before you begin the battle to be sure that it is the true cause for which you are enlisted. We ask you not to waste your strength any longer upon non-essentials; we ask you no longer to be the slave of prejudice; we ask you to take counsel of the best philosophy, to listen to the words of ripest reason, to learn that sweet reasonableness without which all courage is vain. We ask you not to be impatient, not to be self-confident, not to confound what belongs to your idiosyncrasy with what belongs to the eternal truth. If you do you are to be disappointed. You must learn, through true philosophy, to have great faith in time, and, having done all, to wait for the fulfillment. You must learn, when throwing all your strength into the cause you love, that after all you are but one among millions of men, and that your cause may fail, and yet, through other men and other ways, the right may be done. You must learn that hardest lesson to the prophetic soul, that lesson which the philosopher only can teach you, that "God fulfills himself in many ways, lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

And then, when the philosopher and the prophet have been united, what shall we say to the priest? We shall say, "We have need of you, too, O priest of the living God! All about us are the ignorant and the erring, all about us are the little children looking up and asking that the old, old story, that they can understand, shall be repeated; all about us are those who need the symbol and the form, and cannot grasp the reality without it. Every one of us is a child sometimes, all of us children at last, and we need to be taught as little children are taught, line upon line and precept upon precept. And human nature, if it is to keep that which is given it, must bring all these things into itself, must turn the thought into the habit by repeating over and over again the things it loves. There is still the need of the sacred place and the sacred hour and the sacred symbol, and need for the priestly soul to minister at the altar, offering always the same sacrifices. But we say to you, O priest, that you must learn lessons from the philosopher and the prophet before you may find what the truly sacred thing is. You must learn from the philosopher that God is not confined to your shrine though he may be there, to see that God is in this place only because he is everywhere. This time is beautiful because any time which men consecrate by true thought and devotion is sacred and beautiful. And so it needs that you should know that there is nothing sacred but that which is just and right; that holy lives are more than holy words, and that the holy words have power only when they are spoken from holy souls." When the priest learns this, learns the lesson of courage, learns the lesson of the wider thought, new sanctity comes, the old words become transparent to the light of truth.

Then priest, prophet, philosopher, come to an understanding, one with the other, each bringing his own gift to the common altar—sanctity, righteousness, truth, these three: and these three are one.

THE PRESENT HOUR.

[READ BEFORE THE W. W. U. C. MAY 16, 1893.]
PRELUDE.

"Life is a riddle," cries one,
And another: "It is but a dream,
Which endeth in sleep, and all's done."
"A cipher—but key there is none."
But over the conflict supreme Rings a voice, "Whence we come, whither go,
What reck we? Life is for the soul Opportunity; this is the whole."
Its meaning by looking afar
We may miss; why, then, ask of the star
What the blossom may tell us? Or ask
More of heaven to do, when the task
That is nearest us lieth undone?
To the dreamer inert in his calm
The present shows only—a mask;
To the doer, alone, is the palm,
By the toiler is mastery won.

Life's here and now, Where any human soul
Is placed—flesh-fettered, pain-stabbed or sin-blind,
Shut in by circumstances—its lesson lies,
Read it and heed it, then: here's our one book.
This world's the dame-school where we learn to con
Mere alphabet but that's, alone, the root
Of knowledge; grasping that we firmly hold
The key of the universe.

Frail baby souls,
We need a confined space in which to grow;
God sets us here, with time and narrow bounds
Set 'round us as the stakes about the plant.
But once we are strong and school-trained for our work,
He thrusts aside the finite, opens wide

The gates of the infinite, and gives the soul
 For knowledge crude, ripe wisdom; and for time,
 Eternity to do him service in.
 What shall be, let eternity declare;
 What is is time's and man's; our place is here;
 All blessings meant for us lie within our grasp,
 All knowledge good for us is within our ken.
 Nature's our nurse, and Time no task-master
 But patient teacher—for one page well conned
 Placing another something more advanced.
 The daily struggle, the falling, climbing higher,
 The straining toward an aim to scorn it won,
 Is but for the expansion of the soul—
 The muscle-play wherewith it molds to strength
 And service all its faculties and powers.
 The sadness, the perplexity, the doubt,
 The baffled, writhing agony of unrest,
 What are they but the spirit's "growing pains?"
 (So smiling granddames call the aching numb
 Of children's joints.) Ay, very things we loathe
 Play haply greatest part in shaping souls.
 Failure itself and sorrow and disgrace
 Mean that and no more; they are tools God takes
 To shape the form He means the soul to wear.
 We are His own; He loves us—even the worst.
 He reads us back and forward, sees the end
 In all beginning, sees in fruit the germ;
 And loves the great more for its growth from small.
 Therefore we will not fear, though Sin and Death
 And Pain, and all the vast beleaguering host Encamp about the soul; the victory
 Is not for these; they are God's agents
 To make and mold us. In our hand He lays
 A clew to guide us safely through the camps,
 Whispers His secret pass-word in our ear:
 "Love Truth alone. Trust not mere Beautiful Or seeming Best; Beauty God's garment is,
 And Goodness His enfolding atmosphere.
 But His own essence is Truth Absolute;
 O cling to it, for Truth, alone, is God!"
 The way is long the aspiring soul must fare,

But step by step is longest journey done.
 The physical life of man, slow perfected
 By growth through æons, climbed from clod to brain;
 The psychic side needs æons more to grow
 And ripen. Soul-powers yet in infancy
 Stir even to-day within the spirit's ken.
 More close the unknown presses on the known.
 The power of virtue widens in slow curves,
 As eddying ripples spread about the point
 Where the stone broke the stillness of the lake;
 And evil of its very nature shrinks
 To less and less, folds in upon itself;
 The skirts of light are widening, more and more
 The "dayspring from on high" puts night to rout.

INTERLUDE.

*Out of the mud of the Nile
 The lotus uplifts its bloom;
 Out of the darkness of Doom,
 Out of the slime of Guile,
 Emerges the soul
 Purified, strengthened and whole.
 Evil may last for a day,
 And sorrow endure for a night;
 Over wrong triumphs the right,
 Joy driveth anguish away;
 As a day in God's sight
 Are our thousand years of blight.
 It is the dawn, O friends, and not the eve;*

Arise and toil while it is yet the day,
 For there is work for us in every field.
 Woman has been no idler; from of old
 She wrought, with skilful hand and tender heart,
 To clothe the body, and prepare the food
 That builds the body and that shapes the brain;
 To nurse and rear the race—set baby feet
 In the first steps of knowledge and of truth;
 To minister with gentle hand to pain;
 To beautify the life of every day—
 Creating art in household and in dress;
 To set in home and in society
 Standards of morals, bulwarks against vice;
 Loaf-giver, nurse, home-maker, comforter,
 Has woman been—as she must always be;
 We do not dwarf the value of past work
 By recognition of the Present's needs.
 The hour is ripe for work in wider fields,
 Work to be done in phalanx, not in ones,
 The mass achieves—where single hands might fail.
 "This century is woman's," Hugo cried.
 The years slip by us fast like golden beads

Along a slackened cord, a few alone
 Aro left—but one's enough to serve our ends.
 Our work's to mold a nobler womanhood
 Out of the faulty clay that lies at hand;
 To preach "the Gospel of the Golden Rule"
 In home and school, society and state:
 Wage righteous war 'gainst ignorance and wrong.
 The perfect rose is built of tiny cells,
 So womanhood includes the separate life,
 The separate work of women one and all;
 No work so slight but it must leave its mark
 Upon the mighty whole.

For us, we stand

New-wakened to new duties. Pent about
 By sheltering walls of home, we hardly knew
 That life meant more than children, love and home!
 We guard the cradle; let us guard the paths
 Our children later tread. The task is ours.
 Love is our weapon and our armor too,
 Love is our strength as it shall be our power.
 Love—that outreaches from the guarded nook
 Of inglesides to shield the outcast waif,
 Uplift the fallen, strengthen all the weak.
 Temper stern force with love, add heart to brain,
 You bring—millennium to our very doors.

Clasp the hand nearest, sister; that—the next;
 And so we form a chain to ring the world.
 We need the sympathy of hand to hand,
 The magnetism that flows from heart to heart,
 Wisdom of vision that looks eye to eye;
 Shoulder to shoulder marching, tolling on,
 Be love our strength, be highest truth our aim,
 And unity the watchword of the hour.
 Forward, then, comrades. heads high, courage strong,
 The present's ours—and what's eternity,
 When all is said, but an eternal Now?
 Man's not "the fool of space and time;" his goal
 He sees, and marches toward it clear eyed.
 The Eternal Patience waits upon our steps,
 Tolling on, Godward still, through cycles slow;
 The Everlasting Arms are under all.

EPODE.

*The present life and the life to be
 Melt into one when this span is done.
 The eyes of the soul, unsealed, shall see*

All life, in heaven or earth, is one.

*Patience a little, strive and climb:
Into eternity merges time.*

*On the untaught lip all words are dumb,
The speech of heaven, earth may not know;*

To the ear that is deaf no sound may come,

*Through an ocean of melody 'round it
flow:*

Patience, patience—the hour's not yet;

The song is lost in earth's noise and fret.

But nothing is left to chance alone,

All in the universe moves under law;

Through ages to come as through ages flown

Near to the central Heart we draw.

Soul, take courage! All struggle and strife

But draw us nearer the Life of life.

Effect of Liberal Thought Upon the Spirit of Devotion Among Women.

[A paper read by Rev. Sophie Gibb at the Woman's Conference.]

Prof. Joseph Rodes Buchanan says: "The sphere of woman would seem to be self-evident, for the normal sphere of everything in the world is that which it is competent to fill, and would fill if there were no serious hindrances.

Man and woman are eternally bound together, for the masculine left brain is interlinked with the more feminine right brain, to make the complete head, and however low woman is borne down by false institutions, the nation is borne down with her, and however high her career, the glory of the nation becomes its expression. Strange is it, indeed, that a truth so emblazoned on all historical records has attracted so little attention from philosophers and statesmen. The nation that tramples on its women goes down with them in the valley of ignorance and humiliation, losing its honorable ambition and public spirit, sinking in social disorder, poverty and crime, until some stronger race becomes its master. And this is stern justice expressed in "the survival of the fittest," for the crime against womanhood is one the laws of nature do not pardon and ought not to pardon. It is the crime of crimes, for it is the unanimous national rebellion against the law of love—the supreme law of life, as announced by Christ and confirmed by all substantial ethical science which comprehends the nature of man.

The law of love alone is competent to lead man on the upward path out of barbarism and suffering ignorance to the realm of happiness, prosperity and enlightenment.

The important truth recognized by Prof. Buchanan indicates something of the effect that liberal thought must have upon the devotional nature when she comes to an appreciation of it. If she represents this great law of love, if she is moved by it and works in harmony with it, if also she appreciates the fact that the nation must rise or fall with her, she must be glad and thankful that opportunities are opening up to her great fields of work for the elevation of the race, and she must be reverent and consecrated in doing that work. As no other system of religion has ever done, Liberalism recognizes woman as the "Mistress of Destiny" and accords to her in that high rank all privilege and power needed, with the confident assurance that it will be her delight to labor for the betterment of the world and perfection of home. True Liberalism is seen not only in the changing fashions of religion, not only in the elimination of hard and cruel doctrines from creed and church, but in the unfolding of great truths, in the practical recognition of the fact that the eternal principles of love and justice must touch the world at every point of need. It stands for the fundamental verities of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and all that these great truths imply. It calls for an out-of-door religion, a world-wide sympathy and a unity of all human interests.

To woman, Liberalism is that social and religious freedom which permits her to bless mankind whatever the need. Her native motherhood makes her a conservator of morals, a savior of men. Can she see opportunities to do that which the world has never before accorded her privilege to do? Can she become absorbed with the great work of lifting up and saving the world, and not find her swelling with devotion to God for the privilege? Can she labor for the betterment of mankind, and fail in psalms and prayer? Can she forget the source of her strength, or neglect to drink frequently and deeply, though in secret, at the Infinite Fountain?

If, as Prof. Buchanan says, the normal sphere of anything is that which it is competent to fill, and would fill if there were no hindrances, then truly woman's sphere is that of spiritual life. She is at home in the realm of morals, and naturally becomes a teacher of ethics.

She may be a discoverer of truth and builder of theories, if properly educated, but naturally she is a purifier of thought, a cleanser of place and party. Regarding the oft-repeated objection to woman in politics because it is a "dirty pool," dear old Zerelda Wallace said: "That is not a valid objection, for it always was woman's mission to go around cleaning up things." Were it not true, were it not her mission to purify and sweeten and disinfect the world of its corruption, what would be its condition? Liberalism opens to her many opportunities to carry this purpose into the great world, to ask for cleaner legislation, for better social and sanitary conditions, for truer preaching and holier living. Liberalism has enlarged the boundaries of thought and faith, emphasized human responsibility, taken religion from the narrow limits of faith in creed and made it a life, an aspiration toward truth, a high process of character building.

It has removed many cruel barriers to true progress and invited mankind into fields of unlimited research and up the mounts of wisdom and purity. Liberalism stands for and rejoices in the progress of every phase of truth, in the work of all great leaders who are endeavoring to deliver the race from its present imperfect stage of development. No less does it recognize as helpful to the whole every least endeavor of the most common mind to know the truth, and of every puny soul to become superior to temptation of the feeble hand to carry its load, of the faltering tongue to utter a blessing.

It appreciates every attempt to put dimples into the cheek of childhood, hope into the heart of the poor or aged, to inspire one thrill of gladness or paint a single tint of beauty in the most lowly soul or abject human life. All this Liberalism recognizes as divine service; it invites the co-operation of all and scorns the work of none.

It joyfully lifts the weight of depravity from the human soul, assuring it of kinship with the highest. Man is not half so much a creature of sin as of grace—not so much a child of earth, of race, of nationality, of climate, of cramping material environments, as of Mother Nature and Father God—not a fated victim of hereditary evil, but though a struggling, suffering, imperfect being, yet a son of the Infinite, able to overcome evil and stand as king and priest before God.

Woman, quick to recognize the strength and meaning of advancing thought, to see the possibilities lying before these children of divine inheritance, will with bursting heart of gladness sometimes pause in her consecrated labor to weep tears of joy, sing praises to God, and send to high heaven a prayer for renewed strength with which to do the blessed work of life.

Whatever her formulated faith may be, she will not forget, even when fighting social and political battles for humanity—nay, though her antagonist be the rum power, or any of the many organized and legalized forms of sin—she will not forget that God is her strength, and that to him she owes all her powers and all her hopes. For while woman contends with wrong for love's sweet sake, she cannot be irreligious, or forgetful of God.

Once her only privilege was to pray, Now that she can work as well; now that she can think for herself and speak as well, she may not devote as much time to what is called "devotion." Her life will be no less consecrated, no less a sacrifice, no less a perpetual prayer, if spent in the slums, in the kindergarten, on the rostrum, or in the home. Her service will be no less acceptable worship. Great minds that have discovered, and are discovering, the footprints of that "power that makes for righteousness" are as truly religious as the most zealous worshiper of Diety. Those with clearest conceptions of their intimate relations to the whole universe have the greatest incentive to right living.

Under the inspiration of liberal thought woman's life will continue to be so filled with the love and labor for humanity that she will outgrow many ills that in the past have been the bane of her life. The effect of cruelly limited environments, the stifling atmosphere of wholly fashionable circles, or the monotony of limited home privileges, will be overcome when she realizes herself a legitimate—yea, an essential—part of the human family. No longer tolerated and supported, but justly recognized and needed.

Long has she beaten bleeding wings against the cruel bars of conservative social custom; long has her true nature revolted at the thought that it is unwomanly to feel the pulse beat of labor, and poverty, and sorrow in the lower world.

The true liberalism that opens the gates of the world to her and recognizes the human family as one is tonic to the woman whose life has been blighted by the poison of exclusiveness.

A new idea is a new spiritual force. A refreshing thought will bring health, happiness, and devotion into a life almost paralyzed by ennui.

The religious nature of woman is enlarged and intensified when she feels that God himself is calling her to do some great work for the world. Sometimes the world is epitomized in her wayward boy, and while her spirit bleeds in anguish she feels called upon to dry her tears and take sword against those public sins that ruined her own. She is now strong to face the world, to meet opprobrium, to sacrifice social approval, and to contend as one called of God.

Hardship and sacrifice cease to be such when they promote some great interest we have at heart.

Can we wonder, in these days of legalized sins that menace home and happiness, that woman coming onto the stage of public life feels that she is delegated by high heaven to lead on many reforms?

No man or woman is or can be a prophet, or savior, until the soul has been caught up into the region where the Divine will is visible, until all existence pulsates with the great idea, and all human events are aglow with the one supreme motive that burns and blazes within the soul.

Thus woman has been touched—thus she has been called, by suffering and tears, by intuition and inspiration; and Liberalism says, Go forth, oh, mother, sister, wife—the world is yours to conquer by love.

In the midst of all this, with this proclamation in her ears, will she forget to pray? Who fears it? The most devout and effective prayer, however, is an earnest and sincere preparation to get out of God's universe that which we need for usefulness.

That prayer may consist of words fitly spoken before God, or in an experimental use of chemicals, or of an energetic use of pen, pick and spade, machinery, brain, heart, hand, tears, or blood, or it may consist in an unanswered knock upon some college door; but if it is aspiration toward and preparation for that which the life needs and must have to make it successful and helpful, it is sufficiently religious.

Then woman's devotion is augmented by and is as much greater as liberal thought has made her conception of truth and duty greater. Truth alone leads to devotion, while the doing of duty sanctifies and exalts the spirit.

THE RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF CITIZENSHIP.

CHARLES F. DOLE.

Men are slowly waking into a new ideal of citizenship. In fact, we couple religion and citizenship in a sense that could not have been understood in earlier times. For most men used to be slaves, or at least subjects, rather than citizens. Religion was conceived as having to do with another realm than that in which men vote, or serve on juries, or volunteer to fight in the army. (Even with the strong ethical and humane bias of the early Christianity, it was impossible for the average Christian to feel an active and hearty loyalty towards the military and heathen despotism which both plundered and persecuted him.) There had, therefore, to come about a vast change both in men's thought of religion and in their thought of government before they could understand "the religious aspects of citizenship."

What has religion to do with citizenship? some one may ask. Religion in this country is, or at least ought to be, divorced from the control of the state. We do not open the polls with prayer. Men do not think about their religion when they pay their taxes. They have no thought of God when they go to their party caucus. May not the man who never goes to church be quite as good a citizen, stanch, loyal, public-spirited as his neighbor, the church member? What, then, has religion to do with citizenship?

This rather searching question drives us to say what we mean by religion. Our best modern meaning of religion is that thought of life, and especially that conduct of life, which assumes certain deep and abiding relations, order and not discord, unity and not chaos, good and not evil, life and not death, reality and not shame and delusion; in short, the fact of God, call it by what name you like, at the base of the world, and in and through all things. This idea of religion may or may not be thought out into consciousness or acknowledged in words. Nevertheless, whoever thinks of this universe as good and orderly; whoever has any faith in it as true and not false; whoever trusts its ruling laws as beneficial to follow; whoever has any hope about the future of the world or the destiny of the race, so far thinks of the universe and of life as divine. So far as one thinks good of the world, he goes, I take it, the theistic road. But especially whoever acts as he would act, if this were God's world; whoever treats men as not enemies or rivals, but brothers; whoever trusts ideals and labors to bring them to pass, or works on the long lines of principles, whoever decides practical questions on the side of love or humanity, and therefore as if love were a universal principle, so far this man's life is religious. For it moves on the assumption that the world is founded in goodness.

Now, when you think it out, the very basis of the modern popular theory of government is in religion. Who shall persuade me on any mere material philosophy that all men are brothers, that all are entitled to political equality, that I ought to love Negroes and Chinamen, and to establish schools to keep a few starving Indians on the prairies alive? Or if I am a pessimist, or an utter agnostic, who shall persuade me to put the ballot into the hands of all kinds and conditions of men, in short, to trust the democracy? If I believe in men as my brothers; if I treat them as brothers, and in full view of men's obvious selfishness and ignorance, nevertheless refuse to harbor toward them fear, suspicion and hate; if I trust human progress under their hands, I tell you it is on account of some little element of religion, it is an act of faith in God. I, for one, see no other intelligent ground for the vast venture of faith in popular government.

The practical bearing of this ought to be clear. Does some one say that he never thinks of God in thinking of politics, that he never prays as he goes to the polls, that he pays his taxes without religion, and that a man may be as good a citizen without religion as with it? Please set before you, I answer, the most effective temper in which a man may take up his duties as a citizen. It will have to be the temper of a citizen. It will be the temper of one who in politics "never turned his back, but marched breast forward, never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph;" it will be the temper of one who has confidence in eternal justice whenever he casts a vote, and who pays his taxes as one makes contributions to a common cause. Faith, hope, love—all of them religious qualities—rule the acts and decide the difficult questions of duty for every man who needs the highest ideal of a citizen. He cannot be really religious without being a better citizen, and at the same time he illustrates his religion by the quality of his citizenship.

One thing follows. The man who votes and pays taxes and serves on a jury, and discusses political questions on universal (that is, eternal or divine) principles, broadens always in his thoughts of life and the world. He gains larger confidence, he reads the lessons of history and human experience with clearer sense of perspective; his faith widens, he acquires a restful sense, not only of a citizenship in the state, but of a citizenship wherever men are; nay, further, of a universal relation wherever divine laws work, wherever God is. This is no doubt the peace that passeth understanding.

WORLD'S FAIR NOTES.

The new Art Building at the foot of Monroe street, erected under inspiration of the World's Fair, is very much like a success. Spacious, well planned, a fit palace for the accumulating art treasures of the city.

Works of art need space, and here they have it.

As every house should have a doorway, so should every work of art have amplitude of space to set it off.

This week just ending, however, has given the new institute an introduction to the extreme opposite. It is doubtful if such crowds of women will ever again take possession of, besiege, mob, this home of art. From Monday to Saturday no cessation.

It is the Woman's Congress, which has, on the whole, been a fine success. The daily papers have spread over the country amplest reports.

Many more like gatherings the future will welcome. These congresses that collate facts, discuss principles, and carry forward voluntary enterprises are to be commended.

It was a rare privilege to hear Modjeska and the others of her sisters of Thalia "off the stage." Not quite at home, evidently, but each of the four delivering discourses of excellent merit. Will the compliment be refused if one say, even men, on kindred themes, have not done better?

It was, perhaps, inevitable that these representatives of the stage should catch the spirit of the Congress which was reformatory and assertative of woman's rights in any sphere.

When Irving spoke in Philadelphia he was not belabored with the modern spirit. He was not making a triumphal entry on public attention in behalf of sex. He was quite at peace with the world, and his theme ran smoothly.

A decisive victory has been gained for women, but the results are not everywhere confessed. So Modjeska, so Morris, so all the speakers felt the necessity of saying something "apologetic." Modjeska: "There are as many good women on the stage as in any other station of life."

True; but pity it needed saying.

The address of Georgie Cayvan, as one comes to read it, was a masterly utterance. Evidently she is a young lady who well understands life and her own position. Her plea for the stage had the emphasis of herself and her compeers.

This act of the Woman's Congress in "elevating" the stage to a grand participation in its work is a sign of the time. The vulgar prejudice against the stage loses ground rapidly. Its priests and priestesses are ministering to noblest sentiments. What ministers of the church are more loved than Jefferson and Russell? People begin to see how religion cannot be shut within church and pulpit, but diffuses itself naturally in all the avocations of life.

Perhaps more naturally where it is not made mention of. S. H. M.

Clean your Straw Hat with Pearline.

Directions.

First brush out all the dirt possible. Then, with a sponge, wash the hat with the ordinary Pearline solution (in the proportion of a tablespoonful to a pail of water.) Steam it well over the nozzle of a kettle; rinse well with sponge and warm water; press into shape, and dry.

You can do all this at home at a cost of less than one penny. It's simple enough, if you have Pearline—but, with Pearline, every kind of washing and cleaning is simple.

Directions for the easiest way, on every package.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, do the honest thing—send it back. 341 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Notes from the Field

Chicago. The Headquarters at 175 Dearborn street have been enriched by a fine life-size portrait of Edward Everett Hale, the generous gift of a few friends in Dr. Hale's church. The portrait is a carbon photograph, and is regarded as an excellent likeness by all who have seen it. There have also been added to the faces looking down from our walls a photograph of Ezra Stiles Gannett, from Rowse's fine crayon, and photographs (from life) of Emerson, George William Curtis, and Dr. Furness. All these are gifts from friends, and thanks are hereby expressed anew to the givers. We hope to add to our gallery other representatives of the Unitarian movement in this country.

Mrs. Ormiston Chant occupied Unity Church pulpit on the Sunday after the Conference, and spoke in the evening at All Souls, where Mr. Learned, of St. Louis, also was heard. On last Sunday Mrs. Julia Ward Howe occupied the pulpit of the First Church.

At the meeting of the Board of Directors of the Western Conference Friday, May 19, President Shorey, Secretary Hosmer and Mr. Fenn were appointed as delegates to represent the Conference at the meeting of the American Unitarian Association in Boston. Mr. Hosmer preached last Sunday at the Lenox Avenue Church in New York on his way to Boston. Mr. Fenn left for the East on Sunday evening, conducting the morning service at his own church, where Mrs. Howe was the preacher.

Conference echoes still continue to be heard, and all of a pleasant sound. The combination of meetings in the city at the time brought many representatives of the liberal faith together, and the friends in Chicago have had a succession of opportunities to meet and hear them, both in public gatherings and at private receptions.

One always welcome presence was missed in the representative gatherings of Conference week -- that of Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney. But a private letter showed that this life-long friend of rational religion and of the Church of the Spirit was not unmindful of the Chicago anniversaries.

Kalamazoo, Mich. The First Unitarian Church, at the morning service of Sunday, May 14, memorialized the Legislature of Michigan in regard to a bill introduced before that body in favor of capital punishment. The memorial is a strong presentation of the inefficiency of the death penalty in deterring from crime and of its positive influence in lessening the sense of the sanctity of life, and to this extent contributing to the evil it would eradicate. The memorial was signed by the minister and the entire Board of Trustees.

Geneva, Ill. Mrs. Celia P. Woolley has received a call from the Unitarian Church to become its minister, and has accepted the same, to enter upon her duties in September. Mrs. Woolley is so well known in Western Unitarian circles, both upon the platform and in the pulpit, that this formal entrance into the ministry will scarcely seem to change the relations she has hitherto sustained to the working fellowship. Dr. and Mrs. Woolley will change their residence to Geneva, but Chicago friends fortunately will not feel that they have lost them, but will annex another suburb. Meanwhile the church at Geneva is to be congratulated upon the acceptance of its call.

Milwaukee. Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Gannett spent the Sunday following the Conference in this city, and his former darishioners had the pleasure of listening again to the well-remembered voice. It was his first visit since the Unitarian fold was homed in its beautiful new church, and the preacher came back to Chicago full of praise for its fine architecture and of gladness for the happiness of people and minister in the new career upon which the society seems to have entered. The week following Mrs. Ormiston Chant gave an address in the church, to the great enjoyment of all who were present.

Marietta, Ohio. Rev. George B. Penney, late of Geneva, Ill., has accepted a call from the Unitarian Church here and begins his work the present month. This is one of the oldest churches in the West, and to its rooted life and associations of an honorable past the new minister brings the vigor of youth and a sympathetic interest in the new movements of thought and the problems of the present hour.

TAKE COURAGE.

When clouds o'ertake thee, coward heart,
Press on and bravely do thy part:
E'en though the sun is dim awhile,
'Twill shine again with radiant smile;
The darkest clouds at last will rift
And from thy soul the shadow lift.

Thy spirit gird with self-control—
Press forward to thy purposed goal;
Be not a slave to dumb despair,
Within a world so bright and fair:
There is a balm for every ill,
Souls may be free, or slaves, at will.

Beneath the wildest surging sea
Is found an ocean calm and free,—
Adown the steep and rugged hill,
Makes way the clear and rippling rill
That sends its music through the glen,—
Take courage thou, press on again!

THE HAPPIEST LITTLE BOY.

"Guess who was the happiest child I saw to-day?" asked papa, taking his own two little boys on his knees.
"Oh, who, papa?"
"But you must guess."
"Well," said Jim, slowly, "I guess it was a ve'y wich little boy, wif lots of tandy and takes."
"No," said papa "He wasn't rich; he had no candy and no cakes. What do you guess, Joe?"
"I guess he was a big boy," said Joe, who was always wishing he wasn't such a little boy, "and was riding a big, high, bicycle."
"No," said papa, "he wasn't big, and of course he wasn't riding a bicycle. You have lost your guesses, so I'll have to tell you. There was a flock of sheep crossing the city to-day, and they must have come a long way, so dusty, and tired, and thirsty were they. The driver took them up, bleating, to the great pump in Hamilton's Court, to water them. but one poor old ewe was too tired to get to the trough, and fell down on the hot, dusty stones.

"Then, Jim—then, Joe, I saw my little man, ragged and dirty and tousled, spring out from the crowd of urchins, who were watching the drove, fill his old leaky hat, and carry it one, two, three, oh, as many as six times, to the poor suffering animal, until the creature was able to get up and go on with the rest."

"Did the sheep say tank you, papa?" asked Jim, gravely.

"I didn't hear it," answered papa, "but the little boy's face was shining like the sun, and I'm sure he knows what a blessed thing it is to help what needs helping."—Christian Observer.

FOUR YOUNG ROBINS.

When I was about 12 years old, my father had a large tree in the front yard cut down. When it was almost ready to fall we discovered a bird's nest high up in the branches, and thought it very probable there were young birds in it. We knew, if they stayed there, they would be killed by the falling of the tree, so my brother climbed up and carefully brought the nest down in his hand.

Sure enough, there they were—four of the homeliest little birds. Their great yellow mouths were wide open, and they had no feathers to speak of. We put them in another tree, thinking the old birds would take care of them; but they did not come, and at night we took them into the house. The next day we put them in the tree again; but the parents seemed to have been frightened away, so I said I would be a mother to them.

We had an empty room in the house, where nothing could harm them, and in a few days they were able to hop over the floor. Mymother's room was directly beneath the one in which they were; and she said she could hear their little feet pattering over the floor as soon as it became light in the morning. They grew very fast, and improved in their appearance, as their feathers were now thick and pretty. I fed them with dough made of cornmeal and water, and with angle-worms.

Two died; but the other two were very cunning. One of them used to take the bottom of my dress in his mouth, as I sat on the floor, and pull so hard as to lose his balance and fall over; but he did not care for that, but would hop up and try again.

After awhile they were large enough to take care of themselves, and father said I ought to let them out doors with the other birds. So one pleasant morning we opened the window, and it was not long before they both flew away. I felt bad to have them go, but consoled myself by thinking what nice times they were probably having.—Christian Register.

WEALTH often creates more wants than it supplies. Money and contentment do not always go hand in hand.

WORSHIP OF ANIMALS.

The worship of animals is susceptible of a very simple explanation, and has, I believe, really originated from the practice of naming, first individuals, and then their families, after particular animals. A family, for instance, which was called after the bear, would come to look on the animals, first with interest, then with respect, and at length with a sort of awe.

Animal worship was very prevalent in America. The redskins revered the bear, the bison, the hare and the wolf, and some species of birds. The jaguar was worshipped in some parts of Brazil, and especially in La Plata. In South America birds and jaguars seem to have been the specially sacred animals. The owl in Mexico was regarded as an evil spirit; in South America eagles and goatsuckers were much venerated. The Abipones think that certain little ducks which fly about at night, uttering a mournful hiss, are the souls of the departed.—Lubbock's Primitive Condition of Man.

A TRIVIAL FAULT.

A young man who was a pupil at Rugby school was noted for his bad penmanship. When his teachers remonstrated, he replied: "Many men of genius have written worse scrawls than I do. It is not worth while to worry about so trivial a fault."

Ten years later this lad was an officer in the English army doing service in the Crimean war. An order he copied for transmission was so illegible that it was given incorrectly to the troops, and the result was the loss of a great many brave men.—Standard.

ESSENTIALS OF CHARACTER.

XII.

TRUSTFULNESS.

"He is true as steel, and when all others fail, you may trust him in the dark."

THE DIGNITY OF TRUST. The quality which makes one trustful and trustworthy is one of the most beautiful in life. It creates a feeling of security that gives calm and peace. It makes people love you. It creates in you a sense of honor which is uplifting to the soul.

Sometimes parents or teachers give boys and girls something to do and put them on their honor to do it well without watching. This gives them a sense of dignity which can never come to those who must always be watched, and those who do all things "on honor" have gained a nobility of character which will do more to make life happy than a great fortune.

But if children disobey parents and teachers, if things they are trusted to do are neglected, if they show that they cannot be trusted, then they must be watched, and watching tends to develop slyness, cunning, deceit.

IN THE HOME. Trustfulness makes home life sweeter because parents and children have each other's confidence and grow into closer companionship. Do not let anything destroy the confidence your parents have in you. Above all other places, hold the home as the place where all things are to be done "on honor." Boys and girls often think their parents might give them more liberty; but never take liberty, for to be trusted is better than liberty, and you must show yourselves worthy to be trusted. Don't be suspicious or jealous of other members of the home; be slow to think any evil of them. Show them that you have firm trust in them, and you will help them to be worthy of it. Don't take things slyly from the pantry, or do things secretly that you would not like to have others know; it kills trustfulness.

IN SOCIAL LIFE. In your friendships outside the home be trustful and worthy to be trusted. Never betray a friend's trust even in the smallest things. Do not be angry with your friend because of some vague rumor. Trust him; believe in his good intentions and you will help to strengthen them.

IN THE SCHOOL-ROOM, be worthy of the trust of your teachers, of your mates. No one enjoys school life better than the one who is loved and trusted by his teachers and his schoolmates, because he always acts "on honor." The boy who has to be watched, who is always looking for a chance to outwit his teacher, who is laying traps for practical jokes upon his schoolmates, is not to be envied for the good time that he has. If you wish for the best pleasure in life do not so act that people must be on the lookout for you. The boy or the man who is watched is not happy.

Play your games so that your playmate will trust you; do your school work so that your teacher will trust you; so act at home that your parents will trust you, your neighbors and friends as well, and you have laid the foundation for a successful and happy life. To be trusted is to be happy, and loving, and loved; to help out others by bringing out the good that is in them; to help the world by filling its responsible positions; to help one's self by continually adding to beauty of character and nobleness of spirit.

TRUSTFULNESS IN RELIGION brings steady confidence in the power that is guiding our lives, so that we shall always look forward with quiet joy to all that awaits in the future.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla, better than any other Spring Medicine, fully prepares the system to resist the ailments and epidemics peculiar to March, April, May. It purifies, vitalizes, and enriches the blood, quickens the appetite and imparts real and lasting benefit to every tissue and organ of the body. Positive proof of this statement may be had from anyone who has faithfully taken this wonderful medicine.

Read the statement of NATHAN S. CLEAVELAND, whose father was for 60 years Professor in Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me.: "I believe that Ayer's Sarsaparilla has no equal as a blood-purifier and Spring medicine. For Loss of Energy, That Tired Feeling, for Debility, Dizziness, Indigestion, or Dyspepsia, or for Loss of Appetite, this remedy has to me always been an unfailing specific. It gives tone to the stomach, aids digestion, overcomes restlessness, irritability, and nervousness, and exerts a beneficial and healthy action as a brain and nerve restorative. My father believed in the great medicinal value of this remedy, and never failed to recommend it, whenever opportunity offered. Some years ago, he urged my youngest sister to take it for debility, and a low state of the blood, and the result of her following his advice was very gratifying. She improved in health and strength from the first and was soon as well as ever. Whenever any one asks me, 'What do you consider the best blood-purifier?' my answer is, 'Ayer's Sarsaparilla.'" — NATHAN S. CLEAVELAND, 376 Centre st., Jamaica Plain, Mass.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward. And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes re-canvassed. Special inducements to agents will be given on correspondence. Subscriptions $1 per annum. Send all remittances to

*"Fail I alone, in words and deeds?
Why, all men strive, and who succeeds?

Bear up beneath their unsuccess.
Look at the end of work, contrast
The petty done, the undone vast,

—Robert Browning.

ONCE more Memorial Day has come and gone, and the grim memories of war have been wreathed in flowers. The graves of heroes have been watered with tears. As time advances it is encouraging to note how tenderness outlives harshness; and, still more, how the lines of sex and section fade in humanity's desire to honor all valor and to commemorate all disinterested service. The blue and gray, the heroine of the hospital ward as well as the hero of the rifle-pit, received common homage on Decoration Day.

THE recent meetings of the Western Unitarian Conference were too serious for levity, too nobly earnest for flippancy or wit; but once or twice the conference broke into laughter, as it should. Mr. Forbush, in his off-hand speech, scored a point in his humorous paraphrase of Lowell, as follows:

"New occasions teach new methods;
time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must travel in a Pullman, who would keep abreast of truth."

"A hit, a very palpable hit!"

THE Rev. Dr. Shutter, in an article in the June Arena entitled "The Liberal Churches and Skepticism," has rendered a valuable service to true religion. In a short but remarkably full and clear discussion of the problem which confronts those who would minister to the real religious needs of our day, he shows a highly sympathetic appreciation of the position of the skeptic, and sets forth with the utmost simplicity, but with great force, the true way to meet his doubts. In a word, his counsel is to simplify theology and reduce religion to a natural basis. We heartily commend his paper to all truthseekers, and wish that it might be read by every liberal minister in the land.

BEFORE this word reaches our readers the Sunday closing question will probably have reached its final conclusion. However it may be settled, the experiences of the last two Sundays will leave a life-lasting impression upon those who were able to walk through the cathedral aisles of beauty within the gates and note there the religious influence of art in its manifold triumphs. There was a church-like serenity, a prayerful hush and exaltation pervading the vast throng. Father, mother and children were ministered to by a spirit they wot not of. Others may call it as they will; we will call it the spirit of devotion, the palpable though unconscious atmosphere of religion compelling devoutness. It was inevitable that coarseness of every kind should be retired, and that the closing strains of Sousa's great band on Sunday evening should waft the benediction of "Nearer, My God, to Thee" over the impressed and impressive multitude. Surely one having seen that Sunday audience within the gates can no longer doubt the sanctity of such Sunday services.

WE are preparing copy while the World's Congress on Social Purity is in session. Its meetings are presided over by the faithful and wise Aaron M. Powell, of New York, who, in connection with his wife, is editor and publisher of the Philanthropist. Through this and other activities, they have won the deserved place of honor and trust in America, as leaders in the most important work of our day, the field of private morals and personal religion. Of this work we will speak more fully at another time. One fact of great interest and significance must be noted now. The most commanding figure of this Congress, standing side by side with Mr. Powell, whose antecedents are of the house of George Fox, is Archbishop Ireland, one of the most distinguished representatives in America of Pope Leo XIII.

SURELY the world does move! At the last meeting of the Congregational Club of Boston, in Music Hall, President Hartranft, of the Hartford Theological Seminary, spoke to a large audience in favor of giving to women the same advantages in the study of theology that are enjoyed by men. He thought it right that women should serve on the corporation of the American Board and on the Prudential Committee, and that they should preach if they felt that they had a message from God. In view of the fact that the Christian Union credits Hartford with being the most conservative theological school in New England, Dr. Hartranft's treatment of the famous passage in Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians is especially noteworthy. He argued that it had only a local significance, Paul having thus spoken of women only because of the corrupt social conditions of the time.

OUR valued friend and contributor, E. P. Powell, writes us his congratulations over UNITY: "So exquisitely neat and beautiful and good." And in his letter we find the following, which makes a good editorial note:

A great Christian has recently assailed me with a remarkable declaration, "that to open the Fair on Sunday was the greatest outrage on God's people ever perpetrated." He was smoking, and I told him that I had never seen any form of Sabbath desecration comparable, for mischief, with the use of tobacco.

Yea, verily; let the inward foulness be cleansed!

WHOEVER has lived intimately with the life revealed at the congresses held in the Art Palace these last weeks will be impressed by nothing so much, we think, as the necessity of reconstructing the popular theory of sex. Such an one is made to realize that valor is not a masculine prerogative, and that tenderness is no feminine monopoly. If one would live more in the light of the intellect, and the other bask more in the sunshine of the heart, it would be better for both. Let women think more and feel less before they act, and men exercise the manly right of emotion more often, and it will be better all round.

THE article in the June Arena on "Islam, Past and Present," by F. W. Sanders, whom we introduce elsewhere as our new assistant editor on the UNITY staff, is another indication of a rising interest in this faith of and for the desert. At the coming Parliament of Religions in September, the modern attainments and living representatives of this strong monotheistic faith will still further surprise the complacent element in the Christian world. One session of the Unitarian International Congress next September will be given to "Unitarianism in Its Non-Christian Development," at which a representative Jew, a representative Mohammedan, and the eloquent Protab Mozoomdar, of India, are expected to speak.

A CORRESPONDENT from a Western State says of a neighboring town:

Universalists are making strong efforts there. They have quite a liberal class of people. I think the Unitarians would stand a better chance if they could get a foothold.

We fear neither will stand much of a chance, because neither name will fairly represent either the traditions, present inspirations, or future possibilities of such a liberal element in a Western community. A movement fairly accepting the common grounds of universal religion, joining on a purpose to better the world, willing to declare a truce to theological wars that they may make common warfare against evil, a common struggle for virtue, will succeed. Here's the place for the Free Church in name and in aim, and we doubt if there is a place for any other new church in a town that is doubtless already over-churched.

THE following address from the Unitarian Women of Great Britain and Ireland to the Woman's Branch of the World's Congress Auxiliary of the Columbian Exposition, addressed to Mrs. Charles Henrotin, Vice President, arrived too late to be read at any of the meetings. But the handsome document, substantially bound, has been passed over to the proper authorities, and will find a place in the permanent records of the remarkable rally of women that has now become historic. It is signed by nearly six hundred women scattered throughout England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, among which are the names of Mrs. Brooke Herford, Mrs. Robert Spears, Miss Florence Hill of London, Mrs. Harry Rawson of Manchester, and others:

DEAR SISTERS—We want to tell you that our hearts will be with you in the great meetings to be held in your wondrous city, and our prayers shall be yours for the success of your noble aims. How true it is that thought annihilates space and time. It has been our privilege to know by their writings, and even to see face to face so many of your best-loved people, that we feel one with you in your hopes and aspirations, much as a proud parent would sympathize with a lovely child full of promise. And we are looking to you to accomplish better work than we have been able to do. In your large new country all seems to us younger, brighter, fuller of life than here. You have fewer prejudices to overcome; you are more open to receive new light. No doubt you make mistakes and have your own hard battles to fight, but everywhere we know Truth must prevail. In all your brave endeavors we would cheer you on. You do not forget the mother country, but value our calm words. May Heaven prosper your righteous work.

IN their desire to secure the fullest confidence in the program, and that no injustice might be done either to invited speakers or the public, the local committee on the International Unitarian Congress, to be held in Chicago next September, has thought it best to withhold the detailed program until the report of the committee appointed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to cooperate with the local committee of Chicago is received. Some seven or more of the speakers invited belong to their territory, and the report of the committee is waited for with interest and anxiety. Meanwhile we again assure the public that the plans in detail for the seven-day meeting are well in hand, and are as far developed as those of the congresses of associate religious organizations. The present plan of the general officers of the congresses is to publish in one pamphlet the programs of all the denominational congresses, as well as that of the Parliament of Religions, for gratuitous distribution. All possible haste is being exercised to bring out this suggestive pamphlet at an early date. But with the Congress of Religions, as with the great Exposition itself, those in charge had to choose between a small thing easily done and promptly completed, or a great thing difficult to do, laboriously and perhaps tardily completed. The latter committee, like the former, has chosen the harder thing to do. But the success of the great cluster of Woman's Congresses in May leaves little room to doubt that the September cluster of Religious Congresses will be the most surprising and noble of the entire group.

WE have just received the sixth annual report of the Unitarian Church at Oakland, Cal., a busy hive of religious, social, and philanthropic activity. One frequently hears ministers criticised for too much "outside work," yet, when the matter is brought to the test, it seems that this is one of the cases in which one is enriched by what he spends. It would seem to the junior editor of UNITY that the success of All Souls' Church, Chicago—whose pastor not only directs and guides the many and various activities of his own church, but does so much work outside his parish—might well be put in evidence to show that a minister is not spoiled for his special work, but better fitted for its successful prosecution, by general activity outside his pulpit and his parish. But as the relation of All Souls' pastor to UNITY is such as might make a reference to him seem unbecoming, even from UNITY's junior editor, we avail ourselves the more gladly of the case of the pastor of the Oakland church. Mr. Wendte's activity is not only felt throughout California and the Pacific States, but throughout the United States, and even extends abroad. Yet all the time, under his sole pastorate, his church seems to grow stronger and stronger.

In our correspondence column is a letter from Iowa Falls which is of the kind that does good to the heart of the poor editor who has been obliged to notify his readers that their subscriptions are past due. But, alas, we regret to say that not all accept the reminder so gracefully. The subscription to UNITY, as to all periodical publications, is payable in advance; and when the whole year has passed, and after that weeks lengthen into months, and still the subscription is not paid, UNITY must make a strenuous effort to collect, even though it thereby loses a subscriber, or else go to the wall; and when we remind our subscribers of our need they should not, we think, get angry and stop their subscription, as they sometimes do. Of course we know that they do not realize how much their inattention to this matter means to us, but that consideration will not pay our printers. In the case of a weekly of which the annual price is so small as UNITY's, it must be evident that we can have no margin, even where so much of the work is gratuitous. The expense of time, postage and stationery used to remind delinquent subscribers is a heavy tax upon us, and we do not enjoy sending these reminders any more than our subscribers enjoy receiving them. Will not all who read this help us in this matter, and at least pay their subscription up to date, even though they do not comply with the rule in case of all periodicals and pay for a year in advance? The date on the label of your paper is the date at which your subscription has expired, or will expire, as the case may be.

ANOTHER SPOKE IN OUR WHEEL.

Through the loyalty of a few friends who, for UNITY's sake, have made it possible, we have great satisfaction in presenting to our readers the name of Frederic W. Sanders, who, for the next year at least, will be associated with us as assistant editor. Mr. Sanders has just left the pastorate of the Unitarian church at Asheville, N. C., which position he resigned in order to accept this position on the editorial staff of UNITY. The society, in accepting his resignation, placed on record its Full appreciation of his untiring earnestness and strenuous endeavor for the upbuilding of our society and the advancement of Christian life in our community. And we do cordially commend him as worthy of full confidence and of the highest esteem, and invoke the Father's blessing upon him in his new calling.

Mr. Sanders was born in the city of New York in 1864; graduated as A. B. from the College of the City of New York in 1883; spent two years in teaching and journalism; and then studied law and was admitted by the Supreme Court of New York to the degree of Counselor at Law in 1887. The next eighteen months he spent as law proof-reader for the Lawyers' Co-operative Publishing Co., at Rochester, N. Y., at the end of which time, for health's sake, he went to East Tennessee, where he practiced law for three years.

Brought up in the Episcopal Church, he early became a "skeptical" as to orthodox religion, and dismissed all churches, Unitarian with the others, for some twelve years of his life. In Tennessee he came in contact with a Unitarian minister of the modern type, which seemed to invite his ruling interests in sociology, ethics and religion, and he determined to enter the ministry. In the fall of '91 he went to the Harvard Divinity School, spent a year in study, chiefly of comparative religions, took the Harvard University degree of A. M., in '92, and soon after took up the work at Asheville, which he has abandoned for this editorial work upon UNITY. He thinks he has found his place; in which opinion his friend and teacher, Dr. Everett, of the Harvard Divinity School, coincides. The senior editor, speaking out of the grinding experience of fifteen years, welcomes him to the delights of hard work, and, none the less sure, the discipline of disappointments. Whether this will prove his life-work must be determined, not simply by his own industry and consecration, of which we feel assured, but upon the co-operation of the friends of UNITY, old and new. If those who believe in the cause of ethical religion, the church of the Open Fellowship, the piety of the Golden Rule, the ritual of rectitude, with the historic names and their associations when possible, without them when necessary, will take hold and help us find our own, the constituency that needs us, we will try to make a place not only for Mr. Sanders but for many others in this ministry of the pen, the high pulpit of the public press. Slowly the Unity Publishing Company, that came into being on the first of March in order to save and perpetuate UNITY, is getting into shape so that it may offer a paper worthy your patronage and support, and become, if circumstances permit, the maker and seller of such books as represent the growing needs of a people everywhere who cannot do without religion, but who cannot do with religion as it is now expressed in the creeds and the forms of existing organizations. This company would reach out its hands to the discontented aspirants for greater purity and nobler thinking in all the churches and outside of all of them.

Mr. Sanders comes to help in this work, not to do the work of any one previously enlisted in our corps, but to bring another contribution, to do the "several things more" that were waiting to be done. The editor in charge welcomes Mr. Sanders and gladly delegates to him the things he could not do, or doing, did poorly, that he may do better the things it may be given him to do in and for UNITY.

If the wheel is to be permanently strengthened by this spoke, you must help us to complete that two thousand list of new subscribers during the year that ends March 1st, 1894.

We introduce Mr. Sanders to the household of UNITY. Let the household give him not only cordial but substantial welcome.

The Work of the World.

O, the World of Man is a world-wide world,
And the thoughts that shape it are one:
*Do the deed that bodeth no ill to Man
Till the work of the world is done.*

M.

THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

In the beautiful halls of the new Art Palace on the lake front the most significant and promising scenes are transpiring. We have seen men and women representing opposite interests meet upon a common platform. The partitions and barriers have given away before the growing spirit of unity. This concourse of men and minds, of races and religions from all the ends of the earth, is the most magnificent feature of the Columbian Exposition. All the religions of the globe are here. Scholars and apostles from India, Japan, Siam, Jerusalem, as well as from London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna and Constantinople, press upon each other at the corners of our streets and give each other the hand.

This is the age of new conceptions. New meanings have been discovered which clothe the words humanity, science, ethics, religion with larger powers. Again, this is the age of the universals—universals in politics, in charity, in science, in faith. We want the suffrage to be universal; philanthropy to be universal, sheltering under its wings black and white, bond and free. We want the benefits of invention and art to have universal application. We want commerce and trade to become free and universal. Likewise in religion, we are feeling for those principles which underlie all faith and philosophies. The tendency is to extend our thought until it shall cover every inch of human ground, to enlarge our tents until they shall embrace every human child, to lift the dome of our temple until it touches the common heavens and resounds with the murmur and music of every human language, of every earthly hope and love.

A Parliament of Religions is possible only upon an ethical basis. Theology makes for schism and feud; ethics binds together. Theologically we have different bibles, we call our gods by different names, our saviors are of different races, our dogmas are in different molds, our creeds are of different sizes, and we have different ways of going to heaven. Ethics is the point of confluence of the numerous religions of the world.

Great results will flow from the approaching Parliament of Religions. It is already telling upon all classes of intellectual and moral workers.

It is broadening the preacher in the pulpit: he is arranging his household to entertain the apostles of alien faiths. Prejudice will be replaced by friendship; knowledge will revise our opinions. Hitherto we have heard of these men: now we shall see them and learn from their own lips what their prophets really taught. This better acquaintance will result in an intimacy and good-will which will make all future intolerance and misrepresentation impossible. This will be an invaluable moral gain to the world. The raison d'être of such a congress is furnished by the day. The times are ripe for it; the old skins are bursting; truth is expanding and stretching herself, and the old temples are giving away. In order to have truth at her full stature we cannot afford to ignore or leave out a single ray that has ever fallen upon our earth. In the Parliament of Religions the wondrous human instrument will be made to pour forth all its tones; every key will be touched; all the possible modulations evoked, until the severed and opposing faiths of the world shall swell into one glorious anthem.

The days of the sectarian spirit are numbered. "The spirit" is swallowing up "the letter." We have to-day a fellowship of religions. Is not the thought inspiring? I feel confident that the main emphasis of the coming parliament of religions will be placed upon ethics. Dogma is husk; this is corn. "I am sick of opinions," said John Wesley. "You want no other creed than to do the right," says Professor Drummond. The drift of the world is toward ethics and the religion of ethics. M. M. M.

MISSIONARIES NEEDED TO THE MISSIONARIES.

The loudest and most insistent cry for missionaries that ever sounded through Christendom should be set up this day for missionaries to be sent abroad to convert the missionaries already in the field, in view of the action of that Bombay conference, where seven hundred of them "refused to condemn, by even so small a measure as a resolution, the triple evils of the drink trade, the opium traffic, and the state regulation of vice."

To the honor of the American missionaries it must be said that they did not vote with the immortal seven hundred. This action of the conference is in the face of the fact that the greatest obstacle in the way of the civilization, to say nothing of the christianization, of these same precious heathen of whose imperiled souls we hear so much, is the drink which is carried to them by the same nations which send the zealous missionaries.

One of these missionaries in Africa recently wrote to her mother in this country that, as she wrote, she saw nine men lying dead drunk upon the street from drinking the New England rum sent there from Boston. She enclosed $10 in the letter, saying: "Mother, use it in missionary work at home—you need it more than we." Do we not? and should it not be spent in placing before the people the facts in reference to our action in this matter? In 1885 we shipped into Africa 747,650 gallons of strong drink, and this amount has been greatly increased since that day. Many European nations send more than we. Germany, 7,823,042, and the Netherlands 1,099,146 gallons in 1885. The demoralization to the natives resulting from this traffic is beyond all description. It kills them off by thousands, and that is the very least of the harm it does to the country. At Tunburley, in South Africa, there is an average of one native found dead every morning from excessive drinking, and many other places are reported where matters are just as bad. The frightful curse which opium carries to those heathen lands is too well known to be enlarged upon. But these righteous men—these pious preachers, these examples of holiness sent to a sinful people—refuse to have even one word to say upon this vital subject, refuse to condemn it even by implication. They are after the souls of these poor wretches, and the devil may have their bodies and be entirely welcome to them. They evidently have no taste for the finite: the infinite is the thing for them. All that interests these saints is to save as many Africans as possible from what Byron calls

"that immortal fry
Of almost everybody born to die."

Opium and New England rum and state regulation of vice may devastate and depopulate all heathendom—that is none of their affair—but they will compass sea and land to make one proselyte. And to think there are 700 of them. H. T. G.

SPIRIT APPETENCE.

O, eagle soul, thou hast but sparrow wings!
 A thirst for far-off clouds is in thy throat,
 And longings haunt thine ear for sounds that float
 In purple silence, where the star-choir sings;
 Around thy heart, with wing-like flutterings,
 A dream is aching for the fields remote
 Of hidden spaces, and thine eyes devote
 Their vigils to the hope's far beckonings.

A little while content thee, restless soul!
 This lowly life holds food for thee and flowers,
 And songs, antiphonal to star-choirs, roll
 Their mellow measures from this earth of ours:
 A little while, and unto thee may ope
 The silver sometime shimmering in thy hope.

FROM LITTLE TO GREAT.

As long as human beings believe in a God outside the universe of worlds and life—creating, controlling, and destroying in caprice, by lawless will and purpose—so long must they look for special, miraculous revelations of Him and of His ways. This is natural to a certain stage of human growth. The Christian church has passed, and is passing, through a long period of such belief. The new science—philosophy and religion discovering more and more that nature is always lawful, that the soul, or God, of the universe is subject to the eternal law of its own infinite being, as manifest in and through nature—looks no longer for miracle or to the supernatural for a revelation of God and His ways, but simply tries to read and interpret Nature as the continuous revelation of the eternal. Slowly we are learning that the grain of sand, the worm, the man and "angel" are parts of a boundless whole, links of an endless chain of being; that all worlds, all life, seen and unseen, are bound together, ever interblending and interworking through one soul, by one natural law of birth, growth, decay, and death, over all, through all, and in all.

If, then, we can discover and understand God's purpose and Nature's way in a grain of sand or the life of a worm, we may see and understand God and Nature just as truly in man or angel, in earth or heaven, since in will and purpose they must be the same in lowest as highest.

The same meaning, purpose, and destiny of life is written in the body, in the hopes, loves, and strivings, in the living and dying, of the microscopic infusoria of the wayside pool, as in man or the highest unseen.

From this vantage ground of the little, let us try to read and understand some of the simple words and lessons in the eternal revelations of worlds and life about us.

Here is a little vase partly filled with water, holding some spring flowers, and the May sunshine falling upon it. Through the microscope this cup of water is discovered to be a little sphere peopled with millions of infusorial beings. They are being born, growing, decaying, and dying every minute. Whence come they? How do they live? Whither going? We mark, under the microscope, how, in a single drop of water, hundreds of little living forms appear, growing one hour, hoping, loving, and striving, marrying and giving in marriage, through their brief day of infusorial life. Soon decay begins, then death, and they disappear. It is as if we beheld a wave of forms and life flowing into this miniature world from some outside invisible source of being, rising and falling an hour, then ebbing away into the unseen again. Just this more and more appears the scientific fact. From the atmosphere and ether around and above this little vase-world, soul germs and elements of infusorial organisms and life fall and flow in; soon, quickened and nourished by the sunbeams and electric forces, they develop into strange, beautiful living forms; a little while, and the same souls, elements and energies of these microscopic creatures, through death, pass out again into the surrounding unseen atmosphere and ether—thus born to organize and live in other and higher forms of life.

Let us read the same lesson onward, wider and higher. The little microscopic world of the flower vase sees and knows probably nothing of our larger world and more perfect life so close about it. The infusorial beings that people it, in their eager loving, hoping and striving, cannot even dream of us in so much richer and more abundant life. We to them must be of the vast unknown and invisible. And yet, if we read and interpret nature and the soul of nature aright, their little hopes and loves, their homes, marriage and strivings, are only the ruder, earlier forms of existence; ours, more perfect, higher up on the same endless, ascending way of the soul's evolution of organism and life. After us they, too, are climbing according to the same eternal law and purpose of nature and God. They hear not our voices and songs; so real to our senses, all the tumult, all the misery and splendor of our busy life are over and about them unnoticed; our immeasurably greater, richer world makes no conscious ripple upon theirs; yet in countless ways we feed, inspire and mold them; I let in a little more sunlight, drop some flower petals on the surface, rock the vase a little. 'Tis more food, new energies of life for them, yet they conceive not the being and hand that feeds them. I am of an unknown, invisible realm, but of a world that touches and interblends with theirs. I feed and inspire them as some supernatural being their minds cannot comprehend. For thus ever the higher feeds, inspires and molds the lower through all the seen and unseen universe.

Let us enlarge our view almost immeasurably again, trying to read and understand the same law and purpose of forms and life higher and wider. Our earth is only as a drop of water in the infinite ocean, the invisible, ethereal universe that enfolds us. As the infusorial world—the drop of water—to ours, the great earth, so ours to the limitless realm of being over and about us. Our weak, crude eyes see naught in the vast spaces of ether. We hear no voices from thence. We grasp seemingly empty space with our common senses and fleshly hands, and cry "naught." Yet the higher science and philosophy proclaim and assure us that all this boundless ethereal realm of the universe is full with upper and outer worlds, innumerable continents and homes of myriads of beings, related to us as we to the infusoria in the drop of water. As the microscopic creatures in the drop-of-water world are fed and molded by soul elements and energies from ours, so we in turn are fed, inspired and educated by life from the unseen and spiritual realms that surround us. As the infusoria decays and dies out of his drop-of-water world into ours, entering into more perfect form and life—of trees, flowers, and insects—new born and growing into hopes, loves, and strivings, so much greater and richer than his present, yet the same grown, perfected in beauty, joy, and use; so we, by the same natural law of progress, decay and die out of our earth into the upper Unseen, thus new born into bodies and life of more perfect grace and beauty, of joy and use. This is only the natural continuation and progress of our present, just as common and natural as the growing of grass, the blossoming of trees, and the metamorphosis of insects.

Is it stranger that we see no forms, hear no voices, feel not the throb of the great unseen, ethereal world and life that infolds us, than that the atomic creatures living in a drop of water see and feel not our greater, fuller life that is so close about, yet so far above them? Is it less reasonable and natural that we should be fed and educated by the higher, invisible, spiritual world, that borders ours, yet rises infinitely above it, than that the infusoria or worm should be fed and educated by the spirit and power of our lives flowing about and through them? Have we any more reached the perfection, the upper limits of being, than they? The soul of the worm dying from its cloyed world, we say, cannot be annihilated, but must be born, risen into some higher condition of organism and consciousness—as insect or bird. He has developed organs and senses in ways of strength and use that yield life more abundant and rich than in his old estate. Yet all this gain from worm to bird is natural growth, the slow education and perfecting of the weak, crude organs and senses, the loves and strivings of the lower to the higher. By the same law and revelation we read and foresee our higher destiny. We, too, die out of our world into an infinite Unseen, to see, hear and feel the life of a state so rich and abundant in beauty and good that we cannot dream of it now, any more than the infusoria can dream of ours. We behold how naturally 'tis all before these lower creatures of life's way. Why less naturally for us?

Conceive of possessing bodies as much more beautiful and useful, joy-giving and love-giving as ours to-day are than those of the worms! All that growth and gain is man's destiny, if nature is as true and kind to us as to the worm. Conceive of society, of study, and work, of home and marriage, in coming life in some upper world, having grown and developed, in peace and beauty, in helpfulness and gladness of thought and love and labor, above ours of to-day, as our present is beyond that of fish or reptile! All that is before us, and even more, if the will and purpose of the universe deceive not. This is the soul's divine prophecy. If we have read and interpreted God and nature aright in the drop of water, the upper life for us, beyond this world's death, will be a higher continuation and unfolding of our present; in beauty and joy of loving and striving, in study and work, in marriage and home, just as naturally born and grown out of this our common life of to-day, as our present bodies, our thoughts, and loves have been born and grown from the world and life of the infusoria, the grasses, trees, insects, and birds.

THE GARMENT'S HEM.

The breath of spring is in the air,
Soft auguries the breezes bear;
The singing stream, from chains set free,
Fills the dark wood with melody.
Above its banks the mosses lean,
And ferns uncoil their spires of green;
On the brown hill the sunbeams etch
An April sky in violets;
Nature unfolds her living scroll
As one who, lavish, gives the whole;
Yet a reserve, elusive, fine
As vernal haze, her works enshrine;
The secret unrevealed is more
Than all the story written o'er
In bud and bloom and springing grass.

The winds that on far journeys pass
Whisper of unseen, sunnier skies;
Thither the soul, with instinct wise,
Would follow like a roving bird,
In lonely daring undeterred,
The hidden clue to worlds unseen,
Spring's fair immortal empire green.

RELIGION, ETHICS, AND HUMANITY.

DEAR UNITY: The purpose of this letter is not to discuss at length the relation between the three terms named in the caption, but, in reply to certain criticisms which have reached the writer through the columns of UNITY and through the mails, to make a little clearer than he succeeded in doing in his sermon on "Unitarian Religion and the Unitarian Name," what he conceives to be the fact—that religion is a larger term than ethics, and that Humanitarian is a narrower term than Unitarian.

The writer agrees most heartily with Rev. E. S. Greer that "the doctrine of unity—the oneness of all that is—is the key to all life's problems;" but he cannot see that by reason of this truth we are justified in asserting that the part is equal to the whole. In the letter which appears in UNITY of May 4, Mr. Greer expresses what seems in our day to be a common thought, that men's "relations to one another include all relations, and since God is in man, to fulfill our duties to man is also to discharge our obligations to God." The fallacy of this line of reasoning will become evident if for "man" we substitute "flower" or "dog," and for "human," "vegetable" or "canine." Surely, if the unity of all that is be assumed, God is in the flower and in the animal—in the dog—as well as in man. But shall we argue from this that to fulfill one's duties to the dog is to discharge all one's obligations to God? Humanitarian is a noble term. Still, man is but a part of the Universe, human nature is but one expression of the Divine nature which manifests itself in all that is. Your faithful dog is a part of the Universe no less than yourself, and as such has relation to all that is; but it does not follow that canine religion is all of religion. Religion, per se, or, if an epithet must be used, unitarian religion, is a larger, a more inclusive, term than canine religion or than humanitarian religion. It may be true that the man who should do his whole duty to his fellow-men would also do his whole duty to all else that is. Doubtless also he who should be perfect in his relation to dogs would be perfect in all other relations. Nevertheless, the word canine, and also the words human and humanitarian inevitably suggest limitation.

Turning, now, to the question of the relation between religion and ethics, the first point to be determined is, what is meant by these two terms. By religion in its subjective aspect the writer understands the sense, of relation to the Great Whole, and to the Spirit of Perfection (or progress) which pervades it. Whether we say God or Nature when we refer to the soul of the universe is of little importance; our sense of relation to the universe and to the spirit of the universe is religion. This includes our relation to the true, the good and the beautiful. Ethics as such has to do with but one of these relations: it has to do with the good, the morally right. Doubtless it is true that in the ultimate analysis there is a blending of the true, the good, and the beautiful, so intimate that perfection in any one of these directions is impossible without perfection in all. But of perfection, we, as finite human beings, know nothing save that it is the goal for which we strive. The ultimate unity of all that is being assumed, we may take for granted that it is impossible to draw sharp lines making an absolute separation between truth and goodness and beauty, between divine and human, or between human and animal or animal and vegetable. But this does not prevent us from distinguishing between these several terms, and it is an abuse of language to treat them as identical. Probably the writer's critics would not find fault with his view if they understood the terms employed as he does. In the sense in which the writer understands ethics and morality, it is certainly not true that, "so far as a man is anything, he is moral." To say that one is "merely a moral man" is not equivalent to saying that he is "merely a perfect man." A man may be beautiful or ugly, intelligent or stupid, and in either case may be moral. A man may be moral with one eye and a club foot, but he is not therefore a perfect man. Similarly, a man who treats his fellow men with justice and humanity because he believes it to be right, is a moral man; but, however high his morality, he is not a highly religious man if he has no feeling of kinship with anything outside himself, or if he regards beauty as of no intrinsic value or as an evil and a temptation to man, and if he thinks that he has nothing to do with the pursuit of abstract truth. Reverence for beauty in the universe is a religious feeling, but it is not, in any fair sense of the term, a part of ethics. The Puritan who despised beauty and secular truth may have been highly moral; but, however high his morality, men are beginning to see that his religion was at a low stage. This is what was meant in the writer's sermon by "mere morality." The world has too long confused religion and morality. It is an error only less pernicious than that which supposes that religion can exist without morality. The religious man feels his relation to all that is. He is the man of love, the lover of beauty and of truth, throughout the universe, no less than of goodness. F. W. S.

THE WAITSBURG "COTTAGE UNITY."

DEAR UNITY: Some months ago I wrote giving a short sketch of a little gathering of faithful souls at our homes called "Cottage Unity." It still lives and grows—it has to grow—if not in numbers at least in zeal and charity. It had its beginning in my own family, and was known to the Church of our Father in Portland, Oregon, as the "Ingraham-Six."

Our meeting last evening was with a brother who once belonged among the receivers of the Swedenborgian doctrines—which, by the way, have helped greatly to bring the world to more liberal views of theology.

We assembled last evening to the number of sixteen. The interesting feature of the meeting was the reading of a sermon on the Prodigal Son by a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a recent adjunct to our Unity, the point of advancement being the statement that men were always the children of God and always would be. When the one sheep was astray and the shepherd left the ninety and nine to go in search of it, it was not the property of the wolf, it still belonged to the shepherd. The piece of silver lost by the woman, who swept diligently until she found it, did not cease to be hers while it was lost. So there are not, nor can there be, any children of the devil.

The discussion which followed the reading turned upon our first impressions—in childhood—of the Divine Being. Most of us, raised in the orthodox faith, had to modify or do away altogether with our first conception. Not many could conceive, at this time, of any personal God.

Our "Unity" now enjoys an abundance of good reading, thanks to the liberality of its friends. We receive the Christian Register, the Unitarian, the Christian Union and the Non-Sectarian; also many sermons and tracts from the Postoffice Mission. D. G. I. Waitsburg, Wash.

EDITOR UNITY—Allow me to congratulate you on the neat and improved appearance of UNITY, and I rejoice to see it take another step forward. May this one be the harbinger of others in the path of a larger and broader Christianity. One of your writers sounds the keynote of success when he advocates the union of all liberal religious denominations. Could they all unite under one name, and so present a solid front, the result would be a rapid advance along the way that all are now toiling.

I am gratified to note the harmony that pervaded the Institute of Liberal Teachers in Michigan. I would that all States might follow the example set by the leaders of the Independents, Unitarians, Universalists, and Reformed Jews, and thus take some united action for the furtherance of liberal religion. In my own State some towns have a strong Unitarian element, while in others the Universalist denomination takes the lead; and while there may be State organizations in both branches, yet they are seldom heard of and their meetings attract but little attention. Along this line, more than any other at the present time, I feel that union would strengthen the cause and do more for the advancement of liberal thought than any other step that could be taken. Denominational lines may not be torn down, but let the gathering be similar to the one held by our Michigan brothers, in which all workers for a religion of love, teaching the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, could meet in convention and formulate plans for the spread of the doctrine that they preach.

Liberal thought is growing slowly but surely in this section, and while the advance guard is fusiladed day after day by guns leveled from orthodox pulpits yet the progress seems to be onward and upward. Liberality is badly handicapped by the ignorance of the majority as to our belief and doctrine. The masses are taught to look upon a liberal Christian and a liberal church as some awful dragon ready to swallow up and ruin every soul who is contaminated by the terrible influences that surround the individual and the church. May the day come when the belief of a liberal man and a liberal church shall be permitted to stand upon its own merits, be allowed to take its place on a level with the evangelical churches.

The Universalist Church here stands for a religion of love and principle, seeking to stand upon the broad creed which looks to God as a Father and upon fellow man wherever found as a brother. The church edifice, which was erected last year, is furnished throughout and is nearly paid for. Rev. B. F. Snook is doing a good work here, and the congregations grow larger each week. The Sunday school is prospering, as is also the Y. P. C. U. Hon. J. H. Funk, who has labored faithfully for the cause since his removal here from Illinois, has just made the church a donation of $800 to apply on the building fund. Mr. Funk has always been a liberal giver, and this last gift is given as an earnest of his interest in the cause. A READER.

THE FUTURE LIFE.*

BY REV. T. E. ALLEN, SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN PSYCHICAL SOCIETY.

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." MATT. vi. 19-21.

Closely allied to the teaching of immortality is the doctrine of the Kingdom of Heaven. You are all familiar with the old view—now happily being modified to some extent—which divides the future life into a heaven and a hell, or, according to the Roman Church, into these and a temporary place of probation, purgatory. It is not so much in what Protestant and Catholic ordinarily affirm concerning the territorial divisions of the other life that their views are defective, but in the reduction of life in these places to a dead level, in teaching substantially that one saint is as good as another and that the punishment of the comparatively light offender, so long as he falls short of heaven, is the same as that of the most criminal and brutal mortal who ever lived. When to these conceptions is added the belief in eternal punishment, I feel called upon to protest and to put over against them what seems to me to be the truth.

Now, I am well aware that there are persons who do not feel that it is a matter of any particular consequence whether we know anything about the future life or not, about the general principles that govern it even, to say nothing about the details of environment, the occupations of the inhabitants, etc. Their thought seems to be: I believe in immortality, in future progress and in the goodness of God, and I reject eternal punishment; therefore, I will leave all to God, in whom I trust, and not trouble myself further in the matter. Or they may add that they do not believe that we can know very much about it, even if we earnestly desire light upon the subject. Are there any reasons why man will be benefited by a fuller and more correct knowledge of the future life than generally prevails? I shall lay the foundation for answering this question by stating my own beliefs.

Perhaps the most important spiritual law that affects man is the law that like attracts like. We find that the gentle seek those of mild disposition, the considerate those who regard the feelings of others, and that those interested in the same pursuits or problems are drawn together. It is true that the operation of the law of attraction and repulsion is not so dominating as not to be greatly modified by other influences. Duty, environment, lack of leisure and other conditions hold us all in contact with many persons who repel us, and separate us from others to whom we are drawn. Thus it happens that many fail to realize the strength and importance of this law which, in the relations of men to each other, can justly be compared to the action of gravitation between masses of matter. It is, in short, spiritual gravitation. Who is there among us who has not in imagination traveled great distances with the swiftness of thought to meet a congenial friend?

Why should we not affirm the operation of this law after death as well as before? Unless there are facts known to us which establish a presumption that at death human nature is essentially changed, I can see no escape from the conclusion that this law must hold for the other life. But, there are no facts whatever which suggest a sudden transformation. It is true that death brings with it more or less of change, but I find myself utterly unable even to conceive why, or how this transition alone can instantly alter the principles which govern our existence or the combination and degrees of faculties which distinguish each one of us as an individual. From the law of attraction, then, I reason that in the other world there must be a vast number of brotherhoods, corresponding to the great differences which exist between the inhabitants of earth, and also advanced societies fitted to receive spirits when they progress beyond those brotherhoods to which they gravitate immediately after death. The saying of Jesus, "In my Father's house are many mansions," and his recognition of degrees of greatness in heaven, are consistent with this view. It also follows—taking into account progress, in which we all believe—that each spirit can pass from one brotherhood to another as his attractions change.

For centuries the church has been solicitous that its devotees should pass at death to as heavenly conditions as possible, and laymen have shared this anxiety with the priests and clergy. The practical question that confronts us is, then, in what manner shall we live in order that each one of us may enter a comparatively exalted and harmonious society in the spirit world when we die? My answer is, that this can be done by cultivating the higher attractions and starving out the lower ones, and in no other way. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus tells the multitude not to lay up treasures upon earth, but to lay up treasures in heaven. Moth and rust and thieves attack earthly, but not heavenly treasures.

What is the difference between the two kinds of goods, and the significance of his exhortation? It is clear that the treasures of earth to which he refers are material things, wealth in its various forms. We next notice that the treasures in heaven are of such a nature that men and women can lay them up here and every day of their lives. After taking material things away from all that men aspire to obtain, then, we have left intellectual and spiritual riches; knowledge, the virtues, capacity for loving and forgiving, humility, etc., and character, as manifested in a disciplined will and in so many other ways. In brief, earthly treasures are what a man has, heavenly treasures what he is and what he has been. I include what a man has been as well as what he is, because his past acts, if good, have built up relations of friendship and love and kindly feeling, which constitute an essential part of his treasures.

Many things are said about wealth and money which show a lack of discrimination. It is not money that Paul calls the root of all evil, but the love of money. I rejoice that the world is as rich as it is, and believe that there will be a yet greater abundance. The trouble lies, not primarily in material things, but in the attitude of men toward them. The crucial question is, Which do you prefer the more—earthly or heavenly treasures? If the former, your disposition will be to sacrifice justice and all of the things commended by religious and ethical teachers to your love of money. If the latter, your love of money will be subordinate, and you will seek to acquire wealth honorably—doing to others as you would be done by. You will recognize, also, the danger of becoming too deeply immersed in material possessions. I do not overlook the fact that, under our competitive system, it is necessary for the merchant or manufacturer to be alert and industrious and concentrate his energies upon his business, but he and not his money should remain master of the situation. He should never forget that money is a means to an end and not an end in itself. As Paul says, continuing the quotation, "For the love of money is the root of all evil; which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows."

It is chiefly, if not entirely, on account of the love of money that such a thing as the problem of capital and labor exists. If a great catastrophe, exceeding, perhaps, the horrors of the French Revolution, should ever overwhelm our social structure, the tap root of the trouble will probably be found here. We are dealing, then, with one of the greatest evils which confront nations and individuals. Let us apply the law of attraction to one whose love of money is abnormally strong, and see what it suggests relative to his future life:

1. In proportion as he forgets that money is a means and not an end, it is probable that the real ends of life, which would lay up heavenly treasures, will be neglected, thus tending to send him into the other world in an impoverished condition. Thus it may happen—I do not say that it must—that the merchant prince and railway magnate will find themselves little better than paupers when they come to themselves in that new life.

2. There are likely to be pangs of conscience growing out of unjust business transactions.

3. If, as I believe, money-getting for the money-lover himself ceases at death, the probability is that the severest suffering he has to bear will grow out of the fact that his strongest attraction cannot be gratified in the spirit world, where he will feel lost, as out of place as a fish out of water; and therefore he will be under the necessity of strengthening the weaker attractions which exist within him, cultivating new ones, and gradually throwing off the absorbing passion of his life, before he can reach a state of contentment.

4. If he can know precisely what is done with the wealth he left behind, it will probably cause him much pain to see, as is so often the case, the wealth that he labored so zealously to accumulate squandered and scattered to the winds. All of these results would seem to flow naturally from his condition. As his treasure was in material things, his heart is still there, and whatever dissipates them makes him suffer.

You may say that he knew perfectly well before he died that he could not take his money with him, and that he ought, therefore, to at once renounce all interest in his former possessions; but, I would ask, if he was bound up in them, how is it possible for him to do this in the twinkling of an eye? At first, then, he would be attracted to join the society of men who, like himself, were interested in money. What would he care for the society of philanthropists, philosophers, scientists, artists, musicians, and many others whose attractions cultivated upon earth had developed the nucleus of a future heavenly state? He would tell you that there is no money for him in these things; and that would settle the question for him until he had partially conquered his passion.

I believe that there are fraternities in the spirit world adapted to the conditions of all men, from the most debased to the most exalted. I believe that the law which determines the character of the community to which each one will gravitate is as definite and binding as the laws studied by the devotees of physical science. I believe that had we the requisite knowledge we would find that these communities form a regular progressive series from the lowest to the highest, and that as one ascends, as it were, the rounds of this great ladder, he approaches nearer to perfection and finds a purer happiness. I also believe, therefore, that were it revealed to us so positively that we could say,

"I know that this is so," what the precise characters of different communities are, and what course in life will tend to attract a person to one rather than another at death—this information would be most valuable to the world; that it would stimulate many to labor more strenuously to avoid some things and to do others.

I do not forget that it can be claimed that we have a knowledge of certain principles which ought to be enough; that if we follow them faithfully we shall enter some of the higher communities. I confess that this knowledge is worth something in the absence of more definite information; but, on the other hand, I affirm that if such knowledge can be had we ought to obtain and make use of it. What would you think of a young man who said that he wanted to go to college and then mapped out a course of studies which would occupy two or three years without taking the trouble to find out what branches he must be examined upon to enter? There can be no reasonable doubt, I think, but that the relation between life here and hereafter is about like that between a preparatory school and a college: that they are adapted to each other, but far more perfectly than the educational institutions of earth.

Is there any way in which we can obtain the knowledge of which I have spoken? In the first place, I believe that every means of knowing of heavenly things that was open to Jesus and the apostles is open to man to-day. I will not claim that every one is now fitted to receive such revelations, any more than they were in the apostolic age. Nevertheless, if the founders of Christianity reasoned out certain things from principles, as I have reasoned to-day from the law of attraction, so can we, and we can go farther than they if our knowledge be more complete. If they received revelations from God, or were taught by finite spirits inhabiting the other world, then it is our birth-right as children of God to share the same privileges. In the second place, the claim of the spiritualist that spirits can communicate with mortals suggests that the way may open within a few years for the Christian world to receive such knowledge.

If the spiritualist is right, the efficiency of Christianity will be greatly increased by adopting and utilizing his truth. As Unitarians we have cast magical views of salvation aside; but, upon the supposition mentioned, it remains for us to obtain more definite information than we have had in the past concerning the future life, and to recognize that we now stand upon the threshold of a spiritual science and philosophy which, seemingly, can lift man up to a higher level, and bring religious teaching more into sympathy with laws that actually control man's development and tend to speed him toward the high destiny ordained for him by God.

WHERE THE WICKED FOLKS ARE BURIED.

"Tell me, gray-headed sex'on," I said,
 "Where in this field are the wicked folks laid?
 I have wandered the quiet old graveyard through,
 And studied the epitaphs, old and new;
 But on monument, obelisk, pillar, or stone,
 I read of no evil that men have done."
 The old sexton stood by a grave newly made,
 With his chin on his hand, his hand on a spade.
 I knew by the gleam of his eloquent eye
 That his heart was instructing his lips to reply.
 "Who is to judge when the soul takes its flight?
 Who is to judge 'twixt the wrong and the right?
 Which of us mortals shall dare to say
 That our neighbor was wicked who died to-day?
 "In our journey through life, the farther we speed,
 The better we learn that humanity's need
 Is charity's spirit, that prompts us to find
 Rather virtue than vice in the lives of our kind.
 "Therefore, good deeds we record on these stones;
 The evil men do, let it die with their bones.
 I have labored as sexton this many a year,

But I never have buried a bad man here."

"THE LADY OF HEAVEN."

I think my first real lesson in the true spirit of human brotherhood came from a lady who went long ago to her reward, and on whose grave the grass of many a year has grown. It was before people had begun to talk of Tolstoi, and when "slumming" was not yet a favorite amusement. I lived in a country village, which has since then become a fashionable center, but which was at that time as primitive as the neighborhoods of which Mary Wilkins writes. There were no factories in the place, no crowded tenements, no starving poor, but there was a certain amount of poverty and of ignorance; and there was in this place a lady—the richest lady in all the county, so I heard people say—and I watched her comings and goings with a sort of romantic eagerness.

She used to drive about, all over the big sparsely settled township, in a little open wagon, and in that wagon were books for children who had no home libraries, dainties for sick people, toys for fretful babies whose mothers had their own household to do. And this rich lady—who seemed to my childish eyes a sort of goddess of good fortune—never indulged herself in any luxury. Fashion was for her as if it did not exist. She wore a simple cotton gown in summer, and an equally simple woolen one in winter; and she went on her errands of mercy with a sun-bonnet shading her sweet face from the hot sons of June, or a warm hood protecting her ears from the blasts of January.

I don't know that I ever said to myself, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," but I surely felt it. One day I was sent to her house on some slight commission for my mother. She was out, as usual; but her housekeeper, discerning, I suppose, in my face something of the reverence with which I regarded her mistress, asked me suddenly, "Do you want to see where she prays?" and thereupon opened the door of a room almost as austere as a monk's, and pointed to a couch where I could see the impression left by a head bowed many a time and oft in secret prayer. "There," she said, "there's where she kneels." Just then the housekeeper was called away for a moment, and shyly, and almost as if it were sacrilege I was committing, I knelt in the spot where the Lady of Heaven, as I called her in my thoughts, was wont to pray, and put my childish head for one little moment in the place where hers had rested, and said a hurried prayer that I also might, with God's help, walk in the holy way she trod. I had been taken to church all the years of my life, I had heard prayers enough and sermons enough, but I do not remember that any one of them had ever moved me to a single thrill of spiritual longing and aspiration such as I experienced in that hushed room, where she was wont to kneel, whose daily life seemed to me more sacred than prayer or sermon.—Louise Chandler Moulton, in "Childhood."

The Sunday School

At the annual meeting of the Western Sunday School Society, held on the morning of the 18th, during the Western anniversaries, a symposium upon certain features in the management of a Sunday school brought out several papers that were rich in valuable suggestions to teachers and superintendents. We shall be able to give them, one by one, the place in UNITY that has been occupied by Mr. McDougal's notes on "Essentials of Character," that course being now closed. Those who were not in attendance upon the meeting will appreciate the opportunity of reading them, hardly more than will those who, having heard them, can now consider them with more thoughtful leisure. THE BLACKBOARD IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

READ BY REV. W. C. GANNETT BEFORE THE WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

I am only to talk about a blackboard, but let us begin in the large and give it its niche in the universe.

Ear, eye—the two Gates Beautiful between the outer and inner worlds, and each the gate to a separate realm of human nature. The ear is the Heart-gate; tones, music, emphasis, shadings of expression, enter by it; feeling calls unto feeling through it. The eye is the Mind-gate, the sense through which we get the form of things. Eye gives us form—a rim, an outline, that by which each conception, so far as it is conception, is a mental image. An idea is a thing eyed, a thing "seen;" the idol is simply an idea one degree more externalized, as an ideal may be called an idea one degree more internalized. Your thought is not clear to your own mind till it becomes an image; you cannot give it clearly to another mind save with rim and outline and, as it were, in picture. Make it concrete, we say, when we do not understand; give an illustration; tell an anecdote; draw a picture. Teach the child by object lessons. Preach your ethics by biography. Jesus taught in parables. To your lecture add the experiment, the map, the figure, the stereopticon. Help out the ear by eye.

Under this principle of teaching comes the blackboard—one of its humblest applications. And under this principle comes the use of the blackboard in the Sunday school. Let us never forget that the best influence of the Sunday school is heart work. Ear rather than eye, manner rather than lesson, face rather than the word, and tone behind the word rather than the thought in the word, makes the impression wanted there. Even in the college lecture room it was the enthusiasm and the face of Agassiz as he talked about his radiates and mollusks, and not what he said, that I have remembered through the thirty years and more. The mollusks soon slipped off my mind, but he impressed himself upon my heart. And much more in the Sunday school than in the common school or college is heart work the aim and the test of the teacher's success. But for all that the Sunday-school lesson, like any lesson, is also mind work—a call from a mind to a mind, an awakening of ideas, i. e., of things seen, in a mind; and here the dumb, dull, black surface which can flash white an outline, a thought-form, to the eye, is of immense help to the teacher and the taught. The blackboard is the humble canvas on which you can sketch to the eye your careful lesson as a whole, or can enliven your special points as you go along, lighting up the massiness of talk as the white foam-gleams enliven a lake surface. It is your sudden picture book, your cheap stereopticon, your improvised map, your momentary pantomime.

If I try to analyze with a little detail this immensity of help, I find it lies in three directions. First, it gives a chance of drawing a picture or a symbol to explain and impress your lesson. Great is the advantage for the little ones especially, and for all child-minded persons; and, who is not child-minded? Certainly the adult-class is; certainly you, the teacher, are. Why are Talmage's sermons the only sermons that go far and wide to the people of the United States? Because each one is a painted picture-book. Why do Minot Savage's sermons go twice as far as, with thrice the welcome of, any other sermons among ourselves? Because, without paint, each one is so limpid that anybody can see the thoughts outlined side by side like fish at the bottom of a pool. We are almost all child-minded, and an actually drawn picture—copy of a thing or symbol of a thing, no matter which—gives us all ease in trying to make the thing a thought. Chalk helps talk—teach all teachers that. Chalk helps talk so much that the evangelical Sunday-school societies used to send out four-foot square pictures, white on black, each week to illustrate their International Lessons. Perhaps they still do so. You ordered your fresh blackboard, all drawn, as you ordered your fresh milk, for the babes. That was very useful, doubtless, and yet, perhaps it was going to unnecessary extravagance. For the truth is, you can handle chalk clumsily and yet make it very effective. Your picture of a man, or a heart, or a circle, or a river, or a barn-door, may be only an ill-drawn symbol, not a picture, of the thing, and yet it will stand very well for the thing in reaching aspects and effects. They say, anybody can sing. I doubt that, but think any teacher can draw well enough to make a blackboard effective. And this, too, is true, that you may be too good an artist to be a good teacher. If you draw so well that the children admire your picture and you more than the point you would illustrate, you so far fail. Prof. Morse, of Salem, or your own Chicago Mr. French, would never do for a Sunday school, if there were chalk in the room. The children would lose the gospel in their delight over the art. I had an example in my own Sunday school a winter or two ago: After one of my clumsy chalk-talks one of my teachers came to me and gently suggested that perhaps she had a little more gift that way than I, and would be glad to do the pictures for me, if I wished. Of course I wished, and the next Sunday—we happened to be studying for two or three Sundays the religion of old Egypt—there glowed on the blackboard in colored crayons such a really fine picture of an old Egyptian temple, with its grand portal and its sphinxes and its obelisks and a bannered procession of priests, that the result was we had to keep the picture there, and lost all use of that side of the blackboard for the rest of the winter. I tell the story, not to humble the gifted, but to inspire the clumsy. If you have an artist, or are one, use the gift by all means; but if not, exercise your giftlessness.

To continue my detail of blackboard service, a second help comes from it for the intermediate classes, and again I might ask, Who isn't of the intermediate class? I refer here to the good of darting down in a word or two, so that the eye sees it, the point you are trying to teach through the ear. Help ear by eye. In three words, dart it down, white on black; let it stand, if only for a moment, and then for the brush. That is the foam-gleam that I spoke of. Every teacher or lecturer must know the difficulty of getting the main points of his thought into the minds of hearers, unless he aids himself by syllabus or text-book. For most of us the ear is a sluice-way, not a sieve that sorts out sizes as the things run through. It is to be hoped that most hearers get something from every sermon, but probably few get the main point. So with any lesson. Are you teaching about Moses? Before you are far along in the story, dart down in white, "Moses the Patriot," a little deeper in, "Moses the Emancipator," a little farther still, "Moses the Law-giver." It is surprising, but with two out of three of your pupils, the lesson's value and impression and remembrance will be at least doubled by those three glints of white before the eye. Then, besides main points, there are certain details of a lesson, little facts, simply sure to slip away unless you bring the eye to help the ear. Moses again—you want to fix his date, as a pivot-date in Hebrew history and religion: How many out of ten will remember by next Sunday that it was about 1320 B. C., if you simply tell it? Possibly one. But if you also write it? Only two,—but that is twice as many. How many if you write it, ask it, have them repeat it three or four times, a moment or two apart, as the talk goes on? Four, now—and that is good teaching, to get four out of ten.

The third and final good of the blackboard in teaching is for the older classes—those old enough to take in the lesson as a unit having parts, and those parts proportions and relations to each other. I value this use very greatly for an adult class, and for myself in all my own work. I mean the help which the mind gets by a seen analysis of a line of thought or fact, and gets still more by making such a seen analysis for oneself. A seen analysis, the written syllabus of your lecture, your sermon, your lesson, your essay; and this syllabus not run into a solid paragraph, but in heads and sub-heads, revealing the connection and proportion of the parts. Perhaps I value this too much—minds differ in their needs. Not all minds need to make their thought architectural, and the best artist work is not so made; it grows. But the animal body, though it grows, has its skeleton, which gives it framework and proportions. Every plant that grows has its living architecture, and can stand analysis. And I am sure, if most of us teachers and preachers would be humble-minded enough to go to work more like architects with our lessons and our preachments, the result would be more flower-like; I mean would be not only a thing of greater beauty, but a thing of greater meaning. There would be more unity, more proportion, more relatedness of part to part, more total effect, more saying what we mean, more having a point and more keeping to the point—more arriving! Now, the blackboard for the Sunday-school lesson offers the chance for this. If, for the older classes, you have the habit of carefully putting, white on black, the outline of the whole half-hour's talk with them, either beforehand or as it goes along, it will teach them a double lesson—not only the lesson about Moses, but the lesson of mental analysis and synthesis; in a word, the art of thinking. And this second lesson will be much the more important of the two; as much more important as you are than Moses—to yourself.

Let me only add: This service of the blackboard reaches its glory and transfiguration if, instead of merely putting this outline on the board yourself, you accustom the class itself to do it. No better use can be made of the last five minutes of the half hour than to stop short and get the pupils themselves to put down and arrange, white on black, the main points of the day's lesson.

So my ideal Sunday-school classroom would contain always a wall-blackboard, and a large one. If that cannot be, then, in lieu of it, a table, around which all would group, with a large slate* for the teacher's use; and in the older pupils' hands, notebook and pencils with which to reproduce the slate-work of the teacher, or to improvise their own.

And my ideal Sunday-school teacher and Superintendent—well, there are several tests for them, but one of my tests would be the question, "Can you handle chalk?"

There is a book, written by Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, and published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society in Boston, and called "Outlines and Charts, for conversation and study in Sunday schools, with aid of a blackboard." It contains twelve outline lessons on various subjects and adapted to different ages—each lesson developed in two forms: (1) in outline for the blackboard surface; and (2) in fuller detail, as notes for the teacher's talk. It is, I suspect, the most careful exhibition of the blackboard as a teaching-tool that anywhere exists in print.

The Study Table.

PHILLIPS BROOKS IN BOSTON.*

In "Phillips Brooks in Boston" we have a little volume containing nearly thirty editorials upon Phillips Brooks and his work, which appeared in the Daily Advertiser during the five years from March, 1888, to February, 1893. As Rev. Dr. Tucker points out in his introduction, this collection has a special value arising from the fact that it shows what was thought of the man in his own home before his death and also before he was chosen bishop. The fact that the editor of a great city daily, sensitive as one occupying such a position always is to public opinion, should for five years put before his readers frequent comments upon the work of Dr. Brooks, all in the same vein, is very satisfactory evidence that Dr. Brooks was, as Prof. Tucker says, a prophet "acceptable in his own country."

While this is true, I am not sure that one who should rely upon this volume to get an outside estimate of the man Phillips Brooks, would be greatly helped by it. Mr. Ayres was deeply impressed by the personal goodness of the man and the value of his work, and endeavored to express his estimate in appropriate language; yet he who has not had the advantage of a personal knowledge of the great preacher will, I think, put the book down with a feeling that it has not enabled him to get close to the heart of this great personality. Perhaps it is impossible to do the beloved Bishop justice in this respect. It may be that because of his excellence he must always be represented as armored in the full panoply of virtue, never, as it were, in the familiar undress of home. That which impressed one so greatly in direct personal intercourse with the man, his simple humanity, seems to be least evident in most representations of him. On the contrary, after reading and hearing them, we too often feel that this great being stood upon a pedestal above mankind. Mr. Ayres' enthusiastic admiration for the man and the original purpose of his editorials conspire to make his book like most representations of the Bishop in this respect. It may be that if some one could recall, I will not say a fault, but a foible in Phillips Brooks, he would be able to give us a representation which should have something of the vivid humanity of the original.

Be this as it may, in his appreciative comments upon the preacher and his work Mr. Ayres has done good service for the Church Universal in which Phillips Brooks labored. One of the most pregnant truths which he leads us to appreciate is that Dr. Brooks brought his breadth and progressiveness to the service of mankind, not by contending for the new view as against the old, for the broad as against the narrow, but by simply taking the higher, broader view for granted, and preaching and living it, without noticing the old. Then, when his hearers awoke to the fact that the truth he preached was not within the old limits, they had learned to value it too highly to give it up for the old view. F. H. S.

JULIUS E. OLSON'S article on "Norway's Struggles for Political Liberty," in the New England Magazine for June, is one that we would commend to all who are interested in, without being very well informed as to, the steady march of Norway toward the most perfect republican freedom. The vigor and independence which have characterized the Northmen in all ages are becoming specially noticeable in our own day, when Scandinavian literature—reflecting, as it does, the religious and political unrest of that division of the Germanic peoples—is becoming the most popular literature of Europe. Concerning the article of which we began by speaking, it is to be noted that although written by one whose sympathies are evidently with Norway in the present dispute, it leads us to see that there are grave practical difficulties in the way of a double diplomatic and consular service for the united kingdoms.

In addition to the papers in the Arena noticed in our editorial columns, we would note that Mr. I. E. Deen's article, "Save the American Home," is the clearest statement of the evil which results to the debtor class from a shrinkage in the volume of the currency, and of the benefit this class derives from the expansion thereof, that has ever met the writer's eye. So far his contention seems incontrovertible, and it is to be regretted that his adversaries should not have the candor to admit it. Until those who oppose the Populists take the trouble to study their position, and are candid enough to give them credit for all the truth it contains, they need not expect to convince them of their errors. When shall we realize that nothing which really appeals to men is wholly false?

The proof-reading in this month's Arena is not as good as it should be. We noticed several oversights in the articles by Dr. Shutter and Mr. Sanders; and there is a blunder in the table of contents, the prefixing of "Prof." to Mr. Sanders' name.

Notes from the field

Joint Conference.—A largely attended Joint Conference of the Wisconsin and Minnesota Liberal Churches was held in Menomonie, Wis., May 10-12. Rev. H. M. Simmons, of Minneapolis, preached the opening sermon, taking as his subject "Seeds," and his text, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a man who sowed good seed in the ground." Nature's care in the production and protection of the seed was shown; also in the sowing of it; how Nature was taking care of religion, too; that, though old forms of religion decay, the best part of them goes as seed into the future, and grows again and better. Man improves on Nature's methods, selecting the best species, the best ground, and defends the seeds, giving them the most favorable conditions. So we should select in religion—as Jesus said, "search the scriptures"—search and select whatever is good and true and holy. Search all scriptures, the holy books of every place and time; the scriptures of science and of thought. Select and till, remembering that tillage consists principally in weeding.

The second day's session was opened by a devotional meeting led by Rev. F. C. Southworth, of Duluth. Hon. S. W. Hunt welcomed the delegates with a ringing address, which was responded to by Hon. H. M. Lewis, of Madison, the President of the Wisconsin Conference, and Rev. M. W. Chunn, of Luverne, the Vice President of the Minnesota Conference. The discussions of the day were opened by Rev. L. H. Stoughton, of Baraboo, Wis., who read a paper on "Sunday Schools and Young People's Guilds." Rev. Kristofer Janson, of Minneapolis, followed, speaking concerning "Religious Work With and For Foreigners." In the discussion Rev. T. B. Forbush gave a remarkable instance of successful work on the part of one Norwegian minister.

After an elaborate lunch, served in the Menomonie parish house, Rev. T. C. Davis, of Winona, Minn., spoke of "The Work of the Free Church." Rev. Sophie Gibb, of Janesville, Wis., followed, speaking of "Its Opportunities." The discussion was opened by Rev. M. W. Chunn in an address of remarkable power and potency. A practical turn was given the discussion by Rev. Lloyd Skinner, of Eau Claire, Wis., who urged the conference to consider the obstacles of the Free Church and how to overcome them. He was ably supported by Rev. J. L. Jones, of Chicago, and others.

At 8 p. m., after Scripture reading and prayer by Rev. Helen G. Putnam, of Jamestown, S. D., Rev. W. S. Vall, of St. Paul, spoke of "The Realization of the Mission of the Liberal Church." Rev. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul, spoke "In Praise of Narrowness." Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones would reassure those who feared the movement of modern thought, showing that only through liberty can the triumphs of the future come.

On Friday morning the devotional meeting was led by Rev. T. B. Forbush. The relation of the church to the various reform movements of the time was the topic for the day. Rev. C. J. Staples, of St. Cloud, Minn., opened the discussion, taking the topic "Temperance." Rev. Sophie Gibb followed, with "Labor." Rev. Lloyd Skinner spoke on "Charity." Rev. F. W. N. Hugenholz, of Hillside, Wis., on "Emigration." Animated discussions followed each of these.

At 8 p. m., after reading and prayer by Rev. Lloyd Skinner, Hon. H. M. Lewis spoke of "The Aim of the Liberal Religious Movement," Rev. C. J. Staples of "Our Methods," and Rev. T. B. Forbush of "Results." For results he wanted the audience to look around them; the magnificent temple they were in, costing over $100,000; its library of 4,000 volumes and over 1,000 pamphlets and public documents; its reading room, supplied with all the representative papers and magazines; its G. A. R. rooms and museum; its club and amusement rooms, and the elegant auditorium in which they were assembled. Add to these the manual training school, the cooking and laundry schools, and the change made in hearts and lives, and some of the results of the liberal religious movement can be seen.

Oakland, Ca'. The annual report of this church contains so much of interest that, from lack of time and space, we are obliged to pass over almost everything in this issue, yet we would call attention to the praiseworthy determination of the Woman's Auxiliary to keep altruism in sight, even under strong temptation to be selfish in a good cause. The secretary writes that "though our great effort this year has been to raise money for the church, we have not been quite oblivious of our fellow-men." And later, she states that they voted to devote one tenth of their net monthly income to charity.

Olympia, Wash.—Rev. David Utter promises a visit to this place the second week in June. He did pioneer work in Washington Territory twenty years ago, and while in charge of the society in Olympia he visited other places in the Northwest. He was the first preacher of the Unitarian faith who held services in Seattle, which was then but a frontier village. He is to preach in Helena June 4, and in Olympia the following Sunday.

Wichita, Kan.—Rev. E. R. Shippen has resigned his pastorate and is going East. Mrs. L. S. Carter has become the superintendent of the Sunday school, an office which the pastor himself held while here.

Asheville, N. C.—This church has just completed eight months of uninterrupted work under the pastorate of Rev. Frederic W. Sanders, who has now resigned the charge in order to accept the assistant editorship of UNITY. The church will be closed during the months of June and July, and in August the pulpit will be occupied by Rev. Henry A. Westall, during his summer vacation. As this is a new society—Mr. Sanders' ministry being the longest pastorate it has had—it is not yet strong enough to keep open twelve months in the year; but it is hoped that before long it will be able to do so, and to build a church home for itself. The impression is abroad that the South is ultra-conservative, but there is a field here for much work among the young men of the South who are dissatisfied with "Orthodox" Christianity. An instance of breadth worth speaking of is that a ministers' conference for all "ministers of religion" in and about Asheville has recently been formed, of which the Unitarian pastor was a member, and in which he was uniformly treated with the most fraternal courtesy.

Iowa College, Grinnell, Iowa.—

Through the generosity of Mrs. E. D. and Miss Carrie Rand a Department of Applied Christianity has been endowed and a house provided for its head. Just what the work of the department will be is not now known; but something may be surmised from the man to whom the work is intrusted, the Rev. George D. Herron, D. D., of Burlington, Iowa, the author of several little books, which have been characterized as evidencing somewhat advanced ideas concerning the place which Christianity should hold in our modern life.

AYER'S Hair Vigor

Restores faded, thin, and gray hair to its original color, texture, and abundance; prevents it from falling out, checks tendency to baldness, and promotes a new and vigorous growth. A clean, safe, elegant, and economical hair-dressing.

Everywhere Popular

"Nine months after having the typhoid fever, my head was perfectly bald. I was induced to try Ayer's Hair Vigor, and before I had used half a bottle, the hair began to grow. Two more bottles brought out as good a head of hair as ever I had. On my recommendation, my brother William Craig made use of Ayer's Hair Vigor with the same good results."—Stephen Craig, 832 Charlotte st., Philadelphia, Pa.

WHAT THEY SAY ABOUT UNITY.

An Eastern reader says:

How I wish I knew who to thank for first sending me UNITY. It is the only paper I read every word of. If UNITY readers would simply tear the label from the wrapper of UNITY, and after reading it put it back and direct it to some friend, it would only cost a penny, and great good might be done in that way with very little trouble. I think UNITY much better than tracts to call attention to Unitarian thought. It is the best little missionary I know of.

A Southern friend writes:

UNITY with its new appearance has just reached me. Accept my heartiest congratulations upon the improved mechanical condition. Its spirit needs no alteration. It is as broad, safe and liberal as any lover of truth can desire. Anything that I and your other friends in the far South can do for you will be cheerfully done.

From the Boston Budget:

UNITY, the able and brilliant Unitarian weekly of Chicago, appears in a new and enlarged form, and is prepared to take its stand with renewed vigor in its work for the enlargement of thought and the beauty and sacredness of life.

From an Iowa reader:

UNITY is received in its new dress, and I think it quite an improvement; but however poor the form and paper heretofore, I cherished it for the breadth of thought and fellowship it has so righteously battled for.

So, with the new dress, we expect to see it go bravely on in its more than "Christian" mission of Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion. Truth, not pious cant, is what the world needs to save it from corruption.

From Northern Canada:

Many thanks for your friendly reminder. I had, indeed, forgotten that my UNITY subscription was overdue, and might not have thought of it for a long time. UNITY in its new dress seems much more dignified and to have altogether lost the free-and-easy look of old; but, doubtless, when I grow to feel acquainted, I shall like it better than before, and always it will have my hearty sympathy and my best wishes for its future.

An Illinois reader says:

Well, I must admit I do like your new dress.

To tell the honest truth, I thought UNITY as it was could hardly be improved upon, and looked upon the proposed change with a good deal of misgiving. But I find UNITY is still UNITY, and am not disposed to quarrel with the beautiful paper and clear print.

From a St. Louis subscriber:

Enclosed please find $1, for which will you extend my subscription to UNITY one year? I regard UNITY as the best paper published, so of course it is a necessity to me.

From a Kansas reader:

I am glad to be assured that UNITY will be continued. It has not, as yet, finished its good work. It is as much needed to-day as when it first commenced its work.

Seven Studies of Temperance. By W. C. Gannett. Unitarian Temperance Society. Price 10 cents.

Publications of the Unitarian Sunday School Society can also be supplied. Catalogue on application.

Washboards

Make It Warm.

Bobbing up and down over them is pretty hot work. That rub, rub, rub on them is the best thing in the world to warm you up, and tire you out, and wear holes in light and delicate summer garments. Why don't you use Pearline, and take it easy? You can keep cool—and yet have the work better done.

Pearline takes away the rubbing, and the washboard, and the warm work. It gives you more time to yourself—and saves your money.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 336 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward. And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes canvassed. Special inducements to agents will be given on correspondence. Subscriptions $1 per annum. Send all remittances to

WE are sorry to have to apologize to our subscribers for the delay in getting out the editions of UNITY preceding this. The changes in paper and in printers, which we have made in order to improve its appearance, have put the work into new hands, and it has taken some time to get things into smooth running order under the new conditions. Experience goes to show that such inconveniences are wont to attend a transition, but they are nevertheless hard to endure. We trust that they are now at an end, and that in future the paper will come out with satisfactory regularity.

As A sign of the times we note that in Colorado in November the question of woman suffrage is to be settled by popular vote; that is, of course, by the vote of those who now have the franchise—the men. It is hardly probable that the vote will be for female suffrage this time, but the action of the Legislature in thus submitting the question is worthy of remark.

SAYS Dr. Bartol:

"There is a point in which all denominations, Christian and pagan, meet. Even their peculiarities, like rivers to the sea, run from and into the common heart. To discover and establish this fact is the tendency of our time."

Who can doubt that that point is where ethics or the desire for excellence and the willingness to help one another is. The inclusive religion is the religion of character—the religion whose inspiration is the purpose to help the world along.

If the telegraphic reports are to be trusted, the Rev. Dr. Ecob, a Presbyterian pastor in Albany, N. Y., is about to withdraw from that fellowship on account of the Dr. Briggs decision, and has declared his interest in a movement to establish a Free Church of America. Good, Brother Ecob! Go ahead; you have the opportunity of serving many by leading in this direction. To join the Unitarian, or any other existing organization, would carry with it a theological inference which might not be true. But run up the banner of a Free Church and it only implies a truce to theological disputations, a recognition of the right of each one to think as he will or as he must, and that you unite in a unity of purpose,—the oneness of moral aim and of spiritual excellence.

In an able editorial on the Basis of the Liberal Faith, the Non-Sectarian sums up the difference between the "orthodox" and the liberal church in these pregnant words: "The orthodox church believes in the person of Jesus; we believe in the spirit of Jesus." And it points out that while the "orthodox" Christian exhausts his faith in believing physical facts about Jesus, the representative of liberal religion has his faith strengthened by contemplating the ideal held up by the loving Nazarene. When a larger part of the world "looks to Jesus" in this way, his name will not be a word to conjure by, but his life will be of more value to mankind than it can be while he is regarded as a being of supernatural perfection.

THE United States Courts have decided adversely to the "Open Fair" movement. Perhaps they are technically right. But it will be noticed that both judges who gave the majority decision did so on technical and purely legal grounds. The fundamental question of the right of Congress to interfere with the religious liberty vouchsafed by the Constitution was scarcely touched. If the Appellate Court can be induced to touch this deeper question it will be a great service. A decision that will explode the assumption that this Government is a "Christian" government will be worth more than many open fairs. This is a human government, and Christianity, like all other religions, must take its chances before the law, and go up or down according to its moral weight and life-helping power. If it needs governmental protection it is not worth the saving.

THERE is such a unity in the structure of the world that study in any line, whether it is the study of embryos, animals, words, dynasties, stars, laws, you will find the underlying universal truth if only you go deep enough. No greater contribution toward the modern conception of evolution was made by any student, even of zoology, geology, or astronomy, than was made by Bopp in his Comparative Grammar of Indo-European Languages. It may well have seemed barren of fruit for the world's quickening—the study of Sanskrit roots—but it was one of the vital causes which led to the extraordinary improvement in historical theory and in general thought about the world which has taken place in the last seventy-five years. Study, then, what you like best; but go deep enough and you will find that you have reached one of the strata on which the universe rests, and to that same stratum all students in all lines will also in time penetrate, and thenceforth thought has one more firm foothold.

We print in this issue the report of the Superintendent of Western Work of the A. U. A., read at the recent anniversaries in Boston. We give the report in full, because our readers will be glad to know of the progress of the work in this field. We have frankly spoken in these columns our dissent from the present arrangement, not because, as a recent editorial in the Register seemed to imply, we do not think there is work to do, or because that work is not in a measure being done, but because we do not think it is being done in the best way. The double confidences, the divided executives are distracting and oftentimes discouraging. We see no reason for two officials to cover essentially the same field. If this has ever been necessary, it is not so now, when there is such practical harmony and unanimity among our Western churches. If there is but one executive necessary, we think the argument advanced in the annual report of the Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference, published two weeks ago, unanswerable. And the A. U. A. ought to save the $3,500 a year or more now spent on the salary of its Western Superintendent and the "Chicago office," and give its confidences to the organizations on the ground. Their officers stand now, as always, ready to give the necessary information and co-operation; free of cost, or nearly so. Let there be fewer officers and more privates in the missionary army.

THE action of the Women's Auxiliary of the Oakland Unitarian Church in voting to devote one third of their net monthly income to charity, although they were very anxious to reduce the debt of the church, suggests a temptation to which struggling churches are generally exposed, and before which they so often fall. They feel that the need of taking care of themselves and getting clear of debt is so great that they ought not to be expected to contribute to other charitable and philanthropic causes, although they themselves may be most persistent beggars. They forget that a church exists and is supported for the good it can do, and that a weekly service, attended by a limited number of church members, is hardly a sufficient contribution to the good of society to justify the community in contributing very liberally to its support. Such parsimonious little churches often drag on a miserable existence for years, all the time on the brink of dissolution, when by a more liberal course, by taking such an active part in the good works of the community that their presence should be felt and appreciated, they would have grown strong and probably have paid off their debt. It is true that justice comes before generosity, and that we should pay our debts before giving lavishly; but there is reason in all things, and we must learn that "as we journey through life we should live by the way." He who is always getting ready to live may be said never to live. In the regular conduct of business, men are constantly and necessarily creating debts, but this does not prevent them from spending money for any reasonable object. As long as expense is reasonably proportionate to income, it will not prevent men from meeting their debts when they become due. Let us not, like the miser, be too afraid of debt to enjoy what we have; but rather let us do what our hand finds to do, and, if necessary, like the prudent business man, make a legitimate use of credit, treating it as an instrument that will enable us to do a larger work for humanity.

We regret that it was not stated in last week's UNITY that the article on "The Religious Aspects of Citizenship," by Rev. Charles F. Dole, was one of the papers read during the session of the Western Unitarian Sunday-school Society, at the "Sunday-school experience meeting," which was the most prominent feature of this year's session of the society.

SPIRITUAL MIGRATION TOWARD THE PEACE OF POISE.

Professor Shaler, in his recent book called "Interpretations of Nature," tells of the quaint and weird destiny that periodically seizes upon the "lemming," a Norwegian animal resembling the rat. Normally these little creatures live in the mountains on the borders of Finland. For many years they dwell quietly in their native country; but at intervals of a few decades they are seized with a migratory impulse, and in great bands they march westward in direct lines, turning aside only to evade insurmountable obstacles until they reach the sea, into which they fearlessly plunge, and swim away until they are drowned. Our author compares this strange freak with the mad impulse to emigrate which seized the Goths, who, in the seventh and eighth centuries, moved southward without, apparently, any distinct purpose. He ascribes both to the "accumulation of impulses within them to the point where gratification becomes an imperative necessity." Something like this is taking place in the religious world today. Yielding to psychic influences as imperative in their potencies and more beautiful in their tendencies, great multitudes of souls are on the march away from the conventional lines of theology, out of the traditional and convenient homes of organized religion, toward something more clear and real. Let them march. Every step of the way they will find new prospects, fresh conditions, freer breathing space. And at last they will reach the sea, whether to plunge in and be drowned, like the "lemmings" of Norway, or, like the Greek wanderers, to find new enthusiasms and fresh dreams of home awakened, it matters not; in either case their contribution to the onward march of religion will be made.

There is one thing nobler than a thirst for heaven, and that is a thirst for usefulness. There is one thing more restful and reassuring than the consciousness of salvation theologically secured, and that is the consciousness of oneness with the God of the universe, with the throbbing life of Nature. There is one thing more inspiring than the love of humanity, and that is the love of the potency which includes human nature, which interprets and is interpreted by human nature. The inspiration of science in the presence of death says:

"Let go the breath.

There is no death

To the living soul, nor loss, nor harm.

Not of the clod

Is the life of God:

Let it mount, as it will, from form to form!"

The trend of religion is to "broaden our interests on the horizontal plane and diminish them in the vertical." Let us find the "peace that passeth all understanding" in this breadth of divine sympathy with the God that now is, the heaven that is here, the radiance about us.

Recently we heard an ingenious and eloquent plea made for what the speaker called "narrowness." Borrowing a Bible figure, he compared the running brook in its intensity and clearness, kept within well defined bounds, to a marsh, with its stagnant pool without defined limits and definite tendencies. His sympathies were with the running brook; with the defined religion rather than with the liberal religion that "comes from nowhere and goes nowhere." The figure was apt, but, like most figures, it is treacherous, and the conclusions are unscientific. The truth is, the marsh—the stagnant pool, if you please—is a very Jackson Park in the domain of material life. There Nature is fairly at work. There is more life, pulsing, sentient, creative life in one acre of marsh than in a thousand miles of brook. There, all the way from the delicately tinted algæ—the poets of vegetation—with their silken filaments, up through the amœbæ, which you can gather in a colony of thousands in a homœopathic pellet bottle, up through the harping frogs—the croaking bullfrog, that inflated millionaire of the kingdom of Batrachia—to the waving cat-tails, all is life,—splendid, throbbing, creative life. In the marsh the tenderest grasses grow. There the cowslips welcome the dawn of summer, and the glorious cardinals celebrate summer's high noon, while the fringed gentian touches with spiritual beauty the evening of summer. In the marsh, amid the waving flags and drooping willows, the red-winged starling holds his choral convention and makes beautiful the mist with song. In the marsh is being silently but surely laid that best of soils, which will some day be man's chosen garden-patch, yielding strawberries, apples and roses. Present meadows and wheat-fields were once marshes, and what is marsh to-day will yet yield breadstuffs to the world.

I like this suggestion of Nature as to what religion can do when it is broad, diffusive, pervasive, quiet and persistent, like water on a meadow. A thousand forms of beauty will spring into life under its wooings, which religion with its brook-like intensity in its creed-lined banks can never produce and never know.

Let us never be afraid of breadth. The water of life, welcome in every form, is most welcome in its soil-making, flower-creating, and fruit-producing character. Science teaches us to revere the "grasses that grow in the Garden of God," and to remember that the leaves of the Tree of Life are for the healing of the nations. The religion that shall know no strained relation to its science, and that shall war only with ignorance and superstition, will sing the "Song of the Universal."

"Out of the bulk, the morbid, and the shallow,

Out of the bad majority, the varied, countless frauds of men and states,

* * *

"Only the good is universal.

* * *

"Give me, O God, to sing that thought, Give me, give him or her I love this quenchless faith

In thy ensemble; whate'er else withheld, withhold not from us

Belief in plan of Thee inclosed in Time and Space, Health, peace, salvation universal."

THE PITY OF IT.

By the decision of the Supreme Court the Geary law stands. The Chinese must go. But all the same the law is an outrage and a shame. What a travesty on the Republic! In the early days, when the country was young, another spirit prevailed. Then the cry went out to all races of every kindred and tongue: "Here is room. Here is opportunity. 'Stablish a nation on new lines of toleration, charity, equality; all views, all religions, all enterprises of genius and human activity to be honored. The appeal was world-wide. The future was for mankind. And it was seen to be a future such as no other nation could initiate or defend—a new nationality raised on the pedestal of a common human destiny. There was foreseen a people distinguished politically from the elder nations by reason of seeking cosmopolitan and humanitarian ends; by cherishing sentiments of justice and right, of which they were no more ashamed than of their prayers and for which they had the amplest opportunity to live.

This was the new chance that came with American Independence. On this northern continent there should be planted a home for a free people gathered from under every sky of the habitable globe. This it was that made the American citizen proud of his country, for so to be American did not antagonize him with his belief in the common fraternity of man.

But now the spirit has changed. The rivalry of races has bred another class of political patriots. America is for those whom we (who happen to be here) want. We have taken John Chinaman in hand first. Whose turn next?

Of course the Geary legislation is apologized for with the plea of self-defense. The Chinese imperil the welfare of the other inhabitants, and that is reason enough; they must go. Russia, barbarous and cruel, drives forth the Jew. America, "humane and just," pouces on the Chinaman. One law covers it all; the law of "self-defense." "Me, my wife, my son John." The rest to the dogs.

It is plain that our political leaders are on a false scent. They are chasing visions that lead only to evil. The republic needs no wall around about her. Her shores on every coast may remain open to the world. The republic is not to be built up in the similitude of narrowness and exclusiveness, by tinkering politicians, balancing rivalries, jealousies, racial prejudices, seeking their own elevation to power. In a sense the republic is not to be "bullded" at all. It is, from decade to decade, the resultant of unfettered human activities, life carried forward without dictation, the people all freely bringing special contributions to be adopted or rejected by the prevailing good sense.

There is and has been too great a disposition for tinkering. Things are not left enough to themselves. Henry Doty Maxon, of cherished memory, would say when approached for his signature to some new movement for prohibiting this or that great evil: "The evil will prohibit itself, if you do not legislate. Once get the people to reason the matter out, and you have a law that cannot be repealed." Mr. Moody's gospel is not unlike. He, on one occasion, as I remember, said: "I have little to do with 'going to law.' I lay less stress on prohibitions than on salvations. You can't force people into heaven." Such voices correct the tendency for compulsory salvations for this world or the next. To change the figure, there are too many inflexible pilots lying in wait to anchor the good ship of state safely in some little stream that flows by their farm. If she sail the high seas of human hope, with only generous, hospitable, humane sentiments spreading her sails, she will founder some dark night, and go down 'mid the swirl of God's wrath. "Oh, ye of little faith!" With you it is poor man, poor God. Nevertheless, it were better that each mind his own affair with what of loyalty and force he have, and let the good ship drift. "The ship of heaven guides itself, and will not accept a wooden rudder."

It is to be hoped that the republic will hold her own against the disloyalty of her too virtuous politicians. Persecutions, banishments, are not her forte.

UNIVERSALIST AND UNITARIAN.

The relation between Universalism and Unitarianism seems to be the subject of much discussion at the present time.

Rev. Mr. Wendte's recent statement that there is "no call in California for the old type of Universalist gospel, with its incessant polemic against hell-fire, its literal interpretation of Scripture, its supernaturalism, and other primitive features," which was accompanied by an intimation that too many of the Universalist ministers attempting to work in California voiced this outworn phase of Universalism,—has aroused the wrathful indignation of the editor of the Christian Leader, and he is particularly incensed by Mr. Wendte's statement that the California Universalists now occupy a similar position to that occupied by the Unitarians of fifty years ago. The Christian Leader thinks so poorly of what it styles the theological timidity and paltering of the Unitarianism of that day, that it considers this last statement highly injurious. Yet from some recent editorials in the Leader and other Universalist papers, and from the tone of Rev. Q. H. Shinn's remarks, which the Leader quotes with apparent approval, it would seem that much at least of the conservatism attributed to the California Universalists is not yet abandoned by prominent Universalists. Mr. Shinn writes:

"In about all the cities I have visited in the West our Unitarian brethren claim that they can do our work. I do not agree with them. * * * They hunt up our people and try to persuade them that 'there is no difference.' Now, if this be true, and there is no difference between Universalism and Unitarianism, they are right; we have no mission, for, having a better missionary system and more money and being already on the ground, they are surely better able than we to accomplish the work of 'the liberal church.' Please notice that I quote this term, for I never use it myself—I have come to despise it, because it does not mean anything; so I never call the Universalist Church a liberal church. By defining the term every time I used it I could perhaps convey some meaning by it, but I have no time, and so, as I do not want to be understood as belonging to the great 'go-as-you-please' church of the age, I content myself with the name I love—Universalism—I am a Universalist."

The editor of Manford's Magazine, in the May number, attempts to explain the difference between Unitarians and Universalists by comparing a Unitarian's view of St. Paul, contained in a recent article in UNITY, with Dr. Eddy's view, set forth in the Christian Leader of the same date—the Unitarian believing that Paul thought that the nature of the whole human race had been corrupted by Adam's fall and brought under the wrath of God thereby; while the Universalist maintained that Paul's teaching was that of the Gospels and of Universalism. The Unitarian here assumes that a Biblical writer was in error, while the Universalist endeavors to demonstrate that the Biblical writer is right. This is, perhaps, characteristic of the average Unitarian and Universalist. In reference to the Bible, it is generally true that the orthodox Christian says: "Such a thing is true because the Bible says so." The Universalist says: "It is true, and the Bible says so." The Unitarian says: "It is true, whatever the Bible may say about it." The Universalist still clings, as a rule, to the assumption that if a thing be true in the field of religion it must be taught in the Bible; and thus he makes the true interpretation of the Bible the supreme thing; while the Unitarian looks for God in the soul of man and in external nature no less than in the Bible, and when the latter contradicts the revelation of Nature he does not hesitate to say that the Bible is wrong.

But while this is largely true, it is not necessarily true. A man may be a Universalist without believing that all religious truth is taught in the Bible, and a man may be a Unitarian who believes that it is. And, indeed, the fact seems to be that the Universalist press is generally more conservative and more sectarian than the rank and file of Universalists. Whatever Mr. Shinn or the majority of California ministers and Universalist editors may think and feel, a goodly number—and I think I need not hesitate to say most—of the Universalists of our day are glad to call themselves "Liberals." The Universalists and Unitarians of Wisconsin and Minnesota have shown that they regard themselves as true brethren, doing the same work, and for the most part occupying the same position. Having reached their present standing-ground by different routes—the one through the heart, the other through the head; the one through a conviction of the goodness, the other through a conviction of the unity, of God—they naturally retain the name that indicates the country through which they have passed. But both, we believe, value their fellowship in the truth more than their denominational designation, and would rather be liberals than sectarians.

THE SUSPENSION OF PROF. BRIGGS.

The large majority against Prof. Briggs in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church shows how strong are yet the bulwarks of conservatism and superstition. How little has the new thought penetrated when even the mild and guarded new theology of Prof. Briggs will not be tolerated! The decision of the assembly shows how with hundreds of intelligent and candid ministers the belief in certain dogmas precludes all fair investigation or impartial decision. John Stuart Mill said that in some other planet two and two might make five. But in the dogmatic world in which these ministers live two and two always make five. No fact, no scholarship, no argument, no amount of evidence, not even a voice from heaven, could convince them. How true the words of Jesus are: "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." Truth, the real kingdom of heaven, is closed to those who haven't the humb'le, teachable spirit of the little child.

But there is reason for hope and thanksgiving, because in that conservative assembly there were a hundred ministers who protested against the decision of the majority as unjust and unchristian. The new thought has found entrance, and a great, silent revolution is going on. Let it be admitted that theology is progressive, and all at last will follow. Let it be granted that the Scriptures are not inerrant, and that reason and the church are fountains of authority, and the tyranny of the old dogmas is broken. If there be something of the spirit of Luther in Prof. Briggs, and we think there is, his educational work has but just begun. J. G. T.

MR. MORRISON I. SWIFT, in a recent number of the Open Court, suggests that the First of May, 1900, shall be made the day of freedom for enslaved labor. On that day the workingmen shall take charge of the great business plants and manufactories, and all shall equally share in the profits thereof.

That there is a social slavery, a grievous injustice, in our present industrial system we grant. It is also wise and inspiring to have an ideal, a great aim, to work for; and it quickens the blood to think that May First, 1900, may be the workingmen's jubilee. But setting aside the opposition of capitalists and owners to the scheme, let us ask, Would the workingmen be ready for it in seven short years? Here is a factory where a thousand men are employed. Have these thousand men the education, knowledge, training, fairness, balance, unselfishness to manage successfully a great business like this? Would they be willing that the wisest among them should guide and rule? Would they be willing to accept less wages in times of financial stringency, when the factory was running at a loss?

Socialism is a truth—an ideal for which we all ought to work. As men become educated, trained, just, power will be divided. Mr. Swift is too much in a hurry. If he would say May First in the year 2100 he would be nearer right. J. G. T.

UNITY.

O Thou before whose onward course
The pulsing heavens rise and fall,
Encradling Space, enfolding Force,
Life and Life-giver unto all—
I may not call on Thee in prayer,
Thy majesty I dare not name,
Yet fearless through the years I fare,
For we are one thing and the same.

I count not Time an enemy,
For Time and Thou and I are one;
I sit contented here with Thee,
With Thee I mount from sun to sun.
I seek not far, I spurn not near,
For far is near and near is far:
This heart that beats so softly here
Keeps time to yonder rolling star.

I am the solvent and the solved,
I am the knowing and the known,
And the same' thought in me revolved Goes speeding on through yonder zone.

I am the singer and the sung,
The worshiped and the worshiper,
The ever old, the ever young,
The bolder and the timider.

I shall remain and I shall change,
I shall give over and shall last,
But nothing ever can estrange
This present glory from the past.
So when the final fate shall fall,
When to the mystery I bow,
What matter how the change they call—
Force, matter, death, life, I, or Thou?

Thus fearless through the years I fare,
O'er-riding doubt and mocking doom,
And Thou art with me everywhere,
And I shall cleave all earthly gloom.
O quickening Thought, O speeding
Fate,
Speed, speed forever, full and free!
O Flux of all things small and great,
We 're one to all eternity.

REPORT OF WESTERN SUPERINTENDENT.

TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION:

GENTLEMEN—In accordance with the instructions of your Secretary, I present the following report of work in the Central West.

Owing to the financial uncertainty which has obtained during the year, church extension has not been pushed with the usual vigor, it not being thought wise to promote new enterprises which it might be difficult to sustain. Promising opportunities have been regretfully neglected, response to urgent calls has been postponed, and attention has been largely concentrated upon the work already in hand. We have cultivated the old fields instead of breaking fresh ground. Yet the year has not been without substantial progress.

NEW ORGANIZATIONS.

Among the organizations which have come into existence or have gained positive church life and form, are the church at Youngstown, Ohio, which, after a brief experience with a pastor, is now in charge of Meadville students; the Jordan Church, which is an offshoot of Mr. Douthitts' Shelbyville, Ill., parish; the church at Streaty, I.I., which, thanks to the wise and careful fostering of Rev. L. J. Duncan, the State missionary, is already large in numbers and able and willing for self-support; the church at Perry, Iowa, which has grown out of the mission stage into a settled pastorate; the church at Arkansas City, Kansas, which sought our fellowship, fully organized and officered; the little church at Rocky Ford, Col., which has sprung up around its devoted pastor, Rev. George H. Taylor, and through his personal exertions; and the Scandinavian church at Tordjensk, old, Minn., which Rev. Mr. Brauti has created as an adjunct to his Underwood parish. Word also comes that the Sunday Circles at Sterling, Rock Falls, and Ottawa, Ill., and Cherokee, Iowa, are steadily moving toward church consciousness and church organization.

Notwithstanding the financial limitations which have interfered with distinctly missionary operations, promising stations have been opened in Wisconsin, in Minnesota, in Kansas, in Colorado, and down in Oklahoma, newest of Territories. The Secretary of the Helena (Mont.) Society writes that, through the widespread and increasing influence of Mr. Crooker's work, the demand will soon be imperative for at least two more Unitarian churches in that State. Space fails me to even mention the applications which have come from towns and cities in almost every State and Territory for the visiting preacher, each writer saying that the time was ripe for the liberal church. The demand is far beyond the present possibility of supply. The same condition exists throughout the West. The people are ready to listen; many are hungry for the larger thought of religion; but they have little spare money. They are engaged in building homes, in constructing towns and cities, in establishing in one generation a civilization which it has taken older communities a century to gain. The imperative necessities of the situation prevent their doing what they desire to promote liberal religion.

CHURCH BUILDINGS.

Six new structures have been erected during the year. The faithful few at Sherwood, Mich., have received the reward of patient work, in a very neat church-home. Jordan Church, at Shelby, Ill., is a memorial to one of its most honored pioneers. Colorado Springs rejoices in a charming bit of architecture, which harmonizes perfectly with its grand surroundings. Fargo, N. D., has secured for itself a commodious and much needed structure. The congregation at Neillsville, Wis., has completed a beautiful and very satisfactory edifice. The little Icelandic flock at Winnipeg, thanks to the generosity of Eastern and English friends, has been commodiously housed in a sufficiently ample chapel. Toledo, Ohio, has a handsome church well under way. Kristofer Janson's Scandinavian congregation at Hudson, Wis., contemplates a building this summer. Mr. Brauti's three congregations at Underwood, Tordenskjold, and Battle Lake will build or buy as soon as three hundred dollars additional can be raised. The Duluth society has secured an admirable lot, and will move its present building upon it and refit it neatly during the summer vacation. The church at Wichita, Kan., has a good-sized building fund already in hand, and the Swedish Unitarian Society in Minneapolis is moving in the same direction. It is a time of building if not of planting, and this general building movement indicates that Unitarianism in the West has a solid foundation and has come to stay. It is establishing permanent centers of enlightened and progressive spiritual life, not only for this but for all future generations.

Sixteen churches have been so fortunate as to obtain pastors since May, 1892, most of whom are doing excellent work. Four of these churches welcomed Harvard graduates, five took their pastors from other congregations, while seven received their new leaders from outside sources. It is somewhat significant that no Meadville graduate has permanently entered the Central West during the year. The interest among the Icelanders in Manitoba and North Dakota increases. The Winnipeg congregation, as already stated, has been comfortably housed. A printing-press has been sent to Pastor Skaptason at Gimli, and he has begun the publication of a liberal religious monthly—the Dagsbrun—which not only gives his own thought but translations from some of our best Unitarian writers, and is widely distributed throughout the Icelandic settlements in Manitoba and Dakota, and even in the mother country itself. The work is too extensive for the workers. In addition to the churches at Winnipeg and Gimli, there are some eight or ten scattered congregations and missions, and numerous calls from new points. Peterson and Skaptason cannot meet the demand upon their time and strength.

The full details of work in a field that embraces seventeen States and Territories, besides Manitoba, cannot possibly be given in a brief report. In this Central West the work of the association is assuming large proportions. During the year it has aided, either by gratuitous preaching or by direct financial assistance, some seventy churches and mission stations, scattered over every part of this wide field except Wyoming. Yet it has not been able to meet all the demand made upon it, but has been compelled to say non possumus to numerous applications.

Your Superintendent has attended sixteen conferences, councils, and institutes, ten ordinations and installations, four dedications; has made seventy-one separate visits to fifty-five different churches; has given between ninety and one hundred sermons and addresses, traveling over thirty-two thousand miles in the accomplishment of his various duties; but he is painfully conscious of the things left undone. He sincerely regrets that, when the work is so rapidly growing, he should be deprived of the valuable services of such experienced helpers as Powell, of Kansas, and Daniels, of Michigan, both of whom have accepted Eastern pastorates. Their intelligent and faithful co-operation was invaluable, and their departure is a great personal loss.

The steadily increasing magnitude of the work of church extension in the Central West, and the impossibility of any single person attending to all its details, emphasize the value and necessity of well-organized and efficient State conferences. Only local men and local organizations can carefully prospect so wide a field and select the points where time and money can be wisely spent. Missions flourish and churches are established where local pastors interest themselves in their own neighborhood, foster and make effective their State conferences. The Association can give aid and counsel, but only where the men on the ground are active and interested does the work go bravely forward. Even State missionaries will not accomplish much without the hearty co-operation and wise backing of the ministers of the State in conference assembled. Hence, to foster State conferences, to promote their activity and efficiency, is the surest method of promoting the Unitarian cause in the Central West. All of which is respectfully submitted.

T. B. FORBUSH,
Western Superintendent.

AN OPEN LETTER TO DR. C. A. BRIGGS FROM ONE OF THE COMMON PEOPLE.

PROF. C. A. BRIGGS:

I wonder sometimes if you know, have an idea, of the interest that your trial has awakened in the common people (of whom I am one) all over the land; of the numbers who have watched for the coming of the daily paper that they might see how the Briggs trial stood that day. They watched just so during the trial in Portland, and then, again, during the trial in New York, and, with culminating interest, the trial in Washington.

I often ask myself, what is it that has stirred the people so throughout the land? And I have tried to fathom this thing. It doesn't matter to us lookers-on how the case goes. We shall never see Dr. Briggs, and it doesn't matter to us—the foolishness of these ministers or the incomprehensible stupidity of their arguments, and their solemn, very baby talk. Pretense—put on, all of it—it seems to us. And yet we cannot suppress our interest. Why is it?

Why, to me and to the many with whom I talk daily, it seems so evident that a new spirit is abroad in the land; the world is laughing down this old stuff. It has been educated too far to endure longer this twaddle (I must use the word that I hear dozens of people use every day) that people have called religion.

People have learned the alphabet. They have been learning (all except this old Assembly) somewhat to think, and it does seem amazing that people can hold the opinions that have been expressed by members of the Presbyterian Church in that trial! It is incredible that we can be living—intelligent people of this age—right beside people yet in the stone age! For such talk as has been daily reported in our newspapers can only come from people living in inconceivable ignorance, and of a morality below the common standard of those to whom we send our missionaries.

It was not long ago that an old man who had been, he said, more than half a century in the Presbyterian Church, and who was found every Sunday in his seat, said to me: "I have not done much for missions of late years; the fact is, I don't feel any interest in supporting them. I suppose it will surprise you to hear me say this, but I say it solemnly: There is not a people in the world, a single heathen nation, to whom we send our missionaries at such a sacrifice of money and life, that has a creed so monstrous—I repeat it, so monstrous—as the creed of my own Presbyterian Church."

It was in talking over the former arraignment and trial of Dr. Briggs that he made these remarks. He said he had been tried twice himself for heresy, in Scotland, but they always let him stay. He had watched, years ago, the trial of Prof. Swing, as had I myself, and he had watched Prof. Briggs' trial with great interest. "Briggs," he said, "had gone but a very little way; he couldn't stop where he was; he would be led out into clearer light." And this furnishes the text, the real prompting to my letter. The common people, that is, the people of common sense, are everywhere saying: "But the amazing thing of all this is, how can Dr. Briggs stop where he is? How can he be such a stickler to prove that the book of Isalah was not all written by one man, or that Moses did not write all the five books that have been attributed to him, telling us the story of his own death and burial—and leave untouched the terrible immorality attributed to God in many of the books called the books of Moses?"

Why, there isn't a heathen nation in the world under so savage a leader as many chapters in the so-called books of Moses represent him to have been, under the direct command of God. We are horrified at the name of Tom Paine, as a commentator on the Old Testament; but Tom Paine does not paint these scenes—which the Presbyterian Assembly are so zealous to preserve as the exact utterances of God, written with his finger—black as they really are. "And why," the people are asking, "does Prof. Briggs himself keep silent on these points?" Doesn't he see further than he professes to see? or does he think the time hasn't come to say it? Why doesn't he set himself right on all the books of the Bible? Man certainly wrote the books of the Bible, though, perhaps, that Presbyterian Assembly would maintain that God reached down his fleshly hand and with his very finger wrote the very Hebrew words of the text! But if, as is generally allowed, men, inspired men, wrote these books of the Old Testament, how are we going to know that they were inspired just because they claim it, any more than we shall know that men of our day have been told by God or angels such things as have been said to them? Does Abraham's saying that the Lord told him to take his only son and slay him as he would an animal, prove that the Lord did tell him this? Does Moses or any other man's saying that the Lord commanded things too horrible to be allowed in the most savage country in the world prove that a God, elsewhere declared to be "full of mercy and tender compassion," did command these horrible things? How much more natural to suppose that the God they thought commanded these things was the god of their ancient savage ideals. "Why does not Prof. Briggs set himself right on the Bible at once, and come out from those old Calvinists?" This is what people of common sense are asking all over the land. They are out of patience with this puerile hesitancy.

Let him set his own reason, which he claims is one of the God-given guides to man, at work on these points. I was brought up in Calvinism, in the strictest form of Jonathan Edwards' orthodoxy, and I was always floundering in the fogs and mists until I set myself right about the Bible; and I do not believe any one ever truly read the Bible or reverently valued it until he saw in it a purely human book written by men—some parts of it by great and good men, inspired men, even—as other great books have been written, and in parts errant and fallible,—like men,—and is just such a representation of the morals and the ideas of the age in which it was written as any other book. When Moses or Abraham or Jacob said that God said unto them this or that, it was the God as they conceived him, and not by any means the God, the Father, whom Jesus came to show unto man, any more than the God whom the old Pharaohs meant, when they claimed to be his earthly representative, was the true God.

When David, or whoever uttered the prayer recorded in psalm cix., prayed in regard to his enemy: Let his wife be a widow, let his children be fatherless," and with exultant wrath exclaimed: "Happy shall he be who taketh his little ones and dasheth their heads against a stone," etc., he is inspired by the spirit of the savagery of his age, and no other God. People say: "Prof. Briggs must see this—why doesn't he say it?" According to the old New England adage "He may as well die for an old sheep as a lamb." The assembly will turn him out anyway. That was a predetermined fact long ago. The question of his guilt has had nothing to do with it. Every unprejudiced person in the United States knows this.

Then to these people of common sense it is a marvel how, in this last decade of the nineteenth century, in the light of all the discoveries of science, of all the sciences,—discoveries of the infinitude of the universe,—a man of the scholarship of Dr. Briggs can wish solemnly, and evidently sincerely, that he could believe (against the decree of a good God) that the unregenerate might sometime and somehow be saved from the hell of his old Calvinism—that his ancestors have found in the Bible. Who are the unregenerate? If there are any more so in spirit than the Presbytery under whose thunderbolts he has been tormented for the last three or four years, we have never seen them. And that maleboge of his old Calvinism—can't he see that there is no more reason for believing that because men with Bible names have written it, than there is for believing the old mythologies of Homer or Æschylus?

Why can't he free himself from these old bonds, laid upon the world by John Calvin three hundred years ago, and come out into the sweet light of reason and truth?

"It is amazing! amazing!" is the exclamation on all sides; and the marvel is, that Dr. Briggs can be hampered by these ideas of past ages, rather than that the Presbytery should decide against him. Are we a civilized people when such bonds bind our scholars? Talk about the superstition of not daring to see the moon over the left shoulder! It seems not so childish as such superstitions in men of the ripe scholarship of Dr. Briggs.

"Lead, kindly light," we can but pray. Surely the light must come to him and the spirit of the age must redeem him from the unbearable bondage of John Calvin's old wrathful vagaries, inspired by selfish hate, rather than any loving understanding of God.

ONE OF THE COMMON PEOPLE
(For the many who see it so.)

GOOD WORDS.

As resounding hunter's horn
Wakes, at early break of morn,
Comrades brave and true;
Ready for exciting chase,
Each rejoicing in his place,
While the grass is wet with dew:

As the captain in the fight
Leads his men to gain the right,
Daring death to win,—
So the words of heroes old
Wake our hearts to ventures bold,
Make us conquerors of sin!

A REVERENT USE OF SUNDAY.

I have stood from the first with Elizabeth Cady Stanton in favor of the Sunday opening of the World's Fair. Not because I do not reverence God and all his works, but because I do reverence him and all his works. Of all things to honor God Sunday with the "White City" is the greatest. It makes us feel that man is, indeed, almost divine. Look at this question, friends, not from the bigotry of pulpit or backwardness of the press. There are great object lessons there such as the world has never seen before. To say that for us to go there and study the beautiful things the hand of man has made is violating an injunction of God—I can't understand it!

HEREDITY.

—WORDSWORTH.

I wish to uncover, for a brief study, the machinery of the mysterious law of heredity, and to reveal what vast power it has in human careers. I premise that a man's volition, while a necessary factor, is the least factor in the problem of his life; that the matter of supreme importance, the matter which determines whether he will go and what he will become, is the equipment of function, the complex machinery of aptitude, tendency and temperament, which is built into his organism by inheritance from the life-struggle of previous generations. I note that a man does not create a single one of the many organic conditions which control and shape his destiny. He does not create his temperament, sanguine or morbid; does not create his genius or dullness; does not create his moral sensitiveness or moral obliquity; does not create his ambition or his timidity; does not create his energy or his inertia. All these conditions are created for him, not fully developed, but as germs which hatch and grow with his growth. These constitute the machine which his volition operates. He will add nothing to them. Throughout his career he will only operate his machine; not a step will he take that the whole complement of innate conditions, such as they are at the moment, does not assist him to it; not a choice will he make that is not compelled by their influence. Not all at once, nor always with equal force, will the conditions show themselves. He will give no sign of genius, and suddenly it will appear and bend his volition to a totally new path. He will be ambitionless till some event awakens the latent ambition within him. He will long pursue a road marked by low ethical conduct, when in some crisis of experience the moral sense that has slumbered will arise and assert authority over his volition. Experience will develop whatever efficiency is in the several parts of his machine, but if a part is radically defective, experience will never remedy the defect; if it is lacking, experience can never create a substitute to fill its place. If he is born deaf and dumb, experience will greatly enrich his soul with gifts of feeling and perception, but it will never give him sound ears or speech. If he is born with a tendency which ripens into an intemperate appetite, experience will teach him a bitter wisdom which in time will humiliate the appetite, but which will never make that spot in his nature wholly strong and healthy, nor secure him just such a career as he would have had with a different quality of appetite.

And this means, most certainly it means, that we are projected into our careers by our ancestors. The things we encounter in our environment, the adversities due to ignorance of natural laws or to impossibility of complying with natural laws, help to shape us, as the storms help to shape the oak, but our ancestors have already fixed in our natures at birth the determining forces of development. We step forward, choosing our path as we go, yet our choice ever actuated and guided by the accumulative power of their choices, stored up in the organic functions of our natures. The stream of life—we are apt to think of it as a listless, gliding stream, that takes its course by chance, or as a straw or leaf deflects it, or the caprice of human volition—but it is a torrent of tremendous propulsive force. Our volition does not control the activities it sets free. They are shaped and brought to issue by the powerful inherited conditions stored up in our natures.

Are you a scientific billiard player? If you are, and can accurately calculate the strength and angle of the blow you give the ball, and know perfectly the force of rebound in the cushions, you can make the ball take what course you choose across the table. If you do not understand these things, and have not skill of nerve and muscle, the ball will be likely to go any whither except to the spot you wish it to strike.

Life is a game at billiards, and its issue depends on with what skill it is played. An act does not take its course by the propulsion of the volition which starts it. All the innate forces in the organism take a hand in directing it. It is influenced by temperament. It is influenced by the moral sense. It is influenced by sensibility. It is influenced by prudence, by prejudice, by proclivity. If you have the insight of omniscience, know accurately the strength of these manifold influences and can tell just to what angles your act will be deflected by them, you can doubtless make your career wholly what you would have it. But it is not likely that you are omniscient. It is more likely that you are fatally ignorant of these inherited powers, which lay hold of every act you instigate and give it an unknown value and send it off on uncertain course. You don't know whether your organism has been imperfectly constructed for you, or whether its parts are well-balanced and harmonious; whether the forces which are to play on your acts are chaotic, or are held in the even rhythm of Nature's law. In which case you will play an unskillful game, and the issue of your life will be what can never be known till the game is played.

But this is a hard saying, I am told—a most hopeless and despairing doctrine. It is a grim story, that a man is set down where he is, without so much as being asked if he would have it so, to make himself by his choices precisely what his ancestors have already ordained him to be; to elect his path, instigated by conditions which he has had no hand in creating; to reap, may be in his bitter soul, the fruits of seed which he never planted. Lo! what encouragement is this to offer our panting desires, to spur our endeavor along the difficult way, to sustain our bravery as adversities rise against us, and must be overcome if we are to escape collapse? If the ball cannot be shot to its goal, why shoot it? Let us give over life to drift whither circumstances drive it, to work out its innate follies, its fore-ordained issues; and charge it up to ancestors.

Yes, it is a hard saying, there is no denying it. But the fact is hard. The saying is no harder than the fact. We can endure the hardest of hard facts complacently, and trudge bravely under the load, if we do not see them with our eyes and are not required to think of them; but, if they face us directly and set us to thinking how heavy and hard they are, they make cowards of us. This fact of heredity we are ready to quarrel with—not until we begin to think about it. We jog along with it day by day, and not a day that it is not the principal cause of whatever success we achieve or whatever disappointment or failure or pain we experience; yet it makes our bones quake to look this grim companion full in the face.

I wonder if you heard what Ibsen was just now saying: "Dearly one pays for one's birth with one's life." Are you hearing this, "Dearly one pays for one's birth with one's life"? Things often get into one's ears that are not heard. If you were not such an undiscovered country to yourself, had not traveled through the world as a mole does through the ground, without eyes, you could retrace your road and write this word of Ibsen as an epitaph over many a dead hope and dark hour. Peer Gynt (if you have read the drama), what is he but this grim fact of heredity, mounted on a pair of human legs, making a human career. That visionary spirit, that moral instability and lack of purpose, that wayward impulse, that impish dunce of nobility and baseness, that whirlpool of brilliant audacity and egregious folly, which made the Peer Gynt of destiny; the physical prowess that awed the rustics, and the coward that slunk away from the challenge of honor; the ragged pauper, and the rich rascal; the spendthrift, the cheat, the sham; always soaked to his bones in misery; always contemplating reformation and never reforming; to the last of his hoary age chattering with terror in a storm, and a reckless, self-complacent fool in pleasant weather; trampling upon all human sanctities, and cunningly eluding death and the devil,—are traits which were framed into his nature at birth. Norway's great poet has uncovered a truth which has got to be learned as the chief lesson in the problem of human welfare which men are to-day trying to solve.

You do not believe this teaching of Ibsen. I judge you do not, for you probably share the proud conviction, which nearly everybody in this generation holds, that a man's will is the autocrat of the universe, that if he wants the moon and stars to bow down and serve him he can compel them to do so if he has bull-dog grit, that his supreme and proper business in this world is to achieve a profitable career and be able to enjoy himself, that only as these things are insisted on and enforced as rules of conduct have men any valid incentives to struggle and acquire the highest results of life.

I cannot undertake a more useful nor a more thankless task than to set myself against everybody and deny these things flatly. I tell you a man's will—it may be weak, it may be strong; that is a matter which he does not settle, it is settled for him at birth—is no such autocrat as everybody is worshiping. I tell you that the radical purpose which carries a human career through this world is not to achieve and enjoy. If he does achieve and enjoy, these are accidents on the road, for which he may chiefly thank his ancestors; but his career moves steadily to its goal, irrespective of these incidents. I tell you that these false opinions, which are rooted in the minds of the people and shaping their ideals and inciting their conduct, are pernicious; they are the prolific cause of most of the miscarriage and misery which afflict humanity.

But the will—is it not free? Certainly it is free. What is the will? I don't know. As little do I know what a man's soul is, as what his will is. How, then, can I say it is free? I simply speak by the fact. The universal fact with which the world teems is free will. I can find nothing that exists that is not free will. My cat is a free agent, by a lower degree, but just as I am otherwise. The rhythm of the pulsating atoms of the rocks closely resembles the rhythm of the corpuscles of my blood, which is the stored-up free will of past ages of life-development. I can see the image of my daily conduct in the gyrations of a molecule in the air. Will—I don't know what it is in its intrinsic nature, but by the fact, the phenomena of it, I see it to be motion, action, change. In the known domain of life, will is the dynamic energy of the organism, the machine in operation, fulfilling the law of its destiny.

Is it not then an autocrat, not amenable to determining conditions such as temperament, proclivity, sensibility? The Czar of Russia, is he not free? Certainly he is, and we call him an autocrat. His pen moves all Russia. Yet never does he put his pen to a decree which is not determined, not by him, but by the bureaucratic system of which he is merely the volition. It is a bald fiction to call him an autocrat whose acts, though free, are absolutely determined by the governmental organism of which he is the administrative function. Is not the will free? Yes. And an autocrat? No. Like the Russian Czar, the will is but the administrative function of a complex organism which absolutely determines its acts. A man is what he makes himself, and he is bound to be what he is born to be. And this is a monumental contradiction! I know it. And the reconciliation? There is none. It is not my business to harmonize the order of the Infinite and the chaos of things finite, nor to fathom this impracticable polarity of necessity and free will which are locked together in the building of a world and in the struggle of a human career.

But why am I leading you down into the slippery darkness of such philosophic bewilderment? That I may put your feet on the bed-rock of fact which is beneath your destinies, and justify my flat denial of the current opinions which to day are blinding people to the meaning and issues of life. You will never clearly understand yourself, nor be able to exert the highest efficiency of your will, not attain to the serene heroism which wins satisfaction from struggle, until you see the significance of this autocratic heredity which presides over your career and determines what is to be your proper business in this world. You say it is a hard matter and appallingly discouraging to effort. So it is from your stand-point, that one's chief end in life is to aim at achievement and enjoyment. But your stand-point is wrong. You are welcome to enjoy yourself if you happen to be built to do so; but the goal you are making for, whether you will or no, is to be as complete a soul when you leave this world as it is possible for the struggle of life to make you. Heredity equips you, and heredity vigilantly determines your path, your experience, your development. Is it grim? Not unless you are a pessimist and are persuaded that the universe is mad. This heredity is none other than the Infinite Power; beneficent if the Infinite Power is beneficent; the executive of a wise and rational purpose if the Infinite Power is rational and sane. Do we not avow our belief in God the Father, universal, immanent? Where is He? Just where you ignorantly have not looked for Him, in your bones, in your brain, in your disposition, in your talent, in your infirmity. Humanity is grandly rising by evolution to increasing goodness and greatness of soul. How is it rising? By heredity. By God. Heredity is the evolving God. Heredity is the decree of human perfectibility by struggle immutable as gravitation. Heredity holds in its relentless necessity the perfecting of the God-like human brain, of the heavenly society, of a world brilliant with intelligence, culture and good cheer; and compels the human will to execute its commission.

You, standing in this, your generation, have a fragment of that commission to execute. Shall I tell you then the bottom reason of your being here in this struggle of the flesh? It is not to achieve, though you will achieve if your machine is well constructed; it is not to enjoy, though you will enjoy if you have not incorrigible infirmities; but it is to work out the problem of your individual perfectibility. Your will is put to its highest tension to work out for yourself the worthiest and fullest career; but behind your will is God, behind your will is heredity, inflexibly bending your path through the experiences which will greatness your soul and lift you on the scale of perfectibility. Did you hear what Paul said just as I was starting out on this theme?—like Ibsen, a deep-eyed prophet of destiny was that man Paul—"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you to will and to do His good pleasure." Not just as I am saying it, for Paul had not the light of science, as I have, to give the clear white of reason to his thought, yet just what I am saying: "Work out your life-problem with the sole aim to greatness and enrich your soul; for in you, in your talents, in your infirmities, in every function of your organism, is the infallible and inflexible decree of God, ordaining your career."

Human nature has never taken kindly to this partnership of free will and necessity. One or the other partner—now necessity, now free will—has been denied, and a scheme of life built upon the surviving member, with the result that life has been made an insoluble riddle, and no end of miscarriage has been visited upon human endeavor.

Mohammedanism denies free will and cringes to the infinite necessity; and where does Mohammedanism touch, that it does not blast the intellect, repress energy and arrest development?

Calvinism denied free will and built its imposing scheme of destiny on foreordaining necessity, and for two centuries Calvinism throttled intelligence, checked the advance of knowledge, and held society in the clutch of stagnation. The injury it did the human mind is irreparable. It emptied the mind of virility, of inquisitiveness, of hunger for truth. It produced a mind as dense and hard and impenetrable to science as a granite boulder is impenetrable to a sunbeam. No Darwins or Huxleys were possible under Calvinism. The world was not knowable, life was not tolerable under Calvinism. Calvinism tricked out destiny as a fantastic stupidity and made a stupid God. Though undermined and condemned well nigh a century ago and its theology now extinct, we are not yet rid of it. The petrified intellect which is abroad in the churches, incapable of truth, obstructing truth, is a legacy of Calvinism.

Arminianism sinned in an opposite way, though with a pardonable pride in human nobility. It allowed the infinite necessity by which the universe is held together and lives and moves and has its being, but it denied its sway over man. The will it lifted above the reign of law, and made it an absolute autocrat, not amenable to determining influences. It taught that a man is the sole architect of his career; that his business in this world is to live thriftily and nappily, which he may accomplish if he happens to choose discreetly and energetically; that if he ascends to heaven it is because he chooses to do so, or if he descends to hell it is because he chooses to do so.

This is the gospel by which we live to-day, and by which we have lived a hundred years. It is the natural gospel of unripe, irrational democracy. It is twin sister of the French revolution, producing just the same anarchy in life that unbridled democracy produces in society. It is not without significance that Methodism, the distinguished vehicle of this doctrine, started on its impetuous career with the outbreak of the present era of individualism, and that through the century of the spread of democratic principles with their ever increasing bedlam, Methodism, widely in touch with the people, has given to struggling humanity its working theory of life.

It is in many ways a helpful theory. It has done good service in the development of the individual. Beyond doubt the world is materially richer for it, and is indebted to it for the masterful self-reliance and indomitable energy which are the marked traits of the manhood of to-day. Nay, more, it is certain that in the present low state of intelligence the self-reliance and the energy could not have been aroused except by inducing a man to believe himself to be a god independent of all gods and supreme autocrat of his destiny. Not having mind enough to grasp the truth that perfectibility is the immutable law of his life and self-culture the inevitable goal of his volition, that she might make a hero of him of whom she need not be ashamed and get her purpose fulfilled in his development, Nature has had to deceive him with the fiction that he is a despot to whom all things are possible if he chooses to get them.

Nevertheless this fictitious free will, which we have been taught to worship and have worshiped with such zeal that it has become second nature, entails the inevitable consequences of deception. It is a half-truth, and like all half-truths, has its pernicious side.

It makes a man's career through this world wholly an external affair, a matter of the outside garments of life, of success achieved and of gratification enjoyed. It puts all his energies to the pursuit of the conditions of pleasure, none of them to the solid things of culture. Do we not ask, if we want to know of a man, "What can he do?" "How does he prosper?" And what do these questions signify if not that we measure his value, in fact, the entire worth of his career, by his ability to make a place for himself? Did any one ever hear it asked of another, "How does his mind grow?" "What wider truth is he discovering?" "What sweeter feeling is he cherishing?" "What progress does life make in strengthening the weak spots in his nature?" "What power of self-control is he acquiring?" "What joy does he find in the excellent virtues and in the infinite life of the spirit?" Soul? We know not the meaning of the word. It is a word not found in the vernacular tongue of our century. We do mighty works, but not in the soul, or for it. All our struggle of life is to grasp an ambition, not to perfect the conditions of an imperishable destiny. "The world," says Birbeck Hill, "is looked upon as a vast battle-field in which the exceeding great reward is not the inner life nobly lived, but the outer life nobly recompensed."

It is our one-sided theory of free-will which is the cause of this materialism. It comes of having been taught for a hundred years that a man's prime business in this world is to make a place for himself, and that he may make such a place as he chooses to do. We can see no meaning in life except to make a place for our desires, and no interest in it except as we find a good place.

We are consequently in open war with God. We are trying to carry out a plan of life which at every step clashes with the inflexible heredity that is throned in our natures and determines our paths. We aim well and strike with energy, but inherited forces in our natures, with which we have not reckoned, deflect the blow, and it misses the mark. We are defeated and bewildered and embittered. Our world is brim full of violence and rapacity and failure and discontent and pain and pessimism; and the universal cause is our pernicious doctrine of free will. I don't know of another so cruel, so heartless a doctrine. What! Teach a young man it is his destiny to make a place, and when by encountering some inherited infirmity of temperament he fails of the place, tell him that it is wholly his own fault—do you wonder that he turns pessimist? Do you wonder that this generation, intoxicated with this cruel doctrine, is saturated with anarchy, that all struggling fiercely for a good place and failing of it, all are mad?

It would be a weary outlook sure enough if the human will were the unrestrained autocrat of this world's doctrines. The universe is not a safe place for a man if his career is not as certain of its issue as are the stars of their paths. This heredity which appalls us, and which certainly has occasion to do much cruel work in human careers, is none other than the beneficent stream of infinite life, which is bearing us on its tide to power and nobility of eternal soul. We are not free to achieve and enjoy as we will; experience every hour of our lives disproves this sort of freedom; but we are free to work with God, not against Him, in this powerful law of heredity. A sound theory of life dismantles the stern law of its terrors and reveals its intrinsic divinity. Heredity is not understood, and it cannot be understood until the mind is full of the thought that the one omnipotent, immutable purpose in a human career is the perfectibility of the soul. There is no swerving of this purpose, however much it may seem to swerve. The cruelties which it perpetrates, the degeneration of life which it sometimes works, are stages of the soul's evolution. If the machine is badly built, and the man's will is not working with God by the pattern of the Moral Ideal, he is bound to be terribly lacerated by the struggle of life; but the defeat and pain will enhance his permanent spiritual equipment. Heredity entails so many worthless lives, we say. But that is because we are accustomed to treat this career as a finality. It is not a finality: It is probably but one of innumerable life-cycles, the struggle of one equipping the organism for the struggle of its successor.

Besides, we forget that heredity stands far more for excellence than for infirmity, that to it we are indebted for whatever of gift or energy makes grand endeavor possible. Heredity is the accumulating power of human culture. What generations of moral earnestness were stored in the lofty probity of Washington; and what generations of hope and song and heartache went to the making of the genius of Mozart, of Longfellow, of Browning! The powers that bear us so gayly on our destinies had their birth in far back struggles, which were borne with weariness and desolating failure. From the life of each generation God distills the reason and the love and the sobriety and the courage, and carries them on to build the ever greatening human soul.

It is the promise of the future. When the divinity in heredity is understood and revered, and men work with God to perfect the soul as the ideal of destiny, and culture exterminates infirmity and exalts reason and love and courage and sobriety, there will nevermore be a Peer Gynt to bewail his birth; the sons of earth will be the sons of heaven, and life will be the power of fruitful endeavor and of happiness.

BABY'S KISSES.

"In the ring are three kisses from baby."
Letter from home.

"In the ring are three kisses from baby
For papa far over the sea;"

But, ah, here is none of the magic
Of baby's sweet kisses for me.

Have these kisses stolen out of the letter,

Overboard, down into the sea,
To gambol with dolphins and fishes,
Where no baby's kisses should be?

I'll just look as I sail over ocean,
And inquire of fairy and gnome,
But I think I shall find those three kisses

With wee baby Evelyn at home.

A REMARKABLE DOG.

A TRUE STORY.

My grandfather once owned a dog that was a cross between a mastiff and Newfoundland. He was large in size as the largest mentioned breed, and in color that of an African lion, and, strange to say, had a mane like one. His eyes, also, had the intelligent look of that animal. Mars was his name, and rightfully named he was; for the god of battle was endowed with no more courage than that faithful animal. He was noted far and wide for his almost human intelligence. One peculiar trait of his was that he never was known to bark as dogs are wont to do, but, when angry, rattled his teeth by shaking his head violently, so that they could be heard at quite a distance. This he never did except as a warning, and woe unto the intruder that passed unheeding. His disposition was mild and even playful with those of the household, but friend or foe never approached the house unchallenged at night. Mars had a deep, sonorous voice, when he chose to let it out, which was very seldom; then it was more akin to a lion's roar than to anything else earthly. He seemed to know instinctively what was his duty, and when and where his vigilance, that never slept, was needed.

Our grandfather, who was a clergyman, was recommended to reside in the country on account of feeble health; hence the family retired for several years to a beautiful farm in Indiana. It was there that Mars' finest faculties were developed. His usual place at night was the large barn that stood about four hundred yards from the dwelling. The master of the house had frequent occasions to be absent several days and nights consecutively. Without one word or sign from any one during the nights on the above-mentioned occasions, Mars would invariably lie across the threshold of grandmother's door, which opened out into a wide passage; but as soon as the master returned, Mars resumed his usual place in the barn.

Our grandfather was co-partner in a dry goods establishment in the village, situated about one mile from his home. Our uncle, who resided with him, was chief clerk, and to him Mars was much attached and would frequently attend uncle there, then return. As evening approached he would go to the store, as if to guard him on his return. In winter or in stormy weather uncle would often ride horseback to and from the place of business. One stormy winter evening, with Mars, as usual, in waiting, he hastily closed the store, locked the door, and leaped on his horse to ride home. When Mars saw the horse wheeled for home he jumped and gently held uncle by his pants. Thinking that Mars was only glad at seeing him start, he shook him off and proceeded briskly on. Again, the dog leaped up and rattled his teeth ominously. Uncle stopped, Mars gently wagged his tail and trotted a few steps back. Uncle pondered as to what he meant. He knew the dog well enough to know that something was wrong; but what? With his eyes fixed on Mars, he slowly started again homeward. In an instant Mars arrested him as before. He then turned his horse's head and retraced his way toward the store; while Mars, full of apparent joy, ran on before, but still turning every moment to see if he was followed. On they went. On coming again in front of the store uncle perceived at once the cause of the dog's strange actions; for, although he had locked the door, he had forgotten to take the key out. He instantly dismounted and secured the key; which seeing, Mars ran homeward without further pause, but with a look of assured content in his splendid eyes which uncle never forgot.

THE LARK'S NEST.

Some years ago, one of the porters employed at a small station near Darmstadt observed a pair of larks building their nest in the angle in the middle of the railway where two rails crossed. He did not disturb them. The nest was finished, and soon after four eggs were laid in it. Then the hatching began. By this time the attention of all the people employed about the station had been turned to the nest. It seemed to them such a wonderful thing that they resolved to do all in their power to protect its owners and it. Meantime the birds themselves seemed to have very clear ideas as to the danger that threatened them. It was pretty to see how the hen bird, which was sitting on the eggs, would duck her head down when a train passed, and then look up cheerfully when the danger was over.

In due course of time three young ones appeared. One day, after they were big enough to move about a little, but not to fly, one of them hopped out of the nest and seated itself on the rail. At that moment a train was seen approaching. The parent bird called and coaxed in vain. The thoughtless little creature remained obstinately sitting on its dangerous perch. Just as the train came up, the mother bird flew from the nest, seized it by the tuft on its head, and threw it over the line, ducking down itself until the danger was past. The lark's first friend, the porter, who had noticed the whole proceeding, now resolved to remove the nest, with all its living contents, from its perilous position. He took it up carefully and deposited it in a neighboring clover field. The old birds followed him step by step, uttering shrill cries of anxiety, which changed to a loud trill of joy, and, one might almost say, of gratitude, when they saw the comfortable spot in which their kind friend had put their nest. Could human beings have acted differently?

A COZY CRADLE.

The cradle was made for a dear little baby who lived just 100 years ago, on a farm near ours. It was made of the bark of a hemlock tree, with half-circles of basswood neatly fitted for ends, with two blocks of wood fastened on either side near the head and foot to keep the cradle from rocking over.

"Huldah needs a cradle," the baby's mother said one morning; and the baby's father took his ax and went into the woods that grew close to their log house, and, cutting half-way round in two places—and the length of a cradle apart—the thick bark of a round-trunked hemlock, he slit the bark from corner to corner of these cuts, and then peeled from the trunk a great, rounded trough of hemlock bark.

When it had been dried and its rough outside bark nicely smoothed, its ends fitted with head and foot boards, and knobs put on so it could not tip a somersault when being rocked, soft pillows and little baby Huldah were put into this fragrant, cosy, easy-swinging cradle, which the busy mother softly stirred when the whirl of her reel and the buzz of her flax-wheel threatened to wake baby before her nap was out.

One day when she was busy reeling her linen threads, with baby soundly asleep in her little bark house, she heard a big scratch on the door-sill, and, looking up, she saw in the doorway, with his great fore-paws reaching up on the kitchen floor, a big black bear. Huldah's mother did not wait that time till the snap of her whirling reel told forty threads; but, catching baby in her arms, she flew up the rungs of the ladder that led to the loft over the kitchen, and when there quickly drew the ladder after her.

But old Bruin did not venture into the house. Perhaps he dared not; for a bright fire was burning on the hearth and the light cradle still rocking and swaying before it, which he might have thought was some cunning trap set to snare his big black feet. He sniffed and growled, and then turned in his tracks and trotted off into the woods. When he had gone Huldah's mother lowered the ladder and came back into her kitchen, but she shut the outer door before she again set stirring her wheel and cradle. —Baby's od.

THE RISE OF A BOY.

This boy goes to his business, and at his business begins by simply doing the things he is told to do, and doing them in a common and ordinary way. If he stops here, he remains all his life long a drudge. But if he begins to see that business has a significance, that his life is not merely sweeping the store, not merely writing letters, not merely selling goods, if he begins to see the higher life involved in business, if he begins to see that business is a greater instrument of beneficence than what we call beneficence, that trade is clothing thousands of men where charity clothes ten, that agricultural and milling industries are feeding thousands of men where charity feeds ten; if he begins to see how the whole history of the world is linked together, and is God's way of building up humanity and serving humanity—as he gets this larger view, and enters into it, life is enriched, and becomes itself the minister whereby love is enlarged and conscience is strengthened, the school wherein he is educated out of the lower into the higher. He has now risen, or is rising, from that which is mortal into that which is immortal and eternal.

The Sunday School

THE TEACHERS' MEETING.

READ BEFORE THE W. U. S. S. SOCIETY
BY REV. JENKIN LLOYD JONES.

Without a teachers' meeting, a Sunday school that is a school, doing work school-fashion, beginning somewhere, going somewhere, teaching something coherently, laboriously, heroically, is, under present circumstances, impossible in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Without this systematic preparation, this scrupulous, deliberate preparation under the lead of one who has at least undertaken to fit himself for teaching these themes, and to train others to the high task, it will ever be a Sunday school with the "school" chiefly left out. Other functions may be fulfilled, desirable and high, but the school end of it, the instruction and education of the mind on very high and very important lines of thought, will be left out.

With the teachers' meeting, esteemed and conducted in a manner consistent with this estimate of its importance, it is possible with the ordinary material offered us for teachers, under the severe and utterly unworthy limitations of the time and prominence given to this work, in the face of the astounding indifference of parents, to do something, aye, much towards leading the minds of children and adults into profitable ways of thinking upon the highest theme; which thinking will have much to do in inducing them to walk in the ways that lead to noble action and courageous living.

In order to realize this teachers' meeting, the task must be accepted first of all. Undertake a good solid year's work; not forgetting the truth so often reiterated in the history of such work as this, that a hard thing is easier done than an easy thing. Start out with a program that absolutely necessitates a teachers' meeting in order to carry it out. Accept the resignation of every teacher who is not willing to assume this co-operative service, and who does not mean to keep herself in touch, so far as possible, with this normal class. Invite no new teachers except upon these conditions. Expect, on this account, to suffer great inconvenience; to see the school shrink in size at first, in order that it may grow in importance. Abandon once and forever the numerical estimate of success. Seek shelter in the profound truth, that power is never a thing of statistics.

Next, let the minister accept this as his one great obligation of the six-day week. It is his best opportunity to fill the role of educator on themes that are peculiarly within his own province. The teachers' meeting is second only to the sermon in its imperative demands upon the time, ability, promptness, and regularity on the part of the minister, and not second to that in its demand for methodic and laborious preparation.

Having determined upon a year's course, the minister must prepare for it by a general preparation that will enable him to see the end of his course from the beginning; to understand the relation of parts and coordinate the same. In some form or another the year's course should be in the hands of his pupils. For the teachers and others who avail themselves of the privilege of this meeting are his pupils. The same schedule, still more simplified, perhaps, should be in the hands of the pupils of the teachers, that they may see that one lesson leads to another, that the year's work hangs together, and that the value of it must be judged by the results of the year, not by the dullness or the enjoyability of any one lesson.

The minister's library must be well stocked, indeed, if the next step does not demand a deliberate setting aside of a large portion of his year's book-fund to buy the best books for his purpose. He must never depend upon the thin manuals of Sunday-school societies. He must be in communication with the most competent available sources, if his own mind is to reach the maximum. Things are not going as they ought to if the resources of the Sunday school or the revenue of the church, in one way or another, do not duplicate or supplement his own investment with reference books available to the teacher and others, whose quickened interest will lead them to some delightful reading, study, and book-buying on lines which before were inaccessible or unattractive to them.

Admirable, indeed, has been this minister's professional training, and very retentive are his mental powers, if he does not find it absolutely necessary to go over the ground in general preparation for the whole course during the working hours of his vacation days or some other available time, when he is not living in the hand-to-mouth fashion of the active working weeks. And then there should be the inevitable storm within the mind immediately preceding each week's meeting, caused by immediate preparation for this particular lesson, the value of which will depend largely on the amount of work that the minister has put into the immediate preparation. How can the minister make interesting a lesson in which he himself has not conquered an interest? How can he give a lesson that he has not got? Here as elsewhere his triumph will bear some sure relation with his toil.

Once in the teachers' meeting, he is lecturer, minister, schoolmaster, companion, all in one, using the privilege of each as best suits his purpose. One thing is sure to come to pass if he works on these lines for the first half or three-quarters of the session, which will prove all too short: all present will forget the children, the classes and the Sunday school. They themselves are in search of truth, in quest of education. I would have the minister do his maximum to quicken the intelligence and fill the minds of those in his presence with the best intelligence at his command; deal with the subject in its most universal and scholarly aspects possible; and then it will be none too good; but he will be encouraged by the grateful interest and sympathetic response of the little group, and he will rise to his maximum of sincerity, insight, and ability oftener there, perhaps, than anywhere else.

Then, at the last, will come, of course, the anxious "But how am I going to interest my children in all this?" "How would you put this to my boys?" "Where does the lesson touch my girls?" The interest coupled with the anxiety of the teacher will largely solve the problem. It is hard to teach the children what you do not know yourself; not difficult to interest them in a few points of a matter about which you know a great deal. Much of the teacher's discouragement in the class, so far as the instruction side is concerned, comes from the fact that they are tolling away at the fruitless experiment of trying to "get blood out of a turnip."

Now at the end of the lesson is the place for sharp, quick, decisive normal class work; mutual exchange of experiences; mutual revelations and mutual confession.

At such a teachers' meeting there will be the most delightful revelations of the week. It will be a class meeting, conference, prayer meeting, and a little short-meter theological school, delightfully blended, always in unexpected proportions. And this teachers' meeting can be realized wherever there is nerve enough to accept the delightfully high price. Lots of work, great persistency, sublime independence of—I will not say indifference to—numbers. Where there is such a teachers' meeting its constituency will always be a little broader than the Sunday school. It will inevitably become the pastor's class in religion. And where there is such a teachers' meeting there will be a Sunday school with the "school" in it. And, eventually, where there is such a Sunday school there will be a church that will not be the home of idle indifference, timid anxieties about heresies, and a faithless grasp of the verities of faith.

THE GOSPEL OF PAUL.*

The "Gospel of Paul" may be a valuable book, judged from the standpoint of Christian theology, but it is a disappointment to one who judges it by the high standard set by the other works of its author. His "Science of Thought," and his "Poetry, Comedy and Duty," as well as his shorter essays and addresses, are un-failing sources of inspiration to their readers. For Professor Everett possesses a rare combination of qualities. He has the systematic intellect of a philosopher and the vivid imagination of a poet. The subtlest metaphysical theories become clear as crystal in his hands, and they are often illumined by illustrations that stand forth with a beauty and splendor which recall the illustrations sparkling in the great philosophic poem of Lucretius.

But the "Gospel of Paul" is neither philosophic nor poetic. It is only a study of the mind of the apostle Paul. Its sole aim is to show what the gospel was that Paul preached. And as "the world owes Christianity to Paul," it is interesting to the student of that religion to know what Paul's conception of it was.

According to Prof. Everett, Paul's whole gospel rested on the curses which the Jewish law pronounced on whatever man is hanged on a tree. Jesus was hanged on a tree, or a cross. Therefore the Jewish law makes Jesus accursed. But Paul saw Jesus risen and in glory—a fact which proved that he was not accursed, but that the law was abrogated. The law "in condemning him condemned itself," to use the Professor's own words.

In a certain sense, no doubt, this is Paul's gospel. It is the text he used to reconcile his Christianity with his Judaism. But surely this text and his interpretation of it do not explain what his gospel was or how he got it. It is too individual a foundation for a great religion to rest on. Such mighty superstructures are not built on such narrow and personal bases. It is like founding the Mohammedan religion on the fact that Mohammed had epileptic fits. There must have been something beside fits at the foundation of Islam. And there must have been something besides Paul's arbitrary interpretation of an Old Testament text at the foundation of Christianity. It must have rested on some belief that is as wide as humanity.

And that belief, it seems to us, is to be found in the primitive theory of sacrifice, as set forth by W. R. Smith in his recent work, "The Religion of the Semites." Prof. Everett admits that this theory "is of profound and far-reaching interest," but he hesitates to accept it. Yet the facts that Dr. Smith has gathered in this work, taken with those in Trumbull's "Blood Covenant," throw a flood of light on the early conception of Christianity, and connect it with other great religions and with one of the fundamental thoughts of the human mind.

The idea that man is of the same blood as the god he worships, or could be made so by partaking of some deified victim's flesh, is a conception that is found struggling to express itself everywhere. The clearest utterance of it is in the Mexican religion, where a human victim was selected a year before the great day of atonement. He was the noblest of all the captives, physically and mentally without blemish. He received the name of the god, was dressed like him and treated like him in every way—even to being reverently worshiped by his captors. But when the day of sacrifice came the people partook in awful sacrament of his flesh and blood. And they called the feast the eating of the god.

In all parts of the world we find traces of this belief when once our eyes have been opened to it. But the traces of it are clearest in Christianity. Jesus was the divine victim, spotless and pure. The blood of God flowed in his veins. And by drinking that blood or eating that flesh any man can become also of God's blood, can become a son of God, as Jesus was. "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me and I in him." "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." Paul himself says: "Ye are the body of Christ," and "your bodies are members of Christ." "Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father." "We are the children of God, and if children, then heirs and joint heirs with him."

That is, by eating his flesh and drinking his blood we become akin to him and acquire the same relationship to God that he has. We are God's children, because he is; since "we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones." "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." "His life is hid with Christ in God," because his life is swallowed up in the life of Christ and so taken into the life of God.

But I need not multiply quotations. The theological part of the New Testament bristles with them. And if Dr. Everett will study the problem anew and give us the Gospel of Paul from this large point of view, he will produce a book "of profound and far-reaching interest," in discussing this early expression of the relation of the finite to the Infinite. And his philosophic insight and his poetic imagination will not be fettered, as they evidently are in this present volume. And he will not have to admit, as he does here, that he cannot see what Paul means by saying that it was Christ which lived in him.

Christ lived in all who partook of his flesh and blood, and Paul's mind had been so broadened by his contact with the outer world that he thought the Gentiles ought also to be allowed to become the children of God, and be admitted to his coming kingdom as citizens. But the Jewish law seemed to shut them out. Therefore, Paul set to work to find a text that would make that law of no effect. He found his text, as all theologians have done in every age and every religion. But his text was not the cause, but the result, of his gospel. The text was of no consequence to the Gentiles. It was only to satisfy his own conscience and his Jewish hearers. It did not admit the Gentiles into the kingdom of God as citizens. They were admitted only as Stanley was admitted to the citizenship of the African kingdoms—by drinking the blood of the kingdom's ruler. That blood was drunk at the Lord's Supper, either literally, as most early Christians thought, or spiritually, by a supreme act of faith in the Messiah, as Paul probably believed. A. W. G.

THE MAGAZINES.

Among articles of possible interest to our readers in the North American Review for June, we note the following:

"Who Are the Greatest Wealth Producers?" by W. H. Mallock. Mr. Mallock controverts the claim that the wealth of the modern world is created by the manual labor of the working classes, maintaining that by far the greater proportion of it is directly traceable to the part taken in industrial activity by the few who possess the ability of invention and management.

The Rev. Dr. Rainsford replies to the criticisms on his article, "Possible Reformation of the Drink Traffic," which appeared in the May number of the Review.

Under the title of "Police Protection at the World's Fair," are two articles, the first by the General Superintendent of the Chicago Police, and the second by the Chief of the Secret Service, World's Columbian Exposition.

WORLD'S FAIR NOTES.

The continuing surprise, wonder, and delight is the tout ensemble, the marvelous White City that has risen here on Lake Michigan's shore. To wander about and see no other exhibit but the "grandeur of the glistening white palaces, the temples of art and science," and to mourn that they are not the Eternal City!

The feeling grows that somehow some of this modern marvel must remain. "Take the building of Fine Arts—the frame-work of iron, why may it not be the task of the next generation or two to encase it with a marble splendor that shall preserve it to the centuries?"

"What shall fill it?"

"Let it be the depository of ancient and modern genius, an annual display of the New World's art, a home for the treasures of art forever, like the Vatican."

The lever of permanence is working, and it may be that some grand remembrance of the Exposition of '93 will find a perpetual domicile in Jackson Park.

The Fair has made rapid strides toward completion the last month. The last touches on placing exhibits in the Fine Arts are this week being given.

"Miles of painting and sculpture, and nothing positively bad,"—I overheard the remark. "That's what I've been hunting for—a thing positively bad—which I was hoping to find, just to put a relish on the monotony of so much that is too confoundedly good."

"Well, just raise your eyes and observe that monstrosity in front of you, a pure piece of nonsense—hideous to behold."

I observed the lady as she stood pointing with her parasol, herself a fine picture of a disgusted soul. The large painting, to which she had directed attention, was a group of faces grotesque, but not necessarily "hideous." The gentleman, eying, comically, first the painting and then this fair lady, replied with tantalizing spirit: "That? Why tat's a fine display of womanly gossip. Don't you observe—"

"No, I don't."

"Don't you observe that the artist has painted a picture of gossiping spirits—the scandal-brewing of inner souls? Why, it's a regular sewing circle. That isn't, of course, the way the women outwardly appear, for doubtless they are, most of them, pleasing to the eye and some of them even very beautiful."

"It isn't truthful—"

"The very soul of truth; for it is Thought he has painted, the thinking mind of Gossip unconcealed by the outwardly fair."

"Oh, enough!"

The gentleman had scored his point, or so thought, if his congratulatory chuckle, as they moved away, was indication of his true inwardness. He undoubtedly went on giving interpretations amusing and equally foreign to the artist's motif, as in the case of these "hideous" women.

There are many moods observable in one's rounds; the "gushing," with its perpetual "Oh, oh!" the "bored," that keeps exclaiming, "Come, let's get out of here;" the quietly appreciative, that has no set formula, but deems itself reverently even before things it doesn't happen to like, considering how time and acquaintance only causeth some virtue to shine.

The fact that confronts one at every turn in all this vast array of art is the honesty, the labor, the hope to do the "ideal." Think how much of every life here represented has gone into these works of sculpture and of painting. And then, the "ache" of hearts where failure, even partial, has stamped itself on their creations. The artist's life is so commonly, by people of the business world and others, set down to be "easy-going," "light-hearted," "irresponsible." He is thought to know nothing of the "strain" that tugs at the heart and brain of civilization.

"Always at leisure; how charming!"

The artist himself is often—thanks to him!—to blame for this misconceiving. He cannot afford to "per-spire" and drag himself around off duty "so tired," with the air of being the only busy man in all the world. Yet all the while he may be carrying as big a burden and great a stress of soul as the toiler in other occupations. But he, of all men, "must burn his own smoke," and with his life as with his art lend cheer to mankind. Like Emerson's "scholar," he will have "his glees and his glooms alone." He, of all men, not excepting the preachers, knows that the world is a place to live in, not to groan in—his personal woes a distress by day and night.

Altogether this grand display of art-life at Jackson Park, good, bad, or indifferent, is like salt that can never lose its savor. It speaks as art; it tells the story of the lives of women and men, tragic, it may be, but never inglorious.

So with all the displays of industrial art therein gathered. They all give assurance of how busy, earnest, capable the race is.

Even the gods may stand still in their circuits of glory to behold and adore this glory of man.

And now comes the fatal intelligence that two "Supreme" judges decide that this exhibition is not sufficiently moral for the free people of America and the thousands of strangers hither come and coming to behold on the Sabbath day.

And so one changes his tune: How long, O Lord, how long shall stupidity reign?

Is it altogether necessary for a free people to go on setting up so many "supreme" laws, with their "Supreme" judges? Does a free people only preserve its freedom by these barriers to common sense, these interdictions that preclude the doing of the sensible thing at proper time?

To set up a master over us and say: "Be as stupid as you will, we obey,"—is that the price of Liberty?

Notes from the Field

London, Eng. and.—We Unitarians are just now in for a big fight with the High Church party. This party, having at the last election secured a majority on the London School Board, are attempting to have religion in an orthodox sense taught in the schools, and in that way to prevent any Unitarian becoming a teacher under the board. Of course this has roused us. Even Dr. Martineau has been provoked to protest against this gross attempt to impose a theological test for a civil duty, and recently he sent a memorial to the board—which was also signed by such men as the Chief Rabbi, the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Lecky, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, the Postmaster General, and other representative men and women—strongly condemning the proposals. We have taken care that at least all School Board teachers shall know something of what Unitarians believe. When our opponents ask to have religion taught they mean the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. We reply that these are disputed dogmas and certainly unfit for the instruction of little children. The Orthodox non-conformists, or some of them, are beginning to see that while the attack for the present is confined to one upon the Unitarians, the High Church party are really seeking to capture the schools for themselves, and so the non-conformists are making common cause with us.

Lebanon, N. H.—Rev. Chas. C. Vinal made a call at the Unitarian Headquarters at 175 Dearborn street, last week, and gave an interesting account of the little church at Lebanon, to which he was called to minister a year ago. The fact that the church was, in a way, founded by two Unitarian gentlemen, seemed to be the only thing of a distinctively Unitarian character about it, the congregation consisting of those who had been Methodists, Baptists, Agnostics, etc. Nevertheless the church has held together, not merely with tenacity but with enthusiasm, and is hopeful and active.

Iowa City, Ia.—It seems that Unitarianism, as represented in the person of Rev. Charles E. Perkins, is well received in Iowa City. For the Decoration Day celebration he wrote the song and delivered the oration. Of the latter, entitled "The American Republic: Its Great Past; Its Possible Future,"—one of the daily papers speaks in the highest terms, while the other reports it very fully.

Rev. F. B. Shippen, who has just resigned his pastorate at Wichita, Kan., passed through Chicago, June 4, on his way to Madison, Wis., where he was to preach the ensuing Sunday. He goes thence to Washington, D. C., where he will fill his father's pulpit for a month or so, and in the autumn he will go to Oxford to study.

Hillside, Wis.—At the commencement of the Home School Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, is to preach the sermon. Rev. F. L. Hosmer will lecture Saturday night, June 9, on William Cullen Bryant, and will preach at the Unitarian Church Sunday morning.

The Committee on Fellowship Of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches requests us to make the following announcements:

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 31, 1893.

Mr. Frederick A. McCartney, a member of the senior class in Andover Theological Seminary, having sustained a thorough examination covering all points bearing upon his qualifications for the work of the Unitarian ministry, and having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship that he is in all respects worthy of their approval, is hereby commended to the fellowship of our ministers and the confidence of our churches.

W. L. CHAFFIN, Chairman.
D. W. MOREHOUSE, Secretary.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, etical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the conservation of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward. And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes canvassed. Special inducements to agents will be given on correspondence. Subscriptions $1 per annum. Send all remittances to *“Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?

Loved the wood-rose, and left it on its stalk?
At rich men's tables eaten bread and pulse?
Unarmed, faced danger with a heart of trust?
And loved so well a high behavior,
In man or maid, that thou from speech refrained,
Nobility more nobly to repay?
O, be my friend, and teach me to be thine.”*
—R. W. Emerson.

ALL who are interested in the growth of the liberal church, but especially those of our readers who live in and about Chicago, will, we believe, be interested in the account of the establishment of the first Unitarian church at Chicago, which we have republished from the Southern Unitarian. That it is written by the brother of James Freeman Clarke may give it additional interest to our readers.

ANOTHER straw, showing how the wind blows, comes to us in the item in our Notes from the Field from Anamosa, Iowa. When a minister withdraws from the “orthodox” fold now-a-days, he generally takes the greater part of his congregation with him.

THE death of Edwin Booth is one more reminder of the high mission of the theater, and the noble calling of the dramatist. It has been given to few men of his generation to appeal more often or more successfully to the higher side of human nature than to Edwin Booth. Let the theater be encouraged on its upward way. Let its defects be criticised by nobler creations.

FRIENDS visiting at the World's Fair will not have much time, money or strength for theatrical performances. If they give themselves but one treat of this kind, let them by all means see “America” in the Auditorium, a spectacular combination of tableau, pantomime and opera in which over seven hundred characters appear. The four hundred years of America are condensed into three hours of living picture work. It is one more “of the biggest things of the kind in the world” now in Chicago.

REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG'S paper on “The New Orthodoxy,” which we publish in our Church Door Pulpit, is the ablest and most searching criticism of the half-hearted religious reforms of the present time that has seen the light for many a day. Its straightforward, manly demand for an earnest, sincere, and unprejudiced search for truth, and the fullest and freest discussion of our religious traditions, is one of the encouraging evidences that are presented to us, every now and then, that some, at least, of the Unitarians of our day are awake to the true dignity of their position, and are disposed to accept the evolution of Unitarianism toward the strength and beauty which its name implies, regardless of the limitations of its past. Would that Unitarianism were to all who bore the name what it is to Mr. Armstrong!

OUR brother, H. T. Root, of Grand Haven, contributes to the Co-Worker some thoughts suggested by the recent meeting of the Western Unitarian Conference, among which are the following, which seem to us to touch the underlying philosophy concerning many struggles too easily condemned for want of an appreciation of this principle. Earnest men and honest minds save all discussions from pettiness and lift all debates above triviality:

Why do we wrangle over these resolutions? Because we cannot help it. It is a law of progress, of growth. We can no more help it than the boy can help growing. Of all the symbols humanity has used, none has been more prevalent than the one which compares all advance to growth.

* * *

Peace does not belong to the party of progress. When we have peace and quiet, we shall have no activity: i. e., we shall be doing nothing and are ready for burial.

THE following extract from a letter received from the Rev. R. Heber Newton will interest our readers. We regretfully omitted his name from the list of editorial contributors at the time of our reconstruction, in response to a request from his son, on account of his father's health and his continued absence abroad. We heartily welcome our brother back to our shores and to the work which awaits him, trusting that adequate strength will be given him to meet his high opportunities. Our UNITY circle is never complete when such a spirit as Mr. Newton represents is not consciously present. The coming

Free Church we dream of, which even now is here. finds in Mr. Newton an apostolic spirit. And though his name may not be on our list we hope that it will not be a stranger to our columns.

On my return from Italy and Egypt I find yours of March the 6th awaiting me. It so happened that the first paper I opened was the first number of UNITY in its new form. I congratulate you all on its improvement. In that number I saw that my name had been dropped from the list of editorial contributors; and without any further intimation, I realize that I deserve to be thus dropped. Indeed, let me assure you that it has not been from any lack of interest in the noble effort you are making for the larger hope and the freer faith that I have been so delinquent in my editorial contributing. Had my old-time strength continued, I should have done something from time to time to redeem my pledge, and to help along the work of UNITY. The enlarged outline of your enlarged work strikes me very favorably; I only wish that I could be of some practicable service to you definitely.

ONE of the saddest instances of mistaken zeal that have come to our notice is the action of the women of Atlanta, Ga., in reference to an anonymous subscription to their fund for establishing a home for the reformation of erring girls. Having traced the gift to the dissolute women of the city, instead of receiving it with the greater gratitude because of its source, they declined to receive it! If the motive which actuated them be that supposed by the writer in the Woman's Tribune (whose article will be found in another column), what a commentary such blind Pharisaism is upon the need of missionaries to the missionaries!

HAMILTON W. MABIE, assistant editor of the Christian Union, gives, in the issue of June 17 of that paper, his "Impressions of the White City—A First Glance," which we urge the reader who hesitates to read. Do not give up your plans to come to Chicago. Take our word for it, the newspaper alarms of extortion, crowds and dangers are unfounded. Comfortable and economical quarters can be secured, in the search of which we are ready to grant any assistance within our power to our readers. The beauty and importance of this fair has not yet, cannot be adequately stated in words. Says the Christian Union:

The White City will be, in the months to come, a National University, in which every line of human activity may be studied, but the central and constant lesson of which will be the solidarity of the human race. The American who fails to visit the White City will miss a noble education.

TWO NEW "Unity Mission Tracts" are ready,—No. 41, "The Change of Front of the Universe," by Minot J. Savage; and No. 42, "The Divine Unity: in God, in Man and in All Things," by Henry M. Simmons. Both essays have been long in print, but in hiding as the chapters of a book. Now each is set free and sent forth on its own wings to find whom it will. The first is one of Mr. Savages' more famous sermons. It tells of the three great revolutions of modern thought, in physics, in criticism, and in biology, and the effect of these revolutions on our conception of man's nature and destiny and our thoughts concerning God. And Mr. Simmons' is quite akin,—a noble statement of the higher, the universal Unitarianism toward which all church theologies, led by science, are now upreaching.

IT is not to be wondered at, in view of the bigotry, persecution and cruelty which throughout its history have disgraced the Christian church, that men should be so moved by indignation as to express the views of our Des Moines correspondent; and yet we think his indignation has led him to seem a little unjust to "orthodox" Christians, if not to "orthodox" Christianity. This distinction, it seems to us, is an important one, the fact being that not one nominally orthodox Christian—clergyman or layman—in a thousand fully accepts the creed, confession or articles of his sect of orthodox Christianity. If such creed were fully accepted, it would be almost true that the "orthodox" church of to-day would be as bigoted and bloodthirsty as ever. "Almost," we say, for some allowance must be made for the difference in interpretation of texts and creeds which would certainly be made by men of our day even in the most orthodox of churches. But the influence of the higher civilization of our day is greater even than this; and when the literal doctrine of the church commands gross inhumanity, its nominal adherents may be relied upon to deviate in that particular from the teaching to which they continue to profess adherence so long as they are not driven to extremities. Aside from these considerations, however, it seems to us that if the orthodox Christians are as bigoted as represented, they cannot be as venal. A true bigot is at least sincere; he cannot be bought. Mr. Gladstone would not be put out of a Baptist chapel, it is true; neither would Dr. Mueller; but certainly the majority of Baptists would not allow Mr. Gladstone to partake of the Communion with them, and we think they would go no further in the case of Dr. Mueller.

It probably takes bravery to denounce the Geary Law in California as Mr. Wendte denounces it in the Pacific Unitarian for June. He speaks as an old Californian, who thinks that a large influx of Asiatic peoples into our unformed Pacific States would be a serious menace to their civilization, and that further Chinese immigration should be restricted for a term of years. But to dog, ticket and muzzle the Chinese already here under treaty regulations, as the Geary Law proposes, is a very different matter. That, he thinks, would be both infamous and disastrous. Infamous: the Supreme Court of the United States has pronounced it constitutional, as it did the Fugitive Slave Law: but the moral sense of the people now, as then, appeals to the Higher Law. And disastrous: the 72,472 Chinese now in California—only 107,475 in the whole country—are a valuable adjunct to its working forces. Withdraw them suddenly, and the railway contractor, the orchardist, the vineyardist and the ranchman would all suffer great loss and inconvenience. Moreover, the day will come when the Pacific coast will be eager for the good will of its great trading neighbor across the ocean, and California would be the first, and also the last, to feel the evil consequences of the unjust crusade. As to the vile Chinese quarter in San Francisco, there are worse plague-spots than that in the city: and there is nothing worse in Chinatown than the slums of New York show; and Chinatown might be cleansed and abolished, as New York abolished its "Five Points" and Boston its "North End," just as soon as the people of San Francisco really demand its abolition. All which is notable testimony, coming from a man like Mr. Wendte.

A CORRESPONDENT in the June number of the Liberal Co-Worker speaks of the "Weirs Idea." It resulted last summer in a skeleton organization known as "The United Liberal Church." This organization was the outcome of the twin grove meetings, Universalist and Unitarian, which have been held on the beautiful shores of Lake Winnepesaukee for many years. Rev. E. B. Payne, of California, is president, and Rev. L. H. Squires, of Jamestown, N. Y., is secretary of the organization. This movement is in line with the recent joint Ministers' Institute held in Wisconsin and Michigan. It is a part of that larger movement for which UNITY stands, which looks for the church that is not a "union of Universalist and Unitarian," but a gathering of all free minds and progressive spirits under the banners of progress and character-building, irrespective of theological traditions or "previous condition of servitude" to sectarian name and denominational lines. The independents, the great unchurched, the men and women to whom science teaches devoutness and earnestness, are also for this "Liberal Church;" which, if liberal, will be united. We might spare the word "United." The Secretary asks: "That all clergymen, of whatever denomination, who are in sympathy with it, will send him their address, that they may be added to the list and communicated with in regard to the future of this movement." We are with you, Brother Squires. UNITY is ready to aid and abet any high conspiracy in the interest of open fellowship and helpfulness.

BIGOTRY and ignorance are generally found together. Rev. E. M. Milligan, of Steubenville, O., a United Presbyterian, is quoted as saying that he has as much respect for the man who calls the Sabbath "Sunday" as he has for the man who calls his mother "the old woman." One might suppose from this that Mr. Milligan was a man of education, and as such realized the absurdity of confusing the Christian Lord's day and the Roman civil Sunday—being the first day of the week—with the Jewish Sabbath, which is the seventh day of the week. But on reading further one finds that this is not the case. It seems, it is the first day of the week that he is talking about, and that he supposes it to be the Biblical Sabbath!

THE MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

It was many years since the editor of UNITY had seen Meadville in June. Twenty-three years since he had stood among the flowers to receive his diploma of graduation, and still during his visit last week it seemed but a day. There was the same serene landscape, the same luxuriant foliage, wealth of flowers, skill of arrangement and cordiality of human faces, which, to his eyes, remained sufficiently unchanged to keep up the continuity.

The meeting of the trustees of the Meadville Theological School held on Wednesday, the 14th, was probably the largest one held for many years, eighteen out of the thirty being present. Among the non-residents in attendance were Revs. Reynolds, Batchelor, Horton, Chaffin, Snyder, Hosmer, and Jones. Mr. Fenn, of the Board of Instruction, and Mr. Forbush, the Western Superintendent of the A. U. A., were also present. Some questions of moment which were expected to engage the attention of the board—which expectation probably accounted for the full attendance—were settled by the Board of Instruction and private conferences, so that the work of the board was comparatively light. The result was unanimously satisfactory; but it is a question whether the same results reached after full and frank discussion of all problems involved before the full board would not have secured clearer understanding, higher efficiency, and more enthusiasm in the future. Many Unitarians have a constitutional dread of open discussions, and still they have done more than any other religious body toward making such discussions possible and profitable. They have demonstrated also that frank differences and earnest investigation is always conducive to true fellowship and hearty comradeship.

The one significant and hopeful action of the Board was the unanimous election of Mr. Francis A. Christie, of Cambridge, as instructor. If the Board of Instruction shall be able to carry out the instructions of the trustees by securing the service of Mr. Christie, it will add a man to the faculty who, by his ripe scholarship and by his success already attained as a teacher in the Cambridge Divinity School, warrants the confident hope, expressed by all concerned, that he will prove a valuable addition to the faculty, which has always been inadequate to the work in hand. This will give five resident professors; a strength never before reached by the Meadville School. The financial outlook is also hopeful. The completion of the hundred and fifty thousand additional endowment fund is confidently expected at no distant day.

On Wednesday evening the annual sermon was preached by the editor of UNITY, and will be published, by request of the graduating class, in our next issue. On Thursday morning, with a perfect June day for glorious setting, the following program drew to the familiar and beautiful little church, restful in its Grecian simplicity, a goodly audience of delighted people:

PROGRAM.

1. "Come Unto Him".....Handel
Sung by Miss Edith Moore.
2. Prayer, by Rev. T. B. Forbush, of Chicago, Ill.
3. Essay—"Influence of the Theory of Evolution Upon Ethical Doctrine".....Joseph Cady Allen, Rochester, N. Y.

6. "The Lord Is My Shepherd". Smart
Sung by Miss Edith Moore and Miss Minnie Foote.
7. "The Heart of the Teachings of the New Testament".....Robert Collyer Douthit, Shelbyville, Ill.
8. "The Progress of Positivism from Nescience to Faith".... Bernard Antony Van Sluyters, Grand Rapids, Mich.
9. "Methods of Religious Organization".....William Lorison Walsh, Boston, Mass.
10. Hymn, written for the occasion
.....Tune, Hummel
11. Address to the graduating class, by Rev. F. L. Hosmer, of Chicago, Ill.
12. The conferring of diplomas,President Cary
13. Benediction.....Prof. Barber

The topics of the essays are suggestive, and the essays themselves showed that the young men had been grappling with the foremost problems in the intellectual world to-day. And they also showed that such struggles had made for devoutness and character. Six manly young men, girded by a high purpose, faced life that morning. Seldom is it given to a class under such circumstances to pass out into the world under the benediction of more wise, tender and virile words than those pronounced in the short address of Secretary Hosmer.

Next year will be Meadville's semi-centennial, and the Alumni Association are preparing for an adequate celebration. If any school in America has accomplished more for the world in proportion to the instruments intrusted to it we would be glad to note the same. Its funds have always been pitifully low, its faculty always confessedly inadequate, its library humbly meager, and still, when the story of the fifty years is told it will be one that will arouse gratitude, and provoke further effort, to the end that the second fifty years, with more adequate instrumentalities, may look back with pride upon the first fifty as the "day of small things." May it grow and find life still more abundantly.

THE WOMEN'S CONGRESSES.

Our readers will perhaps sympathize with the consciousness of inability to cope with this subject which has prevented us from giving any account of the meetings of this branch of the World's Congress Auxiliary of the Columbian Exposition, when we mention the fact that the final program filled a closely printed pamphlet of fifty-six pages, making provision for thirty-nine meetings during the week of the congress' session. Of course, therefore, no one heard it all; and with three sessions a day going on in a number of different halls, at each of which there were several speakers, it is no wonder that the reporters were overtaxed and that much of what was said, and perhaps much of that which was best, is unreported. We may rest assured, however, that it will not be lost. Those who were privileged to listen to these unreported addresses will carry away some inspiration from them, and later the addresses will probably find their way into print from the notes of the speakers themselves.

One thing at least may be said now. This greatest meeting of women which history knows has impressed the world. This impression began before the assembly actually gathered; from the press accounts of what was to be the public began to realize how large a part woman had come to play in the world's affairs, and what was still more to the point, how well she played it. And the reality has justified the anticipations. In view of their past it is doubly significant that such men as the editors of the New York Sun and the Boston Courier should take the friendly attitude toward the enlargement of woman's sphere that they have recently expressed in their journals.

In this connection Mme. Josefa Humpal-Zema's words are significant also. She represented the women of Bohemia and spoke of their hope to obtain a higher education, saying that her queen had promised that women should be permitted to enter the University of Prague when a certain number were ready, and that eighty students were now preparing for that privilege. And then she said: "Before I left my country the representatives of the press said: 'Write us all you can about the Woman's Congress, that we may publish it. Everybody is interested.'"

Perhaps none was listened to with more interest than Miss Georgia Cayvan, the New England actress, but we are unable to repeat her words. Mme. Modjeska said:

While the life that we lead exposes us to many temptations, stimulates our vanity, and sometimes takes us too far from our every-day duties, it certainly develops in us a sense of independence, and therefore a sense of responsibility. It brings us into contact with the highest creations of the master minds, and is bound to open both our hearts and intellects to the generous impulses and high problems which they teach to humanity.

There is no question that even the higher drama can be interpreted, without detriment to the author's object, so as to appeal to the lower instincts of the public, or to its higher intellect and sentiment. It is in this direction that I think woman's mission on the stage can be of great significance, both to her art, to her public and to herself.

Miss Clara Morris spoke of the fact that hers was one field in which the woman received such recognition as she was entitled to, regardless of sex. Perhaps more might be said on this subject. It is possible that while women who take leading parts on the stage are received with rather more favor than men, their humbler sisters may have a harder time. Miss Helen Gardiner spoke a brave word on the Moral Responsibility of Woman in Heredity.

Among the prominent foreigners in attendance were Mrs. Ormiston Chant, Mrs. Cobden Unwin, and the Countess of Aberdeen, of England; Mme. Callirhoe Parren, of Athens, Greece; Miss Kristine Frederiksen, of Denmark; Baroness Thorburg Rappe of Sweden; Frau Elizabeth Kaselowsky and Fraulein Augusta Forster, of Germany; Mme. Isabelle Bogelot, of Paris, France; Margaret Windeyer, of New South Wales; and many more.

Dr. Mary Putman Jacobi challenged woman's detractors in a paper on Woman in Science. In the religious gatherings the Roman Catholic women discussed "Elevation of Woman Through Veneration of the Blessed Virgin" and "Methods of Improvement in Philanthropic Work;" the Jewish women, "Woman's Place in Hebrew Thought" and "The Light in the East."

The Woman's Unitarian Congress was held under the joint auspices of the National Alliance, the Woman's Conference, and the Pacific Coast Association. Rev. Miss Ida C. Hultin, of Moline, Ill., presided over the morning session, and Mrs. Dix over the evening meeting. Mrs. Fifield, the Secretary of the Alliance, spoke of its work, mentioning its 126 branches and its 5,500 members. Its Post Office Mission work was reported to reach 7,000 correspondents, and was believed to be a mighty force in molding the thought of the next generation. The chief work of the Alliance was said to be the strengthening of existing churches. Last year it gave $28,287 to some forty different objects.

Mrs. Marion H. Perkins gave a sketch of the Woman's Western Unitarian Conference, stating that its work had been chiefly in the line of religious study classes, the Post Office Mission, and the assistance in the care and support of the Western headquarters. Its new departure in the holding of religious councils, of which notice has previously appeared in UNITY, was also spoken of, and its reasons for not uniting with the Alliance were mentioned.

Mrs. Eastman not being present, her report of the Pacific Coast Association was read by Mrs. Davis, of New York. It was organized in 1890, and holds annual meetings, with delegates for every twenty members. The fact was alluded to that it was the women of the Pacific coast who had taken the initiative in establishing the headquarters at San Francisco. The other features of the morning session were Mrs. Jenkin Lloyd Jones' clear and interesting history of the Post Office Mission movement, Mrs. John W. Chadwick's address on the New York Women's League, the Rev. Miss Helen G. Putnam's account of her missionary labors in Dakota, Mrs. Galpin's admirable address on the importance of such meetings and the need for the work in which they were engaged, and the interesting addresses of Miss Mary F. Eastman and Mrs. Lucy Stone.

Mrs. Davis opened the evening session with a paper entitled "A Woman's Religion," asking if religion meant more to women than to men, and showing that it should not, since all truth is religious truth. Her address was an inspiring one, touching upon the fruitfulness of the thoughts of Divine immanence now becoming the central thought in religion, and the hopefulness of the fact that faith always leads to increased happiness and good. In a paper on "The Religion of the Twentieth Century," Mrs. Learned discussed Christianity's place in the history of religion, saying that no one creature ever absorbed the whole of Deity. She thought the pure and lofty fame of Jesus would never fade, but that all that savors of the supernatural would melt away from man's conception of him. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe then spoke, commenting upon the papers which had been read, speaking of her own early revolt from the harsh conception of Divine Justice current in her girlhood, and propheying hopefully of women as ministers.

From the comments of those who listened to them it would seem that the papers of Mrs. Davis and Mrs. Learned were recognized as among the finest religious discussions of our day.

MEN AND THINGS.

MR. JOHN C. HAYNES, of Boston, representing the Free Religious Association, has been in Chicago for a week making arrangements for the participation of his association in the World's Parliament of Religions.

THE managers of a Brussels workmen's union have printed circulars giving a resume of the increase in the consumption of liquor and the consequent increase of poverty and crime. The support of the poor has become an almost intolerable burden, and yet the country permits 83,800 rum snops to rob the laborers.—Exchange.

WITHIN forty years fourteen Episcopal congregations below 14th street, in New York, have been given up or moved up town. Within that time the Roman Catholics have gained as many in the same district. That means principally that the character of the population has changed; but it also indicates, as Dr. B. T. De Costa said last Sunday, that Protestant church work in the lower part of the city needs to be put on a missionary basis, so that churches shall not fight separately, but together, making the success of the whole dependent on the success of each.—The Independent.

COURAGE.

Who fails to strike when man's assailed.
For fear of selfish pain or loss:
Who weakly cowers when Right is nailed

Upon the proud world's heavy cross:
Who fails to speak the splendid word
Of bold defiance to a lie:
Whose voice for truth is faintly heard
When party passions mount on high:
Who dares no struggling cause espouse.
And loves no paths by martyrs trod.
Whose timorous soul no call can rouse
To dare to stand alone with God,—
That man is coward, and no deeds
Of valor done on fields of strife
Can prove his courage. Battle meeds
Are naught beside a tested life.

Who dallies with temptacion's lure,
Nor hurls his tempter to the ground:
Who champions not the weak, the poor,
Whom power and strength with cords have bound:

Who bows obsequious to the strong
And crushes what he knows is weak:
Who palters with a deadly wrong.
And dares no vengeance on it weak:
Who crouches neath opinion's lash,
Nor dares his own true thought proclaim:

Who never with an impulse rash
Ran on before his time,—is tame.
Is coward, and no work upears Which lasts. God's edict from on high

Says, courage shall outlast the years.
But every coward soul shall die.

HOW THE FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH WAS PLANTED IN CHICAGO.

Late in September, 1839, I left Boston for Chicago in company with three friends, one of whom was Rev. Joseph Harrington, of Boston, who was sent out by the American Unitarian Association to organize a society in Chicago if practicable.

From Boston to Albany we went by the recently opened railroad in about twenty-four hours, ten miles an hour being at that time a highly satisfactory rate of progress.

From Albany to Schenectady the train was moved by a stationary engine. Thence to Utica we went by canal boat for some distance, then for a few miles to another piece of railroad by stage. In the distance of 365 miles from Albany to Buffalo we probably changed our conveyance half a dozen times, consuming three or four days in the journey.

Little does the traveler of the present day, who goes easily in a Pullman car from New York to Chicago in twenty-four hours, with his bedroom and dining-room attached, know of the time spent and the trouble undergone by the pioneers, of sixty years ago. To sleep and obtain your meals at miserable wayside taverns, to hunt up your baggage at every transfer from railroad to canal, unaided by any system of checks, and to get it hauled half a mile across a town for a new departure, was the common experience.

Buffalo was then a place of greater importance than at present. It was the gateway of the whole lake region and the commercial center of the great lakes, as Chicago is now. Here we waited three or four days for the steamboat "Illinois," the finest boat of the line, and attended the church of the Rev. Dr. Hosmer on Sunday. There being no railroads west of Buffalo all passengers and freight went by the lakes to Chicago, and the line of steamers was a very comfortable one; the company was good, the table was excellent, and there was usually a band of music on board. On Lake Erie the boats stopped at Dunkirk, Erie and Cleveland. Detroit was a small place, but important from its location. The shores of Lake Huron were uninhabited, and Mackinac was our next stopping place. There we staid one day, and rambled about the picturesque island, dining on the delicious white fish. The "Illinois" was commanded by Capt. Chelsea Blake, a veteran soldier of the war of 1812, and we had among the passengers General Scott, the commander-in-chief of the army, who, with his staff, was on a tour of inspection of the Western posts. As Capt. Blake had served under General Scott in the war of 1812 at Chippewa and Lundy's Lane, the conversation between these two old soldiers was very interesting.

There were few settlements on the shores of Lake Michigan in 1839, and Milwaukee was our first stopping place, and so unimportant that we did not enter the river, but landed the few passengers and the small amount of freight in a lighter.

At Chicago we arrived on the fifth day of our voyage and the twelfth of our journey from Boston, being on the 9th of October, 1839. Chicago was then a city four years old, and only six years from its incorporation as a village. Its population was about 4,500, scattered about on a low prairie, in small wooden houses. Its streets were over shoes in dust in summer, and over boots in mud at other times, not an attractive place to the eye of a new comer, but if a man lived there a year he generally became imbued with the civil pride and faith in the future of Chicago, which have produced great results, and which are likely to produce similar results in Atlanta.

Chicago was a city of young men, active and enterprising, with broad and liberal views, and the American Unitarian Association acted wisely in its attempt to occupy the ground. The Unitarians proper were few in number and mostly from New England, but had much influence in the community. A few Unitarian preachers had from time to time stopped en route to give a sermon or two, but there had been no settled minister of that sect. St. Louis and New Orleans were the only cities west of Chicago where the Unitarians had churches.

In 1839 there were five churches in Chicago, one each for the Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists and Roman Catholics. As it was not to be expected that any of these would open their doors to Unitarians, the only hall in the city suitable for religious services was hired for Mr. Harrington. This was in one of the half-dozen brick buildings in the south division, and stood at the corner of Lake and Clark streets, a central position. It happened that on the first Saturday night after our arrival a large fire occurred on Lake street, and as most of the young men belonged to the fire department and worked all night at the fire, Mr. Harrington had at his first appearance in Chicago only an audience of seven persons. Our hall seated about two hundred people. It was occupied on week days in many ways, often as a court room, for political meetings, and for any lectures or shows that might need a hall, so that it required much purification on Sunday mornings.

Mr. Harrington was a man about 30 years old, well educated, a good writer and speaker, a handsome man, of pleasing manners, and of strong musical tastes. He soon became the popular preacher of the town among the young people, and his hall was usually well filled. The Universalists, who had no church at that time in Chicago, came to our meetings, as did also some of the Jews, who are monotheists. In most places there are people who have become disgusted with the doctrines of the so-called orthodox churches, and are called by others, and perhaps believe themselves to be, infidels or atheists. When these persons hear reasonable doctrine preached, they are apt to become Unitarians. So we gathered in our fold many of these outcasts.

In the summer of 1840 it was decided that Mr. Harrington should return to Boston, make his report, and try to raise money for building a church in Chicago, while we, his people, should raise what funds we could for the same purpose. Although among the stricter people the Unitarians were considered as dangerous, yet the leading business men of the city, believing that another church would help Chicago, and seeing that our leading men were good citizens even if they were heretics, helped us more or less by their subscriptions.

Chicago in 1840 was very poor. The great land boom of 1836-'37, by which great fortunes were made, on paper, had collapsed, and the people found themselves in debt for their lands, which could not be sold. So that in the city, which to-day raises fifteen millions of dollars for the Columbian Fair, fifty years ago it was difficult to raise fifteen hundred for a church. But by allowing the subscriptions to be paid in goods and labor—the lumber dealer to pay in boards, the druggist in paints and glass, the hardware man in nails, and the mechanic in labor—the amount needed was made up, and, Mr. Harrington's appeal to the people of Boston being successful, a church costing $3,000 was built upon a good central lot given us by the State, which, when the town was laid out, had wisely reserved lands for public schools and churches.

Those who gave money or goods for building the church had been allowed credit for their subscription on the price of pews, which were not to be taxed, so that the church had to be run on the voluntary principle, and it was with difficulty that the modest salary of Mr. Harrington could be raised—$600. We could not afford to pay a sexton, and the writer, as one of the trustees, took his turn in making the fire and sweeping out the church, being encouraged by the words of the poet,

"Who sweeps a room, as by thy laws, Makes that and the action fine."

Our congregation slowly increased, and we were after awhile in better financial condition. Mr. Harrington remained with us for several years, and he married in Chicago. When he left us, for personal reasons, his departure was much regretted by many friends outside our church, while to most of his congregation he was a highly valued friend as well as pastor. He returned to Boston, and some time after he accepted a call from San Francisco, but in crossing the Isthmus he contracted disease, from which he died soon after reaching his post.

After Mr. Harrington our church had a number of ministers sent from Boston, but their talents did not prove suitable to that field of duty. The first man after Mr. Harrington who met our wants was Rev. Rush R. Shippen, who remained with us for several years.

Having lost all my papers and memoranda respecting the church in the great fire of 1871, I am unable to give full particulars or furnish dates.

When, somewhere in the fifties, a church was gathered in the north division of Chicago for Rev. Robert Collyer, my connection with the First Church came to an end. Both these church buildings perished in the great fire, but there are now in Chicago four prosperous Unitarian societies with large and costly churches. From this central point also a number of Unitarian societies have grown up in various parts of the State of Illinois during the last fifty years.

A SERVICE OF BROTHERHOOD.

A long, low up-stairs room, with two snowy tables, arranged in the form of a cross, set for supper. Draperies of stars and stripes on the walls; a motto, "Work for God and Works with Man;" and pictures, notable among them a large and excellent engraving of Wendell Phillips. There are chairs set in orderly rows against the walls, and chairs placed about the tables. A quiet, sweet-faced woman goes to and fro, with hymn-books in one hand and napkins in the other. This is the "Church of the Carpenter," on Washington street, in the busy heart of Boston. It is Sunday night, fifteen minutes before the opening of the regular Sunday evening service.

By the stove, warming his knotted hands, sits a toiler of the streets. His coarse pantaloons are tucked into his boot-tops. He wears a shabby old overcoat buttoned high about his throat, and one suspects it is a slumbering sense of pride which forbids his unbuttoning it, even in that stifling atmosphere. A little farther down the room, a man whose face might do service as a draughtsman's triangle, so angular is it, so firm, so practical, so emotionless, is talking with a portly woman in spectacles. He uses his left palm as a register, his right forefinger as an indicator; and all the points which he makes arrange themselves on that registering palm with the absolute incontrovertibility of pandects.

Just inside the door, a poor, besotted wreck of humanity has stumbled into the first chair at hand. The bloated, discolored face is sunk upon the breast. The soiled hands are folded in the lap. All the gospel he asks, poor fellow, is a little warmth; all the temple he seeks is a place where he may forget himself, undisturbed by the rough hand of the policeman. "Poor, crushed brother! let him sleep. That is a little—perhaps the most—of God's love we can bring him to-night," says Pastor Bliss, as he pauses over the drooping form.

By this time the room is well-nigh full. On sharp winter nights there is always a large congregation at the Church of the Carpenter. Jack Frost is better than a Puritan beadle to get the people in. At a nod from Mr. Bliss a lady seats herself at the piano. Gospel Hymn books and sheets of "Brotherhood Songs" are passed around. Then Mr. Bliss raps on one of the tables and the hum of conversation ceases. "If anyone finds a favorite hymn in this collection, please give the number, and we will all sing it," he says.

Then follow half a dozen or more of those simple gospel lyrics, known and loved the world around. They seem to flow out of these human hearts, "like the unwinding of a silver thread." But the brotherhood songs go less smoothly. They are by no means perfect in versification, all of them, nor are they perfectly wedded to the music, which was neither written for them, nor they for it. The untrained company of singers find no little difficulty in getting the required number of poetical feet into a musical bar, and sometimes, toward the close of a line, these feet have to "twinkle in and out" with rapidity which is more amusing than graceful. But the sentiments get themselves expressed some way, with vigor at least, if not with melody, and everybody seems to feel in addition a genuine satisfaction at having wrestled with such metrical difficulties and conquered them, as it were, by main force.

"Now we will partake of our simple brotherhood meal," says Mr. Bliss, as the song service closes. "I trust you will all be able to find places at the tables. If not, there will be plenty left for those who are willing to wait their turn." The pastor asks a brief, simple blessing, and the people seat themselves about the board. It is a truly apostolic scene. Simplicity and fraternity characterize the repast. "One word more," says Mr. Bliss, as the napkins are unfolded. "To defray the expenses of our weekly supper we have been accustomed to charge a nominal fee of fifteen cents. If you feel unable to contribute, you are none the less welcome to share with us in God's bounty. Or if you would like to contribute more, we shall be very grateful to receive it."

Then a lady makes the round of the tables, with a little basket in her hand, and all contribute something. One's left-hand neighbor knoweth not what his right-hand neighbor giveth. The bill of fare is simple, wholesome, home-like; the sweetest and snowiest of home-made bread, cold meats, stewed prunes, tea, coffee, and chocolate. Each participant is first his neighbor's helper. It is a supper, one thinks, not wholly unlike another such, centuries ago, in an upper chamber in Jerusalem.

After the supper comes the characteristic feature of this unique church service: the free parliament of religious (or, if one choose, irreligious) opinion. All seem eager to speak. There are no painful pauses, such as one grimly expects in too many conventional religious gatherings. It would take a volume to describe the variety and intensity of the opinions put forth. As a rule, the speakers are iconoclasts. Each has his little bag of sharp-cornered stones, which he proceeds to empty with vigor and evident zest. Some carry swords and clubs, which make one cringe. The burden of this onslaught is: "Down with institutionalism! down with priest-craft! down with creeds! abase the purse-proud religious hypocrite! a murrain on the church snob! abolish poverty; distribute wealth; communism forever! socialism ditto! no ownership of land or tools—only the right of using them; no church authority; no organized sacerdotalism; every man his own priest; every individual at the apex!" This image-smashing goes on for an hour, steadily. Even Mr. Bliss begins to look a little disturbed at such a violent eruption of the Pandora-box. Then the Salvation Army marches by, in the street, with its drums, its cornets, and its men and women singers. The interrupted iconoclast who chances to be upon his feet is moved to hurl a thunder-bolt of abuse against it. "Aye, march along with your drums and your horns, Salvation Army!" he cries. "You can never reach the fallen brother with your priest-borrowed mummeries. Like the ass in the fable, you drown out wisdom with your bray!"

The speaker storms himself out—and a gentle girl springs to her feet, pale, but clear-eyed, brave, earnest, truth-sustained.

"Mr. Bliss! Please, may I say a word?"

There are others on their feet, louder-voiced, more insistent. But the chivalry of the Christian gentlemen bows its clear permission to the girl.

"I want to say just a word," she falters. "We all know the sympathy, the self-sacrifice, the devotion of the Salvation Army; and it seems to me that we, who profess to have such breadth of sympathy for all mankind, ought to have some sympathy for them too."

There seemed to be an immediate occultation of iconoclasm. This true gospel, this sweet, Christ-like plea for sympathy, changed the whole current of the meeting.

WOMAN'S INHUMANITY TO WOMAN.

The women of Atlanta, Ga., who have been interesting themselves in establishing a home for erring girls who wish to reform, have had a great deal of trouble in securing a location for it, as no community wanted this class of girls, no matter how quietly they might submit to the presence of those who did not want to reform. Finally, having risen superior to the hindrances placed in their way by the Pharisaism of their neighbors, and got well started in their good work, they have proven themselves deeply imbued with this sham morality. They received for the home $1,000 from an unknown source, and were duly gratified, but having traced the gift to its source, they discovered that it came from the dissolute women of the town, whereupon they declined to receive the gift. Was there ever a grander opportunity to come into helpful relations with these erring sisters whom the world calls "lost" than this extension of their hands to help others out of their terrible life, afforded? What a pathetic offering to buy others salvation even with the proceeds of their own sin! Women who could thus appreciate the noble purpose of the home, and wish to clasp hands with good women to save those for whom there is still a chance, were surely worthy of not being scorned.

The Tribune has over and over again inveighed against the laws by which the wages of sin are taken from these women as fines, but when society has closed every door upon them as far as they are aware, their offering to give the means for which they have bartered body and soul to keep those for whom there is still hope from a like horrible fate, perchance with the thought that they might themselves even be saved, shows that the spark of divine goodness is not yet extinguished. Oh, poor, tempted, fallen and unhappy sisters, the tears of many women will fall for you as they read this story of your outstretched hand and its rejection, and the tears of the angels will blur the record of your sins.

—Woman's Tribune.

CONSISTENCY.

The hypocrisy, or, if that is too strong a term, the inconsistency of some of the loudest to protest that a visit to the Exposition on Sunday is a desecration of the Lord's day, and the most emphatic to threaten the organization of a gigantic boycott against the Fair, was well illustrated last Sunday in this city. In the morning a great gospel meeting was held in Forepaugh's circus. In itself, this would call for no comment. But all those that attended the meeting in the morning were well aware of the fact that two performances had been announced for the afternoon and evening. To visit the circus on "the Sabbath" thus is not a violation of God's or Man's Law. But in case the Fair is open on Sunday every good "Christian" is bound to stay away from it also on other days! This is consistency with a vengeance. At least, our brain is not so highly developed as to be able to grasp the principle which tolerates under a circus tent what it denounces as impious 'midst the surroundings of a World's Fair. —Reform Advocate.

HYMN.

Written for the Graduating Exercises of the Meadville Theological School by a Member of the Middle Class.

Eternal Truth, more vast, more near
At parting of the ways,
With rev'rent hearts we seek thee here,
Whose Love hath crowned our days.

So fair hath bloomed the path behind,
So broad the way before,
We follow, glad, new fields to find,
Life's service held in store.

Speed on, O sons, with holy zeal,
In this your pow'r to win;
Pure lives and earnest souls reveal
God's kingdom coming in.

The prophet's word, the high command,
Renewed from sun to sun,
Ring down through ev'ry age and land:
God's Love, God's Truth are one.

Church-Door Pulpit

"THE NEW ORTHODOXY."*

BY REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

The movement summed up under the name of "The New Theology" is a phenomenon profoundly interesting to Unitarians. The title has become current as descriptive of a remarkable simultaneous advance in theological thought and expression on the part of a quite considerable number of able men within many of the communions commonly accounted orthodox. The Church of England, the Presbyterians, the Congregationalists, the Baptists, all present numerous instances. In England, in Scotland, in the United States "The New Theology" is making its voice heard and revolutionizing the religious conceptions of large numbers of the intelligent laity. To many it has seemed that our own battle is already won, that essentially our message is being uttered from the best pulpits of the heretofore orthodox communities. Friends of mine who are in this movement, helping to lead it, tell me this very thing. They say: "You have done your work; you have infused your spirit into our churches; there is no need for you to maintain your protest." Not a few of Unitarian training take the same view, and are infusing them lives contentedly into the Church of England, the Presbyterian bodies, and the congregations of the Baptists and Independents.

And, indeed, a very large part of that which we and our fathers have stood for, this New Theology does truly adopt into its own life. It abhors cant as much as we abhor it. It recognizes that religion, Christianity, is not a creed, but a life; not a sacrament, but a spirit. It takes joy in a wide and kindly tolerance. It stakes salvation on no dogma. It preaches freedom of thought and speech. It pleads for a brotherhood wide as humanity. It faces fearlessly the great new thought and knowledge of our time, and does in some degree weave these into its theological conceptions. It finds the true Christ-life in love, in the loving service of all whom we can help or lift up.

I have no words to express my delight that this is so. The men of this New Theology are lifting a nightmare from the bosom of the world. I thank God for their courage, their insight, their labor.

Yet I have to offer certain adverse but respectful and most earnest criticisms on their methods and their work. I have to lament that they are setting up, not a New Theology pure and simple, growing from the Old as a tree from its roots, but a New Orthodoxy with much of the weakness, much of the mischief in it which pertain to the old orthodoxies which it thrusts aside.

The weakness and the mischief spring from this: The New Theology, so far as I am acquainted with it, always appeals to some other authority besides a man's own reason and conscience, the only court to which Jesus of Nazareth ever made appeal. It gravely discusses the comparative authority of the Bible, the Church and Reason. It might as well discuss the comparative authority of Sir Isaac Newton, the Royal Society and Reason. The Royal Society and Sir Isaac Newton have precisely no authority at all save so far as their statements conform to Reason. The Church, the Bible, the Christ himself have no shred of legitimate authority over our beliefs save what authority is given them by the concurrence of their enunciations with the living voice of God in the intellect and conscience of each individual believer.

That I may make the nature of my criticism clear, it will be well that I should first state what it is that I prize the most in the methods of our own Unitarian thought. To me the peculiar value of that thought is that it moves pari passu with the contemporary thought traveling along the roads of critical and scientific investigation. No man values more highly than I do the conception of the pure and simple humanity of Jesus, and the concentration of the personality of God in the Supreme Father whom he worshiped. But the discovery of these illuminating truths is to me incidental to that method of thought which so absolutely trusts God that it assimilates eagerly all that the man of criticism and the man of science present to it, provided it has stood the tests proper to its own sphere of truth. I value Unitarian thought chiefly for its absolute intellectual sincerity; and if there be a Unitarianism which, when considering purely critical or scientific inferences casts a side glance at its theology before admitting those inferences, to see that that is in no danger of disturbance, that is not the Unitarianism for me. Unitarian Christianity is to me a pouring of the spiritual life into intellectual forms loyally true to the best that can be thought, and the fullest that can be known in science or in criticism. It is the absolute harmony of the higher Unitarianism with critical and scientific results to-day, and still more, my sense that it will harmonize itself with whatsoever critical and scientific results may be revealed to-morrow and the day after, that makes me rejoice in Unitarianism, and trust absolutely that—under whatever name—it must command the future. Unitarianism, as I accept it, has no reserves. It is prepared for all possible outcomes of the investigation of planets or of books, a decade, a century, a millennium from to-day, and can change its form to meet them without disturbance to its essence.

Now, the New Theology of which I speak makes the same professions. If it made them truly, then though its professors call themselves Trinitarian, and we call ourselves Unitarian, we should essentially be at one.

But my respectful charge against the New Theology is that, put to the test, it breaks down in this profession. It departs very widely from the orthodoxies of the past, but it does not free itself from all their limitations. It does still profess some tenets which are not the true result of free investigation, but are borrowed from systems resting on ecclesiastical authority, and have no basis other than that authority. Though it has crossed a wide sea to reach new territories, it has never burnt its ships. Though it has thrown out skirmishers far afield, it has never cut off its communication. Though it adventures far in the ocean of truth, it is a swimmer with a rope tied round his body, by which, if the current prove too strong, he can haul himself back to land. There are swimmers among these New Theologians whose ropes are very long, indeed, but I have met none who dare breast the waves without a rope.

If this be so, then the New Theology is not in the true sense intellectually sincere. I trust I may say this without personal offense. I am far from imputing conscious insincerity to any one of the bold and brilliant writers whom I have in view. All that I mean is that their results are not reached by unalloyed reason, using the term reason to cover all the truth-finding faculties of man. There is an admixture of deference to past authority other than pure reason justifies. They do not with a whole heart trust themselves to the Word of God now. They keep an eye upon past centuries. They do not always test the Word of God then by the Word of God now. They sometimes test the Word of God now by the Word of God then. They do not always measure the revelation of yesterday by the revelation of to-day. They sometimes measure the revelation of to-day by the revelation of yesterday. They give us no confidence that they will accept the revelation of to-morrow.

I shall illustrate this thesis of mine from three small books, very able, very brilliant, in some respects very noble, which are in great vogue.—three books by three thoroughly representative sons of the New Theology. They are Mr. Robert F. Horton's "Inspiration and the Bible," Dr. Lyman Abbott's "Evolution of Christianity," and Dr. James Morris Whiton's "Gloria Patri." It may excite some surprise that I do not turn to Dr. Fairbairn's new and important work, "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology." I can only say that I am so amazed at its extraordinary contents, at the confidence with which it discusses the internal economy of the Godhead, at its acceptance of the three Persons in the Godhead seemingly in the most literal sense of the English word "person," at its absolute dogmatic orthodoxy in spite of the boldness of its critical research, that I am quite unable to regard it as in any way belonging to the New Theology as I have understood that term. I revert then to the three authors whom I have named.

*A paper read before the annual conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at London, Eng., May 27, 1893. Reprinted from the (London, Eng.) Inquirer.

These writers do not all maintain the same lines of communication with the rear. Each of them casts away much which the others retain. But each of them carefully guards at least one line of communication with orthodox Christianity. None of them seem to me to have ventured out to the open sea.

Mr. Horton proposes to go to the Bible with a free mind, and to put nothing into it which he does not really find there. His position is: The Bible is inspired, and inspired in a different sense from any other literature: to make it clear what we mean when we allege this unique inspiration of the Bible we must review it book by book, and note exactly what in each book that quality is which we designate inspiration.

Mr. Horton's volume is full of incidental truth and beauty, but its method is corrupted by the spirit of traditionalism. If Mr. Horton were not moved by unconscious desire to keep open his communication with orthodox Christianity, he could never draw so sharp and absolute a line between the Bible and the whole remaining contents of the world's literature. Some of that outside literature is marked by the very characteristics which in the Bible he claims as inspiration. Some portions of the Bible can only be brought under his rule by the most astonishing straining of his thesis.

"Inspiration," says he, "as applied to the Bible, is a term applicable only to the Bible." "We call our Bible inspired, by which we mean that by reading it and studying it we find our way to God, we find His will for us, and we find how we can conform ourselves to His will." Does Mr. Horton really mean that no man has ever found these things by reading Augustine or a Kempis? Every individual book in the Bible fills "its foreordained niche * * * in a large mosaic." If Chronicles or Esther or Ecclesiastes or Jude had been left out and perished, would Mr. Horton have discovered lacunæ in the mosaic? In Pastoral Epistles of Paul, says Mr. Horton, "it is difficult to trace the breath of inspiration." Then why should he try, unless he has carried a foregone theory to the Bible? Of the Old Testament historical books he says, "It is not the historical record so much as the history itself that is inspired." Then why insist on the inspiration of the books? Yet he concludes, "We shall not be left in much doubt concerning the inspiration of these books." Of the Pentateuch he says that, when we speak of its inspiration, "we can only mean that it played a part in the economy of God's education of the human race," and must, therefore, be included in the Bible. Have, then, no other histories played a part in God's education of the human race? "The spiritual meaning of life's great drama," says Dr. Lyman Abbott, "is not really less in the history of the United States than in that of Palestine." If some one then wrote the history of the United States with sympathetic insight, would Mr. Horton find a place for that in the inspired Bible? Mr. Horton rebukes such as find less inspiration in Esther, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs, than in Job, the Proverbs, and the Psalter. Yet the most he can say for Esther is "that it throws a little light upon a point in the history of the Jewish people," and that the whole history of that people is inspired. He is fully alive to the "cynical pessimism" of Ecclesiastes: yet it finds its ideal place in the inspired scriptures "because it is suitable that the doubting spirit * * * should find an utterance as a foil to the restful and trusting spirit." "Thus," says he, "the book holds a place in the Inspired Volume just because it is not in the ordinary sense inspired itself." Surely this is "lucus a non lucendo" with a vengeance! It is clear that if Paine's "Age of Reason," or an essay from the Agnostic Annual were found wedged in between Proverbs and the Song of Solomon, its place in "the Inspired Volume" might be justified by precisely the same reasoning. Mr. Horton has to submit his theory to still greater strain, that, to use his own words, he may "explain what we mean by calling the Song of Songs inspired." Mr. Horton's book contains much admirable criticism, and grinds to powder all mechanical theories of inspiration; but it is impossible to believe that a mind so acute, so truth-loving, and so devout, could have been betrayed to write a book of which the main argument is a vicious circle, and the details play fast and loose with the contents of the word "inspiration," were he not unconsciously biased by a desire to keep open his communications with the orthodoxy he has left. Mr. Horton swims far from shore; but the rope is round his body.

Turning next to Abbott's "Evolution of Christianity," we find that he completely cuts the line of communication with the rear so carefully maintained by Mr. Horton. He knows nothing of an inspiration in the Bible other in kind than that which exists to-day. He proclaims that "Inspiration is no remote phenomenon, once attested by miracles, now forever silenced in the grave of a dead God, but a universal and eternal communion between a living God and living souls." Thus severing himself from the minister of Lyndhurst-road—and that in the very name of the New Theology—how does the eloquent preacher of the Brooklyn Tabernacle secure his own line of retreat?

His book is a very lucid argument for the recognition of evolution in the Christian religion itself. His thesis is "that the Christian religion is itself an evolution; that is, that this life of God in humanity is one of continuous progressive change, according to certain divine laws, and by means of forces, or a force, resident in humanity." And the bulk of his volume is occupied with tracing this orderly evolution in the Bible, in theology, in the Church, in Christian society, in the soul. Evolution embraces the phenomena of degeneration and decay as well as—though subordinately to—progress and expansion. And so the phenomena of the priestly element for a while superseding the prophetic in Israel and in Christendom causes no embarrassment. The whole is worked out with unshrinking faithfulness from the days of Moses to our own,—the whole save for one transcendent exception. Dr. Abbott's theory requires that as David and Isaiah are products of evolution, Jesus shall be so too. But such an admission would at once sever our author irrevocably from the company of the historic church, and when confronted with it he turns aside. Through all the rest of the story Dr. Abbott teaches that "God is the cause; phenomena are the product; evolution is the method." God worked in prophet and in psalmist on spiritual organisms themselves evolved from the whole preparation of the past. The phenomena resulting were the "Comfort ye, comfort ye," the "Bless the Lord, O my soul," the whole character of the men who wrote these things, the whole literature which they delivered to the world. In philosophical consistency Dr. Abbott would be bound to explain in like manner the phenomena of the life and word of Christ, to see in him also the accumulated spiritual influences of the past giving birth to a soul on which God so worked that the manifestation of unspeakable love and the words of unspeakable grace were the phenomena produced—a link in the chain of evolution in the same sense as Amos or Micah, as Paul or John, as Augustine or Luther. But Dr. Abbott boldly breaks his evolution. He lifts up Jesus and Jesus only in all the roll of history to be himself a true cause, "the Infinite entering"—and entering, we must take it, for the first time—"in human life." I for my part believe that every man is in the measure of his free initiative, not merely a link in the evolution chain, but a new cause acting with free impact on society. But whether it be so or not, an evolutionist must be consistent. He must admit no exceptions. And when Dr. Abbott subjects the historic Christ to a radically different treatment to that which he adjudges to every other bearer of the word of God, he breaks up his own argument and destroys the meaning of his book.

The inconsistency saves Dr. Abbott's line of communication with orthodox Christianity, but it costs him the rank he ought to take as a philosophical exponent of Christian history. Dr. Abbott proceeds to lay it down that in the case of all the prophets before Jesus Christ God spoke to man; that in him God spoke in man. I have tried to attach a meaning to these words. But I cannot understand how God can ever speak to his child save by speaking in him. I can recognize infinite degrees in the clearness and the fullness of his communication with humanity. I acknowledge to the full the vast expansion and brightening of the Divine Word in the Man of Nazareth. But I am persuaded that the endeavor to distinguish between God speaking to us and God speaking in us, an external and an internal Word of God, is born of an unconscious and confused traditionalism, and not of strong and clear-cut thinking.

Let us now glance at Dr. Whiton's very powerful "Gloria Patri." I am not sure that of the three volumes this one is not characterized by the greatest breadth and sweep of thought. It is instinct with the spirit of all that is best and strongest in the New Theology. Dr. Whiton knows no distinction between God speaking to man and God speaking in man. Christ, it is true, is, he alleges, God in man; but in the same way, in however inferior degree, God is in all men—whether before or after Christ.

And yet this bold champion of the newer light writes with the one object of re-establishing the doctrine of the Trinity. This is his line of communication with the rear. His thoughts concerning God and Christ and Man are hardly to be distinguished from those of the completest Unitarian. But he pours all the fervor of his thought into the hard mold of Trinitarian phraseology. His book is a detailed apology for Trinitarianism. It is true he uses the term Trinity for a conception of the Godhead such as never an early Father nor a sixteenth century Reformer would for a moment recognize. He reduces the distinction of the three Persons to a mere variation in the spheres of Divine influence. He rejects with scorn the doctrine of the two natures in Christ. Such a doctrine has a "paralyzing effect." He confuses under the one name "Christ," or "the Son," the historic individual Jesus, the great company of good men, and the Deity "in his revealed immanency in the life of the world." He is hard put to it to find any place at all for the third member of the Trinity. But he stands manfully by the Trinity as the cardinal doctrine of Christianity, and so joins hands with that great mass of Christian believers to whom Unitarianism is a cold and lifeless abstraction.

And of all these New Theologians I have to say that, while in words they admit the modern criticism, in practice they abjure its most obvious results. Why does Mr. Horton say that "of course" Acts does not contradict Galatians? He may ingeniously persuade himself that it does not, but there is no "of course" about it. Why does Dr. Whiton quote texts from the Fourth Gospel as if there could be no possible question that they are the ipsissima verba of Jesus? How can a critic, whether he do or do not hold the Johannine authorship, base "claims" of Christ to such and such Divine rank on particular verses of the text? How can he cite a verse from a prophet to show what an apostle must have meant? All these are the bad habits of traditionalism, which a mind truly free would resolutely cast off.

The method, then, of the New Theology is essentially a method of compromise; and the method of compromise is never the method of truth. Men who are determined to go on believing some of the traditional theology cannot be veritable prophets. They who pray the prayer, "Lead us into all truth," must deliver themselves wholly into the hand of God to be guided only by the reason and conscience which he has given.

As it is, we Unitarians still stand alone,—outposts far away from the most advanced lines of the main body. I often feel it solitary. I long from the bottom of my heart for a free and generous religious fellowship with the men and women of these orthodox churches. I have no sympathy with those of my comrades who seem to rejoice in our isolation. But even the most progressive men in the orthodox communions shrink back from us. They dread to be suspected of our heresy. All else can be forgiven save that alone. They pass us by. They would that we were silent. They do not want our case argued. In the fullness of our freedom we are alone and lonely. Let us love God more. Let us follow the spirit of Christ more closely. Let us serve and help men better. And let us trust that the day will come when good men at last shall read our hearts aright, recognize the beauty of our faith, cease to fear our freedom, and mingle their prayers to God with ours.

The Study Table

FELLOWSHIP.

The May number of the Universalist Monthly may well be called a fellowship number. Rev. Jacob Merrifield's paper, previously read at the Liberal Ministers' Institute at Ann Arbor, is an earnest plea for a closer co-operation among Liberals,—such as Unitarians, Universalists, Independents, Reformed Jews, and Ethical Culturists,—to which we say "Amen!" Dr. Jas. T. Birby has an article on the Symphony of Religions, which in its just appreciation of the great non-Christian cults is in marked contrast to Dr. C. E. Nash's grudging admis-

sign of the good in them and his unfair insinuations against them, contained in his letter to the editor on the basis of Universalist fellowship. Dr. Crow's reply proves him one of the broadest-minded of Liberals. Dr. Crow frankly admits that he agrees with hardly a word of the Winchester Profession of Faith, but maintains that it does not express modern Universalism; but that the latter is nevertheless a legitimate outcome of the spirit which the fathers of Universalism tried tamely to express in the profession of faith; and that therefore he and other modern Universalists have a perfect right to remain in the fellowship and retain the name, since, however the fathers defined Universalism, to the children of to-day it means the universal brotherhood of man, and salvation for all through character-growth. While we are in hearty sympathy with Dr. Crow's individual religious views, as expressed in this article, we cannot but feel that Dr. Nash is right in urging that Dr. Crow and his sympathizers should either have the historic Universalist creed changed or withdraw from official connection with the denomination. If that is the creed of Universalism—and Dr. Crow himself speaks of it as the creed—then Dr. Crow is not a Universalist. We suppose that the Doctor would reply that life is too short to be wasted in creed-tinkering, and that inasmuch as the Universalist fathers, with the best intentions in the world, made such a poor job at it, he has no disposition to try his hand at creed-making. If the Universalist, like the Unitarian Church, had no creed, we should feel that Dr. Crow was entirely justified in accepting the larger meaning of which the word is capable, and which it has come to mean to the advance-guard of the church, and remaining in the corps in which he first enlisted. But, substituting English for Latin, if he disbelieves in the official belief of the Universalist Church, let him call himself Liberal or Unitarian if he likes, but not a member of the Universalist denomination.

HOME DEVOTIONS, OR PRAISE AND PRAYER FOR USE IN FAMILIES. Compiled by Richard Bartram. London: The Sunday-school Association, Essex Hall, 1893.—A little book by a good friend of UNITY, for this Mr. Bartram was once our editorial contributor. It gives a glimpse into an English home where the days are made longer and sweeter by giving a few quiet moments at their beginning to a devotional service. "Having found, in its manuscript form, this selection of sacred verse, scripture and other readings useful in his own home, the compiler has thought it possible that it will be found of service to a wider circle." The object has been to present a choice of reading; so each of the thirty-one services offers a poem, a page from some writer of liberal faith, an Old Testament and a New Testament selection, and a prayer. As usual in such contrasts, the Bible passages go to the front for nobleness. These "Daily Strength" books all reveal how well the Bible earns its rank in literature. In his other selections one would almost take Mr. Bartram for an American, so often does he honor our home writers with quotation. W. C. G.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF PANICS—And Their Periodical Occurrence in the United States. By CLEMENT JUGLAR. Englished and edited by DeCourcy W. Thorn. With Index. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, pp. 150. Price, $1.—A book full of information for editorial writers in these panicky times. The translation seems fairly accurate, and as but a portion of the larger work of the author is rendered, conclusions from the mass of figures are in the main left for the reader to draw, though the translator considers "tariff tinkering" as an unfalling symptom of approach-panic. G. B. P.

A LITERARY COURTSHIP; UNDER THE AUSPICES OF PIKE'S PEAK. By ANNA FULLER. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; Chicago: A. C. McClurg. Cloth, 16mo., $1.—A charming story for an idle summer hour or to take with you on a vacation trip. The talented and famous author assumes a female nom de plume to prove his point, and hence all the complications arise. The book is happily free from the too common "straining after naturalness." Artistic printing and binding add much to its charm. G. B. P.

Correspondence

EDITOR UNITY:

The expulsion of the Rev. Mr. Harvey, of the Unitarian Church, and Dr. Mueller, the Hebrew rabbi, from the Des Moines Ministerial Association, is certainly a subject for comment in these days of nineteenth century progress and independence. It is the first case of the kind, I believe, which has occurred in Des Moines. The church throughout the entire world is not without its troubles and tribulations. Indeed, ever since its inception it has had to contend with periodical volcanic eruptions. Either the true Christian religion was not made for all mankind, or, what might be said to be more rational, all men were not fitted to accept of the true Christianity which was first taught by the Master. Hence, those who have from time to time perused the pages of early ancient history—Grecian, Roman and English history—must have some knowledge of the bad blood which has been continually spilled for the cause of Christianity. Many liberal-minded early martyrs have perished in the flames rather than bow themselves down to ecclesiastical princes, priests and courts. Poor Bruno! Every one is familiar with the history of his case, and how he was compelled to flee from continent to continent in order to escape the burning flames which awaited him. The orthodox church of to-day is not any better, but, thanks to the progress of science and the independence of the age, it is without the powers and laws of the past ages; and I must not forget to attribute the liberalism of the age and the advancement of the modern ideas of religion to the progress in the art of printing. Were it not for a liberal press we might still be groping in the dark ages.

To-day the churches everywhere are still having the same old factional fights over differences in the interpretation of creeds. Of the one hundred and ninety and nine different sects of religion no two of them can agree as to the same mode of worship, and no two of them agree as to the interpretation of the scriptures. The church in America is not any exception to the rule. Prof. Davidson, the brilliant scholar and critic, says: "The anguish of Christendom to-day is occasioned by the discovery that the old oracle is worthless, and that the God whom it has worshiped can no longer be believed in."

The Presbyterians are torn up by dissension because so many of them have found that they can no longer believe in the God of the Westminster Assembly, and are looking for some God whom they can believe in. The Congregationalists are in like straits. They say the creed is dead. The Catholics have had their little spat with Dr. McGlynn, now on his way to Rome to call on the Pope. The Episcopalians, too, have had their differences, because some of them cannot sanction the surpliced choir or the golden cross on the altar, or maybe it is over the introduction of an intoned service of song.

Nothing can seem more silly than the tilts at windmills which these "Quixotic defenders of the faith" are making.

What would be thought of the pastor or church in Des Moines who would dare to expel from its worship President Cleveland because, forsooth, his creed was not that pastor's creed?

What of the church which would bar its doors against Gladstone because he, too, differed in his way of worship?

I venture to assert, with all respect to the reverend brethren, that so long as it was to their churches a drawing card and a matter of dollars and cents, not one of them would exclude either of the above gentlemen from their churches.

The same logic may be followed in regard to the Des Moines Ministerial Association. These gentlemen—let it be said, with one or two exceptions—would not for one moment have dreamed of severing their association with either Dr. Mueller or Rev. Mr. Harvey, if such association had brought them a moneyed consideration in the way of bringing large congregations to their church edifices on Sundays.

In England there was a time when Jew was not permitted to sit in the Commons with Gentile, nor the non-sectarian with the professed religionist; yet we have all seen them admitted alike to the Commons, without regard to religious belief. So stringent was the orthodox belief in its religion, that in England it was a standing order that no Roman Catholic could become Lord Mayor of London; yet to-day a Catholic Mayor is presiding over all London—it is believed, with eminent satisfaction.

The healing of these little trifles is evidence to the modern believers that there is yet hope that all religion is not mortgaged to any one class or body of ministers; and that with advanced teaching the time will come when the new churches will begin to be a power for doing more real good to men by getting down to teaching the doctrines of the Golden Rule, and the pure, unadulterated mandates of Jesus the carpenter, rather than the creeds and dogmas of other men.

Respectfully,

ED. W. CARRINGTON.

DREAMING AND DOING.

Dreaming is pleasant, I know, my boy:
Dreaming is pleasant, I know.

To dream of that wonderful, far-off day
When you'll be a man and have only to say

To this one and that one, Do that and do this,

While your wishes fulfillment never shall miss,

May fill you with pleasure; but deeper the joy

Of doing a thing yourself, my boy—
Of doing a thing yourself.

Dreaming is pleasant, I know, my girl:
Dreaming is pleasant, I know.

To dream of that far-off, wonderful day
When you'll be a queen and hold full sway

Over hearts that are loyal and kind and just,

While your sweet "If you please" will mean "You must!"

May fill you with joy; but you'll find pleasure's pearl

In doing for others yourself, my girl—
In doing for others yourself.

THE STAR; A MINOR HARMONY.

The sky hung over them like the bell of a deep-blue flower, and the stars—the stars they had watched together ever since he could point upward with his chubby finger—emerged from the vast shadow of nightfall and shed over them their pale and mellow light.

"Earth seems but a phantom of the day, and the sky alone reigns supreme over the soul's senses," spoke the mother dreamily.

The child beside her, looking up with a cry of delight, exclaimed,

"There is our star. It always comes, mother!"

They had looked at it together every night since he could remember, and the delight with which it was greeted was still fresh.

"We'll always look at it together, mother, and it will be a sign of how my love for you will last."

The mother's smile had a touch of sadness, but her tone was brave and loving as she answered:

"It shall be a sign."

Again a night of stars; a garden thick with scented flowers; a warm wind that fanned the bright curls on the brow of the young girl, and touched with soft fingers the hot cheek of the lover who walked beside her. It breathed, too, at the lattice window, where the mother gazed at the star alone.

"Do you see the stars and their constant light, my darling?" the deep voice was saying below. "So to you I will evermore be constant. It shall be a sign."

And the silvery voice echoed, "It shall be a sign," and the wind caught up the refrain and wafted it to the ears of the mother above, the sadness of whose smile only the star could see.

A night of cloud and ominous mutterings; the leaves stirred restlessly as if the breath of the storm were already touching them: the perfume from the flowers rushed up thick and sweet, crushed by the unquiet foot, and through a cloud rift only one star could be seen—the old emblem of constancy to the lone figure it was shining on so dimly; and as he gazed upward with clenched hands and knitted brow, it was hidden by a hurrying cloud.

"No stars, no light, no hope," he cried; and the storm rushed upon him.

A narrow-windowed room high above the city streets, reached by the dismal clanging of the incoming trains down the narrow track or the mournful tolling of the bells in some neighboring steeple, but in the room how still!

Crying, "There is no peace," he had passed to peace eternal.

Upon his face there had crept the smile of his childhood, and that smile of peace entered into the grieving heart of the mother watching at the window, and over the roar of the city beneath her there seemed to creep the solemn hush of night, and the star, more clearly large than ever, shone forth, and it seemed to gaze with the tenderness of a son's eyes into her own, and a voice, with the old, rich cadence seemed once more saying:

"It shall be a sign."

Love, like the stars, is eternal.

FRANCES OVIATT LEWIS.

ROMANCE IN WHITTIER'S LIFE.

Whittier's poem, "In School Days," is one with which even the school children are familiar. Some way the sweet verses are very easy to learn by heart, and when they are once committed to memory they have a way of lingering there long after the school children have become grown men and women. It is said that the one romance of Whittier's life was woven about the tangled-haired girl who long years ago had said she loved him, and Whittier's bachelor life is traced by those who love romances to his love for her. Iconoclasts take pleasure in contradicting and ridiculing this story, but those who believe in it are much happier in their belief than are those who deny it in their historical accuracy.

IN SCHOOL DAYS.

Still sits the school-house by the road,
A ragged beggar sunning:
Around it still the sumachs grow
And blackberry vines are running.

Within the master's desk is seen,
Deep scarred by raps official;
The warping floor, the battered seats,
The jack-knife's carved initial.

The charcoal frescoes on the wall:
Its door's worn sill, betraying
The feet that, creeping slow to school,
Went storming out to playing.

Long years ago a winter sun
Shone over it at setting;
Lit up its western window panes
And low eaves' icy fretting.

It touched the tangled golden curls,
And brown eyes full of grieving,
Of one who still her steps delayed
When all the school were leaving.

For near her stood the little boy
Her childish favor singled,
His cap pulled low upon a face
Where pride and shame were mingled.

Pushing with restless feet the snow
To right and left, he lingered,
As restlessly her tiny hands
The blue-checked apron fingered.

He saw her lift her eyes, he felt
The soft hand's light caressing,
And heard the trembling of her voice,
As if a fault confessing.

"I'm sorry that I spelt the word:
I hate to go above you.
Because," the brown eyes lower fell—
"Because, you see, I love you."

Still memory to a gray-haired man
That sweet child face is showing.
Dear girl! the grasses on her grave
Have forty years been growing.

He lives to learn, in life's hard school,
How few who pass above him
Lament their triumph and his loss
Like her—because they love him.

THE HONEY-BIRD.

While actively busied with my oxen, I saw to-day for the first time the honey-bird. This extraordinary little bird, which is about the size of a chaffinch, and of a light gray color, will invariably lead a person following it to a wild-bees' nest. Chattering and twittering in a state of great excitement, it perches on a branch beside the traveler, endeavoring by various wiles to attract his attention: and having succeeded in doing so, it flies lightly forward in a wavy course in the direction of the bees' nest, alighting every now and then, and locking back to ascertain if the traveler is following it, all the time keeping up an incessant twitter. When at length it arrives at the hollow tree or deserted white ants' hill which contains the honey, it for a moment hovers over the nest, pointing to it with its bill, and then takes up its position on a neighboring branch, anxiously awaiting its share of the spoil.

When the honey is taken, which is accomplished by first stupefying the bees by burning grass at the entrance of their domicile, the honey-bird will often lead to a second and even to a third nest. The person thus following it ought to whistle. The savages in the interior, while in pursuit, have several charmed sentences which they use on the occasion.

The Sunday School

THE INFANT CLASS.

READ BY MRS. E. A. HOLWAY, OF DECORAH, IOWA, BEFORE THE WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

To most of us, I think, our religion is of the utmost importance. It is our more or less imperfect realization of our relation to the All Father, and therefore leads directly to the consideration of our relation to His children—to all His creatures.

When are the characteristics of our religious nature fixed? We all know that, in some degree, they are unalterably founded in early childhood, and this is the reason I wish to say a word in regard to the careful consideration of the child's early religious training in the only place in which we can reach him—in our Sunday Schools.

I think I do not lack appreciation for what has been done to aid in this work—yet, perhaps, I do lack—for it is impossible to measure the good done by such aids as the suggested lessons on Home Life, School Life, Corner Stones of Character and others.

These guides lead the teacher to the very heart of the child's life and thus many a little one will be kept pure and wholesome.

There is one need, however, which I think is not sufficiently provided for—the need of greater reverence for God.

Whether the lack of reverence be greater among our children I do not know, but that there is a sad want is sure. It is shown daily in light, misplaced conversation, and in unkind or careless use of some part of God's world. Many a one has had his heart stirred by some child's cruel act to beast or bird or insect, or has seen a fine tree ruthlessly maimed, or, perhaps still oftener, has seen God's common benefits unthankfully received.

Surely these things do not make for right religion. We know for what kind of after life these acts may lay a foundation; not that these children are hopelessly wicked ones—they are only untaught, and if we leave these lessons for them to learn through their own experience we cannot look for that advance from generation to generation for which we work.

Then what shall we do? In answer to my own question something like this has come: Let us take the children of 6 or 7 years of age and teach them directly from the great earth itself God's greatest revelation to us.

Let us lead them to think of it as His, and of things in it as His work. Not that He must come to cause each new movement and change, but that His universe was so wondrously planned that all things must forever obey His will, and so in all we may see His care. I would have gratitude encouraged for all the common blessings of life, and tender thoughtfulness in the child's relation to all common creatures; and I think we are all surprised to find, when we consider it, how great a part of the life of children are their relations to plants and animals, rain and sunshine. The child's lesson should come to him through the concrete—must come so. And if it comes through that of which he knows something, of which he can talk, it is apt to be lasting in effect. So I would have each lesson depend on surroundings, season, etc. Therefore, with the same end in view, the lessons would be different in the various parts of the country.

For my class of little folks in Northeastern Iowa, I have arranged the following subjects, beginning with September and giving place for special lessons on the festivals, and several preparation lessons for Christmas and Easter:

Rain, Sunshine, Frost, Snow—Giving each lesson at a time when that special subject had been suggested during the week or morning. For example—giving the lesson from sunshine on a glorious Sunday morning which followed dull weather. I found very few words answered best in this case, gratitude to the Giver flowed freely.

Then, as these things called our attention in the outer world, we had lessons on Fruits, Nuts, Crickets, Caterpillars (calling them creeping babies), Falling Leaves, Departure of the Birds.

After the New Year I took for subjects the common domestic animals and pets, then considered our debt for our clothes, food and fuel; trying to leave an earnest desire to make return by doing something to help, showing the children how it is impossible to pay directly all who work for us or even to know who they are.

Then, in part as preparation for Easter, I had lessons on Buds, Plantlet in Seed, Plantlet in Bulb, Cocoon, Egg.

After Easter we spent two weeks thinking of the return of the birds, and for two Sundays talked of the Spring flowers.

Now, I wish to take in turn Flowers, Leaves, Roots; the soil in which we find these roots, and the rocks most common, which there are limestone with pebbles and a few boulders.

I intend to tell, as simply as I can, the story of the ancient sea and of the wondrous ice-age. During the summer I would talk with them of the hills and valleys and streams immediately about us—of the trees, animals, and fishes common.

In all this I would have ever in mind the end sought—Reverence, Gratitude, and, as a consequence of these, Kindness to all God's creatures.

Does it seem that this is too difficult for our little people? Think for a moment of the lessons our children have in reading. We do not wait till they can comprehend Shakspeare: we begin with the simplest sentence, but believe they may, in time, be able to read the great thoughts.

Do you say you cannot interpret this great volume? You cannot yourself understand it? Even the wisest must humbly say "it is past finding out," if he speak of it as a whole, but there is not one of us but may read some part.

We must not withhold from the children this great, holy revelation. We must not leave them to spoil it out alone—we must teach them. It is our treasure, but not ours to enjoy selfishly, not ours to keep unread.

Pearline. She uses it—most bright women do. You'll find the arguments all on her side—what can you say against it? We are willing to leave the case in her hands. You'll end by using it. The fact is, every argument as to the easiest, safest and best way of securing perfect cleanliness is settled by Pearlina. If you use it, you know that this is so. If you don't use it, sooner or later you'll have to be convinced.

Beware of imitations. 351 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

Notes from the Field

Hillside, Wis.—Hillside was at its loveliest on Sunday and Monday, June 11 and 12. On Saturday evening F. L. Hosmer gave a lecture in Unity Chapel to the Hillside Home School and outside friends. His subject was: "William Cullen Bryant; the Man and the Poet." The lecture had much to do with Bryant's love of Nature as illustrated in his poetry; and the afternoon drive had keyed the minds and hearts of the scholars and invited guests to the music of the poems. On Sunday morning Mr. Hosmer preached at the chapel, Mr. Hugenholtz taking part in the service. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon the Commencement sermon of the School was given by J. Ll. Jones. Mr. Jones spoke upon the growth of the soul, holding in his hands an object-text—a shell of chambered nautilus. Eyes and ears were kept intently open as Nature and the preacher joined forces in the parable and its appeal.

On Monday the graduating exercises of the Hillside Home School took place in Unity Chapel. Three essays or papers were read: "The Magician of the Nineteenth Century," by W. Leonard Mabbott; "Shall we adopt the Hawaiians?" by Anna Nell Phillip; "Margaret Fuller," by Helen McArthur. It is needless to say that this nineteenth century "magician" was electricity. All three papers were most creditable to the writers, both in their thought and its expression. Music, vocal, and instrumental, added to the enjoyment of the morning. Brief remarks were made by Mr. Hosmer, Mr. Hugenholtz, and Mr. Jones, and the diplomas of graduation were presented by Miss Jane Lloyd-Jones. Miss Ellen C. Lloyd-Jones having conducted the exercises to this point. It was a delightful time, with the faces of childhood and youth aglow with joy, and the gathered friends who filled the chapel, and the June landscapes framed in the open windows, through which came the scent of clover blossoms and woods and meadows and fields. Altogether this "Sixth Commencement" of the Hillside Home School was a deserved tribute to the principals and proprietors, the Misses Lloyd-Jones, and their efficient corps of teachers. Not least suggestive to the writer of this note was the contented and happy aspect of the twenty-seven boys and girls, as if they were really "homed" in the pleasant hillside house and in the care and affection of those at the head of it. The lawn party in the late afternoon, the dancing, and the supper under the shady trees, closed a day of delight to both young and old. We are glad for every boy and girl whose year includes at least some weeks of hills and open fields, woods and wild-flowers, streams and lakes, animals wild and domestic, birds and all life. Nature is a great teacher.

Anamosa, Iowa.—The extremely interesting liberal movement here is making good headway. Rev. E. W. Beers, a graduate of both the theological and collegiate departments of Yale, was called some four years ago to the pastorate of the Congregational church. His progressive views soon disturbed the conservative members of his flock. He thereupon asked for a council to pronounce upon his teaching, agreeing to abide by their decision. The council, although called, refused to pass judgment upon the points at issue, but advised Mr. Beers to withdraw. Here was a significant refusal of a council to do its duty—to decide what doctrines may lawfully be preached within the Congregational body. Did they fear the far-reaching effects of such a judgment?

There being now no prospect of Mr. Beers receiving ecclesiastical sanction of his work in the Anamosa Church, nor of being left in peace without it, he decided to withdraw—not from the city, but to the Opera House. A large and strong part of his congregation went with him, and still zealously support him. The Opera House crowd went the way of all such crowds, and left Mr. Beers with an average congregation of about a hundred thoughtful and reliable people. These are determined that the church shall endure and grow, and there is every evidence they will succeed. Should they find it best to take fellowship in the Unitarian Conference, they will receive a hearty welcome.

St. Paul, Minn.—The annual meeting of the Society of the Church of Our Father (Liberal), St. Anthony Park, was held in Central Hall, at that place, Tuesday night. The society is prosperous and flourishing, owning their hall, being out of debt and having a small balance in the treasury. Reports of a very interesting nature were read by the clerk, treasurer and chairmen of the various committees of the society. Rev. Mrs. Wilkes, pastor, spoke eloquently and earnestly, telling of work accomplished during her six months' pastorate, and speaking words of advice and encouragement as to the prospects for the future. Her administration meets with the unanimous and hearty approval of the society, and she will be requested to continue in charge. An election to choose seven members of the executive committee was held, resulting as follows: H. O. Hall, F. L. Moffett, Miss H. Sewell, R. Jacobson, Frank Hoover, D. A. Cudworth, and Mrs. C. A. Dunn.

Peoria, Ill.—Children's Day, or Flower Sunday, is called "Rose Sunday" by the People's Church, and was celebrated on the second Sunday of June by a service in which seniors and juniors took part, with brief addresses from the minister, Rev. R. B. Marsh, and the superintendent, Mr. Barker, and a responsive service between superintendent and children, explaining the nature of the service. In the evening, at Rouse's Hall, Mr. Marsh lectured on "What Liberal Religion Offers in Place of Old Creeds."

New York.—An organization to be known as the Educational Alliance has been formed by the Aguilar Free Library Society and the Hebrew Free School Association, for the purpose of aiding in the work of the Hebrew Institute. The Alliance will collect all dues for both its constituent organizations. The officers of the Alliance are: Isidor Straus, President; Samuel Greenebaum and Myer S. Isaacs, Vice Presidents; F. Spiegelberg, Secretary; and Albert Friedlander, Treasurer.

St. Paul, Minn.—It now seems probable that Rev. Mr. Crothers will decline the call to the First Parish church of Cambridge, and will remain at St. Paul.

Philadelphia.—The Daughters in Israel, a charitable society composed of young ladies, continue to do good work. A most encouraging interest has been taken in the society by young girls. Over fifty of them wear the badge of the society and strive to be helpful to the deserving poor.

Denver, Col.—This church has extended a call to Rev. W. H. Savage, of Watertown, Mass.

Easy to Take

And prompt to cure, Ayer's Pills act on the intestines, not by stimulating, but by strengthening them. They promote the natural peristaltic motion of the bowels, without which there can be no regular, healthy operations. For the cure of constipation, biliousness, jaundice, vertigo, sick headache, indigestion, sour stomach, and drowsiness, are unsurpassed. They are equally beneficial in rheumatism, neuralgia, colds, chills, and fevers. Being purely vegetable, delicately sugar-coated, and quickly dissolved, they are admirably adapted for household use, as well as for travelers by land or sea. Ayer's Pills are in greater demand, the world over, than any other pill, and are recommended by the most eminent physicians.

Ayer's Pills

Summer at Bay View.

The custom of spending a portion of the summer by the lake and woods is now followed by most of those who can afford it, and even the bewildering World's Fair will fail to draw many of those who have once enjoyed the restful ease and charm of some pleasant spot. And then the children's welfare must always be an important consideration in summer plans. In selecting a summer resort, one free from moral dangers and expensive living will be of great account. One of the finest resorts in all the world is Bay View, on the picturesque eastern shore of Lake Michigan, reached from Chicago, Detroit, and Cleveland by palatial lake steamers and through trains, and quickly accessible from everywhere. Also, direct from Cincinnati without change. It is a summer city of over 400 cottages and hotels, pleasant environments, and in a region famous for pure air, cool and marvelously healthful climate; and it is the site of the widely known Bay View Assembly and Summer University. Thus one has there a pleasant and profitable combination of rest, recreation, and intellectual life. There are both furnished cottages and rooms for rent, tenting is pleasant, board is moderate in price, and the bakery and market and a fifty-cent oil stove will do wonders in helping out those who must economize by boarding themselves. If your summer plans are not quite determined, send to J. M. Hall, Flint, Mich., for the University Review. It tells all about Bay View, gives the Assembly program, University courses, and is beautifully illustrated. A visit of a few days at the World's Fair, then by lake steamers or through trains to Bay View will make a pleasant trip.

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward, And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes canvassed. Editorial

Men say you should not think of the week on Sunday, nor of your business in your devotion, nor bring your world into your church. But this is just what I would do—remember the week in my Sabbath, my business in my prayer, the world in my church. I would do this that all these things might be sanctified. In your highest state it is always well to remember your lowest and so get lifted up.

—Theodore Parker.

Whittier, Hosmer, Gannett, Chadwick, etc., are preparing such crystals of faith, hope and love for the coming generation."

WE note with pleasure the organization of the "American Invalid Aid Society," described by Dr. W. P. Roberts in Lend a Hand for June. Its purpose is to assist by loans those consumptives who are too poor to leave home and work for needed change of climate and of life, and also to assist them to light, suitable employment at the place to which they must resort, by means of which they may be enabled to repay the loan. The locus of the new society is not stated, but we suppose that further information may be had by applying to the editor of Lend a Hand, at Boston.

WE are sorry to notice in the report of the paper entitled "Lawyer or Minister, Which?" read before the Young Men's Convention of the Universalist Church, a slightly veiled hint that young men who may not have the ability to succeed at the bar may go into the ministry. Although the minister is but the servant of religion, that which dishonors him is in a measure an injury to the cause in which he is enrolled. The ministry has too long been a resort for men of something less than mediocrity. No profession has need of greater ability. The world can much better afford to have narrow-minded and uncultivated lawyers than narrow-minded and uncultivated ministers. There is, it is true, great need of good ministers, but religion will fare better with too few ministers than with an abundance of clergymen of meager qualifications.

IN view of what Canon Taylor says about the breadth of the Established Church in England, and of the presence in it of himself and such men as Canons Farrar and Driver, Professor Momerie, and others, the attempt to induce the London School Board to make it obligatory upon all instructors therein to teach the doctrine of the trinity and the deity of Christ, may be somewhat startling; yet it is well that the fact be brought home to us that religious liberty of thought is not yet the unquestioned possession either of Englishmen or Americans. The recent persecution of Prof. Alexander, of the University of South Carolina, and the countless difficulties of liberal-minded teachers North and South, make a record of the condition of public opinion in our own time on this subject that is far from reassuring to those who would believe that religious bigotry is a thing of the past.

THE Christian Leader calls us to rejoice with it in the discovery of a mare's nest. Referring to the editorial remark in the Evening Post that the people who visit the Fair on Sunday are those for whom Sunday opening was pleaded, generally working people, and that they are singularly quiet and well-mannered, it points out that in its news columns the Post reports that opening the Fair on Sunday has perceptibly lessened attendance on the saloons of Chicago. "The implication," says the Leader, "is that the quiet and orderly crowd in the grounds came largely from the frequenters of saloons." Well, what of it? Cannot our eminently respectable contemporary realize that a mechanic who would enter a saloon on Sunday may, possibly, not have horns and a hoof, but may be willing to employ his time better if the opportunity be given him? It seems to us that there is a lesson here for the friends of temperance. How would "Substitution" do for a watchword instead of "Prohibition?"

GERMANY, in her World's Fair building, offers a tempting attraction to the lover of German literature and art. Her beautiful folios and attractive reproductions are made accessible to the throng that keep her courts crowded from morning till night. France, with characteristic skill and daintiness, offers everybody a chance to study her latest achievement in the new education and municipal administration. To such exhibits her building is largely devoted. England, of all the foreign powers, comes to us in stiff buckram and gold lace. Her exquisite building and costly interior is too nice for the public. When her costly rugs are all rolled up and the guards are all out, the common folk are allowed to step in and have a little peep. This is John Bull the snob, which does misrepresent the great English heart and brain, the fertility and nobility of which is testified to in all the exhibits found in the other building. It's a pity, though, that the English Jack should fly only over the effete side of England, while the living England must reveal itself under the freer folds of the American flag.

IN an editorial brief in the Christian Leader, Dr. Atwood writes:

What strikes us in the present agitation is the absence of knowledge and the presence of prejudice in what is said by the advocates of a secular Sunday. Declamation, clamor, loud talk and type, and facts which are manufactured to order, constitute the bulk of their plea. The "Sabbatarians" are not deficient in prejudice; but they have studied the subject, they know something about it, and if they betray bias it is the excusable bias of experts. Unfortunately our experience has been so absolutely the reverse of President Atwood's, that we cannot but wonder where he could have obtained his. The ignorance, the pretentious ignorance, of Sabbatarian assumption has been to us as remarkable as its bigotry. In saying this we give the Sabbatarian advocates the benefit of the doubt. Ignorance or willful misrepresentation there has been in most that has come to our ears from Sabbatarians. It seems to us the more charitable hypothesis to suppose these speakers and writers ignorant. Certainly it is reasonable to expect some knowledge of the institution and history of the Jewish Sabbath and of the Christian Lord's Day, if not of the civil Sunday, from Christian ministers. But our experience with the average ministerial Sabbatarian has led us to abandon that expectation in his case. In the face of the facts attested by the best scholarship of our own and preceding periods as to the historic distinction between Sabbath and Lord's Day, in contravention of the words of Jesus and Paul as recorded in the New Testament, and in opposition to the practice of the Christian church for at least fifteen hundred years of its existence, the American Sabbatarian, in his Puritan Sunday, utterly confounds Jewish Sabbath and Christian Lord's Day and Roman Sunday, and rails at the rest of the Christian world because it does not accept his distorted, unhistoric, unscriptural and unreasonable view of the subject.

WITH the first of July issue the familiar face of the Christian Union is changed and bears at its head the new title, "The Outlook." Although the ownership, editorship, form and purpose remain, we are told, unchanged, yet the change is very significant. It is one more attempt of earnest and devout men who feel the great ties of ethics, science and religion binding together those things which creeds, sects and theological terms and traditions divide, to escape the travail of the denominations; to avoid the trammel of the words which confuse. As the editor implies, the paper has been larger than its title in spirit and purpose, and this is an effort to find a name that, to say the least, will be as large as the paper's ideals. In this struggle to reach the larger constituency the Outlook has the keenest sympathy of UNITY. Our estimate of this paper is well known to our readers. We confidently believe it will still more merit the judgment we have heretofore expressed, viz.: "That it is the best family paper published in America." Whether it will continue to carry the confidence of the half-emancipated supporters of the paper heretofore; and whether it will succeed under its new name in escaping so many of the penalties of progressive thought and the liberal spirit in religion, as it did under the old name,—remain to be seen. This change in the name of the Christian Union revives the topic often discussed at our office, whether our favorite word, "Unity," is so associated in many minds as the theological antithesis of Trinity, and with the cognate denominational word "Unitarian," as to be a barrier between it and the constituency who believe in the Open Church and the Free movement in religion, larger than any theology or denominational movement whatsoever. Central as is this word to modern thought, true as it is to our innermost purpose and highest ideal, we would gladly let it go and float another name from our flag, if thereby we could the more effectively work for that unity which will bring together the believers in a rational religion, a practical piety, a character-building faith, founded in science, human experience, and the inspirations of progress. "What's in a name?" Much; sometimes very much. We welcome the Outlook.

THE action of Gov. Altgeld in pardoning the three remaining convicts of the famous anarchists' trial has stirred again the country with something of the old intense anxiety and bitterness. The newspapers, particularly of the opposing party, have poured out the vials of their wrath and have sweepingly impugned the motives of the Governor. Last Sunday quite a number of our city pulpits echoed the denunciations, and breathed forth patriotic hate against the three men who, after having tasted the bitterness of imprisonment for six years, once more are permitted to taste the joys of freedom. We regret the polemical character, and what seems to us the unjust implications, of the Governor's message. We respect the wholesome reverence for law, and the American faith that liberty is not only compatible with law but possible only under law; but we rejoice that these deluded victims of a vicious theory, who were agitators in the interest of what seemed to them justice and reform, are trusted once more to the freedom of earth and sky. The hand that threw the bomb into the solid ranks of the police—representatives of law, order and liberty—did a fell and despicable deed. Whose hand that was has never been known, and now probably never will be known, by the public. It is universally conceded that none of those convicted were directly implicated in the deed; some of them were not even present. The agitation that led to the rash deed was deplorable in its spirit and in much of its logic. In this agitation the convicted parties and many others on many sides of the question were responsible. For this they ought to be held responsible. But we maintain now as then that excited public sentiment carried the punishment to a lamentable extent. We protested against the dark deed, and will ever remember with a shudder the black day that hung the wild enthusiasts,—extravagant advocates of impracticable and undesirable theories with which this country is able to cope without resorting to such extreme methods. "I dip my pen into the blackest of ink because I am not afraid of falling into my ink-bottle," said Emerson. We would be patient and just to the delusions of anarchy because we do not fear it. It cannot thrive in an atmosphere of freedom. It dies in the presence of justice.

FROM a special dispatch to the Chicago Tribune it appears that this is the way in which an orthodox doctor of divinity (presumably a man of sufficient education to know something of the size of the Buddhist denomination, even though he be ignorant of its religious spirit) regards the Parliament of Religions. Dr. De Costa speaks thus from his pulpit:

Chicago, which has succeeded in making the United States Treasury an annex of the wheat pit and has thimble-rigged the nation out of some $6,000,000 wherewith to carry on the Exposition contrary to contract, has now in hand a side exhibition to glorify the sects of all nations, and every pinch-beck sect from Buddhist to Spiritualist is to have place and praise.

It may comfort the Doctor to know that those "free thinkers" who regard all religion as superstition are in hearty sympathy with him in his opposition to the Parliament.

A LONG FAREWELL.—A little girl's father had long been a professor at Cornell, and it was with sincere misgivings that he accepted an offer to the new Chicago University. The little girl was no less uncertain, but at last became reconciled to the change. The night before they were to go her mother was hearing her prayers as usual. The little girl said them all, and then at the end added: "Well, good-by. O, Lord! We're going to Chicago."

LEWIS MORRIS.

The invitation extended to Lewis Morris to furnish the poetry for the nuptials of H. R. H. the Duke of York makes this author the acting poet laureate of England; while poor John Ruskin unconsciously wears the nominal honor with a sad irony. This recognition of Lewis Morris will, it is likely, start again the question which, in this country at least, will be a frequent one: "Well, who is Lewis Morris, anyhow?" The people who affect to know what poetry is, and are ready with their measuring rule to pass on any line or to test any rhyme, are likely to answer that he is no poet at all, that he lacks the divine afflatus, that he is cold, commonplace, or what not. And still we cannot consider it any calamity to the public mind if there should come a wider reading of the writings of Lewis Morris in this country. It is true his pages lack the serpentine grace and beauty of Swinburne, and the free and easy flying, never-ceasing imagination of William Morris: but they do contain always keen sympathy with the human heart; a mind alert to the problems of the soul, and a free spirit. Lewis Morris is in love with freedom, and more or less conscious always that that freedom must rest on internal foundations. Lewis Morris is easily read. He speaks the simple language of the moralist. He does not hesitate to preach in verse. He might be considered an English Whittier without Whittier's range in the things of the spirit. The psalm-like quality of Whittier is missing in Lewis Morris, but his trust in the Eternal Goodness is the same, though the expression of it is more touched with modern questionings and the spirit of science. The travail of faith found in Matthew Arnold's poetry, and underlying much of Tennyson's, runs through Lewis Morris; but he sees the rising sun more clearly than the former, and his head is more prompt to justify the heart's longings and confidences than the latter. But we miss in him the virility and the faith which make triumphant the lines of Browning. To venture on another comparison, we would say that in Lewis Morris the faith and philosophy of James Martineau find a poet. To read him in quiet, meditative moods—and he can be read in none other—is to irrigate the spiritual fields so that the germs of goodness, kindness, and aspiration already implanted there will germinate and grow more promptly.

Lewis Morris is a Welshman with English attachments. He is the grandson of one of the best beloved "bards" of Mona of the last generation. His home, for the most part, has been and probably . . . at Carmarthen, in South Wales, and his books, most of them, bear the imprint of Penbryn (hill top), the name which he has given his Carmarthen home. He has given many years of active service to the educational interests of Wales, acting under an appointment from the Queen, in which capacity he was associated for several years with Matthew Arnold. His poetry shows that London and his home in Wales are the two centers around which the elliptic of his life is drawn.

The first and most popular of his writings were published under the title "The Songs of Two Worlds," the first series appearing in 1872, a second series in 1874, and the third series in 1875.

In 1878 appeared "Gwen," a drama in monologue, an unique venture with strong Welsh coloring, which will make it dear to those who love the Cambrian hills and traditions. It is also a study of the caste lines which still enslave English "nobility," which will make it interesting reading to the English Liberal in politics, and the friend of democracy everywhere.

In 1879 appeared in revised and completed form his "Epic of Hades," which had been partially published before. This probably represents the high-water mark of his creative power. It is a frank attempt to read modern thought into ancient mythology, or to use the classic fables of Greece as vessels in which is poured the feelings and experiences of a scientific age. This is a book to which the preacher can well afford to give close study. It reveals the truth that "All things and thoughts, both new and old,

are writ
Upon the unchanging human heart and soul."

In 1880 appeared the "Ode of Life," a book which, to the present writer, has yielded many pulpit readings, as has the "Epic of Hades," readings which, judged by their reception by a Sunday audience, have in them Scripture power.

In 1883 appeared "Songs Unsung," which contains several of the pieces which will be most welcome to those who read poetry in order to find "daily strength for daily needs." In the poem entitled "At the End," as well as in "When I Am Dead," of an earlier volume, we find a biographical touch, a self-revelation which assures us that whatever may be the value of the poetry, the core of the man is genuine, poetic because prophetic. He is a true bard, because he "loves the race of men."

Next came the "Songs of Britain," which, as the name indicates, is fragrant with the flowers that grow both in the field of nature and human nature called "British." Here in simpler form one touches the original soil out of which was eventually grown Tenny son's "Idyls of the Kings," and here, if anywhere, one might discover the candidate for the office of "Poet Laureate," the singer to the Queen and her retinue. In "A Song of Empire" the English patriot speaks in a way which endangers the cosmopolitan spirit of poetry, and in this democratic America there might be reproach if anyone could be found who had a right to "cast the first stone" at this sin of provincialism.

The last volume from the pen of Mr. Morris, so far as we know, is entitled a "Vision of Saints." It appeared in 1890. Here he has attempted to do "for the beautiful Christian legends and records that which has so often been done for the mythology of Greece." The breadth of the author's sympathy is shown by the including of Antoninus Pius,—who knew not Christ indeed, yet not the less was his,—John Bunyan, Elizabeth Fry and Father Damien in his catalogue of saints.

If any one is tempted by this article to seek further acquaintance with this author, let him try "In Trafalgar Square," "In Regent Street," "The Organ Boy," "On a Modern Painted Window," "The Enigma," "Children of the Street," "Frederic," "Vendredi Saint," and "In the Strand." Or, if he is willing to be led along the lines of philosophic thought by the poet, let him broodingly read "The Wanderer," or "Even Song." By this time he will know whether Lewis Morris has anything for him or not.

Most of the works named above are republished in this country by Roberts Brothers, Boston. And, all save the last named are gathered into one convenient volume by Kegan-Paul, publishers, London.

THE RELIGION OF FEAR.

The theory of the ancients was that fear was the origin of religion; fear formed the gods, fear formulated the worships. Primos in orbe deos fecit timor. But much may be said against this theory. In the first place, all the great religions refer to some golden age in the dawn of history, when all was contentment and joy. The gods were familiar and friendly. Nature brought forth spontaneously and abundantly. Men dwelt together as brethren, yet gratefully recognized the divine bounty and protection.

The childhood of the world finds its parallel in the childhood of men. To the vast majority of human beings their childhood, as they look back upon it, seems a happy time. Everything in the world was new to them. Food, clothing, and shelter came to them without anxiety or toil. Beauty was spread before their eyes on every hand. Everywhere there were objects of interest and wonder. Pleasure largely predominated over all transient pains. So the memories of childhood are cherished with emotions of gratitude.

If we look into the old Vedic religion of India, or descend to its Aryan offspring in Greece, we see the nature-powers generally regarded as friendly. Man stands in happy relations to the divinities about him. The world is beautiful and good. Man is richly blest. Life is optimistic—full of hope and promise. "By and by, however, as the age of reflection comes on, and experience grows more varied, and more depends upon the individual will, we find doubts and fears rising in the hearts of men. There is a reaction against the childlike and easy confidence of a primitive age. Civilization brings complications, competition, wealth, caste, social disturbances, wars, oppressions, epidemics, poverty. Suffering seems common. Sin and evil pervade the world. Wicked powers are invented to account for the calamities of life. They are worshiped to avert them. In some cases the bad gods become the strongest. Religion, then, consists largely in attempts to propitiate the wrath, or flatter the pride, of deities that look down on men but to mar their happiness or devastate their lives.

Thus we reach the conception of a bad world—life here a burden or a curse. If hope remains, it is for some escape from this to another sphere of existence. We have then the religion of pessimism—the second stage in the history of faith, amply illustrated in Buddhism and Christianity. "How shall man make an end of consciousness and sink into the unruffled serenity of Nirvana?" said the Buddhist. "How shall one get through this valley of tears and tribulation, and rise to the bliss of heaven?" said the Christian.

There is a third stage, or movement, in the life of faith, dimly seen in our time, patiently waiting for its hour of fulfillment. No church is as yet fully and openly organized to promote it, though some are groping their way towards it. That church, when formed, will not worship from impulses of fear. Its doctrines will contain no references to bad gods or to devils. It will make friends with all the nature-powers. It will find, even in suffering and want, the agencies of good to man. Its true, golden age, however, will not be in the childhood, but in the manhood of the race. It will look for its heaven in the redeemed earth. But the means of redemption will be the achievements of man's own reason, intelligence and will. Truth and justice will be the foundation of that church, while love and hope will be its perpetual theme and service. J. C. L.

Men and Things

READERS of UNITY perhaps knew more of Mr. Joel E. Hendricks, who has just passed away, as a liberal in religion than as a world-known mathematician. Mr. Hunting's funeral address says: "The work of his life from an intellectual standpoint was the ten volumes of the Analyst, a journal of pure and applied mathematics. Its recognition by the most famous universities of Europe and America is sufficient to put it among the foremost mathematical productions of this half of the nineteenth century. The Technical High School of Graz, in Austria, by its professor; Prof. C. H. Peters, of the Litchfield Observatory of Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y.; Prof. J. W. L. Glaisher, of Trinity College, Cambridge, England; La Societe Physico-Mathematique, of the Imperial University of Kasau; and mathematical specialists of Edinburgh, Paris, Milan, Ann Arbor, Yale and Johns Hopkins University,—all knew the merits of the mathematical productions of Mr. Hendricks."

THE facts about Mr. Lincoln's religion, as he detailed them to Bishop Simpson, are these: In his youth he was a skeptic. (It is currently believed that he wrote a book of the Tom Paine style against Christianity when he was a young, untried man; and this is probable.) As years advanced and responsibilities crowded upon him he became convinced of the existence of a personal God, and believed that the Bible contains descriptions of the laws and attributes of God, and of His feelings toward the human race, which had a supernatural origin. He attended the Presbyterian church without accepting its creed. He believed that Jesus Christ was not an ordinary man, but into the details of religious doctrine and the story of the Bible he never went; or, if he did, he expressed no opinion thereupon.—Christian Advocate.

ON the last great day of the Woman's Congress the religious service was conducted entirely by women. Eighteen women ministers occupied the platform representing thirteen denominations. It is a sign of the religious toleration of the age that even the persecuted Mormon sect was welcome here in the person of some of its priestesses, of whom the Mormon church ordains six. Rev. Anna H. Shaw prefaced her magnificent sermon by reading from the Bibles of all faiths.—Woman's Tribune.

A convict says he was sent to prison for being dishonest, and yet he is compelled every day to die out pieces of pasteboard, which are put between the inner and outer soles of the shoes made there and sold as solid leather.—Shoe and Leather Reporter.

THE editor of the Reform Advocate has proposed a plan of work among the degraded Jews of Chicago and other great cities, on the line of "neighborhood-guild" work, which we hope will receive the attention it deserves.

THE Christian Union for June 17th contains "A Mother's Song," poetry and music, the words of which are written by Miss Kate S. Kellogg, of All Souls Church, Chicago. The music is by Miss Elinor Smith.

MY CHRIST.

My Christ is not the Christ of other men,
 For thou didst never walk in Galilee,
 Nor still the storm upon the sacred sea;
 The cruel scourgings and the curse profane,
 The crown of thorns, the cross, the awful pain
 On Golgotha have never tortured thee.
 Yet, O my friend, not less art thou to me
 Than he who trod Judea's hills and plain,
 For, as I gaze across the vale of years,
 His distant form grows dim; but thou dost stand
 Beside me, and my weary spirit hears
 Thy tender voice o'er life's hot, desert sand,—
 Thy voice which, speaking words of comfort, cheers
 My soul, and tells me thou dost understand.

THE UNELECTED INFANT.

An unelected infant sighed out its little breath,
 And wandered through the darkness along the shades of death,
 Until the gates of heaven before him he espied,
 And ran to them and clung there, and would not be denied;
 Tho' still from earth rose mutterings, "You cannot enter in!
 Depart into Gehenna, you child of wrath and sin."
 At last the gates were opened—a man with features mild
 Stooped down and raised the weeping and non-elected child;
 Immortal light thrilled softly down the avenues of bliss,
 And on the infant's forehead the spirit placed a kiss.
 "Who are you thus to hallow my non-elected brow?"
 "Dear child, my name was Calvin, but I see things better now."

A MORAL UNIVERSE.

In the promotion of ancient governments, in statesmanship, in philosophy, religion, and, not least, in science, this fact has been verified many times over, in every nation that has existed on this earth: The lowly are chosen to confound those highly exalted by earthly titles. He whom we come hither to-day to honor by the purest impulses of our hearts was no exception to this law of human providence. He was what we call a self-made man—that is, he used the abilities given him by inheritance to make of himself an intellectual and a moral power in the world. During the past year the Historical Society of this State was able to put before this community some of the facts of his life, with a letter from himself, which deeply interested every person among us who read it. It was a grand chapter in our history. In reading that record it must have occurred to you as it did to me, that the real secret of the eminent success of Mr. Joel E. Hendricks, in his chosen work, was his moral greatness, his strict integrity. In his youth he had the same mathematical moral uprightness which appeared in the mental calculations of the "Analyst." No matter how humble the duty which he did in coming along the path of his youthful career, which resulted in such nobility and simplicity of character, he did it as if a mathematical result depended on it which would affect the motion of the planets.

It might be teaching school, it might be carrying the chain in the field, it might be using the compass as practical engineer and surveyor, and whatever the fact which the chain or the compass revealed was put down as the very truth. Such was the moral integrity of his mind that he could no more vary from the revelation of the truth than the law of attraction could vary. I say this most sincerely, after talking with him and reading the simple story of his life. So true was he to the laws of nature and of morality that I may truly say he was a man who walked with God.

All the laws of the universe are moral, and he whose life is centered in moral integrity is anchored on that rock without which all religious experiences are vanity. I repeat that the power of this man's life was in the moral integrity which lay behind his intellectual calculation.

—Rev. S. S. Hunting, in an address at the funeral of Prof. Joel E. Hendricks.

THE GOSPEL OF LOVE.

A friend of Miss Putnam, who received the following in a letter written from South Dakota, has permitted us to let UNITY's readers learn from it some of that earnest missionary's experiences:

"I expected to have a service here this evening, but after having announced it in the paper, gave it up on account of a union temperance meeting at the Presbyterian Church. I was sorry, because at a fire yesterday morning two young working girls lost all they possessed, and I was going to take up a collection for them. I wrote a note to the Congregational minister asking him if he would make announcement of my service being omitted, and suggested that his people should take up a collection for the girls. (They didn't do it.)

"I went to see the Methodist minister, and he said, before I could ask it, 'Why not take up one in my church, and will you come and speak for it this morning?' Of course, I said 'yes.' Then he continued: 'I want you to speak at the union meeting this evening and on the subject of True Union of All Churches on This Common Ground.' Again, of course, I consented. He said there was a spirit of denom-inationalism that was separating the churches in this very matter of temperance, when they ought instead to lose sight of differences and work together for the good of humanity, and he wanted me to emphasize that point. Then he has invited me to speak for his people next Sunday morning, which I shall do if I am in town. He told them this morning that he hoped Miss Putnam would be with them. They took up a good collection, considering that it was children's Sunday—and more is to come to me in the morning.

"I went to the Congregational Church after their service, and told their minister and deacon what the Methodists had done, and they concluded they must do something. Nothing like emulation in good deeds. The Methodist minister spoke of the significance of one of another denomination coming into their Methodist Church and appealing for aid for foreigners in nation and creed—and how it was living the true Christ-spirit. Was it not good that I gave up my service?"

AN EXPLANATION.

The following letter is given to UNITY, according to the writer's wish, and that any injustice thought to have been done in the official report of the Assistant Secretary may be corrected by her statement. F. L. HOSMER,

Secretary W. U. C.

Rev. F. L. Hosmer, Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference:

In the official report of the Western Conference given in the last number of UNITY, that portion regarding the remonstrance which I offered in behalf of certain subscribers to the endowment fund is seriously incorrect. As this report becomes a matter of record, I ask that the mistake be corrected both in the record and in UNITY. It states that the remonstrance "set forth the fact that many subscribers to the fund felt that the supplementary resolution so far changed the basis of fellowship that they ought not to give further installments until the conference stood again clearly where, in the judgment of the contributors, it stood when the pledges were given. Some felt further that money already given on the basis of the Cincinnati resolution could not rightfully be retained when that basis was modified, as to them it now seemed." (The italics are mine.)

It will be seen how incorrect is this report by the following quotations from my paper: "The money subscribed was given out of slim purses and full hearts, and it seems to me a poor use to make of it to return it to us." And again: "Still more do I protest against the return of the money, but rather I ask the Conference to again place itself on the basis to which these subscriptions were made." The whole matter on our part was a protest against what to us was a backward step taken by the Conference one year ago, and nowhere was refunding desired. Again, the report fails to state that, pending Mr. Judy's resolution, I withdrew the remonstrance by permission of the Chair and the delegates. This rendered Mr. Crothers' resolutions published in the report unnecessary, and no vote was taken upon them.

I make this request in the interest of clearness, assuring you that the result was as satisfactory to the remonstrants as to all concerned. Very truly yours,
 LOUISE M. DUNNING.

A PROMISE.

The frozen fields are sere with rain-washed grasses,
 The skies are dark and sadly drop their tears;
 The earth gives little promise of a brighter morning,
 But seems the brim-filled cup of bitter fears.

Yet, looking upward through the brown, bare branches,
 One rift of blue shows faint, tho' skies are gray,
 And outlined trees, with brave assurance tracing,
 Are writing promises of coming May.

So when life's road 's beset with stones and brambles,
 And weary feet go stumbling on in sorrow,
 Be sure, oh, pilgrim, against sorrow's twilight
 Hope traces there a brighter, better morrow.

For, by the law which governs all the ages,
 Each hour of sorrow has its hour of cheer;
 And ye who patient wait, or ye who wrestle,
 With stronger powers can face the coming years. F.

THE DEATH OF SENATOR STANFORD.

The death of Leland Stanford gives, as it seems to us, a somewhat unwelcome task to the conscientious editor. It is not pleasant to criticise dead men who have been eminent in public service and displayed personal traits of a very praiseworthy nature. Mr. Stanford's life has been one of remarkable activity and success. The building of the Southern Pacific Railway was accounted the most-remarkable engineering work the world had ever seen up to that time, and very few have surpassed it since. The difficulties to be overcome were something appalling. Mile after mile of road bed had to be chiseled out of the precipitous mountain sides, men being suspended by ropes in order to work. Overhead were the avalanches of snow and sometimes for twenty continuous miles the track had to be protected by snow sheds. All the tools and machinery and most of the material for construction had to be shipped from the east, transported around Cape Horn to the Pacific coast and then borne by pack trains to the scene of operations. No one but a man of overmastering mind and relentless resolution would have succeeded, and such a man was Stanford. The closing years of his life have witnessed another great work of a different sort accomplished by him in the Leland Stanford University, endowed in memory of his only son, who died abroad about seven years ago. Great as his services have been, it is but just to add that Leland Stanford's great fortune of about thirty-five millions was in all reasonable probabity founded upon methods that will not square with the law of ethics. The corporation out of which his fortune was for the most part made grew poor while he grew rich. The millions which the government loaned it have never been paid back to the extent of a dollar, and, while the mortgage the government holds on the road (a second mortgage) matures in 1895, no provision has been made or can now be made to meet it. The corporation of which he was the president has been for years practically insolvent, while he and Huntington and others have rolled up their millions at its expense. It is a harsh thing to say, but it ought to be said: no endowment of colleges, no benevolent gifts, no philanthropic use of money can atone for unjust and dishonest methods used in securing it; and nothing can be more demoralizing to the moral sense of the public than the lavish praise of men for the philanthropic use of a fortune dishonestly come by. We do not judge Mr. Stanford. The suspicions we utter may do him injustice; but they are suspicions warranted by the appearance of things, they are in many men's minds, and until they are explained away (if they can be) it is just as well to let the eulogies of the dead senator be tempered with criticism. —The Voice.

A JUNE MEMORY.

A memory sweet has breathed its tender perfume through all the years since Theodore Parker preached "Good Will to Man" in Boston Music Hall. It is a peaceful Sunday morning in early summer; growing life without, within the hush of souls unshackled, responsive to the greater soul which breathes of "Liberty and Life." "Dear Father and Mother of us all" is the prelude to the morning prayer which serenely wings its flight and nestles in our hearts. The wideness of the petition clasps the whole brotherhood of man round about. (The words were few and simple. I do not recall them, but I know they made a new glory in my young life.) Again I see the host of upturned faces; some are black and seamed with lines of sorrow and care, others are fair and grand, and glowing with the earnest of intellectual life. Age is there, calm in the sense of a dawning newer light, joined with the younger manhood and womanhood, eager for the strife of truth and falsehood which the coming years will yield. Voice and soul, in one grand harmony blent, unite in singing the morning hymn. Scarce has the first strain of music died away ere our good minister quietly leaves his desk, and from the platform stoops to give his hymn-book to an elderly colored woman, who is standing in the foremost row of the vast auditorium. Simple and unobtrusive was the act, yet neither time nor change can erase from memory the pure picture of the saintly Parker and the colored sister.

DR. HANSON says, in the Universalist: "I agree with Mr. Shinn that the phrase 'liberal Christian' is one that no self-respecting Universalist ought to use." As to be a liberal Christian is to be a New Testament Christian, these brethren must have some objection to New Testament Christianity. What is it?

JUNE.

Do you know the lesson that June is teaching?
 Have you heard it whispered amid the leaves,
 As in the valleys and through the woodland
 Her flowery garland each day she weaves?
 Go 'neath the orchard boughs; listen, listen!
 The birds will tell you; they know it well;
 In their voice of music they love to repeat it,
 And every hour their joy to tell.

And listen again! 'neath the water-willow,
 Do you hear a murmur, low and sweet?
 The sparkling brook the story is telling
 To the listening trees as it bathes their feet.

And the noble river, bearing onward
 The wealth of commerce away to the sea,
 In a louder tone is the story repeating,
 As it glows and sparkles, glad, bright and free.

Each hum of the insect repeats it over,
 The droning bee at his work, all day,
 Telleth his neighbor the gladsome story,
 And why it is better to work than play.

And what is the lesson of bird and brooklet?
 What message hath June to give us cheer?
 It tells us that God, who created this beauty,
 Would have us rejoice that His world is so fair.

And fill our lives with its glorious brightness,
 And be thankful and glad for the good gifts we share;
 Nor let our heart's sunshine 'neath life's cares be buried,
 But rejoice in the beauty we see everywhere.

WITHOUT morality, intellect were impossible. A thoroughly immoral man could not know anything at all. To know a thing, we must first love, sympathize with it, be virtually related to it. Our virtues, all of them, lie recorded in our knowledge. Nature remains, in her truth, to the bad and selfish a sealed book.

Church-Door Pulpit

THE OPEN DOOR.

BY REV. S. S. HUNTING.

"An open door which no man can shut."
 "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwells in you?"

The truth for us is that the way into the sanctuary of this temple is by many doors all opening inward. The common thought is that the world is first revealed to us by sensation, next by the understanding, and then we come to reason, and in all we have the manifold spiritual nature. There comes to us as teachers and as seekers after the best things of life, the command to "open the door." Let us begin with a very familiar illustration.

We can remember when the common door seemed to be a great thing, the latch being too high for us to reach it. Coming to a door, we would call out, "Open the door." If there is a mother who has not been called up from her chair to do that, she must have had a rare experience. Every hour some child is calling out, "Open the door," and somebody must answer the call. We can all understand what this means to a child. He is out in the cold, and will come in, and you must open the door. He is shut in, and will come out; you must hasten and open the door. If you still insist that you will shut him in a dark closet for his ill-temper, which he may have caught from you in some storm of passion, in his terror he knocks at the door and calls aloud to have it opened. You realize the situation and give him his freedom, and adopt a more rational method of discipline.

Does not this simple fact of common life suggest a treatise on the education of youth and the perpetual evolution of human life, even beyond this earth-sphere?

The first suggestion is that in infancy the child is in darkness. The temple is perfect, but it is not lighted. There are no open doors but those outside, the doors of sensation. Will you say there is a light hidden in the sanctuary—the reason? The fact is that we cannot find this light till some door is opened through the senses. In the case of natural vision it is absurd to say that the physical eye sees; if the light does not enter through its crystal doors and chambers, there can be no sense of sight. Behind the eye the sense within a sense is awakened, and there is the consciousness of seeing.

The young child hears sounds which have no meaning. The opening door vibrates in the ear, some emotion is evoked, and there is joy or terror. The light reveals a chaotic world which is meaningless, and wonder rules in the infant mind. The continual repetition of sounds soon leaves an impression which becomes a thought. The same sounds of infant voice, in the first words of the nursery, are traced far back, through the ages of child-life, to our Aryan ancestors on the plains of Asia. Thus the same experience comes to every child in learning the meaning of the first sounds which connect him with father or mother, brother or sister.

A similar experience comes of learning the meaning of things seen. Physical light leaves the child still in darkness. By some unexplained process of simple perception the child makes the first link in that chain of association which connects whatever shall be learned in an endless series. Looking at the little innocent staring at the color on its dress with a curiosity which seems to be almost painful, do you not yearn to open a door of that young soul? The chaos within makes the outward chaos. Little by little the outward light is wedded to the inward faculty. The impinging of the electric ray on the retina opens a door into the sanctuary of the rational soul, and the response is conscious sight.

As the brain has been evolving through æons of centuries, whatever is the fact with a savage, the child of the highly developed reason in the parent must have the intuitive faculty to which the object of sense appeals. Whatever the beginnings of the mental life of mankind, the incarnate spirit in the well-born child is the vitality which quickly conceives when touched by the finger of the senses. Hereditary emotions and facial expression show at least a physical memory of past experiences; and the life that evolves as the soul of every child is, indeed, the spirit of God.

Looking into the curious face of a child every inquisitive feature calls on us to "open the door." A hint, a few kind words teaching the meaning and use of a simple thing, may open a door which will lead to the opening of many doors in coming years. The burnt finger opens the door of caution, and a fall opens the door of fear. Every opening faculty is a door leading into a new apartment of life. The world must be introduced to us, while it seems that we are being introduced to the world. The teacher is the mediator to make the introduction for the child; a senseless thing is to be clothed with a garment of life which the rational spirit bestows.

What is this glorious aurora, celebrated in myth and song, but a combination of solar rays? As Aurora opens the gates of morning she opens also a door into the rational soul, and is transformed to a goddess of more than earthly beauty. What is the rainbow but a decomposition of solar light? In the soul it is the sign of divine love. Thus the sense of sight is an open door through which come reflections of the inanimate world, to be transformed into living things. Time was when no rational spirit in human form was here to thus transform nature; and when man came, a brutish savage, it took æons of years to gain a rational view of the objects of sight or sound. Perhaps the world seemed a huge animal, or the embodiment of some revengeful spirit.

"Once slept the world an egg of stone.
 And pulse and sound and light was none."

When the time came for man, he looked and stared; he heard and wondered. The ears and eyes were open, but the reason was dull, not dead.

How slowly came the evolution of reason is hinted by the hard task of educating the child of a savage. First came sensation; next the rude sympathies just above the brute; next love of child, love of brother and sister. Life in a hut or a cave made the first family possible. As the forms and forces of nature wrought through the senses, door after door opened through nerve and brain-cells, into the interior world of light and love, till, after unknown ages, man gained a complete rational life. The history of those ages of the infant life of mankind will never be written, and fancy revels in Eden fable and nature myths. In all those ages there was an imprisoned god calling through the feeble brain to "open the door." Prometheus was in chains, but he courted the lightning and gave fire to the soul.

Leaving figures, and learning the law in the life of a child, you see him making animate forms of snow or clay. Give him a brush and paint, and the bird or horse shows the germ of the artist, and the god within calls to you to "open the door" and turn on the lights.

Education is our word for the liberation of the struggling life. It is the method of drawing out the waiting powers. Science tells us that all the light and shadows and colors have no existence but in the mind. Be that as it may, when all these outward forms become mental realities, nature, is idealized, and the young artist lives in a world of spiritual realities. By opening the door of light into the reason, that sunset, landscape, and lake become ideals of beauty in the mind. Thus the mind gives order to nature as it is transformed by knowledge, and the outward fact becomes a living truth. By our methods of education we are opening doors for the children, and let no man shut them. One by one the mind grasps facts till we come to science. We deny not the existence of the tree on the lawn, but it is ours as a tree of the mind. Here is our artist child who has become a master, and his imagination, or genius, puts life into the marble or the canvas, and they speak to him and to others. Nature has a varied language for all who understand its alphabet. The door of science has opened into a mansion of beauty! As true artist one is also poet, and the world is transformed in his imagination; in the opening faculty he experiences the laws of beauty. Through the open door of the senses natural objects have become spiritual realities, and he can retire from the actual and live in the ideal. That which was first natural has become spiritual. Here we come to the important conclusion that all truth is the mental image of some fact; that nature furnishes the panorama which, by the magic touch of education, becomes the mental world of Truth and Love.

The problem of education is nearly solved when we come first to nature, and next to human life, as giving us the material which the teacher, as a mediator, is to use to open the doors of the spiritual temple within. And the one question which covers all education, is that which Mr. Spencer asked years ago: "How to live? How to live as to the body, as to the intellect, the love, and the reason?" To us the value of education becomes the blessedness of living. The thing to be changed is found in the fact that so many persons live a merely sensuous or lowly intellectual existence. The soul is cheated by such living; the humanity is asleep. The one end of education should be to open doors which deepen and broaden experience, to create wants and inspire hopes that produce mental discontent. Every mental faculty has its door opening inward, and we should use the world as a kindergarten, its objects being gifts and play-things. The call of the little child to "open the door" is the voicing of the deepest desires and grandest aspirations of life.

I see a lad at the first crisis of his life, thoughtful and pure, searching for truth in his varied studies; and as the doors open by the unfolding of faculties, as the flowering of his experience increases, he soon finds the realities of life, and nature is transformed in his visions. Do teachers know that every rational faculty may be opened by some mental delight? If they can touch this secret spring they have found the open sesame of knowledge. All around us youthful voices call to us to "open the door." There are doors not often opened waiting for the magic touch of the teacher who has found the secret—who knows the labyrinthian mystery of human life.

There was a man, once a president of Harvard University, who daily committed poetry and read the classics, after eighty years of age. A venerable minister of the Unitarian faith, past ninety years, still finds new inspiration in his Hebrew and Greek. Those men of thought and culture whose eighty years have been given to opening the doors of science, philosophy, art, or music have been ever nearing the infinite center of life. If at any stage of culture, we see not what the philosopher means, let us be patient and seek for the door in ourselves by which he entered into the more hidden ways of thought; and, going in at the same door, we may sit down and sup with him; and after the feast we may go in and out rejoicing in the new-found light. It is not that we had gained a little knowledge, but we have opened a door to new and rich experiences.

The wonderful life of Jesus has been the theme of Christendom for 1,800 years. That life was centered in the heart of Being, in an ideal world of Love. Others saw the world of nature and nations by the eye of science and policy; with his finer perception he saw the moral order of human life. Not only did he put a tongue into trees and flowers, sunshine and rain, and through them voice the divine beneficence, but he taught the possible realization in others of the life of love which he lived, and opened the door to the Father. We know "as deep as we live." We do not know the finest harmonies of music. We never lived in that harmony. We envy the experience of the composer who puts such grand and tender emotions into tones. He lives in the bubbling of the brook, the gentle flow of the river, the crash of the waterfall, the roar of the ocean, the burst of passion, the peace of love, the joy of friendship, and the glow of heroism. He lives an oratorio before he can put it to music. The music of prayer may be too beautiful to find a voice in human language. It is all in the composer's soul. He lives in a world of rhythm and harmony, inspired by the beautiful and the true. If there is a discord in his life it will appear in his works; if not true himself the lie will sing in his song. To live in human hearts and never die, he must be the life of song and music. Occasional flights will not save him. From the heights where he lives his melody comes. Wordsworth and Byron were both real poets, but their moral qualities gave the character to the productions of each. We go through the door of moral purity to a life which transcends that of a brilliant imagination or an aesthetic taste. There is a door opening into the life of love mercy and justice. "I am the door; if anyone enter by me he will go in and, out and find pasture," said Jesus.

Christians have been hearing of the "new birth" since the days of stupid Nicodemus. It is not so much of a marvel as some suppose it to be. It is simply a method of ascension through open doors. Every spiritual faculty newly aroused is a birth, and by ascending the stairway of experience, we pass from the good to the better, and then to the best. Yes; we may thus be born from above. By numbers we open the door to mathematics; by business we acquaint ourselves with business life; sympathy opens the door to the gentler emotions; a lofty aim creates aspiration. We open the door into the musical heart by musical culture. We open the door into the kingdom of righteousness by doing the right. We open the door of justice six days and that of worship one day. Nature, by its million births, has brought forth the rational soul in this temple of God. Woe to him who has had only a natural birth,—to eat and sleep and work and play and die! The bee finds honey at the very center of the flower. Inward, still inward, driven home even by hard discipline, we find the honey of life. Labor, trial, trust, and hope lead us on to a series of births of which no one can estimate the number. This suggests to us that we may extend the chain of this life into the mysterious future.

The undefined interior life is, indeed, a nebula that we cannot resolve. It often seems but spiritual mist, stardust. It is not therefore unreal. The fault may be with our eyes. We need a microscopic vision. So an abstruse science seems to a pupil, which is simple and plain to the teacher. So the life now beyond our experience, hence unreal, may be sublime reality to others.

"Beneath the thick and struggling clouds,
We talk of Christian life."

I wish now to carry this view of the evolution of soul-life into the future; to consider its possibilities. Even imagination is a revealer of truth, if guided by reason; if what we claim for the future is a logical inference from the laws of soul-life to-day. Let us give to the "sweet reasonableness" of faith wings of imagination.

The first question in the Westminster Catechism is this: "What is the chief and highest end of man?" Answer: "To glorify God and fully to enjoy him forever." We see no way in which the creature can glorify God unless he gain the end of his existence. That end must be the full fruition of his nature, the full evolution of the rational germ of life. We see what the greatest or best of mankind have attained in this life, of which Plato in rational development and Jesus in moral inspiration are types. To maintain the spiritual kinship between such as they were and the untutored barbarian, we must believe in the possible evolution of every rational soul into the Christ-life. For that event we must extend human existence indefinitely, when unopened springs will break forth from the soul.

This view of the future is reasonable. A person is equipped by many years of culture for a good work, but by some power in his environment he is shipwrecked; and must we assume that there is to be no opportunity in eternity for him to regain what he lost? Were you omniscient would you fit out a human craft with such transcendent faculties, launch it on life's sea, knowing it would be wrecked ere it reached harbor, and would you have no lifeboat at hand to ensure salvation? Remember we are now dealing with a rational principle of life supposed to be indestructible. This life furnishes the opportunity for the full development of all the faculties of our bodies, but we cannot assume that a rational being ever reached the possible limit of his soul-life in this stage of existence.

In old age we find Emerson's mental powers suddenly crippled by the deterioration of his physical powers; and Parker, about to pass on, grieves that no more opportunity is given him here to finish his work; but there were, as he said, two Parkers, and only one was dying. If there is no sequel to this volume of their lives, I cannot help the conviction that the order of evolution revealed in the natural world does not pertain to our soul-life, our rational existence. It is possible, and a thing to be hoped for, that this mortal is to be immersed in a higher life, when the opening heaven of our inmost being will bring us a new birth. Thus "death will be swallowed up" by our victory. Under the light of this faith we turn our faces steadfastly to the future, confidently waiting for the opening of doors which will admit us into other mansions. Why talk of reincarnation? The body must follow the law of the spirit.

This view of the future makes all these semi-theological discussions about future probation seem trivial, if not childish. We hope for that progressive life which results from a succession of soul-births, as doors forever open on the ascending stairway.

Said Jesus, as reported: "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do;" but was that all? Others have had a like feeling at the end of a faithful life, but that did not preclude the fact of other work. There were two Parkers—one dying in Italy, and one living in America. There was one Jesus dying in Palestine, who prayed that the cup might pass from him. There was another Jesus, who prayed "Father, forgive them," who awaited new christenings by the spirit of the Eternal. Life is ascension, and death is the door which opens, and no man can shut it, but we leave it behind us forever.

If, as many believe, the departing soul touches by consciousness those still in their earthly tent, it is to give an assurance that the soul knows no death, but ever onward, as new doors open, tends to its eternal destiny. There is no hint here of the possible truth of the horrible dogmas of the orthodox hell; but the mind is its own place; its shadows and lights, sorrows and joys, are its heavens and hells. A cloudless heaven brings spiritual barrenness. Sunshine and rain are both in Divine order.

Let us look for a hereafter and not for a thereafter. The thoughtful, believing in the future life, no longer think of that state

"Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths never end."

There no orthodox faction will be able to close the gates on sacred days, which open to the revelations of the celestial glories of human attainments. The hunger and thirst of the spirit will be gratified. Let it be to us a hereafter for which we hope. Who would live ever under a cloudless sky, with no mountain mist, but barrenness forever? Speaking for those who have an abiding faith in the future life, a cloudless heaven would be inhospitable. Were there no sympathy, no tear of affection, no heart yearnings, no correction of error, there would be no progress. A cloudless life of human exaltation is as devoid of human graces as a sun-scorched desert is of vegetation. Life, to be the evolution of what it is here and now, must have its winds and calms, its ocean currents and tidal waves, and be glorified by its victories. A listless, passive existence with no cloud-capped Alp up yonder, no excelsior, would not be endurable for one full of the aspirations of an immortal being. We must live in thought, in love, in deeds, and the hereafter must be as the here and now. We must ever desire and hope for the good and great unrealized. This is living, and whatever our future estate, we go no farther than this. Let no one dogmatize here. We find the key to all doors in this life, as we come to them, one by one, and pass through. Existence is an unbroken chain. The doors open before us and shut behind us, and we cannot retrace our steps. We enter the winding way at birth and thread the labyrinthian way forever. "I shut and no man openeth," is the word of the Eternal. Whatever are the spirit revelations, no step is retraced. Alone we go, and yet in the steady onward going hearts are linked together. There is a moment when the parting comes; each takes the fated step; there is a rap at the wicket, a response, the door opens, and each goes in alone; others follow; the mystery is solved for that step. Faith sustains, hope is the anchor in doubt. Thus it is now; it must ever be the same.

With this view of progressive life we readily solve the problem of retribution. No horrid scenes of a judgment day rise up to torture the soul. The crises of life are ever coming. While we speak the word goes to its judgment, and the sentence is just; its effects go round the world, return to ourselves, and retribution is complete. Why do I thus speak? Because this view of the subject is rational, hopeful, and helpful, while we abide by facts and build no castle of dreams and fancies. We find order in this life, and extend it to that for which we hope. The cosmos is not limited to earth-spheres, but extends to spiritual existence. The judgment day is now and ever. Conscience is the throne of Osiris or of the Christ. The deeds of this day have gone to their final judgment, and their course is determined. Our lives are in the balance now, as when we pass the fated door of death, and every hair is numbered. With such views, going or staying, we go with a trusting confidence in the beneficence of the ruling Power. Rightly viewing this life, we confide in the goodness to come. While we hope for the better and the best with a chaste imagination, we still bridle our fancies and put away all thoughts that breed despair. At least one half of the teaching and hearing about saving the soul is worse than wasted energy and time. If we substituted for the fable concerning the future life the realities of this life with the law of spiritual evolution, the gain would be immense. We give no heed to those speculations which are not inductions from the facts of our existence now and here. We surround the sunset of life with no thunder clouds, with no ill omens. Granting that we continue to live, we drop the earthly with its trash. What we take no one knows, except it be our pure self, which is the principle of Love. Be it ours that, when we join

"The innumerable caravan which moves To that mysterious realm,"

we may go through doors of joy into mansions of helpfulness!

THE STANDARD DICTIONARY.*

From the prospectus, which has received a careful examination from the writer, it appears that Funk & Wagnalls Co.'s Standard Dictionary will be a very valuable book, quite worthy of its name. The wonder is that it can be sold for the price named. The names of a large proportion of the nearly two hundred editors employed upon the work would themselves be a considerable guaranty of the value of the work, and the names of the distinguished English and American scholars who heartily commend the plan of the work and such specimens of its execution as have been submitted to them, arouse a further prejudice in its favor; but the many admirable features of the work are such that the favorable circumstances referred to are not needed to commend it: Scientific definition, as distinguished from general description; careful illustrations of the use of synonyms; the giving also of antonyms; the explanation of proper prepositions to use with certain verbs; the placing of the most usual meaning first; the placing of the definition before the etymology; special attention to compound forms, the adoption of a consistent system therein, and the use of the German double-line hyphen to distinguish the mark of compounding from other marks; presentation of the American Philological Association's spelling reform orthography alongside of the current, and the use of its special alphabet alongside of the ordinary one to elucidate the pronunciation; the presentation of a careful collation of many authorities in cases of disputed spelling and pronunciation, the approved form being first given; the great extent of pictorial illustration, frequently accurately colored; explanations of gaits by picturing their several phases, etc.; specific location of references to authors quoted; the grouping of related words; exact scientific definition of colors; a complete appendix, geographical, biographical, etc., together; and the employment of recognized specialists for every department of knowledge—are among the distinguishing features of the work. Although it is stated that obsolete, foreign, dialectic and slang words are only given place if likely to be sought for in a general English dictionary, the vocabulary has 280,000 words, a much larger number than is given even by the Century Dictionary.

It would seem invidious to give the names of some of the editors, American and English, employed upon the work, since almost all are well known. But it may be well to note that Prof. F. A. March is general consulting editor and in charge of the spelling and pronunciation, and that such specialists as Max Mueller, Judge Cooley, Prof. Simon Newcomb, Prof. Huxley and the like are in charge of the several departments. We await its publication with eagerness.

DR. DRUMMOND ON THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.*

The series of Biblical manuals to which this commentary belongs is best known to American readers by the editor's volumes, "Life in Palestine" and "The Synoptic Gospels." It is high praise, therefore, to say that this commentary by Professor Drummond is fully up to the reputation of the series. Although conciliatory, and in spots just a little indefinite in tone, it must be said that no fairer, more sympathetic and, withal, more readable commentary on Galatians is known to us. Remarkable deftness is shown in the translation of Paul's thought into modern terms and in its application to modern problems. Not all would agree, however, that the phrase, "faith in Christ," means the faith which Christ possessed, or that the second visit to Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30) must be regarded as a mistake on the part of Luke. In the explanation of III. 13, Dr. Drummond looks in the direction that Dr. Everett has gone, and the interpretation might have been clearer had "The Gospel of Paul" been published earlier. In the chronological table of Paul's life (p. 38) the placing of the second visit to Jerusalem (which Professor Drummond thinks did not occur) before Paul's call by Barnabas to Antioch, if it be not a mere clerical error, should have been explained and justified. And is it not almost pedantic to recommend (p. 68) that in Cephias the C be pronounced hard, like K? But, minor points aside, the author has done admirable service in preparing this commentary, which puts in a popular, warm-blooded way the results of careful scholarship.

SCRIPTURE TESTIMONY CONCERNING THE OTHER WORLD.—By Rev. James Reed. Philadelphia: American New-Church Tract and Pub. Society. Cloth, 16mo., pp. 81, 40 cents; paper, 20 cents.—These seven discourses, by the pastor of the New Jerusalem Church in Boston, have all the sweet graciousness that one has learned to expect in the works of those who call themselves Swedenborgians. One may demur at their interpretations of the Bible and falter where they firmly tread, but the poetic winsomeness of such sermons as these has an irresistible charm.

LORENZO DE' MEDICI: An Historical Portrait. By Edith Carpenter. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 16mo., pp. 216.—In * * * the variety of his talents and the paradox of his position, Lorenzo stands forth as the pattern, the exemplar of this many-sided epoch. "It was a period of change and transition, the threshold, as it were, between two chambers, so that in those respects where he may seem to have been in advance of his contemporaries he is simply standing on this threshold holding one hand before him and one behind." "He is no mighty spirit, wrestling with the problems of life and anticipating the future; he is simply a landmark between the Old and the New, the mediæval and the modern, reflecting in the mirror of his individuality the spirit of each. It is the vividness of this mirror, his individuality so much stronger than that of most men, that gives him his special historic value as the typical Italian of the early Renaissance." These words from the opening chapter will indicate the author's point of view, speak somewhat for her style, and convey an intimation of her treatment of the subject. It is one of the best historical essays of the kind that has met the writer's eye, and deserves especial notice for the care the author has taken to set forth Lorenzo's literary rank, generally lost sight of by reason of his political fame. While there are some indications that the author may possibly not have delved as deeply into the original sources from which the history of Lorenzo and his times is to be obtained as the modern school of historical scholarship is disposed to require, the reader will probably admit that she has gone as far as the purpose of portraiture required; but however this may be, her chapter on the "Poet of Out-of-Doors" bespeaks a first-class knowledge of Lorenzo's own writings, and will whet the appetite of every lover of literature not already familiar with his poetry. The style is clear and rapid, and the book has that further charm which comes from the most perfect arrangement of material. The topical and chronological methods are combined with exquisite art, the several aspects of the great Florentine's life being treated in the order that contributes most to a natural view of the individual and a true picture of the age. In conclusion it should be said that the Knickerbocker Press has done all it could to contribute to the perfection of this little work of art, and that it is a pleasure to handle and look at such an admirable specimen of bookmaking. MORTAL MAN. By A. Easton. Chicago: C. H. Kerr & Co. Paper, 12mo., 47 pp.; 25 cents.—As the title would lead one to suppose, the author of this little book in verse believes man to be mortal and not immortal.

"Self-evident some unknown power controls;
'Tis not self-evident mankind have souls."

Again:

"Sensation is the fount from which there springs
Reason and instinct of all living things.
Void of sensation, matter will decay;
Life is sensation in poor mortal clay."

Here is a bit that grates upon one who believes in higher things:

"The true philosophy of life is this:
Enjoy to-day's, wait not to-morrow's bliss.
A good digestion, free from aches and pains,
Will yield more comfort than superior brains."

It is somewhat offset by this:

"Honor and fame should only those attend
Who battle wrong and ever right defend."

The theory of the whole poem is harsh and cold, and would not lead to an elevated view of life nor to high endeavor. In his effort to be entirely free from superstition, the author is materialistic and feels that "reason undermines faith" and that "man conspires with hope to dethrone reason" when he believes in immortality and some other things above the senses. That he is earnest and has found his theories sufficient to govern his own life well is evidenced by the fact that he dedicates this book to his son, although some of the advice and conclusions seem unwholesome to at least one reader. COLUMBIA'S EMBLEM: INDIAN CORN. A garland of tributes in prose and verse. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, 16mo., pp. 62; 40 cents.—No fewer than twenty-two well-known writers are placed under contribution to furnish out this little volume, whose mission it is to herald the claims of maize to recognition as our national emblem, leaving the arbutus, golden rod or laurel to be honored by single States or sections. The place of corn in the mythology of the ancient American peoples, where it was considered the special, divine gift of the gods, its importance in the early days of the colonies, its artistic meanings and possibilities, and its universality are arguments skillfully set forth by the sober statements of the historian or the glowing verses of the poet.

MAGAZINES.

IN NEW OCCASIONS for July the leading article is a protest against "Eugene Richter's Caricature of Socialism," from the pen of Laurence Gronlund. A favorite method of discrediting a thing has ever been to set up an image of straw bearing some slight resemblance to it and then to knock it down. This, Mr. Gronlund contends, is what Herr Richter has done; and it is evident that the school of socialism to which Mr. Gronlund belongs does not advocate or approve of what the German parliamentary leader assumes to be socialism. Still we must bear in mind Mr. Gronlund's admission that some German socialists do approve of some of the—to him—most objectionable features in Richter's picture of socialism. This grudging admission seems to the writer to deprive Mr. Gronlund's answer of much of the force it might otherwise have as coming from a representative socialist. Mr. Gronlund prefers to be called a Collectivist, and in this he tacitly assumes to speak for a considerable body of American socialists. In their name he repudiates Herr Richter's representation. But the reply is that Herr Richter's attack was not directed against Mr. Gronlund's school of collectivism, but against the extreme school of thorough-going state socialists; and as regards them the writer in New Occasions admits that Herr Richter is largely right. Socialism in the larger sense is a term under which the great majority of the men of our day might be gathered; as has been often pointed out, the post office, the public school, etc., are in the large sense socialistic. In fact, the larger sense of the term is so elastic and ambiguous as to have little meaning except as opposed to the extreme school of individualists. Thanks to the influence of a few strong men who early put it forth, the extreme laissez-faire doctrine appears to have a much wider sway over the minds of men than it really has. In the "orthodox" school of political economy in which our older men of affairs were educated, it was, nominally at least, a fundamental principle; but it has never been consistently followed out in the theories of social administrators, and it is now almost dead. It is, generally speaking, therefore, a work of supererogation in our day to advocate socialism in the larger sense. The anarchist is the only consistent opponent it has. It is incumbent upon one who asks us to listen to him in the name of socialism, to go a step further and indicate what kind or degree of socialism he advocates. This, in four crisp pages, Mr. Gronlund attempts to do; but the subject is too large for proper treatment in such limits. One feels that he is going too fast; that if he were called on to explain just how the things he speaks of are to be brought about and regulated, he would probably have to modify his program. However this may be, one strong point he makes, which all who speak of socialism or collectivism should bear in mind, viz.: that it is not necessarily inconsistent with emulation, but that the money-making motive may lapse without destroying ambition. Common minds in our day seek wealth because it is for them the best means of acquiring honor and distinction; and since there are more common than superior minds wealth seems to be the great desideratum. But we should not forget that even with the distinctive money-seekers—all but the very grossest of them—wealth is but a substitute for greatness. Hardly a rich man lives who would not rather be a great orator, general, statesman, inventor or philanthropist, honored by the world, with a merely comfortable income, than a multi-millionaire. And men would strive not less but more for distinction in these honorable lines, if they did not feel that by turning themselves to mere money-making they were pursuing a short cut to the social position which in a less plutocratic community would come from virtuous devotion to the higher interests of men.

This paper is not alone in showing that New Occasions has a lively interest in the social problems of the day, with a leaning toward so-called "radicalism." E. H. Thomas' review of "Why Government at All"—something very similar to which the writer thinks has already appeared in UNITY—and the editor's notes seem most worth reading. The magazine is very small, containing perhaps as much reading matter as UNITY's conference number.

THE FORUM for July has, perhaps, a wider scope than many preceding issues, but shows still its special interest in social-political questions. Right Hon. Prof. Bryce has an article on "The Teaching of Civil Duty;" Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, one on "How the Fourth of July Should Be Celebrated;" Mr. Edmund Hudson, one on "The Army as a Military Training School; and last—but, in the opinion of the writer, most worth reading of all—is Prof. J. B. Moore's "The Russian Extradition Treaty: A Reply to Protests," a scholarly paper, the perusal of which would, it is believed, convince any fair-minded man that the late scare as to this treaty was ill-founded. Among the non-political articles which may be of interest to our readers are two on the prospects of the World's Fair, and one by Dr. Lyman Abbott, entitled "What Are a Christian Preacher's Functions?" the purport of which is that he must concern himself with individuals rather than institutions, and must view life as Dr. Abbott does.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE for June 24th is a very rich number, by reason of the article entitled "Literary Discoveries in Egypt," taken from the Quarterly Review. It contains quite a full account of the various literary remains recently unearthed in Egypt, including some Greek writings of Aristotle and Herondas, and—what to the student of history, ethnology and religion is more important—a great many letters to and from the Egyptian kings of the 15th century B. C., giving us quite an insight into the condition of affairs at that time in Babylon, Syria and Palestine.

THE series of articles by college presidents in the Chicago Advance is a feature which may add greatly to the value of the paper. In the last issue of June, President W. G. Frost, of Berea College, had a helpful article on "German Ideas for American Schools," which will do something to straighten out the misty ideas current here as to German education, as well as give some useful hints to the working teacher.

BLESSED BE DRUDGERY.—A sermon by W. C. Gannett; 2c. mailed. UNITY PUBLISHING COMMITTEE, CHICAGO, ILL.

Notes from the Field

Western Unitarian Conference.—A meeting of the directors of the W. U. C. was held at the headquarters on Monday, June 19; at 2:30 o'clock, President Shorey in the chair. Present: Messrs. Blake, Effinger, Gould, Hosmer, Jones, Van Inwagen, West, and Wilkinson. Minutes of last meeting (May 19) were read and approved. The resignation of W. C. Gannett was read, and was accepted with great reluctance but in deference to his wishes. W. W. Fenn was elected to fill the vacancy. The election of a treasurer was discussed, in place of Myron Leonard, who declined at the annual meeting to be a candidate for another year, at the same time resigning his membership in the board. E. A. West was nominated, but declined. William McFaddon was then nominated, the nomination carrying with it nomination upon the board. The nomination was followed by the unanimous election of Mr. McFaddon. Adjourned to meet Tuesday, June 27, at 2 o'clock p. m.

F. L. HOSMER, Sec'y.

An Adjourned Meeting of the Board of Directors was held on Tuesday, June 23, at 2 o'clock p. m. Present: President Shorey, Messrs. Blake, Effinger, Fenn, Gould, Hosmer, Jones, McFaddon, Milsted, Van Inwagen, West, and Miss Hultin. The minutes of last meeting were read by the Secretary and approved. On the withdrawal of President Shorey, Mr. Fenn was called to the chair. Mr. McFaddon was welcomed to the Board and responded in a few fit words. The Executive Committee deferred report upon the matter referred to them at the meeting of May 19, which was to provide a plan for two full meetings of the Board during the year, traveling expenses to be paid. There was some discussion of the Secretaryship, Mr. Hosmer having declined at the annual meeting to be a candidate for another year, and the matter having then been referred to the Board, with power to act. It was moved that a committee of three be appointed by the Chairman, to confer and report upon the choice of a secretary, with instructions to call a meeting of the Board when ready to report. The motion was adopted, and President Shorey, Mr. Jones and Mr. Crothers were appointed such a committee. It was moved by Mr. Jones, and adopted, that the Treasurer, as heretofore, be authorized to use the bonds held by the Conference as collateral in raising money for current expenses. Attention having been called to the fact of Treasurer Leonard's contribution of a large portion of his salary to the Conference treasury the past year ($87.50 out of $150), the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved: That the Treasurer of the W. U. C. be instructed to pay to Myron Leonard, our late treasurer, the sum still unpaid of the small salary hitherto attached to the office of treasurer; and that our late treasurer be requested and expected to receive the same, whatever disposition he may have made of it in his book:

"And that we ask leave to add our grateful sense of the untiring faithfulness, skill, and efficiency with which he has administered his important office for so many years, to the great benefit of the Conference."

Adjourned, subject to call.

F. L. HOSMER, Sec'y.

Eastern Unitarian Conferences.—Maine.—At this conference resolutions were introduced indorsing the Unitarian headquarters established at Portland, and the Church Exchange, an eight-page, 35-cents-per-annum paper, edited by Rev. J. C. Perkins, of Portland, with the assistance of other ministers in the State. The sermon was preached by Rev. Jas. De Normandie, of Boston, from the text: "If that which was done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious." Rev. A. G. Pettengill, of Yarmouth, made a "Plea for a Practically Useful Christ." Rev. H. D. Catlin, of Eastport, read a paper upon "The New Idea of the Church," in which Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones' church in Chicago appeared as the representative of the new idea. Rev. S. C. Beach, of Bangor, followed, referring to the new theological idea of the church set forth by Prof. Paine, of the Bangor Theological Seminary, and also touching upon the new idea as seen in the working of Unitarian clubs and guilds. Rev. Cora S. Cochrane spoke of "The Church We Need," and was followed by a number of speakers. The conference was entertained by the Augusta church, June 13 and 14.

Manchester, N. H.—From a recent number of the Manchester Union, which devotes nearly three columns to the work of the Unity Club of Rev. W. H. Ramsey's church, giving cuts of a number of rare fern specimens collected by the members of the botanical department of the club and their friends, we quote the following remarks: "The object of the Unity Club is to enrich the intellectual life of the city and its young people in general, and the results attained in its eight months of existence are very flattering to its projectors. The effect of the club's efforts by reason of interest awakened by these classes and lectures is particularly noticed at the public library. Scientific works which have stood on the shelves undisturbed for years have been called for, and a steady run has been made on works pertaining to subjects intellectual. One member in particular of the class in evolution has read as many as eight or nine books on that subject."

The North Middlesex Conference was held at Wilton, N. H., June 15. Rev. G. W. Patten, of Dublin, conducted the devotional meeting. All clergymen present were invited to take part in the proceedings. Rev. Frank Phalen spoke on "The Future of Liberal Christianity," saying it depended largely on the missionary spirit. Rev. Wm. H. Ramsey spoke on "The Ideal Church." Rev. Enoch Powell spoke on "Church Life and Fellowship." Rev. A. J. Rich spoke on the "Friendliness of the Churches." Miss E. P. Judkins spoke of "The Work of the Woman," as done by the Women's Alliance. Rev. D. M. Wilson, superintendent of New England missionary work, gave a summary of what had been done in his territory.

The Connecticut Valley Conference was held at Turner's Falls, Mass., June 14 and 15, the sermon being given by Rev. A. M. Lord, of Providence. The two principal papers were by Rev. C. F. Dole, of Jamaica Plain, and Rev. F. A. Hinckley, of Florence. Mr. Dole's paper, entitled "Teaching Ethics in Sunday School," was received with great favor, and a desire expressed that it might be published. Rev. Mr. Hinckley spoke on "The Human Catholic Church."

The Norfolk Conference was held June 15 at Walpole. Rev. L. R. Daniels, of South Natick, conducted the devotional service, taking Prayer as his theme. Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke, of Newton, read a paper entitled "Is the Church a Luxury or a Necessity?" Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, of Concord, spoke on "The Devotional Element in the Sunday School."

Yonkers, N. Y.—The admirable new building of the Woman's Institute was formally opened on April 3 with interesting exercises. The object of the institute is: "To promote the welfare of women, particularly those dependent on their own efforts for support, by cultivating a spirit of fellowship and co-operation on the basis of a high moral and religious standard, without sectarian distinction, by providing a free circulating library and reading room and classes for instruction, and other means of improvement, recreation, and benefit." The work includes classes in dress-making, millinery and cooking; lectures, concerts and entertainments; and many other excellent features of plan, management and construction.

Through the untiring labors of the President, Miss Mary Marshall Butler, the work was conceived, founded, and brought to its present condition. In 1880 she established, in a single room, the Yonkers Free Circulating Library for Self-supporting Women, now developed into this noble result.

—Pratt Institute Monthly.

Atlanta, Ga.—United States Bank Examiner Geo. W. Stone spoke Sunday last in the Church of Our Father on "Heresy." The Atlanta Herald, in giving notice of his address, speaks of his culture and pulpit ability, and tells how his fame has grown in Atlanta, at which place he has previously spoken several times. On the last occasion it reports that the Unitarians were largely crowded out of their own church by outsiders anxious to hear him.

Chicago, Ill.—Rev. W. R. Alger, of New York, preached at Unity Church last Sunday in support of the doctrine of immortality. Next Sunday Rev. A. W. Martin, of the First Free Church, of Tacoma, will preach there. At All Souls' Church the pastor preached in the morning on "The Cost of Gunpowder," and in the evening Mr. Laurence Gronlund, the Socialist, delivered an address on "Individuality Under Collectivism." Next Sunday evening Rev. Mr. Martin will preach at All Souls Church. In the morning the pastor will speak.

HELPS TO HIGH LIVING.

SUN.—No more in heaven than earth will he find God
Who does not know his loving mercy swift.

MON.—Think while thou sunnest thyself
in joy's estate,
Mayhap thou canst not ripen without frost.

TUES.—The new is but the old come true;
Each sunrise sees a new year
born.

WED.—Who longest waits of all, most surely wins.

THURS.—I am glad that good and ill
By changeless law are ordered still.

FRI.—Gladder for brief pain's uplifting
power,
Thou shalt but pity griefless men.

SAT.—To doubt, to chafe, to haste, doth God accuse.

—Helen Hunt Jackson.

NANNIE CAMPBELL'S HAT.

"Is it not a beauty, mother?" asked Nannie Campbell, holding at arm's length a hat in the latest style, gay with ribbons and laces and the bright plumage of birds.

"It is very handsome, Nannie, but entirely too expensive for your father's pocketbook, this spring," replied her mother quietly.

"You forget, mother, that Cousin Miriam will be here next week; you don't want me to look like a dowdy by her side, do you?" pouted Nannie. "She will be decked out in expensive finery, I know. Surely I can afford this one bit of extravagance. Do say I can have it, that's a good mother," she added coaxingly, and though her mother still protested, Nannie finally had her own way, and four dollars of father's hard-earned money found its way into the milliner's purse, while the coveted hat was put away carefully until the city cousin should arrive.

Nannie had never seen Miriam, but, aware that her father was wealthy, she had indulged in visions of costly garments until she was scarcely prepared to welcome the little figure in plain clothes that came in upon them unannounced two hours before they were expecting her.

Miriam's sweet face and sunshiny disposition soon captured her heart, however, and before the day was over they had exchanged confidences and were the best of friends. Miriam's gingham and prints which did duty on week-days, though pretty, were inexpensive, and the soft merino in which she robed herself on Sunday morning looked quite plain beside Nannie's new summer silk. It must be acknowledged that Nannie felt a little vain when the new hat was brought out for inspection. She actually enjoyed the look of surprise that Miriam bestowed upon it, and, mistaking the look for admiration, asked somewhat vainly, "How do you like it?"

Miriam's face flushed—she did not like to give pain, but she was a truthful girl, and after a moment's hesitation answered:

"It is very pretty, and I like it—all but the birds."

"Why, they are the most beautiful ornaments on the hat—everybody says so," snapped Nannie, impatiently. "There is nothing shoddy about them. Why, just look at that humming-bird. It looks natural enough to be alive."

"Do you know, Nannie, that these winged creatures of rare plumage are actually flayed alive in order to preserve the brightness of their burnished feathers?" asked Miriam.

"No, I did not," replied Nannie, indignantly. "How do you know this is true, Miriam?"

"A gentleman who has made the subject a special study, and knows all about the cruelties practiced in the capture of birds, says they are snared, trapped, netted, lamed, and, to preserve their value for the ladies, skinned alive." Just think of that, Nannie! The ladies not only demand the slaughter of birds for ornament, but in order to preserve their coloring full, vivid, and brilliant, they require the skinning process to take place while the blood runs warm and the body still quivers with life."

"Such shocking cruelty!" exclaimed Nannie, with tears in her eyes. "I never gave the subject of bird slaughter a moment's thought before, but I am done with bird ornaments now, forever," she added, putting the hat back in its box.

"Are you going to stay at home from church?" asked Miriam, watching her cousin's movements.

"No, but I cannot wear that hat," answered Nannie. "My last summer one must do service to-day, and tomorrow that little humming-bird shall be exchanged for a bunch of daisies."

Her mother approved, but the milliner objected, saying she had too much money invested in birds to help inaugurate a crusade against them.

Though Nannie could not have the flowers, she would not wear the birds; consequently the ribbon and lace on that fine hat had to be spread out considerably so as to cover the bare places—a job which the two young girls accomplished quite creditably.

If all the young girls in America would follow Nannie Campbell's example, and resolutely refuse to wear birds as adornment, the trade would soon be so crippled that it would die a natural death.

FLOSSIE'S BIRTHDAY PICNIC.

Flossie White was a dear little girl that I used to know, and I am going to tell you what happened the day she was nine years old. It was a lovely summer day, the 10th of June, if I remember rightly, and Flossie wanted to go down to the shore of the lake,—beautiful Lake Michigan,—near which they lived, and have a picnic with her little brother Charlie and her playmate Hattie Burns. It was always a great treat to watch the white-winged ships sail over the blue waves, or look at the foaming breakers slowly creeping up and lashing the shore; and sometimes—and that was really the most fun of all—the shoes and stockings were taken off and the children waded in the clean white sand and quiet water near the shore. But Flossie and Charlie were never allowed to wade unless mamma or papa was with them, and this bright sunny birthday, as they started off with their gay little basket of luncheon, Flossie never thought of wading. She only thought of how grand it was to be nine years old, and the privilege of having a picnic alone (without the older ones) seemed to her a sure sign that she was almost a young lady.

Charlie ran on ahead, switching a little stick he called a cane, or stopping to play hide and seek by the trees they passed, while Flossie and Hattie chatted away like two magpies. Oh, they were so happy.

The hours flitted by all too quickly. Charlie made islands in the white sand and played he was Robinson Crusoe, Flossie and Hattie built sand houses with wonderful lawns in front and splendid orchards at the back, and then visited each other and made calls upon Robinson Crusoe, until dinner time came and went, and they were thinking it time to go home. Just then something began to happen.

Hattie said she was warm, and the water looked so cool. "I'll tell you, Flossie, let's go in wading," she said suddenly. "It'll be just the thing to do on your birthday," and she commenced unbuttoning her shoes.

"Why, Hattie, we mustn't. It would be wrong!" exclaimed Flossie. "Mamma wouldn't like it."

"Oh, she wouldn't care, specially now you're nine years old. She told us to have all the fun we could and be happy every minute, didn't she, Charlie?" said Hattie, turning to him as she took off her last stocking.

"Course she did."

Hattie began to run about in the sand and plow it up with her toes. Flossie looked at the shining water and then down at the cool damp sand. It would be so nice to bathe their feet in these tiny ripples near the shore. Surely mamma would not care for that.

While she was thinking all this, Hattie had begun to unbutton the little brother's shoes. "Do hurry, Floss," she cried impatiently, noticing Flossie's "lazy spell," as she called it.

"No, Hattie, I guess I mustn't," replied Flossie rather faintly, looking again at the tempting water.

"All at once Hattie heard a very decided voice saying, "Hattie, button that shoe right up again this minute. Charlie and I will not do it. I know it is not right. No, we will not," and Flossie stamped her foot in the sand so hard she nearly fell over.

Then the happy feelings all came back again, and the sunshine seemed as bright as it was before.

When Flossie told her mother about it that night, she said it had been the happiest birthday that had ever come to her.—H. V. A., in the Cup Bearer.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Monroe Street, Chicago, who publish Theodore Parker's "Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man," have a considerable number of paper copies slightly soiled as to cover, but otherwise in good condition, which they wish to close out at once. They therefore offer them to the readers of UNITY, post paid, at 20 cents for a single copy, or $1 for eight copies. This is the regular 50-cent edition of 480 pages.

NEW OCCASIONS is the name of a new magazine of social and industrial progress, edited by B. F. Underwood, formerly of the Boston Index and later of the Open Court, and published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Monroe street, Chicago. The first two numbers, for June and July, are already issued. No. 1 contains a notable paper by Dr. Lewis G. Jones, on "Recent Advances in Penological Reform." In the July number Laurence Gronlund, author of "The Cooperative Commonwealth," discussed Eugene Richter's caricature of socialism, which was brought before the American public in a recent number of the Review of Reviews. It will be the policy of New Occasions to discuss social questions temperately but freely, offering an open field for opposing views. The price is fixed at 10 cents per copy, or $1 a year, and the publishers invite subscriptions. Address CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Monroe St., Chicago.

Announcements

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

You Can't Keep Cool

while you're rubbing away over a tub of steaming clothes. If you want to keep comfortable and save your health (think of inhaling that fetid steam) and strength, stop the rubbing—and the steaming. Pearlina does it. Pearlina; cold water; no boiling; little work; that is the programme for hot-weather washing.

This taking away of the rubbing is more than a matter of saving work. It's a saving of needless and ruinous wear and tear to all your summer clothing.

Direction for this easy, safe and economical washing, on every package of Pearlina.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

I have learned

*To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth; but hearing oftentimes*

*The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample power*

*To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man:
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought.*

And rolls through all things.

—Wordsworth.

PROSPERITY has its penalties. A growing boy hath need of a new suit of clothes very often. Sometimes institutions find themselves embarassed by their growth. The Chicago University finds itself in that condition—a magnificent endowment to pay the teachers, but an exhausted treasury to pay current expenses. It is not enough to set a good cause a-going; you must remember the good cause must be maintained.

It is reported that the outward-going steamships from New York and Boston carry away about as many American tourists as ever. Is not this a case of going across the river to get water? These seekers after art, novelty or other recreative material must travel far before they will find what they are turning their backs upon in the World's Fair at Chicago.

We are surprised to find the announcement in The Outlook that the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes has decided to withdraw from the ministry and is about to enter political life. Can it be that he who has succeeded in making so many new paths for a minister in London still finds himself handicapped so much that he prefers the outwardness of politics to the deadness of theology? He has prepared the way for the minister and the ministry that will do the work for which he now leaves the ministry. We are sorry he discontinues the battle against dead forms and hampering traditions on the inside.

NOTHING is more discouraging in the field of morals and religion than the short term of service which seems to satisfy the conscience of so many workers. Having given and received help for a time from a church or other institution, they seek to escape responsibility, toil and expense under shelter of the law of periodicity, and say "it is somebody's else turn now. I have done my share." Is it ever anybody's else turn to do your work? Have you "done your share" until life is ended? Are not the highest things eternal, and the obligations they impose perennial?

THE Outlook seems to justify its discouragement and covert reproach of the young men who leave the Congregational church for the Unitarian, on the score that they will probably find narrowness and bigotry whither they go. Of all pessimists they are the worst who justify the wrong by the argument of "you're another," and would discourage travel by the argument of a long road. Rather let the young men be encouraged to move on just as they feel cramping limitations and hurting environments. Truth and light lead ever onward. Let them be as quick to resent and escape Unitarian bigotry as Trinitarian bigotry, if such exists.

"SHALL DEPENDENT CHILDREN BE REARED IN POORHOUSES?" is the title of a pamphlet we have received, prepared by the friends of the movement described in the article entitled "An Encouraging Failure," which appears in another column. The pamphlet sets forth the condition of the law in Illinois, gives the text of the bill recently introduced into the Legislature, and sets forth the progress of the legislation on this subject in six or seven States, including Pennsylvania, which has, perhaps, the best system of any. We believe that a limited number of these pamphlets may be obtained by those feeling a special interest in the matter from Mr. George H. Shibley, 144 Oakwood boulevard, Chicago.

THE price paid for elegance is noticeable at the World's Fair. The New York State Building fittingly represents the "Four Hundred"; elegant, sumptuous, in perfect form. In the second story there is a great banquet hall too elegant to be used. All around there are indications of art too palpable for daily service. No lunching is allowed in the New York Building, while all around it the more modest, home-like State Buildings, notably those of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Indiana, are thronged at the proper season with family groups from any State enjoying the contents of well-filled lunch boxes. These State Buildings are fulfilling the objects designed for them, places of rest and resort for all who may come. Something like this is observable in the church life of America. Our cities are burdened with churches that, like the New York State Building, are too elegant for use. They have over-reached themselves. Having lost sight of utility, they have thereby violated one indispensable canon of good art. This is a suggestion which the artist as well as the moralist may well consider.

We have received a little pamphlet on the Need of the Japan Unitarian Mission, containing a plea for this mission, floor and elevation plans of the building in course of erection for its uses, and a catalogue of the Jiyu Shin Yakko (School of Liberal Theology). Excellent business sagacity seems to have been exercised in the purchase of a site and the planning of the headquarters and theological school. It is calculated that the whole cost of land and building will be but $6,500, and certainly this is a very modest outlay in consideration of the importance of the work. The little theological school, now entering upon its third year, seems especially admirable for its breadth. The preamble to the constitution reads:

This institution has been established for the purpose of promoting the philosophic and scientific study of theology and of religion, together with the practical application to life of the results of such study.

We question whether there is anywhere a better field than in Japan for the propagation and rapid growth of liberal religious thought, and we hope that all friends of the movement will give the cause such assistance as is in their power. For that purpose they may address Rev. Clay MacCauley, at 25 Beacon street, Boston, Mass., or Tokyo, Japan.

CHANGE seems to be the order of the day among our periodicals. Last week we referred to the Christian Union's change of name, and this week we note that the Cosmopolitan, perhaps the best magazine in the world in the matter of illustrations and artistic finish, and quite abreast with others in respect to literary value, has reduced its price from three dollars to a dollar and a half.

The friends of UNITY will be pleased to know that we have availed ourselves of such an opportunity as is rarely offered, and have made an arrangement with the Cosmopolitan whereby we can offer it and UNITY to new subscribers for two dollars a year. We thought that UNITY was one of the cheapest publications in the United States, but having found one that is even cheaper, we have pooled our issues, and offer both at a discount. We do not believe that such an offer has ever been made before in the history of American journalism; we feel ourselves very fortunate to be able to make it; and we hope that it will enable us to double our list of subscribers. Will not UNITY's friends help us to do this? We must greatly increase our subscription list or UNITY cannot continue after the present year to do for its readers what it is trying to do. If you cannot get us subscribers you can send us the names of persons to whom we may send sample copies, or you can send to us for sample copies which you think you can use to advantage. Will not each subscriber of UNITY try to secure us at least one more?

THE PEACEMAKERS.

It has been a favorite commonplace in our social philosophy that war would eventually bring its own defeat. But gunpowder as a peacemaker does not seem thus far to have been very much of a success. The tendency now seems to be to lay it aside on account of its inefficiency. Our own government is spending at Sandy Hook thousands of dollars every month in experimenting on smokeless explosives, that the work of destruction may be more sure and sweeping. The prediction that the instruments of war will become so terrible and the work of destruction so sure and speedy that human courage will give way and no soldiers can be found to withstand the deadly implements, has little justification in history or in philosophy. It will not do to reckon on the cowardice in man to bring about peace. Human nature is a nery thing. There are no tasks so hard, no dangers so great but that the human soul will undertake the one and confront the other. War is the law of the lower orders of nature, the normal condition of primitive society, and it cannot be corrected by the weakness of men. We must appeal not to the baser but to the higher motive.

What, then, are some of the forces that are at work ameliorating the horrors of war and bringing about the time when war will cease altogether; when, indeed, "swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks"?

First comes the white light of intelligence, the study of hard facts. This age cannot compute its indebtedness to that brave Russian artist, Veretschagen, who has put on canvas the horrors of the march, the sickening tedium of the camp, the everyday misery of the hospitals, the ghastliness of the battle-field. His striking canvases went their rounds through the cities of Europe and America, shaming kings and queens, challenging those high in authority to beware how they let loose their grim dogs of war that leave such a train of agony behind them. No wonder that such an artist should become the terror of the iron-handed Czar. No wonder the military forces of Germany forbade the exhibition of these paintings at their recruiting stations because they depressed the spirit of enlistment, and that the British Government denied them recognition because they told such ghastly truths about its Christian (?) campaigning in India and elsewhere.

Philosophy, not charity; science, not sentiment, must eventually come in to vindicate the law of love over and above the law of hate. Once the genealogy of war is clearly understood, and it is known that the dominion of the cannon is nothing more nor less than the dominion of the bludgeon intensified, the power of the cannon will be gone forever and men will throw it aside, not because it hurts, but because it does not accomplish that which they hoped for. So long as men believe that one race has come into the world under the smile of a divine partiality, and that its prerogative must be maintained by some other providence than the law of the specific gravity of soul, which permits every one to contend for the highest prizes of life and allows those to win who deserve to win; so long as a king claims dominion by a divine right descended through bloody ancestors; so long as a priest claims a monopoly of celestial wisdom not to be disclosed to the uninitiated; so long as any compact of men, religious, industrial or political, are unwilling to submit their claims to possessions, mental or physical, to the arbitrament of reason,—so long will war be inevitable, though it continue to devastate and debauch the individual, the home and the state. Madam von Suttner, the author of "Ground Arms," is right when she says that Darwin inaugurated the era of peace. Evolution is the gospel which teaches the inadequacy of the Law of Might and the coming supremacy of the Law of Right. Everything that makes for rationality; anything that probes through sham, that breaks down conventionality, that disarms blind prejudice, that puts the mind in sympathy with the universe by increasing its acquaintance with the laws of being, makes for peace. The awful enginery of destruction made more fiendish every year by new inventions, the thundering demon of Krupp, now on exhibition in the World's Fair, that sends his message of terror yelling through twenty miles of space, the devilish fish-torpedo of Sims and Edison that can be sent in complete control of the operator sneaking under water for more than two miles with two hundred and fifty pounds of dynamite in its bowels in search of some ship to blow up, are not going to put an end to war. Plenty of men may be found ready to offer themselves a willing sacrifice to these Molochs. But the skill and knowledge necessary to perfect these infernal prolongations of the claw and the fang which form so prominent a feature in the lower stages of evolution, necessitate a skill and develop an intelligence worthy of better things and deserving of better company. This developed talent will eventually carry its wares to a more responsive market; and war, like sorcery, witchcraft, the mutilations of the ascetic and the sacrificial slaughterings of the priest, will be left behind simply because the soul has found a better way.

Edison had defeated his own invention of the fish-torpedo before it was completed. That devil-fish has been disarmed by the telephone and the electric light. It is said that Maxim, the inventor of the automatic gun that will fire itself off at the rate of seven hundred and fifty shots a minute, is hard after the air-ship that is to be a success. When the successful air-ship comes, as come it will, it will impugn the vision of the great dead singer who was made laureate by a crown of the old regime. He in imagination anticipated the time when the heavens shall be filled with commerce. Then he "Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rained a ghastly dew

From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue."

But no "ghastly dews" of human blood spilt in national strife will belong to the air-ship's age, for ere that time arrives the poet's other vision will have been fulfilled:

"When the war drum throbs no longer,
and the battle flags are furl'd,
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.

When the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber,
lapt in universal law."

The skill of the bell-makers of Troy, N. Y., was sorely tried these past few weeks. It was hard to cast a peace-bell out of war metal, gathered from many sources. The diverse elements were loath to fuse. But we believe the bell is finished, and on the Fourth of July it rang out its message of universal peace among nations. It is a most prophetic symbol of the larger tasks given the friends of progress to engage in to-day. Let them bring on their diverse contributions from all the jarring fields of thought. Let them bring their relics from the battle-fields of trade, politics, and religion; and science, directing the workers for humanity, will forge a bell that will be a peace-bell, because it will ring liberty throughout all the land and declare freedom to every hand, head, and heart. Liberty to seek, not its own, but another's good; not blessedness far away, but blessings here and now. It is time our Fourth-of-Julys should rise above the noise and smoke of gunpowder into the hallelujahs of the soul that rejoices in the prospect of a "peace on earth and good-will to men," a peace that is to become corporate, organic, national, international, universal, and eternal.

THE IMMEASURABLENESS OF BEAUTY.

One subject summer always offers to our thought, Beauty. Beauty so defiant of definition, so hard to even analyze, but so unlosable. What is it? The Century Dictionary should know, but it helps one little to be told, "It is that quality of an object by virtue of which the contemplation of it directly excites pleasurable emotions." Emerson, following Plato, helps me more when he suggests that "the new virtue which constitutes a thing beautiful is a certain cosmical quality, or a power to suggest relation to the whole world;" that "into every beautiful object there enters somewhat immeasurable and divine." My friend helped me still more, to whom I showed the picture of a beautiful boy-face, when she said, "It makes me think of all the beautiful things I have ever seen." A cosmic quality,—let us hold, at least, to that; and each beautiful thing by virtue of its beauty is related and akin to all else that is beautiful,—let us hold to that. The Greeks called Order and the Universe by one word, cosmos. It is not definition, it is only hint towards it, to say that Beauty is the cosmic order concentrated in individual things and radiating thence again. We see more than forms and colors; we see them, indeed only see these, in relation to each other and the All,—their symmetries and harmonies, their contrasts and their unities, their in-flowings and out-flowings from each other; and this more in the vision, this that we feel as with a sense behind the eyes, seems to be the "Beauty" of it. To intellectually analyze the vision is to seek the "True." To trace the influences of it and its causes upon life is to seek the "Good." So let us further hold to this,—the Beautiful, the True, the Good are one; a mystic trinity; three aspects of one essence, three summaries of one nature, three faces of the One God.

But to-day no more of definition; let us revel in the fact,—the universality of Beauty, the immeasurableness of Beauty; that which everything illustrates, that to which there is no beyond.

We go abroad,—but here is Italy. We chase the summer beauty to the hills or sea,—but leave behind almost as much of it as all we go to. We love June,—but how lovely is the winter and the snow storm! We greet May,—but November brings chrysanthemums for weddings, and even February is a beautiful month to be born in.

Can we ever tire of the stately pomp of a day,—the outside of a day? A dawn and then a sunrise to begin it, a sunset and an after-glow to close it; the wheeling shadows of morning and afternoon, the noon's high light, the twilight quiet of color; and after the all-day blue and grey and white have passed, the stars in the deep skies at night. Day by day of this make the year! And these days, all alike with sunrise, sunset, shadows, stars, yet so richly varying with the circuit of the seasons.

And then, inside the day, the separate things of earth,—each thing a world of beauty that can be entered and explored only to reveal, within, new worlds all beautiful. The things that seem at first least fair, fair enough in inner aspects; the very rottenness and foulness and decay and death of things, beautiful enough, when dissected and scanned, each portion by itself,—decay and death being but recreation on some lower scale, in which, as in the great Genesis, the Creating Power pronounces each thing good.

Add the beauty visible if eyes there were to see it, but which there are no eyes to see,—each sea-shell on the untrod beach; the atom's tiny shell at the bottom of the ocean ooze, or compacted in the white tomb of the chalk cliff; the wood-grain hidden in the tree's trunk,—halve the smallest block and you double the beauty; the flowers in the wide wildernesses; the splendors of the moths emerging from the summer nights.

To this add the beauty which the microscope reveals in every structure which can be cut thin enough to be gazed beneath a lens: that night-moth's wing-dust becoming a field of the cloth of gold; a pin-point of refuse becoming a heap of glittering gems; a tiny section of a red rose petal turning to a flush of sunset sky!

Add all the beauty born to die in its birth-instant,—that timeless beauty with which Nature is so lavish; the foam-gleam on the ocean; the sun-gleam in the forest; the spark within the dew-drop, and the sparkle on the brook; the snow-flake's sudden star; the flash as of the seven heavens when the light-ray and a falling rain-drop counter; the fit of smiles upon the human face, the music in the intonations of our syllables.

And add, once more, the beauty hidden to most eyes but revealed to artists, poets and nature-lovers: that for which no microscope is needed and no journey, but it waits at the wayside, under foot, at the turn of the road, at the rise of the hill. Man is a beauty-animal as he is a land-animal,—he must have both to live on; yet many of us seem not fully-born, but to be living still in our embryonic gill-conditions in our beauty-world. In common landscapes common eyes see nothing to remark. Less common eyes see and say, "How pretty!" The artist sees, thrills, stays, pictures, and lo! how much can we save on dinners and on clothes to buy this copy of what the artist saw where we saw nothing? The poet sees and thrills and sings, and the daffodils, from winters all secure, laugh and toss forever in his song. Rightly or wrongly, we claim private property in land, but can one market the landscape? Yes, if greedy enough, he can, by fencing in his hill-top or his park, by boxing up the waterfall approach as in Switzerland or at Niagara of yesterday. But do this, and it still is doubtful whether you have yourself the landscape that you claim, the sea-front that you market. The owning depends upon a pocket-book; the having depends on eyes and head and heart. The old farmer sometimes sells with his acres values above ground as undreamt of by him as any gold mines under ground. The fisherman's rocks would not bring $2 an acre; before long $250, will not buy them. What has happened to the rocks? Only eyes have arrived that see them,—and now the world comes and covets.

So is it everywhere,—a new world opens for each new growth in eyes. Be the Columbus and you need no caravels to reach it. And it is a joy to know that we may all become Columbus to ourselves; for we can all grow new eyes to see, explore, report. The picture, poem, music, architecture may yet be yours and mine; and better still, the flower, the sky, the wood-walk yet be ours. Thoreau, Burroughs, Warner, Jeffries, Mrs. Miller, are our past masters and past mistress in this art-of discovering new worlds in the old. In the new century that nears, the tenderer century when "pigeon-shoots," it may be hoped, will go the way of bull-fights, and fishing be no more a "sport" for men than butchering, boys and girls will learn to greet the rocks and flowers and trees as old acquaintance, to take portfolios for the game-bag, catch birds with kodaks, not a gun, and instead of trout bring home the secrets that Nature has been telling them among the woods and streams.

The immeasurableness of Beauty! As we think it over, vista beyond vista, thus a side thought opens. It is the contrast in respect to durability between beauty in Nature and beauty in Art,—Art, which is but man's imitation, interpretation, exaltation of the beauty that he feels in Nature. Lowell, in his birthday lines to Holmes, speaks of "Fame's great antiseptic—Style." Beauty in Art is the great antiseptic, the grand preservative of work. If man-made, "a thing of beauty is a joy forever." Poor work vanishes; make it beautiful, it tends to last. A song lasts longer than a law, a poem than a treatise. A poor torso of a perfect statue draws the world, and the maimed marble has ten thousand lovers to the living woman's one. But with Nature, beauty seems preservative of nothing. "Timeless," we just now said of certain gleams and glows of it; but what to her seems more than gleam and glow? What besides the stars attains the other meaning of that word, "timeless?" Faded sunsets, vanished Junes, lost chords, lost smiles, forgotten heroism,—the past is made of them! Is Nature spend-thrift, then? Rather, she is impotent to not-make beautiful. Of her perfect she fails often, but her very failures fail not, save in contrast with her own successes, to be beauty. Yesterday's sunset, yesterday's self-devotion vanishes, but light and love will be as freshly full of miracles to-day and every day forever.

And yet such vanishing of beauty almost terrifies when we are thinking of our immortality. Can such finish be expended on the sea-shell, on the petal, on the human face, and then can Nature so instantly dispense with it? If so, why may she not dispense as promptly with the spirit's beauty? Is a soul too beautiful for even Nature not to hoard it? Plato's high-reaching word was: "If a man has eyes to see the true beauty, he becomes the friend of God and immortal." But the answer must lie higher yet: We are not merely beauty which is manifested, but of that which manifests itself in beauty. To be "spirit"—this is the great faith—is to partake of the eternal source whence all beauty springs.

And at this very point one more vista opens. Granting the new life, what may its new senses show us? If microscopes ever report more beauty found, if artist-eyes never exhaust it, if new sensitiveness is always flattered by its new surprises, then what may new senses in a new and spirit body reveal! Perhaps Heaven starting at us! Heaven here, all around us, only waiting to be seen! The kingdom of heaven literally "at hand." Think you we hear the full music of the running river, of the chanting wind, of the rustling pine, of the climbing sap-stream in the grasses? If the outside of June be so beautiful, what may the inside be? "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor hath the heart of man conceived" the beauty which may dawn in everything familiar when death opens the eyes. W. C. G.

BUSINESS PANICS.

Of the more immediate causes of business panics, most may be included under the general principle of disturbance of mutual confidence. For on this confidence modern business is based. Capital is loaned on the confidence that it will be repaid with interest,—and if this confidence ceases, it is withheld. It is invested in the confidence that it will pay certain profits; and if this ceases, industry is checked, fewer workmen are employed, less wages paid them to spend, demands decrease, prices fall, and many establishments have to stop, and perhaps ruin their owners in the process. So far-reaching and interlaced are all the fibers of the industrial system, that the condition of one affects all the rest. All work together as one, and can only work with mutual trust. When for any reason this trust fails, the system partly stops.

Of the more immediate causes of the troubles to-day, most come under this principle. Whatever of the many assigned causes you prefer,—whether the dishonest transactions of cordage companies and Reading Railway and whiskey trust; or the honest failure of banks and business firms that could not carry their burdens; or the dread of cholera degrading trade; or Homestead riots and labor strikes, making employers fear to extend their business and try to contract it; or the uncertainty of a Presidential election and of tariff legislation, making manufacturers uneasy and disposed to diminish their productions and suspend them for a season,—all of these alleged causes work through that principle of diminished confidence. And the practical lesson of it is, for all and each to do the utmost to restore the confidence, to do away with dishonesty, to discountenance disturbing speculations, to stop strikes and riots, to help laborers and employers to see their common interests, and to work for a commercial system which—whether high tariff or reformed tariff or no tariff at all—shall at least not be tinkered by every Congress, but have some permanence, so that manufacturers can trust it from one term to another, and not be disturbed even by Presidential elections.

But we want to work not merely for mutual trust, but for a condition of things that can be trusted. Here is a second principle quite as important as the first. Trust is often carried too far, and then becomes a deeper cause of commercial panics than the immediate one of distrust. Before the distrust begins, and often as a necessary reason for its beginning, extreme confidence has carried men into airy enterprises and reckless speculations and expenditures, which have to be checked by a season of distrust. A long period of prosperity is wont to make men too confident of results which the laws of nature will not allow. They extend their enterprises, call for more labor; wages rise, workmen have more to spend and still further increase the demand for all sorts of products, and so lead employers to extend their business again and again, and the general prosperity rises higher and higher. Capital increases and is loaned ever more readily; new men borrow it and go into business with the same result; and industry seems to have secure possession of an upward and enlarging course that will never end. In the easy times business morality grows less strict; regular trade passes into rash schemes for making money faster, and even crooked ways of making it sometimes come to be condoned and looked upon as almost legitimate. So the work goes on until confidence is overdone, and honest Mother Nature calls a halt. Dishonest firms get caught in their own trickery and go down, honest ones which had assumed larger burdens than they can bear break under them, and the reaction sets in. Distrust begins and increases, failures breed failures. It is Nature's way of correcting the over-confidence that had run wild. We want to work for mutual trust among men, but still more for honest and solid business methods that can be trusted.

THE CRY OF THE MUTE.

The cheering word comes that, owing to the prompt action taken by the National Humane Society, the cow-boy race to Chicago, from the Western plains, has been robbed of its worst features, and although a cruel thing, is not as bad as was at first expected. And to the credit of the press be it said that they have their share in this consummation so devoutly wished. This leads me to urge once more what I have so often urged upon the writers for the press, that they add this theme to the many noble ones that now engage their pens. There are already many noble men and women who are saying their wise, strong words in behalf of the poor, suffering mute creation. But many more are urgently needed. Probably no class of people could do as much to educate and awaken public sentiment in this matter as the writers of the country. Even the clergy speak to a limited audience compared to that which any good newspaper writer addresses. And how purposeless and ephemeral much of their writing is! The mere stringing together of pretty words, into pictures of more or less power and brilliancy, is not necessarily a very noble work, although it gains dignity when we speak of it, as a whole, as literature; but the stirring up of noble thoughts and impulses in the human heart, the elevating of the mind above mere selfishness—that is noble and profitable and enduring, be the words spoken ever so brokenly, and although the numbers may halt and limp in inartistic fashion. And the cry for help in this good cause deepens day by day. The brutes at our very doors are beseeching us. The brutes far away on wide Western plains, subject as they are to fiendish tortures, are beseeching us. The winged wanderers of the air, as they cut the blue with their flashing wings, are beseeching us. The little children all over the land, held in thrall by the despotic bonds of ignorance and vice, are beseeching us. And helpless old age, in many nooks and corners, in the keeping of coarseness and cruelty and greed, is beseeching us. The noble army of the great and gifted already working for humanity are beseeching us to give time and attention, money and influence to this good cause. Let no voice that can plead for the helpless keep silence. H. T. G.

A CHRISTENING SERVICE.

The following service, daintily printed, comes to us from one of our parishes. It is designed to give one to the parents of the child after the name has been inserted in the proper place. It may be too late for others to copy this service of flowers and of christenings; but it will surely be interesting reading to many who are doubtful about the possibility of beauty and feeling in connection with natural religion. The rational faith has large place for the sentiments.

Welcome to the Little Children.

"He set a little child in the midst of them."

The People sing :

MOTHER AND CHILD. - (Marlow.)

My child is lying on my knees;
The signs of heaven she reads;
My face is all the heaven she sees,
Is all the heaven she needs.

I also am a child, and I
Am ignorant and weak;
I gaze upon the starry sky,
And then I must not speak.

For all behind the starry sky,
Behind the world so broad,
Behind men's hearts and souls doth lie
The infinite of God.

Lo! Lord, I sit in thy wide space,
My child upon my knee;
She looketh up unto my face,
And I look up to thee.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

The Pastor reads :

Then were there brought unto Jesus little children, that he should put his hands on them, and pray: and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

And again the disciples came, saying, Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?

And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Whosoever shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven; and whoso shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein.

And he took them up in his arms, put his hands on them and blessed them.

The Children come for flowers and remain clustered around the table.

The Parents enter with their little ones, the Children singing :

Lead us, Heavenly Father,
Lead us, Shepherd Kind!
We are only children,
Weak and young and blind.
All the way before us
Thou alone dost know;
Lead us, Heavenly Father,
Singing as we go.

Welcome by the Pastor :

Dear friends, amid the beauty of the new-born flowers we welcome these, your new-born children, to the family of God upon the earth. By bringing them to be given their names in our Church Home you bear witness to your grateful joy that they are yours in God. We share with you that sacred joy, and greet as kin of ours your little ones who will to-day receive their names among us.

Mothers, fathers, you can scarcely deepen here, or at this moment, the consecration which your children have already laid upon you by their birth. By that birth which you, not they, invited, you stand already pledged to them, and pledged to God who gave, to make them pure and beautiful and holy, as far as in you lies,—pure like this clear water, symbol from old time of baptismal purity; beautiful in their unfolding, like these flowers; happy as child-life can be made by prayer-led love. Behold in us the witnesses of your consecration to the duties, the dignities, the joys of parentage.

Mother, by what name shall this, your child, be known upon the earth?

The Mother answers.

Thus shall it be. Henceforth thou shalt be called the name thy parents give thee now. May thy name be blessed to thee, and be honored among men!

.....

May the Father's holy spirit, which is in thee, keep thee noble, keep thee pure!

May God, the Mother and the Father of us all, be dear to thee, as thou art dear to God.

After each christening the Pastor gives a flower, and the children softly sing :

Hallelujah, Amen!

As the Parents withdraw, the Choir sings :

O beloved little children,
Blessings upon you fall!
Heavenly peace and blessings
Gather on your way!
Ye are all weak and helpless;
But the good Father guards,
Watches and shields you always,
With merciful love and care.

O beloved little children,
Blessings and light descend
On the dear love parental,
Which hath offered you here!
Hallowed and consecrated
By holy song and prayer,
May love be filled with wisdom
To guide the feet of the child!

The People sing :

THE LITTLE ONES.

(Manoah.)

All hidden lie the future ways
Their little feet shall fare;
But holy thoughts within us stir,
And rise on lips of prayer.

To us beneath the noonday heat,
Dust-stained and travel-worn,
How beautiful their robes of white,
The freshness of their morn!

Within us wakes the childlike heart;
Back rolls the tide of years;
The silent wells of memory start
And flow in happy tears.

O little ones, ye cannot know
The power with which ye plead,
Nor why, as on through life we go,
The little child doth lead.

RELIGIOUS WORK WITH AND FOR FOREIGNERS.

READ AT THE CONFERENCE OF LIBERAL MINISTERS AT MENOMONIE, WIS., MAY 11, BY REV. KRISTOFER JANSON.

Being a foreigner myself, I am requested to-day to speak about religious work with and for foreigners. And being a theme of discussion, I think the meaning is: Will it be advisable for the American Unitarian Association to maintain missionary work in a foreign language any more? The economical side we will put entirely aside for the moment, because the American Unitarian Association, if it cannot afford to support foreign missions, of course must drop them, and then there is nothing more to say about it. But supposing the American Unitarian Association be able, as it has commenced to support religious work among foreigners, will it then be advisable to do that in foreign language, or should it not be preferred to force the strangers into the English, as those people have become, and intend to stay as American citizens? The latter question I will decidedly answer with No, because you cannot reach the foreigners in any other way than through their own language. Even if the persons have stayed here long enough to understand the daily talk and help themselves along in the stores and at the workshops, their heart is not in their new language, and they can scarcely understand a sermon or a lecture, where a little richer or higher language is used than the common slang. I have experienced it myself. I tried to speak once a month in English, but I had only half the audience and I had to give it up. And it is a common remark to hear when my people listen to English-speaking pastors, "He speaks too high for me," even if it be very plain. I must confess myself that an English speech never makes the impression on me as a Norwegian. It strains me more or less to listen to it, and the covering of the thoughts seems cold and bare. Remember also that most of the people coming here, from the Scandinavian countries at least, are uneducated people of the middle age, when they do not so easily catch any new language, especially as most of them have not learnt any other tongue than their own or have not the slightest key to understand the strange sounds that float around their ears. This is especially the case out in the country. I have met farmers that cannot understand, not speak, not read a line of English, though they have stayed here for twenty-five or thirty years. These people live, of course, in a colony of their countrymen.

But will not this supporting of their own language keep up the clannishness and hinder the assimilation with the American people? I think not. Force will simply not do in this case. And the assimilation will go on quite naturally by means of the children learning English at the common school. In the cities, even the first generation born here, or arrived here as smaller children, will have emancipated themselves from their native language; in the country, the third generation, I think. At Minneapolis I am compelled already to use English in my Sunday school because the children are more familiar with that and think it easier. If you speak to them in Norwegian, they will answer in English. The assimilating process will go quite naturally without any force or push. * * * But let the older people enjoy their own native tongue. The language covers for them all the dear remembrances of their old home, their customs, their history; and when they hear it again all their slumbering faculties awaken, their eyes sparkle, their hearts beat, and even the plainest talk makes a deep impression on them, because they can so thoroughly accept and absorb it. A language is a holy thing. It is not like the grinding of a coffee mill—only a monotonous sound. It is closely connected with the heart strings of the people, with the awakening of their intellect and with all their deeper feelings. If you, therefore, will educate the immigrants, especially when you have new thoughts to offer them, use their own language or you will never succeed. The assimilation belongs to the future and takes care of itself. And the liberal gospel, preached and accepted by foreigners in their native tongue, makes it easier for them to assimilate later, because the new ideas have torn them off from national and religious prejudice and intolerance. * * * Difference of nationality includes hundreds of things and all of importance. It is conceded by all that a heathen mission, if it shall succeed, must educate native preachers, or that the missionary must live entirely into his people and become like one of them. But be that so, it will also apply in the relation between European and American. Of course the difference is not so great as between a Chinese and an American, but still there is a difference. They may be highly civilized people, both of them, still there is a great difference and both of them feel it instinctively. Now, for instance, myself. If I stayed here a hundred years I would never be Americanized. The rules of society, of politeness, the mode of thinking and reasoning and speaking and writing are of another kind. They are against my nature, my education, my customs. I may love and admire many Americans, but I will never become like one of them. You cannot deprive the leopard of its spots. And the extreme mutual flattery in their conversation that is the proof of good education, the lack of what the Germans call "Gemuthlichkeit" in their society life, the letter-worship and form-worship, especially in religious matters, which is an inheritance from the Puritan fathers, and which has created its strongest expression in closing the World's Fair on Sundays, the, in our opinion, ridiculous prudishness in their literary taste and criticism, the Anthony Comstock censoring,—in short, the whole spiritual atmosphere, is something so entirely different that a European never will feel at home in it. And he will on his side seem to Americans too free, too frank, too rough, too aggressive, too familiar perhaps. Even if the poor immigrants cannot explain why, they will feel the difference at once. And therefore if you will establish a mission of any kind among them, use one of their countrymen, who is familiar with their customs, their food, their mode of living and reasoning and thinking, their history, the nature of their country, their prejudices and vices as well as their virtues, and let him work among them in their own language, not in opposition to their adopted country, but leading them by his knowledge of both countries and their demands into a closer relation to the new institutions and forms, wherein they now shall live.

America, and the West especially, is predestined to become the wonder witch-kettle, where nearly all the nationalities of the world shall mix and mingle, and at last be boiled together to one new nation, who shall bear the stamp of every one of its many parents, I hope, by selecting their virtues and letting the dregs sink to the bottom. And it will be of great importance for the future of America whether those foreigners are led into liberal progressive ideas in regard to political, scientific, and religious matters or they shall become backsliders. The fourth part of the population of Minnesota, for instance, is Scandinavian, and they are very numerous in Wisconsin and all over the West. Will not that be of some importance for the future of Minnesota and Wisconsin? It will not do for Unitarianism to approach the Catholics. Their crowds are too ignorant and too tied up to the apron-strings of their ministers. And among the Protestants I should say that the Germans, the Dutch people, and the Scandinavians ought to have the preference. I can only speak for my own countrymen. They are in some respects excellent materials for liberal ideas. They are born republicans, have an inherited love of freedom and self-dependence, are a hard-working, courageous, frugal set of people, apt to become pioneers. As a rule they are more educated than the crowds of Southern Europe; most of them can read and write. The drawback with them is their stubbornness in clinging to the inherited religious orthodox ideas, and their leaders, the Lutheran ministers, fanaticize them in that respect. I receive frequently letters calling me the Devil and Anti-christ, and there is a rejoicing all along the line now, because they shall get rid of me for a year. But this intolerance and narrow-mindedness causes a great many of the intelligent young men and women, touched by the livelier influx of ideas and surroundings, to withdraw entirely from all religious work, to look upon religion and church with distrust and scorn as an old barbaric relic from the past. To them the liberal gospel comes like a liberation, because their inmost soul is longing for some higher life, and I have received many letters gratefully thanking me for what I have done for them. Since the foreigners are in the majority here West, it will not be good policy for American educators, and among them I count the American Unitarian Association as one of the most important, to pass by this element in silence without trying to influence them; and in order to do that they must support foreign workers in the foreign languages as their means permit it.

AN ENCOURAGING FAILURE.

Our General Assembly adjourned Friday, the 16th ult. House bill 700, providing that it shall not be lawful for an overseer of the poor to send any child between the ages of 2 and 16 years as a pauper to any poor-house for support and care, but that such children as are charges upon the public shall be cared for in respectable families, or in institutions especially designed for the care of children, passed third reading in the House Wednesday, the 15th ult., at about 4 p. m., too late to be taken over to the Senate and put through first reading. As three readings on as many different days are required, this most beneficent provision failed to become a law. This is deeply to be deplored, but as the bill was not introduced into the House until March 30, its failure to get through the Senate was not unexpected.

This bill is the outcome of the appointment at All Souls Church of a committee to formulate a plan whereby there may be incorporated in this State a society for the care of dependent children in private families. It was at once discovered that a large number of dependent children are being cared for in poorhouses along with the idiotic and, in some cases, the insane. After an examination of the laws of the several States, and consultation with those who make it their duty to see to the enforcement of these laws, the bill was drawn and placed in the charge of Hon. Godfrey Langhenry, a member of the House from this county, who, by careful attention, secured its passage in the House. In the Senate, the bill was placed in the charge of Senator Aspinwall, but at too late a day to become a law. We extend to these gentlemen our most sincere thanks, and trust that they may be members of the next General Assembly, and that they will not be weary in well doing.

It will interest the readers of UNITY to know that apparently the only opposition to the bill was from one in charge of an industrial school who desired such an amendment as would place all dependent children in their institutions rather than leave it optional as between institutions and private families. The Roman Catholics are pleased with the bill because of the fair treatment accorded them in the provision that "the children shall, so far as practicable, be placed in families or institutions of the same religious denomination as that in which they were baptized; in case they have not been baptized, then in the families or institutions holding religious views similar to those of the parent or parents." THE INDIAN AND THE WORLD'S FAIR.

DEAR SIR—In view of the recent threatened trouble from a certain portion of the Navajo Indians, in Arizona, Lieutenant Plummer, U. S. A., the Acting Agent, has asked the co-operation of the Indian Rights Association in carrying out a project which may save future bloodshed, and will undoubtedly tend strongly to promote the civilization and education of these Indians. He expresses the wish that some of the wildest of the Navajos should be taken on a visit to the East, so that they may see a few large boarding and day schools, and have an opportunity to form some idea of the work of the whites. There are many Indians in the northern part of the reservation who have no idea of civilization at all, and if they had an opportunity to form some conception of the power of civilization, their absurd notions of their own importance would be overcome, and their objections to education, which are now a serious obstacle to the work of the Government in that direction, would be removed. Lieutenant Plummer thinks that this plan, if carried out, will "save much trouble that is sure to come soon unless there is a decided change in the present condition of affairs on and about this reservation."

I have written to the Department at Washington asking their approval of this plan, and in response I am informed that the Department heartily approves, but has no money at its disposal to carry the project into effect. The Department has since officially authorized the Association to proceed with the project, provided we can raise the necessary funds. We therefore propose to raise a fund sufficient to carry out the plan,—at least to send a limited number of Indians, under proper supervision, as far as Chicago while the World's Fair is in operation, to a sight which will probably convince them of the power of our civilization, and that they should fall in line with it without delay.

Will those to whom this plan commends itself, and who care to assist the Association in carrying it out, kindly forward such contributions as they wish to make to it to this office so soon as convenient? The entire amount needed will be about $700. We have already secured about $200. Small contributions as well as large ones will be thankfully received and promptly acknowledged.

Newspapers can render aid by printing this letter, or otherwise informing their readers of the project.

Respectfully, HERBERT WELSH,
Cor. Sec. Indian Rights Ass.,

SERMONS AGAINST CRUELTY.

DEAR UNITY: Did you ever hear a minister preach upon man's duty to the brute creation? Did you ever hear a sermon upon cruelty to animals? or to children? or upon any other form of cruelty? I have been a pretty constant attendant upon their ministrations for over forty years, and I never did. Is the theme unworthy of their attention?

THREE STORIES.*

The review editor of UNITY has recently been reading three very different books, which may be regarded as characteristic of as many schools of fiction. Amanda M. Douglas' "Larry," which won the Youth's Companion prize of $2,000, is an old-fashioned tale, which seeks to please the reader with the story of an attractive little gentleman, who, though well-born, spent his early years in poverty, and after his widowed mother's death became a newsboy, was sent West by the aid society and practically adopted by a lovable old-maid farmer, who, though always kind-hearted and generous, had previously led a pretty bare and lonely life. She is perhaps forty; the ten-year-old waif awakens the motherly instinct of the woman and becomes as dear to her as her own flesh and blood. She is well-to-do and gives the boy a superior education, and her love for him prompts the plain countrywoman to cultivate her own mind and manners, that she may continue his companion. The strength of the love between these two, and its effect upon their lives, is, of course, the best thing in the book. Other features of the work are not so commendable. For one thing, the picture is too rosy; we are told that the boy had undergone hardships before the story begins, but so far as we really see him in the story he is an enchanted prince. His companions and teachers all have an excellent influence over him, his "Aunt Mat" grows steadily richer, he discovers a coal mine on the farm, which makes her independent, and finally two fortunes come to him from his own relatives, who are anxious to give him all that wealth and the highest social position can accomplish. Then, too, there is the conventional villain; not a blood-stained bravo, or one of the harrowing villains, but a beefy, brutal farmer, whose spite against Larry and his "Aunt Mat" is strong, but never effects anything. The falsity of the picture is not in painting his faults too black,—doubtless there are many mean and brutal men,—but in failing to so much as hint at a redeeming trait in him. There is no real attempt to paint a man here; he is a mere lay figure, a foil for the good "Aunt Mat" and Larry. Inasmuch as the story was primarily written for children, it was not deemed wise to endow him with any very fiendish traits or horrible deeds; but the principle is the same,—he is the conventional villain. The story is, on the whole, superficial. Although supposed to be for children, little or nothing is presented of the real interests and problems of child life.

*LARRY. By Amanda M. Douglas. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Paper, pp. 242; 50 cents.—MY WICKEDNESS: A Psychological Study. New York: Cleveland Pub. Co. Paper, 16mo., pp. 88; 35 cents.—ASLEEP AND AWAKE. By Raymond Russell. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, 12mo., pp. 200; $1.00.

Yet, when compared with the other books mentioned in the heading, we are disposed to turn back to this representative of the old school of literature with pleasure; because it is clean and wholesome. True, it does not feed the whole man, but in a measure ministers to his better nature.

"Asleep and Awake" belongs to the introspective romantic school, and "My Wickedness" to the radical psychological school. The latter is very well written and seems really to deserve its sub-title, "a psychological study;" but it is the study of a sorely diseased mind, and, being thus abnormal and horrible, seems better adapted for the physician and the criminologist than for the general reader. It is the journal of an inmate of a Parisian lunatic asylum, who has committed a number of horrible murders, whose madness consists in recurring frenzies of blood-thirstiness, and in an almost total absence of moral sense at all times; yet regarding himself he seems to have formed a certain tentative philosophy of life. Aside from the general fact that the book devotes itself so exclusively to the dark side of life as to be unwholesome, it has the further defect, from an artistic standpoint, of representing the prominent characters in the book other than the hero as almost equally abnormal.

The third book tries to handle the great problem of life without the adequate ability. It is the voice of one who has ambition, with little talent, and no genius. It distinctly fails to prove what it was professedly designed to establish, and rather serves unnecessarily to cast doubt on that great truth. The author perceives the falsity of many of our conventional rules of morality, and feels an immense superiority over the rest of the world in consequence thereof. The truth the book contains only serves to make it more dangerous, because it is morbid. We hope that the writer will withhold her pen for several years; and when she has been longer awake we trust that she will write more wholesomely. F. W. S.

PRINCETON SKETCHES. By George R. Wallace. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, large 8vo., pp. 200; $2.—Princeton Sketches, by a recent graduate of the college, has more than a local interest. It gives us interesting glimpses of the development of one of the few institutions in America that have become historic. "Nassau Hall" dates back to the time when William of Orange and Nassau was King of England. Princetonians are proud of the influence which their college has had in the affairs of the nation. Especially was this marked in the Revolutionary struggle. The President, Dr. Witherspoon, was a conspicuous figure in the Continental Congress, and his patriotism could no more be impeached than his orthodoxy.

Among the hundred undergraduates who, in 1770, met in the college yard to protest against the encroachments of the British Government, there were four who afterward became members of the Continental Congress, two of the Constitutional Convention, and eleven of the Federal Congress. That little group contained five distinguished judges, four governors of States, one attorney general, a vice president and a president of the United States. Jonathan Edwards, James Madison and Aaron Burr are some of the names connected with Princeton in the days before it had broadened out into a university.

In the last chapter, entitled "The Princeton Idea," the writer seeks to do away with the impression "that somewhere on the campus is the spot where Jonathan Edwards 'stamped his iron heel,' and that this sacred indentation is the fetich of every true son of Nassau Hall."

There may be some who will be surprised to be told that one of the characteristics of Princeton College is "the utter absence of denominational feeling." The author adds, significantly: "The presence of the leading Presbyterian seminary in the same town has fostered a contrary belief." It is also just to the college to state that the two institutions have no organic connection. S. M. C.

THE MAGAZINES.

We have watched The Cosmopolitan with growing admiration for some time, and the wonder is that as it grows better it becomes cheaper. Already one of the cheapest monthlies, after having established the most perfect plant possessed by any periodical of its kind, and having gained the very front rank among illustrated magazines, it has reduced its price one half. Yet the very number in which this announcement is made contains two new departments, and shows that the magazine is continually improving. The two new departments to which we refer are: (1) "In the World of Art and Letters," and (2) "The Progress of Science." The former promises us brief critiques from the most competent minds in England, France, Germany, and the United States. M. Sarcey's critiques are to be given in French and English. The July number, for which the editors apologize as incomplete, contains in this department work from Andrew Lang, H. H. Boyesen, Agnes Repplier, and Thomas A. Janvier,—certainly a very respectable showing, if fame is any criterion of ability. Another feature of this department is a list of the twenty books deemed by a committee of three the worthiest publications of the month in fiction, science, art, biography, and history. This seems to us a somewhat mechanical device—twenty each month—but in the wide field of taste one must, perhaps, be more or less arbitrary. The five books mentioned under the head "Scientific and Economic" seem to be worthy of their place, if one may judge from a partial knowledge. We think that the selection with which critics would be least satisfied is that of the four books mentioned under the head "Critical."

The other new department, as carried out, is not only new in The Cosmopolitan but quite a new departure in American magazine literature, and seems to us a very praiseworthy undertaking. It is "intended to supply the requirement for the latest and most important scientific information, prepared not by one writer who may have a smattering of all the sciences, but by a number of leading scientists who are specialists in their respective fields;" and this information is to be stated in the briefest possible language, to render it available for the general reader. Professors A. E. Dolbear, C. A. Young, and S. C. Tillman, and Mr. G. H. Knight speak for this department in the July number.

We have taken so much space to speak of the new features of The Cosmopolitan that we cannot give as extended notice to the excellences of the body of the magazine as we should be glad to. It is profusely and beautifully illustrated, not a few of these little gems of art being alone worth more than the price of the magazine, and the text admirably written. Hjalmer Hjorth Boyesen's poem, "The Parley of the Kings," is a delightful bit of modern thought charmingly set in the frame of antiquity, and having an indescribable flavor from its setting. Mr. Howells' "Traveler from Altruria" shows that gifted author at his best, and that is saying much. Charles De Kay discusses American Art: the historian, McCrackan, the Swiss Referendum; and there are contributions from Camille Flammarion, Clinton Scollard, Gilbert Parker, Sara Carr Upton, Francois Coppee, Lucy M. Salmon, and other writers, ably representing literature, art, and sociology. The value and variety offered for 13 cents is truly astonishing!

IN the Atlantic Monthly for July Edward S. Morse, in an article entitled "If Public Libraries, Why Not Public Museums?" makes an earnest plea for museums, and at the same time points out the unavailable character of much of the work of the past in that direction. In this, it seems to us, the chief value of his article lies. In order to awaken a healthy interest in useful museums we must disabuse the public mind of the impression that a collection of odds and ends, of unrelated objects, or of objects the relation between which no pains are taken to make evident, deserves the name and merits the support of a museum.

THE SABBATH AND THE SUNDAY.*

BY REV. CHARLES G. AMES.

"The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath; so that the Son of Man is lord even of the Sabbath."—MARK II. 27, 28.

Jesus was the most radical of radicals, for the most conservative of reasons. Coming not to destroy, but to fulfill, he yet boldly rooted up every plant of tradition which had overgrown and smothered the primary principles of life and reality. The proof of his divinity appears in his fidelity to humanity. He bids us apply to all outward forms and venerable institutions this test: Do they help and serve man? If not, away with them from the face of the earth! The value of everything is in its use; if useless, it is worse than useless; hindering, it is harmful. Not as a reckless anarchist, but as a reverent reformer, did he denounce the usurpations of those religious leaders who sought to build up their own authority, or to fortify religion itself, by hedging about or overlaying the laws of God with the traditions of men.

How like a blaze of light amid obscuring sophistries came this clear word: "The Sabbath was made for man; not man for the Sabbath." To the Pharisees it was an unwelcome saying; yet it was unanswerable. And it gives us a formula which can be applied to the whole apparatus of human institutions, observances and agencies. Scriptures, priests, altars, temples, synagogues, churches, liturgies, governments and laws,—were they not all made for man? Must they not all be interpreted and used in the freedom of the spirit, and not in the bondage of the letter? Any man—the least of these our brethren—is greater than any institution or custom. For man's sake, let every good institution or custom be honored and preserved; for man's sake, let them all be held subordinate to service, and changed or abolished as humanity may need.

The value or sacredness of an institution does not depend on our knowledge or our theory of its origin. Who first made a clock or a watch? We would gladly know and duly honor the inventor; but our estimate of the value of a time-keeper does not depend on the name of its maker.

Historical and comparative studies have not made it easier to believe in miraculous origins; there are too many of them. Did the goddess Ceres, as the Greek story ran, send Triptolemus over the earth to teach the human tribes agriculture and cookery? Perhaps not; but when the handsome fable melts into thin air, we cherish these arts not the less. Did Prometheus first bring fire from heaven as a gift to mankind? Perhaps not; but the people of this latitude will not therefore banish fire. Did Minos, the Cretan king, learn his laws direct from Jupiter? Did Numa receive laws for Rome from the nymph Egeria? Were the Ten Commandments handed to Moses out of a storm of fire, on tables of stone engraved by the finger of Jehovah? Perhaps not. What matter, so long as all these statutes were "made for man," and were wisely adapted to guide his life and promote his welfare? Religious faith traces every good and perfect gift to one source. The myths which gather around the origin of ancient laws are poetic testimonies to human reverence and gratitude. They express a true conviction that all high wisdom is a revelation; that every good thing is of God.

The word "sabbath" means simply a stopping, a pause, a rest. The word ought not to drop out of use. It is a good, sweet word; it stands for a good, sweet thing, however it began.

The division of time into weeks of seven days is older than written history. In Genesis, the Hebrew poem of beginnings, we are told that the setting apart of the seventh day commemorates the rest which the Creator took at the end of his six days' work. Read other accounts, and you may conclude, as I do, that the changes of the moon first suggested this measurement of time by weeks. In the 20th of Exodus, the reason given to the Israelites for observing the seventh day, is because on that day the Lord rested. In the 23d chapter, the Sabbath legislation is put on the grounds of humanity. "Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest; that thine ox and thine ass may have rest, and the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger may be refreshed." In the 5th of Deuteronomy the same reason is given; the Sabbath is to be a relief for the hardship of labor for man and beast, and especially "that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and the Lord God brought thee out." The weekly holiday was thus made to celebrate the emancipation of the people from the toils of slavery.

Did the Day of Rest originate by supernatural appointment, or as a lunar festival, or as a humane observance? No great matter which; it was a good thing; it was "made for man." We ought to get over thinking that some good things are divine and others human. Their goodness makes them all divine, and it ought to make them all human. We must have respect enough for the Creator to believe that his will and his law include all that is best for his creatures. If the Day of Rest has proved a benefit to mankind, why should we not accept it as we accept the opportunities of the other six days; and why should not they, too, be hallowed as equally sacred for their proper uses?

God legislates for man through man's own faculties and experiences, as well as in the whole, large order of nature. Enlightened reason is itself a revelation, which no man may innocently or safely disregard. Humanity at its best represents divinity, and our common sense reads the law of duty in our situation and our needs as plainly as we read the commandments in a book.

The Day of Rest has verified its value by its benefits. It stands solidly on its merits, just like the school, the courts of justice, or the alphabet, and the use of coal and iron. If a part of our people undervalue or abuse any of the blessings of civilization, or throw away any good thing that has come down to us among the costly gains of history, it is surely a step backward toward barbarism. They are the losers, and not they alone, for they impair the great common inheritance of mankind. We must preserve the Day of Rest, because "it was made for man," and because man cannot spare it without injury to himself.

But the Sabbath is not superior to man; he is its lord and master, and he plays the fool when he does not compel the day to yield its finest benefits. Like all other institutions and customs of historic origin and growth, it has certain relations to his nature and his needs; its uses must be determined by his circumstances, and partly by his social state. External usages must change with changing conditions, else man is cramped, and becomes "the victim of his tools." As we must never hesitate to put a good thing in the place of a poor thing, so must we never hesitate to put a better thing in place of a good one.

I believe the early Christians held this theory about the Day of Rest, and that the change from the seventh day of the week to the first would have been impossible had they felt rigidly bound by the letter of the Old Testament. The Jewish Sabbath, which was perhaps, at one period, a joyous day, had become a weariness to flesh and spirit. In their zeal to save it from desecration the guardians of the law had overlaid it with petty and vexatious restrictions, some of which were practically inhuman, as we can see from the censures leveled against Jesus as a Sabbath breaker when he healed the sick and bade the paralytic take up his couch and walk, or justified his disciples for harvesting a handful of wheat when they were hungry.

When the gospel of Christ spread among the Gentiles, no injunctions were laid on the converts to observe any kind of Sabbath except the rest of the spirit. Paul declared for entire freedom in this matter. "One man esteemeth one day above another; another man esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." He denounced all attempts to carry over into the Christian community any of the Jewish national usages. "Let no man judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a feast day, or a new moon, or a Sabbath day, which are a shadow of the things to come."

In these two passages Paul dismisses the Sabbath question with indifference, for not another reference to it can be found in the Epistles which bear his name or in the reports of his preaching. Nor is the day once mentioned in the Epistles of Peter, James and John; and in the Acts it appears only as the day in which the Jews were accustomed to meet in their synagogues—a custom which gave the apostles, who were also Jews, an opportunity to preach of Jesus as the expected Messiah.

How then did Sunday come into the Christian Church as the successor of the sacred seventh day of the Jews? It is easy to answer. The new doctrine produced a new life; the new life produced new customs. But gradually, not all at once. Faith in Jesus took the lead of faith in Moses, without wholly displacing the old. The tomb of the Crucified had been found empty on the morning of "the first day of the week," and on that day he showed himself alive to his awe-stricken friends. It was the date of a new creation, the beginning of a new order for humanity. With no thought of instituting a new Sabbath, they yet grew indifferent to the old one, and the non-Jewish Christians naturally celebrated the resurrection by holding their meetings on the first day of the week, which half a century later was called the "Lord's Day." But its observance was not binding; they kept it in freedom and love, all the more gladly because it was not required, because it was no part of that burdensome yoke of the law which they gradually gathered courage to throw off.

On the day of the resurrection they met in the early morning and sang a hymn, "Awake, thou that sleepest! Arise from the dead! And Christ shall shine upon thee; and He shall give thee light!" Generally, they joined in the breaking of bread. Then they went to their usual occupations. Many of them, being of Jewish stock, kept up their old custom of resting on the seventh day; but no such obligation was ever laid on the Gentile converts, who soon made the greater part of the church.

The "Lord's Day," though mentioned but once in the New Testament (Rev. i. 10), naturally became more and more a day of repose for all who could spare the time,—a high day of instruction and fellowship, of song and worship, a festival of freedom and joy. Of course it took on a religious meaning; it emphasized the sweet privilege of keeping every day holy unto the Lord, and thus converting all life into a happy privilege, a heavenly blessing, and a type of "the rest that remaineth for the people of God."

So the Christian Sabbath grew and made its own place, and made it "for man." If the Church had not taken up the custom of devoting one day to rest and worship, and if the best features of the older Sabbath and its synagogue had not been taken up into the next day, Christianity would have been so far inferior to Judaism. In its own defense and in justice to its own people, it could not do less than lift its day of rest and worship into honor. Besides, the free and humane spirit of Jesus himself passed into the observance of the day. He had made a sick man well; he had brushed away the hard and soulless traditions; he had walked abroad through the field of growing grain with his company of disciples; and he had said, "The Sabbath was made for man; not man for the Sabbath." His whole aim was to liberate, heal, comfort, cheer and uplift.

But the early Gentile Christians, whose congregations were scattered over the Roman Empire, were mostly of the poorer class, and many of them were slaves. Whether they went to meeting early or late, they were obliged to spend most of the day in work. Sunday labor was not prohibited by any rule of the Church any more than by the civil law.

Another fact may have contributed to the change. The new faith was bitterly hated by the Jewish leaders. In the free teaching of Jesus concerning the Sabbath they saw a reflection upon themselves. The Christians saw in the rigid observance of the day a reflection upon their Master; nor could they forget that the men who murdered him were a party to that rigid observance. Every seventh day they were reminded of that sad seventh day when his body lay in the tomb; and many of them spent it in fasting, holding their very joy in check till the dawn of "the first day of the week," when he burst the bonds of death. Thus a chasm opened between the holiday of the Jews and the holiday of the Christians; they stood for two circles of thought and feeling. The new wine needed a new bottle. And the reproaches brought by the Judaizing Christians against their brethren, who did not observe the whole law of Moses, may have operated in favor of some sort of Sabbath.

The substance of it all is given in a few sentences by Dr. Hase, whose "Church History" was translated from the German by James Freeman Clarke. Dr. Hase says that during the first century, "in the Jewish Christian congregations, the Jewish sabbath and festivals were observed," while "only in congregations composed principally of Greeks could the members be induced to observe Sunday in commemoration of our Lord's resurrection." During the second century, "Sunday remained a joyful festival, in which all fasting and worldly business was avoided as much as possible; but the original commandment of the Decalogue respecting the sabbath was not then applied to that day." In the fourth century, Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, ordered that on Sunday "all worldly employment should cease, except works of necessity in the field, and the manumission of slaves."

Thus it appears that nearly three hundred years were required to complete the change from the seventh day to the first, and to secure for that change a legal recognition. But before the Christian era the Roman people had adopted the division of the month into weeks; and the first day of the week was named in honor of the sun, which had anciently been an object of worship. It was both easy, natural, and fitting that the prevailing sentiment of reverence should be transferred to Christ, as the true Light of the World, and so to make the Day of the Sun the Day of the Lord. It was also easy, natural and fitting that the Western nations, though imperfectly converted from paganism, should fall into the useful and beautiful custom of resting one day in seven.

Thus the Christian Sunday grew.

We have seen that the early church did not at first regard the observance of Sunday as an obligation; it was taken up freely and by degrees, as a privilege; in time it acquired authority, because of its value. If it grew binding afterward, it was because all customs tend to become fixed, and because the church acquired political influence and power to stamp its usages as public law. Later, the rigid sabbath legislation of the Old Testament was applied to the new day, especially by the Puritans and other Protestants, from whom our own traditions have descended. But Luther and other reformers stoutly resisted the tendency and demanded the same liberty of judgment which Paul had vindicated.

Our present Sunday laws, as interpreted by the courts, do not rest on theological grounds; they rest on considerations of public policy and general welfare. If the mass of our people wish to set apart from labor and business the Fourth of July or Decoration Day, the Legislature so provides for the public pleasure and convenience. As the mass of the people also find it for their relief and advantage to rest one day in seven, the law sets apart that day which is already hallowed by the prevailing sentiment. The law does not confirm nor contradict those who believe that Sunday observance is an appointment of God; it does not deal with such questions; it makes the Sabbath "for man," and on purely human grounds. And it respects the consciences of Jews and Seventh-Day Baptists.

Because the day is for man, man must keep it, or it will be the worse for him. If God did not rest, we must. The breaking down of Sunday would be a fearful calamity to society, and especially to all who work with muscle or with brain. It is the opinion of medical men that the giving up of Sunday rest, or its equivalent, would materially shorten human life. The mental change, even the change of garments, brings a sense of refreshment. Life gains both in quantity and in quality by this regular interval of repose, this slackening of the tension and the strain. To the families which make all days alike, month after month, year after year, life becomes monotonous and weary, a round of drudgery, a landscape of sand. To abolish Sunday would make certain a vast increase of insanity and suicide.

The true idea of rest is restoration, recovery, repair. And the whole man needs refreshment. We can put the day to higher uses than mere bodily repose; the body itself needs to be uplifted by the wings of the spirit. The Sunday is lost if it does not put us in tune, so that all days may yield a sweeter and richer harmony. The Sunday is a great humanizer. Emerson calls it "the jubilee of the whole world, whose light dawns welcome alike into the closet of the philosopher, into the garret of toil, and into prison cells, everywhere suggesting, even to the vile, the dignity of spiritual being."

It is not to the laws of the State, it is to our own happy sense of need and of blessing, that we owe the impulse which brings us together in companies, to meet each other as spirits, to hold these precious festivals of the mind and heart, and to cultivate kindly respect and sympathy and reverence for our common duties. Why should not we, as well as the old Hebrews, call our Day of Rest "a delight, the holy of the Lord, and honorable"? How deeply and sadly those children are wronged who are allowed to grow up and miss all these fine impressions and pure associations, as millions do!

We wish, indeed, to escape from that kind of Sunday observance which makes the day burdensome and depressing; but we shall best do this, not by lowering the use of the day, but by raising it; by making it a school of spiritual culture, and a welcome reminder of those realities which give life all its dignity and sweetness, and for which we find too little room and too little relish amid the rush of week-day activities, excitements and agitations. We do well to shake ourselves free of gloomy or stupid traditions of Sabbath-keeping; but we cannot afford to miss the best of all opportunities for bodily and mental refreshment, invigoration and uplifting.

The other six days must be the test of our use of the Sunday. Those who spend it in a carouse, and go to their work on Monday morning all the worse for it, are not the only ones who waste a good opportunity. On the other hand, I know of some who say that this day always brings them instructions, meditations, influences, and fellowships which help them to live with more cheer and courage through the whole week. Is not this a habit worth cultivating? Would it not lift up all days and put new meaning into life itself?

The century has witnessed some changes for the better, and some for the worse. The Sabbath idea has been humanized; the old cloud of gloom has lifted from the day; the theory of Sunday laws has been cleared of theological implications and conformed more nearly to American ideas of religious liberty. But, in resisting this rational change instead of leading it, some of the Protestants have unintentionally helped the reaction toward laxity, and have widened the chasm between the churches and the workingmen. They have weakened the hold of the day on the affection and reverence of the people by putting into their demand for its observance some of the spirit of the Pharisees. Imagine St. Paul as threatening that God would let loose the cholera upon mankind unless they honored him by observing the first day of the week—as if the day were for him rather than for them!

As to the opening or closing of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday, the original issue has been confused by those who have made it a question of what is due to God rather than of what is best for man. It might have been discussed as a matter of expediency, about which something true could be said on both sides. There were considerations of interest and of sentiment to be balanced; considerations of the rights of exhibitors, the welfare of employes, and the wishes of the general public. On the score of respect for the law and fair dealing with Congress, the managers do not appear to advantage; but the kind of clamor raised by some of the religious people, along with their attempt to carry their point by menace, and to employ the power of the Government in enforcing their views on those who do not share them, cannot be said to make up a handsome record.

However it ends, the net result of this unseemly struggle must foot up as a loss both to the Exposition and to the cause of religion. The Church has put on exhibition its own lack of human sympathy, spiritual insight and moral power. It has missed and spoiled a great opportunity. The Fair itself should have experienced religion, should have been converted to God. Had American Christianity been equal to the occasion, it would have interpreted the Fair as a powerful parable, teaching the lessons of brotherhood to capital and labor, teaching the sanctity of genius and of the resources of civilization, and proclaiming to glad millions that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; and He hath given it to the children of men." Not the most imposing cathedral service could so impress the multitudes with the wisdom and goodness of the Deity in nature and humanity as the Sunday opening at Chicago might have done, had the Church remembered that "the Sabbath was made for man," and given the signal for the anthem, "Enter into his gates with thanksgiving and into his courts with praise!"

There is a saying that "nothing goes against the grain." The ultra sabbatarian party rubs the temper of the non-Christian public the wrong way, and so defeats its own object. The Day of Rest might well cry out, "Save me from my friends!" It is doubtful whether the cause of true religion has gained anything since the time of Constantine by the methods which put law first and persuasion second. Whoever cares for the bodies and souls of his fellow-creatures must wish to preserve the sabbath. But is it not clear that a modification of our Sunday customs has been brought about in the interest of humanity, and by the needs of modern life? Yet it has been resisted at every stage.

A few years ago, in a company of ministers, when one of their number argued in favor of letting the street cars, the common people's coaches, run every day of the week, he was spoken of as "the gentleman who takes the devil's side of the question." The Sunday opening of libraries and museums and the running of suburban trains for public convenience were opposed with the same blind disregard to the needs of modern life; and it really looked as if some of the ministers were disposed to say to the people, "If you will not go to church, you shall not go anywhere else. The city poor must stay in their alleys through the heats of summer and keep quiet. They shall not profane the holy day by a breath of country air." But have not the people who are outside the churches, and who do not choose to be inside, some rights which the rest of us are bound to respect?

The Sabbath was made for man. For man let us use it. Let us keep it fresh and fair and sweet and sacred for ourselves; let us study how it may be made a blessing to our households and to the whole community. There should be ungrudging allowance for whatever amount of work, business or travel may be suited to the complex needs of society or reasonably adapted to promote human welfare and happiness; also for escape from constraint and discomfort, for natural freedom of movement, for friendly intercourse and the play of hospitality.

But all sorts and conditions of men and women may well cry out for a minimum of the common burdens of toil and care; for a minimum, too, of disquiet and noise and public parade and feverish excitement! And why not also for a maximum of facilities for getting away from the conditions that depress and exhaust and consume; a maximum of facilities for getting nearer to the things that refresh and cheer and refine—the things that speak to us of the True, the Beautiful and the Good!

Surely if the church knows its business it will use the Sunday as a lever for lifting the whole community out of vulgar and sordid materialism toward the higher levels of intelligent virtue. It will not censure but utilize the cravings of great multitudes in our cities for cheerful music, for wholesome spectacles, for innocent out-of-door activities, for access to Nature, and for every kind of relaxation which a free people judge to be best for themselves. The tendency to convert the Sunday into a pandemonium and a horror of license is not to be checked by a return to austerity and arbitrary restriction, but by a sympathetic approach to the better side of human nature, and by favoring every just demand of modern life for its own relief and expansion.

For my part, how gladly would I see our Protestant places of worship thronged on Sunday mornings, as the Roman Catholic churches are, with multitudes who enjoy both their religious services and afternoon recreations! We have partly lost our hold on our own people by their natural reaction from the non-Christian rigidity of the old New England Sunday. And now, since we must compete with the Sunday paper and the bicycle and the excursion and the labor unions, let us not repeat the old folly of appealing to the civil law and the constable, or to the stern example of Nehemiah. Let us rather do what still remains possible to draw the people to the house of prayer by giving them fair reason to believe that the freedom of the gospel of Jesus, the vision of truth, the brotherhood of hearts in love with the best things, and the repose of the soul of man on the perfection of the good God who made him, are, after all, the supreme attractions of the universe.

DARKNESS AND LIGHT.

Sometimes our pleasures turn to pain
 Within this world so bright and fair;
 Creation's smiles are all in vain
 With hope enslaved to dull despair.
 Sweet music still is ever near,
 Will we but give the list'ning ear.

We miss the flowers' perennial bloom,
 Scattered so brightly on our way,
 Filling the air with sweet perfume,
 Distilled and brought from common clay.
 Drive ev'ry phantom from thy breast!
 God guides our wand'ring thoughts to rest.

We magnify the smallest ill,
 Until each speck seems mountain high;
 Obedient to that subtle will
 We pass the daily blessing by.
 Oh, coward Heart, shake off thy fear!
 God's mighty power is ever near.

A STORY FROM LIFE.

There is a man at the Great Northern who is in love with his wife, but stranger than this is the fact that he fell in love with her after they had been married over thirty years. It was a case of love at first sight on the part of both when they first met years ago. She was a good and beautiful woman and loved him truly. He had been "rather wild," and his regard for her was more a matter of the imagination. Impulsively he proposed marriage and was accepted. At least this is the way one of the children tells the story. After the glamor of the honeymoon had worn off and her continuous and unsolicited manifestations of affection had begun to pall upon his ennuied soul, he returned to the companions and pleasures of the pre-marital period. She clung to him for some time and then left him to return to her parents, thinking that this act would bring him to his senses and her feet again. It did neither. Untrammelled, he plunged more wildly into the vortex of social life in Berlin, Germany, their home. His eyesight had always been weak. The disorder was increased by his irregular hours and life, until finally their light went out, as he and his friends supposed, forever.

The wife came back to him then and nursed him. She was his constant companion and ministered to him in the gratification of every whim and caprice. She became his sight; the light of his life. She was his amanuensis; she read aloud to him; she guided his steps through the thoroughfares; at the theaters she told him what the actors and the scenes looked like. A trained and accomplished vocalist, she sang to him in the twilight.

Children came and blessed their home, and she told which was the fair-haired and which the dark-haired one, and drew word pictures so true that he almost knew their faces. Only as the years went by his wife's face changed. She told him that the color had gone from her cheeks, that silver threads were distinct among the black tresses. He shook his head and smiled; there was one bright face he could always see; her young face, but around it and back of it was the darkness of his own life. When she sang her voice was the same, and he could not believe her face had changed.

When their children were men and women a celebrated oculist of Berlin undertook to restore his sight, though many eminent specialists had failed. After awhile he saw that there was light; then he could distinguish blurred objects. About this time his wife was taken ill with some throat complaint. She had sung a great deal. A surgical operation became necessary to save her life, but she lost her voice, even the power of speech.

The sight of the husband improved. At last he could see. He was confined in a dark room out of which he was brought by degrees. His children, whom he had never seen, were brought to him—and another, a middle-aged, matronly woman, with gray hair. It was his wife. He conjured before him the vision of the young woman he had neglected and to whom he would bow in adoration and love for her constancy and devotion. This woman was not the wife he loved, and her voice, which was the one physical link between the present and the past, was gone.

So she stood a stranger before the husband for whom she had sacrificed all the pleasures that are dear in life. There seemed to be no reward for duty done, for love lavished, for devotion unexcelled; but the children called her "mother," and he had pity on the voiceless being whose eyes pleaded for some return of the great love she had given him. And pity is akin to love, and he was grateful. So now the father and the mother and the children are here, their first outing as a family in years, to see the Fair.

The name of the man who was blind for so long is Otto Berger. The family has been in the city for over a week.

RUSKIN'S TENDER HEART.

Kindness to animals has often been noted as one of the most striking traits of Mr. Ruskin,—a sympathy with them which goes much deeper than benevolent sentiment or the curiosity of science. He cared little about their organization and anatomy, much about their habits and character. * * *

He founded the Society of Friends of Living Creatures, which he addressed in his capacity of, not President, but "Papa." The members, boys and girls from seven to fifteen, promised not to kill nor hurt any animal for sport, nor tease creatures, but to make friends of their pets and watch their habits, and collect facts about natural history.

I remember, on one of the rambles at Coniston, in the early days, how we found a wounded buzzard—one of the few creatures of the eagle kind that our English mountains still breed. The rest of us were not very ready to go near the beak and talons of the fierce-looking, and, as we supposed, desperate bird. Mr. Ruskin quietly took it up in his arms, felt it over to find the hurt, and carried it quite unresistingly out of the way of dogs and passers-by to a place where it might die in solitude or recover in safety. He often told his Oxford hearers that he would rather they learned to love birds than to shoot them; and his wood and mow were harbors of refuge for hunted game or "vermin," and his windows the rendezvous of the little birds.

THE WIND.

I saw you toss the kites on high
 And blow the birds about the sky;
 And all around I heard you pass,
 Like ladies' skirts across the grass—
 O wind, a blowing all day long,
 O wind, that sings so loud a song!

I saw the different things you did,
 But always you yourself you hid,
 I felt you push, I heard you call,
 I could not see yourself at all—
 O wind, a-blowing all day long,
 O wind, that sings so loud a song

HOW JOHNNY GOES TO SLEEP.

I used to wish I was grown up,
Or at least as big as Fred,
For he can stay down stairs at night
When I am sent to bed.

They think that I will go to sleep;
But I just lie there and think,
And I've often felt 'twas very late
Before I've slept a wink.

But one night Mamma told about
Some pretty, snow-white sheep,
That bounded o'er a low stone wall
And down a grassy steep.

And I like to lie and think of them,
And watch them as they go
Over the wall and down the hill,
Their fleeces white as snow.

How fast, and yet how still, they go;
I count fast as I can,
For as many as I count I'll own
When I'm a grown-up man.

I count them bounding o'er the wall—
I think that's eleven, or ten;
But Mamma says I must count fair,
So I'll begin again.

One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight—
My pretty woolly sheep—
Nine, ten,—the first I know
I find I'm fast asleep.

THEY WEAR VEILS.

The oddest things to be seen in the streets of Colorado Springs are horses decked with veils. We have grown accustomed to the jaunty little hats worn by many horses in our towns to protect them from the heat of the sun. We can even see an umbrella fastened over their heads without surprise, but a veil gives to the noble beast a dandyish look that is very droll. Some of these veils, belonging to fine saddles, are mere fringes of fine strips of leather that hang before the eyes; others are pieces of mosquito netting drawn tightly back and fastened like a lady's nose veil; but the most stylish and altogether effective are of netting drawn over a hoop which holds it away from the eyes, yet completely protects them. These exaggerated goggles give the gravest horse a waggish look. The veils are not worn for fashion's sake. They are indeed a stern necessity, and the comfort, if not even the life, of the horse demands it. Colorado, with all its great attractions, has one plague—the plague of flies. Flies of all sizes, from the least up to the enormous blue-bottle, are everywhere. Most parts of his body the horse can himself protect if not deprived of his tail, but his eyes he cannot, and these delicate organs are special objects of attack by the fly tribe. It is the least a man can do to provide a protecting veil for his most faithful servant.

Notes from the field

Chicago, Ill.—Among recent visitors at the World's Fair have been a number of liberal ministers from a distance, including W. R. Alger of New York, A. W. Martin of the Tacoma Free Church, J. T. Sunderland of Ann Arbor, editor of the Unitarian, Misses Marian Murdock and Florence Buck, the new pastors of the Cleveland Unitarian Church, who are en route from Oxford, England, to Miss Murdock's home in the West, Rev. A. M. Judy of Davenport, Iowa, Rev. W. I. Nichols of Philadelphia, Pa., Rev. C. A. Staples of Lexington, Mass., Rev. Dr. Thomas Kerr of Rockford, Ill., Rev. Joseph Wassall of Windsor, Vt., and Rev. E. M. Wilbur of Portland, Oregon.

Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones preached at the World's Fair last Sunday afternoon on "Character."

New York, N. Y.—The Baron de Hirsch Trade School for the benefit, primarily, of Jewish immigrants, is doing an admirable work, is full to overflowing, and has at the same time the hearty support of employers and trade unions, with which it co-operates.

England.—In last week's paper we had occasion to suggest the advantages of substitution over prohibition as promotive of temperance. Mr. Joseph Bentley, at the World's Congress on Temperance, read a paper from which we quote the following: "Its rapid growth may be judged by the amount of capital which it is estimated is invested in coffee-houses, temperance restaurants, and hotels in Great Britain and Ireland. The sum probably exceeds two millions of pounds sterling, the number of establishments 7,000, and the persons directly employed 56,000."

"The work is mainly carried on by joint-stock companies incorporated on the limited liability principle, and managed by directors of high character, representing all sections of society, politics, and religion. Most of these companies pay a uniform dividend of ten per cent. per annum on the invested capital, besides making ample provision for repairs, renewals, and depreciation; in many cases also setting apart a substantial sum out of the profits to be divided among the employes as bonus. The average dividend paid, as far as can be ascertained, has been about eight per cent."

"Evening attractions are made a special study. Newspapers and periodicals are on the tables a piano is a requisite piece of furniture; in some cases concerts, entertainments, and debates are arranged. Games of skill, such as chess, draughts, and billiards, are provided and encouraged; for here they can be practiced apart from drink, gambling, profanity, and bad company, with which they are too often associated elsewhere."

Once more UNITY has taken another step forward. And still it is one of many short and feeble steps which have characterized its fifteen years of life. Never much ahead, but always a little better. By this change of dress and increase of size we have greatly added to the expense of publication.

The new company was confronted with this problem: In order to justify this additional expense it must either double the price of subscription, which would then leave it only two-thirds the cost of the journals with which it is compared, and with which it shares a place in the current religious literature of our country; or, to keep it still at the old price and double the number of subscribers within a reasonable time. The company has ventured on this last undertaking. We confidently turn to our subscribers to help us realize this. Only by so doubling can the strain, both financial and editorial, be reduced to its proper limit, and the advance be justly maintained. Over one hundred and fifty new subscribers have been received during the last month while UNITY was at its shabbiest. Give us a Columbian lift. Let old subscriptions be paid and parishes canvassed. Special inducements to agents will be given on correspondence. Subscriptions $1 per annum. Send all remittances to

"Let us speak plain: there is more force in names

Than most men dream of; and a lie may keep

Its throne a whole age longer, if it skulk.

Behind the shield of some fair-seeming name.

Let us call tyrants TYRANTS, and maintain

That only freedom comes by grace of God, And all that comes not by His grace must fall;

For men in earnest have no time to waste In patching fig-leaves for the naked truth."

—James Russell Lowell.

BIGOTRY, a hateful thing, is a heavenly virtue compared with hypocrisy. Bigotry is a stunted tree, alive, stalwart, gnarled, but strong. Hypocrisy is rotten wood, whose phosphorescent glow is a deception born out of decay and dampness.

We call attention to the advertisement of the Western S. S. Institute in this issue, and to the program of the Weirs grove meeting contained in our Notes from the Field.

ONE of the leading independent ministers in the West writes concerning the coming Parliament of Religions: "It will be worth a pilgrimage to Chicago to hear men of all lands and religions sing together. I hope to be there."

**

IF the press reports are true, that the "satisfaction" of Dr. Talmage's church debt was effected by paying only twenty-three cents on the dollar, we do not wonder that the secular papers are full of sneers. We trust that there is a misunderstanding. Otherwise we can but agree with those who denounce this dishonest financiering as a disgrace to congregation and pastor.

WE take pleasure in announcing that the Woman's Tribune was in error as to the action of the Atlanta ladies in reference to the contribution of fallen women to their Magdalen's home. Last week's Tribune corrects the mistake, and from it we learn that the little these poor women did contribute was reverently received. We make the announcement here because in the issue of June 22 we commented in this column upon the supposed rejection of this offered help.

NOW THAT there will be no danger of anybody seeing them on Sunday, we suppose that our Methodist friends and their immediate orthodox neighbors in the Liberal Arts exhibit at the World's Fair will uncover their Bibles and hymn books on Sunday. While human eyes were there to see, these gospel tools were concealed for fear they might contaminate the soul. Are the days of tithing the mint, anise, and cumin passed?

THE last week's Congress of Letters, divided into the departments of Philology, Folk-lore, Library and Literature, proved to be the most interesting and popular held since the first flocking of the women on the introductory week. One competent to judge pronounced President Angell's paper on the "Recognition of Diplomats by Historians," alone, worth going a hundred miles to hear. It showed the want of a just recognition of the diplomatist by the historians who are still too busy with the generals and the cannon. It was a grand plea for arbitration of international difficulties, the next great step in civilization.

OSCAR NEEBE was known to have been somewhat of a social agitator in sympathy with anarchy, though not present at the Haymarket outrage when the dynamite bomb was wickedly thrown. For this he was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment by the State. Now that he is released the same State grants him, for a money consideration, the privilege of keeping a saloon, where he will daily pass over his counter liquid dynamite, destructive at once to the tissues of the body and the moral sanity of the individual, and the State. It is easy to see that the latter dynamite is a far more dangerous element in society than the former. Is it the suddenness of the dynamite that makes it horrible? Is it right to use it if it is only sufficiently diluted so that its work is slow, imperceptible, but none the less sure in its fell destruction? Oscar Neebe is now more than ever before a dangerous element in society, and now the city of Chicago and State of Illinois have legitimized his business with a license.

THE assembling of the new Congress will bring again to the front some searching questions. It will be or ought to be a momentous session. We trust it will avoid, if not correct, some of the unwholesome mistakes of probably the most blundering Congress in the history of the United States. Judged by their effects in disturbing the public peace, unsettling the harmony, and interfering with the prosperity and progress of the country, the last Congress has transmitted to the incoming Congress at least four great and humiliating blunders, viz.: The McKinley high tariff bill, the Geary Chinese outrage, the silver bill, which satisfied nobody and defeated all policies, and that meddlesome ante-election piety bill, wherein, swayed by political ambition, profane and irreligious people became pious even to the extent of constitutional violations when they passed their Sunday-closing clause, after withdrawing their liquor prohibition clause, in the World's Fair appropriation bill. Subsequent events show that these legislators, creatures of a public vote, counted the voting power of orthodoxy more carefully than the Directory of the World's Fair. Let the new Congress correct these blunders and wipe away these shames from the national statute books, and it will make itself famous as its predecessor made itself infamous.

We are in receipt of two earnestly controversial communications concerning our editorial note upon the pardon of the anarchist prisoners by Gov. Altgeld; the first written, as the author admits, while he was "red-hot" over what he considers the unwholesome and unjustifiable attack of the papers of nearly every description upon the Governor for this act of belated justice. The other correspondent also writes warmly, protesting against the opinions advanced in our note. He regarded them as flavored with arrogance, inasmuch as they presume to pass judgment upon those who were more competent to judge of matters involved than the editor. He also thinks that to criticize the action of those in authority and in position of trust is itself anarchistic in its tendency. We have declined to publish both articles, simply because we do not desire to give our space to discussions for which the daily and weekly press make more than ample room. These antagonistic communications show how widely honest men differ—how slowly is clearness evolved on the great questions of state and society. As for our own position, we are glad to be understood, or, if necessary, to be misunderstood, in this matter. We greatly regretted the hanging of the anarchists, and were diligent in our protest from first to last, not because we believed them guiltless, but because we believed that one crime does not justify another. Still less was it because we sympathized with the mad philosophy that has any apostolic uses for dynamite bombs. We believe that the social compact called government is the high fruit of evolution. It has come to stay. And the well being of the individual is inseparably connected with the solidity and sanctity of the state. And again we say that we are glad the three remaining convicts are once more at large because we think the safety of the individual and the state is not endangered thereby. We know of no reason why anyone should be locked behind prison bars except for the protection of life and property and for the reformation of the prisoner himself. Vengeance is not for man. The law of retribution will have its way whether the law breaker is within or without prison gates.

THE PIOUS BOYCOTT SUCCEEDS.

Last week, by a vote of 24 to 4, the Directory of the World's Fair rescinded their Sunday opening resolution, and returned to the six-day arrangement. Their reason for this action was purely financial. They found that it did not pay, although forty thousand were on the ground the Sunday previous to the vote. They accepted as real the argument of the clergymen that memorialized them, the substance of which was that the orthodox world was staying away, and that they proposed to stay away.

This was to be expected. It was what the Directory bargained for, and they ought to have foreseen the struggle and been prepared to meet it. We regret what seems to us a too easy surrender of a right principle. We do not believe that four Sundays was an adequate experiment. We do not believe that all the high expedencies and legitimate tests were tried. It is the history of all strikes and boycotts that they reach their maximum at the outset. Their clock strikes twelve at the beginning and then runs down. In this back-down of the directory we see a backward step, a violation of the true Chicago spirit, which overcomes instead of avoiding obstacles. We fear that they are reckoning without their host if they trust these "millions" of the orthodox host who have been once more voted en bloc by the resolutions of a few clergymen. We think it would have been better policy as well as better principle for them to have thrown the gates of Jackson Park wide open on Sunday, free of any charge, rather than to have thus denied the natural rights of men to the entire privileges of the art and nature there centered.

But we are not disposed to judge the Directory harshly. They defied a strong public sentiment and conventional religion in the interests of the rational and the spiritual thing for over two months of the Fair time. Some of us who have to give our lives to the maintenance of principles that "do not pay" knew better than they did themselves what contentment they had in store for them. If they have surrendered to the most gigantic boycott known in history (if these ministers are right, over two million Christians conspired to defeat the Fair by staying away not only on Sunday but every day in the week) earlier than they would have done had it been their own business, it is because they were burdened with a public trust, the many-sided success of which it is their duty to secure if possible.

While regretting their action, and doubting even their judgment, we thank them for the high venture. They displayed for a short time an independence of church and clergy for conscience and judgment's sake, which is hopeful for the religion of reason and science. And we propose to lend our energies and influence, in the future, as in the past, toward arousing the public mind to a sense of the high spiritual and educational value of this Fair. For ourselves we are glad of six days' opportunity at what is worthy of seven days' appreciation and study.

But certain reflections crowd upon us. This boycott shows how solid, stalwart, and ponderous is Protestant "orthodoxy" in America. It is organized, determined, dogmatic, with the earnestness that always characterizes bigotry. This earnestness is the one redeeming feature of an otherwise wholly disagreeable attitude of mind. With lamentable consistency the church again has arrayed itself solidly against the forces of cosmopolitanism, culture, and progress. Theology has once more assumed the role of antagonism to science and art, and has tried to justify this antagonism by an appeal to the supernatural and to what it calls "Revelation."

Another thing is manifest: The clergy of this type of religion have been found following, not leading, the procession. The so-called "Liberal Orthodox"—the many cultivated and eloquent gentlemen who in their own lives are known to be hospitable to science and literature, readers of Emerson and Darwin, lovers of the arts—have stood by, with scarcely an exception, without a word of protest, while Bigotry has been calling down the calamities of flood, fire, and pestilence upon this fairest outcome of human civilization of to-day, because its management would not be party to their confusion of Sabbath and Sunday, of Mosaic and sociological regulations. Hundreds of the so-called "Liberal Orthodox" ministers known to have been in sympathy with a rational use of the Sunday have bowed silently before this stupid piety, accepting a public opinion in their churches which it might have been for them to change and re-form on higher lines. In all this discussion it is apparent that the so-called Liberal tendency inside of Orthodoxy is an intellectual movement wanting an heroic conscience back of it. It is made up of people with opinions, but without the courage of their opinions.

This triumph of mere numbers, this success won by the bludgeon marked with a $ mark, will set back in many places throughout our land the rational use of the Sunday, which calls for open libraries, art galleries, museums and parks, high concerts and noble lectures, twenty-five years. It will take the courage more than ever out of the man in the Orthodox pulpit who has been half persuaded that he not only ought to think certain advanced ideas but to preach them. It has widened the chasm between culture and organized religion. The number of men who will pay their money to support the church they do not believe in, in order to justify their own conscience in staying at home and taking no interest in any church, will be greatly increased.

The last lesson learned in this connection is a reproach to the so-called Liberal people of the United States. The non-orthodox elements in the community, including, on this question, the Catholic and a large percentage of the Lutheran churches, have shown the weakness that goes with unorganized masses. Not until the Liberal people put a religious fervor into their liberality, not until rational religion becomes enthusiastic, and science becomes an inspiration in the field of natural religion, not until our wealthy men will put their millions at the service of the new, the free church that they do believe in, rather than at the service of the old, the closed church which they do not believe in, will we be safe from these perplexing and discouraging breaks in the onward march.

Jackson Park, with its vision of beauty, which, in a few weeks more will have vanished into air, is no longer available as a Sunday-sanctifying influence. The beauty of its art galleries is denied the prayer accents of the Sunday worship which it could not have failed to inspire. But the lesson of this effort remains. The final arguments of orthodoxy to-day, as revealed in the history of this agitation, has been numbers and dollars; by these has it conquered. How far these are witnesses to justice, to truth, or to piety, time will tell. Meanwhile let all lovers of the light continue to seek truth in the inward parts, and to spread the light of science and the warmth of human love everywhere, that we may have seven-day piety, and make art and science sacramental. Let us keep on the move. Let wealth and culture combine to do for mankind what superstition and bigotry are trying to do, but what they cannot accomplish.

SOLDIERS' WIDOWS.

It is of course very unpatriotic to say a word against soldiers' pensions, and very ungallant to utter any suspicions concerning their widows. But the latter at least seem sufficiently protected by pension agents and politicians, so that the facts may be stated fearlessly.

The war of 1812 ended eighty years ago,—so long that there are said to be only 165 of its soldiers now surviving as beneficiaries. But, according to an article in the last Forum, 6,600 widows are still drawing pensions for that war,—that is, forty times as many as the surviving soldiers. The conclusion would seem to be that most of these women were not very seriously wasted and worn out by the privations and sufferings of that war eighty years ago, or by their subsequent toils in taking care of the veterans. And though we would not breathe a suspicion that they married these veterans from any but the most disinterested and tenderest feelings, still these figures seem to prove that there is no other position so conducive to long life and apparent prosperity as that of a soldier's widow.

This conclusion is still further enforced by the pension reports of the revolutionary war. That war ended about one hundred and ten years ago; but, according to the World Almanac, twenty-two widows are still drawing pensions for it. This almanac is also kind enough to give their respective ages, from which it appears that the oldest of them was not born until ten years after the war was over, and at least six of them were not born until thirty years after it was over. Whether it was passion or pity or the pension that moved these tender-hearted maidens to marry men more than fifty years older than themselves, history does not say; but the figures are prophetic. For if the same principles continue to work, then there are many babes in their cradles to-day, and even yet unborn, who will be drawing pensions during a large part of the twentieth century for the privations and agonies they endured from our civil war, which ended thirty years before they saw the light.

And the facts seem to indicate that these principles do continue unchecked and are even encouraged in our times. For several years after our late war few people thought of getting pensions, and during Grant's administration pensions were reduced and many suspended. So late as 1878 they cost the country less than thirty million dollars a year, and in 1880 President Garfield thought their highest point had been reached. But as the disabled veterans and their wives died, the pensioners increased, and so rapidly that they now number nearly a million, and over a million claims are now pending before the pension bureau, while the pension costs of 1878 have since multiplied more than six-fold. "In 1892," says the article in the June Forum, "the country was roused to the character of the legislation under which half a million dollars a day were distributed on account of the war that closed nearly thirty years before. For the first time it awoke to the fact that our peace establishment for pension purposes was a greater financial burden to us than is the expense involved in keeping a great army on a war footing to any of the great powers of Europe. The item was one which from its extraordinary character admitted of no comparison—the largest single appropriation ever made for government expenditure on the face of the globe." The same writer says "among the pensioners are now known to be thousands of impersonators of brave men under whose names they have skulked; perjurers who have magnified or forged bodily ailments, or who have attributed to the service injuries and diseases known to have been received or contracted elsewhere; 'relicts' who never knew the soldiers in whose names they ask relief; 'pension jumpers' of both sexes who are drawing two, three, or more pensions at once under different names; and, lastly, and in increasing numbers, widows who were born after the war." It is to be hoped that the magnitude to which this evil has grown will arouse the nation to end or at least check it. We would encourage a very generous policy toward our soldiers' widows who are yet unborn, and toward those who were born during the first twenty years after the close of the war, but we would also remember the rights of the rest of the people.

H. M. S.

FROM a private letter of Miss Helen G. Putnam's, our Dakota missionary of the liberal faith, we quote the following. Are we to suppose that Mr. Cook regards Unitarianism as one of the seven wonders of the world?

I was much amused and amazed yesterday to learn what pains Rev. Joseph Cook took in March last to abuse Unitarians to Wessington Springs people. One woman had the courage of her convictions and spoke to him after his lecture, telling him that she was a Unitarian, whereupon he tried to wriggle out of what he had said, but she was evidently ready for him. He had a good deal of condemnation for Theodore Parker, although he claimed that there was no compilation of his works and that his influence was fast dying out. More in the same line. He declared the Unitarian cause to be one of little or no use in the elevation of humanity, and that to orthodox Christianity was due all the progress of the age. Considering his low estimate of Unitarians and their "ism" I could not exactly see why he should refer to them at all. The subject of his lecture was "The Seven Modern Wonders of the World."

CREEDS OR DEEDS.

Once, seeking Truth, I wholly lost my way,
Rocked back and forward by the swinging tides
Of doubt and hope; confused by many guides,
Each one armed with a doctrine and a creed
Which each felt safe to say
Would meet and satisfy my every need.

One claimed that Jesus was the Son of God,
And one denied that he was more than man,
One scented wrath in the salvation plan,
One dwelt upon its mercy and its love,
One threatened with the rod,
One wooed me with the sweetness of a dove.

And whether souls were foreordained to bliss,
And whether Faith or Works were meant to save,
And whether judgment lay beyond the grave,
And Love with pardoning power went down to hell—
Whether that road or this Led up to Heaven's Gate, I could not tell.

Amid the dust of theologic strife
I hungered with a want unsatisfied;
Heaven while I lived, not Heaven when I died,
Was what I craved; and how to make sublime
And beautiful my life
While yet I lingered on the shores of time.

To judgment swift my guides in doctrine came:
Which one lived out the royal truths he preached?
Which one loved justice, and ne'er overreached
His weaker brother? Which himself forgot,
To press another's claim?
Alas! alas! I sought, but found him not:

And wept and railed because religion seemed
Only the thin ascending smoke of words.
The jangling rude of inharmonious chords,
Until—my false inductions to disprove—
Across my vision streamed
The glory of a life aflame with love:

One who was silent while his brethren taught,
And showed me not the beauties of his creed.

But went straight onward, sowing precious seed
That made the waste and desert places glad;
Whose hand in secret brought
Comfort and healing to the worn and sad.

Aglow, I cried, "Here all my questionings end;

Oh, what is thy religion—thy belief?"
Smiling, he shook his head with answer brief—

This man, so swift to act, so slow to speak—

"In deeds, not creeds, my friend, Lives the religion that I humbly seek."

Spake he again—the man of deeds not creeds,

Seeing the toils in which my soul was caught—

"But know this truth, dear comrade: it is not

What you shall do, but what you love to do—

The spirit of your deeds—
That brings the grace of heaven near to you."

And soft across my sea of trouble stole
The light and peace which I had vainly sought—

Keep thou the tender grace I have not—

In ministering unto another's need
Leave me to lose my soul;

And in Love's service let me write my creed.

—A. L. M., in The New Earth.

A RABBI HONORED.

In these days of rampant anti-Semitism, it is pleasant to record an incident that took place early in the present month at Salzburg, in the Oberpfalz (Bavaria). On the 4th inst., Dr. M. Loewenmayer, District Rabbi, celebrated his eightieth birthday, and the event was officially recognized by the Prince Regent, who conferred on him the Michael order. The entire population, Jews, Protestants and Catholics, the clergy of every denomination, the Burgomaster and Municipal Council and societies participated in the fete given the aged rabbi, who has held the office for fifty-five years. The whole town was gayly decorated, and all business was suspended. The decoration was publicly presented to the rabbi by Regierungsrath Roder, who impressed on Dr. Loewenmayer the fact that he attended not only as a Royal Commissary but also as a personal friend. The Roman Catholic priest Felsenstein addressed his Jewish colleagues in a hearty speech, brimful of the most fraternal sentiments.

—The Occident.

MOTHER. NATURE. THE COM-PORTER.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole." For any one who would rise above despondency, God has placed plenty of helps at his command. He to whom sorrow and trial has made the world seem only deathful and worthless, can walk forth on a spring morning and feel himself rejuvenated with the quickening of nature. We hardly realize to what an extent we may find solace and strength in the acceptance of nature's joyousness as our own. For the gray days of life the sky is blue; for him who can not sing the birds give voice; and for the deadened spirit all things are a quiver with breathing and growing. A woman who had suffered unfairness and consequent loss at the hands of another, wrote to a friend: "Things hurt me dreadfully at the time, but I never let it rankle long. What is the use? The world is so beautiful that I won't have it spoiled just by people; and, moreover, it is spring-time, and who can bear malice in spring?" Who shall say that God does not give us external nature for our own to help us through our trials? It is a fine and noble thing to say that we will sing with the birds, we will grow with the leaf, we will shine with the sun—let men be what they may. —S. S. Times.

THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH.

There is a recasting of the lines going on in our own day; there is unrest in the church. The thin edge of the wedge of criticism and independent thought is forcing an entrance there, and the liberals, as we have said, are already in touch. The restoration and the revival of the religious spirit of mankind will take place. Shall it be a reinstatement of the old forms of worship? Shall it be a rehabilitation of the old edifice toward the crumbling of which the sciences have done so much? Surely not. The Church of God will be built, but it will not be that of creed or sect or race, but the temple of humanity, around whose altars all of God's children shall be gathered without distinction, all who believe in righteousness and justice, purity and loving kindness. We do not know whether men shall build domes with spires that tower to the clouds, whether organ peal and the chime of bells shall awake the religious sentiment in the soul of the man of the future, but we do know that the lessons of righteousness, as taught by all of God's great prophets, shall never be lost to mankind.

—Rabbi Sale, in the Non-Sectarian.

"AM I A UNIVERSALIST?"

This question has come to me of late so often, I thought I would try to answer it. For more than fifteen years I have considered myself a sound believer in that doctrine, and often said, in speaking of its progress, and what it has done in speaking and in modifying other beliefs: "We have done this and that and the other." We—Well, let's see what we have done. I mean myself. I could better tell by showing what I have not done. When I think of the joy, the unspeakable glory, found in a firm faith in this doctrine, I feel I have done nothing, and judged by the rule, 'show me your faith by my works,' I would not stand the test; I am unworthy the name.

In going back over my life, coming up through joy and sadness, sickness and health, through clouds and sunshine, the sweetest, brightest hopes, the most strengthening joy, the golden glory of life comes to me through faith in the dear God whose mercy extendeth over all his works. Yet (I speak it with shame-facedness) I have done less for the cause than for almost anything else. I have talked more of politics, or making money, a thousand times, than in telling of God's goodness and everlasting mercy. I have spent more for tobacco than I ever gave to spread the "great tidings." I have failed to live that pure life every Universalist should live, if he walks in harmony with what they believe. I have not given our paper (The Herald) the support it deserves—in short, I am "weighed in the balance and found wanting." Like David (Psalms 119, 59, 60), I have been thinking on "my ways," and intend to do better. The greatest evil in the world is not that a man has sinned or been a failure somewhere along the line of life, but that he will persist in his failures and sins. David was a great sinner, guilty of the most grievous offense, and justly condemned for the same, yet a more sublime character is hardly found in the catalogue of great men. And why? Because after he thought on his ways, he turned his feet unto "thy testimonies, and made haste and delayed not to keep thy com andments." Well, that's all God wants us to do. We can do it. We ought to do it. Our cause pleads for it, the life of the community needs it, and heaven would rejoice in it. I, for one, see my sins, confess my wrongdoings, and, by God's grace, intend to do better.

A young man said to me, not long ago: "I am a Universalist, I believe all men will some time get to heaven." To which I replied: "You are a married man, are you not?" "Oh, no, sir," he said. "You believe in marriage?" "Yes, with all my heart." Now, said I, you are no more a Universalist because you believe in it than you are a married man when you believe in marriage. Your simply believing in matrimony by no means makes you a married man; nor does your belief in Universalism make you a Universalist. If a man who had never farmed any was to tell me he was a farmer, and had no other reason than that he believed in it, I could not believe him. But if he took me to his fields and barns and showed me growing grain and full cribs, then I would say he means what he says, just so. Now, brother, what do you say? The Book is right when it says, "Show me your faith by your works;" and if all who profess to be Universalists would live so that they could be known by their deeds our cause would prosper to the surprise of all. May God help us all. May God help us all to live the life of the godly.—V. M. Tumlin, in Universalist Herald.

LIFE'S BLESSINGS.

How many beauteous things we have to bless,
While all the days in changing round appear,
What wondrous joys like blossoms fill the year
And with their perfumed breath our souls caress!
I count, and see that they are numberless;
A hundred smiles for sigh or falling tear:
A hundred joys offset a single fear.
Our life is born to grow in happiness!
Consider how the home may Eden reach;
How toil for bread can be a song of love;
Think how the arts of painting, music, speech,
Are life's strong ties and its endurance prove;
As sunshine in the heart of summer fair,
The goodness of our God beams everywhere!

THE ATLANTA PROBLEM.

EDITOR UNITY:
UNITY of June 22 quoted, with comment, an article from The Woman's Tribune reflecting somewhat severely on the action of the Atlanta women, who, wishing to found a home for erring women, felt constrained to refuse a gift of $1,000, when they discovered that it came from "the dissolute women of the town." While, on the whole, the action of the Atlanta women seems unwise, is it not unfair to jump to the conclusion that it was "Pharisaical"? May they not have felt (with all charity toward the women offering this gift) they dare not make themselves part and parcel in the unholy traffic by which the money was earned? They dared not use the wages of sin, even while feeling all tender sympathy for these poor sinners trying to save some of their sisters from their own awful fate. This should be said in fairness to the good women of Atlanta. But what should they have done? Their attitude toward the special evil involved could not be questioned; on this point there was no new need for testimony; so they were in no danger of weakening their work by the acceptance of this gift. This fund should not be accepted and treated like any common donation; it should be taken and used with special recognition—tender yet regretful—of its source; and it should be used for some portion of the work—a library, perhaps—to be labeled as a gift of those who, knowing to the uttermost this horror, would save others from their fate. Would not such action bless both givers and receivers? By this course all suspicion of Pharisaical virtue would be disarmed and no needless blow dealt to these poor souls. Let us women save a part at least of our horror of this sin for the men who choose self-gratification at the cost of degradation and untold suffering to their and our sisters,—and spend more of our charity on these poor women!

Here is another case where the principle is, perhaps, the same, and where there is more need to apply it closely.

A church, which has the usual struggle to make both ends meet, has a legacy of $500 from a good man who has made much of his money by a distillery. Which of three courses of action shall this church take?

1. Shall the church, which is supposed to exist,—in part, at least,—to undo the work which whisky does,—shall the church accept for its own uses money earned in a business which contributes directly to the saloon, the closest partner and most prolific purveyor to this other social evil of which we have just been speaking?

2. Or shall the church accept this money and use it for temperance work, as such?

3. Or shall it say, "While we respect the memory of this man, who engaged in this business believing it to be right, and gratefully appreciate his gift to us, we cannot take it. We would not reflect on his integrity, but we dare not use, even to do good with it, the profits of this traffic in men's souls. Not that we all believe the use or manufacture of liquor in any way or fashion to be entirely wrong, but because the abuse of it has grown to such fearful proportions, has become so great a menace to the social weal, that we see at present no other safe and true way than to stand absolutely apart from it."

Which of these three ways should a church choose?
M. T. L. G.

[Our correspondent will perhaps remember that we were careful to condition our censure by the words, "If the motive which actuated them be that supposed by the writer in the Woman's Tribune" (giving the article from the Tribune in another column). We are glad to learn that the supposed event never occurred; but had the good women of Atlanta refused the contribution from this source because it represented the wages of sin and shame, the writer of the note to which our correspondent refers still thinks that the term Pharisaism would rightly describe such conduct. "Pharisaism" is often used as identical with hypocrisy, and Webster (and probably the other lexicographers) give hypocrisy as a secondary meaning. For that reason the writer ought perhaps to say that he did not use the word in this secondary sense, which seems to him unfair to the Pharisee. Surely the Pharisee was not necessarily a hypocrite, but he was one for whom the form had obscured the substance. For him holiness took the place of righteousness; (ceremonial) purity was more than love. He would not touch that which was unclean although good might come of it. It seems to the assistant editor but just to believe that some of the Pharisees were in a large measure pure-minded as well as pure-bodied; but that did not prevent them from being Pharisees. And so, it seems to him, the women who refuse "the wages of sin" for such a purpose, and the "temperance" church which refuses the liquor dealer's contribution, are Pharisaical, however conscientious they or it may be in the matter. As to the three alternatives presented by our correspondent, the writer has no hesitation in preferring the first to the third, and thus hallowing the wealth, however come by; and he would say the same if the gift came not from a distiller but from a saloon-keeper. Even as "not that which entereth into the mouth defileth the man," so it is not the ultimate source of that which we receive innocently which consecrates or defiles us, but the use we make of it. The contrary view is Pharisaical. In such cases, it seems to the writer that we may safely follow the example of our great religious teacher, the gentle Nazarene, who gratefully accepted the offering of the "woman which was a sinner."—F. The Study Table

STUDIES IN BROWNING.*

A helpful book for the new initiate in Browning's world, and by no means uninteresting to the older student. The author does not attempt too much, and performs all that he promises. Though he at times seems to grasp the finer rather than the larger meaning, he succeeds in revealing to us the soul of the man behind the poetic forms and figures, and we realize more fully the debt that pure religion owes to the reactionary influence of Browning, who insisted on the personal and the spiritual, though retaining the flavor of conservatism that the twentieth century will reject.

The book divides naturally into the six chapters. Chapter I. deals with "Literary Life," combining a brief biographical sketch with the chronology of his poems, showing how they reflect the development of the man.

Chapter II., dealing with "Religion and Ethics," together with the succeeding chapter on "Poems on Religion," makes the most interesting part of the book. In one place he says: "To Browning man's spiritual being is the center around which facts of nature and events of history move, by which they are explained, from which they receive illumination. Until we realize this these poems must be dark riddles to us." And again: "One reason why Browning regards the external world as subordinate to conscious man, is the grand discovery that every fraction of power is subservient to the purposes of eternal wisdom and the destinies of infinite love. Power in itself is not divine: it may be feared, it cannot be worshiped. Unless the secret of the world be LOVE, man is more godlike than a whole universe of force. For, as he finely says:

"A loving worm, within its clod,
Were diviner than a loveless God
Amidst his worlds."

And on the ethical side he says: "On many occasions Browning thinks that what goes by the name of duty is merely a social conventional-ity, with no divine authority to control the living energies of a man's inner life. The mighty reserves of a divine soul may be wasted on the shallow levels of a monotonous conformity." But "the traditional precept must only be denied under the diviner stress of pure aspiration and holy passion; 'the only right of rebellion is the right to seek a higher law.'"

Under Poems on Religion, "Christmas Eve" and "Easter Day" are presented, with argument, extract, and comment.

The remaining chapters treat of "Poems on Love," "Poems on Art," and "Dramatic Poems." Under the latter "Pippa Passes" and "The Return of the Druses" are presented.

The book will enable one who has felt himself shut out from an appreciation of Browning to cross the threshold, and, though but one of many, it must ultimately find its way into the libraries of all lovers of the great humanist poet. G. B. P.

"TOOLS AND THE MAN." By Washington Gladden. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 12mo., pp. 308; $1.25.—This book may well be considered as a companion piece to N. P. Gilman's "Socialism and the American Spirit," issued from the same press at about the same time and reviewed at some length in this department. Of the two books, that of Gilman is far more scientific, though disclosing the bias due to previous special study; while that of Gladden might be called sympathetic, revealing a broad, or possibly second-hand, reading, rather than a profound study. Each chapter represents a lecture in a course delivered in November and December of 1892, before the Meadville Theological School, in accordance with the terms of the endowment of "The Adin Ballou Lectureship of Practical Christian Sociology," and this fact may in a measure account for the application of the limiting adjective "Christian" to everything that Mr. Gladden considers desirable or commendable. The reputation of the author will doubtless bring the book into the hands of many who will, through a perusal of its pages, see many things from a different visual angle; and in so far as it acts as a solvent of prejudice it has a high mission. The book contains much faulty logic and not a few misleading and inaccurate statements, the attempted criticism of "Scientific Socialism" being especially anachronistic, due no doubt to the fact that the lectures were prepared several years ago; and it is here, too, that the weakness of the appeal to "authority" rather than to "facts" is made manifest. A comparison of the chapters on "Scientific Socialism" and "Christian Socialism" cannot fail to touch the humorous sensibilities of American socialists. But as a whole the book is instructive and timely, and no one would quarrel with its spirit, though its prophet author has seen no vision of a time when employer and employe have become merely historic terms.

MCQUAKER TRUST LECTURES, SECOND SERIES. By Philip H. Wicksteed, J. Estlin Carpenter and John Page Hopps. Introduction by James Forrest. London: British and Foreign Unitarian Ass'n, Essex Hall. Cloth, 12 mo., 88 pp.; 2s.—The lecture on "The Jesus of the Gospels and the Jesus of History," by J. Estlin Carpenter, having been presented to the readers of UNITY in the issues of April 13 and 20, no comment is needed here; and it is perhaps enough to say that the other two lectures—on "Old and New Conceptions of the Bible," by Wicksteed, and "Incarnations of God," by Hopps—maintain the same scholarly and critical yet reverent attitude towards all that has ever inspired the devotions of men. The introduction, by Forrest, presents some interesting facts concerning the "liberalizing tendency" in Scottish religious circles. He makes much of the "omissions" in the latest volume of one of the ablest of the Free Church (not of the Tacoma genus) professors, Dr. A. B. Bruce, and the change in the method of apologetics indicated thereby. He quotes Dr. Bruce as saying that "miracles cannot be offered as evidences of Christianity with the confidence with which they were employed formerly. Men do not now believe in Christ because of his miracles; they rather believe in the miracles because they have first believed in Christ." The lectures are popularly condensed and of interest to the general reader.

MAGAZINES.

WORTHINGTON'S MAGAZINE for July contains several good articles, notably Eliza Calvert Hall's excellent essay on the poetry of Henry Timrod, which contains some beautiful selections from the works of this neglected Southern poet. The illustrations add much to the interest of Mrs. Rudd's article on "Some Phases of Life in the Tyrol," which contains much in small compass. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells' article on "Snobbishness" has a more delicate appreciation of the point of view of the snob than most critics display, and for that reason is much fairer and more worth reading. Its purpose is not to say something smart, but to study the phenomena.

THE UNITARIAN for July is an excellent number. The Rev. C. F. Dole's sermon on "Moral Faith or Courage," Rev. W. H. Ramsay's paper on "Unity Guilds," and also his essay on "Church Sociability," and the editor's advice as to the conduct of services during the summer are all admirable. The magazine also contains an interesting chapter from Mr. Sunderland's new book on the "Origin and Growth of the Bible."

AN INSTALLATION SERMON.*

BY REV. W. W. FENN.

"And the Lord had respect unto Abel and his offering, but unto Cain and his offering he had not respect."

Why? What can have been the principle of discrimination? Although the question has been discussed so often that it may seem like a fruitless pounding of old straw to bring it up again, theologians have had such a way of whacking the wrong end of the straw in biblical matters that even in the time-yellowed sheaves that have lain for centuries upon the the much-befailed threshing floor, there may be still the grain by which a man may live, seed for the sower and bread for the eater.

Study of the Bible as literature has inspired us with profound respect for the unique religious genius of the Jewish people and given us a settled conviction that no thought of theirs concerning God and man's relations to him can be wholly astray. As in a great author, the very sentences which are hardest to understand, or perhaps seem at first most certainly false, contain the meat of his thought, his peculiar contribution to the mind store of the world, so the belief or usage of the Hebrews which appears most remote from our sympathies is often found to carry an idea of rich and enduring significance. It is by studying ideas which conflict with our established notions that we grow in knowledge. A man who reads only what falls in with his present thought becomes stationary and bigoted. The very essence of life is the power to assimilate unlike materials. It is not intellectual protection but intellectual suicide to refuse harbor to a strange craft that does not fly the flag of our petty mental principle. Of minds, as of homes, the saying holds: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

Because, therefore, our feeling is so decidedly in favor of Cain's offering as against Abel's, it is worth while to inquire why the Jews ascribed to God the opposite preference. Each offering was appropriate to the manner of life of the worshiper. Abel was a keeper of flocks, Cain was a tiller of the ground. Naturally therefore the one brought the firstling of his flock, and the other the first fruits of the soil. "Thy gift must be a portion of thyself," said Emerson. "Thou must bleed for me. Therefore the poet brings his poem, the shepherd his lamb, the farmer corn, the miner a gem, the sailor corals and shells, the painter a picture, the girl a handkerchief of her own sewing." Judged by this principle, Cain could have brought no other offering than he did, for nothing else would have been so congenial to his life.

Moreover, our repugnance to animal sacrifices is so great that we cannot understand how they can ever have been deemed well pleasing to God.

"His.

What is his high pleasure in
The fumes of scorching flesh and smoking blood
To the pain of the bleating mothers which Still yearn for their dead offspring, or the pangs
Of the sad, ignorant victim underneath
The pious knife? Give way! This bloody record
Shall not stand in the sun to shame creation."

When we think of the sickening sights and sounds that must have accompanied the sacrifices in the temple at Jerusalem, the sweet song of the psalmist seems like bitter irony. "The sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts, my King and my God." Can swallows nest by altars that steam with blood? "A dove-house filled with doves and pigeons

Shudders hell through all its regions;
The lamb misused breeds public strife."

Because of the inhumanity and cruelty of animal sacrifices we marvel that any one of religious insight should have deemed it possible that God should prefer a slain lamb to the fruits of the earth.

Before proceeding further we must notice the popular explanation of this seemingly anomalous preference. It is commonly taught that the chief reason for our preference of Cain's sacrifice, is the very reason why God rejected it—because it was bloodless. This sacrifice of Abel's, we are told, was the beginning of a long line of sacrifices in the Jewish economy, all of which looked forward to the great anti-type on Calvary. The sacrifice by Abel and all the sacrifices that followed it were efficacious because prophetic of the consummate offering upon the Cross of the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world. If the question we are considering were put to the evangelical Christians of this country, of all who have given any thought at all to the subject nine out of ten, I fancy, would give that explanation. Yet is it not written in Hebrews that by faith Abel offered up a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain? His offering was preferred not because there was blood in the sacrifice, but because there was faith in Abel. And even in Genesis it is written that the Lord said unto Cain: "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" Both Calvin and Augustine, whom Dr. Shedd calls the most comprehensive and scientific theologians of Christendom, teach that Abel's offering was acceptable because he himself was acceptable because of his charity. It is pure, clear blood in the worshiper that avails, not the blood that gushes from a slaughtered lamb. Furthermore, the idea of animal sacrifices as representative and typical, and for that reason ordained by God, is contradicted by the express teaching of the prophets of Israel. "I delight not in the blood of bulls or lambs or goats. I desire mercy and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings." The notion that animal offerings are acceptable to God is stated by Micah only to be distinctly rejected. The theory underlying the so-called Levitical legislation of Moses that God instructed his servant concerning sacrifices and ritual is denied by Jeremiah: "I spake not unto your fathers nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of Egypt concerning burnt offerings nor sacrifices, but this thing I commanded them, saying, 'Obey my voice and ye shall be my people.'" Outside of the Levitical legislation, which is of very late date and represents not the winnowed thought of the whole people, which alone contains the revelation of God through Israel, but only the professional opinions of a very small part of the nation, there is not the faintest authority for belief that a sacrificial system was ordained by God as typical of Jesus or that Abel's offering was accepted because it was not without blood and hence prophetic.

Let me state the principle as set forth by Robertson Smith: The idea of communion with the Deity in a sacrificial meal of food was primarily confined to the animal victim, and belongs to the nomadic life, while the proper significance of the cereal offering is that of a tribute paid by the worshiper from the produce of the soil, and this offering arises in the agricultural stage of civilization. This narrative, therefore, represents not merely, as has sometimes been suggested, the conflict between nomads and agriculturists; it represents the conflict between two thoughts of the relation between man and man and man and God, which arise in the two stages of civilization. To make this perfectly clear we must spend a moment over the history of animal sacrifices. In primitive times the slaughter of an animal for food was always a sacrificial act; the whole tribe took part in the sacrifice and in the feast that followed. But there was absolutely no thought of propitiation, and could not be till religion, by becoming a personal instead of a tribal affair, called into being the sense of individual responsibility and sin. Indeed, the ideas of sin and repentance have no place in the joyous festivals of early religion. God is father of the tribe. He joins them in their feasts, a portion is set apart for him, and the great feasts of the tribe are when they have a banquet upon animal food. The fundamental idea, therefore, of the animal sacrifice is communion: communion between man and man, for the tribe joined in the sacrifice and the feast; communion between man and God, for the God of the tribe was one with them, sharing their mirth. But as the agricultural life succeeds the nomadic, the thought of God as the Lord of the land becomes more prominent, and it is felt that a tribute of the first fruits must be paid him as his due. Thus the cereal oblation becomes an individual instead of a tribal affair, and the relation between the man and his God is conceived of as one of contract instead of as communion. Communion between man and man as against individualism; communion between man and God as opposed to compact; these are the conflicting ideas in the animal and the cereal sacrifice.

Whether or not we may accept this as a true interpretation of the legend (and let me remind you again that it is only a conjecture), it has at any rate brought clearly to view two contrasted conceptions of religion and morality which are found even in our own times. Is God the Father of men by virtue of community of nature, or is he sovereign, entering into the fatherly relation only with those who fulfill certain conditions contained in a contract of his making? The theology of the church has been suffused with the idea of commercialism or compact. By reason of sin man owes a great debt to God. But since that sin was committed against an infinite being, the debt incurred must be infinite. A finite being cannot pay an infinite debt, yet the debt must be paid by man, since man has sinned. Therefore, it is needful that there should come the God-man, able to pay the debt because he is man, and the infinite debt because he is God, and save the world from the debtor's prison of eternal punishment.

In one form or another this theory has dominated Christian theology. We are forgiven, not because God is loving and forgiving by nature, not because "God's free mercy streameth over all the world," but because "Jesus paid it all—all to him I owe." Is a debt forgiven when it is paid by another? Is that a free salvation which is purchased at the price of a human life? In the Roman Catholic church there was the heavenly treasury filled with the merits of saints, which could be drawn upon to make good the deficiencies of sinners, or rather to benefit the buyers of indulgences. Protestants kept the heavenly treasury, but stocked it with the merits of Christ alone. It is true, of course, that Jesus died for us because God loved us, and hence in the popular theology there is this salt of religious belief, but the stress has been laid not upon the ultimate love of God, but upon the purchasing blood of Christ. One hears of the terms of salvation, the conditions of redemption, and I have even heard the phrase used in a social meeting, "We are doing business for eternity." All of these expressions imply the idea or concept of God as sovereign offering rebellious subjects a treaty, all of his making, upon the acceptance of which his favor depends. It has even been called a heresy to speak of God as the Father of unconverted men, as if conversion were not the recognition of a relationship that already exists.

Similarly and with entire consistency, those in the same church call each other brethren, but neither the designation nor the feeling is apt to swing beyond the limit of the church. Yet the increasing recognition of the actual brotherhood of man is prophetic of the future recognition of the actual Fatherhood of God.

Political theories always bear intimate relations to religious beliefs. The first Christians spoke of the kingdom of God, but one of the noblest books of this generation is entitled the Republic of God. Protestantism and Democracy go hand in hand historically and theoretically; Roman Catholicism and monarchy. Dr. Everett has recently shown how the change in the theory of the atonement from Anselm to Grotius indicates the change in political ideals. With Anselm it was the dignity of the monarch that was to be maintained; with Grotius the sacredness of the law must be upheld. Now the idea of contract in religion has its counterpart in theories of government. Till very recently the state was thought of as arising by social compact. Men who had been leading isolated lives came together for personal advantage by making certain individual concessions and assuming certain duties in return for certain rights. At exactly the same period the notion of contract in religion was most widely held. But the view of the state as based upon contract is practically extinct now. Researches into the primitive condition of man have put it almost beyond doubt that the horde, and not the individual or the family, was the original social unit. Man is a political animal. By his very nature he belongs to the state, and his nature finds its fulfillment only in the civic organism. The state is not a sand-heap of separate atoms held together by a social contract; it is an organism of vital unity. Hence, the state is grounded in the nature of man, and the new theories of ethics are based upon the idea that man must so act as to preserve the organic unity of which he is part. All the socialistic and co-operative ideas which are now rife spring out of the idea of organic communion. Not that the age of compact and individualism has not been of use in the development of the state. When the system of feudalism gave way to the individualism of the industrial revolution, the change was an actual loss but a prophetic gain, for in the tooth and nail struggle for existence and the merciless competition we have been gradually reaching a position where the new communism will become possible.

Now to match these political theories which base the state and ethical duties in the nature of men, the conception of religion has grown up which holds to an essential communion between the nature of God and the nature of men. The old idea of a kinship between all the members of a tribe and between the tribe and God symbolized in the offering of Abel is taking the place of the idea of God as the sovereign to whom individuals must pay tribute, the idea symbolized in the sacrifice of Cain. This is the so-called new theology of which we hear so much, whose central truth is the actual Fatherhood of God and the actual brotherhood of man. In him we live; his life is ours; his nature is in us, and because we are all thus his children we are all brothers and members one of another. The new ethics gives prominence to the one body of humanity, the new theology emphasizes the one spirit that is the animating life of the body. Actual human nature is potential divine nature.

What changes must come in the outward form of a theology which has this as its formative germ! Revelation is not from without but from within, since the divine dwells in man. Only in and through human reason and conscience has God revealed himself most fully, since human nature is the noblest part of the great Universal Nature which, in its entirety, is the manifestation of God.

Therefore the human reason and conscience, as they grow toward perfection, are the only authority for the truth, and the sufficient authority since they are informed by the indwelling God. And, consequently, revelation must be progressive, since man is growing continually wiser and better, and at each new level of manhood a more perfect vision of God is disclosed. And since the divine life is in man, the unfolding of its rich possibilities has given us Jesus and all saints, the Bible and all books of holy inspiration. This is not a degradation of Christ and Bible, it is the exaltation of the divine humanity which rose to such high levels in each. And if Jesus was human, then he shows of what our humanity is capable; he is prophetic of the future character of all men. But the salvation into his likeness cannot come by conversion, since there is no alien nature to be converted. It can come only by the education of the native powers and faculties of the human soul. And if salvation is by education, there rises before us a dream of humanity which is infinitely more thrilling than the old ideal. So long as the old idea of contract dominated religious thinking, the work of the church was necessarily individualistic. We were shut up to the narrow task of picking here and there one out of the great mass hurrying on to death. A race cannot be converted, but a race can be educated. If the idea of communion holds and mankind is one, then the great mass of humanity can be educated, is being slowly educated, into the perfect image of God. Some of us can never forget the inspiration that came from the mere title of Canon Fremantle's great book, "The World the Subject of Redemption." It was as if a great door were opened in heaven to let the light of the New Jerusalem through. The vision of Paul, in his most exalted mood, is the hope that animates today those who work not merely that here and there one may be rescued, but that the world itself, humanity as a whole, may be led to higher levels of life. The primitive, tribal form of religion is returning larger and purer as we pray and hope that the kingdoms of the world may become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, and that he may reign upon the earth.

And now we are prepared to see that the idea of religion and of the state, in which contract was the energizing center, was necessary for the production of this higher communion. In the state, we have already hinted at the necessity of this intermediate stage; and it was equally indispensable in religion.

It was a profoundly sagacious remark by Dr. Hirsch, of Chicago, that to elevate the masses it is needful first to unmass them, and, carrying the same thought further yet, to elevate the thought of God it was necessary to separate him from the world. When the simple communal relation between God and the tribe was broken up, the holiness of God and the sense of a will for righteousness superior to the will or wish of the worshiper were increased. The Greeks never gave ethics the prominent place that the Jews did, who separated God from the world and bowed in awe before his righteous will. It was the growing moral sense of the Hebrew people that made God transcendent, and aided in destroying the old simple communion. But when that moral sense, which began in hatred of evil, advanced to sympathy with the evil-doer; then the feeling of hatred in man which had led him to believe that God hated both sin and the sinner, was succeeded by a profound sympathy with all who had erred or strayed, and that same compassion was found also in the heart of God. And so the moral sense, which first set God apart from the world, now brings him back into the world as a mighty force of tenderness and loving sympathy. But the idea of holiness which involved separation had to precede the idea of sympathy, which brings again the thought of communion.

Similarly with the individualism which springs out of the conception of contract and intensifies it in turn. Without that stage we could not have had the dignity of man and the as-urance of the infinite value of every human soul. Because we have learned our latent possibilities and understand how rich and precious this humanity is, we can see now how there may be communion between God and man, because of sympathy on the one hand and possibility on the other, which entirely removes the necessity for the apparent chasm between a holy God and a sinful world. In criticizing, therefore, the idea of religion, which has the idea of contract at its heart, I am not asserting that it was not an inevitable stage in the history of religion, but only that it is not a final stage. It is the means by which the religion of simple communion is passing to the religion of deep and rich communion. Has it not become already apparent to you with whom that idea of communion entered the world? When the theory of compact was at its worst, when Jews were teaching that if Israel could only keep one Sabbath as it ought to be kept Messiah would come, when they were striving to keep their part of the great contract, there came a man saying: "The kingdom of God is within you." Why strive thus to win the favor of God when his love has always been over you? "Believe this," he cried with passionate earnestness, "believe this thought of the present God ever in active communion with all aspiring souls, and you shall live in peace and joy." In Jesus the ethical sense had come to its fullest development, in tender, loving sympathy with all souls. In him the sense of the superlative worth of every human soul, because of its divine possibilities, was wondrously keen. Therefore was it, as we have seen, possible for him to reject the prevalent idea of compact and teach the present communion of man and God.

And thus the cycle is complete. Human thought moves in a spiral, it returns again and again to the same point, only each time on a higher level. From childhood to childhood is the law of progress everywhere: from the simple hopes and fancies of the child through the disappointments and chastenings of manhood on—not back, but on—to the simple life of the child again enriched by the experiences of ripening years. The idea of communion with which religion began its evolution is the idea which shall crown its process. Of races and of religion is it true: "Except ye become as little children ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." The old tribal belief of God as one with his people, who were also members one of another, was obscured by the strenuous demand for holiness and the perfection of individual character, but the human spirit in the discipleship of Jesus is on its way to the same blessed belief again. The tabernacle of God is with men, and God himself shall be with them and be their God, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

As prophet of this high faith our church stands. It comes not with a contract but with a gospel in its hands. It says to men not that if they are good or if they believe in Jesus they shall become children of God. It declares that all men are children of God now, and that recognition of this present and eternal fact is the chief incentive to holiness and the supreme blessedness of every soul. Its overmastering purpose is to work with God, and not merely for God. Through all nature run the universal laws that work for righteousness; and to perceive these laws of perfecting humanity, and work in accordance with them, is to ally one's self with the spirit that goes forth conquering and to conquer over every form of evil. Therefore is ours a church of the Holy Spirit, speaking the message and doing the work of the Spirit. And because a church of the Holy Spirit, also a church of the human spirit, since the Holy Spirit is the transforming life of humanity, and the human spirit is on its way to holiness. As a church of the human spirit it is largely inclusive. It welcomes to its present fellowship all God's children who feel drawn to it by spiritual affinities; it builds no walls of dogma; it erects no barriers of creed. "Free as the sun and air it is of latitudes and boundaries." In every man is some arc of the divine revelation in mankind—in the patience and perseverance of Darwin as in the tender humanity of Jesus. And the church of the Spirit must seek to bind all the arcs into a perfect round of truth and one unbroken fellowship. Ours is a goodly fellowship, seen and unseen, recognized and unrecognized, for we strike hands through all the ages and in all lands with all sons of the Spirit, however different may be their phrase from ours. And because the Holy Spirit and the human spirit are one, our church has an abiding hope in the future of man, because it has an unshaken faith in the eternal presence of God. Men wander in darkness and error and sin, yet He abideth faithful. He cannot deny himself. To the eternal goodness, which is the very nature of God, and which abideth goodness still in all our sin and death, we trust ourselves and all who are dear to us forever.

Though we sink in the darkness,
His arms break our fall.
And in life or in death
He is Father of all.

CLIMB AND SEE.

Here's a pretty story
About a pretty thing—
A little morning glory
Climbing up a string.

He said to robin red-breast,
When just a dot of green,
"In that high window yonder
What is there to be seen?"

"Wond'ring cannot help me;
I'll grow till I can peep.
This long, strong string shall aid me,
Ill grow while you're asleep."

So bravely did he clamber,
At last he reached the place,
And thrust in a fair chamber
His morning glory face.

A wond'ring bow then made he,—
That very puzzled shoot,—
"Why, here's the pretty lady Pours water on my root!"

INTELLIGENCE IN ANIMAL LIFE.

I was once the happy owner of a watermelon patch. A flock of crows congregated there, and in a dispute I was outwitted. I could not leave the melons but the best would be taken. The crows were the best judges; only the finest and ripest fruit was tapped, and the seeds carefully extracted. No scarecrow was of any use. One day I set to watch them myself, and how grimly you can imagine. But the crows settled in an adjoining field and worked their way through the grass and under the rail of the fence and regaled themselves on the finest and ripest fruit, then turned the melons carefully over so as to look as good as new, and, when they were through, flew away with a wild, triumphant cry that rang in my ears. Here was a careful plan of concerted action fully carried out. I am free to confess that I hesitate in telling this story for fear you may doubt its accuracy. In sound common sense the crow is very closely related to mankind. When we follow the bird's life and see it return, after its migrations, year after year, to the same spot—for birds do return; when we see with what care the nest is builded and with what vigilance it is hidden from the eyes of men; when we see how tenderly the young are watched and tended and after long instruction are allowed to leave the nest,—we do not see in these things a long line of instinctive acts, but a series of thoughtful acts, governed by determination to overcome obstacles, that prove the birds to be thinking as well as living animals.

I had an ugly spider part of one summer, and I discovered that the spider, like the ant, was subject to anger and melancholy. It had mechanical skill, better known as ingenuity. This was shown in the skill with which it wove its web, using it as a pulley for carrying its food into its net; another web was constructed on the principle of a diving bell, and used to catch its prey. To watch this spider's web, you would find there contrivances for every purpose necessary to its life. You may call it instinct or intelligence; I say it was guided by intelligence.

I invaded the premises of the little ant-lion. The little engineers had their pit dug out, and I teased them by throwing in small seeds. They were quickly thrown out with force, that they might not roll in again. I threw in another seed, and it was thrown out with greater force. They seemed to resent the foreign substance. By great good luck I caught a little black beetle not larger than the head of a pin, and threw it in; the ant-lion seized it, and after giving it a tremendous shaking, threw it out of the pit. I tried yet again to tease them by suspending a good-sized ant by a thread so it would just touch the sand and roll it into the pit; they seized the ant and tossed it away, but the thread controlled its movements and it swung back again over the pit. The ant-lion again seized it and apparently gave it a jerk that tore it from the string, and then tossed it out of the pit. Would any sane human being have acted differently? If we can see intelligence in insects we must grant it to every living creature until we reach ourselves. If a being from another planet visited this earth and unseen watched man in his importance, and watched the living creatures around him, he would marvel to observe how deliberately each creature worked for a wished-for goal, how each lived for the pleasure of living. Then turning to the sacred cities of men would he see there so great a difference? Would the difference not be in degree rather than in kind? Would men and animals be separated by such an impassable gulf? The same motive influence may be seen in human and divine, in the seen and the unseen. In the insect, bird and mammal world the same story is being told continually, and the same desire, in wisdom fraught, to carry out the same purpose.

—Chas. C. Abbott, M. D., University of Pennsylvania.

LIVE NEAR TO THE CHILDREN.

It is helpful when a man has been in one line of business for thirty-five years, and has had the opportunity of seeing many go out from under his tutelage and instruction, to see these people, perhaps, take up some of his thoughts and carry them out. He has a right to consider that some time, when with him, he has had something to do with those lives. This is the thing I want to say to you. Begin away back, and have the child trained from the time it is brought into existence.

The great difficulties that come into my professional life grow out of the fact that boys and girls are not trained at home. I am sorry to say that, but must tell the truth. And I absolutely believe the great difficulty with parents is that they don't know their children; they have to be introduced to them. They don't know where they live. They don't know what they think. They don't know anything about them. They can't see them; they have no perspective; they are too near to them. I have the advantage in that regard. I am not so much hampered by affection, although I have some affection for them all. A great majority of my boys and girls have no parents in this sense. Their fathers and mothers don't understand them.

I know a father who loved his son as dearly as a father can, and yet there was no possible understanding between them. He told me time and time again, with tears in his eyes, that he would give anything if somebody would take his boy and treat him fairly. "I can't do it," he said, "I don't understand him." The point I want to make is this: To train children, even when you love them dearly, they must be understood. We must not forget that we were once children ourselves. We are so anxious that the child shall do right that we destroy its individuality. We don't allow them to develop in the right way. We don't allow them to think why they were born, or what are their conditions, and the result is that we get out of sympathy with them and they go sometimes to the bad.

—Rev. S. S. Packard, in "Childhood."

We cannot make bargains for blisses,
Nor catch them like fishes in nets;
And sometimes the thing our life misses Helps more than the thing which it gets.

—Alice Cary.

World's Fair Notes

"It's astonishing how much the world's alike. Now here—in Denmark, I believe it is—is the exact image of my baby, and none of us ever saw Denmark since the flood."

I did not ask what flood she referred to, but quietly took it for granted that she would say that none of her baby's ancestors had ever been citizens of Denmark. It was her extravagant way, that was all. But the query remains whether a like extravagance entered into her asseveration as to the likeness between the Denmarkian baby and her own. A glance at the painting showed a sweet little face. No wonder if any mother felt moved to see her own darling imaged there. But a glance at the woman's face put one in doubt again; for it was, to keep within bounds, a "quite plain-looking" face. Nestling in her arms, the petite, cherubic little innocent of the picture would have looked separated from her by great unlikeness. Of course, at a certain age all babies look pretty much alike (this, braving the wrath of a million mothers); and remarkable transformations are to be daily chronicled in their development. But this particular painted baby was so sweet, and this particular living mother claiming its resemblance to her own was so sour would complete the antithesis, but homely is the better word; for far enough from "sour" was this homely face. Kindness, tenderness, and a great love were there to be seen as she stood in rapture gazing at the picture, claiming kinship, saying: "How much the world's alike."

And so it seemed, in even a deeper sense than was in her thought. How much alike in spite of feature! Features, after all, come to mean or play only a subordinate part. Nature has a defiant way of sometimes using very coarse and unlovely faces for expression of rarest beauty and intelligence. Great natures are not infrequently doomed to go through the life of this earth-sphere with very inferior or inadequate outward comeliness. But, somehow, they know the way to win the world's admiration, and it does often happen that one comes to take a real joy in homeliness, so often it proves itself "a joy forever," when beauty fades and goes out with unmeaning gaze.

The woman of whom I have been speaking was, I fear, though exceedingly homely, yet not homely enough to be truly great. Yet I salute her here, begging her pardon for seeming disparagement, and shall remember her with the child on the canvas as forming a picture worthy of the genius of our great artist.

Returning to Denmark again, urged thither by the memory of the scene depicted, I seek in vain the canvas that has been of such special interest. Not in all Denmark can I find a trace of it. Has it been spirited away or has there been a great mistake made?

Was that child, after all, not of Denmark? Could it have been a German or a Frenchman or an Italian? The mystery remains still unsolved. But right here comes up the thought of, what a treasure-house is the human mind. That picture lost, and many another picture, yea, the whole White City itself, when it shall also vanish into the night of the past, I shall carry with me—my own veritable possessions; Columbian guards, chair pushers, sellers of catalogues, Midway Plaisance, and the show of all the earth's one family entertained, pleased, captivated, enthusiastic, overwhelmed by this grandeur and beauty which the one human mind hath marvelously wrought.

Looking for one thing one finds many another thing. Denmark's art is a curious mixture of ancient and modern, of idealism and realism, of variety startling—and shocking at times. What a woeful thing is Zartmann's "Job and His Friends"! As a poem, while the man of Uz and his afflictions are portrayed by words only, the story goes. But when you are forced to feast your eyes on carefully wrought eruptive sores covering the entire body of that righteous man, dotting his limbs into set squares of writhing flesh, imagination hies away, its occupation gone. Turn to "Cain and the Eye of the Lord" (La Legende des siecles—V. Hugo)

—Cain shriveling in the Great White Light—and you have the benefit of a realism which gets a lift from the imagination that carries it into the realm of what you will be apt to regard as a more legitimate art. "Hercules bringing a Satyr before the Tribunal of Olympians," by the same artist, L. Frolich, is another lead into the imaginative that is interesting. What the Satyr thinks of it is your problem. "The Jews in the Wilderness" is the title of a canvas on the way to another exhibit, entitled "From the Children's Home (The Children have Cod Liver Oil)." Then, change of theme: "A November Night on the North Sea," "The Glacier of the Oefjelds," "Landscape in Jetland," "Griffenfeldt as a Prisoner at Monk Home, Teaching Two Little Boys." This last a return from nature, outwardly, grandly shown, to the quiet grandeur of the human soul, asserting superiority in simplest ways; teaching also a lesson from the text, "There is always liberty within one's own soul."

It was in my thought, when indulging my hardly chivalric meditations on the homely yet unhomely woman, to step over into the art rooms of the United States and gaze a moment at Abbott Thayer's "Virgin Enthroned;" by far, to me, the most impressive painting of the entire art-exhibit. If I mistake not, it is a portrait of a mother and her two children, but is of such elevation of sentiment, such nobility of feature, such natural grace and dignity of mien, that it might well have become a study so attractive as to have found a fitting space for its particular exhibition in the Woman's Building or at the Woman's Congress. It is pre-eminently a great painting, not surpassed even by the choicest displays of the loan exhibit. S. H. M.

Notes from the Field

Weirs, N. H.—The Unitarian Grove Meeting, to be held here July 30 to Aug 7, seeks to deepen the sense of religious fellowship among all who hold the Liberal faith, and invites to communion and counsel with an earnest company of men and women who are striving to build that Free Church of God whose foundation stones are Truth, Righteousness, and Love. The opportunities of the place and time for social intercourse and pleasant excursions, etc., make it an especially popular resort. Circulars and full information regarding railroad and board rates, etc., may be obtained by addressing Rev. Jas. B. Morrison, Laconia, N. H. Special railway information not contained in circular may be obtained of Col. C. C. Danforth, Concord, N. H., and for further information as to meetings Rev. Wm. H. Ramsay should be addressed at Manchester, N. H.

The program includes, besides receptions, excursions, services of song, etc., the following papers and conferences: Sunday, July 30, 10:30 a. m.,—Sermon by Rev. F. H. James, of China (probably); Rev. J. E. Wright, of Montpelier, alternate. 2:30 p. m.,—Sermon by Mrs. L. Ormiston Chant, of London, Eng. 7:30 p. m.,—Conference led by Rev. S. C. Beane, of Newburyport. Monday, July 31, 7:30 p. m.,—Conference led by Rev. Wm. H. Ramsay. Tuesday, Aug. 1, 10:30 a. m.,—Conference led by Rev. Enoch Powell, of Nashua. 7:30 p. m.,—An intimate friend of the poet has been invited to lead the evening with Whittier. Wednesday, Aug. 2, 10:30 a. m.,—Sermon by Rev. Enoch Powell. 7:30 p. m.,—Address by Mr. Wm. M. Salter, of the Philadelphia Ethical Culture Society. Thursday, Aug. 3, 10:30 a. m.,—Sermon by Rev. A. M. Lord, of Providence. 2:30 p. m.,—“The Opportunities and Mission of a United Liberal Christianity,” upon which the following gentlemen are to speak: Revs. J. E. Wright; Henry Blanchard, D. D., of Portland; Grindall Reynolds, of Boston; F. B. Hornbrooke, of Newton; T. W. Illman, of Concord; and D. M. Wilson, of Boston. The meeting will be continued in the evening, when Revs. E. L. Rexford, D. D., of Boston; Watari Kitashima, of Japan; F. O. Hall, of Lowell; and F. L. Phalen, of Concord, are to speak. Friday, Aug. 4, 10:30 a. m.,—Sermon by Rev. D. M. Wilson. 2:30 p. m.,—Sermon by Rev. Henry Blanchard, D. D. 7:30 p. m.,—“The Religious Outlook.” Letters are expected from such veterans as Dr. Furness of Philadelphia, Dr. Morison of Boston, Dr. Stebbins of San Francisco, and others. Saturday, Aug. 5, 10:30 a. m.,—Sermon by Rev. W. H. Savage, of Watertown. 2 p. m.,—Laymen's Day Meeting. Hon. Geo. B. Chandler, of Manchester, will preside, and the committee, consisting of him and Col. Danforth, of Concord, and Hon. J. W. Fellows, of Manchester, will provide speakers. 7:30 p. m.,—Lecture by Rev. Mr. Kitashima, in native costume, on Japan. Sunday, Aug. 6, 10:30 a. m.,—Sermon by Rev. W. R. Alger, of Boston. 2:30 p. m.,—Sermon by Dr. Rexford. 7:30 p. m.,—Farewell conference led by Rev. J. B. Morrison.

Wausau, Wis.—The State Convention of Universalists was held here June 5-8, Rev. J. F. Schindler preaching the occasional sermon.

Canton, N. Y.—St. Lawrence University commencement began Sunday, June 25, when President A. B. Hervey preached the baccalaureate sermon to the collegiate department, taking his text from Mark x., 44, 45, preaching the gospel of service. Rev. J. M. Payson, of the class of '74, offered the prayer. In the evening, after prayer by Rev. Francis A. Gray, '83, President I. M. Atwood preached the sermon to the theological class from Matt. ix., 36. That the Doctor was true to his old-time conservatism appears from this extract:

The course is marked out for the Christian minister and the port fixed. He needs only to follow and steer his ship to the desired haven. Other instrumentalities may be used, for the gospel is “co-operative.” It takes in all the good. But Christianity, as the revealer of divine realities, is the only agent that will fully accomplish the object for which the ministry was instituted. History, reason, science—the handmaid of religion—will not avail to cure the disease of sin or comfort the mourner. We need the authoritative declarations of Jesus, “the Saviour of the world,” “in whom dwelt the fullness of God.”

On Monday afternoon the Pauline brotherhood gave a pleasant reception to students and professors. In the evening Rev. Dr. J. M. Pullman, of Lynn, Mass., gave an address to the united literary and theological societies on “The Moral Capital of the World.”

In the theological school the commencement papers were: “The Relation of Jesus to His Age,” by Chas. R. East; “Unity in Christ,” by Burt B. Gibbs; “The Divinity of Man,” by Herbert H. Graves; “Socialism and Christianity,” by Wm. M. Lawrence; “Christianity and the State,” by Fred G. Leonard; “The One Increasing Purpose,” by Harry E. Townsend; and “Tendencies of Religious Thought,” by Miss Blanche A. Wright. The degree of B. D. was conferred upon John Murray Atwood, B. A., and Charles Henry Vail. The honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred upon Gov. Flower, who was in attendance, and John V. N. Standish, Ph. D., President of Lombard University. At the alumni dinner Mr. Foster L. Backus, '73, presided, and responses were made by the Governor, Dr. T. B. Stowell, Hon. Chas. O. Tappan, Hon. George R. Malley, Gen. N. M. Curtis, Rev. D. L. R. Libby and Prof. Henry Priest. Wednesday evening the alumni reception was held in Miner Hall, the professors and their wives receiving the guests. Quite a fund has been raised for a gymnasium, and it is hoped to raise $50,000 or $100,000 to put the institution on a satisfactory basis and pay the faculty adequate salaries. George R. Hardie, late of Harvard University, was elected to a full professorship in Latin.

Pacific Slope.—From the Pacific Unitarian we have many items of interest concerning the work of the liberal church there. In Oregon the new movements languish as a result of the financial depression. In Washington the cause holds its own well. In California, particularly in the south, it flourishes greatly, the vigor and rapidity of the growth of our churches there being unsurpassed. As an illustration of this we may mention the fact that Mr. Thomson's average congregation at Los Angeles is about 1,000. In the same city Rev. Dr. Fay has been preaching twice a month in Davis Hall to the Independent, or People's Church, which is being gathered by Rev. Mr. Phillips. Arroyo Grande is one of the new points at which work is being undertaken. Late in June Mr. Thacher preached there on “Some Aspects of Unitarianism.”

Rev. Chas. W. Wendte has accepted the Pacific Slope Superintendency for the A. U. A. for one year, retaining his pastorate at Oakland, where he is to be assisted by a junior pastor when the right man can be found. If he is able to stand the strain he will probably remain the superintendent after the present year, as his previous experience peculiarly fits him for the place; but the work is arduous, and for the present he is unwilling to leave his parish. Later in the summer he will visit Oregon and Washington, and in September will attend the Parliament of Religions at Chicago.

Redlands, Cal.—In this flourishing town, which, however, has only about 1,200 inhabitants, there has been found an audience of about 150 liberal people, who have raised $1,200 for the first year's salary of their minister, Rev. A. J. Wells. This, notwithstanding the presence of five or six orthodox churches and an active Y. M. C. A. movement. Rev. Mr. Wendte thinks the personal strength of Mr. Wells, who has recently come out of the Orthodox fold, is quite sufficient to account for this. Mr. Wells is also preaching at San Bernardino.

Pasadena, Cal.—The broad Universalist Church, under the pastorate of Dr. Conger and Miss Florence Kollock, has decided that the Winchester confession is not obligatory for membership, and the Unitarians have, with the advice of Mr. Wendte, the new superintendent, decided to throw in their lot with the church, and help to make it a noble exponent of liberal religion. Four of five Unitarians have been put on the board of trustees, including President Keyes, of Throop University, and Mr. Wadsworth, formerly of All Souls Church, Chicago.

St. Louis, Mo.—The allied organizations known as the Self-Culture Clubs have done an excellent work the last year. Six lecture courses have been maintained—one monthly, one fortnightly, and four weekly. The strictly educational part of the work is free of charge, including use of the library, reading-room, etc.; but for taking out books a small charge is made (50 cents a year), as also for use of gymnasium, etc. The gymnasium is a valuable auxiliary. Its members largely join for it alone, but frequently become interested in the library and educational work. Among the various activities are a Civics class, led by a young lawyer, Mr. B. F. Charles, a debating society, and a singing school. Beside the main headquarters now occupying the whole of a large three-story building and its yard, at 1730 Washington street, there is a branch at 2004½ South Broadway.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Rev. S. W. Sample, minister of All Souls Church and of the “People's Meetings” held in the Lyceum Theater Sunday evenings, addressed the Home Rule meeting held in the city in June.

A union meeting of all the young people's societies of Minneapolis and St. Paul was held at the Church of the Redeemer Sunday evening, June 25, under the leadership of Mr. O. F. Tilton, and another similar meeting at the Third Church, July 24. Evening services in the Church of the Redeemer were discontinued June 18, but the church will be kept open during the summer. Dr. Shutter will himself preach most of the summer.

Oxford, England.—The institution founded in 1786 at Manchester as Manchester Academy, and then moved to York seventeen years later, where it remained thirty-seven years as Manchester College, then returning to the place of its birth, where, in courtesy to a neighboring establishment it assumed the name of Manchester New College, which designation it retained during the thirteen years of its second sojourn in Manchester, the thirty-six years of its residence in London, and the four years of its temporary stay at Oxford,—is now established in its new home at Oxford, Manchester Hall, and has officially assumed the name of Manchester College, Oxford. The closing exercises of its year's work were held June 22 and 23, in the presence of a number of earnest friends of the liberal faith. The Visitor's Address, by Rev. J. E. Odgers, and the Welcome into the Ministry, by Rev. R. A. Armstrong, were particularly helpful.

Chicago, Ill.—Rev. F. L. Hosmer, Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference, preached at Unity Church last Sunday. Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Providence, R. I., is in the city, attending the Exposition. Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones addressed the Humane Society last Friday, July 14, and preached at Madison, Wis., Sunday, the 16th inst.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL S. S. INSTITUTE,

Under the auspices of the Western S. S. Society, will be held this year in the UNITY BUILDING, under the management of

The Tower Hill Pleasure Co.

AUGUST 7 TO 13.

The building is located at 286 Woodlawn Terrace, within three minutes' walk of one of the World's Fair gates, and about the same distance from the Illinois Central Railroad Station at Sixty-seventh street.

The program this year will consist of ten two-hour sessions, from 10 to 12 a. m., led by Rev. W. W. Fenn. The study will be devoted to the fourth year's work of the Six Years' Course—"The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion;" The New Testament Time. Mr. Fenn proposes to arrange the studies upon an art string, using the great masterpieces of Christian art as centers around which the story of Jesus, the disciples and the apostles will be told. So far as possible these pictures will be made available to teachers and pupils.

It is hoped that this Institute work will fit into, rather than interfere with, the sight-seeing of World's Fair attendants, and every help possible to the management in this direction will be rendered.

Arrangements for room and board at economic prices can be made in the Unity Building or in the immediate vicinity.

Institute tickets for the season, $2.00. For further particulars concerning Institute, address MRS. E. T. LEONARD, 6600 Ellis Ave., Chicago. Application for room etc., to be made to MRS. R. H. KELLY, 286 Woodlawn Terrace.

One Upward Look Each Day.

POEMS OF FAITH AND HOPE.

SELECTED by J. T. SUNDERLAND.

A Boston minister writes: "Your 'Upward Look' book is beautiful. We are buying it by the dozen, and giving it where it will do good."

One of our best known authors writes us: "Your collection of poems, 'One Upward Look Each Day,' is a wonderfully good collection. It is surprising that so many excellent poems can be comprised in so small a compass and offered at so small a price."

Price, Morocco, 75 cents each; Cloth, 50 cents each; Heavy embossed paper, 30 cents each.

Mailed to any address on receipt of price by UNITY PUBLISHING COMPANY, 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

Charles H. Kerr & Company's

NOTEWORTHY NOVELS.

Asleep and Awake.

By RAYMOND RUSSELL. A story of Chicago, daring in its theme, delicate in its treatment, vivid and dramatic. Cloth, crown octavo, 199 pages, $1.00.

Washington Brown, Farmer.

By LEROY ARMSTRONG. Tells how one man organized a combination of farmers that beat the Board of Trade speculators and secured a fair price for wheat. Not a "true story" yet, but it will help make itself come true. Every reformer should read it. 326 pages, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

The Russian Refugee.

A tale of the Blue Ridge. By HENRY R. WILSON. A thoroughly readable book of 618 large pages. Full of adventure and incident, with a judicious proportion of love story. Good vacation reading. Paper, 50 cents.

Silhouettes From Life.

By ANSON URIEL HANCOCK. Twelve breezy outdoor stories of pioneer life in the backwoods of Michigan and the back-prairies of Nebraska. Cloth, 12mo., $1.00.

John Auburntop, Novelist.

By ANSON URIEL HANCOCK. A story of life in a "co-educational" Western college which depicts the characters and scenes in a graphic way that will delight every alumnus. Crown 8vo, 275 pages, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

Inquiendo Island.

By HUDOR GENONE. A bright and ingenious story of adventures on an island where the sacred book was the Arithmetic. Crown 8vo., 353 pages, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

The Last Tenet.

Imposed upon the Khan of Tomathoz. By HUDOR GENONE. An exquisitely funny story of an Oriental despot converted to Christianity and how he forgave sins up to seventy times seven—but kept tally. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

For sale by booksellers, or mailed by the publishers on receipt of price. Descriptive catalogue free.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES. FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

*A sower went his way alone
And I heard him sing and say,
The noon is bright, but soon the night
Will come, the grave of the day.
Then I smiled to hear his woeful song,
And sent these words their way—
The noon is bright, but the blackest night*

Cradles another day.
—Quoted in a sermon by H. D. Maxson.

DON'T forget the Sunday School Institute next week. These higher exchanges are economic in point of time, money, and energy.

THE record of the Chicago Woman's Club, as described by Julian Ralph, in Harper's Magazine for July, is one that will interest not only every friend of woman's advance but every student of municipal reform and social science.

As illustrative of the spirit of the times, we note an appeal for the United Church of Jesus Christ, a call to unity from Rev. Jos. H. Bradley, of Tuckerton, N. J., who, taking John xvii. 21, as his text,—"That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou has sent me,"—contends that Christians are bound by the command of Jesus to unite in one body.

IN the recent death of Joel Tiffany the Unitarian parish at Hinsdale has lost one of its faithful pillars, and the friends of liberal thought in Illinois and elsewhere a familiar friend. His voice has been often heard in our conferences. His presence was always a gracious one. He was a man of varied resources; one who in his long life of eighty-two years had won eminence as inventor, jurist, and public speaker; one who brought a very active mind to the study of the most subtle of problems,—the problems of soul-life independent of and beyond the realm of body. He has gone to prove the truth of that psychical world, the existence and familiarity with which was to him not an hypothesis but a fact. In Judge Tiffany was to be found one of the innumerable proofs that spiritualism has in it to some souls the qualities of a life-forming and life-helping religion.

WE call attention to the word of Mrs. Wright in another column. Mrs. Wright has charge of the Unitarian exhibit at the World's Fair. Since this word from her was written we have received from one friend thirty dollars, with instructions to invest the same in such Unity Mission Tracts and Unity Short Tracts as may seem best adapted for free distribution. We are sure this will be sowing seed some of which will fall on good ground. We wish we could afford to place a hundred or more copies of UNITY on that stand every week. Perhaps to many this would be the most acceptable of any tracts available, as it certainly would be most economical in a money one. We will be glad to appropriate any money sent us for this purpose, also, and give to it its longest purchasing power. Meanwhile let the friends visiting the Fair look into the little white Grecian temple standing unique among the church exhibits.

ABOUT 50,000 people were at the Fair last Sunday, although it was a surprise, gloomily announced, and the advertisements, attractions, and encouragement reduced to the minimum. Notwithstanding all this there were, doubtless, more people than could be found in all the orthodox Protestant churches in the city of Chicago that day, and those who went found just what we have been asking for from the start—"a silent Sunday," devoted to thoughtful, intelligent study of high things in quiet ways. One pastor we know spent in the Art Gallery a rare afternoon with some of his Sunday-school children, accompanied by several adults who accepted his Sunday morning invitation from the pulpit. And they will much miss the chances of repeating it. Let the management cut down the admission to 25 cents, give us a few open gates, and let those who will get the benefit of it. As yet the Fair has never been open on Sunday in an honest fashion. They have always asked full price for a fractional exchange.

AN item is going the rounds of the papers, accredited to Lyman Abbott, entitled "The Essential Element in Preaching," in which this great apostle of clearness and progress indulges in what seems to some of his friends a characteristic collapse, when he says: "There is no place in the ministry for the rationalist," and proceeds to draw the old-time and obsolete distinction "between a man of faith and a rationalist." The Bible must seem to the preacher, he says, an "unique" book. He must have some sort of an estimate of Jesus as a "world's Master" and "world's life-giver," if he has the elements of a preacher. No matter what his beliefs in God, immortality, sin, etc., may be, if they are "mere scientific conclusions (the italics are ours), he has not the necessary equipments of a prophet." This mushy rather than mystic psychology has done much to rob the ministry of the young men and women whose services are most needed in these days. While such talk is indulged in, the pulpit will continue to miss from its representatives many of the ablest young men and women of our colleges. We would like to reverse the dictum of this prayer-meeting gush of the good doctor, and say that the time is coming when none but the rationalist will have a place in the pulpit,—when faith will be a beautiful flowering of reason as well as of love and conscience; when the immortal hope and that outgoing of the soul in aspiration, which always has been and always will be the essence of prayer, will confidently rest in the assurances of science and find abundant room in the scientific mind and heart. We say, give us more rationalists in our pulpits, that the eclipse of faith may pass. Reason and emotion, love and thought do go hand in hand. They are not foes, but friends. United they are the essence of life, the spirit of progress, the wings of the soul. Separated and antagonized they produce discord, superstition, or irreverence, as the case may be. Give us more rationalists in the pulpit, in order that we may have a faith-giving pulpit that will inspire faithful occupants of the pews.

We welcome the Moslem World to a place among our exchanges, and confess to a great deal of admiration for the ability with which it is conducted. It is doing a good work in removing the false impressions so prevalent about Islam. The scholarly articles of Sir Seyd Ameer Ali, M. A., C. I. E., a judge of the High Court of Judicature in Bengal and a man of insight as well as learning, are especially worthy of attention. Besides original papers by men of broad nineteenth-century culture, such as Sir Seyd Ameer Ali, this organ of the Islamic propaganda contains remarkably well-selected discussions of Islam and Christianity from fair-minded Christians and neutrals, and by a page or so of newspaper clippings directs attention to certain characteristic blots upon Christian civilization, such as drunkenness and fornication. It ought, perhaps, to be noted that Mr. Webb and the high-minded Moslems who are back of him in this propaganda of advanced Islam are monogamists; and not only so, but Sir Seyd Ameer contends that a careful study of his words will show that Mohammed himself taught that monogamy was the true practice, although in consideration of the hardness of the hearts of his contemporaries this teaching was so expressed as temporarily to permit a limited polygamy. Those of us who are familiar with the arguments of verbal-inspiration Christians are used to this sort of reasoning, and are not now greatly impressed by it; nevertheless, it should be said that Sir Seyd Ameer All shows himself an able lawyer in the presentation of his case. But we think he misses it almost as far as the prohibitionists do in their effort to demonstrate that the Bible taught prohibition. The simple truth is that from the prohibition standpoint the Koran has greatly the advantage over the Old and New Testaments, and from the monogamist's standpoint the New Testament has as great an advantage over the Koran. While there is much that Christendom may learn by a study of Islam, and while it may be that from the less intellectual classes Islam will for a time make American and European converts, the day has gone by for any widespread success in this direction, for the simple reason that what is highest and best in Islam, just as what is highest and best in Christianity, belongs to the undenominational faith of all great minds,—is neither specifically Buddhism, Islam nor Christianity, but is the catholic religion of all souls.

PROF. GANENDRA NATH CHAKRAVARTI, of Allahabad, India, will attend the theosophical convention at the World's Fair Congress of Religions. Prof. Chakravarti is a high-caste Brahman and ranks high as a scholar. He leaves Bombay July 21, and will come to New York with Mrs. Annie Besant, meeting her in London. Prof. Chakravarti will be one of a very few high-caste Brahmans who have been in this country. He cannot cross the seas without sacrificing his rank. Another prominent theosophist who will be at the congress is M. Dharmapala, who is to represent the Southern Buddhist Church. —Chicago Tribune.

UNITY CLUB WORK.

The fourth year's course of Sunday-school work being prepared for several of our churches by Mr. Fenn, will bring into use the stereopticon and the camera and awaken an interest in the general study of art. Is it not possible to carry co-operation along this "line of least resistance" into the Unity Clubs next winter? Three months still remain of the World's Fair; unquestionably, the greatest attendance is yet to come. Of course the greatest treasures of this Fair are to be found in the Art Palace. To scatter this great and noble collection, so representative of modern art, will be one of the calamities incident to the limitations of life. Is it not possible for us to begin now to conserve some of the inspiration for next winter, and, by careful gleanings from newspapers, buying what books we can afford, pooling our resources to buy collections of lantern slides that will go the rounds, delighting one club, at least, every week throughout the winter, and looking with a purpose,—put study into our sight-seeing so as to have a profitable winter on modern art in our Unity Clubs?

Suppose that now, very soon, a tentative outline be printed, taking the twelve or fourteen leading collections by countries, and, for tentative study, the names of not more than four of the leading artists be given and the names of not more than ten notable pictures selected on any principle, other than mere technique, that would make them profitable studies. The names of the artists given would send our Unity Club workers off to the handbooks, current art literature and the encyclopedias. They might be "assigned" early, and the work of preparing the ideal Unity Club paper, fifteen minutes long, begin at once.

The names of the notable pictures would give the hint to the hunters in the art galleries of the World's Fair; lead them to look not only for these but to find better ones. These pictures would generally be of the sermon kind, gospel canvases that will teach life lessons, inspire pulpit effort, etc. If any considerable interest is manifested, much may be done with the officials of the several countries in the way of securing favors that will give us photographs, lantern-slides, and information not in the books. Perhaps UNITY can make itself useful as a bureau of information and exchange. Next week at the Institute, advertised elsewhere, will be a good time to talk this matter over. Meanwhile let those who will not be at the Institute but are interested let UNITY know what they think about it.

Such co-operative work might be still more available in the Anthropological and Reformatory exhibits of the Fair. We will be glad to print any suggestion of tentative programs suitably prepared.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR COOKS?

I refer in this inquiry to that class of theoretical cooks, who write in the newspapers and cook books, and who recommend a small infusion of wine, or brandy, or rum, as a choice addition to almost all the dishes they fabricate. The majority of them, I presume, never really did any cooking in their lives, and some of the mixtures they recommend would turn the stomach and ruin the digestion of the average donkey or rhinoceros; but in spite of this fact foolish people do read their columns of recipes, and the most foolish of them try to follow them out. The best standard cook books also err very grievously in this direction, and the new teachers of cookery who instruct classes; but far beyond all these, the newspaper cooks revel in alcoholic flavors. You would fancy that every one of them was mistress of a wine cellar, and that the poor, ignorant people they aim to instruct are also lavishly supplied with a variety of alcoholic stimulants. I was glancing over a pile of old fashion papers to-day, where the domestic recipe fiend had full sway and is glorified, and the column fairly reeked with stimulants. Over as simple a dish as sliced bananas you must pour sherry before bathing them in cream; peaches must be drenched with brandy before they are sugared. All ices and creams have a certain modicum of wine, and there are no sauces for puddings that do not call for wine or brandy. Cakes require it, and mince pies must be fairly intoxicating if made according to these recipes. Then the iced drinks—but why particularize; the general idea is enough. That is, that the writers upon this subject are incurring a fearful responsibility by their lavish recommendation of alcohol in cookery. I wish they could be made to see it, and that editors who print their pernicious teachings could be made to see the harm they are doing.

There is no more subtle and insidious way of cultivating a taste for alcohol than to introduce it freely into food. No mother who wishes to bring up a temperate family, dares feed them upon food with alcoholic flavors. No young wife but invites the most terrible of misfortunes by such a course. The taste for these liquors is latent in almost every person. We have come from an ancestry steeped in them in every fiber, and unwittingly we help to develop this taste by every toothsome dish we place before our families, which contains those ingredients. What good is all our teachings of the effects of alcohol, in the public schools and elsewhere, going to do if our children are to be tempted at our own tables, and if these brainless and irresponsible recipe-makers are going to dominate the minds of mothers and wives? Down with the alcoholic cook-book, say we, and down with the papers who furnish the domestic recipe column reeking with strong drink. H. T. G.

HIS "THUMB NAIL."

It is being remarked every day the Fair continues that the people are all wonderfully good-natured, civil, even cordial. Go where you please—up or down the Plaisance, with its innumerable rivalries and interests, where every opportunity is afforded showman or visitor to prove him or herself quite other than hospitable and courteous, and still the friction of ill-will is exceedingly limited. Free competition appears there to mellow or dissipate the "grasping greed" of all races, and you can run across many a little "aside" that is interesting, if of non-commercial value.

For instance, somewhere near the great Ferris Wheel you may chance upon a Brahmin who is busy turning off very pleasing effects on little cards with his thumb nail. He has bright eyes and a plentiful flow of wit. He is usually surrounded by admiring ladies.

"Only one nickel, Lady; will you buy? You seem interested."

The lady has been studying him intently for some minutes.

"No, I believe not. But I would like to know if you are a Christian?"

"A Christian! No, indeed. Why should I be a Christian? I am a Brahmin. As well ask 'are you a Brahmin;' but I know you could not be. No more could you be a Christian if you were born in Turkey. You would be Mohammedan sure. For Bible you would read the Koran——"

"That is not my opinion."

"Opinion! It is not opinion, it is fact. We are all born to our religion. But, it's all the same—Mohammedan, Christian. Have a flower, Lady?"

Another lady interposing: "I would like one with your autograph."

"Oh, sure! 'Tis but a moment to write it." And as he writes: "This is not my profession. I wished to come to the Fair. My people say no. But the vessel come, the vessel go, and I was gone, too. So I make my thumb nail—I learn it when a boy—to serve me. I earn some money, I see the Fair, I go home. As for my religion, I am nobody here. Here, the Christian on top, I am under. At home I am on top, the Christian under. But we should not be so unkind. Apple pie you like; lemon pie I like; but it's pie all the same. So with religion. Different, but the same."

"But have you no fear of going to hell?" persisted the lady, intent on his soul.

"To hell? Oh, no! I fear to go nowhere; so hell is not in me, I am everywhere safe."

I was interested in noting that this little by-play of religion is nowise lessened his income. His autograph was all the more in demand.

With a smile, he said: "Since you so much demand the autograph, I can make no flower. I must make a bigger price. Ten cents, Madam."

SOUTH CAROLINA has gone into the liquor business, and proposes to monopolize it. It is only to be sold, however, in those counties which petition for it. The Governor has laid in a big stock, and it will be sold in bottles bearing the seal of the State. It is said that the toppers show a great deal of indignation at this humiliation of the great seal. —Independent.

THEORY vs. PRACTICE.—Mr. Hubbie—What! Out again this evening? Why, you've been out every day this week so far! Mrs. Hubbie—I wouldn't miss Prof. Talker's lecture this evening for anything. She's going to speak about "How to Make Home Happy." —Puck.

LEARNING REWARDED.—"Did Brown stand the civil-service examination?" "First-class." "Went through the Greek alphabet?" "Jest a hummin'!" "And the Latin verbs?" "Every one of 'em!" "What place did they give him?" "Head coal-shoveler." —Atlanta Constitution.

WAITING FOR ME.

Already I've climbed to the mountain top,

I am almost down on the "other side;"
Though my steps are weary, I may not stop,

For I may set sail with the ebbing tide.

Soon, soon I shall clasp the loving hand

Of one who has gone to the "border land."

Yes, already my feet have touched the shore,

I have heard the oars of the "boatman pale:"

A few short hours and a few steps more,

Then I shall pass thro' the shadowy vale.

When the hour is near my own will wait

To welcome me at the "open gate."

I am near the line where the two worlds meet,

And my brow is fanned by the balmy air

That is stirred by the rush of swift-winged feet

That hasten to welcome me over there.

They are gathered there, those gone before,

And they wait for me on the "summer shore."

The world is bright, and I gladly stay
Till the Master calls to me, "Well done:"

Then I'll fold my work at the close of day

And journey on toward the setting sun.

Then O for a touch of the vanished hand

That beckons to me from the "morning land."

RELIGIOUS AND SECULAR JOURNALS.

Summarizing in few sentences this discussion, we may say that the religious journal is not simply a secular newspaper committed to the advocacy of the tenets of a religious organization. Independently of its denominational affiliation, its character as a weekly newspaper imposes upon it functions which are altogether different from those of an ordinary daily. In so far as it is purely a newspaper it is governed by a different principle in selecting its material, and it estimates the value of the material by different standards. The fact that it is a weekly publication tends to make it a journal of comment, in which the news of the world is viewed in a more comprehensive way in relations to principles than is ordinarily practicable in a daily journal. And the fact that it is a religious paper determines that its allegiance is not to a political party, but to the ruling principles of religion.

In the light of these contrasts between the secular newspaper and its religious compeer, the peculiar relations which the latter sustains to the family, to the church, and to the ethical life of society, make it a unique and essential factor in the influence of the press upon the progress of the world.

HAMLIN GARLAND.

Hamlin Garland has written enough within the last few years to make his name familiar to all those watchers of the literary skies who stand ready to hail any new star which swings into ken. So far Mr. Garland has happily escaped becoming a craze, although he has many readers and some enthusiastic admirers. There is a sturdy manhood about this author which may be counted upon to keep him forever free from the dwarfing influences of extreme popularity. He is not likely to become a fad, and should thank his controlling star for exemption from such a fate.

It is said of Mr. Garland, whether truly or not one cannot say, that he refuses to wear a dress coat upon any occasion. His writings bear him out as to this trait. They refuse any kind of a strait-jacket in manner or form or matter. Mr. Garland even reviles verse, regarding it, probably, as a kind of dress coat in literature, too "cabined, cribbed, confined" for the full play of mental and moral power and beauty in the expression of life.

Mr. Garland's books, whatever his theories may be, are their own excuse for being. "Main Traveled Roads" is the title of his volume of short stories, in which appears "the first fine careless rapture" of this writer's genius. These are tales so real, so true, and so well told as to reach home to every reader instantly—sometimes to his sorrow, but never to his regret. From the pages of this book, as of every other written by this author, the toil-worn, stoop-shouldered man of labor and care looks out and says, "Am I not a man and brother?" The lives of men, women and children on the farms of the Northwest form the ground work of Mr. Garland's writings. Men's joys and their sorrows, their sordid cares, their holidays, their heroic struggles with Nature's closed palm for existence, their simple triumphs and failures—these are the themes upon which our author's pen loves to dwell. They are elaborated and set forth with a depth of sympathy and understanding, an insight into human life, which is amazing, uncompromising, and true.

"An Average Man" and "A Spoil of Office" are stories long enough to be published and sold, each as a separate volume, as novels; but the name "novel" seems a light and unseemly word when applied to those studies of life; they are so evidently histories of lives that are now being lived in this very world around us, among the hills, prairies and forests of Iowa, Wisconsin and Illinois. A later volume of short stories recalls those of the first collection. One is sorry to come to the end of them. Humor is playing about every page of Mr. Garland's work. "Ma Ripley's Visit to New York" and the story of the sign painting on the farmer's new barn are examples of a most fresh and delightful vein of this sure sign of sanity, without a trace of exaggeration or that rank poison, ridicule, both of which qualities embitter much of American humor.

A HUMANE POOR LAW.

While on the one hand Austria taxes the food of the needy for the benefit of the rich, she provides, on the other, for her poor at once more wisely and more humanely than any other nation. Distinguishing between sturdy beggars, confirmed idlers, and men whom temporary misfortune has reduced to want, she metes out to each of them the treatment they merit. Besides, she has answered the difficult question, What can be done for the aged poor?

By the law of Joseph II. (1781) each town was obliged to provide food and shelter for the temporarily destitute; to take charge of the invalids, cripples, and idiots, among the poor; and in a special way to secure the comfort of the aged.

The principle established by this system—that each commune should take care of its own population—still remains the basis of all poor-law regulations in Austria. The imperial exchequer is under no obligation to contribute to the support of the poor. Instead of one uniform system there are now several in the empire, widely differing from each other.

We will study the system in force in Vienna. The municipal authorities, with regard to the poor, delegate their duties to a regularly constituted department, which administers all the municipal charities and has under its control upward of a hundred institutions. It consists, in addition to certain paid officials, of 537 Guardians of the Poor, elected by the ratepayers, and 233 Waisenvaeter and 54 Waisenmuetter. These latter are appointed by the Burgomaster for the special purpose of watching over the young.

The most distinctive feature of the Vienna poor-law is the sharp line it draws between the young, the able-bodied, and the aged or feeble; while in England the three classes are clubbed together in one building and subjected to the same treatment. In Vienna a child is never sent to a workhouse, but placed under the care of a Waisenrater or a Waisenmutter. No guardian may adopt more than five children, however, whom he must visit, see that they are kindly treated, properly fed, clothed and taught, and being fitted to make their own way in the world. In 1889 the town of Vienna had nearly 7,000 children under its care. The custom is to board the children, while they are young, in families, and to transfer them into the orphanages, when the time comes, for more careful training and supervision. A child in an orphanage costs 79.96 kreuzer, while a man in the workhouse costs only 50.13 kreuzer. Care is taken that no stigma attaches to these children. Many of them attend the public schools, where special scholarships are offered for their competition. The University, even, is in sympathy with public opinion on this point, and admits the sons of pauper parents to all lectures and examinations free of charge. While it is a saying in London that a child born in a workhouse always returns there to die, it is a rare thing to find in a charitable institution in Vienna a man or woman brought up at the public expense.

Then there are the District Guardians, or Armenrater, to whom the pauper men and women have the right to apply for help. A guardian has generally one street or a small district under his care. He must know every individual living there, so that he can decide how any case of destitution may best be met. Great pains is taken to adjust the treatment to the merits of each individual case. Any one between eighteen and sixty can claim admittance to any Asyl or workmen's boarding-house, where a bath, supper, bed and breakfast are supplied free of charge. But these Asyls offer only temporary relief, and, unless a man secures work at the end of a few days, he is moved on to the workhouse.

There is only one workhouse in Vienna, the number of whose inmates, in 1889, averaged 166. It is by no means an uncomfortable retreat. The inmates must do a certain portion of work in return for food, shelter, and clothes; but when this is done they are allowed an amount of freedom unknown in similar institutions in England. In Vienna the people laugh and talk as they work, and seem to be on friendly terms with the officials. No work is done on Sundays and holidays, and on one day in the week they are free to go out in search of employment. A man is not expected to stay in the workhouse. He is a visitor, not a resident. There is no hardship in this arrangement, because, as the old and feeble are never admitted, the men and women in the workhouse all belong to the able-bodied class. Every effort is made to put them in the way of finding work for themselves. If a man seems inclined to look upon the house as his permanent home, he is promptly drafted off to a Zwangarbeitshaus, a compulsory labor colony, where the sternest prison discipline prevails, and where the order of the day is that he who will not work shall not eat. The average cost per head in the Vienna workhouse is 50.13 kreuzer per day.

The greatest contrast, however, between the English and the Austrian systems of relief we find in the treatment of the aged poor. It has been recognized that it is practically impossible for the working classes to save enough money to provide for old age. Joseph II. faced the problem boldly, and decided that at sixty a man should have the right to claim from his native town a pension equal to one third of his average daily wage, not as a charity, but as the reward for past services. This is still the guiding principle of the Austrian poor-law, which recognizes the right of the old and feeble to be supported by the young and vigorous. In 1889 there were sixteen thousand six hundred persons receiving from the city of Vienna pensions varying from two to six florins a month. There were also thirteen hundred and twenty-two persons living at the public expense in the regular Armeninstitution and three thousand seven hundred and sixty-one in Versorgungshäuser.

These houses, peculiar to Austria, are divided into two parts, the women living in the one, the men in the other. The long corridors, however, the hall, the dining-room, and the gardens are equally open to the two,—an arrangement admitting husbands and wives passing the greater part of the day together. Once a week they may spend a whole day with relatives and friends outside. Visitors are freely admitted; young men drop in, when their work is done, to chat, and young women come in search of advice on the management of their babies. While in London pauper parents are shunned as if they were lepers, there is no such feeling in Vienna. Most visitors take with them little offerings. As sons and daughters know that what they give goes directly to increase the comfort of their parents, and not, as in England, to swell the workhouse treasury, they give generously. The town provides the pensioners with a uniform, but each may decide whether or not he will use it. They may also adorn their rooms with their own property, and they enjoy many other liberties denied to English paupers.

The Vienna poor-law is by no means an ideal system; it has many defects; it works too much for the poor, not enough through the poor; and it places too much power in the hands of irresponsible persons. But we may, nevertheless, learn from it how to preserve little children from the taint of pauperism, and how to introduce some touch of brightness into the lives of our aged, deserving poor.

THE WEIRS IDEA.

Perhaps the brethren are beginning to hear about "The United Liberal Church" and to wonder what it means. Permit me, then, a few words in explanation. At Lake Weirs, N. H., a number of Universalist and Unitarian clergymen, who were attending a series of liberal religious grove meetings, met in August, 1892, and discussed the possibility and practicability of a closer association of all liberal religious churches. There was very evidently a growing sentiment in favor of a union of Universalists and Unitarians and other liberal churches. It has been publicly declared by representative men on both sides. Resolutions looking to a friendly co-operation of the two denominations had been introduced in the New York State convention of Universalists some years before, and, although voted down at the time, the idea has been steadily gaining. The same sentiment was given strong utterance at the Ministers' Institute in Chicago in 1887. It was earnestly advocated by that able champion of liberal religion, the Universalist Record, and became a practical experience in the New Jersey State convention of Universalists, where, under the strong leadership of such men as Dr. Crowe and Rev. J. F. Thompson, Universalists and Unitarians had equal recognition in the public services. So the brethren assembled at Weirs, reading the signs of the times, and already enjoying practical co-operation in their meetings, concluded that the time was ripe for a positive advance in that direction. A meeting was called at which there were present: Rev. E. B. Payne, of Berkeley, Cal.; Rev. E. L. Rexford, Roxbury, Mass.; Rev. M. D. Shutter, of Minneapolis; Rev. E. W. Whitney, of Milford, Mass.; Rev. F. A. Bisbee, of Philadelphia; Rev. L. H. Squires, of New Haven, Conn.; Rev. H. A. Rose, of Portsmouth, N. H.; Rev. J. B. Morrison, of Laconia, N. H.

An association was formed and named "The United Liberal Church." Rev. E. B. Payne was chosen President and Rev. L. H. Squires Secretary. An annual meeting will be held and an effort made to bring together for mutual counsel and co-operation all liberal Christians.

It is encouraging to learn that Michigan and Wisconsin are already getting the brethren together, that a "Liberal round-up" in Chicago is talked of, and that the Co-Worker has come to help on the good cause. Rev. L. H. Squires, Jamestown, N. Y., is gathering a list of friends of this movement, and earnestly desires that all clergymen, of whatever denomination, who are in sympathy with it, will send him their address that they may be added to the list and communicated with in regard to the future of this movement.

Church-Door Pulpit

PURPOSE, NOT ROMANCE, IN RELIGION.

A DISCOURSE BY REV. DR. EMIL G. HIRSCH.

In the minds of many, religion is associated with mere sentiment. As the flower exhales perfume, so, they hold, the soul of man breathes forth sweet fragrance, and this scented breath, as it were, is religion. Thus religion would largely be the manifestation of the æsthetic impulses of human nature. It would be a sister of poetry and music; it would be one of the gifted family that is sent out to gladden earth and to beautify it; the daughter of song or the inspired minister of the arts. Some truth there is in this conception; vainly would one endeavor to question this. Man is mentally so constituted that he cannot rest satisfied with a fragment; he would push on to the complete, and whenever the wings of real observation and possible experience droop, because too weak to carry the soul to those regions where the perfect looms into sight in undimmed beauty, the mind calls to its aid imagination, and fills out the gaps left by the outer, through the medium of the inner vision. Poetry will for this reason ever command the ready ears of men, for the poet brings report from dreamland; he has visited the table-lands of the heights; he sees in full, harmonious, rounded-out completeness what dusty day presents in broken outlines. The experience of which he sings is not the individual occurrence of a fleeting life, but is the universal law, a law which, sceptered, rules not merely now or did yesterday, but before time was, and also when time shall be no more. But the poet is not a solitary dweller on those heights where the broken rays are gathered into one grand warming sun; the philosopher, too, explores those glacial caverns, his thought is architect to the stately castle, with not one line out of proportion, not one room dark, not one stone misplaced, and not one column out of plumb. For this reason metaphysics will forever command the services of the boldest intellects, rewarding, as it does, their effort with a satisfaction and strength which the less courageous minds will forever lack.

And the third in this company of daring travelers towards the region hidden usually from view is, indeed, religion. It, too, dreams of completeness; it, too, creates the perfect world; it, too, takes the broken thread, and changes it into one of a web spun on the loom of eternity; it cherishes the conviction that the pattern but half unfolded will be revealed in its full colors and in its grand execution sometime. This certainty and this positive confidence of the completeness of things, now but partially unclosed, is fundamental to the message of religion. And yet, all this granted, he who holds religion to be only this—who makes her to be merely the sister of song, or of thought, has not the full, not the clear insight into her function, is a stranger in the regal audience chamber of religious inspiration. We account readily for the fact that, with so many, religion is dwarfed into a mere sentiment, not to say sentimentalism. So many of the professed prophets of religion have robbed her of her poetic laurel wreath. They have presented her in a guise aught but attractive; they have dashed from her hand the foaming, brimming cup of inspiration, and have instead compensated her with a rod wherewith to chastise men; they have hushed her sweet, soft voice that would sing, and made her the mouth-piece of dead, crystallized dogmas. Instead of leaving her to sound the clarion notes of the advance up the heights, they have made her sigh the wail of foul despair, degradation, doom, perdition.

This dreary, ungainly caricature of religion could not but in course of time bring on a reaction. Nature abhors a vacuum. The human soul cannot be mutilated; it cannot with impunity be hampered in its natural functions. As the craving for that which religion was destined to bring was not satiated, by natural recoil the human soul laid to its embrace the warmer figure of poetic religion, with all the greater intoxication of joy since priest and preacher had so often commanded to embrace a dead, chilled, cold verbal idol, without warmth, without love, without uplifting impulses. Not that we would join in the silly, one-sided condemnation of dogma; not that we would have a religion barren of thought. The dogmas are merely the trial balances of religious acquisitions. In the course of the development of humanity there come times, and they come frequently, when it is necessary to look into the ledgers, to examine whether they tally, or tally not. This is absolutely indispensable in the domain of active business; it is equally essential in the sphere of thought. There are hours when the human race would like to ascertain where it stands, what the amount is that is to its credit, what new venture, therefore, it may safely engage in. Dogma, now, is the crystallization of thought attained; is the currency struck for ready use in the mint of religious reflection and speculation. But being so, being merely a token of acquired possessions, it cannot at the same time be the symbol of what can ultimately be obtained. The dogma as a provisional statement, as a makeshift, a crutch to lean on, a round in the ladder to scale higher, is of eminent service, has been of great profit to the advance of religious thought. But mere dogma, repetition of the thought of an age that was, handling the worn-down pennies, the depreciated exchange of values, once standing for actual possession, beyond which we have gone, will do violence to the spirit of religion. This insistence upon dogmatic religion, on the part of metaphysics, as the substitute for religious culture, has brought about the revulsion which lands so many into the opposite mistake of confounding religion with mere sentiment, with mere romance without purpose. We Jews, perhaps, have never been troubled much with dogmatics. * * * But if Judaism has not suffered from the dogmatic spirit, Judaism as a religion has almost been robbed of its healthy life-flow by another distemper. Religion was thought to be by the Jews a mere matter of legal dialectics. The ceremony, the symbol, the perfunctory act were held to be the essential. Chained to a rite and hampered by fetters, that was the Promethean agony of Judaism, however loyal its supporters in the dark months and years of the middle ages. In those times there was an excuse for this conception. Yea, the willing martyrs felt not this guise of slavery as the garb of the prisoner. Underneath this outward restriction flowed, yet not as robustly as it might have, and as it should have, something of the old, the better, the nobler, the fuller fervor and the broader ambition of the prophet's freedom.

But in modern times the insistence that the clanking chain is Judaism, that the hampered gait marks the religious man, that the pot and the pan, an hour, a certain day, is the sum and substance of Jewish hope and duty, does indeed prey upon the vitals of Judaism as a religion. This emphasis robs it of all of its attraction, and what is worse, does injury to its true message; it is the cause of so much ignorance within Judaism to-day as to the true purpose of Judaism, leading naturally to indifference and ripening the fruitage of open desertion; hurrying our present generation into the old error of exchanging the cistern of living water for a broken well, of worshipping a new idol, the golden calf, instead of bowing in humble reverence before the as yet invisible altar where flames the true light of Jewish ethical and universal destiny.

No wonder, then, that to-day religion as a whole, and Judaism in particular, has merely for many the function of a safety valve, lest by pressure of too great emotion that boiler of ours, the heart, might explode. No wonder, then, that many pulpits to-day, Jewish and non-Jewish, ring with the appeal that, lost as we are in a dreary desert of ceremonialism or credal metaphysics, the emotions shall once more receive their due right. Ah, if they only received their due right, who would object? But as all reactions go to the extreme, so this recoil from dogmatics, or from ceremonialism, naturally whirls us to the other pole, where the emotions shall receive more than their right; yea, where they shall be constituted the sole ushers to the palace of religion.

Others again, and their thought, if thought it be, is clearly akin to the views of those whom I have sketched so far—others, indeed, believe that religion is not merely romantic sentiment, but is a purpose. Their purpose, however, again is romance. For many that are not Jews religion is merely a means to something beyond this life. It is a bridge-builder throwing the bold arches over the broad dark chasm which divides this life from the mysteries of the hereafter. It is merely a sort of arrangement to be insured against hell fires, and a contract to gain glory to come. This view of the purpose of religion is romance in itself, for the very insistence upon the concerns of the hereafter is due not to our clear thought and not to our ethical intentions, it is due to the requirements of our æsthetic nature. Why do men insist that there must be a hereafter? Because their æsthetic notions rebel when confronted with the blemishes, the imperfections of the present world. This world is not complete. Can this be the last? Can have come from one to whom we attribute completeness a work that seems to be the make-believe of a bungler? Ah! the woe of this life shall be turned into glory in that to come, and the imperfections of now and here shall then and there fall away from us, the discord be solved by the accords of the grand harmonies of the life to be. Can it be otherwise? The picture is here but half unrolled: these outlines must be filled up. The canvas shows unsightly blotches; these are the indications that the ultimate painting will be of transcending perfection: the divine artist cannot leave his work half finished.

In this manner the assurance and the need of assurance in the life to come is largely offspring of our æsthetic sense; and thus far those who would make religion a purpose, far yonder, are in the grasp of romance. There is a mere sentiment, sentimentalism, perhaps, not the clear guidance of religion. Others do not go so far. They make it the purpose of religion to act as a sort of anæsthetic. When we have to weep religion's hand dries the tears; when we sigh religion whispers into our ear soft words of hope; when we are suffering, religion applies the lotion which dulls the sting; when we are burdened, religion eases the yoke. As the surgeon requires his preparations to deaden the nerves; so religion when life with circumstance sharpened to cut approaches, hands us the balm, the elixir, which, if applied, makes us insensible to pain. Life is a great surgical operation room. The circumstances of life are the brutal surgeons; they wield the knife, bones are chipped, nerves are lacerated, organs are mutilated, blood flows. We are disappointed here; we are met there by obstacles;

we must separate friend from friend, father from son. Religion proffers the draught that makes unconscious; this is the purpose of religion. Again a romance! For a moment such religion may deaden the pang, but the more of this anæsthetic is applied, the greater grows the need of repeated application in larger doses until at last no effect can be produced upon the abused nervous organization, and blank despair remains. Ah! we whose duty it is to stand by coffins, we who have the opportunity of seeing men and women in situations which unbare their real nature to view, when the outer veneer is stripped from them and the assumed culture has taken wings and fled with the winds—we know that these anæsthetics are inoperative, that if religion has no higher function than this, it is a snare and a delusion.

Is there no purpose in religion? Is it merely sentiment and romance? Ah! there is to it a purpose. Religion is that force which makes man feel his "manness," if I may coin that word. In German I could express it graphically at once, Menschen-tum. We are not men unless religion speaks to us. We are this or that—we are one, opposed to all others. What are the principles of our actual life? Each one for himself, this is the law of our society; God blesses the foremost, the devil takes the hindmost. No feeling of affinity: We are the animal that fights for life—has merely the instinct of self-preservation and of self-propagation. We are engaged in a battle. But religion proclaims we shall not be this; as long as we are this we are incomplete. Man is one of a society. He is one of a kind that is created for something to do, and in the doing of that something lies the value of humanity at large, and of individual man for humanity. Religion has always been a social force. In its lowest forms already this was characteristic of it. The natural sciences have taught us the methods, how we should proceed with our studies. The man in the laboratory takes one fact, another, then a third; he takes one occurrence, and then a second and a third; he makes one experiment, a second, etc., and after he has gathered all the facts, he carefully sets out to draw his conclusions. He does not enter the laboratory with the theories made; the theories are to be found. It is the same method which the properly trained thinker must pursue, in religious speculative thought. We take the facts, and from the facts we derive the true theory.

Now take the facts of religious life in the most primitive types: among the tribes of savages, for instance; religion even there is the bond that binds the different individuals into one community, a community that has a common life, some common purpose; a community that gives to each member a certain standing, but asks from each one a certain return in the shape of duty and obligation. God himself is not excluded from this community. It is the fundamental concept of primitive religion, that God is one of the tribe: he is not merely the God of the tribe, but he is a member of that tribe. At the banquet he receives his share; in this lies the origin of sacrifice. At the common gathering God is remembered; that is the origin of prayer. He is spoken of as the ever present but invisible friend; he is a member of the community. He assumes occasionally the semblance of an animal; that animal therefore becomes sacred; it is not eaten; for you do not eat your brother, even savages would not eat one of their own tribe; the "Totem" animal is not deemed permissible food, because he is one of the tribe. The religious idea it is, then, which forges the chain of social union, even in the form in which primitive religion presents itself. Go east and west, abide with the varied sons of man! Listen to the proclamation of the primitive Aryans; yea, tarry in the land of the almond-shaped eyes, rest in the countries where dress is almost unknown! you find these to be the facts. The conclusion is certainly warranted: Religion is that force which makes of individuals a community; the object of religion is to bind man to his fellow. Religion has this purpose in all of its manifestations; such should be in a greater degree the purpose of religious association in those higher developments of religious thought which are so near to our heart. Religion has this purpose not for life to come, but for life here on earth. Religion, being the force that binds man to man, is essentially ethical. The word ethics is bandied about on the lips of so many as standing for highest thought, but I doubt if many ever give thought to what it means. It sounds well; what is more, it sounds big, and what sounds big is liked. But many know not what the big term denotes. Such words are with many mere fads. Such phrases are heard from the north pole to the south, all around the world. Slang phrases even have belted the earth; a very epidemic they sweep across the seas. In this, more serious terms share somewhat the fate of the gutter-terms. They issue forth we know not how. They stand for something, they indicate a certain direction of thought; they are taken up by everybody, and when we do not know what to say we use these words. They sound well, they sound big; that is the main thing. Ethics, one of the latter day sacramental spell-words, has come to mean something out of the ordinary run of life, something mysterious; something that is not to be found in a synagogue, in a church, something entirely new that nobody ever dreamt of. But ethics is old. It is based on the fact that man owes something to his fellow; that he is not one by himself to perhaps force others to serve; that he is one of a community, whom he must serve.

Now, religion in its crudest forms sets forth that purpose; it has been ethical even in fetishism, and was even in this form busy with right and duty, with obligation and consideration for the common life; and the higher forms of religion are certainly not inferior in this respect. But ethics does not concern itself with life to come. Indeed, we can wait for the life to come. All our bothering will not lift the veil, all our dreaming will not give the surety, and all our pleading will not open the door, and all our imagination will not allow us to peep through the crack of the wall that shuts us out; speculate, doubt, hope, despair, all vain to make response to these questions. One surety is as immovable as the everlasting hills: that a life well lived here is the best preparation for what comes hereafter. More than this, religion has not to do with questions of this order. Religion originally was something for this life, and something for this society, and it is this which Judaism has always preached. Not a word of a hereafter in our Bible. They say this is poverty; I say it is power. They tell us it is a lack; I say it is fullness. It is characteristic of our religion that it makes no announcement about the things to come, and does not pretend to make them the magnet to draw us on. How little to-day the Jews understand their very religion is shown by the fact that nothing holds us together half so strongly as the cemetery; that there is no use for a man in my position but to preach funeral sermons. But for life the rabbi does well as an ornament for the mantel-piece. We have lapsed from the clear perception of the prophetic mission of Judaism, or else these questions of death and the graveyard would not be the most prominent. And in our pulpits the young graduates are always indulging in discourses about the existence of God, to prove what needs no proof, and the immortality of the soul! A beautiful subject, indeed, for a Yom Kippur afternoon. It will make the women cry and the men simper, and the preacher will be lauded as eloquent, nice, cute and sweet. But, in confidence, that is not Jewish. It may be nothing, but if it is something, it is absolutely not Jewish. Judaism has never lost itself in the mysteries of a hereafter, but it has said: Here is your duty, this life, this world; they are enough, for the present.

Not in prayer and not in festival, says the prophet, consists our religion. "Your sacrifices I have not asked; if you come to my temple, have I invited you? Why, you make me weary with your prayers; your hands are full of blood. Wash you and make you clean; cease to do evil, learn to do good." Good and evil are terms denoting conduct. Good is what is social (not in the sense of our club-jargon); evil, what is selfish, anti-social. "Cease to oppress;" do not live for yourself alone, "plead for the right. Judge the fatherless." Do not pick them up and dump them into institutions and pay your annual contributions, and think that thereby you have done your duty; but judge them—judge what they need. Do not think that by an annual contribution, to pay somebody else, you have discharged your duty. "Help the widow;" "those that are weak, come to their rescue;" that is the religion which Isaiah preached. His religion is religion indeed! not a sentiment and a romance; not a dream and a promise; not dry metaphysics, but purpose in life: The knowledge that we belong to all, and that each one has to do his share in the life of all! To change this knowledge into a firm conviction, and to strengthen this impulse, to give it deeper roots and a richer fruitage, is the purpose of true religious training.

Judaism is often presented in the guise of a romance; a romance of race. Orthodox Judaism would have the purpose of Judaism be to keep us together, so that at the dawn of redemption's day we may march with flying colors back to Jerusalem. And what will we do in Jerusalem? We shall re-erect the temple; we shall again bring sacrifices, we shall be a kingdom apart from all others under the scepter of our king. In the meantime, while waiting for this, we must have our own barriers so that we will not be lost; we must have our ceremonies, so that we will have the testimonials of our citizenship in the priestly kingdom. Conservative Judaism, if one can characterize that which has no character, is romantic in another way. The history of our religion is indeed a romance of suffering more terrible than Dante's divine comedy, more pathetic than the Nibelungen; an epos of tears and persecutions, scanned for more than fifteen hundred years, the last stanza of which has not yet been composed; a romance such as the world never before heard of, and I hope will never again bear of. This romance it is that is brought into the foreground by conservative Judaism. Judaism is then merely a memory of sufferings gone through. It is the historic pride of suffering. There is such a thing as pride of suffering; there is such a thing as voluptuousness of grief. I have met mothers having lost their children, who for three or four, ten years thereafter, would constantly nourish their grief. They nursed it because it gave them satisfaction. Such fondling of grief is by psychology called the voluptuousness of grief. Something of this order conservatism indulges in. It revels in rehearsing our sufferings and it makes us a religious organization held together by nothing else and for no other purpose than by the memory of suffering gone through and for the determination to suffer again.

This determination I should, too, emphasize. I should, if I had the eloquent tongue, thunder into the ears of our rising young women and young men the knowledge of the nobility of suffering. I should tell them that the sufferer in history is not the meanest, but rather is the most glorious. I should impress upon them the fact that, according to the code of military ethics, at least in European armies, the officer that resigns in the face of the enemy is shot as a coward. The officer must remain in the service until peace is signed: then he may sheathe his sword, and if he wishes to be relieved of his emperor's commission, he may petition to be retired. But as long as batteries pour forth their fury, and as long as battle-fields wait for the harvest, the officer that would resign marks himself as a coward. The military duty of Israel is not yet ended. A coward he who would run because the enemy is massing his columns for the attack. With a view to escape the unpleasant fight many seek new affiliations. But the very escape sought is not vouchsafed. Is it the Jew that to-day is attacked? It is the Shemite that is obnoxious. And as a fact all or most of those who do not want to be Jews in religion, present all those characteristics that make the Shemite indeed objectionable. Loud they are in their professions; they want to be in the first rank, they must get the best seat! Anti-Jewish Semitism deserves all the blows it receives. I for one decline to fight its battles. Desertion from the post of duty does not help. Let the "cowards" be branded as they deserve to be, by Jew and non-Jew alike!

But this is not all of Judaism. There is a purpose beyond, and that purpose is ours. Judaism has always looked toward the future. It has always looked forward to the time to come when this earth shall be reclaimed and be relieved from selfishness, and to be the leader in this hope is the historic mission of Judaism. And this is our Judaism, not pinned to race and not pivoted on creed; not a sentiment, but the purpose to go into the world and reclaim the world. But well and wisely have the rabbis said, first adorn thyself and after that attempt to wreath in flowers others. So the Jew wishing to bring about the humanitarianism of the world must at home first learn the song of humanitarianism; but after he has learned it, let him go out to wake the world by his sweet lay of love! That is the purpose, not the romance of Judaism. So, friends, let me ask of you, if still you are in the thrall of error, break the shackles. Not as a sentiment, not merely as an aesthetic need, not merely as a service of fear, not merely as an anesthetic, something to lighten the gloom of the grave, has religion power and charm. Religion is that force which wings the thought that man is brother to man, which fills the heart with enthusiasm for that thought, and which steels the hand to carry out the thought in active life. Thus, religion addresses itself to the three great departments of the soul-life, to the mind, to the heart, and to the will. And Judaism is the historic force united to realize the human life in example for others to follow. Thus let us be rid of error, let us be wedded to the nobler, the more inspiring truth, to purpose without romance!

The Study Table

A SUCCESSFUL LIFE.

Namely, that of Amos Bronson Alcott, as reported by his friend Frank B. Sanborn, in two handsome volumes, published by Roberts Bros., Boston, for three dollars and fifty cents, and well worth the money. Mr. Sanborn is not an ideal biographer. He has plenty of materials, but he lacks the art of continuity. He does not seem able to fuse them into a whole of mutually consenting parts. Often we find ourselves craving a few more solid facts, a few more details, where, it would seem, it should be easy enough to furnish them. The total impression is, after all, somewhat fragmentary and scrappy. There is a lack of definition and analysis. We feel at every page how great his admiration for Alcott was and is, but the grounds of it we do not find clearly set forth. Perhaps we ought not to look for them in any formula or definite contribution to his biographer's theory and practice of life, but rather in an attitude of mind, a charm of personality, a devotion to plain living and high thinking as life's double best.

Notwithstanding these deductions, Mr. Sanborn has given us a very interesting book. If we never seem to see Alcott single and whole, we have many glimpses of him that are full of charm, and, with a man as with a mountain, that is always good. Moreover, we have many of Mr. Sanborn's deliverances on topics relating to his subject that are most interesting and valuable. Best of all, we have a great deal of Emerson. Some of it, a good deal of it, we have had here and there before. It is no worse for that. And it is no careless derogation from the passages quoted here from Mr. Alcott or any other writer to say that every bit of Emerson gives us a peculiar and unrivaled happiness. We always brighten up when he appears upon the scene, and not less because the trait he manifests habitually is a certain noble common sense. Children, they say, are "not a mean but a mixture" of their parents. So is it with the thoughts born to Emerson concerning his friend. They are not a mean but a mixture. There is no middle term between the praise and blame. The blame is frank, and sometimes stern enough. But the praise is always paramount. Alcott had a very high opinion of Emerson. We have not only his monograph about him, than which nothing at once so good and so compact has so far been written, but many other things. But Alcott's admiration for Emerson is surpassed by that of Emerson for Alcott. Alcott's was that of a superior for an inferior person. Superiors he did not know. He said to Emerson: "You write on the genius of Plato, of Pythagoras, of Jesus; why do you not write of me?" This self-estimate may seem a trifle overweening, but for those who are disposed to think Alcott a simpleton, a crank, there remains forever to rebuke them the opinion of Emerson, who, recognizing clearly his defects, still thought him one of the most remarkable of men.

Alcott's father's name was Alcox, but so only by corruption from Alcock, the name of the progenitor from whom all the Connecticut Alcotts and Alcotts and Alcoxes are derived. Alcott changed his name from Alcox in his youth, a cousin, William, doing the same thing at the same time. His father would gladly have sent him to college, but he could not afford to. So he went peddling in Virginia and North and South Carolina. In this way he got an education and experience that cost him, Mr. Sanborn reckons, about as much as a college education—from four to five hundred dollars! This means that he did not do a lucrative business; also that he did not attend to it; was shiftless and extravagant, especially in the matter of fine clothes; borrowed from his father $600, paid him $180—the beginning of a continuous and increasing misery of indebtedness which reached its term only when Louisa Alcott wrote "Little Women." The conversions of the saints do not offer any livelier contrasts than that between Alcott the young dandy, proud of his ill-gotten clothes, and Alcott the educational reformer. The transition was abrupt, unheralded. The new life brought him into connection with Samuel J. May, and then—of all things in his life the happiest—with a sister of that saint, forever blessed, who became his wife. To label Alcott's philosophy may be a difficult matter. To label the philosopher is easy enough. He was a peripatetic. He went from one place to another in Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, always beginning the new enterprise hopefully, only to find it dwindling before long. The last and most important venture, the Temple School in Boston, began with thirty children and gradually went down and down till there were five children left, three of them his own, one a friend's, the fifth the colored girl, whose retention in opposition to the protesting parents of other children gave his school its coup de grace. The publication of his "Conversations on the Gospels" had already done its work of disintegration. The fault was not in him, but in his patrons' minds—that they were too ignorant and prejudiced to appreciate his better way. A Harvard professor said of the work that one third of it was absurd, one third blasphemous, and one third obscene. The first count was probably true; the others utterly false. In Alcott's school-keeping there was much of real wisdom mixed with some things impracticable and wild. Its generous ideals are still a sound impeachment of our prevailing methods, and much that is best in our improved methods is the fulfillment of his prophetic hope. In this connection, as elsewhere, Mr. Sanborn has defrauded us of those humorous aspects of the matter to which we were entitled. His own sense of humor is sufficiently keen, but Alcott has been so much laughed at that he is bound he will not flatter the exaggerated tendency. But he might have been much less sparing of the comic, as we can imagine Emerson would have been, and still have shown that none the less here was abundant call for admiration, love and praise.

Alcott's loyalty to his colored pupil was one of the many signs of his anti-slavery sentiment, which, beginning early in the contest, never wavered till the end. When Garrison was imprisoned to save him from the mob of Boston gentlemen of property and standing, Alcott was one of those who visited him in jail. (There is no excuse at this late day for putting the rope by which Garrison was dragged around his neck. It was around his waist, as Mr. Sanborn ought to know.) Alcott's most heroic moment, as heroism is commonly reckoned, was when he went with Higginson and others to rescue Anthony Burns, and, standing on the Court House steps alone, said to the rescuers: "Why are we not within?" Higginson tells the story in his inimitable way. A few years later Alcott was ready to go to Virginia in behalf of John Brown, whose clientele was larger in Concord than anywhere else.

In the Transcendental Movement Alcott's place is high up among the highest. Mr. Sanborn calls him and Emerson the founders of the Transcendental Club. If he had said they were among the founders, he would have been more accurate. Others were more initial in the club than they. But Alcott was emphatically "a clubbable man." His conversational class was a kind of club, a continuation of his Temple school, but with adults for scholars, whose questions frequently were not less childish than those of his first pupils. The sturdy common sense of Parker and Emerson comes into the discussions like a strong wind into a bank of fog. The "Town and Country Club" was also of Alcott's devising. Higginson would have let in women. Emerson objected in a letter which Mr. Sanborn calls "remarkable." It is so for its lack of any reason for his course. The "Saturday Club" agreed with Wordsworth that and arranged for high living and high thinking, much to the distaste of Mr. Alcott, who was an infrequent visitor. For something racy we commend to our readers the elder Henry James' account of one of the dinners of this club. Its glimpse of Hawthorne is one of the best vouchsafed to us.

"Plain living and high thinking are no more,"

Mr. Sanborn's second volume opens with an account of "The Dial" and Alcott's relation to that time-marking periodical, so provocative of mirth to the Phillistine mind. Going to England he attracted other spirits, worse than himself for dissatisfaction with the existing order, and two of them, Lane and Wright, came back with him, and with him initiated the experiment at Fruitlands. This was a much more drastic experiment than that at Brook Farm, where, according to Lane, there were "eighty or ninety persons playing away their youth and day-time in a miserable, joyous, frivolous manner," and "not above four or five who could be selected as really and truly progressing beings." At Fruitlands not only was all meat abjured in the first degree but also in the second and the third. No eggs or milk were to be used. Predatory vermin were to be let alone. What shoes should be made of in default of leather was a serious problem. Mrs. Alcott's cooking for the community, with her limited resources, must have been a fearful tax upon her ingenuity and strength. The experiment ran its course in a few months, a rigorous winter hastening the conclusion, which was the hardest blow that Alcott ever got. It drove him to his chamber in despair, where he refused all food and came near to ending his visible relation with our present life; but his good wife persuaded him to go on with the hard struggle. The remainder of his life—and half of it was yet to come—ran a more placid course, in less violent antagonism with the social order as he found it, partly because of his own changing temper and partly because of certain more or less evident realizations of his hopes. The great literary success of his daughter brought his financial troubles to an end, and enabled him to publish his own "Tablets" and "Concord Days," regardless of the expense. Moreover, his own lecturing tours were not always so pitiful as that one from which he returned with one dollar as the gross proceeds; the net being much less, as his overcoat had been stolen. When he was eighty-one he traveled 5,000 miles in seven months, and, lecturing more than once a day upon the average, came home with $1,000 in his purse. In a good chapter on "The Alcott Family in Literature" Mr. Sanborn urges the consideration that the family debt to Louisa was not so absolute as it has been commonly regarded, seeing that without the material furnished her by the household experiences she never could have written her books. Alcott's literary ability was at its best in the sonnets which he wrote in his old age, some of which are packed with lofty meaning and felicitous expression. It was Mrs. Alcott, who never wrote anything called literature, who had—so Mr. Sanborn thinks—the rarest literary gifts.

Mr. Sanborn has sometimes been considered an extravagant admirer of Alcott and a too lavish ministrant upon the altar of his vanity. But there is little in these volumes to bear out such an accusation. There is frank allowance of his hero's weaknesses and faults, and of his tendency to drop below the level of his best. Prof. William T. Harris adds a chapter of 125 pages, in which he discusses Alcott's philosophy. The outcome of his study is by no means flattering. It is that Alcott, following the Neo-Platonists, made the idea of lapse central to his conception of nature and humanity. Here he was diametrically opposed to Emerson, who was nothing if not a believer in an infinite progression. It is Prof. Harris' belief that from the failure at Fruitlands dates a more or less conscious attempt on Alcott's part to introduce certain elements of evolution into his system. He does not seem to think that the new patch on the old garment is a complete success. The truth would seem to be that Alcott was a philosophic pessimist, an optimist by temperament, and that as he went on in life his temperament got the better of his philosophy, the improvement in his personal environment helping to this end. But Alcott's value was not in his philosophy as such; else Emerson could not have valued him so highly while directly at variance with his doctrine of the lapse of spirit into matter. Something of pure fancy mingled with his philosophical ideas in their habitual expression. No doubt these ideas attracted some people. But his attraction for the best was of a different sort. It was an attraction which declares itself in many sentences and passages of his writings in these volumes. Re-enforced by his personal exaltation, if such things had not stirred men's hearts in some strange fashion, it would have been strange indeed.

I set out to write of a successful life. Certainly Alcott's was far enough from being one, judged by the ordinary standards of the forum and the market, but not farther than the ordinary successes of our business and our politics are from being successful, judged by Alcott's standards. And, when every allowance has been made for the defects of Alcott's character and philosophy, I must confess that in his devotion to ideas and ideals he impresses me as vastly more successful than a good many of our millionaires. He once said, "That is failure when a man's idea ruins him, when he is dwarfed and killed by it; but when he is ever growing by it, ever true to it, and does not lose it by any partial or immediate failures,—that is success, whatever it seems to the world." He did not say this of himself, but it could not be truer of another than it was of him. After this fashion his was a successful life.

JOHN W. CHADWICK.

THE MAXIMS AND REFLECTIONS OF GOETHE. Translated by Bailey Saunders. With a preface. New York: Macmillan & Co.—Mr. Saunders gives a good account of Goethe's maxims and reflections, when and how they were written. There is the usual apology for Goethe's immorality, and it is as lame as usual. He has the right idea of the true work of a translator: "In so far as every language has a peculiar genius, a literal translation must necessarily be a bad one; and any faithful translation must of its nature be free. * * * But he must guard against the abuse of his position: his liberty may become license, and his translation instead of being faithful may be fantastic. The translator's first and last duty is to efface himself." As for the maxims and reflections, their average quality is excellent, if they do not entirely bear out the lofty praise of the translator. They range through a scale of several degrees. The best are wholly admirable; the poorest "say an undisputed thing in such a solemn way." They are classified under the heads of "Life and Character," "Literature and Art," "Science" and "Nature." One note continually recurs, "In contemplation as in action, we must distinguish between what may be attained and what is unattainable." But how are we to know what is unattainable except by pressing against the barriers with all our might? Who knows but they may break? There are maxims here which seem to teach this also. For example, "A man must cling to the belief that the incomprehensible is comprehensible; otherwise he would not try to fathom it." And again, "If I acquiesce at last in some ultimate fact of nature, it is, no doubt, only resignation; but it makes a great difference whether the resignation takes place at the limits of human faculty or within the hypothetical boundaries of my own narrow individuality." The one thing is easily confused with the other. There are many good sentences about the Bible, so good that we have to remind ourselves that they were written nearly a hundred years ago. There are sentences about literature which seem to anticipate Zola and Guy de Maupassant by a whole century and to condemn their evil ways. Some of the most practical maxims are among the best. For example, "If one has not read the newspapers for some months and then reads them all together, one sees, as one never saw before, how much time is wasted with this kind of literature." There is blissful ignorance of the Sunday journal's superabundance in that naive remark. Reading, in any true sense of the word, will soon be a lost art if our present tendencies are kept up.

PIETRO GHISLERI. By F. Marion Crawford. New York: MacMillan & Co.—To enjoy Mr. Crawford thoroughly one must not expect too much of him. He writes for the amusement of his readers, and those who go to him to be amused will get what they require. They will get more than this—the attraction of goodness in some of his characters, the repulsion of badness in some others. In the present instance we have in Pietro Ghisleri a man not wholly good; a man fascinated by another's wife and giving himself over somewhat recklessly to his fascination. We cannot help liking him, but we do not like his faults, and we are glad when, at the end, he is made happy by the love of a true woman, the heroine of the book, whose first husband is taken off in the convenient manner of the novelists, so seldom encountered in real life. Over against the good woman there is the bad woman, for cruel intrigue one of the baddest of the bad. Gossip—Virgil's rumor, which grows as it goes—the way it grows, its blighting, killing power—plays a great part in the book. Sometimes the net is woven so close about the victims that it seems they must be hopelessly entangled, but Pallas Athene was not more kind to much-enduring Odysseus than is Mr. Crawford to his own elect. He writes much better now than formerly, having much fewer oracles. He is reported as saying that he has no pleasure in writing except for the money that it brings. We do not believe he said this; and if he did we do not believe that it is true.

The many friends of the late Henry Doty Maxson will be pleased to know that his sermons are just out from the press of Chas. H. Kerr & Co. We hope to notice them in UNITY in a week or two, and meanwhile we shall be glad to fill orders for them.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE ARENA for July opens with a short paper by W. D. McCrackan on "Our Foreign Policy," the chief value of which is in its emphasis upon the fact that freedom of access to natural opportunity is the greatest benefit to the people of a country; the writer pointing out that, land being a fixed quantity, "every child born in the United States and every immigrant landing upon these shores increases the demand" and further enriches the land-owning class. Helen Campbell's sixth paper on "Women Wage-Earners" discusses specific evils and abuses in factory life and in general trades, and suggests remedial measures. Rev. T. E. Allen has a thoughtful article on "Reason at the World's Parliament of Religions," in which he discusses our true relation to Jesus. Mr. Geo. G. Brown presents very ably the liquor dealer's side of the question, an answer to which is promised us at an early day. There is, also, a bright dialogue on the "Charities of Dives," by A. R. Carman, the scene being laid in the spirit world; the verdict of nine jurors in the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy—among the jurors being Alfred Russell Wallace, O. B. Frothingham, Cyrus A. Bartol, Frances E. Willard, Henry George and the Marquis of Lorne; two articles on the money question, the critical part of Mr. Buell's being the more able; an article on "Realism in German Literature," by Dr. Blum; a negro sketch, by Miss Dromgoole; "The Confessions of a Suicide," by Coulson Kernahan; one of Mr. Flower's vigorous editorials; and a number of interesting reviews—on the whole, a particularly strong number.

THE FREE THINKERS' MAGAZINE is doing a good work in discussing the points at issue in the minds of those who affirm and those who deny religious doctrines,—not indiscriminately ridiculing form and substance, as some so-called free-thinkers' organs do. In evidence of its fair-mindedness we note that the leading article in the July number, "Reason and Dogma," is by one to whose name "Rev." is prefixed, and that there are two other clerical contributors,—the three being Messrs. J. C. F. Grumbine, E. P. Powell and E. P. Adams.

THE UNIVERSITY EXTENSION WORLD for July has a timely and judicious article by Mr. Richard Waterman, Jr., entitled "The World's Fair—What It Offers to University Extension Students." It also contains the recent convocation address of the President of Chicago University, which is very interesting reading.

LITTEL'S LIVING AGE for July 1-8 has an interesting and instructive article by J. W. Fortescue, taken from the Nineteenth Century, on the "Influence of Climate Upon Race." No very definite conclusions are reached, but the reality, strength and rapidity of the influence are made evident.

World's Fair Notes

It would be a surprise greater than the Fair itself if a collection of works as large as that exhibited by American sculptors should make good its high claim to recognition on the ground of interest or artistic merit. With much that is promising, there is nothing supremely satisfying—nothing wholly good. To be even more frank, what one work of the American sculptors deserves more than a friendly word—a sort of very-good-for-you praising? Art does not require one to be patriotic. It insists on individual responsibility, and names the man, not the nation.

In my judgment it is a sort of barbarism to divide the art building off into sections, naming the United States, France, Denmark, etc. Truth told, France should not send art exhibits as she sends stuff for her agricultural department. But Paul Dubois should send his splendid sculptures, Bonnet his pain ings. It should be emancipated from territorial limits, and come to us as the expression of the individual genius. It is what the man can do, not the French-man or English-man. What we get in these displays is not so much what the national life produces, but what it arrests.

America has not got far enough along to do more than say of her exhibit, "These things were done in the United States. It is our home talent."

The hope of a distinctively American art may never be realized. It is after all an unwise clamor. William H. Seward once wrote to an aspiring youth: "The mission of America is to break down barriers, race limitations, prohibitions, in art as in all things, and foster only the growth of individual liberty. The symbolism of race or nationality under the sway of personal freedom will be worn lightly by the emancipated soul." Perhaps it is this force of emancipation that is putting off and may be circumventing altogether the building up of a distinctively American art; the distinction, if there is to be one, to be seen in its variance not only from old standards but from any new ones whenever the individual gets "a gleam of light from the above."

In the room devoted to sculpture by the United States there would appear to be innumerable "gleams," but whether from above or not one hardly dares to say. In some cases, however, the fact is pretty plainly to be seen.

What to say, for instance, of this group called "The Vanderbilt Family," by a Miss Brooks? What not to say, or what to say, it is all one. There is nothing to say. It is silly, and you don't wish to consider it; yet around it circle admiring eyes, and you must stop and wonder. If some conceited lad from the country, who had not had advantage for measuring the lucubrations of his genius with contemporary art or the models of the antique world, should come along and say: "I did it; whittled it all with a knife," you would feel happy in being able to graciously let it all pass, and go seeking the art-soul elsewhere. But, no; it has been deliberately placed as a good exhibit, and the papers have spoken well of it. Query: Suppose it had been named the "Humpty-Dumpty Family?" Ah, there were a chance for a laugh, and so would come relief. But seriously regarding it—what shall we say? A stuffy, hideous thing? Yes, quite so. And so neither distinctively American nor distinctively anything else that pleases the mind's eye.

But how is the model for the new Shakspeare statue, by Mr. Ordway Patridge?—the duplicate bronze to be placed in Lincoln Park. Mr. Patridge has written entertainingly of the "American School of Sculpture," and his early sketch for his Shakspeare promised a vigorous treatment of his clay. But this large finished model has woefully lost the best suggestions of the original. The face is commonplace, the position lazy. It is dudeish and wholly uninteresting. His Lowell and Hale busts are better, but fall short of the mark in not even growing on one. But, for all this, there is a purpose of great work discernible, and Mr. Patridge is doubtless sharing in the uncertainties attendant on the new emancipation.

Mr. Gelert contributes his group called "The Struggle for Work." It was a great undertaking and demanded far more time for its execution than the sculptor was able to give it. The idea of it is catching, and the group has received much praise. But it can hardly be called a successful rendering. It is confusing to the eye, frantic beyond need, and leaves an impression of weakness, uncertainty of aims, etc. That is about all one can say of it, but it is cheering to see Mr. Gelert, though not to the manner born, driving away in the instinctively American fashion, hitting the mark if he can, but going ahead all the same if he doesn't. What he needs, like all us Americans, is more repose, a vaster leisure in which to nurse the great resolve until it answers its own readiness. S. H. M.

Correspondence

FROM THE WORLD'S FAIR UNITARIAN EXHIBIT.

DEAR UNITY: Your readers ought to know that the Unitarian exhibit in the gallery of the great Manufacturers Building is justifying its existence and fulfilling its mission. Here in a quiet nook in the midst of the whirl and greatness of the colossal exhibition we lose sight of the individual, but the human family stands before us in magnificent proportions, and the word "Unitarian" carries with it the thought of the unity of things and the loving Father over all. This church corner of the Exposition is not without its suggestive interest. Representatives of the faiths of Luther, Calvin, Wesley, Swedenborg, and Parker greet each other here in cordial good will. Our little exhibit contains samples of the British Unitarian publications, Sunday-school material, etc., the publications of the Western Unitarians, the Southern and Pacific coast periodicals, and a full line of the A. U. A. publications, with such photographs as have been placed at our disposal. We are not permitted to sell under the rules of the Exposition, but the American Unitarian Association has placed at our disposal a large number of tracts for free distribution. This has proven to be an opportunity for missionary work rarely offered to one space and time. During the last four weeks I have spoken to over nine hundred persons; many of them called not for love or idle curiosity; and I have been able to put into the hands of earnest inquirers from all parts of the United States hundreds of such tracts as James Freeman Clarke's "Why I Am a Unitarian," C. W. Wendt's "What the Unitarians Believe," etc. etc. A limited number of copies have been furnished me for free distribution, of the sermons of Revs. Sunderland, Milsted, Fenn, Blake, Jones, Savage, and others, and much gratitude has been expressed for them. It is a matter of regret that the Unity Mission Tracts and Short Tracts are not available for free distribution, owing to the lack of funds. We trust that those who believe in the missionary power of the printed page will bear this in mind and increase the material for distribution. Here we may send your best and highest thought to all parts of the world.

CALLING THE ROLL.

They have taken their places before me,

The children, with faces so bright,
All ready for school and its duties,
With hearts that are happy and light.

And I, with my ledger before me,
Look over the faces so dear
To see who is missing this morning,
Or who answers blithely out—
"Here!"

There is Gertie, and Minnie, and Ida,
And Lillie with golden hair,
And over the way, just beside her,
Sit Meta and Lizzie and Clare.

All here. But the next name is missing,
And my heart throbs, and fast the tears fall;

O, George! thy life's lesson is ended,
Thou art with the great teacher of all.

So the names of the lassies and laddies
Ring out on the air strong and clear.
Some are missing, some few gone forever,
And from some comes the cheerful
"I'm here!"

Heaven grant on Eternity's morning,
When we stand by the Father so
dear,

And He calleth that last long, long roll call,

May we all answer. "Lord, I am here."

CANINE MANNERS.

Few animals excel the dog in the power of expressing emotion. This power is a sure sign of an animal which is habitually in communication with its fellows for certain common ends. There are many reasons for the tail being the chief organ of expression among dogs. They have but little facial expression beyond the lifting of the lip to show the teeth and the dilation of the pupil when angry. The jaws and contiguous parts are too much specialized for the serious purpose of seizing prey to be fitted for such purposes as they are in man. There is no doubt that hounds habitually watch the tails of those in front of them when drawing a covert. If a faint drag is detected the tail of the finder is at once set in motion, and the warmer the scent the quicker does it wag. Others seeing the signal instantly join, and there is an assemblage of waving tails: before the least whimper is heard. When the pack is at full cry upon a strong scent the tails cease to wave, but are carried aloft in full view.

The whole question of tail-wagging is a very interesting one. All dogs wag their tails when pleased, and the movement is generally understood by their human associates as an intimation that they are very happy. The chief delight of wild dogs, as with modern hounds and sporting dogs, is in the chase and its accompanying excitement and consequences. When the presence of game is first detected is invariably the time when tails are wagged for the common good. The wagging is an almost invariable accompaniment of this form of pleasure, which is one of the chiefest among the agreeable emotions when in a wild state. Owing to some inoculation of the nervous mechanism, which at present we cannot unravel, the association of pleasure and wagging has become so inseparable that the movement of the tail follows the emotion, whatever may call it forth.

An explanation of a similar kind can be found for the fact that dogs depress their tails when threatened or scolded. When running away the tail would be the part nearest the pursuer, and therefore most likely to be seized. It was therefore securely tucked away between the hind legs. The act of running away is naturally closely associated with the emotion of fear, and therefore this gesture of putting the tail between the legs becomes an invariable concomitant of retreat or submission in the presence of superior force.

THE BURNED HEN.

A friend has lately told me the following story. In the western part of Massachusetts a man had a fine stock farm; that is, a farm for raising cows and horses. But a few weeks ago a fire broke out in the barn, and burnt not only the building and the hay, but most of the animals also. After the fire the owner walked over the ruins. It was a sad sight to see the charred bodies of his fine Jersey cows and his high-spirited horses, to say nothing of the money lost with them.

But at the end of the barn he saw a sight which touched him more than all the rest. There sat an old black hen. He wondered that she did not move her head to look at him as he came near her, but he thought she must be asleep. He poked her with his cane, and to his surprise, the wing which he touched fell off into ashes. Then he knew that she had been burned to death. But out from under her came a faint little peep, and pushing her aside with his cane, the man found—what do you think?—ten little live yellow chickens! The poor hen had sacrificed her own life to save them, and had held her place in the fire as Casablanca held his on the burning deck. That sight touched the man more than everything else, and he has to own that his eyes grew a little more moist than usual.

Perhaps this may make some of our readers think of what Jesus said over poor Jerusalem. "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing, and ye would not!" Do you not think he would have been glad to know of such a hero as this one? And if the lower creatures, as we call them, can sacrifice themselves for others, ought we to be any less loving and self-forgetful?

STORIES OF BATTLE.

A pleasing incident is told of Robert E. Lee, in the late civil war. One day when he was inspecting a battery, and his soldiers had gathered in a group to welcome him, this action drew upon him the hot fire of the Union guns. The General noticed it, and he faced about and advised the men to go under shelter. But he did not do this himself. He walked coolly onward, at the risk of his life, and picked up and replaced an unfledged sparrow which had fallen from its nest in a tree close by the battery.

One of the surprises of the civil war was the nerve shown by boys whose youthfulness caused the recruiting officer to hesitate about enlisting them. At the battle of Shiloh the little drummers of the Fifty-fifth Illinois were found in the ranks, gun in hand, whence they were rescued by the Chaplain, who formed them into a hospital corps. One of them, "Little Joe," worked like a hero in caring for the wounded. When night came it found him by the log-house used as a hospital at Pittsburg Landing. He lay down on the wet ground outside, and went to sleep. As the wounded died inside they were carried out and laid alongside the sleeping boy, whom the attendants supposed to be dead. In the morning, when Joe awoke, he found himself at the head of a ghastly row of dead bodies. The nerve which had carried the boy through the toil and dangers of the preceding day forsook him, and with a yell he fled from the spot, shouting: "I won't be used as a header to dead men."

—American Youth.

THE relative value of property and children was amusingly estimated by Baby Hattie (less than two years old), who had climbed up to her mamma's desk to "vite" and upset the ink bottle—its contents flooding desk, letters, carpet and baby, who, nothing daunted, suggested: "Frow Baby 'way! Vash (wash) 'e paper!" She had evidently been taught that the consideration of property came first, and philosophically prepared herself for the natural consequences. It is highly probable that in the first flurry of the moment the much tired mother felt like adopting the baby's suggestion.

THE VIOLET'S PRAYER.

A thirsty little violet

Looked up into the sky,
So blue it was, so far away,
So radiant and so high.

She did not speak the want she felt,
But One there was who knew.

He sent the pretty little flower
Bright drops of evening dew.

The violet looked up and smiled
In thankfulness, and then

Down over all her velvet robes
Came the soft summer rain.

Then all the pretty violets

And all the gay bright flowers
Looked beautiful and fair again
Under the summer showers.

When flower or bird or little child
Looks up in prayer to heaven,
God listens; surely as he lives
An answer shall be given.

Discussion: Miss Lillie Hirshfield, New York City; Dr. Emil G. Hirsh, Chicago; Mrs. Celia Woolley, Chicago; Mr. William Onahan, and others. Thursday, 10 a. m.—Organization: Miss Sadie American, Chicago, Ill.

Wheeling, W. Va.—Rev. Geo. L. Chaney, the indefatigable Southern Superintendent for the A. U. A., has just completed a month of missionary labor in West Virginia and Southern Ohio by preaching and lecturing here. During the month of August he will be at Leominster, Mass., and in September he will go to Chicago for a few weeks.

Atlanta, Ga.—The special course of sermons given under the auspices of the Liberal Church League of Atlanta completed its series July 16th, the last service being conducted by Mr. John Y. Dixon, the president of the Southern Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, who spoke on "The Liberal Church League; What It Is and What It Stands For."

Iowa Falls, Ia.—In the absence of Rev. Mr. Snook at Des Moines, Rev. M. W. Chunn, of Luverne, Minn., occupied the Universalist Church pulpit here last Sunday. He preached two able sermons, and his hearers were impressed with his earnestness in the espousal of liberal thought and belief. His subject in the evening was the "Brotherhood of Man Beyond the Grave," in which he directed attention to the belief of endless torment taught by orthodox churches, and, without mincing matters in the least, held this horrible dogma up in the true light of freer thought and its terrible teachings.

The Tower Hill Pleasure Co.

AUGUST 7 TO 18.

The building is located at 286 Woodlawn Terrace, within three minutes' walk of one of the World's Fair gates, and about the same distance from the Illinois Central Railroad Station at Sixty-seventh street.

The program this year will consist of ten two-hour sessions, from 10 to 12 a. m., led by Rev. W. W. Fenn. The study will be devoted to the fourth year's work of the Six Years' Course—"The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion;" The New Testament Time. Mr. Fenn proposes to arrange the studies upon an art string, using the great masterpieces of Christian art as centers around which the story of Jesus, the disciples and the apostles will be told. So far as possible these pictures will be made available to teachers and pupils.

It is hoped that this Institute work will fit into, rather than interfere with, the sight-seeing of World's Fair attendants, and every help possible to the management in this direction will be rendered.

Arrangements for room and board at economic prices can be made in the Unity Building or in the immediate vicinity.

Institute tickets for the season, $2.00. For further particulars concerning Institute, address MRS. E. T. LEONARD, 6600 Ellis Ave., Chicago. Application for room etc., to be made to MRS. R. H. KELLY, 286 Woodlawn Terrace.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL INSTITUTE PROGRAM.

In the New Testament lessons for next year, which will form the basis of the Institute work, three things will be attempted: First—to study a few good pictures; second, to present by the pictures, arranged in chronological order, the chief events in New Testament history; third, to show, by the aid of the pictures, leading New Testament ideas which may be regarded as the flowering of the Hebrew religion. Obviously no single lesson can be completely ideal: an event which cannot be omitted in an outline of New Testament history may not have been the subject of a great painting; or, sometimes, a picture of not the highest artistic merit may show more clearly than another intrinsically better a truth which must be included. Yet it is believed that a set of fairly good pictures has been selected, and that the series, if not perfectly ideal, will be found serviceable.

The pictures selected are the following:

The Holy Night—Correggio.

The above will explain itself. We earnestly solicit the co-operation of ministers, Sunday-school superintendents and teachers in extending this notice. One representative from each school that proposes to use this fourth year's study in the Six Years' Course, at the Institute, will greatly help the teachers' meeting and other Sunday-school work in the parish during the year.

- The Sistine Madonna—Raphael.
- The Carpenter's Son—Hofmann.
- Christ Disputing with the Doctors—Hofmann.
- The Baptism by John—Dore.
- Tempted by Satan—Cornecelius.
- Christ Preaching from a Boat—Hofmann.
- The Sower—Millet.
- Jesus and the Sinner—Hofmann.
- The Good Samaritan.
- Jesus and the Children—Hofmann.
- The Transfiguration—Raphael.
- Purifying the Temple—Hofmann.
- The Last Supper—Leonardo da Vinci.
- Ecce Homo—Rembrandt.
- The Crucifixion—Angelo.
- Easter Morning—Plochhorst.
- The Omnipresent Christ—Hofmann.
- The Death of Ananias—Raphael.
- Stephen the Martyr.
- Paul Preaching in Athens—Raphael.
- Christus Consolator—Scheffer.

All of these pictures are published by Soule, and arrangements will be made to supply sets at lowest possible rates. This list is published provisionally, subject to slight alterations before the meeting of the Institute.

**

THE wish has been expressed that UNITY should announce the date of the Peace Congress. It will be held in the week beginning August 14.

**

A WORKINGMAN, in a Chicago paper, says: "The World's Fair never was open on Sunday. 'No admittance' cards were confronted everywhere, and still they charged full fare for less than a half privilege."

This may also be one of the primal dishonesties, well meant but far-reaching.

**

THE Cambridge Divinity School will be represented at the Unitarian Congress next month by Prof. Toy, who will read a paper on "Old Testament Criticism," and the Meadville School by Pres. Cary, who will read a paper on "New Testament Criticism." The revised program almost in its completeness will be found in our announcement column.

**

WE are informed by the Secretary that at the congress of the Free Religious Association, to be held September 20, as a part of the Parliament of Religions, Col. T. W. Higginson, Rev. Wm. J. Potter, Francis E. Abbott, Ph. D., Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, Dr. Edward McGlynn, Rev. Minot J. Savage, Mr. Mangasar Mangasarian, and Mrs. Edna D. Cheney will speak, as will also the senior editor of UNITY.

**

THE woman's part in the International Congress of Unitarians which will be held Friday afternoon, September 22d, will be an unique one. The women's organization having had their field day last May, this session will be given to a discussion of Woman's Theological Emancipation. Rev. Marion Murdoch will speak for the Unitarian, Mrs. Edna D. Cheney for the Free Religious movement, Miss Mary Cohen for the Reform Judaism, and, it is hoped, Miss Florence Kollock for the Universalist movement.

**

WE call special attention to the program of the Unitarian Congress revised up to date. Our English brethren have at last been heard from. We much regret that they do not give us assurance of personal representatives, but are glad of the assurance that we shall have the words of such men as Professors Upton and Gordon and the Rev. Messrs. Croskey and Wicksteed. We cannot think that England will allow itself to be outdone by France and Scandinavia, and trust that it will yet see to it that we have at least one representative, in person, of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Let there be a full attendance.

**

WE commend to the attention of our thoughtful readers the words of our friend Mr. Sprague, of San Francisco, found in our "Correspondence" department. He speaks out the desire of many hearts, and the clear judgment of a few. The true success, the ultimate triumph, not only of the Western Unitarian Conference but of Unitarianism throughout the country and throughout the world, is to see the "Unitarian" name fading like the morning star into the glory of the rising sun which it has heralded. The principles that underlie the Unitarian name and inspire the Unitarian movement have already received a recognition through other agencies than its own, which will necessitate a recognition of the same by a movement so large that it will include the Unitarian name, or such Unitarian organizations as are willing to profit by the enlargement, but can never be included by it or them. If Unitarianism knows its destiny and Unitarian organizations are equal to their opportunity, they will lead in this fusion and rejoice in the high synthesis that is to make for the free church of character, the Liberal Church of America.

THE Christian Register in noticing the coming International Unitarian Congress asks that the program be condensed from seven days to four. If our neighbor had studied the program closely, he would find that that is practically the condition of the program now: all the papers that belong to the Congress proper are arranged for Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. The socials arranged in the Church of the Messiah and Unity church and the Sunday preaching are matters of local hospitality. The one exhibit day for the Unitarians at the Parliament of Religions is a matter outside of the Unitarian Congress' control. As to the number of papers, the committee, in common with other denominations, had not in mind primarily the listening capacity of "ordinary Fair goers," but rather the completeness of the record up to date. They went on the theory that somebody would attend each session, and they hoped that subsequently all the papers would contribute toward the publication that will have permanent historic and educational value.

"A CHICAGO TRICK."

The Sunday opening question continues to attract and distract thought. The fining by the Court of four or five of the leading officials of the Fair a thousand dollars each, for contempt of court in ignoring the injunction that forbade their closing Jackson Park under the laws of the State of Illinois, was an unexpected rebuke, and puts a puzzling turn to affairs. To our mind the decision of Judge Stein was a righteous one. Millionaires have no more right to presume on the indulgence of a court than the day-laborer. The former more than the latter are called upon to maintain the dignity of law; and whatever the ultimate merits of Judge Stein's injunction may have been, it was the business of all concerned to respect it until it was properly dissolved. Meanwhile we cannot regret that this discussion continues. The agitation is wholesome, educating; though it brings out in painful clearness the tendency, even of judicious minds, to indulge in sweeping generalities and unfair epithets. In illustration we give an extract from a private letter written by a clear-headed friend of UNITY and of the open Fair. Speaking of our editorial on the boycott he says:

To one at a distance—and perhaps in that matter distance lends disenchantment—it seems as if the boycott probably had little, probably very little, to do with keeping the Sunday crowd small; but that general reasons did it,—the Saturday's return for many visitors: the week's tire for all; the feeling that one couldn't see everything, the whole Fair and the Fair at work; the feeling that there might be a crowd, and of the persons the well-to-do would care least to see things with, etc., etc., and then a sense, which I feel sure must be wide-spread, though in your article you did not even allude to it, that the attempted opening under the conditions of that national contribution was a trick, an attempt to keep the advantage of a promise while breaking the promise. I fear it has stamped the phrase "a Chicago trick" pretty effectually in people's memory the country over and abroad; and think thousands and thousands who thought the closing a Sunday desecration, and the condition imposed by Congress a desecration of the Constitution, thought the directors' action a desecration of honor, and by far the worst desecration of the three; for the first was more or less sincere, and the second more or less thoughtless, but the third a deliberate act of sharpness. Is it not true, too, that the great Sunday crowds hoped for would be mainly the local population of Chicago and its neighborhood,—and that there are thousands of these to whom the Fair would really be a tame show, and thousands more to whom the 50 cents admission, multiplied by two or three (for members of the family), would be a tax beyond their power? Is it not possible that the directors may yet try the effect of a Saturday half-price day? Wouldn't that draw the crowds, stir enthusiasm among the citizens at large to make the going possible for the employes, and actually make money for the directors?

In reply to the above we have little to say in the way of dissent. Doubtless all the points urged have great force. The main point we meant to urge in our editorial was that the boycott had succeeded in intimidating the directors. With our correspondent, we doubt very much whether it succeeded in keeping as many away as the Sunday-closing agitators claimed. We also regretfully recognize the mistakes and blunders of the directory in this matter, and admit the wide chasm between ideal ethics and the actual ethics prompted by the test of money success and financial necessity. The only thing we protest against in the letter of our friend is the insinuation contained in the phrase "a Chicago trick." This savors of that greatest hurt and most effective injury done to the Columbian Exposition from the start, "the deep-seated distrust on the part of our Eastern friends of the integrity and good intentions of Chicago in this matter. There is an apparent incapacity on the part of some friends living east of the Alleghanies to believe in the genuineness of anything in Chicago. We suspect some of our New York friends distrust the consensus of the competent concerning the architectural triumphs on the Grand Court, and suspect that there is somewhere "a Chicago trick" in it. We do not say that wealthy men are always honorable, that capital is not sometimes manipulated ignobly, but we do say that these things are not peculiar to Chicago. There are tricks in New York, and, if local papers are to be trusted, there are some devious ways in Boston. Our wealthy men in Chicago are not ideal. In this and other matters we have been quick to criticise, and perhaps too quick to blame. But we do believe that in this matter they have displayed public spirit, energy and enthusiasm,—and that in excess of the self-abandon of capitalists elsewhere,—which redound to their credit and not discredit. It is well known that there were thousands of favored visitors who found their way into the Philadelphia Exposition on Sunday through the closed gates. But it would be unfair to characterize that as a "Philadelphia trick." It is also well known that some New-Yorkers have put many hindrances in the way of the success of the Chicago Fair, but that is not a "New York trick."

Let Chicago men be held to severe standards; as severe as those of Boston or of London. Let blame fall where it belongs; but let us have done with this superstition about the special depravity of Chicago. It has its faults, many of them incident to its rapid growth, but it has its inspirations also. And from Chicago there radiates to-day and will continue to radiate for the next century, a river like that of the Apocalypse, in the midst of which grows a tree "whose leaves are for the healing of the nation." Intellectually, artistically, ethically and religiously Chicago to-day is a creative force, an inspiring factor, which deserves respect and confidence; which, we believe, compares favorably with anything that New York, Boston, or any other city on the globe has to send forth. There have been "tricks" in this business, but they have not been confined to Chicago, and the worst of them did not begin in Chicago. Let the nation take the primal shame, and blush for the trickiest trick, played by that tricky Congress when, under the guise of piety, it perpetrated in the Sunday closing law that violation of the religious liberty vouchsafed by the Constitution.

We greatly regret, with our correspondent, the action of the local directory in various particulars. But as a close student of them and near neighbor to them, we desire to record our belief that they have tried to act honorably in this matter; that they are gentlemen who have sought to do the right thing, and that even with their mistakes they deserve the praise and confidence of their fellow citizens. And we urgently commend their example to the ampler millionaire living elsewhere.

CUSTOM IN DEVOTION.

I recently met the pastor of a large independent German congregation in a neighboring city. He is a scholarly and devout man, and is kept very busy by the demands made upon him for pastoral work. The calls on him are numerous from those outside his charge. I was interested in many things he told me of the methods of his church. He will not have a Sunday school—because it is impossible to find teachers competent to give religious instruction. Classes for confirmation he prepares himself. His theory is that a Sunday school, to be of value, must never depend upon volunteer or gratuitous services, but must have a paid instructor thoroughly qualified for the work. We find this method realized in many Jewish synagogues.

His idea of domestic worship is worth noting. The custom is not quite obsolete of expecting the minister to offer prayer or say grace, on occasion, in the homes of his parishioners. Our pastor never prays in other people's houses. He dispenses with prayer in his own house, if there are strangers or persons not of the family present. If at a wedding supper he is requested to say grace, he asks the head of the family to do so, as his peculiar privilege. If the father replies that it is not his custom, then our pastor answers that we will omit it.

As a rule, the people are quite as much embarrassed as the young minister in trying to reach the right in such matters. There is apt to be very little independence on either side. The chief question is as to the "proper thing" to do. Yet some people like to hear prayers who do not like to make prayers. There are ministers who offer public and official prayers who have no custom of devotion in their own families. For some it would be easier to offer prayer in a church and before a large assembly than it would be in the presence of only wife or child.

This reminds us of what Rev. John F. W. Ware, formerly of the Arlington Street Church, Boston, once said in a public discourse of his father, Dr. Henry Ware: "As a child, when I traveled with my father, and we had the same room and got to our beds together, I remember that I marveled that I never saw him on his knees or heard his morning or evening prayer or could divine when he was praying." So the ancient Brahmins were instructed to pray apart and in secret. Not even a neighbor must be permitted to hear the petitions of his fellow—a literal fulfillment of the precept of Jesus to "enter into thy closet" in the act of devotion.

Yet more than any authorized or permissible use is the spirit and life. Is there reverence, patience, gratitude, aspiration? Is there sincerity, simplicity, spontaneity? Speech is welcome and appropriate, but silence may be safer. As some one says, "thanksgiving is well, but thanksgiving is better." J. C. L.

A CONVERT TO ROME.

The announcement that the Rev. Henry A. Adams, rector of the Church of the Redeemer in New York City, has left the Episcopal Church for the Roman Catholic fold has called forth some pretty severe comments from the Protestant press; the New York correspondent of the Independent being specially hostile in the tone of his remarks. In view of the fact that the papers which condemn him most strongly represent him as a young assistant minister, instead of the senior minister of a large parish, thus seemingly endeavoring to minimize the importance of the event, one cannot but feel that the event touches them more closely than they are willing to admit.

It is ungenerous and unfair to endeavor to convey the impression that some petty personal disappointment or unsatisfied ambition led Mr. Adams to the step he has taken. The fact is that Mr. Adams is one of the most unselfish and devoted ministers of our day. A man of large culture and marked eloquence, he declined large salaries to do the work that lay near his heart, and endeavored manfully to help the poor by preaching justice and brotherhood rather than charity. By so doing he moved the hearts of many of his hearers and helped them to a larger life.

But he doubtless offended many of the richer and more worldly of his congregation, the class of which the vestry is so largely made up. A high-churchman, believing in the divinely inspired character of the visible Church, it was but natural that the absurdity of the position should deeply impress and hurt him,—the discrepancy between theory and practice, where the Church, the representative of God upon earth, was governed not by those who had consecrated their lives to the divine service, but by those in whose lives religion played a small part—"rich men, sometimes immoral, often ignorant, usually officious."

In some respects the Episcopal Church is the most inconsistent of bodies; because, theoretically ecclesiastical, it not only shares with all the orthodox denominations the doctrine of the visible church of God, but it further shares the doctrine of the Roman church that the priesthood has received from Christ himself, through apostolic succession, divine authority to rule the Church,—i. e., the kingdom of God on earth. And therefore the control of vestry and church wardens over the parish, thus making the priest subordinate to the laity, is particularly illogical. The perception of this, and the recognition that in the Church of Rome the doctrine of apostolic succession, instead of being a meaningless fad, is practically carried out in church administration, is the head and front of Mr. Adams' offense in the eyes of the Episcopalians.

But we may presume that what rouses the ire of orthodox Protestants in general and of the Independent's correspondent in particular, is Mr. Adams' perception of the truth that he who would rest religion upon external authority rather than the Divine revelation of the Universe to the soul of man, can find no logical abiding place short of the Holy Catholic Church whose head professes to be the Vicar of Christ on earth, and which tells you positively what you shall or shall not believe; that, in short, there is no alternative between Rome and Reason. Yet in this Mr. Adams is certainly right. We must either accept religious truth upon authority or upon reason. If upon reason, we not only may, we must examine for ourselves, and reject so much of the doctrine offered to us as does not appeal to our minds and hearts as true; and this opens the way for, and leads to, the rejection of much that is commonly taught as essential to salvation. If one maintains that the other alternative is the true one, and rests religion upon authority, he will find no resting place short of Rome. Is the Bible the authority? Which Bible—those books used by Romanists or those used by Protestants, the old translations or the new, the Hebrew version of the tenth or the Greek version of the second century? And where the writers differ, whom shall we follow, Ezekiel or Isaiah? Shall we accept Deacon Smith's interpretation or Parson Brown's? (If we really study the question for ourselves we must choose between this book and that, between Amos and Jeremiah, between Mark and John; and this involves the setting aside, the rejection, of one part of Scripture, where inconsistent with another—which is putting reason above Scripture.) The interpretation of the church is what the old orthodox Christians do actually rest upon; but that interpretation varies, and does not cover the whole ground of life. And while the Protestant churches actually offer a particular interpretation, they do not profess to be infallible. So the longing for certainty, for definite authority, remains unsatisfied. Rome alone undertakes to direct your life and claims to speak with absolute authority. Having decided, then, that in religion you must rest upon authority, you will not find sufficient authority to rest upon till you get to Rome.

And then? Can we rest upon authority which asserts a thing against which our mind and heart revolt? "Ah, there's the rub!" Perhaps this sensitive and earnest man who has followed Newman into the ancient church can find in practical work surcease from intellectual unrest. But we doubt it. Sooner or later we think the day will come when he shall be convinced in every fiber of his being of some practical or theoretic truth which the church authoritatively denies. Then he must question the Divinity of that authority to which he had till then so gladly surrendered himself. Mr. Adams is or was a believer in the land theory of Henry George. With Father McGlynn's experience before him, even though that devoted priest is at present in favor at Rome, we should have thought this dissatisfied Episcopalian would hesitate to put his conscience under the guidance of the Roman church. That question may have been settled in his favor, but what of others likely to arise? He may think now that he will always be able to feel that the church's view is right, but will he? Can the contest between authority and freedom of thought, between Rome and Reason, ever be settled until the supremacy of the latter is recognized? No; the ultimate appeal must ever be to consciousness. No revelation can be received but through our human faculties. It is not a revelation to us until it is thus grasped. Man is not a compound, but a complex being. Reason and faith are not separate parts of him, acting independently. True faith and reason work together, the one impossible without the other. Man cannot be true to himself or God, and rest upon authority one moment longer than it coincides with reason. If the alternative fairly presents itself, he must decide in favor of reason.

What leads men to the endeavor to lean upon authority in preference to reason? The desire for rest; the longing for certainty. They will not believe that there is no royal road to knowledge; that life and knowledge now and here are necessarily imperfect; that revelation is a continuous process, which can only be received by carefully studying the whole manifestation of God,—the Universe,—as it unfolds itself before our quickening powers. When Mr. Adams' religious feeling shall have brought him to appreciate not only the greatness, but the Infinity of God, he will cease to cry out for definite authority. And then, perhaps, he will unite with us in the true catholic church, the open church of all souls. Ours is a creedless religion, not because we believe nothing, but because we recognize the immensity of the thought of God. Men have long spoken of the Infinity of God, but they have only begun to realize what it means. For us of the free church God is in very truth, as well as in word, Infinite. Recognizing this, we know that our best and highest thought of God cannot but be inadequate, and that, state our thoughts as best we may to-day, to-morrow—if, as we hope, we continue to draw nearer God—that statement will be outgrown. Would that Mr. Adams could see that he would find more true happiness by going forward into the open alone with God, than by surrendering himself to the guidance of an authoritative church!

Men and Things

It will hardly be believed that the chief electrician of the London Post office has recently conveyed a message by electricity from Cardiff to a little island three miles off in the Bristol Channel, without the intervention of a wire. What he did was to put a long wire on the shore and a shorter one on the island, fitting the latter wire with a "sounder" to receive the message, and sending the message by a powerful telephonic generator. That message from the mainland was distinctly heard on the island. The message did not travel through earth or water or even air, but was transmitted through ether by means of waves of a certain and probably unusual magnitude; or, to put it differently, as the London Spectator says: "It flew through a medium independent not only of human volition or energy, but of this planet, the medium which fills, so far as we know, all space, the medium through which light reaches us from the star Sirius." The principle being established, it is quite possible that if we had a generator strong enough we could send a wave of electricity to the planet Mars, where if a "sounder" was ready and human beings were there to hear, it would be audible; or to come nearer home, if we cannot some day communicate by telephone through the ether to New York or Melbourne without cables, the fault will be with our generators and sounders, for there is no natural law against it. Who shall say that beings may not exist who can in thinking a thought make that thought audible to finer ears than ours? The only person in these days likely to make mistakes is the one who says that this or anything else is impossible, for it seems as if we have come to the period when it is the impossible that happens. —Exchange.

THE forthcoming annual report of the Jewish Training School of Chicago, besides giving the ordinary items of interest as to size and success of this most admirable philanthropy in the ordinary directions of education, both manual and scholastic, adds some paragraphs relating to the tender watchfulness of the physicians in charge over those physically disqualified for the demands made upon those of sound bodies. Careful observation discovered cases of heart disease, and excused such children from gymnastic exercises. Defective eyes were fitted with proper glasses. Cripples, from the neglect and ignorance of parents, were cared for in a way, if possible, to cure, and if not, to ameliorate their condition. All this is quite an expense, but is not that true charity? Where is the school in which teachers take enough interest in their children to have their eyes examined, eyeglasses provided, splints and trusses made, and the source of puzzling conduct traced back to the germs of disease and counteracted? Where is the institution in which the teachers are educators in the real sense of the word and come in close contact with the parents, and endeavor to straighten and properly shape everything suitable and necessary for the correct and successful breeding of the children?

HELEN LOUISE JOHNSON, editor of Table Talk, is demonstrating at the Chicago Exposition that electricity in cooking will do more to lighten the labor of the kitchen, save housework as well as money, than anything she knows of. All kinds of ordinary utensils heated by electricity are shown, and it is demonstrated that a steak can be cooked to a turn in four minutes and everything else in short order. The utensils include everything required for all kinds of cooking, from the making of pancakes to the baking of a ham, and even the hot-footed flat-iron is obtained by simply hooking on a cord and switching on the heat producing current. All the cooking on the whaleback, "Christopher Columbus," is done in this way, and the Minnesota Club, of St. Paul, uses electricity exclusively in its kitchen.

SABBATARIANISM IN TORONTO.—The street cars in Toronto have never run Sunday, but a special election is soon to be held, upon the question of allowing them the privilege. Here is one of the arguments advanced by F. S. Spence, an opponent of the proposition: "If we have Sunday cars there will be thousands of people at the parks, and who will control these people? There will be all sorts of vice and extra policemen will be required to keep order. It is impossible to imagine the evil that will result." Mr. Spence should take the train for New York next Saturday, spend Sunday in this city and Brooklyn, and visit Central and Prospect parks.

HEALTH is oftentimes a matter of moral perception. It is the full realization of the necessity of a sound body if one would have a sound mind; for it is the sound mind that keeps a moral balance and sees the true relations of men, of things, efforts. Overwork is more often the sin of zeal without knowledge than of intelligence; it is the blindness of selfishness that fails of recognizing the rights of others.

THERE have recently been discovered in the high Alps, near the summit of the great St. Bernard, five large granite altars and numerous other relics of the stone age used in pagan epochs for sacrifices. Swiss scientists consider this discovery a proof that Mount St. Bernard was a place of sacrifice in pagan times, and that the canton of Valais must have been inhabited by human beings as far back as the stone age.

MRS. VIOLA FULLER MINER, who graduated from the Minnesota State University in 1877, with the degree of B.

The crowning effort of her life has been the preparation of a comprehensive treatise on domestic economy from a scientific standpoint. To fit herself for this work she took a post-graduate course in natural science. Her book, which was nearly completed at the time of her death, covered the entire range of home development in its fullest sense, from the selection of a building site, and it was intended to form a thesis that would entitle her to a higher college degree.

MRS. OUR genial friend of "The Pulpit," in the Advance, observing that the text, "We saw one casting out devils and forbade him," is a favorite Scripture with the defendants of Dr. Briggs, is moved to say, "The application to this case is not so apparent, as the Union Professor has not been casting out the devil." No; he has only tried to cast him out and failed. The devil is still in the Presbyterian body, in about his original dimensions. But he must be cast out or he will rend and ruin the unfortunate possessor. It is all a matter of taste; but it seems queer to an outsider that the General Assembly should prefer the devil to Dr. Briggs.

THE Brooklyn bridge is just ten years old. The cities were allowed to build it for themselves, as capitalists saw no money in it. Fifteen thousand people crossed in one day ten years ago. One hundred and fifty thousand people crossed in one day last week. Its cable fare, reduced to two and one-half cents, provides a surplus revenue of half a million dollars. The bridge will last a thousand years and cost the people nothing. It is paying for itself as fast as its bonds can be redeemed. Capitalists are now ready to build two more bridges, better and more costly ones. They see money in it now. Do the people see anything?

ALL IN ALL.

Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; and establish thou the work of our hands upon us. Yes, the work of our hands, establish thou it.—Ps. xc. 16-17.

My eyes are Thine, that earth may show

To Thee its blossomings;

My ears, that Thou mayest hear Thy birds

At their dear rapturings.

To Thee the mountains look sublime

When they my vision please:

To Thee I bring the splendors of Thy chanting emerald seas.

That Thou mayest rapture in a child,

My heart is love for Thee;

Its happy tenderesses give

Their answer back through me.

And so interpreter I am

Of all that Thou hast made;

When Thou wouldst joy in all Thy earth,

Thy life in mine is laid.

And so of this that's ugliness,

And this that's dreadful pain:

Through me Thou feelest every moan,

And every sad refrain.

O, help me, that I faithful be

To all Thy holy need,

That less my sad unfaithfulness

Make thee and nature bleed.

Such blessed unity with Thee

May I more realize,

That for Thy faithful love to see

I give Thee faithful eyes;

That I in steadfast heart and hand

Be but Thy holy will,

Thy moral grandeur moving men,

Till they Thyself fulfill.

Then deeper will the earth in joy

Of holiness increase,

And not an ugly troubling be,

But only holy peace.

Thou art a God of beauty, and Thy creation is fashioned fair. Thy beauty comes forth in the violets by wayside and in field. It flies and sings with the bobolinks, and answers their song in the blossoming orchards. Its tenderness is in stars. Its grandeur is in burning noonday and in evening skies. It neighs in the strong horse and bleats in the gentle lamb. In mountains and oaks it is mighty, in seas it is sublime. It blows in the sweet breath of summer, and comes forth in the waving harvests, the blushing grape, the orchard's autumn robe of silk and satin dyes. It is the wonder in the storm's terrible loveliness, and its marvel is a breathing spirit of gentleness everywhere. In that dear kiss of wife it is, in this dear baby face. In friendships tender, true, and wise, it hallows days and makes the hours like song. Within me it is beauty to answer all the beauty that's without. Something is within that knows and loves the violets, the bobolinks and skies; that strengthens in the mountains and the seas; that trembles in the storms, and is at peace in quiet winds; that goldens with the grain and mellows in the fruit; a little child within to laugh back at the little child without; a noble friend within to give true love for love; a breathing marvel of the soul to know and understand the breathing marvel everywhere in all that Thou has made. What multitudes of tender thoughts Thou givest me! What beauties of the brain and heart! What love to answer Thine and know that Thou art Father everywhere, with dearest, tenderest, wisest love for all. Sometimes a lip I am, and all about me golden pipe that Thou dost play, and filling all with sacred music, until I am at peace and know I am forever with Thee in Thy perfect life, in spite of every change and shadow that may fall. And yet—and yet there's heartbreak, Lord, the things about I shrink from, the ugly deaths I fear and moan about. Ah, me! I so lament a dear one gone, a little child Thou gavest me. Her voice—O, that it might speak to me now! her kisses be upon my face, her arms about me, all her laughing love outjoking for me every other thing on earth! O, could she speak to me from Thy bright other world, her dear face show, and make it certain that the meeting hour will come! But silence all about and darkness of the grave, no face, no voice, no conscious nearness! And so the violet loses beauty, and a voice of sorrow moans in all the songs of birds. And I am not alone in grief. All hearts are sometimes touched with this same agony. This loneliness is desolation for us all; for all, this voice moans in the melodies of time. O, keep us from despair! Still keep us deep in love with Thee; still may our hearts be the unswerving trust that love and wisdom is in all, to give at last a perfect peace and joy in fullness of Thine own eternal life. Give us to see more clearly every day that Thy work is only making, not done and hopeless marred; that we are only lost as statue in the marble when the quarry holds, or when in studios it is but coming forth, imperfect yet. Give us to strengthen and grow joyous in the faith that Thou art using everything—what pains, what gladdens, what brightens, what makes dark—to bring forth in us all Thy holy beauty, till at last the children of Thy heart's deep thought are laughing in Thy dear eternal home: the gladness then, the glory of the sorrow now, the peace the blossom of the trouble sore, the life the holy dawn that hides in every death, the finding of our lost loves there outweighing far this lonely losing for a little while. Then shall such faith Thy dear companionship make real, and through the fields of life together we will go in contemplation sweet, in conversation glad.—we joying in our Father, Thou so pleased in children that can love Thee and can understand. Amen!

All beauty that without me lies

Is there to fashion me,

A child of beauty that Thy heart

May love so joyously.

A bird Thou lovest for itself:

Thy heart flies in its wings:

Some dear enchantment of Thyself

In all its music sings.

But yet it flies its happy way
Within Thy tender thought,
That somehow all its beauty may
Within my heart be wrought.

It wakens life within my soul
That deathless beauty gives;
That life, its happy counterpart,
In me eternal lives.

And so of all these wondrous things
That stir my senses so,
They are without, that I within
May in their graces grow.

Thy whole creation joys Thy heart
For its own beauty's sake;
And yet Thou dost through all its ways
Thy human children make.

And they can love Thee as no bird
Abroad on happy wing;
They understand Thy holy thought:
They feel Thy passioning.

So through creation moves my life,
That it may move in me,
And Thou at last may have a child,
Thy heart's dear company.

The travail of my making, then,
Will both so satisfy;
Thou, as a bird's own beating heart,
I, as its wings that fly.

O life eternal flying, then,
One heart that happy beats;
My love in Thine is perfected,
Thy life mine own completes.

PASTOR QUIET.

THE WEAKNESS OF SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS.

The restlessness with which many men and women are afflicted does not come, as they often think, from their surroundings, but from themselves. It is an old truth, which each man must learn for himself, that we do not bind happiness and content; we carry them with us. We are always transferring to conditions and surroundings a responsibility which belongs to us, and we are always trying to get from conditions and surroundings that which we can get only from ourselves. It is a sign of the greatness of our natures that we carry within us the seeds of happiness or unhappiness, and that, in spite of our intimate and necessary relations with the world, we are fundamentally independent of it. Of itself it can neither give us peace and content nor take them away. The secret of peace is self-mastery; the conscious direction and control of our inward lives; the putting of the thought of self in the background, and the free reception of all that life offers us, and the unconscious outgoing of all our activities in response. In no way is this self-mastery more distinctively shown than in the diminishing self-consciousness and an increasing unconsciousness. Many good men and women are hampered and distressed by self-consciousness; by the fatal intrusion of self at the moment when a clear field and a clear vision are necessary. Such men rarely look through a clear atmosphere; they see through an atmosphere which distorts and exaggerates all objects. Instead of having the stars for company on the long, hard journey, they stir up the dust of the road to such an extent that the heavens are obscured. Instead of seeing the world clearly and steadily, they see it always in relation to themselves; instead of deciding each question in a clear, intelligent mood, they are confused and perplexed by the intrusion of the personal element. This temper is not egotistic, for self-conscious men and women are often unselfish and generous to a degree; it is, rather, egoistic, or the undue and abnormal consciousness of self. And it is a weakness, because it throws the nature out of harmony, diminishes its capacity for growth, and destroys its repose and content. All the deepest thoughts come out of our unconsciousness, out of that profound resting upon God in which there is no thought of self; and the more unconscious we can become, the richer, the stronger and greater we are. To turn our conscious thoughts and moods into unconscious ones is the need of those who would live the whole life which God opens to us; to get away from the shallows of our small selves, and spread sail on the shoreless sea of truth and action and life.

THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

From the Chairman of the General Committee on Religious Congresses, World's Columbian Exposition, we learn the following facts:

The World's First Parliament of Religions will convene Monday, September 11. The sessions will be held in the Hall of Columbus (seating about 3,000), in the new Art Palace on the Lake Front, already made famous as the meeting-place of the many congresses of the World's Congress Auxilliary. The sessions will continue seventeen days.

It has been definitely settled that H. Darmphala, general secretary of the Maha-Bodhi society of India, will attend the Parliament of Religions as the accredited representative of the Southern Buddhist Church.

The chairman of the general committee, Rev. John Henry Barrows, D. D., is in receipt of a communication from the Archbishop of Zante, in Greece, who signifies his intention of being present at the Parliament. The archbishop will come in his personal capacity, the Holy Synod of Greece having decided to be thus unofficially represented.

President Bonney is authority for the statement that the congresses so far held have been successful beyond all expectations. He realizes, however, that the bright particular jewel of the congress coronet will be the Parliament of Religions.

Japanese Christianity will have as its representative at the Parliament the Rev. J. T. Yokoi, of Tokyo. Mr. Yokoi has an international reputation as a speaker of great force, and nothing but approval has been expressed upon all sides at his selection for this important position.

One of the most interesting figures at the Parliament will be Mr. Minas Tcheraz, of London, who will come among others on behalf of the Armenian Church. Mr. Tcheraz had the honor of representing the Armenian people at the Congress of Berlin, for which service the Sublime Porte has banished him from Turkey.

The Free Religious Association of the United States has applied for and has been given a day for holding its regular annual convention in connection with the Parliament of Religions. The date assigned is Sept. 20, and among the speaker will be Rev. William J. Potter, Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Francis E. Abbott, Mrs. Edna D. Cheney, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones.

Among the eminent Roman Catholic divines from abroad who will address the Parliament are Monsignor D'Harlez, of the University of Louvain, and Monsignor D'Hulst, of Paris. Representing the American hierarchy will be his eminence Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishops Ireland, Ryan and Chapelle, and Bishops Keane and Spalding.

University and college faculties will contribute largely to the program of the Parliament. President J. G. Schurman, of Cornell, is slated for an address, as also are Prof. W. C. Wilkinson, of the University of Chicago; President W. P. Martin, of the Imperial University, of Peking, China; Prof. Richard T. Ely, of the University of Wisconsin; Prof. O'Gorman, of the Catholic University of America, at Washington, D. C.; Prof. George P. Fisher, of Yale University; Prof. Thomas Dwight, M. D., of Harvard, and others.

Many who intend being present at the Parliament will be glad to know that the Rev. Dr. Jessup and Dr. George E. Post, of the Syrian Protestant, of Beirut, have signified their intention of coming to Chicago for the great event.

Judaism will make a strong presentation at the Parliament. Among the Jewish rabbis who have already been selected to make addresses are Dr. Berkowitz, Dr. Wise, Dr. K. Kohler, and Dr. Silverman.

The Presbyterian General Assembly one year ago frowned officially on the Parliament of Religions. This action, however, did not prevent some good orthodox ministers of that church putting their seal of approval on the plans of the Parliament. Among the host may be singled out Doctors Ellinwood, Patton, Green, DeWitt, Hunt, Willis Beecher, Happer, Haydn, Briggs, Van Dyke, Sample, Morris, Riggs, William C. Roberts, Willian H. Roberts, Marvin R. Vincent, Schaff, C. L. Thompson, Ecob, Parkhurst, W. A. Bartlett, Niccolls, Teunis L. Hamlin, Ray, Withrow, Worrall, McClure, Tuttle, McPherson, Freeman.

The foreign delegates to the Parliament, especially the non-Christian, will, it is hoped, have all hospitality extended to them during their visit to Chicago. This will be a grand occasion for the Christian people to emphasize the teaching of Christ in their relations with these visitors. It is confidently hoped that for them many latch strings will be hung within easy reach.

India will send to the Parliament, among others, the Hon. Rai May Das, who will tell the world what Christianity has wrought for India.

IN THE DARK.

Oh, in the depths of midnight,
What fancies haunt the brain.
When even the sigh of the sleeper
Sounds like a sob of pain.

A sense of awe and of wonder
I may never well define,
For the thoughts that come in the shadows
Never come in the shine.

The old clock down in the parlor,
Like the sleepless mourner grieves,
And the seconds drip in the silence
As the rain drips from the eaves.

And I think of the hands that signal
The hours there in the gloom,
And wonder what angel watchers
Wait in the darkened room.

And I think of the smiling faces
That used to watch and wait
Till the click of the clock was answered
By the click of the opening gate.

They are not there now in the evening—
Morning, or noon—not there;
Yet I know that they keep their vigil
And wait for me somewhere.

CULTURE WITHOUT COLLEGE.

BY W. C. GANNETT.

It is vacation time. The boys and girls have shut their school books, the school rooms are given up to janitors, the teachers are resting in the country places or have themselves turned into scholars in the summer schools or at Chicago. It is a good time, in this breathing space, to say over again to ourselves certain homely old truths about education, which we are apt to forget in the school hours; certain old truths about education which those who go to school, and those who have got through school, and those who hardly ever have had a chance for school, all equally need to bear in mind. Homely truths which the school masters and the school books comparatively little emphasize, yet which are more important than anything which they do emphasize; truths about the fundamental education, that which underlies all other education, and which all the rest is for; and which goes on independently of time and place, equally in school and out of school, equally in term-time and in vacation, equally in youth and age; truths about the fundamental education which knows no vacations.

And this is the very first thing to say about the matter: One girl and one boy can go to Harvard College or to Wellesley or Ann Arbor or Cornell, while a thousand boys and a thousand girls can not go. Let not the thousand think that culture without college is impossible for them.

But of the thousand many say, perhaps, that they do not care for "culture" anyway. Yet "culture" is but a sort of glory-word for education. There is a flower-hint in "culture," that suggests not only the process of growing and unfolding, but the beauty of the blossom and the service of the fruit at last. When men laugh at it, the very misspelling—"culchur"—shows that what they laugh at is not the real thing, but some dwarf and caricature that apes the real thing. No one that is wise laughs at the true culture. Everybody that is wise wants it. Everybody that is wise tries for it. Culture is that which turns the little, sour, wild crab-apple of the roadside into the apple of the orchard. Culture is that which turns the clumsy apprentice into the workman who is an honor to his calling. Culture is that which transforms the willful, crying child of five years into the earnest boy of ten, the self-controlling man of twenty, the helper of men at thirty, the loved of men at fifty. Nobody really laughs at this. The laugh comes in when this large, inspiring word is dwarfed to mean a bookish education only; or—dwarf of a dwarf—a mere text-bookish education, such as the high-school and college are sometimes thought to give. And sometimes do give.

Yet if to-day they give no more than that, it is the fault of boy and girl rather than of the school. Our colleges and high schools have much yet to learn, but no one knows this better than themselves; the educators were never quite so wise as now in suspecting their own methods, and never more in earnest to find out better ones. By all means go to college, if you can; or if, when young, you could not go, give your boys and girls the chance you missed. That is an uncolleged parent's glory—to give his child the education that he missed. Go to college if you can. For the college is a green-house for the mind, where its faculties can be started and trained more quickly than outside. But, after all, the great crops on which the country feeds are not started in the green-houses, and the great faculties of mental and moral nature have no vital need of college training. Yes, go to college, especially if you have to pinch in order to get through it: for that pinch on the money side will halve the college dangers and may double the college profits for you. But whether one goes or not, keep two main facts in mind: this, first, that education depends chiefly on the boy, not on the place, even when the place is the best college in the land; and this, second, that, in the boy or girl, it depends more on the will power than the brain power. And what are these two facts but saying that culture can be won outside of college by means which nearly all of us can master? So I repeat: while one boy and one girl can go to Harvard or Cornell, and a thousand boys and girls cannot, let not the thousand think that culture without college is impossible.

THE MAIN OF EDUCATION.—WHAT IS IT?

Rather let each one of the thousand think just the other way, and repeat often to himself or herself, "Culture without college is possible, and possible for me." Keep that motto bright on the mind's inner wall. It is possible because the main of education lies in self-disciplines—self-disciplines in certain habits that are the tap-roots of both mind and character. Parents, teachers, friends, employers, home, school, workshop, travel, never make one grow; they only offer us materials for growth; "each for himself" is the inevitable law of the actual growing. No one can assimilate the materials and make mind from them except one's self, just as no one can digest another's dinner for him. Education is always at bottom a self-discipline, and all of us, to speak exactly, are "self-made" men. What is more, these tap-root habits lie at the bottom of everybody's culture, and are the same for all, college men and uncolleged need them alike. Rich men and poor men need them alike. Talent and genius need them as much as the ordinary mind.

What are they—these tap-root habits? They lie in three great groups.

First, and underlying all, those habits by which we adjust the powers within us to each other: I mean self-control and temperance, courage to bear, courage to dare, concentration, energy and perseverance. Do you call these mental, or do you call them moral, habits? Practically they are both. They make the tap-root of both mind and character. It is they that compact the man into a unit, into a "person." And without them high success in any life-path is impossible. One cannot go far in book-knowledge without them; cannot go far on in his trade without them; of course cannot rise far toward nobleness without them. Without them the average man dooms himself to remain all his life a half-failure. Without them talent is lopsidedness and genius top-heaviness, sources of downfall rather than of rise. But with them, whether one be dull or talented, every year of life sees growth, advance, uprise.

Next, another group,—those habits by which we adjust ourselves to other people: habits of justice, of sympathy, of courtesy and of the public spirit which begins in self-forgetting for those we love, and widens into self-forgetting for all whom we can help. And besides these two, a third group—those habits by which we adjust ourselves to our ideals; habits of loyalty to truth as truth, of delight in beauty as beauty, of reverence for goodness as goodness. In this last group we reach religion.

As we name these great names over one by one, the feeling rises in us,—these surely are the main things in culture; to have these habits is to have vigorous mind, firm character, high tastes. Specialties of knowledge and of art are good, but these are worth more than any specialty the college gives. Think them over once again, these man-making habits: the power of self-control, the power to dare and to bear, the power to face obstacles, to stand and push; the splendid power of centering one's whole mind in fixed acts of attention; the power to side instinctively with right against the wrong, to side with the weak against the strong, to side with public against selfish ends; the power to obey with answering joy a call to come up higher. Yes; this, this, is the real culture! And he who strengthens these powers in himself is a well-educated man. Now all these noble powers can be attained without high school or college. Then culture without college is possible—and for me!

THE THREE TEACHERS: (1.) ONE'S WORK.

Who are the teachers that teach these things to us—us who cannot go to Harvard or Cornell? The teachers are three in number—Work, Society, Books; and the greatest of the three is one's Work. To our work we owe more education than to anything else in life, spite of the hard names we sometimes give it. Work makes mind: work makes character. No work, no culture. It matters less than we are apt to think what the work is, so that it be hard enough to require will, attention and honor to do it. Of all the educating forces, a steady need to do something promptly, persistently, accurately, and as well as we can, stands paramount, because nothing else so vitalizes those primary roots of mind and character, the habits that came first upon our list. "Every man's task is his life-preserver," Emerson reminds us: he means our soul's life. The worthless people are the worthless people, even to themselves. What wealth gives, or should give, is choice of work, but not exemption from it. The man born rich is born into danger; he, as also the man quick to win riches, must make himself trustee for causes not his own, or else his riches become his doom. In our land at least, a "gentleman," whatever else he is, is a good workman; that is, one who has something to do, who can do it well, and who always does it well. To-day even the daughter of wealth elects a task to save her life. To be a true woman, to be an educated woman, she must stand for some good work well done.

Well done, for, if our work is to teach us, it must be good work—good as we can do. The culture in it is proportioned to the quality of it—not the absolute quality, but the quality as proportioned to our power. And good work means first or last, and usually both first and last, hard work. The master-workmen in any trade or profession have always been hard workmen. The actor Kean was a master on the stage; he practiced two days on a single line, but when he spoke the five words, they melted the house to tears. Hard work did that. Ruskin is a master in the art of making sentences; he tells us he has often spent several hours in perfecting a single period. Hard work, again. Edward Everett Hale is a master in the art of writing short stories. To write the well-known story, "In His Name," took a journey in Europe, the ransacking of a Lyons book-shop for old pamphlets, a study of the history of poisoning, a week or two shut up in a country house, and then, says he, "I was ready to go to work." George Eliot was a mistress in the art of writing a long story; she spent six weeks in Florence before beginning "Romola" in order to catch the trick of language among the common people of the city, and her husband said that before writing her "Daniel Deronda" she read a thousand books on Jewish history. Hard work, that; and she was a genius, too! Darwin was a master-workman in science. In his scrap of autobiography he explains the success of his book, "The Origin of Species," by two causes: (1.) It was so slowly written. More than twenty years of collection and arrangement of facts preceded its publication, and that publication was his fifth re-writing. First came a short, condensed statement; then another; then a long, full statement; then an abstract from this, and, at last, abstracted from this abstract, came the book. What patient labor! Yet Darwin was a man before whose genius all the men of science in the world would stand in reverence. And (2) for years it was his "golden rule," as he calls it, to note and study every fact that seemed opposed to his theory. The result of this rule was that his book, when it appeared, was a sifted argument presented at its strongest, anticipating most of the objections that were raised to it. Hard work, all this, as he himself knew well; for it was himself who said: "Whenever I have found out that I have blundered, and when I have been contemptuously criticised, and even when I have been overpraised, it has been my greatest comfort to say to myself: 'I have worked as hard and as well as I could, and no man can do more than this.'"

Such instances hint how master-workmen educate themselves by and in their work to be the masters. And if this be true in book-making, it is no less true of any humblest task. Hear what Mrs. Garfield once wrote her husband, the man who was to be the President: "I am glad to tell you that, out of all the toil and disappointments of the summer just ended, I have risen up to a victory. I read something like this the other day: 'There is no healthy thought without labor, and thought makes the labor happy.' Perhaps this is the way I have been able to climb up higher. It came to me one morning when I was making bread. I said to myself, 'Here I am, compelled by an inevitable necessity to make our bread this summer. Why not consider it a pleasant occupation, and make it so by trying to see what perfect bread I can make?' It seemed like an inspiration, and the whole of life grew brighter. The very sunshine seemed flowing down through my spirit into the white loaves; and now I believe my table is furnished with better bread than ever before. And this truth, old as creation, seems just now to have become fully mine, that I need not be the shirking slave of toil, but its regal master, making whatever I do yield its best fruits."

It is a great comfort and inspiration amid long, hard tasks to remember all this, and to say to one's self: "Why, this is going to college for me; this task is the day's lesson; I'm not a drudge, but a pupil; do this as well as I can, and there is education, there is 'culture,' in it for me." The sense of quantity in the task may tire and age us, often does; the sense of high quality put into it refreshes and makes young. Many of us contrive to miss the joy by not doing the work well enough to get it.

(2.) SOCIETY.

The second teacher for those of us who cannot go to college is Society. And, as with the head-teacher, Work, we scarcely realize how much we owe this tireless assistant, and how much more it can teach us than it does, if we will let it. "Every man my school master," is a motto for the wise. It is said of Daniel Webster that he never met a stable-boy without extracting some bit of information from him that was worth remembering. Probably no eye meets eye, no hand clasps hand, no two voices mingle in a minute's conversation without some actual interchange of influence, unconscious if not conscious. Think, then, of the education always going on for good or ill! A wilderness of varied character stretches around us in every social circle. The heroes and the villains of the novels walk our streets, and we ourselves are the stuff that Shakspeare's plays are made of. The carpenter and the carpentress, the grocer and the grocer's wife, the parson and the lawyer, and the broods of playing children hold more texts than any text-book. If we can only read well our neighbors, each, like a bit of scripture, is "profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness;" and the best among them are "inspired of God" to reveal to us—what? Ourselves, our unknown possibilities, the sleeping powers within us—and to make us come up higher. "Our chief want in life—is it not somebody who can make us do what we can? We are easily great with the loved and honored associate." As if unexplored wastes of human nature lay within us all, waiting for some Livingstone or Kane to come that way. Blessed are they who have the eyes to see to the inside of a neighbor!

Among discoverers thus gifted are men we put upon the school-committee, send to the Legislature, elect as Mayor and as Governor, make overseer of the very college that, as boys, they longed, but never could afford, to go to. And these men might answer, should we ask them about their schooling,—“My schooling? I have had none to speak of. My school-masters have been the men and women I have met in parlors, in the church, in the caucus, in the shop, the counting rooms, on 'Change. One taught me manners; one taught me tact; she raised my standards of justice and truthfulness and honor; he widened my ideas of public spirit; this one showed me how to save time in my work, and that one how to spend my leisure to advantage; and many a man and many a woman has served to warn me by making my mistakes for me. I have seldom faced a neighbor without facing a teacher.” He who can truly say such things was born for education, and will get it, whether he go to college or not.

But how is it that they manage to extract so much—these head scholars in the bookless school? Some do it by that gift of eyes to see the inside of a neighbor; others have a genius for geniality. But, as in work, so in sciety, few win a great success without deliberate effort. There is no easy, royal road to any art. To extract the good out of society takes bravery, takes modesty, takes a kind heart, takes a high aim. Bravery to conquer shyness, if one has it; for some poor fellows it takes campaigns of suffering to conquer shyness! If we know that we are shy, better launch ourselves into the party, though we drift to the wall forlorn; better send ourselves to dancing school, though we only dare to dance with the little girls; better make ourselves tell the story at table until we can tell it, and others can hear it, without a shudder. By and by we shall hug and bless ourselves for all this bravery. But through it all keep bravery's twin, modesty; for modesty gives the ready passport through the lanes of good society. The clean, kind heart is needed, too, for this alone admits one past the outer doors and the reception rooms of courtesy to the inner living rooms of mind and heart. And the high choice is needed which companions the best side, not the poorer side, in men, and which instinctively seeks friends among those brighter and nobler than one's self. Four things,—it takes them all; bravery, modesty, a kind heart, and high choices in comradeship. Have these, and you will have the art of making neighbors, and of making your way quickly to the inside and the best side of a neighbor, and men and women in loving faculties of approval will confer upon you the invisible degree, "Master of Arts."

(3.) BOOKS.

And now a word about the third teacher who waits to teach us boys and girls and men and women who cannot go to college. His name is Books. He is the same great teacher that they have in colleges, but in this day he goes about the country teaching everybody. He goes to the big city and every alley in it, teaching. He goes to the little village and every cottage in it, teaching. He will teach just what one wants to hear—all manner of trash, all manner of vileness, if one wants that. He does teach a vast deal of mental dissipation, and leads many minds into very bad company. On the other hand, there is no end to the good things he will teach, if one wants them. He will teach us history; he will teach us science; he will teach us the love of good literature; he will teach us how to think well, how to talk well, how to write well. And he will stand to us in place of good society, if we cannot otherwise command it; for in books we can visit the best of the race. He will almost bring the college to us who cannot go to it, if we are willing to study under him patiently and steadily and with high aims. But again, it takes the patience, the steadiness, the high choices, and the hard work, or else he can do little for us. The young man ready to give that price for his help, will make for himself three golden rules:

I will be a reader.

I will read best books.

I will read best books in the best way.

"I will be a reader": that is, no day shall make me so tired that I will not find an hour; if not an hour, a half hour; if not a half hour, then a quarter; if not a quarter, then five minutes, in which I will read something. With many of us the odd minutes of ten years are enough to make the difference between an educated and an uneducated man. The odd minutes of this summer can make the difference between two good solid books put into us and none at all put in. The odd minutes of tomorrow can make the difference between a rich day and a poor day for our minds. The men on exchange grow rich on margins: it is margins of time well used that gives us mental riches. How many opulent minds have taught that secret! There were Franklin, Theodore Parker, Lincoln—all of them poor boys with horny hands and candlelight, no more. There were Faraday, Chambers, Stephenson, poorer boys, if possible. Many and many a boy starting with good eyes, a fair mind, a strong will, and his odd minutes, has become an intellectual capitalist. Many a boy—and how about the girls? Let me quote from "Far and Near," a journal for working girls:

"A young mother said: 'I haven't read a book in three months; I can't with the children.' But her neighbor across the way, with one more child, had read many volumes in that time by always keeping a book in her work-basket, ready to catch up at odd minutes. She seasoned her darning and mending with literature. Lucy Larcom, when a mill girl in Lowell, carried a book in the big pocket of her apron, and records specially the fact that she read Wordsworth's poems and many of Shakspeare's plays in spare minutes amidst the clatter of spindles. Another lady told the writer that she read Carlyle's 'French Revolution' and Taine's 'English Literature' while waiting for her husband to come to dinner. She was her own housemaid and kept the books close at hand in the dining-room."

But, of course, if I am to reach culture, the books I read must be "best books;" not bad, not even pretty good, but the best my mind is able to absorb. That is our second golden rule. In this day of cheap literature, beware of the literature of cheap quality. Too much newspaper will spoil one for magazines. Too much magazine will spoil one for a solid book. Our margins are small. How shall we use them? It is easy to use them all up and have nothing to show. Look out the words "Index Expurgatorius" in the cyclopedia to see what they mean, and then make a private Index Expurgatorius, on which a great many innocent books, as well as all bad books, should be registered,—innocent books which are not innocent for you and me because our time-margins are so small. Am I a boy, the question on which my education is apt to turn is this: Shall the newspaper be the staple of my reading? Am I a girl, the turning question is: Shall love-stories be the staple of my reading? Am I a grown man or woman, the turning, or perhaps the turned, question is: What sort of books lie waiting on my table for the leisure hour at night, and what do I read on Sunday afternoons? In the public libraries seventy to eighty-five per cent. of the books taken out are classed as "juveniles and fictions." If my library book is often in that seventy per cent., I am no candidate for "culture." Whereas the habit of absorbing three or four "real" books each year, and year by year, goes far towards making one the gentleman or lady.

Of absorbing them, I say, for "I will read best books in the best way." This, our last rule can be put in one word—Read and ruminate! Read and ruminate! A book that gives no cud to chew is scarce worth reading once; a book worth reading of which one does not chew the cud, has scarce been read.

A bracing word from John Stuart Mill shall end our talk. He says: "They who know how to employ opportunities will often find that they can create them, and what we achieve depends less on the amount of time we possess than on the use we make of our time. Several great things which this generation is destined to do will assuredly be done by persons for whom society has done far less, to whom it has given far less preparation, than those whom I am now addressing." If that be true in England, how much more true here in the land of opportunity! Work, Society, Books—with these three teachers, and a will to get the best from them, Culture without College is possible, and possible for me.

SUNDAY IN JUNE.

Hark! In the orchard, near to my window,

A thrush is spokesman for all the birds.

"We bring you," he carols, "a new June morning:

Use it—live it—set it to words."

Hark! From the porch, right under my window,

Children's voices rising in glee.

"We bring you," they say, "two souls new dawning:

What is their human day to be?"

Day of June, may the songs that greet you

Ring as clear at your set of sun!

Souls, with you be it always morning,
Ever a larger life begun!

World's Fair Notes

Hovenden's "Breaking of Home Ties" must be regarded as one of the successes of the Fair. Hovenden is from Plymouth Meeting, Pa. He must, as Emerson said of Whitman, have had a "long foreground" somewhere, but so far as I know he comes to the Exposition very much of a stranger. But he is a stranger no longer. No painting in the building arrests everybody's attention as this creation of his does.

I overheard one criticism: "Well done, affecting, but commonplace." More commonplace than Millet's "Sheep Shearers," than his "Pig Killers"? But what of commonplace? Are we ashamed of the common, every-day life? Nothing is commonplace, in any sense of being poor or cheap, which art can glorify. Lifted into the realm of the imagination the common things of life take their place securely in the home of the universal, inseparable parts of the whole. But is it meant that Hovenden's picture is "too real" in treatment, depicts everything with too close resemblance to facts, tells the whole story too clearly? Therefore it lacks imagination, leaves no room for imagination. There is much cant about this "too real." Nothing is "too real" until the story is told.

"The Pig Killers" are very real, and the pig is very real, unless his snout is too long; that is very true to life. And the scene of the proposed butchery is realistic enough. But what of that? Is the imagination balked? Not a bit of it. The feelings of that pig, the reasons for his obstinacy, the baffled wiles of the man, the woman's perfidy in trying to fool him to his doom with a bucket of swill—oh, there is plenty of room for the liveliest imagination! And if some tender soul is seeking a "moral"—what a stretch of the imagination awaits it!

In this "Breaking of Home Ties," here is the very embodiment of the mother forcing herself to the inevitable, sending forth her idol boy, now taller than herself, to do his battle alone in the great and all too unfriendly world. She must do it, but her heart is in her eyes, in her every feature, despite all she can do. Will that boy ever forget that look?

And the boy! Choking back now all the great expectations of this to him supreme moment, as he stands on the threshold of the career he has pictured in his mind until it almost seems as real and sure as all that he now puts behind him, he looks past his mother into the future; or, if his eyes meet hers, they still look beyond. He can hardly realize why there should be this agony of parting. He is not afraid; he will return again and they will find that his head has been "level." But the mother thinks she knows the world, and it is her one stripling boy against it.

But why against it? Is there not some mistake here? The boy has, perhaps, the truer instinct after all. As a rule he will receive from that world in kind like unto that he carries. He will make friends, warm friends, true friends, if he himself be a friend. Let the mother trust him; let her trust the world more. Let her not so much dampen his ardor, nor sow in his heart the seed of too great a suspicion. It is far better for her to believe than to doubt. Yet, there she stands, and cannot do otherwise.

The father, I take it, clutches the grip and moves on, his back to the scene. The boy shall not see tears in his eyes. Yet his heart already is lonesome. He knows the world better than the mother does, is more trustful, courageous, expectant. He would not be so proud of his boy if he did not believe him equal to the emergency.

Altogether, it is a picture too sad to see, yet one that can never be passed.

From the point of view of its technique, it seems a little too smoothly done, and yet it is probably all right. There is no standard in this respect, no better rule than, Handle your material as you please so you hit the mark. Take the dress on this mother,—spotted calico, or whatever it may be,—how it fits to her form with a homely grace, as part and parcel of her very soul. No flowing, sweeping, graceful lines; merely a true mother, clothed simply and unadorned; not a spectacle, but a soul.

Correspondence

THE COMING CHURCH.

DEAR UNITY: I wish to send you my congratulations over recent improvements. Surely the thoughts of freedom should be clothed in choicest form. UNITY is needed in the ranks of rationalism. Its cry for a religion greater than any denomination is a wholesome noise. Gladly do I welcome the "one step more" in the history of UNITY's improvement. One suggestive sentence in an editorial of May last I hope some day will bring results: "Would not this conference [the W. U. C.] be coming not only to itself, but to its own, if it called itself the Western Conference of Liberal, or Free, Churches?" Some of us feel a growing need of a conference with another name. The "Unitarian" name is a good name. It has served its purpose well. But the movement which that name today tries to represent is far greater than our denominational history. Can we wisely wish the name to be a "red rag" to bigotry and ignorance? and such it surely is. Our individual churches will hold the name applied to the conferences. We have that much of organization, at least, in our denomination. Let the conference therefore change. May the discussion continue until it issues in a "conference of progressive churches." Such a conference will be not Western, but American. It will not be a "branch" of Unitarianism, but Unitarian conferences will become its auxiliaries. May the Western conferences give its emphasis, as it has ever given it, to rational, broad religion,—to rationality and breadth for the sake of religion; and may it in all peace and friendliness establish the "coming church!"

If the Western Conference ever takes such a step; or if it does not, UNITY will still advocate the church too great for name to fetter it, too free for any bonds.

If the church needs any one thing more than another, it is to be "socialized." "For thee and for me" should be its motto. And this state of church life will never come until the people ask for it by their appreciation. Educate the people, therefore, O UNITY! The secular press will not do it. Few people read the social science press of the day, and it must be acknowledged that they might absorb more fanaticism than wisdom if they did. Give us a religious sociology, a study of the association of hearts and heads! If UNITY will do this thing it will become the prophet of the Higher Faith.

OPIMUM-FIENDS FROM THE CRADLE.

[The following communication we print in fitting humiliation. Notwithstanding our vigilance and well-understood policy, the medicine man will creep into our advertising columns once in a while. As soon as our attention was called to it, the obnoxious advertisement was suppressed, and a snug little annual contract for advertising space sacrificed. Only those who have tried it will ever know how persistently business and principle seem to war with each other in the advertising department of a newspaper.—ED.]

DEAR UNITY: It gave me quite a start, the other day, to find you taking stock (inadvertently, of course) in the business of making opium-fiends.

Probably nothing else—not even the reckless prescribing of laudanum and hypodermic injections by certain classes of "physicians"—has done more to breed the opium habit in this country than the persistent advertising of the famous (or infamous) nostrum, composed of syrup, anise and morphine, wherewith credulous young parents and unscrupulous nurses have, for a generation past, been urged to dose and soothe (stupefy) helpless babies. The seeds of that baleful habit have been imbibed with the mother's milk; and the "doped" cigarette a few years later has quickened their sprouting.

The facts of the case are too well known among well-informed people to call for testimony or argument in your columns. And for my part, I do not believe that the vilified Chinaman's opium-joint has wrought America a tithe of the harm that has been done our little ones by the business enterprise and "push" of a single drug firm, which have been bribing the press of the country generally, year after year, with the price of a three-line "ad."!

For once UNITY seems to have been caught napping; but for the sake of the higher health, of sobriety and humanity, make haste and get up again among the "few honorable exceptions"!

Faithfully and fraternally yours,
N. E. R.

Chicago, Ills.

AUTHORITY WANTED.

TO THE EDITOR OF UNITY: In a recent discussion with a Methodist I asserted that Wesley was radically opposed to the Trinity doctrine, and denounced it in very emphatic terms, but when my authority was called for I could not give it.

I am convinced, however, that the statement was correct, and will be obliged if you or any reader of UNITY will inform me where the proof of the assertion can be found.

The Study Table

THE MONIST for the quarter ending in July, beside several interesting reviews, had two discussions which commanded our special attention: that between Mr. Peirce and the editor on "Chance versus Necessitarianism," in which Dr. Carus shows himself an able controversialist, and Prof. E. D. Cope's paper on "The Foundations of Thism." While we are unable to accept all his premises and conclusions, we found much in this article that was suggestive and helpful. As illustrative of this we quote his statement of the "utilitarian ground of our numerous ethical and religious organizations:"

If ethics cannot exist without material expression, it is clear that, on the other hand, they cannot exist without a subjective foundation. Thus ethics is the highest expression of the relation between mind and matter. Ethics is the practical application of the mental powers to human relations, and the more complete the evolution of mind the more perfect is the ethical practice. Thus the evolution of the mind is the guarantee of ethical progress, and the more intelligent the mind, the more easy will the evolution be. As in all education, the laggards experience the severities of compulsion, while pains and penalties are avoided by those who perceive their approach and do not await their arrival. Here we have the utilitarian ground of our numerous ethical and religious organizations. They invite men to a priori subjective theory, and objective practice, so as to preserve society from the evils of inferior and painful methods of compulsion, which lie at the basis of ethical evolution. It is the dread of this method which rouses a natural repugnance in the minds of many men to the doctrine which teaches of it. But it must be remembered that the instruments of evolution change with the thing that is evolving, and the conditions of progressive ethics are the stages of progress of the mind. What is necessary for the education of the lower mind is no longer necessary for the higher. This is not only a truth of philosophy, but the fact may be discerned in the religions which men made for themselves. They describe the ethical state of their authors, and prescribe the treatment appropriate to it.

THE OUTLOOK continues to deserve the esteem won by the Christian Union. The issue of August 5 is a particularly rich one. The editorial, "Settled," although perhaps stating what is now agreed upon as religious truth a little too strongly, certainly gives an approximately correct picture of the present state of religious science. In another column we republish the editor's discussion of "The Weakness of Self-consciousness." In the two papers on the financial question, that by the bimetallist, A. Foster Higgins, is at the same time one of the best and briefest statements of that side of the question that we have seen.

Notes from the field

Pittsfield, Mass.—Rev. W. W. Fenn, of the Church of the Messiah, Chicago, will preach here Aug. 27 and Sept. 3. Every one of our church should read Prof. Harnack's article on the Apostles' Creed in the July number of the Nineteenth Century. Rev. Mr. Horst gave an excellent sermon on "The Four Corner Stones of Our Faith," which are: 1. The honest, heroic search for truth. We believe in the continuous revelation of God, which implies that all the truth has not yet been spoken. 2. Christ, whom we follow as our master and under whose leadership we seek to build up the kingdom of heaven on earth—i. e., by love and helpfulness make earth our community, our own homes a heaven. 3. The worship of God. 4. The service of man, in which all true worship must express itself. This noble faith of ours which loves truth, and follows Christ, and worships God, and helps men, is good, not only for this day and age, but for all times, for it is founded on eternal principles which can not pass away. All true Christian faith must be founded on these principles, which no man can ever outgrow, unless he can outgrow God.—Unity Notes, in The Berkshire Eagle Ramona Ranch, Montana.—On Tuesday, July 25, 1893, Rev. J. H. Crooker, of Helena, officiated here at a double wedding,—the marriage of Charles J. Mayers and Fannie M. Spencer: and also, Frederick A. Spencer and Hattie Wood,—son and daughter of Rev. A. A. Spencer, well known in Wisconsin, and at present at the head of this very successful educational work among the Crow Indians.

THE WORD SHE REMEMBERED.

"You remember the sermon you heard, my dear?"

The little one blushed and dropped her eyes,
Then lifted them bravely, with look of cheer,
Eyes that were blue as the summer skies.

"I'm afraid I forgot what the minister said,
He said so much to the grown-up men,
And the pulpit was 'way over my head;
But I told mamma that he said, 'Amen.'

"And 'Amen,' you know, means 'Let it be,'
Whatever our Lord may please to do;
And that is sermon enough for me,
If I mind and feel so, the whole week through."

I took the little one's word to heart:
I wish I could carry it all day long,
The "Amen" spirit which hides the art
To meet each cross with a happy song.

—M. E. Sangster, in Myrtle.

A LITTLE GIRL'S VISIT TO FRANCE.

Margery and Cuthbert lived in a little town in the south of England. Every summer they went with Mamma to the seashore. They had been to Brighton, Yarmouth, Scarborough and Leamington.

"This year," said Mamma, "we will go to Dover."

"And perhaps I can run down for a week or two and take you across the Channel to France," added Papa.

"Won't that be fun?" said Cuthbert, aged eleven. Margery, who was seven, and just beginning to study the French grammar, asked timidly:

"How can we understand what the people say?"

"We will invite Cousin Laura to go with us," said Mamma. Cousin Laura was a grown-up young lady who had just finished school, and prided herself upon her pure Parisian accent.

Two delightful weeks were spent in Dover. The children found various treasures in the shape of shells, stones and seaweed on the beach; they rode on the patient donkeys, dug sand with their wooden spades, gazed curiously into the windows of the tiny houses hollowed out of the huge white cliffs, and looked with awe upon the immense mountain of chalk that loomed behind their boarding-house, on which the tall soldiers in scarlet uniform looked, to the wondering eyes below, like tiny toy men, and their barracks like dolls' houses. They went up the Giant's Causeway to Dover Castle, in which are stored many curious things, not the least interesting to Cuthbert being the coats of mail and visors worn by gallant knights of old. They walked along the Grand Parade, and on the pier far out into the sea. One day, while on one of the smaller cliffs, Cuthbert thought it would be great fun to roll down its steep declivity.

"No, no!" said Mamma. "You might injure yourself for life."

Just then, whether by accident or design they never knew, over the edge went Cuthbert. Mamma almost fainted with fright, Cousin Laura screamed, and Margery began to cry. But Cuthbert, at the foot of the cliff, rose to his feet, clapped his hands, and laughed aloud. He wasn't hurt, and wanted to repeat the experiment, but Mamma would not hear of it.

The morning set for crossing the Straits rose gray and lowering. A strong gale was blowing, but their trunks were packed, arrangements made, and they determined to go if possible. It was only with the greatest difficulty, and by the offer of an extra fee, that Papa could induce a captain to take them in such a furious storm. Finally they put out to sea, Margery carrying a big bag of lemons, and Cuthbert a bottle of brandy, two infallible remedies for seasickness. No sooner were they seated than the boat gave a lurch, and Cuthbert fell forward; the bottle broke, and all the brandy was spilled on the deck, where probably it did just as much good as it would have done elsewhere. Oh, how that boat rocked and creaked and groaned! Angry waves dashed against her sides, but she bore up bravely, and kept on her way, though wind and tide were against her.

Soon Mamma and Margery had to retire to the cabin below, and Papa went to wait upon them, for the lemons were of no avail. Cousin Laura and Cuthbert staid on deck. Laura would have been drenched by the salt spray had not the kind-hearted captain lent her a dread-naught coat, which covered her from head to feet. Cuthbert enveloped himself in Mamma's shawl, much too large and too long, and trailed up and down the wet, slippery deck, greatly to the amusement of the captain and crew. All were glad when safely landed and housed in the cheery hotel at Calais. Such a dinner as they ate. First came soup, which the ladies could not touch, because that mischievous boy, Cuthbert, declared he saw frogs' legs in it; but Papa pronounced it very good; then a roasted chicken, daintily browned, with delicious gravy; vegetables served in all sorts of fantastic shapes; tomatoes like large pink puff balls; potatoes that seemed to be snowy flakes of sea foam; pale-green cabbage leaves, crisp and curly, filled with ripe red raspberries; sherbets that sparkled, and custards beyond compare.

After dinner they drove along pleasant country roads and winding lanes, and watched the peasants gathering in the vintage. Grapes hung in clusters by the roadside, and the polite and friendly driver frequently dismounted to pluck some for the thirsty travelers.

Two sleepy children crept into the queer white-canopied beds that night and slept as soundly as though in their own little cots at home.

The next day they took the diligence for Boulogne. The polite landlord, the stout landlady, the son and daughter, the old grandmother, and all the lackeys, big and little, came into the courtyard to see them off. Papa gladdened the grandmother's heart by telling her how strongly she resembled his mother. Mamma bought of the pretty waiting-maid her quaint white cap as a souvenir. Laura showered smiles and thanks upon them all, though I regret to say that half her pretty phrases were not understood, for the French of the schools and the French spoken in France somehow seem to differ in sound.

At Boulogne they saw the famous Napoleon monument, and ascended its spiral stairway to the summit, from whence they had a magnificent view of the towns and villages below and the blue expanse of sea beyond. Cuthbert, who was always playing pranks, terrified Mamma by wanting to balance himself on the railing, climb outside of it, and other foolish acts. Mamma and Margery were glad to go down to earth again, for the great height made them dizzy and faint, and Cuthbert was such a tease.

Then they went on to Paris—gay and beautiful Paris, with its outdoor life, its wonderful shops and cafes, its beautiful churches, fragrant with incense and gorgeous with precious stones and costly stuffs. Through the dim cloisters they wandered, where black-robed priests and sweet-faced nuns mingled with the market woman with her basket, the huckster with his wares, and the high-born lady with her sorrows, who knelt on the floor and prayed to the pitying Christ.

All too swiftly glided by those sweet September days, and almost before they could realize it they were again in their own dear home.

"Next year," said Mamma, "we will go to Spain."

Alas! when next year came Mamma had gone to an unknown country, and Margery and Cutbbert were motherless. M. R. H.

HOW NANNIE RETRIEVED HERSELF.

Almost all children have a troublesome habit of telling the truth about things, and blurt it out in season and out of season, and keep their relatives in a state of abject terror at the way in which they often betray family opinions. Nannie was no exception to this rule, and her mother, like other mothers, found it difficult to teach her that while truthfulness was essential, the truth—or, rather, facts which some people mistake as the only truths—should not always be spoken; that while we must not say a thing is good which is altogether bad, it is permitted us to keep silence without any transgression of the moral law.

One day Nannie was taken in to see the new baby and cousin. After viewing it with great gravity for several moments she said, "I t'ink it's a berry homely baby."

After they had reached home her mother took her to task for her plainness of speech. Nannie, of course, insisted that the baby was homely and she had only told the truth. "But, Nannie," said Mamma, "it would have been better not to have said anything; or you could have said it had pretty hair, for that is true. I'm afraid you hurt Aunty's feelings."

On the next visit Nannie hastened to retrieve herself. "Aunty," she remarked, after a long look at the small creature, "Aunty, I t'ink your baby is berry decent!" and her mother in despair came to the wise conclusion to leave Nannie in the future to the promptings of her own innocent mind.

A GENIUS FOR HELPING FOLKS.

"There is a man," said his neighbor, speaking of a village carpenter, "who has done more good, I really believe, in this community than any man who ever lived in it. He cannot talk very well in prayer meeting, and he doesn't often try. He isn't worth $2,000, and it is very little he can put down on subscription papers for any object. But a new family never moves into the village that he does not find them out, to give them a neighborly welcome, and offer any little service he can render. He is usually on the lookout to give strangers a seat in his pew in church. He is always ready to watch with a sick neighbor, and look after his affairs for him; and I've sometimes thought he and his wife kept house-plants in winter just for the sake of being able to send little bouquets to invalids. He finds time for a pleasant word for every child he meets, and you'll always see them climbing into his one-horse wagon when he has no other load. He really seems to have a genius for helping folks in all sorts of common ways, and it does me good every day just to meet him on the streets." —Selected.

The Six Years' Course of Sunday School Lessons.

The first year's work, "Beginnings," originally prepared by the lamented Henry Doty Maxson, and upon which Mr. Gould has been working for the past year, has gone to the printer and will be ready for sale by the first of September. Price 25 cents, postpaid, or $2.50 per dozen. The Western Sunday School Society is prepared to take advance orders. Those interested are requested to send orders as soon as possible, so that the book may be in their hands by the opening of Sunday School in the autumn.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL S. S. INSTITUTE,

Under the auspices of the Western S. S. Society, will be held this year in the UNITY BUILDING, under the management of

The Tower Hill Pleasure Co.

AUGUST 7 TO 12.

The building is located at 286 Woodlawn Terrace, within three minutes' walk of one of the World's Fair gates, and about the same distance from the Illinois Central Railroad Station at Sixty-seventh street.

The program this year will consist of ten two-hour sessions, from 10 to 12 a. m., led by Rev. W. W. Fenn. The study will be devoted to the fourth year's work of the Six Years' Course—"The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion;" The New Testament Time. Mr. Fenn proposes to arrange the studies upon an art string, using the great masterpieces of Christian art as centers around which the story of Jesus, the disciples and the apostles will be told. So far as possible these pictures will be made available to teachers and pupils.

It is hoped that this Institute work will fit into, rather than interfere with, the sight-seeing of World's Fair attendants, and every help possible to the management in this direction will be rendered.

Arrangements for room and board at economic prices can be made in the Unity Building or in the immediate vicinity.

Institute tickets for the season, $2.00. For further particulars concerning Institute, address MRS. E. T. LEONARD, 6600 Ellis Ave., Chicago. Application for room etc., to be made to MRS. R. H. KELLY, 286 Woodlawn Terrace.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL INSTITUTE PROGRAM.

In the New Testament lessons for next year, which will form the basis of the Institute work, three things will be attempted: First—to study a few good pictures; second, to present by the pictures, arranged in chronological order, the chief events in New Testament history; third, to show, by the aid of the pictures, leading New Testament ideas which may be regarded as the flowering of the Hebrew religion. Obviously no single lesson can be completely ideal: an event which cannot be omitted in an outline of New Testament history may not have been the subject of a great painting; or, sometimes, a picture of not the highest artistic merit may show more clearly than another intrinsically better a truth which must be included. Yet it is believed that a set of fairly good pictures has been selected, and that the series, if not perfectly ideal, will be found serviceable.

The pictures selected are the following:

The Holy Night—Correggio.

The above will explain itself. We earnestly solicit the co-operation of ministers, Sunday-school superintendents and teachers in extending this notice. One representative from each school that proposes to use this fourth year's study in the Six Years' Course, at the Institute, will greatly help the teachers' meeting and other Sunday-school work in the parish during the year. E. T. LEONARD, 6600 Ellis Ave.

The Sistine Madonna—Raphael.
The Carpenter's Son—Hofmann.
Christ Disputing with the Doctors—Hofmann.

The Baptism by John—Dore.
Tempted by Satan—Cornecelius.
Christ Preaching from a Boat—Hofmann.

The Sower—Millet.
Jesus and the Sinner—Hofmann.
The Good Samaritan.
Jesus and the Children—Hofmann.
The Transfiguration—Raphael.
Purifying the Temple—Hofmann.
The Last Supper—Leonardo da Vinci.

Ecce Homo—Rembrandt.
The Crucifixion—Angelo.
Easter Morning—Plochorst.
The Omnipresent Christ—Hofmann.
The Death of Ananias—Raphael.
Stephen the Martyr.
Paul Preaching in Athens—Raphael.
Christus Consolator—Scheffer.

All of these pictures are published by Soule, and arrangements will be made to supply sets at lowest possible rates. This list is published provisionally, subject to slight alterations before the meeting of the Institute. W. W. FENN.

Woman, Church and State.

This long promised book by Matilda Joslyn Gage has just been issued in a handsome volume of 555 pages. The announcement of this forthcoming work a few years since with the publication of a preliminary sketch of its contents roused much interest both in this country and in Europe, and many letters of inquiry regarding it have been received every year since. Therefore it is with pleasure we answer all such enquiries by the announcement of its publication by our firm.

Mrs. Gage has long been known as a profound thinker, spoken of as possessing "curious and minute historical knowledge, a peculiar sense of justice, and an intense and passionate love of liberty." Profoundly stirred to the depths of her being by the wrongs and injustice perpetrated upon her sex, a pioneer in the Woman Suffrage reform, devoting her life to its advocacy and advancement, her latest and most profound work in this line is "Woman, Church and State." Mrs. Gage has given years to its preparation. It is a historical work, rendered doubly valuable by copious notes and references to authorities not easily accessible to the general reader, and is an emphatic refutation of that assertion so often made by the clergy, that woman holds a higher position under Christianity than ever before. The chapter upon the "Matriarchate" proves the high position woman held among ancient nations, both in religion and government, ages before the rise of either Judaism or Christianity. While these forms of religion represent the Patriarchate or Father-rule, it is an unquestionable fact that under the Matriarchate or Mother-rule which preceded it, woman was superior to man in religion, government and the family, while peace and justice reigned supreme. A vast fund of information upon religious, social and governmental points is contained in this book. Parker Pillsbury, the veteran abolitionist who is numbered among the "Twelve Apostles" of the Anti-Slavery reform, and who was for four years a Theological student in two New England Seminaries, said of the preliminary sketch: "It contains facts in church history of stupendous importance, not taught in any Seminary or University in Christendom."

The chapter upon "Celibacy" is especially strong, showing the growth of this idea and its final confirmation as a dogma of the church, although opposed by St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Paphnutius, the martyr bishop of Thebes; also its terrible results in the destruction of virtue; its establishment of two codes of morals; its creation of the confessional and control of the family; its system of concubinage; the increased persecution for witchcraft and the enlarged power of the Inquisition under it. We consider the chapter upon celibacy one of the most important in the book, where all are valuable.

Tracing the gradual encroachment of Canon Law, Mrs. Gage shows the power it gained by its control of wills, the guardianship of orphans, marriage and divorce; and from the best authority she proves the sanction of Polygamy by the Christian Church. Abby Hutchinson (Patten) one of the original famous Hutchinson singers once said, "I like to hear Mrs. Gage speak; she always says something new and different from others." The chapter entitled "Woman and Work" is a unique presentation of that question fully sustaining Mrs. Gage's reputation of "saying things different from others."

In "The Church of To-Day" the teachings of the pulpit as to woman's created inferiority and "original sin" are brought down to the present hour. "Woman, Church and State" is a terrible indictment of Christianity and the civilization of to-day, the church as Mrs. Gage points out, citing from excellent authorities; first lowering the position of woman in everything connected with itself, then in the state and in the family. Yet the work is calm and dispassionate; no sense of personal injury is shown, but the facts are as coolly and as clearly stated, as any great jurist might present them. While in a general way the world has known that the policy of the church has always been to subordinate woman, and through her dominate the world, the facts proving this have never before been so thoroughly and authoritatively given. While thousands have seen the evils of catholicism, few have become aware of the equal danger to liberty arising from the orthodox protestant church, and fewer still realize the present danger in our own country owing to the work of the "Christian Party in Politics" and its determination to introduce a religious amendment in the National Constitution. These dangers are pointed out by Mrs. Gage. To read the book will be a liberal education in many directions.

The value of the book is acknowledged by all who know Mrs. Gage and her work. Helen Gardener has written us, "I shall want the first copy issued."

The price of the book in substantial cloth binding is $2.00, including prepayment of expressage to any address.

TO BE a liberal minister takes brains. Many ministers cling to traditional religion because it gives them a ready-made gospel to retail, and so saves them from forging their message from the experiences of God vouchsafed them in their own every-day life.

THE World's Congress on Suffrage, which called out so much interest and enthusiasm last week, seems to have reached its culmination Friday. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe was unable to be present, but despite this disappointment the attendance was large and the meeting was declared a great success. The speakers were Mr. Henry B. Blackwell, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, and Miss Susan B. Anthony, and from all accounts the President of the Woman's Western Unitarian Conference made a distinct impression. Her fellow-speakers, the reporters, and the throng of listeners united in the enthusiastic expression of great satisfaction with her eloquent address on "Woman Suffrage a Means to an End."

ALAS for the slow progress of religious and race toleration! From what is published of a private letter to the editor of Hapiogah, of New York City, it appears that the Persian Jews are suffering intolerable cruelties, especially in Hamadan, despite the alleged intention of the Shah to give equal protection to all his subjects. It is said that his Mohammedan officers prevent the carrying of his wishes into effect; and that if a Jew leaves his house he is in danger of being beaten to death by the mob. No consideration seems shown for the age, sex, or condition of the unfortunate victims. From the letter referred to, the Reform Advocate quotes the despairing sentence: "There is none to have compassion or give consolation, and we are sick of our lives."

We print in this issue, in addition to the completed program of the Unitarian Congress, the preliminary announcements of the Free Religious Association and the World's Congress of Evolutionists. Both of these programs will interest our readers much and are directly related to the message and the mission of UNITY. The logical consistency and ideal inclusiveness of the Free Religious Association, and the continuous search, the spirit of quest, in connection with the solid grasp of the law of unity given by a close study of the facts of the universe, which characterizes the Evolutionist,—place both these bodies in the front line of religious leaders. However inefficient the one may be in a practical way, and far removed the other may be from existing ecclesiasticism, they both occupy prophetic ground. No words will be uttered in the great parliament more in consonance with the permanent message and religious interest of the great occasion than the words spoken from these platforms. Let our readers look out for both, and as many as possible prepare to attend, that they may listen and heed.

THE Free Church Record, with a persistency that apparently will not be corrected, continues to classify UNITY among "Unitarian publications." In its last issue it speaks of it as "the organ of progressive Unitarianism." UNITY is not and never has been connected in any organic way whatsoever with any denomination. It has now and always had upon its staff representatives of progressive thought who work with various denominations: Judaism, Ethical Culture, Universalism, and Episcopalianism have been thus represented, as well as Unitarianism. It has happily found itself for the most part with but not of the "Unitarian movement." With Channing we promptly take the Unitarian name when it is spoken ill of. With James Martineau we proudly confess our interest in and essential agreement with the development of Unitarian thought. In so far as Unitarian organizations are true to the prophetic spirit and prophetic methods of their real leaders, the major prophets, Channing, Parker, Emerson and Martineau, we are with them. But UNITY never forgets that Unitarian organizations deliberately cast two of these leaders out, and, as it seems to us, have often been disloyal both to the spirit and the methods of the others. UNITY keep company with Unitarianism so long as it goes our way, as it does with Reform Judaism, Universalism, Ethical Culture and Free Religion. But it also holds itself ready to part company with any of these when to us they seem to fail to go in the way of that broader thing: the open church of character, the Liberal Church of America, the democratic religion of study and helpfulness, which now has representatives in all forms of religious faiths, Christian and non-Christian,—representatives who, as we hope, are slowly coming into conscious recognition of each other, and some day may clasp hands in efficient organization. Several years ago Dr. Thomas said at a meeting of the Illinois Unitarian Conference, "My hand is stretched to take the hand of any one who will accept it." That is UNITY's position, and we allow no one, with our consent, to pin labels upon us that would seem to limit or narrow that position.

A YOUNG girl has asked the senior editor for a list of ten pictures found in the World's Fair Art Gallery most worthy of study. Disclaiming any superlatives, omitting the qualifying and descriptive part of the reply, the following were named as worthy of study, and are printed here for the purpose of provoking criticism, which is equivalent to awakening interest and opening eyes. Who will send us a better list? Such a list, were it possible to make it, of course would not be selected by the excellence of execution and technique alone. Here is a list which seems at least partly selected by popular vote. We purposely omit the masterpieces and the masters whose fame will draw the student's attention, such as are found in the rich British and the American loan collections. We also omit all landscape and water pieces, however attractive and helpful. We seek the pictures that are proving their power to appeal to the uninitiated human heart, sermon-preaching canvases, truth-revealing paintings. In so far as these or any other pictures deserve this judgment they are not wanting in artistic qualities. Certainly to know such pictures as these in such a way that they become permanent possessions is itself an endowment, a soul culture.

FREE CHURCHES NOT UNITARIAN

Our friend, the Christian Register, comes up with its customary smile over the suggestion of the Free church of Tacoma that the American Unitarian Association should print in its next Annual a list of churches not Unitarian, but which, on account of their free and independent spirit, hold so much in common with the Unitarians that such a list would be both a convenience and a more truthful exhibit of the Liberal forces that are making for the religion of character and of reason.

This suggestion the Register calls a "somewhat refreshing proposition," and it thinks that "the plain implication of such a distinction would be that all churches included in the first list were not free but were still subjected to some kind of slavery." This question—no more than others that have disturbed Unitarian legislators—cannot be disposed of with a sneer or with a joke. It is getting harder and harder to persuade anybody that the word "Unitarian" can be made synonymous with all the liberal organized forces in religion, that might and should, and to a certain extent do, work together; or that the word "Unitarian" is co-extensive with the fellowship which the Unitarian himself, nursed in the spirit of Channing, fired by the warmth of Parker, and lured by the high dreams of Emerson, must ever seek. We do not call it slavery, but the word "Unitarian" as used in the A. U. A. Year Book does bind, in a certain sense, the churches named in its list to the traditions, be they glorious or otherwise, to the activities, be they noble or otherwise, represented by the Unitarian organizations of America. Our neighbor, on this as on other occasions, seems to ignore the fact that among these traditions are the records and proceedings of Unitarian organizations, not churches,—the A. U. A., the N. U. C., and other conferences,—as well as the individual churches.

Another fact is equally obvious, that there are now men and churches that find themselves in closest sympathy and practical fellowship with much, aye, most, of Unitarian men and organizations, but, from historical or logical reasons, find themselves outside the Unitarian traditions, particularly those of the national organizations named. These men and societies are outside from various reasons. Some because of excluding words and phrases in the constitution of these national and other organizations; some because as a matter of fact too many Unitarian churches, in contradiction of their claim and name, are churches of the classes rather than of the masses, churches blighted with a pretension of culture that carries them from the simplicity that ministers to average human needs; a stuffiness of wealth that carries their privileges beyond the reach of struggling men and women. These "Free churches," these "Independent churches," these "People's churches" do exist under various names. Whether the A. U. A. recognizes them as essential co-workers or not is a matter of little import. Perhaps the time may come when the question will be whether these liberal churches will include as one group of their constituency the technically called and formally organized Unitarian churches and conferences. In Illinois alone there are at least seven such "Independent Societies" which are not Unitarian in name or tradition, but which are in spirit and method, to say the least, as free, as devout and as liberal as the same number of Unitarian societies found anywhere. It matters not where their names are published, or whether published at all, the hopeful thing is that there is in our midst a groping for a fellowship that will not be rimmed even by the gilt-edged ribbon of Unitarianism; that there is a rising body of consecrated men and women who are trying to formulate a seven-day church of applied religion, that will include pagan and Christian, believer and doubter, if they are out ready to work for Truth, Righteousness and Love in the world. Towards this movement we think the Unitarians have made a magnificent contribution. The existence of such a movement is a high tribute to Unitarian work and workers. The question now remains whether Unitarians will be equal to their opportunities. Are they to rejoice in what they have helped bring about, or will they continue to hold back and hold off, refuse to acknowledge the mistakes of the past, and undertake to ignore, instead of removing or correcting, their limiting traditions? Is Unitarianism going to strangle the spirit with the letter and cling to the name to the sacrifice of the thing?

Be this as it may, that Church of the Spirit, the Open Church, not founded on anti-trinitarian theology, nor upon the confession of the Christian name, but upon human needs and the inspirations of human excellence and human wisdom wherever found, is coming. It is here. And the sooner Unitarians and others recognize this fact the better for them. All hail, the Church of the Spirit! the religion of the human heart, that consecrates art, science, literature, dogma and ritual to the sanctifying of human lives and the breaking down of the arbitrary and traditional barriers that divide those who ought to be united and keep apart those who ought to walk together! Let the religion of Love be organized, the piety of Abou Ben Adhem be recognized, utilized and emphasized. This is the Unity-arianism that is conquering and will triumph.

CRITICISM.

Mr. Charles Dudley Warner, in his address before the literary congress, did us all the service of pointing out the need in America of criticism according to Matthew Arnold's definition, "a disinterested endeavor to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world." If he sends us all back to Mr. Arnold's famous essay on "The Function of Criticism at the Present Time" he will do us a still greater service, and set us to thinking, perhaps, that "the present time" is as applicable in America in 1893 as it was in England thirty years ago; that we still need "to establish a current of fresh and true ideas"; that "by the very nature of things, as [America] is not all the world, much of the best that is known and thought in the world cannot be of [American] growth, must be foreign;" and that "the [American] critic of literature, therefore, must dwell much on foreign thought."

The hindrance to our knowledge of foreign literature and thought is of course the foreign language in which they address us; in music we can all follow the best that is known and thought in the world: no translation is required, either, to help us appreciate Israel's "Alone in the World," or Millet's "Man with the Hoe." All arts except the literary art speak a universal language. It is, then, an essential accomplishment for a critic "to possess one great literature besides his own."

How grateful we should be, then, if a man like Mr. Kristofer Janson, who possesses not only our literature but that of a country where great creative genius is now at work, and who has himself both critical and creative talent,—if Mr. Janson and other cultivated foreign-born Americans (may we not call them so?) would devote themselves to the work of criticism in this high sense!

Mr. Janson has recently, in an article on the Unitarian missions to foreigners in this country, outlined the difference in temperament between us and his countrymen: "The extreme mutual flattery in this conversation, the lack of what the Germans call 'Gemuethlichkeit' in their society life, the letter-worship and form-worship, the ridiculous prudishness in their literary taste and criticisms"—are among the American traits he criticises. Here is an example of just what I was saying; Mr. Janson's criticism of us for lack of gemuethlichkeit will do us little good because we do not know what gemuethlichkeit is.

Criticism which introduces us to new names and achievements, which points out to us that which it will be best worth our while to seek out and make our own amid the countless effusions of modern literature, which translates for us rare and beautiful pages (like those of Maurice de Guerin, which Mr. Arnold sets in such exquisite English that one doubts whether the French original can be the equal of the translation),—this is the criticism which we need. It is one of the functions of the minister, as well as of the editor. It was in fulfilling this function that UNTRY introduced us to Lewis Morris a few weeks ago. It was still more serviceable, because the subject is further removed from common notice, when the Nation, a few weeks ago, gave us a long sympathetic account of a Frenchwoman, La Comtesse de Chambrun, and her writings,—an account of a gifted, devoted life—"beautiful and stainless domestic relations, surrounded by simple and refined social pleasures"—"in the highest social circles of France, and amid vast wealth."

Such a critic helps to save us from the prejudice against the French as a corrupt and morbid nation, which is apt to form itself in us on reading the Marquise de San Carlos on "French Girlhood," in the North American Review, or the judgment of a competent reader on Zola: "One breathes a sigh of relief at the thought that 'Le Docteur Pascal' is the last of that series of repellant books in which passages of marvelous beauty and strokes of undoubted genius serve but to deepen disgust and to intensify regret" F. G. B.

Men and Things

OLIVE SCHREINER is, we believe, now visiting in London. She has come from South Africa with another manuscript. Her reception is very different from that of a few years ago, when George Meredith in his capacity of reader for a big publishing house asked by letter that "Mr. Ralph Iron should call upon him." Miss Schreiner is the daughter of a German missionary, is the ninth of a family of twelve children, was grown up before she ever saw a town.

J. H. WILLIAMS & CO., of Brooklyn, N. Y., whose business is drop forging, have done an admirable thing for their employes, which will doubtless redound to their own advantage in gaining the confidence of their workmen and keeping the best kind of men in their employment. They have, at considerable expense, set up shower baths, with hot and cold water, and other bathing facilities, both for the men themselves and for their working clothes; putting in convenient lockers in which the men may leave the clothes which they wear to and from the works. The men work where the temperature is very high, and of course they are drenched in perspiration. They may now have a refreshing bath at noon and at night, and have their working clothes clean and dry ready for them every morning.

THE TWO LIGHTS.

The darkness rises to the star-lit height.
 O'er town and plain and clustered olive trees.
 All sounds of labor cease, the sighing breeze
 Alone disturbs the dewy hush of night.
 'Twi'x star and dew shine forth two lights of earth,
 From height and plain they each a story tell;
 One of the hermit in his lonely cell,
 Watching the stars' decrease, the morning's birth.
 It speaks of souls that countless ages through
 Have watched and prayed alone upon the height,
 Keeping, through all the darkness of the night,
 Undimmed, a lofty faith, a vision true.
 The other, shining from a window low,
 To every wandering, homeless creature speaks
 Of kindly help and care, a love that seeks
 To bring divinest aid to human woe.
 It tells the story of a gospel near,
 Whose spirit is to know a neighbor's need,
 To pray in loving, worship in a deed.
 The hungry feed, the sorrowful to cheer.
 The light that burns afar upon the height
 Seems cold and distant to the toiling crowd,
 And often must the mists of earth enshroud
 The beacon ray of mercy from men's sight.
 But ever as the world moves to the morn,
 The two shall blend and perfect truth reveal:
 The star-fed faith, the heavenly ideal,
 And the pure beam from gentle service born.

ALICE GORDON.

REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

ABSTRACT OF A SERMON BY REV. VICTOR EMANUEL SOUTHWORTH, MINISTER OF THE FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH, OF WARE, N. H.

The doctrine of rewards and punishments, as it is commonly taught, amounts to this: Life is a probation. Here and now the soul is given an opportunity to be saved from the lost condition into which the race has fallen because of the disobedience of our first parents. Life is short. Death is certain. After death comes the judgment. By our acceptance or rejection of certain clearly defined conditions of salvation our final and unalterable destiny will be determined. Our opportunity for repentance and conversion ends with the grave. Then, once for all, we are rewarded, or once for all condemned to punishment. In brief, this is what is popularly understood as the doctrine of rewards and punishments. As can be readily seen, it lies at the very core of the evangelical scheme of salvation. In one way or another it is being constantly urged upon the attention of the people. Its fascination for the average mind is largely due to the great element of truth there is in it.

It is true that in a sense we are rewarded when we do what is right, and punished when we do what is wrong. This is in accordance with the great law of cause and effect. Only it is unreasonable to suppose that the reward for right-doing and the punishment for wrong-doing are in any way postponed to the life after death, when, as a matter of fact, our experience is that we cannot do a good deed without at once feeling rewarded, and we cannot do an evil deed without at once feeling condemned. In spite of all its truth, I am painfully convinced that there is no other doctrine taught in the sacred name of religion that is so easily or so often perverted to low and immoral purposes. The soul is challenged to choose, not between the right and the wrong, but between the reward and the punishment. The appeal—not always, I admit, but usually—is directed to the basest elements of our nature rather than to our noblest impulses. We are urged (I have been, you have been) to accept certain conditions of salvation, not because of the rightness or reasonableness of the conditions themselves, but for the sake of personal gain, or from fear of personal loss. And this is why I say the doctrine of rewards and punishments, as it is commonly presented, is essentially immoral and wicked, because it appeals to our lowest instincts, to our cupidity and cowardice; and not to our highest impulses, to our love of truth and our sense of right.

To me it seems as if the moral integrity of humanity calls for a direct and unqualified condemnation of this pernicious doctrine. In this sense—that the direct outcome of our conduct will be good or ill exactly in proportion as our action is right or wrong—do I hold to the doctrine of rewards and punishments. I recognize that justice and right is the one law engraven on the very heart of things,—a law that vindicates itself here and now in the facts of our own experience. In the moral world every soul has what it deserves and is fitted for, no more and no less. Every deed carries with it direct and unavoidable results. It is not a question of suffering or enjoyment, but of being.

The gain or the loss is not some fresh pleasure or some grievous pain. It is the gain or loss of moral nerve and energy. It is not what I get, but what I become, that forms the real reward or punishment. There is no such thing, therefore, as evading or being saved from the direct consequences of my action. As the Buddhists have it, "All we are is the result of what we have done." Or, as one of the old Greek sages put it, "We are our own children." That is, what we are is determined not by what Adam did or by what Jesus did, but by what we do. "We are our own children," because what we are is the result of our own actions. We are our own saviors or our own destroyers. What we are in our own moral selfhood, what we have made out of ourselves by our deliberate choice of good or of evil, this alone is our salvation or our condemnation, our reward or our punishment.

Yes, indeed, there is a large element of truth in this doctrine of moral compensations. Only this is my point—we are not rewarded or punished by another, but by ourselves. The only real reward is the increase and preservation of a noble character. The awful punishment is not so much a matter of suffering or pain as it is the moral degeneration and loss which inevitably result from wrong behavior. When the eye looks in upon the soul it sees the beauty or the deformity its own thought and deed have created. We make or mar our character. As St. Bernard said: "Nothing can work me damage but myself."

Man hath no faults except past deeds,
 No hell but what he makes.

The great Moral Reformer of Galilee, affirmed that "the kingdom of heaven is within you;" so, too, is the kingdom of hell. Heaven or hell, our punishment is just this,—

All that total of a soul
 Which is the things it did, the thoughts it had.

Alone, each for himself, must we reckon with

The fixed arithmetic of the universe,
 Which meteth good for good, ill for ill,
 Measure for measure unto deeds, words,
 thoughts,

Making one future grow from all the past.

This is right. What more can we ask? It says in the language of Dr. Lyman Abbott: "Righteousness is better than any reward it brings. Sin is worse than any punishment it entails." Worse than hell, worse than a thousand hells, is hellishness—the loss of purity, the decay of moral power, the debasement of character. This is the sure penalty of a wasted life, not that we have been shut out of heaven, but that we have shut ourselves out by unfitting ourselves for its enjoyments.

This is the view of life I would teach you, my friends, to take. I would teach you to build your life on honor. Do not try to do right for pay. Do not shun evil simply because you dread the punishment. I cannot see how you can retain the integrity of your character and stop for an instant to speculate upon the rewards or punishments when the question of right and truth is at stake. To be saved through the merits or proxy of another, to win heaven by grace would be, as Dr. Momerie suggests, equivalent to being morally lost. Heaven, or a thousand heavens, would be far too costly if in order to secure them one must sacrifice in an infinitesimal degree the integrity of one's own nature.

INDIAN WOMEN.

[The following from an article in the New World will awaken a new interest in the man whose voice will be heard next month in Chicago. Upon Mozoomdar's shoulders more than any other one man has the mantle of Keshub Chunder Sen fallen. These kinsmen are the best known representatives of the new movement that brings Brahminism up to the level of nineteenth century religion. Devout theism, rational religion, universal sympathies find in this movement an expression.—Ed.]

Every one expresses impatience at the condition of the Indian woman. She has been the victim of a civilization, or semi-civilization, controlled by foreign conquerors who had little respect for ancient Hindu usages. For the seclusion and repression of women have never been principles of the national religion. Even now, where Mohammedan rule is not enforced in cruel severity, Hindu women are comparatively free; the whole region known as Maharashtra is evidence. The Brahmin housewife of Poona tramps about the thoroughfares in heavy anklets and substantial red slippers; in the domestic arrangements and the affairs of the neighborhood she exercises a will-force imperious and aggressive. Dozens of texts are often quoted from Manu declaring that where woman is honored the Devasas are propitiated and love to dwell. Despite, however, all that has been said for and against the condition of the Indian woman, the fact remains that she deserves more attention, more service, more elevation than we have given her. The Brahmo Samaj has girded itself to deal with this fact. During the last thirty years, various agencies have been started for female education. Societies, both religious and literary, have been established, schools founded, lectures given, journals and books published, and training households opened for the benefit of women. We have, I think, more than a dozen lady graduates in and about the Brahmo Samaj, and all of them passed by hard, honest work. But there is a feeling in our heart of hearts that this is by no means the right method for the education of woman. A system that cannot adapt itself to sexes and circumstances is a slavery; a freedom that cannot realize itself in an intelligible system is a delusion. We have not been able yet to reconcile these two extremes, and I should like very much to know how other communities have done.

I pray and trust that, amidst all this clamor about "female emancipation," we may not forget that the reform of the Hindu home is the real object we have in view. The home and the congregation are the lesser and larger dimensions of the same divine relationship. The church cannot be purified while the home remains impure and unhappy. We are a very indigent people; for long, long years there is no prospect of wealth, even of comfort. What other influence or culture can help us save that which consecrates poverty into blessedness and sheds the consolation of love and trust in God?

The Brahmo Samaj is slowly building up a new society around itself. The loosening of the old caste system has now been effected to some extent among some classes quite as much by the influence of European education as by reforms similar to our own. Whatever we may have to say for or against an indiscriminate fusion, every one is agreed that the different castes and orders should come closer and form a brotherhood. In some parts of the country the rigid rules about food and association have relaxed, and members of the Brahmo Samaj—wherever they go, and whoever comes to them—give and receive a brotherly welcome of the warmest kind. Even Europeans and Mohammedans have penetrated a part of the crust of the old society. About a dozen cases of Hindus marrying English wives have been known in Bengal. The law of survival applies to the formation of a new society. It is a curious fact that the leading men of the Brahmo Samaj in every section, almost without exception so far, come from the three highest castes, though our rank and file include men of all castes, even some Mohammedans. It should be our principle to proceed in this matter as slowly and carefully as possible, leaving Time, the arch-architect, to build, shape, and modify the materials according to the intelligence and needs of the people. It is of the utmost importance that we ourselves should not get contracted into a caste, but keep our sympathies and courses open for all future contingencies.

SHALL WOMEN BE SOUGHT FOR THE MINISTRY?

With the memory of the noble women and their fine enthusiasms at the Woman's Congress in Chicago and in other succeeding congresses, and with the consciousness that it is invariably the welfare of the race which absorbs them, I cannot avoid the reflection that the ministry is the field waiting for women.

And following my reflections comes the wish that more of our bright young women leaving college and planning their life work would enter this field. The liberal churches, if they do not offer inducements, present few obstacles to the entrance of women.

Those who are already in the profession have so proved their fitness for their work that they have in a great measure removed the prejudice which a few years ago stood, sword in hand, intimidating and threatening the women who ventured to enter this path.

It is true there is still a lingering notion in some minds that a woman, however gifted, should devote herself exclusively to soothing the sorrows of one man, instead of comforting the hearts and inspiring the souls of a community; but this notion is fast fading, and, as all women do not find the man wishing their devotion, and as those who find him often find he is magnanimous enough to wish his wife to use her gifts in helping others, it follows that the way is much easier and pleasanter than formerly.

There is much of the pastoral work so peculiarly suited to women that it is often said success in a parish depends as much on the minister's wife and her ministrations as on his eloquence and religious fervor.

There are parishes waiting for leaders, some of them not able to pay large salaries, yet offering such opportunities for good work that many a woman would gladly accept the charge if encouraged to do so.

Considering the fitness of women for this work, and the need of workers, would it not be well if the Unitarian organization offered the same inducements and assistance to young women that it does to young men to prepare themselves for the ministry?

Of the hundreds of young women graduated from our colleges every year, some would gladly enter this not overcrowded profession if encouragement were extended.

ALL OF EDEN NOT LOST.*

BY REV. M. W. CHUNN, PH. D.

When Prince Buddha was growing to manhood, so runs the old Hindoo legend, his father, King Suddhodana, built three beautiful palaces the like of which this world had never before seen. These palaces rivaled in splendor the abode of the immortal gods. Magnificent gardens adorned with every shrub and flower which are a delight to mortal eyes; enchanting lakes in whose waters sported graceful swans, and upon whose bosom the lotus bloomed, trees that furnished a cooling shade and filled the air with delicious fragrance added to the beauty of King Suddhodana's stately palaces. The most beautiful women in all the land were chosen to grace these costly palaces. Ramparts were extended all around the palaces to keep out the aged, the diseased and the beggar class of mankind. There must nothing ever enter the bounds of this earthly paradise to remind anyone of old age and disease and death. In this charming spot Prince Buddha was to dwell. Parental affection was not the only motive that led King Suddhodana to make ready for his son this earthly paradise. It had been foretold by infallible soothsayers that if the prince should ever see the four presaging tokens, an old man, a diseased man, a corpse and a beggar, he would become a Buddha, and would devote his life to religious work. If he could be prevented from beholding these four presaging tokens he would become the king of all earthly kings. The father cherished the fond hope that his son would realize this last ideal, and so he would spare no pains to prevent the prince from beholding the four presaging tokens. The king had prepared a paradise even more magnificent than the one in which the young prince dwelt. A soothsayer had foretold that if the prince should ever behold this new abode of bliss he would be content to remain forever there, and not wander forth into the sick and suffering world where he would meet the four presaging tokens. The king's task was to convey his son to this new paradise without letting him behold on the way one of the four presaging tokens. On the appointed day the prince in his chariot leaves the palace by the eastern gate to drive to the "Garden of Happiness," for so the new abode was named. Soldiers had been sent out to scour the country near and far so as to keep an aged man, or a diseased person, or a corpse, or a beggar from crossing the pathway of the prince. But as the prince's chariot proceeds, and the people shout their joy, and scatter flowers in the way, suddenly there appears close to the chariot an old man with streaming white hair, with wasted form, and with stooping shoulders; he hobbles slowly along leaning upon his staff. The prince is moved with pity at this unusual sight. He had never before looked upon any one except the young and strong and fair. His charioteer explains to him that this is old age which he now for the first time beholds, and that this condition must be the final lot of all the young and strong and fair. The prince declares he will have nothing more to do with the pleasures of life. He commands the charioteer to turn round and drive him back to the palace from which he had set out.

King Suddhodana, although chagrined by the failure of the prince to visit the garden of happiness, does not lose courage. He makes three more attempts to have the prince reach the garden of happiness without beholding any other of the presaging tokens. He takes every precaution that human skill and power can devise. But his labors are in vain. The second time the prince sets out in his chariot through the southern gate of the palace to reach the desired garden. But this time a man whose body is emaciated with disease and suffering stands close by the chariot of the prince, and the prince, once more moved with compassion, and bewailing the sorrows of human life, commands the charioteer to take him back to the palace. When the third attempt is made to reach the garden of happiness, a corpse followed by mourners tearing their hair and beating their breasts is carried across the road that the prince's chariot traverses. The prince for the first time is brought into contact with death. Again he bids his charioteer turn round and take him back to the palace. A fourth attempt was made to reach the garden of happiness, but this time, the last of the four presaging tokens, a holy beggar, carrying his alms-bowl in his hand, is presented to the eyes of the prince. The prince once more gives the command to turn back.

Through the eastern, the southern, the western, and the northern gates of the palace the prince had passed in his chariot, but each time one of the presaging tokens had crossed his pathway, and the garden of happiness had not been reached. King Suddhodana was in despair, for his son had seen the four presaging tokens, and he would never become a king of earthly kings—the pride of his father's heart. The prince turned his back upon earthly honors. He left his kingdom, his wealth, his friends, in order to devote himself to the task of lightening the sorrows of mankind. Louder and more urgent than the voice of his friends sounded in his ears these words:

"Mighty prop of humanity
March in the pathway of the Rishis of old,
Go forth from this city!
Upon this desolate earth, . . .
Thou, whose life is pure, save flesh from its miseries!

In the presence of reviling be patient, O conqueror of self!
Lord of those who possess two feet, go forth on thy mission!
Conquer the evil one and his army."

This beautiful Hindoo legend of Buddha teaches the truth which we must all learn sooner or later, that old age, disease, and death are three evils that mankind cannot escape. Sir Edwin Arnold in his grand poem, the "Light of Asia," makes Buddha voice the general sentiment of humanity in these lines:

"Oh! suffering world;
Oh! known and unknown of my common flesh,
Caught in this common net of death and woe,
And life which binds to both! I see, I feel
The vastness of the agony of earth,
The vainness of its joys, the mookery
Of all its best, the anguish of its worst:
Since pleasures end in pain, and youth in age,
And love in loss, and life in hateful death,
And death in unknown lives, which will but yoke
Men to their wheel again to whirl the round
Of false delights and woes that are not false.
Me, too, this lure hath cheated, so it seemed Lovely to live, and life a sunlit stream
Forever flowing in a changeless peace;
Whereas the foolish ripple of the flood
Dances so lightly down by bloom and lawn
Only to pour its crystal quicklier
Into the foul salt sea. The veil is rent
Which blinded me! I am as all these men
Who cry upon their gods and are not heard,
Or are not heeded—yet there must be aid!
For them, and me, and all, there must be help!
Perchance the gods have need of help themselves,
Being so feeble that when sad lips cry
They cannot save! I would not let one cry Whom I could save! How can it be that Brahm
Would make a world and keep it miserable,
Since, if, all powerful, he leaves it so,
He is not good, and if not powerful
He is not God! Channa! lead home again!
It is enough! mine eyes have seen enough!"

Some of the most earnest religious teachers of the world have been men whose philosophy was strongly tinged with pessimism. Buddha belonged to the class of pessimists. The same is true of Jesus of Nazareth. In a passage ascribed to Publius Lentulus, which has come down to us from the fourth century, it is said regarding Jesus: "He has never been seen to laugh, but oftentimes to weep." Life was full of seriousness for such men as Buddha and Jesus. They looked upon men and women as sheep distressed and scattered for lack of kind shepherds. Much that we read in the New Testament regarding Jesus would lead us to infer that he was a man who did not always dwell on the mountain-heights of optimism, but frequently abode in the dark valley of pessimism. Nowhere in the New Testament are we told that Jesus smiled or laughed, but we are told in several places that he wept. His addresses were never in the humorous vein. From beginning to end they breathed the spirit of seriousness. The intense sympathy that Jesus felt for mankind prevented him from being gay and happy in a world filled with disease and sorrow and suffering. In modern times the philosophy of pessimism finds advocates. Schopenhauer, the great German philosopher, was an avowed pessimist. The creed of such men as Buddha and Jesus and Schopenhauer did not make them less zealous, but rather more zealous to work for the interests of mankind.

What a difference there is between such men as Buddha, Jesus and Schopenhauer, and the light, frivolous class of humanity that it is our lot sometimes to meet! What a difference there is between such a man as Jesus of Nazareth, who wept more frequently than he smiled, and the man who cannot banish the silly grin from his face even when he is brought into contact with the wants and the sorrows of his fellow-mortals! Says the author of Ecclesiastes, "there is a time to laugh;" but he says also, "there is a time to weep." Seriousness is sometimes better than frivolity. A tear on the cheek is sometimes better than a smile on the lips. If there is a real bond of brotherhood that unites all the children of men, no man can revel in perfect happiness while his brother is forced to writhe in hopeless misery. The sorrows of the unfortunate must lessen the joys of the fortunate.

It is doubtless true that this world is the best world that could possibly exist under the reign of that system of Law which holds sway throughout the universe. But we can conceive of the existence of a better and happier world than the one in which we live. We can conceive of the existence of a world in which a thousand secret enemies, such as earthquakes, lightnings, and cyclones, should not threaten every second the life of mankind. We can conceive of the existence of a world in which good health, and not loathsome disease, should be contagious. We can conceive of the existence of a world in which death would not come with ruthless tread to snatch the wife from the arms of her husband and the babe from the bosom of its mother. We can conceive of the existence of a world in which woman would not sell her honor for gold and man would not barter his manhood for office. We can conceive of the existence of a world that should excel as far this present world in beauty as the rich prairies of our Western States, in the month of June, excel the Sahara desert.

Men in every age have realized the imperfections of this present world and the sufferings that are a necessary portion of this present life. The poetic fancy of man has taught him to believe that the world was not always blighted with imperfections, and that human life was not always cursed with suffering. Far back in the distant past the human race, in its childhood, dwelt in a land of bliss in which pain and sickness and sorrow were unknown. Mankind lost this Eden to find it again, not in this world, but in a sweeter and happier world beyond the skies.

I do not wish to say anything today that might lead one to infer that I belong to the class of pessimists. In this part of the country, as fair and rich in summer as the sun ever looks upon, and in this most beautiful month of all the year, when the fields and the groves are adorned with their most bewitching apparel to cheer our hearts, we ought, if at any time, to rejoice even with joy and singing. We have dwelt upon some of the sad realities of human life, old age, disease and death. We have seen how men possessed of deep religious natures, and of warm, sympathetic hearts, have passed their days in the valley of weeping. We have cast a glance at the pictures men have painted of the world in the age when there were no pains and sorrows to vex the human race. What is there that has survived the wreck of this happy Eden—this Eden which holds so important a place in the legendary writings of mankind? What is there of happiness that remains to us in spite of the reign of old age and disease and death in every nation of the world?

In the first place, FRIENDSHIP has survived the wreck of this happy Eden of by-gone days. There is not a person in the world, whatever his condition in life may have been, who has not experienced the joys of friendship. Most of us have passed through occasions of trial and grief which would have driven us to the verge of despair or insanity if we had not been blessed with friends upon whose arm we could lean for support, and in whose face we could read the tokens of sympathy. Many of us might have stained our souls with impurity and covered our names with dishonor if the loving hand of some friend had not kept us back from the evil path. Old age, disease and death are less grievous evils than would be the loss of this bond of sympathy which unites man with man. What a hell this world would become if man had no more sympathy for a brother man than one block of wood has for another block of wood! What a hell this world would become if man, although surrounded by thousands of fellow creatures, should yet be forced to dwell in the solitude of the desert for want of one human heart to beat in sympathy with his own!

If theologians wish to invent a hell for mankind in the future life that shall be the most uninviting and intolerable spot in all the universe, let them, instead of building it with walls of flame and adorning it with lakes of brimstone and rivers of molten lead, make it a dreary waste in which no flower of friendship ever blooms, and upon whose parched soil no tear of sympathy ever falls. Let them make it a land in which man shall toil and suffer knowing that in all that cursed land there is not a human soul that cares to waste sympathy on him. The saddest condition of mind into which man can fall is that condition when he believes that in all the wide world there is no friend who takes interest in his welfare.

Whenever we meet such a man it becomes our most sacred religious duty to make him realize that sympathy has not died in every human breast. There has been more than one young man in the world who, having transgressed the moral law, and brought ignominy upon his home, has exclaimed in the anguish of his soul: "Mother does not care for me; father does not care; brothers and sisters do not care; nobody cares!" Woe to the world when man shall lose sympathy for his brother, however deep in the cesspool of immorality this brother may have sunk himself! Some of the world's most distinguished men, Cicero, Lord Bacon and Emerson, have written on the subject of friendship. It is a subject the human pen cannot exhaust. Old age, disease, misfortune, may visit us, but as long as friendship shall remain to bind our hearts with the golden chain of sympathy to other human hearts, we cannot be truly poor, we cannot be truly miserable, we cannot say that all of Eden is lost.

In the second place, VIRTUE has survived the wreck of this happy Eden of by-gone days. Old age, disease, and death, and other physical evils have power over the body, but not over the soul of man. It does not lie in our power to preserve beyond a certain limit our youth, our health, and our life, but the loss of youth and health and life does not mean the loss of virtue. There is a spirit, or a soul-principle, in man that is not subject to the law of change and decay. Every age of the world witnesses the growth of the virtue of the world. Man is the only animal that can be said, strictly speaking, to have the power of choice, and thereby the ability to form moral character. Man is the only animal to whom virtue can be ascribed as an attribute. While Buddha was hesitating regarding the proper course in life for him to follow, the message came to him clear and distinct:

This is the night! Choose thou
The way of greatness, or the way of good;
To reign a king of kings, or wander lone, Crownless and homeless, that the world be helped.

We all know what choice Buddha made. What would it matter to him whether his days should be few or many, whether his body should be diseased or healthy? He had chosen aright, and the crown of virtue that encircled his brow would shine with greater luster than the crown worn by any king of earthly kings. The crown of virtue that Buddha won can be won by every man who will choose as Buddha chose. Thousands and tens of thousands of the human race have chosen as Buddha chose, and so, whatever losses the world has experienced, virtue has survived the wreck.

In the third place, HOPE has survived the wreck of this happy Eden of by-gone days. In Grecian legend it is said that after Prometheus had stolen fire from heaven, Zeus, in order to punish mankind for the theft, sent down to the world a box that was filled with all kinds of diseases and pestilences. When the box was opened, as the result of human curiosity, these diseases and pestilences flew out, and were scattered to all portions of the world to afflict mankind. At the bottom of the box hope remained, and before it could fly away the box was covered up again, and so hope was preserved as a blessing for mankind.

When hope is lost all is lost indeed. Zeus, although he sent grievous evils upon mankind, was not so cruel as to rob mankind of hope. When disease and suffering should visit man the hope of better days to come—should remain to cheer him. More cruel than any torment that the imagination of Dante devised for the souls of the damned are these words written over the gate-way of hell: "Leave every hope, ye who enter here!" Man can endure almost any degree of suffering if he has the assurance that a day will come at last when his suffering will end. But welcome him through the gate-way that leads to eternal woe, and reason cannot stand the shock, but must abdicate her throne, and leave man a raving maniac.

The study of the history of mankind for the last two or three thousand years ought to fill our hearts with hope and not with despair. The reading of such a book as Mr. Darwin's "Descent of Man," that shows how man has struggled slowly but surely onward and upward to higher and still higher levels, ought to inspire us with hope for the grand future of the race. Is there not every reason to believe that man will press on toward the goal of perfection until a future age will witness the birth of a race of beings that shall excel as far the present race as man excels the ape-like creature from which he sprung? There is many and many a dark page in the annals of mankind, many and many a dark page that almost fills our hearts with despair for the future of the human race, many and many a dark page that we would gladly blot out if we could. But through these dark pages of human history there gleams a ray of light; the farther down we follow the stream of history the brighter grows this ray of light. Century by century marks an advance in the civilization of the world. The nineteenth century would not tolerate the wrongs and cruelties against the weak and unfortunate that were practiced in the eighteenth century. The twentieth century will not tolerate the evils that are practiced in the nineteenth century.

Yes, in spite of sin and suffering and death, that rest upon every portion of the world, hope remains—hope in the final triumph of humanity; hope in the final victory of the right over the wrong; hope that mankind shall yet inherit an Eden not in a world beyond the grave, but in this present world; hope that the future will witness the dawn of that golden age of the world which poets have placed in the distant past, in the childhood period of the race.

"I believe in Love renewing
All that sin hath swept away.
Heaven-like its work pursuing
Night by night and day by day;

In the power of its remoulding.
In the grace of its reprieve,
In the glory of beholding
Its perfection—I believe.

"I believe in Love Eternal,
Fixed in God's unchanging will,
That, beneath the deep infernal,
Hath a depth that's deeper still!
In its patience, its endurance
To forbear and to retrieve,
In the large and full assurance
Of its triumph—I believe."

BOOKS AND MAGAZINES.

THE SHRUBS OF NORTHEASTERN AMERICA. By Charles S. Newhall. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, large 8vo., pp. 250; $2.50.—The lover of beautiful books will be gratified by this volume. Its form, print, and arrangement give it a value before one has had opportunity to know its greater worth. Scientific without being technical, this book will afford to one who has little or no botanical knowledge means of becoming acquainted with the names, habits and economic values of the shrubs growing in the United States and Canada east of the Mississippi and north of the southern boundary of Pennsylvania. The three guides give the possibility of naming these shrubs through their flowers, leaves, or fruit: which will be of great assistance to the many who are with them but a short time each year. The outline drawings, typical without being conventional, will be important aids to the stranger and delights to the old friends of these plants. The notes explaining local names and giving traditions are interesting and furnish information that one may look long and far to find. A. M. P.

COSMOPOLIS. By Paul Bourget. Translated from the French by Cleveland Moffett. Chicago: F. T. Neely. Paper, pp. 341; 25 cents.—A psychological study of heredity as evidenced by the persistence of race characteristics, woven into a plot highly flavored with the incidents common to novels dealing with the artificial life of social parasites. The children's teeth are set on edge by the grapes that the mothers as well as the fathers have eaten. The scene of the story is Rome; time, the nineteenth century. That the book has a positive value cannot be denied, though the impartiality with which all the characters are supplied with faults is perhaps a trifle monotonous, even if lifelike. G. B. P.

DONALD MONCRIEFF. By Jeanie Oliver Smith. A companion book to "The Mayor of Kanemeta." Buffalo: Charles Wells Moulton. Paper, 12mo., pp. 184; 50 cents.—There is not enough of freshness or originality in this little book to commend it to any lover of a strong, healthy novel. It is a simple love story, and a fair representative of a type which is already too familiar to every reader. Fond love and bitter jealousy are depicted in the good old-fashioned way, with the usual satisfactory conclusion. H. U.

A CONFLICT OF EVIDENCE. By Rodrigues Ottolengui. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, 16mo., pp. 347; $1.00.—A book that will please the morbid taste of all who find pleasure in following the adventures of wily detectives in their peculiar calling. H. U.

FROM THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION we have received, as No. 20 of the second volume of Tracts for the Times, Dr. Brooke Herford's "Main Lines of Religion as Held by Unitarians," a presentation of the subject, admirable alike for brevity and attractiveness of style, with which American readers are already familiar, it having been issued as one of the A. U. A. tracts, while Dr. Herford was on this side of the water. We have also received two very diminutive tracts (the pages being three inches by two) by Rev. R. A. Armstrong, which are to be sold for a half-penny. One, entitled "The God-Christ or the Human Christ," is such a clear statement of the alternative as we should expect from Mr. Armstrong, a thinker known to UNRY readers by his criticism of the New Orthodoxy published in our Church-Door Pulpit a few weeks ago. The other, entitled "Unitarian Christianity Explained," takes a somewhat more Christocentric view of Unitarianism than we should have expected from Mr. Armstrong.

THE INDEPENDENT for August 3 is an educational number, containing, in whole or in part, seventeen of the addresses and papers for the recent World's Educational Congress. We confess to a grudge against The Independent for publishing thirty-two folio pages fifty-two times a year: it takes us so long to ascertain whether it contains anything of special interest. This week we spent longer than usual over it, but were inclined to forgive it for publishing so much in view of its value. To call attention to particular papers where all are so good may seem invidious; the note of rational reform sounded in almost if not quite all the papers in the educational symposium; but perhaps Dr. Woodward's explanation of the American Manual Training School (though not as perfect as we should like to have it) and Sarah B. Cooper's paper on the aims and methods of the kindergarten are especially valuable to the layman.

THE OUTLOOK, for Aug. 12, contains an interesting article descriptive of the work of the Mansfield House Settlement in Canning Town, East London, written by Mr. Percy Alden, the Warden. Although not yet three years old, this settlement has already accomplished so much that a story which should describe such achievements would probably be condemned as exaggerated and impossible.

THE NON-SECTARIAN for August sustains its reputation by the thoughtfulness and timeliness of its editorials and the scope of its contributed matter. Rev. R. C. Cave, in his article on the Kingdom of Heaven, points out the resemblance between the particularism of the old Jewish conception of the Kingdom and the illiberal faith of so many modern Christians. In an article taken from the Liberal Co-Worker, Rev. J. H. Crooker discusses "A Safe Religion" in an incisive manner, which may be guessed at from the title itself.

World's Fair Notes

An artist is often attracted to a picture simply because of its "treatment." He is not intent on the picture itself, the sort of story it tells, the choice of subject, but on some picture of his own which he either has under way or in contemplation. "How does that fellow get his effects? That's great handling," etc. Then comes a professional critic, and you soon know all about the drawing—whether it is "out" or "great." And you get the picture dissected with such precision and thoroughness that you sometimes wonder why artists as a rule do not consult the critics beforehand and so profit thereby as to save themselves the mortification of being slaughtered at the end.

But, if the right critic has not been consulted—"ah, there's the rub!"

There are two things in judging a work of art which one desires to have satisfactorily set forth: 1. That the choice of subject is a good one. 2. That it is consistently worked out. The drawing and the technique follow, and of course you wish them to be good. But the art does not all nor in greater part lie with these two last. These touch more on the mechanism of art than of its essence, or soul. Naturally artists work into a style of their own; so you pick their works out by their "style." This individuality of style adds a great deal to the interest, because it is not merely mannerism, it is the subtle way—genius, flowing through particular channels, confronts us with variety, and assurance that she has a "thousand ways by which to touch and come again."

But is it not possible for a truly great artist to let his subject suggest the style?

Doubtless, in some degree, and it may appear that the peculiarity lies farther back than style in the sort of world the artist has been born into, and out of which he comes to speak to us by his work. 'Tis the style or fashion of that world wherein he dwells to do so and so. He has not invented a style: no, it is the natural way of his world.

Stop before Whistler's two paintings. Here is a style—not invented, not borrowed, but it is the man himself to whom an idea need not be clothed upon too elaborately. A touch or two and you have it—the dark backgrounds separating that idea from all else. The two pictures in question are, to me at least, not quite interesting in subject—the "Fur Jacket," the "Lady with the Yellow Buskin"—but that is what they are. Whistler has no disturbing accessories. It is said that his portrait of his mother and the one of Carlyle are remarkable for their portrayal of intellectual and spiritual power.

George Feller, represented by the single painting called, for the want of some other name, "The Octoroon," with a style wholly different, gives always a picture without confusions—the whole is one—an idea dominates and fuses all the particulars. What spoils a picture is the having to look it all over to see what everything is doing.

The force of that great painting, while it is not pleasant long to contemplate, called "The Flagellants," lies in the fact that with all its manifold detail, the story, or idea, is made perfectly legible.

"The Morning Soup" (497—France)—that is the whole story, with a sense of the universal "Fraternity and Equality" pervading it, for even the dog licks a platter.

Rosa Bonheur's "The Overthrow" (328), is wholly an overthrow—a picture, too, one would like to have hanging where it could now and then be seen by the public after the Fair is over. S. H. M.

ANIMAL HELPFULNESS.

EDITOR OF UNITY: I read with much interest on page 277 of your last issue the remarks on "Canine Manners," and the story of the heroic hen who deliberately sacrificed her life to save her offspring. These inspire me to write you what has come under my own observation.

One evening last week in watering some flowers in our garden I unconsciously beat down a small butterfly with the spray from the hose, and held him flat to the earth with little particles of dirt. Next morning my wife and I, while looking at the flowers, discovered the butterfly lying on the ground and two other similar butterflies tugging at him, evidently trying to raise him up. After watching them a moment, and being certain of their purpose, I released the captive butterfly and the three flew off joyfully together! Is not this an example for Christians to follow?

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

EDITOR UNITY: In a late UNITY the question is asked if our liberal ministers have never considered "cruelty to animals" a subject worthy their consideration. Two such sermons, at least, come to mind, one by Rev. M. J. Savage—"Rights of Animals, or Man and His Poor Relations;" and the other, "The Doom of the Sparrow," by Rev. J. L. Jones, in which he calls attention to the brutalizing effect upon children of the Illinois law regarding the sparrow. Then by carefully prepared facts and figures Mr. Jones showed that, whether or no the doom of the sparrow is sealed, the more rare and beautiful birds are rapidly becoming extinct because of the ruthless slaughter, which still goes on, for purposes of decoration, especially in millinery. Mr. Jones has in yet another sermon protested against the so-called sport of hunting.

A FRIEND.

EDITOR UNITY: In answer to "Inquirer," I would say that I have many times heard the good Episcopalian minister of St. George's Church, Flushing, N. Y., J. Carpenter Smith, D.D., preach sermons entirely upon the evil of cruelty to animals and to children. I have no doubt other ministers do the same.

Our Unitarian pastor, Rev. Edward B. Payne, gives us the finest sermons upon varied themes that I have ever heard. K. P. S. BOYD.

WORTH WHILE.

It is easy enough to be pleasant,
When life flows by like a song.
But the man worth while is one who will smile
When everything goes dead wrong.
For the test of the heart is trouble,
And it always comes with the years,
And the smile that is worth the praises of earth
Is the smile that shines through tears.

It is easy enough to be prudent,
When nothing tempts you to stray,
When without or within no voice of sin
Is luring your soul away;
But it's only a negative virtue
Until it is tried by fire,
And the life that is worth the honor on earth
Is the one that resists desire.

By the cynic, the sad, the fallen,
Who had no strength for the strife,
The world's highway is cumbered today,
They make up the sum of life.
But virtue that conquers passion,
And the sorrow that hides in a smile,
It is these that are worth the homage on earth,
For we find them but once in a while.

MISTAKES OF CHILDREN.

The childish understanding has a hard time of it, and in no sphere so much as in that of religion. If it were only possible to set foot in that undiscovered country traversed by active, whimsical little minds during outwardly attentive hours spent in church or Sunday school, what ludicrous interpretations, or rather misinterpretations, would we discover are fastened upon the hymn or prayer or Scripture text, which we fondly believed the most illuminating presentations of gospel truths to the lambs of the flock.

"When the twister, a-twisting, would twist him a twist," he need look no further for an example than the rendition of our popular hymns by the average infant Sunday-school class. The tots, of course, cannot read, so the superintendent (whose enunciation is probably none of the clearest) reads them out line by line, and the diminutive audience rapidly translate any words or ideas which are beyond their comprehension into vernacular which "may be understood of the common;" the babies on the back seats, whose ears the original dictation did not reach, catch the text as well as they may by listening to the others, and whatever has been lost in the transit is glibly filled in with words and sentiments of the most secular and startling character; and by the time the hymn has circulated all through the room the sense is pretty well sifted out of it—like the measles in the prolific Ward family, which Artemus said he escaped, "because there wasn't enough of it to go round."

"Who is Etta Farr, Mamma?" asked one little girl who lives in the Quaker City, "right in our midst," as the popular bit of bad grammar goes.

"Etta Farr?" thoughtfully replied Mamma, mentally conning over her calling list. "I don't know any such person."

"Oh, yes, you do," persisted the little one. "We sing about her, you know." "The Sweet Bye and Bye" was indeed a Sunday evening favorite at that home, but no one had ever noticed that "Girle" had always faithfully rendered one line:

By faith we can see Etta Farr, and that curiosity concerning "Etta's" identity was rife within her small bosom.

"The vilest sinner"—that standard character with whom we self-abasingly and unfavorably compare ourselves in the hymns, and to whom we flatter our secret selves that we are immensely superior—has at last been given a name, if not a local habitation. An excellent lady of stern New England upbringing recently confessed that to her youthful fancy an even more impressive figure of warning than even that of Lot's wife was one Mary Turn, who must be "the wickedest woman in the world," for did not the village choir frequently assert that

The vilest sinner's Mary Turn.

How discouraging a perversion, into a message of denunciation, of a hymn whose peaceful purpose was to assure guilty hesitancy that "the vilest sinners may return!"

When the spectacular production of "Nero, or the Burning of Rome," appeared in this city a few years ago, a certain small Eddie's grandma took him to see it, in fulfillment of a long-standing promise. While on the way thither that respectable lady's dignity was hopelessly upset by the innocent inquiry, "Grandma, is that Nero we're going to see any relation to 'Nero, my God, to Thee?'"

What makes up the charm of child life is the feeling, which we have lost beyond recovery, of the possibility of the improbable. A wealth of juvenile imagination spreads itself on the idea of "the miz" as part of the universe—a notion which has misled many children besides the one of whom Bessie Chandler writes:

"You never heard of the Miz?" she said;

"Oh, Mamma, that isn't so,
For they read every Sunday about it
In church; why, Mamma, you know.
'The heavens and earth and sea He made,

And all that's in the Miz '—
And it must be somewhere' in the world,

But I can't find where it is."

Perhaps these "twisted hymns" do "darken counsel," but it is an alluring darkness, full of delightful possibilities, like "the Miz." Surely, in losing all hope of acquaintance with "Nero" and "Mary Turn" and "Etta Farr," we have lost much.

FOR AMBITIOUS BOYS.

A boy is something like a piece of iron, which in its rough state isn't worth much, nor is it of very much use; but the more processes it is put through the more valuable it becomes. A bar of iron that is worth only $5 in its natural state, is worth $12 when it is made into horseshoes; and after it goes through the different processes by which it is made into needles, its value is increased to $350. Made into penknife blades it would be worth $3,000 and into balance wheel for watches, $250,000. Just think of that, boys; a piece of iron that is comparatively worthless can be developed into such valuable material.

But the iron has got to go through a great deal of hammering, beating and rolling and pounding and polishing; and so if you are to become useful and educated men, you must go through a long course of study and training. The more time you spend in hard study the better material you will make. The iron does not have to go through half so much to be made into horseshoes, as it does to be converted into delicate watch springs; but think how much less valuable it is! Which would you rather be, horseshoe or watch-spring? It depends on yourselves. You can become whichever you will.

This is your time for preparation for manhood, but don't you think that we would have you settle down to hard study all the time, without any intervals for fun. Not a bit of it. We like to see boys have a good time, and should be very sorry to see you grow old before your time; but you have ample opportunity for study and play, too, so don't neglect the former for the sake of the latter.

MOTHER'S DRESS.

My little man, just three years old, came in from a visit at a neighbor's, and, telling me all about his good time, added, "The ladies had on b'ack dresses and w'ite dresses, but they didn't have any pittty flowers on 'em, like yours, mamma," stroking my old challie lovingly. Another day, waking from his nap, he smiled the instant he saw me, and exclaimed, "O Mamma, you dot on such a nice w'ite dress!" So often I think, "It is too warm," or "I'm really too tired," by the time all the work is done, to dress for the afternoon. And the "pittty" dresses don't look fresh very long, after "little Sister" wakes up. But I've made up my mind that the little ones shall, if possible, grow up with the memory of mother looking neat and clean, at least, and as near "pretty" as Nature will allow. Let us make the best of ourselves; let the "gude mon and the bairns" be able to think of the cozy home and the housemother in a "pittty" dress, waiting for them, and they will step up a little quicker as they start for home—and they will start for home a little sooner.

The Sunday School

SUNDAY SCHOOL INSTITUTE.

SEVENTH SESSION.

The experiment of holding a study class within sight of the World's Fair gate, and within hearing of much of the railroad traffic, has been tried, and the first week's work has proven as much of a success as could have been expected. The attendance has been from twenty to twenty-five, and representatives of the Sunday schools at Sioux City, Kalamazoo, Grand Rapids, Hinsdale, Geneva, Humboldt, and from two of the Chicago schools, have been in attendance, taking notes and getting ready for the next year's work.

As was to be expected, Mr. Fenn's work as a leader has been of the most satisfactory character. He has proven what even Unitarians are slow to understand, that "The learned eye is still the loving one,"—and the members of the class must have often realized that with the growth of knowledge there is a growth of reverence, and that critical studies are constructive studies.

The plan of arranging these critical studies on an art-string, judged by the interest aroused in this normal class, cannot fail to bring happy results in the Sunday schools.

MONDAY, AUG. 7. Mr. Fenn began by reading extracts from Whittier's "The Meeting," and then proceeded to consider the sources of information from which we must construct our knowledge of Jesus and other New Testament characters. Extra-

Biblical: Reference was made to Josephus, Philo, "The Talmud" (uncertain as to chronology), and the Latin writers Tacitus, Suetonius, and Pliny. Later than these, the apocryphal gospels, with their exaggerations, show the growth of tradition. Biblical: The Gospels,—and he showed by diagram and otherwise the as yet unexplained resemblances and differences among the first three, the "Synoptic Gospel." "The Triple Tradition," the "Original Mark," and the "Aramaic Matthew" theories were explained. As to the Fourth Gospel, he suggested that the mystical side of Jesus may have been understood better by John than by the other disciples, and that this Gospel, whether actually written by John or not, may contain essentially his conception of Jesus as it was developed under the influence of Alexandrian thought. The session closed with some remarks on the duty of using the Revised Version in following this course.

TUESDAY, AUG. 8. The introductory reading was from Milton's "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity," the greatest of the Christmas poems. Correggio's picture of "The Holy Night," and Raphael's "The Sistine Madonna," were passed around as an introduction to the birth stories. The significance of every detail of the pictures of the old masters was dwelt upon. Then birth stories from the apocryphal gospels were given, to illustrate and supplement those found in the Gospels. After which there came a careful study of these three questions:

When was Jesus born?

Where was Jesus born?

Who were his father and mother?

The reasons for rejecting the miraculous birth were elaborated, and references for further study of both the picture and the text were given.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 9. Poem, "The Song of Deborah" (Judges v.).

Topic, "Home and Religious Environment of Jesus."

Picture, Hofmann's "The Carpenter's Son."

The details in the picture were used to reconstruct the home life, and the names of the brothers and sisters were given as furnished by tradition. The miracle stories of the carpenter's shop led up to the study of Nazareth—the "Bushtown" of Galilee—and Jesus' probable education, his method of teaching suggesting his environment.

Here Hofmann's "Christ in the Temple" was introduced; not the more familiar one, showing the appeal to the book, but the one showing the appeal from the book, which seems to suggest as a motto, "Why do ye not even of yourselves judge what is right?" The method of Jesus was the method of Plato. He trusted his own sense of right rather than external or conventional standards.

THURSDAY, AUG. 10. Reading from Lowell's poem to Curtis.

Picture, Dore's "Baptism by John."

"A holy purpose in his heart
Has deepened calm and still,
New from his childhood's Nazareth
He comes to do Thy will."

Jesus comes out of obscurity to do a great life-work. The four young men who inaugurated the great movement were considered,—John, Jesus, Stephen and Paul. John's ministry is apt to be underestimated by the student. The significance of his baptism. The Sadducees and Pharisees and other sects of his time. John probably had a broader thought concerning the Gentiles than Jesus had at the beginning of his career.

Next, Cornecellus' picture, "Tempted by Satan," was introduced, and the three great temptations analyzed,—the last, the temptation of power, being the one seized by the artist. This is the temptation of noble souls.

Then followed a discussion of the sinlessness of Jesus, and how the problem is to be met.

Hofmann's picture of "Christ Preaching from a Boat" was offered in conclusion, as an object lesson of Jesus' method.

FRIDAY, AUG. 11. Poems read: Wasson's "Seen and Unseen" and Burroughs' "Waiting," found in Whittier's "Songs of Three Centuries."

Picture, Millet's "The Sower."

Physical laws are spiritual laws. It was a great triumph of insight when Jesus realized that the same laws which govern physical life also govern spiritual life. This insight of Jesus is confirmed by modern science and the laws of evolution. The parable was studied in detail, as was also the parable of "The Good Samaritan," after which Hofmann's "Jesus and the Sinner" was presented to illustrate Jesus' idea of the superlative sin. The hard, cold complacency, the unsympathetic, unfeeling excellence of the Pharisee left less hope for him in Jesus' eyes than for those who had fallen into sins of passion. Jesus was a great revelation to the woman, who found that tenderness could be pure, and purity could be tender.

With such searchings for the springs of the hidden life, the secret of the soul's nobleness, the first week's work ended in a general conversation.

This bare outline is here offered as a mere suggestion to those who are casting about for their next year's work in the Sunday-school. These lessons will be elaborated by Mr. Fenn for class uses, and then published, first in UNITY, after that in weekly slips to be placed in the hands of the teachers and pupils. Arrangements are being made by which the pictures can be furnished by the Western S. S. Society. In our next we hope to give a similar outline of the concluding studies of the Institute, which will end Friday, August 18. Meanwhile we hope our readers, outside Sunday-schools as well as inside, will plan to keep along with this course.

Notes from the Field

The Religious Congresses in Chicago.

—It is expected that these Congresses, in which representatives of all the great churches are to take an active part, will be the crown and culmination of the Columbian year. In the center of these great gatherings will be the far-famed Parliament of Religions, which begins on Monday, the 11th day of September, and continues for seventeen days. This is a meeting whose near approach interests the whole world. This cannot be said of any other gathering ever assembled. The Parliament of Religions is looked forward to with ardent hope and eager curiosity by thoughtful men everywhere. Among the monastic brotherhoods of India it is talked over, and in the cloisters of Japan. It has entered into the counsels of the Catholic Hierarchy, and into the scholastic retreats of the British and German universities. It has been the theme of editorials in London, Athens, Constantinople, Berlin, Melbourne, Tokyo, Shanghai, Buda-Pesth, New York and Honolulu. More than three thousand of the foremost religious leaders of mankind, scholars in the great universities, missionaries, eminent divines and devoted laymen of all lands, have accepted places on its Advisory Council.

Among those who will take part in this memorable meeting may be mentioned the following eminent Americans and Canadians: Prof. George P. Fisher of New Haven; Bishop Dudley of Kentucky; Rev. George Dana Boardman of Philadelphia; Sir Wm. Dawson; Rev. Joseph Cook; Rev. Philip S. Moxom of Boston; Prof. M. S. Terry; Dr. Albion W. Small of the Chicago University; Rev. Edward Everett Hale; Rev. J. M. Buckley, LL. D.; Principal Grant; Bishop C. D. Foss; Bishop W. F. Warren; Dr. Daniel Dorchester; his eminence Cardinal Gibbons; Archbishop Ireland; Bishop Spalding; Prof. J. DeWitt of Princeton; Bishop Vincent; Dr. Lyman Abbott; Rabbi Wise of Cincinnati; Hon. Andrew D. White; Rabbi G. Gottheil; Rev. A. H. Lewis, D. D.; Mrs. Margaret Bottomo; Miss Frances E. Willard; Prof. Richard T. Ely; Mrs. Ballington Booth; Rev. Washington Gladden; Prof. Valentine of Gettysburg; Dr. David J. Burrell; Dr. James S. Dennis; Rev. H. K. Carroll, LL. D.; Dr. George F. Pentecost; Prof. Philip Schaff; Bishop Keane; Pres. J. G. Schurman.

Of European scholars may be mentioned the following: Canon Fremantle; Count A. Bernstorff of Berlin; Dr. Momerie of London; Prof. Bruce of Glasgow; Prof. Tiele of Leiden; Prof. Hardy of Freiburg; Prof. Max Mueller; Prof. Rhys-Davids of London; Mgr. D'Harlez of Louvain; Dr. Washburn of Constantinople; Rev. H. R. Haweis; Mgr. D'Hulst, Prof. Henry Drummond; Rev. H. Grattan Guinness of London.

A high-caste Brahmin from Allahabad College, India, will speak on Hinduism. Mr. Mozoomdar, of Calcutta, will speak for the Brahma-Samaj. Mr. H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Buddhist Society of Southern India, will soon sail from Colombo to attend the Parliament. Eminent Christian natives of India will be present. Three eminent Mohammedans of India have promised their attendance. The delegation of Buddhists from Japan will be large. Prize essays on Confucianism and Taoism have been prepared under the direction of Christian missionaries and sent from China. The Secretary of the Chinese Legation at Washington will read, by direction of the Imperial Government of China, a paper on Confucianism. The learned Dr. Faber of Shanghai is already in Chicago, and will attend the Parliament.

Catholics, Lutherans, Methodists, Congregationalists, Unitarians, Jews, the Christian Endeavor Societies, the Evangelical Alliance, and other religious bodies have found so much interest that they are expecting very large and enthusiastic meetings. Twenty other denominations will hold Congresses in September. The popular interest is immense and growing. Out of a recent package of 1,000 letters, the chairman found that 700 correspondents, mostly ministers, were expecting to be in Chicago in September.

The Mission Congresses immediately follow the Parliament of Religions and they will furnish the only complete picture of city, domestic and foreign missions ever attempted.

It is very important that I should have some estimate in advance of the number of persons planning to attend these phenomenal gatherings in order that adequate provision may be made for the meetings in the Art Palace on the lake front and for the overflow meetings which are likely to occur. I therefore earnestly request all persons who are planning to come to Chicago in September, and to be present at some of these Congresses, to send me a card, giving name, address and denomination, addressing Rev. John Henry Barrows, 92 Dearborn street, Chicago.

JOHN HENRY BARROWS,
Chairman General Committee on Religious Congresses.

Chicago, Ill.—Rev. Clay MacCauley, President of the Liberal School of Theology in Japan, has been here for the last fortnight, in attendance upon the Exposition. He has now left the city, but will return in September. Rev. A. G. Jennings, of Toledo, Ohio, A. U. A. missionary for Ohio and Indiana, has also been in the city.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Dr. Marion G. Shutter preached his last sermon for the season on July 2. He will resume his services in September, and expects to remain near home during his vacation. He will be unable to preach at the Weirs Grove meetings, as was expected and announced. Rev. Dr. S. Crane, of Earlville, Ill., was Dr. Shutter's substitute for the first two Sundays of this month. At All Souls Church, in this city, Rev. S. W. Sample, on July 16, delivered a discourse entitled "Twelve Years After Emerson." At the Third Universalist Church, on the evening of July 19, a musical and literary entertainment was given for the purpose of raising a tenement-house fund. We are indebted for these notes to Church News, the excellent parish sheet published by Dr. Shutter's church, which is also a news medium for the liberal churches of the city.

Washita, Ia.—The liberals of the little village of Washita were the recipients of a great intellectual treat Sunday, July 9. Rev. Mary A. Safford, of Sioux City, preached in the afternoon in the Masonic Hall. The room was crowded to overflowing. Her theme was "The Growing Thought of God;" and the words of the text were, "God is love," "There is one God and Father of all, who is above all and through all and in you all." Miss Safford having been the first Unitarian minister who had ever preached in Washita, the sermon was necessarily a little doctrinal; but the gradual development of the idea of God held by the Calvinist up to the present high conception of the liberal evolutionist was beautifully wrought out.

—Unitarian.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—The Unitarian Church has invited Rev. H. Digby Johnston, of Chicago, to become its pastor. The invitation has been accepted, and Mr. Johnston will begin his work Sept. 1. Mr. Johnston was formerly connected with the Episcopal Church, has held a Denver pastorate, and was afterward associated with Dr. Rainsford in New York. Mr. Johnston is now in Chicago and has made several calls at the headquarters at 175 Dearborn street, lately.

Ethical Society, Philadelphia, Pa.—Since last reports, the section meetings have been as follows: June 2, Wayland H. Smith read a paper on Theosophy. June 28, Social meeting. July 5, "Declarations of Independence Since 1776" [a very broad and interesting discussion, which was reported in the July Conservator.—ED.] July 12, "Robbery as an Element of Social Reform," a discussion of the method of reform suggested by Mr. M. I. Swift in his recent pamphlet, "A League of Justice."

In the Ethical class, on June 11, a paper by Mrs. Ella Reeves Ware, entitled "Services the Quakers Have Lent to Moral Advancement," was discussed with much animation. June 18, Mr. Daniel discussed "The Old Religions and the New." The treatment of the subject was rather historical than descriptive: The cream of the nine or ten great religious systems of the past will form the religion of the future. That which is best and of value to the human race in those systems will live and be perpetuated. The chief characteristic of the religion of Confucius is its conservatism and inertia. What we should extract from it and embody in the new religion is its reverence for the past, and the respect and honor which its followers pay to old age and parents. In the Greek religion the leading and best element is the idea of the divine in the human form; their gods represented human perfection, and, as a result, much attention was paid to the care and development of the body. Brahminism owed its origin to a caste—it had no leader. Its essential thought was its belief in pure reason. It concerned itself with the future of man, and paid no heed to the present. What can be commended is its seriousness and deep thoughtfulness. Buddhism is Protestantism against Brahminism. It may be called ultra Naturalism, while Brahminism corresponds to ultra Spiritualism. Obey the natural laws and all will be well. Disobey and punishment is sure to follow. The Rationalist of to-day is in spirit a Buddhist. The religion of Zoroaster is above all things an ethical religion. It makes a radical distinction between Right and Wrong. Its belief agrees in essentials with that of Ethical Culturists. The central idea in Mohammedanism is the absolute unity of God. Its belief in this one great principle is what has made it coherent and mighty. There can be no division into schisms and sects when the demands of a religion are plain and exact. June 25, Mr. Herbert A. Drake presented a paper upon "The Ethics of Salutation." July 2, Mr. Joseph D. Birknell led a discussion on "Alexander Hamilton—His Mind and Motives," contending that he stood for nothing but his own ideas and aspirations. July 9, Miss Julia C. Loos presented a paper on "The Place and Scope for the Moral Training of Children." She said that the purpose of moral training was to make good men and women, to foster and develop in children during the formative period such habits of conduct as constitute a life in harmony with the laws of growth and advancement. To obtain a better state of society she advocated the establishment of playgrounds, kindergartens, etc., for the children—bringing them into contact with decent treatment and extended opportunities. What is needed is nothing more than employments and associations worthy of their imitation.

—Condensed from the Conservator.

Rowe, Mass.—I have been intending for some time to give you a report of the great "waking up" of the Unitarian Society, which had been running down these last years, the numbers growing less and less. Death had taken some of its most prominent members; some had moved away; others had grown slack and indifferent;—but the rest wanted preaching and to go on as in former years. But there did not seem to be any one who cared to come to the country and live, or to preach in so small a society; we did not pay enough; we were too far from Boston, large libraries, public schools; our winters were too severe; and many other reasons there were why the men whom we would like couldn't come. And we nearly despaired of getting any one. But a year ago Mrs. Mary A. Lyche came to us from Warwick and preached through the summer, and she would have been glad to remain with us, as she saw our needs and felt she was doing us good. But her husband had gone back to their native home, Norway, and was engaged in business there, and she knew it was best for her to go also, for there was great work awaiting them. It was very hard for us to give her up, and it seemed an impossibility to ever get another minister to fill her place who would feel the same interest in us; we were so poor, so isolated, and our numbers were so few. But our committee made more applications to the A. U. A., and after a time their efforts were crowned with success. Mr. Wilson sent us Rev. Herman Haugerud, a native of Norway, who had been preaching in Washington (with great success), and expected to return there; but who for the last year had been taking an advanced course at Harvard. He was sent to us for one Sunday before he returned West, not thinking to settle. But the fates had ordained otherwise. We liked him. He was young, full of life and zeal, a great worker, with a love for the country, and not afraid of our hard winters. He saw at once our great needs and felt drawn to the place by our beautiful mountain scenery, our grand old hills and pure atmosphere. He felt full of inspiration at once, and he was sure he could draw in deep draughts of it all the time, and be able to do greater work, could he remain here. He was kind enough to tell us so; hence the result; otherwise we should be the forlorn society now that we have been. So we gave him a call, knowing full well he was beyond our means, and fearing we could not get him, or, if we did, that we could not keep him long. To our surprise and joy he accepted our call and came to us at once, with his sweet wife and two small children. And such a change as he has wrought. The attendance at church has increased greatly. He at once started right in to help the young people, and formed a society called "The Onward Unity Club." A great many joined. They hold a meeting every Sunday night. They have essays, recitations, singing and a talk from Mr. Haugerud on the subject chosen for the evening. He is ever ready to help them, and the life and interest manifested is truly surprising. The meetings have become more and more interesting. And although they have them once a week, which seems very often, still they never fail to have a nice program, well carried out. All of this is due to our minister, who began in the right way, by interesting the children and helping the young people, quickening their thoughts and feelings for good things. He is ever ready with a speech, an apt quotation from some noted author, or drops into poetry, as the occasion may require. It was a grand thing to come to us here, in our isolated condition, and make us feel it is a pleasure to do so and that he is being benefited by it, when we are the ones that are receiving such great help. Much more I would be glad to tell of the help we are getting, but fear now I shall not be granted space for all I have written. But it is so seldom Rowe speaks, I trust you will favor us this time, and will rejoice with us that we are able to report so favorably of our improved condition.

—MRS. BROWNING.

Somerville, Mass.—During the summer vacation the First Unitarian, the Winter Hill Universalist, and the Cross Street Universalist churches have united for union services. Rev. I. P. Coddington, pastor of the Winter Hill Church, conducted the first service, which was held in the Unitarian Church. He spoke on faith without works as "an unprofitable religion."

—Condensed from the Somerville Citizen.

Newton Centre, Mass.—Rev. B. F. McDaniel, recently of San Diego, Cal., has accepted the call of the Unitarian Church, and will become its settled pastor Sept. 1.

Winter Harbor, Me.—The fourth session of the Hancock Conference will doubtless be held at this place before UNITY reaches its readers. It is fixed for Aug. 15, and promises to be an interesting occasion. The devotional exercises are to be conducted by Rev. Samuel A. Elliot, now of Brooklyn, N. Y., and addresses are expected from President Elliot, of Harvard, Rev. Chas. F. Dole, Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Rev. D. M. Wilson, now of Boston, George S. Merriam, Esq., of Springfield, Mass., and others, possibly including Hon. Geo. S. Hale and Rev. Howard N. Brown. Two subjects have been proposed for discussion, "The Problems and Perils of Union Churches," and "How to Make Summer Churches into Permanent Churches," in the discussion of which all present are invited to take part.

Colton, Cal.—Sunday evening, July 2d, Rev. Mr. Pierce held the first Unitarian service here. He preached on "The Mistake of the Ages" to an audience of 200. The audience was not only large but good, most of them being of the respectable, influential, fine-grained sort. Not aristocratic, but good people; such material as all can build with. Both the local papers are Unitarian, and openly favor the new thought. The News gave a half column report of sermon. It is intended to hold monthly services.—Pacific Unitarian.

San Jose, Cal.—Rev. N. A. Haskell is called to the Denver (Col.) Unitarian pulpit. Mr. Haskell's promotion is deserved, but he will be greatly missed by his late parish and associates on the Pacific coast. He is a man of unblemished and lovable character, and a preacher of great and growing power. The San Jose society has called the assistant pastor, Rev. J. H. Garnett, to the vacant pulpit.

Denver, Col.—We should have reported before this that Rev. W. H. Savage, of Watertown, Mass., has declined the call to this parish.

Columbiana.

AT the World's Fair there is a bronze statue of the emancipated slave, representing a curly-haired negro with a broken chain attached to one arm, and holding in his hand a scroll representing the emancipation proclamation, with the name "A. Lincoln" at the bottom. A woman stood looking at the statue a few moments, and finally said: "Well, that may be pretty fine as a work of art; but it seems to me it's a very poor likeness of Abraham Lincoln."

They were standing before the picture, and she was reading the title: "Feeding the Pigeons Before the Dog[e]s' Palace." "There are the pigeons," said she, "but where are the dogs?"

A discouraged woman was heard complaining the other day on the Fair Grounds that she had searched every building in the inclosure but could not find the "Lagoon" in any of them.

A patient and long-suffering Columbian Guard when asked by a rural visitor why he wore a strap under his chin, replied: "I am compelled to answer so many foolish questions the strap is to hold my tired jaw in place."

The white flat angels that are pasted on the Transportation Building at regular intervals excite much curiosity. To one seeking for information as to what they meant, a Columbian Guard replied: "Oh, that is the last method of transportation."

THAT only is the right education which makes all learning serve as an instrument with which to train the child to see in an effect the cause; in other words, to become a rational being, to whom the great truths of life have been shown.—E. Harrison.

For Nervous Exhaustion Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

DR. J. S. PARKE, Franklin, Tenn., says: "For many years I have employed it in my practice, and have always found very satisfactory results from it in nervous exhaustion, brain fog and prostrations of various kinds. Personally, I use it to the exclusion of all other preparations of the phosphates, and find it restorative and refreshing."

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AT THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

FROM THE PRELIMINARY ANNOUNCEMENT.

Inasmuch as the Free Religious Association of America was really the first to inaugurate on its platform, twenty-six years ago, the idea of a "World's Parliament of Religions," it will be eminently proper, and in accordance with the fitness of things, for it to take part in this larger Parliament to be held in Chicago as a part of the World's Fair, recognizing as it does in its projected convening a "consummation devoutly to be wished" for it is one of the most significant events of the age, and it may be productive of vast results to the future development of religion. The full significance of that assembly of delegates from all the leading religions of the world will not be manifest, however, nor the logical results of the event be deduced in their completeness, without the meeting of the Free Religious Association to point to what lies beyond a temporary Parliament of Religions. It is very much to have the religions of the world thus brought together on the same platform for a presentation of their beliefs and aims by their own representatives, without controversy or debate. But are the representatives of the religions, there amicably gathered, to separate for their respective countries with the same controversial aggressiveness against each other which they have hitherto manifested, and with the same mutually antagonistic claims to exclusive supernatural inspiration and guidance? The Free Religious Association is the one general religious body in this land which, following the inevitable logical trend of the scientific study of the religions of mankind, has publicly proclaimed the possibility of a new and permanent religious fellowship and co-operation on the basis of the "scientific study of religion and ethics," free reason and of a common humanity.—In lieu of the old theological bases, which, however stringent or attenuated the Dogma, were laid in alleged revelations through miraculous books or persons. We urge, therefore, the members and friends of the Association to rally at this gathering in full numbers. And we cordially invite all who are in sympathy with the general aim and purpose of the Association, whether they have heretofore acted with us or not, to be present at the twenty-sixth Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association, which will be held in Hall No. 31,

Art Palace, World's Fair, Chicago, Ill., on Wednesday, September 20th, 1893.

WM. J. POTTER, Pres.
D. G. CRANDON, Sec'y.

THE MORNING SESSION, beginning at 10 o'clock, will be presided over by Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, one of the Vice President and founders of the Association, who will make the introductory address. By request of the Directors, the President, William J. Potter, will then give a written address entitled: "The Free Religious Association,—its Twenty-six Years and their Meaning." Dr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot will follow, on "The Scientific Method in the Study of Religion." Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, of Providence, R. I., on "The Free Religious Association as the expounder of the Natural History of Religion," and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, on "Religious Progress." Other speakers have been invited and will be announced later.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION will begin at 2:30 o'clock, and will be devoted to the subject: "Unity in Religion." Minot J. Savage, of Boston, will open the subject, followed by Dr. Edward McGlynn of New York, Mangasar Mangasarian of Chicago, Rabbi Hirsch of Chicago, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney of Boston, and others yet to be announced.

THE FESTIVAL, with supper, speeches, music, and social opportunities, will be held in one of the large hotels of Chicago, or at the Union League Club (the place to be definitely announced in the Chicago daily press). Col. T. W. Higginson will preside and welcome the guests, and Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, M. J. Savage, Francis E. Abbot, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, William J.

Potter, Paul K. Frothingham, Mangasar Mangasarian, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. McGlynn, and others are expected to speak. Reception from 6 to 7 o'clock. Supper at 7 o'clock. Tickets for the supper to be procured at the convention, and of Secretary D. G. Crandon.

in the matter of washing, will lead you to use Pearlina. Look about you, and see the work of your friends who use it. Isn't the work easier? Isn't it better done? Can't you see that it must be easier and better without all that rubbing that tires out women and wears out clothes? Gumption is the seeing why and the knowing how. You can't know how to wash with the least work and the most saving, unless you use Pearlina.

LIBERTY AND LIFE. By E. P. Powell. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Monroe Street. Cloth, 208 pp. 50 cents.—We welcome most heartily this cheap edition of Mr. Powell's inspiring little book, which, in a more expensive form, has before been noticed in these columns. We trust it will have many new readers in its more democratic dress. Mr. Powell is the preacher of a genuine gospel; and his words are no less searching and effective because, in these latter days, they are not always spoken in the pulpit, but weekly, to a quarter of a million readers in a great daily newspaper, and occasionally, through helpful and thoughtful books, to a public which, if not large, is growing from year to year, and is heartily appreciative of his uplifting thought. We need not here review this book in detail. Its object is practical rather than speculative. It is rationally optimistic and thoroughly imbued with the scientific spirit in its treatment of the problems of our daily life. Our author finds hope and promise in the teachings of modern science and the doctrine of evolution that the religion of the future will be lofty theistic in its conception of the Infinite Power which is the life of the universe, and lend rational sanctions to the belief in personal continuance hereafter.

*Though love repine and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply—
'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the truth he ought to die.*
—Emerson.

AN indication of the tendency of the times is found in this clipping from an exchange:

The several Protestant pastors of Woonsocket, R. I. unite in the publication of a paper, the "Church Herald." The Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Universalist ministers take each a department of the paper and devote that department to the affairs of the church designated. The paper, of eight pages, thus made up, goes into the families of all the five parishes.

Why not other towns also? "Go thou and do likewise!"

It will be well for the railroads of this country if they reflect before it is too late that there is to be a "day after the Fair." In obstinately refusing to join with the management and the public in an attempt to give to the Exposition its highest potency they are acting the part of the dog in the manger. The rising feeling among thinking people, that the public has rights as regards these great necessary franchises of transportation and natural monopolies, will inevitably be emphasized. It will take a great many free passes to silence coming legislators concerning the rights of railroads, rights of travelers, and kindred subjects. These legislators will surely point to the experiences during the World's Fair year as arguments germane to the question.

OUR readers will be more than sorry to learn that the devoted missionary of the liberal faith in Dakota, Miss Helen G. Putman, has lost everything but her clothing in the disastrous fire which recently devastated Jamestown. Books, pictures, furniture, lantern and slides, tracts, etc., are all gone, yet in a letter to a friend this brave woman writes that for herself she has nothing but thankfulness in her heart, since in even saving her clothing she was more fortunate than some of her neighbors.

UNITY is blessed with the love of many a venerable reader. It finds it hard to keep up in progressive thought and aggressive rationalism with the piety of applied religion of several youthful octogenarians on its list. Miss Anne W. Abbot, of Cambridge, Mass., sister of the learned and lamented Professor Ezra Abbot, in the eighty-fourth year of her age, sends us her annual contribution to our work, with her never failing words of cheer; while Mrs. Sarah R. Barnard, of Worcester, Mass., sends in her own handwriting her greeting to the editor, with interesting items of the life about her and the life behind her, from the high altitudes of the ninety-third year. Such serenity from such heights beckons us forward with cheer and courage.

A most suggestive story is told of a German artist of note who painted a lovely picture and sold it for a high price to an American collector on condition that no one should own a duplicate. The artist reserved the right of painting one for himself. This he brought and placed on exhibition in the Fine Art collection at the World's Fair. The picture was a lovely one; and it tempted purchasers. And the artist was solicited to sell it at a high price. He needed the money. The temptation was great, and for fear that in a weak moment he might yield, and thus violate the contract with his former purchaser, he with his own hand drew his knife through the coveted canvas. This is a true story, as the slit in the canvas, which any one may see, in the German collection, testifies. This is one way of praying "Lead us not into temptation."

THE recent history of the city of Detroit shows what an earnest, determined man can accomplish for municipal reform. A few of the things Mayor Pingree has accomplished are the reduction of the price of gas from $1.25 to $1.06, which is all the conditions of the companies' franchises permit; the proper assessment of property in the case of great corporations, two extensive car-shops which had been taxed on a valuation of $200,000 having had the assessment raised to $2,000,000; the defeat of the street-car monopoly by the veto of the bill to renew its franchise unconditionally; and the exposure of the bribery by which the electric light monopoly obtained a renewal of its contract, by means of which he has set in motion a project for the city to take this matter into its own hands. Would that the great cities of New York and Chicago had a Mayor Pingree at their heads!

THE letter book of the senior editor contains over five hundred letters,—many of them lengthy ones, requiring much thought,—written since the first of January last concerning the matters related to the cause represented by UNITY. This has been in addition to the prior obligations involved in his duties as pastor and editor. And still there lies in his letter-crate now and always a large stack of, "unattended correspondence" awaiting the time to attend to the same. Perhaps some of these neglected correspondents may share in the indignation of the one who thus releases his feelings on a postal card:

When a gentleman of "our liberal faith" writes to another, evidently the writer is quite entitled to a reply, however brief. This I think squares with the BROTHERHOOD OF MAN doctrine about which some make such theatrical thunder!

To all this we can only give humble assent and plead guilty to the breach. Regretting the tyrannical limitations, we can only go on believing in and preaching the Brotherhood of Man, however far we may fall short of the demands of the same. We must continue to crave the indulgence of our unanswered, though ever welcome and ever solicited, correspondents.

"SHALL WE PREACH THE WHOLE TRUTH?"

Our readers are already informed of the fact that C. H. Kerr & Co., of this city, have put forth a volume of the sermons of our lamented yoke-fellow, Henry Doty Maxson. The volume is a memorial one, published by the Menomonie parish. But it is one which ought to reach far beyond the limits of personal acquaintanceship and the pastoral bond which that acquaintanceship always established. The editing from stenographic notes by Mr. Blake is done with the greatest care, and with the admirable judgment and literary skill which characterizes all of Mr. Blake's work.

The biographical sketch by Mr. Simmons is admirable for loving clearness. It tells the story of a hero of thought. It shows how romantic the life of the student may be, in the highest sense of the word.

But the work of these two brethren is but fitting introduction to the fifteen sermons that follow. And we can do nothing more consonant with our own feeling, and more satisfactory to our readers this week, than to let our dear comrade and fellow-laborer occupy his old position on the editorial staff of UNITY and let him furnish the leader this week from the sermon found in the book with the above caption.

"What do you think, my boy," asked the mother who was teaching Johnny his Sunday-school lesson, "what do you think Lot did when he saw his poor wife turned into a pillar of salt?" "I don't know, mamma; I spec' he wondered where he could get a fresh one." A fresh wife is better than a pillar of salt, even though not so durable. It is not the highest compliment to say that a doctrine has been preserved unchanged through the ages. When a doctrine crystallizes in such shape that it will keep just as it is forever, it is high time to turn from the traditions of the past to the visions of the present; high time to seek a fresh statement that shall draw its warrant from the eternal "I am." We are doing the people a sorry service if we withhold from their life the larger truth of to-day.

We are often enjoined not to proclaim a new truth until the time is ripe for it. How do times ripen? Not by a man's postponing the utterances of his fresh thought until other men begin to think as he does; but by a man's promptly proclaiming his fresh thought and thus helping make other men think as he does. "The highest truth a wise man sees, he will fearlessly utter, knowing that, let what may come of it, he is thus playing his right part in the world, knowing that if he can effect the change he aims at, well; if not, well also, though not so well."

Human progress is not an unconscious growth, with which individual human beings have nothing to do; human progress is a conscious growth with which individual human beings have everything to do. Would you have the times ripe for your new thought? Proclaim that new thought and so help ripen them. Thus did Jesus, in defiance of the impending cross. Thus did Socrates, with the deadly hemlock ready for his lips. Thus have done all great souls who have faithfully played their part in the world. When is it your duty to utter a new truth? Just as soon as you discover that new truth. When will your neighbor be helped by hearing that new truth? Just as soon as he can comprehend that new truth.

How then shall we find out when he can understand our belief and when therefore we shall preach that belief? Try him. Proclaim it, and leave the outcome with the Eternal. If we can effect the change we aim at in the Hindu creed, well; if not, well also, though not so well. A doctrine is of service to a man only so long as it remains the largest expression of truth that he can comprehend.

George MacDonald once said, "The hell which a lie will keep a man from is doubtless the best place for him to go to." Perhaps MacDonald was right. Perhaps the only heaven worth living in is a heaven reached along the pathway of truth.

You remember that in the "Old Town Fireside Stories" we are told of the mishap that befell old Parson Morrell. Once during the long prayer in the morning service, the good preacher, who "hed a way o' prayin' with his eyes open," happening to look through the window into the open ground around the meeting-house, was convulsed with merriment on seeing the havoc that a certain horned beast of the field was making with his most respected deacon. This was a pretty heinous offense, that the minister should break out into laughter in the middle of the prayer. A council of the church was called to try the case, and this was in substance their verdict: "There hedn't no temptation took Parson Morrell but such as is common to man; but they advised him afterwards allers to pray with his eyes shet." This is the common practice. When we meditate on the deep things of life we close our eyes lest we see something that may unsettle our faith. I would stimulate that larger faith which shall fit us to stand in God's presence with our eyes wide open; that larger faith which shall nerve the tongue to proclaim what the eye hath seen.

The Chinese have a legend about a company of people who were to shout in unison, and each one kept still that he might hear the others. Is man to find the truth? Then men must find it. Is man to hear the truth? Then must men proclaim it. May we all be quickened with a sense of that duty which belongs to each one of us to give to our neighbors the best, the largest, the truest thought that is in us, remembering that if we can arouse some slumbering soul to catch that thought 'tis well; if not, well also, but not so well. THE LITTLE ONES IN SUNDAY SCHOOL.

What shall we do with the little ones in Sunday school? The Unitarian Sunday School Society in Boston is bravely answering that question this summer with four new answers, each one good.

One is Mrs. Jaynes' "Lessons on the Old Testament." Thirty-six of the famous old stories are told in child-like words that make pictures even without the help of the wood cut that each story is provided with. They are all the better as a tool for not being bound together,—each lesson is a separate leaflet. And they are honest stories, because not told as true ones; for instance, of the Creation account,—“You must remember it is only a story, but many people have believed it a true story, and, although we know it is not true, it is very beautiful, and we love it because it shows us how much those old Jews loved and trusted God.” Of the Moses stories,—“They are not true, children, but they are as interesting as any fairy stories I ever read.” The price is only 15 cents,—which perhaps means that good friends have given the plates outright to the Society; and at a guess we thank them! We know no better kind of missionary work than to make good Sunday-school publications cheap. Each such publication should have, besides the author, a pocket-book friend behind it, who may feel, “This is also my seed-sowing.”

“Childhood's Morning,” by Elizabeth G. Mumford, tells teachers and mothers how to be Sunday kindergartners and draw out the things of the spirit from objects, as Jesus, “the first (?) kindergartner,” did. This is a thin, square book (50 cents; in paper covers, 40 cents), containing twenty-five or thirty lessons, besides a few songs and poems and short opening and closing services. The lessons are on the hand, foot, face, etc.; snow-flakes, seeds, fruits, Easter lilies, our country's flag, etc.;

Moses, Samuel, David, the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, etc. In each lesson we find ourselves inside a kindergarten, listening to a pleasant teacher, watching bright-faced children, seeing how the thing is done. It is all admirably told.

The other two consist of cards conveyed and admired by a little book. The prettier of the two is called “Sunday Helps for Little People.” by Alice C. Dockham and Lucy F. Gerish. This has thirty-eight cards, each one a tinted picture framed in bright border, with room to write a motto underneath the picture. For each subject (“Love,” “Truth,” “Kindness,” etc.) twelve mottoes are given in the book, from which the teacher can make choice. The plan is to divide the little ones into three classes according to age, and to each child give a card on which the teacher has written out one motto; three mottoes sufficing for a whole class, and the three classes, though using different mottoes, having all one subject. These mottoes are to be talked over and illustrated by stories and learned by heart. Each child is also to have a blank book in which he pastes his cards in due order, to be ready for reviews. Many of the pictures are prettier than half the Christmas cards we buy, and the mottoes simple and suggestive. The two authors must know the child-mind well, and must have worked long to have made their work so good. Only we should not have taught “Patience” by a fishing picture—if that is what the little fellow is about. These thirty-eight cards cost 25 cents; a dozen sets, $2.50; and the book, 20 cents.

“Little Thoughts Made Larger” is by Lizzie C. Estey and Clara K. Daley. Here are no less than three sets of tinted cards (no pictures), twenty in each, intended for the three grades of little ones. In the smallest pack (10 cents) the cards hold a single short motto; in the middle-sized pack (12 cents) they hold the same motto and one more; in the largest (15 cents) these two mottoes with a third. So again the three classes of little children are both graded and unified, and can all take part together in the blackboard work and the “general lessons,” which are sketched out to fit each subject in the little book (30 cents) that goes with the cards. It is again good work by experts,—experts who tell us: “It has been our experience that the children can comprehend the highest truths, if applied (by themselves in the course of the story-telling) and illustrated by their little experiences.”

This is only what the Boston Sunday School Society is doing for the little folks this year. For the older classes it offers other new and good work. W. C. G.

Men and Things

DR. CARL VON BERGEN, of Stockholm, Sweden, the eminent scholar and orator who is to address the psychical congress and the congress of religions, is now in Chicago, and called at UNITY's office one day last week.

It is estimated that Australian rabbits destroy annually $5,500,000 worth of crops. A good illustration, this, of how innocence, helplessness and stupidity in their aggregations may, when misdirected, become great pests.

THE enthusiastic reception which Rev. Mary L. Leggett, the Unitarian minister of Green Harbor, Mass., received upon her return from a six months' trip to Europe for her health, would seem to be satisfactory evidence that woman is in her right place in the ministry.

ONE of the interesting things at the Columbian Exposition is the album of women ministers, for which photographs have been solicited and contributed, which is to be found in the Organization Room of the Women's Building, in the space for the Federation of Women's Clubs.

THE recent death of Sir Thomas Martineau, thrice Mayor of Birmingham, son of Robert Martineau, who had also been Mayor of the city, and nephew of James and Harriet Martineau, brings to mind the power and virility of that distinguished Huguenot family. While the fame of the two last named has been so great as largely to eclipse that of other living members, yet in English publications one is continually hearing of the Martineaus.

AUGUST is not a very good time to tell a snow-storm story, but for fear this scissoring will have passed from the editorial drawer in snow time, we give it now. And then it may not be a bad time to tell it when it will cool August heats by means of the imagination. The story has the peculiar charm of being essentially true, as those conversant with the traditions of the good Doctor know.

The Rev. Dr. Gannett, the eminent associate of Channing as minister of Arlington Street Church, having returned from home on some important errand, was so buffeted by the storm and the driving north wind, that he lost his way, and sank on a doorstep on one of the side streets not far from that of his residence.

Here he was fortunately seen by a passing teamster, who, with some difficulty—the Doctor was very lame—got him into his wagon. The Good Samaritan was entirely ignorant as to the identity of the man he had rescued, and when after no little effort the clergyman came to his senses, these were the first words that greeted his ears: “Look here, you unlucky customer, do you know, if I hadn't happened to go through M—street you'd have been in h—half an hour ago!”

LEARN to live, and live to learn:
Ignorance like fire doth burn,
Little tasks make large return.

MORAL BEAUTY.

Thou who art vowed to beauty—who dost know
Thy being's end in the uplifting swell
That sweeps thee to the height of lyric spell,
Or merges thee in master-music's
flow,—
Oft when thou feel'st thy far-touched spirit grow
To mystic union with the Power, a knell
Clangs sudden on thy sense: "The burden fell
Of years shall crush thy bliss with weight of woe."
Not thus! feebly the goddess grace is known
To him who thinks but so. Her deepest thrill
Hath power to shake the dying:
changeless still Christ on the cross. Aurelius on the throne,
Thy fellow's generous deed: such lordship own,
And years with mightier wine thy cup shall fill.

THE TRAGIC SIDE OF HUMOR.

American humor is sui generis. Not that bastard brand of the Spoopen-dike order, which is not humor but buffoonery, which is no more American than English or German. The true American humor is subtle and dry—extra dry. To have it is to know it. While the uninitiate listen with contempt or stupid wonder to the rapid play of thought, often cynical, always quaint, pithy, condensed like steam under pressure, these men chaffing so lightly, the thin smile flickering about thin lips, know that it is their way of snapping fingers at fate. They have faced her and dare her worst. They are like the red man at the stake who chooses to go down with a smile belying his agony.

There is something sublime in this, none the less because it is an everyday affair. More than the taciturn endurance of the Spartan, more than the cynicism of the Roman, more than the fatalism of the Oriental, it nevertheless contains a dash of each. It is comparatively easy to endure pain or disappointment with sullen defiance, or to vent an impotent rage in cynic sarcasm; easy to yield to the inevitable, to fold hands and say, "It is fate." But what is this? Not merely to take toil and trouble without a whimper, not merely to dare disaster without a quiver, but to do and dare all with a "don't care" jest, so that the superficial observer shall say, "He is too frivolous to feel or suffer deeply." The defeated Roman thrust a sword into his vitals; many so-called philosophers have sought surcease with noose or poison; the American flicks his cigar-ash, cracks a joke, and passes on.

History can show plenty of individual examples of laughing in the face of fate; women in particular can mask the heart-ache with the smile. But, however well a woman may bear up on exhibition, when alone or with familiars she must relieve her overstrained nerves with the luxury of a burst of grief. Not so the tragic humorist. His gayety is assumed, not merely for the world's deception, but to deceive himself. Like Virgil's hero, "he crowds deep down the sorrow in his heart." He says, "Who cares?" and he doesn't care, except to fight the harder. He schools himself to a jesting stoicism that he may cheat his own heart. By a correlation of mental forces the pressure of disappointment or the friction of trouble is transmuted into new heat and energy of action.

This mental attitude is something new under the sun, in that it characterizes so many men of this country as to have won for itself the distinctive title of American humor. Even American women do not understand or appreciate it, much less can foreigners. The latter are generally too matter-of-fact. They are like those very worthy people, themselves Americans, who were shocked at Abraham Lincoln's levity, and thought him almost imbecile, because he would persist in joking in the greatest crises. He was a most striking illustration of the truth that American humor is a child of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and they who knew him not despised and rejected him for it. Shallow themselves, they could not understand how his great heart fought off its overwhelming load of care with quaint jest and quaint story.

American humor is masculine, not feminine. Women are not stupid, yet they do not appreciate this style of humor; simply because they are not made that way. Woman, being an idealist, never attains that perfect sany froid which is the first essential. However many of her dolls she may have tearfully seen emptied of their sawdust, she still hopes against hope that some time, some day, she shall find one which will not betray. Her idols are sacred, she fights for them as a mother for her child, and when they are broken she is as Rachel. She mourns, and calls on all to mourn or be anathema. A jest is profanation. A woman who can lose faith in all her ideals is lost herself. But the man may go on the same to outward seeming, except that his smile is a little grimmer, his jest a trifle more bitter. His last ideal—as his first—is simply to be a MAN.

Many imagine that the American humorist is just a jolly joker; but the deep-hued features, the keen, steady eye, and the frequent irony tell a different story. His humor is an after-glow in the ashes of burned-out hopes. He has learned the hollowness of things, and has resolved to make the best of a bad business. Many matters for which other people get excited and are ready to fight at the drop of the hat, he regards with cool contempt as purely questions of individual opinion to which each has an equal right. This indifference is often carried so far that he tolerates political and other abuses which should be promptly suppressed. But any one who rashly assumes that for this reason he lacks stamina will discover the mistake to his cost. He is a curious cross between idle and earnest, the terrible tenacity of the Saxon veneered with the gayety of the Gaul. The war of the great rebellion showed how American jokers could fight.

What is the source of this national trait? It is one current of that stream of indomitable independence which we are so fond of tracing far back, until lost in the windings of countless rivulets of heredity and environment. In casting off both priest and king the American character acquired a breezy self-reliance which refuses to bow to any power of earth or air. Encompassed by wild and strange conditions, by the marvels of nature in her most whimsical moods, himself working wonders in defiance of all rule and precedent, how could the American fail to respond to the challenge of all his environment by a fancy bold and original, even grotesque! No wonder, too, that he pierces with eagle-glance the shams which others worship. Yet in all his optimistic pessimism there is a mingling of philosophy and pride. He knows what can't be cured must be endured, and his pride forbids him to make faces about it: he puts the best face on it with a joke, which helps him to bear his own burden and others to bear theirs, and thus without intending it he becomes a public benefactor.

American humor is the best substitute yet found for Christian fortitude. It takes no thought for the morrow and lets the dead past bury its dead. In some respects it is superior. The New England fathers had plenty of the fortitude but none of the humor; a keen sense of the ridiculous would have saved them from some folly and evil. Many very good people nowadays also take life altogether too seriously; they allow troubles to bow them down like a spring which has lost all resilience. How much better to come up smiling every time fortune floors you.

"For every trouble under the sun
There is a cure, or there is none.
If there is a cure, find it:
If there is none, never mind it."

The danger of American humor lies on the side of cynicism. The man who has learned by sad experience the hollowness of the material world is in danger of assuming therefrom the hollowness of the spiritual. He fails to see that the vanity of the material is the legitimate result of neglecting the spiritual, and the strongest possible argument in favor of cultivating the latter. This is the lesson of life which the world is ever learning, ever forgetting.

A LETTER FROM THEODORE PARKER.

[The following letter, sent to us by a friendly hand, is always timely. It was written when the great preacher was an exiled invalid, in response to sympathetic words forwarded to him by representatives of the Yearly Meeting of Progressive Friends at Longwood.—ED.]
TO THE PROGRESSIVE FRIENDS IN PENNSYLVANIA:

Dear Friends—Your kindly letter of the first of Sixth month, signed by your Clerks, Joseph A. Dugdale, Elizabeth Jackson, and Oliver Johnson—persons well known and highly esteemed—reached me but yesterday, for it was long delayed in Paris. Let me now, from a full heart, thank you for your generous expression of such sympathy and regard. In these times, when a difference of theological opinions so often hinders all feelings of human brotherhood, your words come to me full of sweetness and encouragement. How pleasant it is to find Religion without Bigotry, Devotion to God with no hatred of his children!

Once I intended and promised to speak also to each of the other congregations of Progressive Friends, but now I think you will never again hear my voice in your Yearly Meetings; for even if I somewhat recover my health, it seems I must hereafter address men only with the pen, and no longer also with the living word. Yet I trust I shall never fall, with what powers I have, to help forward the cause of Truth and Righteousness, so dear to you all.

I kept sacred the anniversary of your last meeting, with devout gratitude for the opportunity I twice had of preaching before you what to me is far more dear than this earthly, mortal life, for the friendly reception my words found among you, and the cheering talk I had with many of you in private. The faces of the men and women I value so much came up before me and peopled the solitude of the ocean I was then sailing through, adding their human loveliness to the else mere material beauty of the sea. This year I could not gather with you at your Yearly Meeting; yet was I present in spirit and joined in your spoken or silent prayer for the Truth which shall make all men free, and for the Love that shall add its most precious blessings to all humankind.

Long may the spirit of Truth and Love, the spirit of Religion, live in your hearts, shedding its gladness and its beauty on your daily lives, while it keeps your feet in the paths of righteousness, and strengthens your hands for every duty which God demands of you.

Believe me, ever faithfully your friend,
THEODORE PARKER.

"HEATHEN" MORALS.

If you happened to have a cultivated Japanese friend who has remained in all things truly Japanese, whose character has remained untouched by the new egotism and by foreign influences, you will probably be able to study in him the particular social traits of the whole people—traits in his case exquisitely accentuated and polished. You will observe that, as a rule, he never speaks of himself, and that, in reply to searching personal questions, he will answer as vaguely and briefly as possible with a polite bow of thanks.

But, on the other hand, he will ask many questions about yourself, your opinions, your ideas; even trifling details of your daily life appear to have deep interest for him; and you will probably have occasion to note that he never forgets anything which he has learned concerning you.

Yet there are certain rigid limits to his kindly curiosity, and perhaps even to his observation; he will never refer to any disagreeable or painful matter, and he will remain absolutely blind to eccentricities or small weaknesses, if you have any. To your face he will never praise you; but he will never laugh at you nor criticise you. Indeed, you will find that he never criticises persons, but only actions in their results. As a private adviser, he will not even directly criticise a plan of which he disapproves, but is apt to suggest a new one in some such guarded language as, "Perhaps it might be more to your immediate interest to do thus and so."

Among no other civilized people is the secret of happy living so thoroughly comprehended as among the Japanese; by no other race is the truth so widely understood that our pleasure in life must depend upon the happiness of those about us, and consequently upon the cultivation in ourselves of unselfishness and of patience. For which reason, in Japanese society, sarcasm, irony, cruel wit are not indulged. I might almost say that they have no existence in refined life.

* * * The moral policy is that through which the highest and happiest results may be obtained. A foreign dweller in the interior cannot but long sometimes for the sharp, erratic inequalities of Western life, with its larger joys and pains and its more comprehensive sympathies. But sometimes only, for the intellectual loss is really more than compensated by the social charm, and there can remain no doubt, in the mind of one who fully understands the Japanese, that they are still the best people in the world to live among.

REAL INFLUENCE.

There are few publications that continue and increase their influence upon us throughout the varied mental fluctuations of years. To us UNITY is such a paper. It is so because it is habitually anxious to see the truth and willing to tell the truth. Hence, it always has the spirit of truth—which is more to the honest reader than the mere letter.

It seems wildly venturesome—but hardly is so—for a paper to thus throw itself on truth for support, while sect and class and specific creed seem so necessary to success. But it happens that the only real success lies in advancing truth—giving folks what they want instead of what they wish. It must not be forgotten that all error and all inadequateness of view have the unreality of not being permanent. Hence, such a paper as UNITY is of more actual influence than any paper of narrow creed—no matter what its popularity or its circulation. For instance, there are preachers to-day who are read in many languages, but whose real, permanent influence is most trifling.

So, UNITY will continue to ignore the "shooing" of men in herds through the gaps of truth. It will make its honey indirectly by tolling the queen bee—by influencing those that influence, and by being willing to influence even those by views of life in its widest relations.

AGE AND YOUTH.

A stranger came one day,
Sat by awhile then went his way,
And lo! my hair was gray.

"O, youth!" I cried, "what need
For one such passing word to heed?"

So well we two agree,
Stay thou with me."

Alas! I spoke to empty air,
Youth was not there.

I stood alone, forlorn.

If youth were gone
Would I had ne'er been born.

Life said, "Since thou art here
Nor sigh avails nor useless tear—
Still thou hast naught to fear."

What cared I for Life's word—
The fleeting steps of Youth I heard.

Scanning the wide earth o'er,
Toward Age's door
I turned, and there in truth
Stood errant Youth.

"Behold! faint heart," he said,
"Life is a mask still half unread.

Among the dead
Thou sought'st me? Nay!
Herald of Life's new day,
I did but pass thee on thy way
To go before."

THE MYSTERY OF PROVIDENCE.

A DISCOURSE BY REV. E. M. WHELLOCK, OF AUSTIN, TEXAS.

"Let thy work appear."—PSALMS, xc. 16.

The idea of providence is inseparable from the thought of Deity. A good God who is not also a perfect providence is inconceivable to the mind. He who creates must sustain and preserve, or his creation goes back into chaos. The marks of forethought, design, and care facing us on every side point to the care-taker. So everywhere with the belief in Deity is found belief in providence. It is a universal accompaniment of religion. It is the frequent theme of Jesus. It is a self-evident truth of the filial worshipping heart.

But while all religious faith pivots on this belief, and while the heart of man holds fast to the thought "that nothing walks with aimless feet," the intellect demurs and denies. The reason stands dumb before the terrible facts which are arrayed against the teachings of an infinite, sleepless, and perfect providential care protecting the world. Fatalities, cruelties, and wrongs confront us on every side. War and strife is the watchword of nature. A worm is at the root of every blossom. A grave opens under each cradle.

Nature with the same readiness takes her children to her bosom or clutches them by the throat; it is all the same to her. Her babes never know whether they are to be nursed or strangled. Her law is, "Let the strong devour the weak." She gives to the deer its fleetness, but gives also to the wolf the muscles of steel by which he pulls down the deer. She gives fangs to the rattlesnake as well as beauty to the humming-bird. The glare of the tiger, the spring of the leopard, the coil of the snake, the sting of the insect, are gifts from her treasury. Life begins by building a stomach; its next step is to swallow and digest its neighbor. Pain is the universal law. Wine issues from the trodden grape and iron must be blistered into steel. Nature shows no sympathy, and pity she has never felt; all her children are digestible; to eat and be eaten constitutes her eternal round. The very soil on which we tread is the infinite cemetery of lives tortured, slaughtered, burned and buried in the endless struggle for existence. The sparrow may not fall without the Heavenly Father's notice, yet it falls.

The planet is a trap and the earthquake or the cyclone soon jostle down man's card-house of sentimental belief in an amiable, saccharine Providence. The survival of the fittest is nature's one and only law. The weak drop from her arms; the strong survive.

If the greatest saint in the world falls overboard from the deck of a ship he drowns unless rescued by human hands. His prayer to be saved is never answered if it fails to reach the ear of man. Where there is no man to hear there is no providence to save. If the broken ship goes down on a lonely sea where there is no human aid the sea swallows ship and crew. The supplication flung skyward brings no divine succor, unless it sounds in a human ear and vibrates in a human heart. The common sense of the world knows this. The truth is denied only by a silly, sentimental, mawkish religionism which has shut its eyes so long to realities that it has lost the power of discerning truth.

An earthquake kills men like flies. The cholera, smallpox, pestilence cuts them off as with grapeshot. Every page of history is spattered with tears. Nero is on the throne and Jesus on the cross in every age. If the rain fails to the growing crop, or the potato bug destroys the food of an island, Providence does not interfere, and men and women are held as cheap as the rotting food for lack of which they died. In the great Bengal famine a few years ago, the prayers of starving millions of Hindus did not restore a grain of the rice harvest; but so much of earthly help as could get aboard the relief ships from London, New York, and Boston came to deliver. When the pinch comes, man learns by the sharp lessons of reality that there is no tender intervening providence on which he can call to check the tragedy of starvation, earthquake, plague, or storm. When men most need help, God seems to care for them no more than for so many mice. "Providence tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." Yes, but only when man shelters the lamb that he shears. No harsh event or cruel circumstance is ever held at bay by the compassion of Providence towards those who must bear the brunt. The cup of hurts, heart bruises, and sorrows must be drained to the last drop, even though the "Son of man" himself prays that it may pass untasted by. If we give Deity credit for the flower and the sunshine we must debit him with the storm. If he heals this sick man, to that one he sends consumption or cancer. If he is in the melting hand of charity he is also in the fist of the wife-beater. The laws of the world of nature are invariable and immutable. No prayer can turn their sharp and bitter edge. On every error waits the Nemesis. It is poetry, not reality, which says the wall of Siloam fell on the worst sinners, and that the sword of the guilty man falls in the duel. Only in poetry does the fire refuse to burn the innocent, and purity lay her hand on the fierce lion's mane. Raphael once composed a lovely picture of St. Marguerite, showing how, with no weapon but a lily, she walked safely through the yawning jaws of a dragon. That will do for romance or legend, but in real life if the holy maiden entered the dragon's mouth she would stay there and furnish the beast with a breakfast.

On every hand, in the human world, we find hunger unfed, nakedness unclothed, weakness without protection, and misery without hope. The fields are tilled, the cities are builded, the factories are operated, by means of a life-long slavery of monotonous toil. The past of the race is knee-deep in blood, and the past of nature is black with convulsion and struggle. The heart of man continually asks the question, "Why must these things be?" Where is the divine providence? Where is he who cares for the happiness of every creature he has made?

The answer to this question is found, and the immense perplexity which environs the problem of providence disappears, when we learn the true relation which man sustains to the universe and to God. Providence is never solely a divine act. It is always divine-human, or it is nothing. Man and God are partners in every act of providence. Not God alone nor man alone, but both, concurring and active, are found in every providential deed. If either factor fails there is no result.

Providence is a compound principle, having a human as well as a divine element. The agent of every providence is man. Wherever there is help for man it comes in a human form. Deity gives nothing and helps no one directly. The distribution of all divine gifts is in human hands. The divine providence must become human before it can become active. Whenever man is redeemed it is by the work of his fellow-man, and it is done by human hearts, brains, and hands, with the God in man inspiring and impelling. No superhuman hand has ever shown itself, directly and nakedly, in the history of the world. The hand is always gloved and the glove is always man. God purposes, wills and loves; man must execute that loving will. Until he does, God waits and his providence waits. Every providential action is divine in spirit and human in expression. Human justice, human kindness and pity is all the justice, kindness and pity that we know now or ever will know. For God is in man, and is only to be seen and known in man. Thus in the government of the universe man is as needful to God as God is necessary to man. Man interprets the divine to the universe. He translates Deity. He makes God visible and audible in the external world. There is no God in the blind forces of the whirlwind, the earthquake and the fire; only in the still, small voice speaking in the soul.

Outside of man we see in the universe only the clash of blind, unconscious forces. The best man of the race,—he who is fullest of the divine element, he who realizes his own inner personality,—is practically its god, and so remains until his place is wanted for a still diviner manifestation of the Highest. Thus the Odin of our grim forefathers, the Hebrew Jehovah, the Jupiter of the Romans, even the gentle Buddha of Asia, are dethroned by the crucified outcast of Galilee—the sweetest flower upon the stem of human nature and the highest incarnation of the heavenly and divine. The tradition of the God-man, the savior and the friend of his brethren, is the common bond of union between good and true men of all beliefs. Thus he sends the "Comforter," whose voice is always a human voice—Vox Humana.

The soul bows at this altar, and asks no higher shrine. It is the growing manhood of our time, coming out of brute life into an evolution of justice and brotherliness; coming out of the improvidence of selfishness into the large-hearted providence of sympathy and love—that is the only divine thing which our age needs or craves. The phantom god of the sectarians, the fierce Jehovah of Calvin, who sits on the outside of the world, seeing it go and scowling at his trembling creation, has fled before the footsteps of science, nor has he thought to leave his address. Thus mankind is fast outgrowing a Deity streaked with partiality and tainted with favoritism, with whom "kissing goes by favor," who pets and pampers a few of his children, turning his back on the rest. Our priests and theologians must make a better god or retire from the business. The human race demands a nineteenth century Deity.

Man is made in the creative image that he may complete the creative work. The higher power having done its best, it still remains for the lower power to respond. Ideally the sleepless providence which Jesus saw with the fine vision of the spirit—taking note of all, forgetting none and numbering the very hairs of our heads—is perfect now, and always has been. Practically, the most of the work has yet to be done, and it shares the imperfection of all human ministry. If the divine purpose in the world appears from time to time to stop or fall or turn aside, the fault is ours alone. To the eye of science the oak is all in the acorn; so the divine providence is seen by the dial soul, just as Jesus and the poets, the prophets and moralists have declared; but it is a seed, not a tree. It is a floating vision, and it can only find shape and fulfillment through the free consent and concurrence of man. It is in the germ only, and so remains until man brings it forth by evolution. The education of man is the evolution of providence.

God declines to be held responsible for any of the evils under which we suffer. When we try to throw off our evils upon him he throws them back upon us and compels us to use our own powers to improve our conditions. Once when Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister of England an epidemic of typhoid fever swept over a large district of country. Hundreeds sickened and died. A panic ensued, which the pietists improved after their own foolish fashion by telling the people that "Deity was angry with them and had sent the pestilence as a punishment because they did not keep holy the Sabbath day." A delegation of priests and bishops and other superfluous people visited the minister, asking him to appoint a day for fasting and prayer.

Palmerston, unmoved by this muddy torrent of superstition, replied: "This is the nineteenth century, not the ninth. Deity will not hear the prayers of the idle, nor will he become the providence of the shiftless. Why should the nation fast and pray when the power to remedy the evil lies in your own hands? God is not angry with you, but he ought to be. Go home; work as well as pray. Clean up your back yards and look to your drains." They did so and the pestilence ceased. Sanitary science, not prayer meetings, is what is needed in an epidemic of sickness. For science, that multiplies a thousand fold the powers of labor and the energies of man, comes forth to us a divine gift as truly as any Bible; nor does the infinite word of God reach us solely through a Jewish pinhole.

The responsibility for human progress rests on human shoulders. The movement of providence goes on as fast as man will's and works for it, and no faster. There is no destiny but what we frame for ourselves. There is no salvation but what we ourselves achieve. All lies in man's own hands. We make our fortunes and we call them fate. In the human soul is the latent God-power which must transform, uplift and redeem nature, till her cruel tragedies end in submission to the will of God, acting through the will of man. Like every other divine quality, providence is incarnated in humanity and waits to be put to service. The creative word becomes flesh in man. The race's redemption is locked up in the race's intelligence. Deity will not move the engine whose lever he has placed in our own grasp. The hand that hurts us is never the divine hand; it is always human—it is our own. We must become the masters, not the victims, of our earthly life. We must learn and obey the conditions of right existence. We must take the wild way of nature into our guiding hands and realize that every calamity is curable. This takes time—ages upon ages. There are a million failures to each success, but the one success endures.

Culture, spiritual culture, will absorb at length every cruel Gehenna, and change hell itself into sweetness and blessing. God is only where men find him. He dwells in the temple of the soul, so that the best man of the race can truly say: "I and the Father are one." The divine help comes to man through man. In the flesh and blood of each of us is planted the divine providence as a germ, a seed, which it is ours to bring forth by evolution. Our brothers are the channels of the infinite friendliness. The overflowing sympathy of the heavenly Father can only reach man through man's heart and brain. A human agent or mediator goes with every wave of divine help. All forces, elective or vital, follow conductors. Nothing finite can touch the naked infinite. Deity is immediate only as he is in the human spirit which partakes of the divine, and the prayer that goes outward retreats from the only direct presence of God. He meets us only in the sanctuary of ourselves. Look not up for him; look not out for him; he is the inspiring life and soul of the race. He sinks into his willing children as the sunlight sinks into the flower, so that not an atom can question his right to be there. Only by listening close at his own heart does man begin to hear the beat of the heart eternal! As no good ever comes from closing one's eyes to the truth, men of culture should know that there is no God to help in the affairs of this world except the God and Father revealed by Jesus,—the inside God, the God latent in man and waiting to be evolved through man. Each human innermost is a molecule of God.

Now a word as to what are called "Special Providences." As the phrase is used by priests, there is and there can be no such thing. Outside of the sickly literature of devotees and Sunday schools it does not exist. The God of science and of true religion fills all space; penetrates every atom, and moves all from within. His only action is through universal law. His providence is over all, and therefore not partial to any. It does not care for persons, for a chosen race or for a special church. It does not appoint sailing days, insure steamers or choose staterooms. The action of Providence is constant and uniform, not now and then and here and there, but always and everywhere. It has no favorites, is never personal, and never gets angry, the priesthoods of the world to the contrary notwithstanding. When my petition made to the outside God wins reply, it is by awakening the kindly sympathy of a fellow-heart, here or in another sphere of being. This fellow-being then becomes the appointed almoner of God to me. But if my appeal moves no point of human touch, I gain no response. Every special providence since the foundation of the world has had a man behind it.

The unbroken silence of the heavens should long ago have taught this to man. A poor woman who was dragged half dead from the fatal flood of Johnstown, which had engulfed in a moment her five little innocent ones, said: "I have always been taught to believe in a special providence; now I know it is false." Every mother passing through a like experience would say the same. The goody god of the devotee is nowhere found in the hour of trial, and the fictioned faith that is based on special providence vanishes like mist when brought to the test of practical experience. Until the sun shoots some special ray for you and the attraction of gravity makes an exception in your favor, count not on God doing so. Believers in special providence put personal meanings into universal principles and hang special interpretations on general laws. Not long since Mr. Moody, the evangelist, was crossing the Atlantic. Rough weather was encountered and some part of the machinery gave way. While the engineers labored at the repairs he had a prayer meeting in the cabin. The ship was staunch, and after a time of anxiety and peril the repairs were made and the ship went on her course. Mr. Moody, after the modest custom of his tribe, claimed the credit, intimating that his prayers saved the ship. But who believes that if he had been a passenger on the missing Naronic she would have reached her port? Such assumptions are only the symptoms of pharisaic egoism coming to a head, like a boil.

In the world of matter man was made to rule Nature and not to be crushed by her. As he learns more and more to control the natural forces about him, making use of them to correct the evils of soil and climate, providence in nature will begin to be evolved, malaria, parasites and venomous creatures will disappear, the deserts be fertilized, the climates ameliorated and all that is detrimental to man recede and pass away. By a wise study of his environment, and by devoting faithful effort to the improvement of the globe, there are no rude, blind forces in nature, no fatalities, no elemental stress which may not be overcome. The hard, remorseless powers, before which man at first seemed a mere helpless pawn in the blindfold game of necessity, he learns to govern and to guide. He yokes the river to his mill, steam to his car, lightning to his wire. Human worship began with man adoring the elements and ends with the elements adoring and obeying man. As he has tamed the electric fluid, so will he learn to control the earthquake, dissipate the cyclone, and say to the tornado or the storm, "Peace, be still."

Our destiny is begotten by ourselves. The earth is given to man. In all human affairs God works by human instruments, and he never interferes by supernatural means with the orderly action of his laws. The God-power that works for man works only through man. Above the sinking ship, the starving people, the burning city, the heavens remain serene and silent. No answer direct from the unseen and eternal has ever sounded in the ear of man in response to his long, childish wailing and begging for miraculous aid. It is humanity that embodies God, and any work for man's uplifting must be done by man and through man if done at all. In this new year of reason the grisly dogma of the churches has become unthinkable, which teaches that an All-Benignant Father plants one of his children in the most favorable soil, giving health, wealth and every earthly good, while he whelms another in the bitter waves of poverty and pain, promising to make it up in the next world—perhaps. Man is fast learning that the only God who commits such injustices is in his own skin and is the monstrous phantom of human selfishness.

Man need not accuse his Creator of the evils that trouble the world. He has himself made them all, and he, with the divine uplift befriending him, must undo them all. There was not a fiend in the universe till man came to beget him. There is no hell for man except the hell in man, made by man, and never yet was there devil but sprouted from man.

Men are impatient at the slowness of God, but he can move no faster than they do, for man drives the divine chariot. Providence never gives bread to the hungry. He gives the wheat, man makes the flour and the loaf. The only bread-maker in the universe is man. Providence never gives clothes to the naked. He gives the wool on the sheep's back; man supplies the shears, loom and needle. The only cloth-maker in the universe is man. Providence never warms those who are cold. He gives the fuel in the forest and the coal in the mine; man must use ax and saw, rust hew and chop, excavate and blast, procuring by an immense effort the heat that is vital to civilization and life; the true Prometheus, or fire-bringer, is man. God did not make the world; he only began making it, and left it to man to finish: just as he did not create the mellow apple, but only the harsh and bitter crab, from which man, co-laborer with the divine, has evolved the pleasant fruit. We are the children of the king, ignorantly denying our royal blood. The agents of the heavenly providence are not the priest, the saint, the pietist, absorbed in their selfish scramble for a puerile and imaginary heaven; but the farmer, the fisherman, the laborer, the scientist, the reformer, the inventor,—in a word, the producer. These are, however unconsciously, working with the creative power to repair the waste and blunders of ignorance, to diminish the evils that infest the planet, and to evolve at length the perfect providence.

Grains of sand scattered on a glass plate will arrange themselves in symmetrical figures upon the sounding of a musical note; but a human hand produces the note. The same hand must evoke the note that will one day arrange the world in symmetry and beauty and bring into lovely and harmonious forms these sand grains that are human beings, states and nations. Let men find providence where they found the steam engine and the telegraph, the reaper and the printing press—in the regnant, teeming, and illuminated human brain. The evolution of providence is the gradual unfolding of the divine in human nature, the "God in man" unbinding himself, the "Word becoming flesh," and man in the neighbor possessing his God.

World's Fair Notes

Now we know. The medals are awarded, the judges are paid,—foreign judges, $750; American judges, $500. John Boyd Thatcher announces the result. There are 485 medals to be given for excellency in oil, water-color, pastels, and black and white work.

The award to France does not appear on the list as given in the morning paper. The United States come in for a goodly share; Great Britain and Germany follow with about the same proportion of commendations, Japan is well cared for, and Spain need not complain of being neglected. Why France does not show up is perhaps only a "press" mystery. Some typographical error, perhaps, on a large scale. For surely La Belle France should have these "medals" in abundance.

Possibly France declines them. They are not discriminating enough. "Equality, Fraternity" does not hold in art to the extent of awarding exactly the same sort of praise to each and all. The Tribune expresses the sort of disappointment the artists of all countries may be at this moment experiencing. Says that journal: "It is most unfortunate that Congress has not provided for medals that should designate comparative merit; for the bronze medals given by the Exposition are rendered of little value, first, because of the large number awarded, and second, because they confer no greater honor upon the artist who has produced a masterpiece than is conferred on the one who has barely escaped black-balling."

This is, indeed, "unfortunate," for it is to be noticed that no one of the forty-four or forty-five American painters who are to receive these bronze medals, can now tell whether his work has been unanimously designated as a "masterpiece," or was missed by a hair's-breadth by the fatal "black-ball."

There is room for two conjectures which would serve to keep up the debasing thought of equality of merit. It is within the possibilities that this entire lot of forty-five paintings barely missed the aforesaid black-ball; and then, there is room for the more comforting thought that each and every one of them won for its male creator—no woman's name appears on the list—from these foreign and native paid jurors the verdict of "masterpiece."

This is probably the "crumb of comfort" that Elihu Vedder, Eastman Johnson, George Inness, Thomas Eakins, and all the now immortal forty-four will carry with them to their respective graves.

It is perhaps true that they have all been "medaled" by the infallible jurors of the Columbian Exposition of 1893, for having produced and there exhibited "masterpieces." Let them bedeck themselves and parade down the Midway Plaisance—"medals" and "decorations" are in abundance there—and, but that comparisons are sometimes odious, they can experience the satisfaction of furnishing an additional exhibit in connection with the numberless "artists" of that locality, all profusely "medaled," that might not inappropriately be designated as "Exhibit of Comparative Medalology."

Certain it is that no denizen of that region but would rush valiantly to the encounter. For have they not all the crowned heads and potentates of Europe, Asia and Africa as their sponsors!

Another unfortunate circumstance, according to the Tribune, is the fact that no "honorable mention" has been provided for, which "would have afforded encouragement to many aspiring artists whose work is not of sufficient merit to justify a medal."

Yes; it is sad that the three or four thousand painters these appointed and paid supreme jurors have "black-balled" are left so completely out in the cold that they do not know positively whether or not they are worthy of even an "honorable mention."

This is one of the matters which Congress should certainly have made provision for. There is no excuse. Congress should be able to make reputations as well as money. The government's "flat" should be good anywhere.

However, there is consolation in the fact that many a "deserving" artist has been thus unwarrantably neglected and left to struggle on, and die, perhaps, like Millet—leaving works that were never "medaled" or "honorably mentioned," but which have somehow won their own way to the front, and are now to be seen only in "loan exhibits," where they are royally honored by the great public.

There have been politicians who have declared they were "speaking to posterity." It would not be well for artists to cherish this delusion—for delusion it has mostly been proven to be with the aspirants in the political field, at least. Probably Millet painted because he liked to, and not with an eye to rank in any salon or to the verdict of posterity. And so it comes to this. There is nothing final or absolute in the decisions of courts or juries so far as merit is concerned. Walt Whitman averred that he had nothing to say about the verdict either of the present or of the future on his work. He had done what seemed to him best for him to do, what he enjoyed and himself believed in, and so dismissed it—confident that it would win its own right place in the long or short run (whichever it might be), and what more could he ask?

One thing more to be remarked is that this award of the Columbian Exposition to painters has been given for "excellency in painting." This is important. For if these expert judges have been intent solely or mainly on the skill in handling paint and the technique of pictures, why, then, the unmentioned artists can take to themselves courage and persevere, for the real significance or rank of their art has not been sat on.

The Study Table

THE WILDERNESS HUNTER.*

For the hunter, the historian, and the lover of nature Mr. Roosevelt has written a book of exceeding interest. He has hunted in all sections of our broad land. The caribou he has tracked in the lonely recesses of the wild Selkirks; ridden after the hounds in the beautiful valley of the Genesee; chased the peccary amid the cacti of the Texan border; dared the grizzly and the cougar in their Rocky Mountain haunts, and stalked the wild goat "among the high mountains of the Kootenai country." During these years of extensive travel the author has been more than a mere hunter with eyes for the chase only. "To him who can understand the keen delight of hunting in lonely lands," he says, "there shall come in after years the memory of endless prairies shimmering in the bright sun; of vast snow-clad wastes lying desolate under gray skies; of the crooning of ice-armored pines at the touch of the winds of winter; of cataracts roaring between hoary mountain masses; of all the innumerable sights and sounds of the wilderness; of its immensity and mystery, and of the silence that broods in its still depths." And in the case of our author, not only did all these things come to him in the hours of his lonely hunting, but what is very exceptional, the power came also to describe in a way that brings them home to the reader. Among American writers who have attempted to describe nature, few save Thoreau and Burroughs have been as successful as Mr. Roosevelt. His strokes are few, strong and masterful, and the picture he draws abides, so that next to having seen this wild land in all its terror and beauty—which, how few can do!—the best recourse is to read "The Wilderness Hunter."

In after generations when our wildernesses and our border life are no more, this book, together with the "Ranch Life and Hunting Trail," by the same author, will be cherished as original documents of the highest merit. For here is a man who sees things as they are and sets down his observations without refracting embellishments. The habits and characteristics of animals he describes with the accuracy of a trained naturalist, while his sketches of the life of the cowboy, the soldier, and the hunter would be acceptable to the most exacting historian.

The book is excellent reading for boys in whom the love of adventure is strong, and equally desirable for men in whom hardihood and daring have been all but extinguished by enervating comforts and luxuries. We may sing of those who "name the birds without a gun," and rejoice at all increasing regard for life, but we must not forget that a land cannot be the abode of both man and grizzly, and that if a thickly peopled country is a thing to rejoice in, then the dauntless hunter, fearing neither danger nor hardship, is a man to praise. While the book in hand contains passages which make the heart of the pitiful sad, its influence, could it widely prevail, would tend greatly toward the preservation of our noble game. Our hunter himself killed, and insists upon the right of killing, only under conditions which, if generally observed, would insure the perpetuity of the animals he hunted. Not by such men, but by the brutal crowd who kill indiscriminately for a paltry recompense, is the great game of this land threatened with extinction.

PERSONAL AND SOCIAL CHRISTIANITY: Sermons and Addresses by the late Russell Lant Carpenter, B. A., with a short memoir by Frances E. Cooke. London: Kegan, Paul, Trench, Truebner & Co. Cloth, 8vo., pp. 325; 6s.—The interesting memoir prefixed to this volume of sermons and addresses gives us a glimpse of a very modest, noble and devoted life. It might have been said of Russell Lant Carpenter, as Dr. Martineau said of his father: "I have never seen in any human being the idea of duty, the feeling of right, held in such visible reverence. There was no such thing as a dead particle in his faith; it was instinct with life in every fiber." To read of such a man is always profitable, however briefly. In his funeral sermon the Rev. H. S. Solly called upon his hearers to remember Mr. Carpenter if ever they were tempted to shun disagreeable subjects, or to profess no interest in questions that deeply concerned their fellow creatures, merely because their own homes were happy and such troubles "did not enter into the immediate circle of their lives." How hard it was for him to take hold of such disagreeable subjects few ever knew, but he was never found backward in doing so. An instance of this was seen in his connection with the Contagious Diseases Acts. At first he shrank very decidedly from meddling in any way with a matter so repugnant to all his tastes and feelings. But when finally persuaded by such women as Josephine Butler, Harriet Martineau and Florence Nightingale that it was his duty to labor with them, he put aside at once and forever every temptation to shrink from the work, and bore his cross bravely for sixteen years. His sermons show the deep interest he felt in all that concerns the life of the people and their true prosperity. They are practical, and related to the life that now is, as well as to that which is to come. One of the strongest is devoted to England's Responsibility for the Opium Traffic, and is a document well worth circulating. If anything could bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the nation it seems that this indictment would do so.

THE MAGAZINES.

To the editor, the most interesting articles in the August Forum are the first two of the series on an inside view of daily journalism. All these are by men who are or have been managing editors, and the table given by Mr. Speed makes a telling commentary upon the tone of Mr. Miller's article, when it is remembered that Mr. Miller is the editor of The Times under the new regime. Perhaps, however, some bias should be allowed for, in view of the fact that it was about twelve years ago that Mr. Speed ceased to be managing editor of a daily paper. Mr. Speed's paper seems, nevertheless, a very just criticism of existing newspaper methods, and suggests an early reform. Professor J. J. McCook analyzes a tramp census, and makes some valuable suggestions. Dr. Billings pours out statistics in reference to "Municipal Sanitation in Washington and Baltimore" at a rate that makes it difficult to digest them; but the apparent lack of evil results attributable to the absence of sewers from Baltimore is certainly striking. Professor Ebers attributes great influence in character formation to solitude, but the illustration of goose and eagle, lamb and lion, by which he seeks to introduce if not to enforce this truth, seems rather absurd. The important question of the hour, the silver question, is discussed by Messrs. Horace White and E. O. Leach, who naturally conclude that the Sherman law must be repealed as soon as possible. The danger of hasty tariff legislation is treated by a large wire manufacturer.

IN LEND A HAND for August the most important paper is Rev. Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer's address delivered at the World's Congress of Charities, Correction and Philanthropy, on "Social Responsibility Toward Child-Life," an address that everyone interested in civics and philanthropy (which, at the least, should mean every educated adult) should read. Although not professing to go into any detail, it is as full of information as it is of suggestion. In another World's Congress paper Anna L. Dawes emphasizes the growing need of professional training for charities administrators. Dr. Hale's memorial of Col. R. F. Auchmuty calls attention to the admirable work for humanity which that practical philanthropist did in establishing schools to teach trades.

PERHAPS the most noteworthy contribution to the August Unitarian is the paper in which Rev. Henry C. Badger calls attention to the book, "Verbum Dei," and the oral utterances of the brilliant young London minister, Robert F. Horton, whose recent appointment to the Lyman Beecher Lectureship on Preaching, at Yale, seems to portend a great theological broadening in the Yale Divinity School. Among other strong utterances which Mr. Badger quotes, we find the following:

Nothing can surpass the futility and, in the end, the mischief of the dogmatic appeal, made with dull vehemence and harsh unreason, on the ground of Biblical authority, to those who are really waiting for evidence that the Bible is authentic or true, consistent or convincing, inspired or authoritative.

S. C. Selden's article on "Unity" is suggestive, and we are tempted to quote the passage in which he refers to the common content of religion and science:

But at length man passes this stage of his history, and begins to investigate, as well as wonder and worship. He looks from another standpoint, not yet seeing that, after all, it is the same. He now gives that which is not understood the name of nature, and calls his investigation science, without a suspicion that he is seeking the same goal by another road. His intellect seeks the cause, his sensibility recognizes the operation, and his will regulates or modifies the effect. Cause, operation, and effect in science correspond to Father, Spirit, and Son in religion, and each is alike dependent upon the law of mind.

THE SOUTHERN UNITARIAN grows steadily stronger. We do not mean that the editorial and contributed matter in the late issues is intrinsically superior to that of the earlier numbers, for Mr. Chaney's first work was so good in itself that it would be hard to improve upon it. But as the months pass there is evident a more and more perfect adaptation to the environment. We remember that the first number seemed to us admirably adapted to its purpose—missionary work; and that the third number impressed us particularly in its happy adaptation to Southern work; but though we did not then appreciate the fact, it was rather for the South than by the South. This is no longer true. The present number—that for August—has the unmistakable, albeit indescribable, flavor of the South. It is indeed a paper of the South, for the South, and by the South, and as such we are doubly glad to have its comradeship in the work of promoting a simple, unfettered, natural religion. Mr. Free's sermon on the inspiring text, "All things work together for good to them that love God,"—is a model of simple, manly, undogmatic religious faith.

IN WORTHINGTON'S MAGAZINE for August, Lillian Whiting's article on "The Enlargement of Relations" is one we should like all our readers to see. Walter Deming's study of "The Mental Characteristics of the Japanese" is also interesting.

IN THE OPEN COURT of August 10, Gen. M. M. Trumbull has an article on "The Ethics of Legal Tender," in which he urges that the true solution of the financial trouble is the entire abolition of the "legal tender" quality of money, leaving common media of exchange to their market value.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE for August 12 has an article from the Church Quarterly Review, entitled "Five Years of Documentary Discovery," which is of special interest to the church historian and Biblical critic.

A Great Public Library.

Any book you want, loaned to you, in city or country, anywhere in the United States, for as long or as short a time as you want it, at an average cost of only one cent a day, is the offer of The American Co-operative Library, recently organized in New York. This undertaking successfully carried out will give book-readers everywhere better facilities than heretofore enjoyed outside of the reach of less than a dozen of the largest libraries in the principal cities. Books can be ordered either direct from New York, through neighborhood book clubs, or from country postmasters, newsdealers, booksellers, or others who will act as agents. A 160-page catalogue is sent free to any applicant inclosing a two-cent stamp; members of the Library are not limited to this, but may order any book in current literature suitable for general circulation. Any further information will be sent free on request. Address THE AMERICAN CO-OPERATIVE LIBRARY, 57 Rose street, New York.

THE NEWEST BOOKS.

All books sent to UNITY for review will be promptly acknowledged under this heading, and all that seem to be of special interest to the readers of UNITY will receive further notice. "IT IS MORE BLESSED."

Give! as the morning that flows out of heaven;

Give! as the waves when their channel is riven;

Give! as the free air and sunshine are given;

Lavishly, utterly, carelessly give!
Not the waste drops of thy cup overflowing,
Not the faint sparks of thy hearth ever glowing.

Not a pale bud from the June roses blowing;
Give as He gave thee, who gave thee to live.

Pour out thy love like the rush of a river
Wasting its waters, forever and ever,
Through the burnt sands that reward not the giver;

Silent or songful, thou nearest the sea,
Scatter thy life as the summer shower's pouring;

What if no bird through the pearl rain is soaring?

What if no bloom looks upward adoring?
Look to the life that was lavished for thee!

—Rose Terry Cook.

A MEMORY.

It was our last ride. Don, Daisy, and Dolly were feeling finely, for they did not wonder as did we, their riders, when we three should meet again to ride together in the lovely twilight. Dolly was the pony, and she always liked to get in between the two big horses, for she evidently loved them. We started first up the Boulevard and cantered through the park on the equestrian path, which seemed to belong to us.

As it grew darker the lights came out one by one, and finally, as we neared the World's Fair grounds, the dome of the Administration Building, with its crown of glory, shone above us against the dark-blue sky. Don's rider was fond of the side shows on Stony Island avenue, so by one consent we turned toward them. We rode along, with the large, quiet buildings of that new university, which will sometime eclipse all others, on our left, and on our right the noisy Plaisance, with its crowd of people loitering here and there.

Soon we came upon the Chinese theater. We turned the horses near the fence, and, looking over, saw the whole show for nothing. Such a noise as came out of that one small room! The actors screamed, each holding a key of his own different from the others, which he never changed. Then, at irregular intervals of a few seconds, a bell was sounded, possibly to mark the rhythm, though of this we could not be sure. Daisy's rider thought he could make as good music as that with two cats and a cow-bell,—and we started on.

Then we came to Stony Island Avenue, where the shouts and cries of men telling of the wonderful attractions of their particular shows were enough to drive one crazy. First, we caught the tones of an open-air preacher anxiously exhorting his hearers, with the use of very bad English, to turn from their paths of wickedness. A little farther was a dime-museum, or beauty-show, with a part of it outside, surrounded by a wondering crowd. Then came a tin-type gallery, and the Siege of Chattanooga. Daisy's rider declared he had not seen a tin-type gallery since the days of his youth and had supposed the species to be entirely extinct, but we assured him that they had been flourishing right along ever since. Even we ourselves had had pictures taken at a similar gallery not many years ago.

From the noise and confusion of Stony Island Avenue we came to the side of the quiet lake, and watched the pretty picture made by the boats with their many colored lights.

After that we had a long lope across the Boulevard, Dolly coming out ahead, which made Daisy feel rather sad, since she knew she could have beaten if her rider had allowed. The electric lights, shining through the trees, made weird shadows on the road, and looked like little brownies jumping up and down. After saying good-by to Don and his rider, we trotted slowly homeward, feeling regretful that the last of our lovely rides had come to an end.

EDITH ENDICOTT MAREAN.

A STORY FROM THE LATE WAR.

Just after the battle of Bull Run, six men were found close together on the bloody field with seven of their legs needing immediate amputation.

One by one they were gathered up and carried on an improvised stretcher the surgeon's table. When it came Corporal Tanner's turn he was rolled over on the stretcher, lifted up, and carried away. But now came the moment of trial. The rude stretcher was far too short for his none too long body in its original state, but both of his legs being broken now dangled over the rear end of the stretcher. Just then his head dropped over a little at the other end, and he saw under the blanket, both of his feet swaying in the air, as the men moved off.

The corporal was true grit, and before they had gone ten feet, yelled

Brave on the battle field, brave among the wounded, calm on the surgeon's table, where both legs were amputated, a patient sufferer for many months in the hospital, he slowly came back to health and strength minus his legs below the knees.

One day a lady visitor came into the hospital and with her genial smile called here and there at the cots, giving a few words of cheer to each soldier. When she saw the poor pale-faced corporal she lingered a little longer than usual and left a tract for him to read. The name of the tract was "The Folly and Sin of Dancing." As soon as his eyes caught the title he called her back, lifted his hand and said: "Madam, I promise you upon the honor of a soldier I never will dance as long as I live."

The lady thanked him for the promise, but had no knowledge of his disabilities.

The other five men had their turn on the bloody table of the surgeon, and then the six men were placed in a small hospital tent about nine feet square, without couch, pillow, blanket, bandages, water, food, or attendance; suffered, groaned, and endured about as much agony as the same number of human beings ever suffered on a spot of that size.

But they were not alone; a comrade near by, with a part of his side torn away, pitied the poor men in the little tent, and though fatally wounded himself, determined to relieve them in a measure.

Some distance away was an orchard, and under those trees were a few miserable, scrawny apples, which would do something toward quenching thirst and relieving the pangs of hunger. But he could not stand, and was far too weak to walk, if once erect. He could not roll over, his torn side would not permit of that, and so crawling along with one hand and one foot he finally reached the apples, gathered a few, and made his way back to the tent. His comrades had hardly eaten the few he had gathered when Tanner saw that the man was in convulsions, and in a few moments was dead. His last efforts were given for others, and he died in doing good. Was he not a hero of royal lineage?

ALL'S WELL.

The clouds, which rise with thunder, slake

Our thirsty souls with rain;
The blow most dreaded falls to break
From off our limbs a chain;
And wrongs of man to man but make
The love of God more plain.

As through the shadowy lens of even
The eye looks farthest into heaven,
On gleams of star and depths of blue
The glaring sunshine never knew!

The Sunday School

SEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

READ AT THE SUMMER INSTITUTE
HELD AT UNITY BUILDING, 286 WOODLAWN TERRACE, CHICAGO,
AUG. 7-18, 1893.

Of the seventy circulars of inquiry sent out by the Secretary of the Sunday-school Society, asking for statistics of their schools from the various superintendents in the Northwest, twenty-two have been returned with answers.

Of the schools reporting, there is one from North Dakota, one from South Dakota, one from Kansas. Sioux Falls, Fargo, and Wichita each reports a reasonable condition. Wichita shows interest in the work and sufficient zeal to insure success. Iowa is represented by Humboldt and Sioux City. Humboldt is doing well. Sioux City always brings in an enrollment that puts the other schools to the blush and sustains its reputation in all other directions. Michigan is represented by Kalamazoo, Grand Haven, and the Holland Sunday School of Grand Rapids—all of them in a reasonably prosperous condition. Minnesota sends reports from Luverne, Duluth, and Winona; this last school reporting an enrollment and attendance to take pride in. From Illinois we have Geneva, Moline, South Evanston, Sheffield and All Souls Church, Chicago. South Evanston is the baby school, having been added to the family circle since our last summer meeting. It is still in its infancy, as to size as well as years, but the care it is sure of in this energetic little parish insures it a healthful career. Wisconsin is the banner State as to number reporting. Six schools send their statistics: Baraboo, Hillside, Eau Claire, Madison, Menomonie, and Milwaukee.

Of the large number of schools failing to report, we know by past experience that there are many good and strong schools that are doing excellent work. We will trust that it was forgetfulness and not lack of interest that will account for the omission.

As to the subject-matter of such reports as have been received, we hear the familiar complaints: "Not enough teachers," "lack of interest on the part of parents," "no suitable text books for the smallest children." These are problems not likely to be solved at once. In individual schools your Secretary knows good work is being done in methods of instruction for the infant classes. That such work might spread is greatly to be desired.

Moline, Ill., reports, in addition to its Sunday-school work, an auxiliary society called "Little Women," organized last February, which has bought chairs for the kindergarten, and is now working toward a library fund.

In Evanston the Sunday school is saving its pennies toward a church building fund. Reports of money raised by the various Sunday schools show that the larger portion is expended in the current expenses of the school; but it is also evident that a large number are doing outside missionary work in addition to these home duties. Charity, Indian schools, Kindergarten, Meadville Theological School are all mentioned as recipients of these funds; one Sunday school sent its organist to the Columbian Exposition.

One line of missionary work, the full report of which can only be obtained from examining the Treasurer's report at the annual meeting in May, is the valuable assistance rendered to the Sunday School Society. Seventeen different Sunday schools contributed an aggregate of $195.00 to this society. The largest amount given by any one school was $25.00; the smallest, $2.00.

It is pleasant to observe a growing feeling that this is one of the duties to be attended to with annual regularity. There is hardly a Sunday school that could not send at least $5.00 annually to this fund, and it is hoped that the number of small schools who will contribute to that extent will increase year by year. Good work in the Sunday School Society can only be realized through missionary zeal, as our constituency is too small to expect a self-supporting basis for this organization for many years to come. Annual memberships on the part of teachers and scholars is an easy and simple way to help this work, and it is greatly to be desired that all of our old friends and as many new ones as we can find should contribute in this way to the growing and ever-present needs of the society.

The long looked for book, "Beginnings," edited by our President, Rev. A. W. Gould, from Henry Doty Maxson's notes, is in the hands of the printer, and will soon be for sale by the society. This will be the permanent form of the first year's work of the "Six Years' Course." It comprises work in an entirely new and original direction, and is especially interesting for scholars of all ages.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL INSTITUTE.

SECOND WEEK.

MONDAY, AUG. 14. Mr. Fenn began the discussion of Jesus' thought of the kingdom of Heaven by reading from Holmes' poem to Burns, and offering for the inspection of the class two pictures, as representing two different phases of Jesus' thought. Hofmann's picture of "Jesus and the Children" presents Jesus with a smile on his face, which fact made it unique. The receptivity of the child, love without wiles, unconscious growth, represented this phase of the thought. Raphael's "Transfiguration" shows another phase of Jesus' thought concerning the kingdom. After the great crisis in his life, represented in the Cæsarea Philippi episode, he may have accepted the idea of the suffering Messiahship, that was to triumph through death. This conception of the Messiahship involved the second coming—a dramatic harvest-time. This two-fold idea of the Kingdom of Heaven was the subject of the interesting discussion that filled in the morning session, involving the truth implied in the story of the transfiguration and the Palm Sunday account.

TUESDAY, AUG. 15. Hofmann's "Cleansing of the Temple," Da Vinci's "Last Supper," and Angelo's "Crucifixion" introduced a study of the closing week in the life of Jesus. It was a morning of absorbing interest which led to the consideration of the Last Supper, the Trial, and the Crucifixion, with critical examination of the records of the same. The discussion was participated in by Revs. Sunderland, Gould, Jones and others.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 16. Readings from Arthur Hugh Clough's "Shadow" and "Easter Day" introduced the discussion of the resurrection. The incredible part of the story Mr. Fenn thought to be of Galilean growth, springing from the fact of an empty tomb found by the women.

According to a tradition preserved in John, Joseph of Arimathæa and Nicodemus had previously embalmed the body and buried it, and this was unknown to the women. The resurrected Jesus became the center of Paul's teaching and one of the fertile inspirations of the church. The discussion took a wide range,—considering the growth of miracles, their place in the early history of all religions, and how to deal with them in teaching children the New Testament story.

The study session was followed by a brief business meeting, at which the Secretary of the Sunday School Society, Mrs. Marion H. Perkins, read the annual report, found in another column. Again the few workers were thrown back upon the consolations of the minority. How few people, even of those who ought to be and who might be interested, really show their interest. Yet with this very few, the Western Sunday School Society has persisted through its twenty years of history, and has accomplished something very real. It has indeed been a very little candle, but like little candles it has thrown its beams afar.

THURSDAY, AUG. 17. This morning's study was introduced by a reading from Whittier's poem, "Our Master." Raphael's picture of the death of Ananias formed the basis of a study of the Early Church, which was described as being "simply the expansion of the little band of apostolic company, with the dominant spirit of Jesus supreme." This picture showed it to be a church of power, a church of purity, a church of the communal life, and a church of democracy. The non-hierarchical origin of the church was dwelt upon. The identity of the bishop and the presbyter shown. Both words did not mean much more than what in modern phrase is represented by "parish committee."

The discussion of the "Pentecostal spirit" and the "gift of tongues" led to a consideration of the character and message of Stephen. He was characterized as an underestimated man. He was, to Paul, something of what John was to Jesus. In him the broader church had its beginning. His death scattered the apostles, and the scenes shift from Antioch to Jerusalem, and from thence spread to Ephesus and Rome.

FRIDAY, AUG. 18. The last day was a fitting climax to the high thinking and frank utterance of the fortnight's work. Paul, always an inspiring theme to the thoughtful, never glowed with more power, or stirred the minds of those present with more potency than he did in the hands of Mr. Fenn this morning. For the first time the leader brought to his aid a manuscript and read a lecture, which ought to be made available to all those who will undertake to teach this course of lessons and to many more. Starting with Raphael's picture of "Paul Preaching in Athens," the leader traced the growth of Paul's ideals, and showed how through him the Jew and Greek mind mingled in early Christianity. This union is typified in the very fact that the language of the New Testament is Greek while its thought is germinally Jewish. Paul's inconsistency with himself was brought out in illustration of the splendid, spontaneous and fiery character that he was.

At the close, Mr. Gould, the chairman, expressed for the company present, the great satisfaction in the work done for them during this course by Mr. Fenn. His words were heartily seconded by all present.

Thus ended the seventh Institute held under the auspices of the Western S. S. Society,—the fourth mid-summer venture. Again was realized the old promise, always inspiring. "Where two or three are gathered together in my name," etc. Interest is independent of numbers. The best things often get themselves said in small companies. The venture was, on the face of it, a daring one. Right within sight of the gates of "The White City" this little company gathered for ten forenoons, for quiet consideration of the great themes not related to time and place. As suggested by one of the members, it was of itself a sort of Columbian venture. We voyaged in waters unknown and terrible in the estimation of the great mass of Christendom, but it was in the interests of the continents of faith farther on,—the future land of a rational religion, a life-forming faith consistent with the results of science, critical study, and the ethical needs of man.

The attendance scarcely held its own, though during the week we gladly welcomed as additions representatives of our workers at Ann Arbor, Champaign, Janesville and Quincy, besides the sojourners at Unity building from the eastward.

The direct results in the estimate of those present amply justified the effort; but the indirect result—in the way of giving coherency, definiteness and momentum to the fourth year's work in "The Six Years' Course," as it is to be developed in the future lesson-papers of Mr. Fenn in UNITY, and applied in the careful year's work in the Sunday schools which take up the study—will be the greater justification. WHY THEY DON'T COME.

EDITOR UNITY: Some one writing for UNITY says, "Why don't they come?"—i. e., to the World's Fair. I do not know why the bankers and merchants and officeholders, etc., don't "come" (if they don't), for they have got all the money; but I can tell that earnest inquirer why the farmers do not. We want to come, but we cannot. There's the long and short of it, bitter though it is. With wheat at 45 cents per bushel and but half an average crop in their bins, and debts coming due in September, and everything perishing with drouth, and the hopeless future before them, there is no way for the farmers but the hard way of sacrifice. And nobody cares. CAMPERDOWN.

Notes from the Field

Western Unitarian Conference.—A special meeting of the directors of the W. U. C. was held at the headquarters on Friday afternoon, August 18. Present: Messrs. Shorey, Blake, Crothers, Effinger, Fenn, Gould, Hosmer, Jones, MacFadon, Milsted, Miss Hultin and Mrs. Woolley. The records of the last meeting were read and approved. The committee appointed to confer and report upon a nominee for the Secretaryship for the coming year then made report through its chairman, President Shorey, recommending Rev. Arthur M. Judy, of Davenport. Mr. Judy was subsequently elected to the office of Secretary, with salary of $2,500 a year. On motion of Mr. Gould, the additional sum of $75 was appropriated toward defraying expenses of the Unitarian exhibit at the World's Fair. The Treasurer, Mr. MacFadon, made report for the month, which was accepted and placed on file. Adjourned, subject to call of the President.

F. L. HOSMER, Secretary.

Chicago, Ill.—Rev. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul, Minn., and Rev. Mr. Horst, of Pittsfield, Mass., are in the city, the guests of Rev. W. W. Fenn, of the Church of the Messiah. During Mr. Fenn's absence in the East, where he will attend the meeting of the directors of the American Unitarian Association, his pulpit will be supplied as follows: Aug. 27, Rev. David Utter, of Salt Lake City; Sept. 3 and 10, Rev. W. F. Greenman, of Fitchburg, Mass. Rev. J. T. Sunderland, editor of The Unitarian, Rev. J. L. Marsh, of Saco, Maine, who has done much to extend the liberal faith in the New England States, Rev. A. M. Judy, of Davenport, Iowa, Rev. G. W. Buckley, of Sturgis, Mich., Rev. J. C. Mitchell, of Wilton, N. H., and Rev. C. F. Niles, formerly of West Superior, who has just received a unanimous call to Menomonie, Wis., as well as Rev. Ida C. Hultin, who is spending the summer here and taking an active part in the various congresses,—are now in the city, and Rev. Chas. G. Ames is expected daily.

Hillside, Wis.—The many readers of UNITY interested in the Hillside Home School will be glad to know of its continued prosperity. Additional buildings on the farm end of the school are going up during the vacation in the way of a carriage house and additional barn room. Two additional teachers will be added to the faculty on the opening of the term. Miss Florence Hendershot, of Cleveland, comes to meet a growing demand for a teacher of the violin. Miss Hattie Bradley, of Englewood, Ill., will assist in primary and intermediate classes. Miss Alice Warren, of Hinsdale, Ill., has been engaged to take the place of Miss McMinn, who, after four years of faithful work, withdraws in order to further pursue her studies. Each of these teachers has had special training in the art of teaching as well as a broad general culture, and they come to their work highly recommended. Notwithstanding the general financial depression pervading the country the prospects of the school have never been as bright as now. Wise parents realize that it is poor economy to retrench upon lines which relate so closely to the future well-being of their children as those which have to do with their early education.

New York, N. Y.—The lectures having ceased for the season, the New York Ethical Culture Society is quiescent except in its charities department. The Young Men's Union is collecting and disbursing the Fresh-Air Fund this season. Chickering Hall is no longer to be the assembly place of the society. It expects to meet in Carnegie Music Hall until it has a home of its own.

Menomonie, Wis.—This society, which for several months has been without a minister, has now secured the services of Rev. C. F. Niles, formerly of West Superior, who has decided to accept the unanimous call extended to him by the Menomonie Church.

Spokane, Wash.—Rev. E. M. Fairchild, the Andover graduate whose entrance into the Unitarian ministry gave rise to so much discussion, was at the Unitarian Headquarters at 175 Dearborn street, Chicago, last week, on his way to take charge of the Spokane church.

London, Eng.—Rev. Prof. Marks, D. D., who for fifty-one years has been at the head of the only Reformed Jewish congregation in this city, has retired from his position in the Berkeley Street Synagogue, to be succeeded by Rev. Morris Joseph as senior, and Rev. Isidore Harris as junior minister. The Chicago Israelite remarks that Rabbi Joseph's published sermons and the reforms he has introduced in the Hampstead Synagogue show his fitness for the honorable position he is to fill.

Kolozsvar, Hungary.—We learn from the Inquirer that Rev. S. J. Barrows on his way home from the East stopped at Kolozsvar, where he made a very happy impression upon the Unitarians of that place, whose guest he was. He addressed the consistory, and at the conclusion of his speech Bishop Ferencz proposed that Mr. Barrows be elected an honorary member, a suggestion which was most graciously received. Mr. Barrows seems especially to have enjoyed his visit to the Unitarian patriarch, Dr. Samuel Brassai, who is 93 years of age. Professor Boros, in his letter to the Inquirer, speaks most highly of Mr. Barrows' "singular modesty, his graceful manners, his powerful eloquence, his quick appreciation of everything good and kind, and his deep knowledge of classical and modern art and science."

The Voice from Bulgaria.—Mr. E. S. Yovtcheff, favorably known to many of our UNITY readers, East and West, as a gentleman of culture who has been compelled to seek the American shores for freedom's sake, has been meeting with encouraging success as a lecturer upon Eastern subjects at the Chautauqua circles this winter. The New England Assembly Daily, reporting his success at South Framingham, says:

"No more instructive and interesting lecturer has come upon the grounds than Mr. Yovtcheff. Although he speaks with a slight accent, yet every word can be understood. He is a thorough master of English and speaks with the utmost care. His lectures received widespread commendation. In private life Mr. Yovtcheff is a charming gentleman. We commend him to all Chautauqua assemblies."

From extended acquaintance and growing interest in this gentleman we gladly extend the commendation to the Unity Clubs who may be arranging for lectures this winter. By the aid of costumes and other illustrative matter, Mr. Yovtcheff speaks to the eye as well as the ear. Among his topics are: "The Social Life of the Turks," "Bulgaria, the Apple of Discord," "The Czar and the Jew."

PERFECT CONFIDENCE IN TOKOLOGY.

Lizzie N. Armstrong writes: "If I knew I was to be the mother of innumerable children it would have no terrors for me, so great is my confidence in the science of TOKOLOGY." This book is written by Dr. Alice B. Stockham, who practiced as a physician over twenty-five years. Prepaid, $2.75. Sample pages free. Best terms to agents. Alice B. Stockham & Co., 277 Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

Valuable but Not Costly.

It may save you a great deal of trouble in cooking. Try it. We refer to the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, regarded by most housekeepers as absolutely essential in culinary uses, and unsurpassed in coffee. All Grocers and Druggists sell the Eagle Brand.

The Six Years' Course of Sunday School Lessons.

The first year's work, "Beginnings," originally prepared by the lamented Henry Doty Maxson, and upon which Mr. Gould has been working for the past year, has gone to the printer and will be ready for sale by the first of September. Price 25 cents, postpaid, or $2.50 per dozen. The Western Sunday School Society is prepared to take advance orders. Those interested are requested to send orders as soon as possible, so that the book may be in their hands by the opening of Sunday School in the autumn.

LIBERTY AND LIFE. By E. P. Powell. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Monroe Street. Cloth, 208 pp. 50 cents.—We welcome most heartily this cheap edition of Mr. Powell's inspiring little book, which, in a more expensive form, has before been noticed in these columns. We trust it will have many new readers in its more democratic dress. Mr. Powell is the preacher of a genuine gospel: and his words are no less searching and effective because, in these latter days, they are not always spoken in the pulpit, but weekly, to a quarter of a million readers in a great daily newspaper, and occasionally, through helpful and thoughtful books, to a public which, if not large, is growing from year to year, and is heartily appreciative of his uplifting thought. We need not here review this book in detail. Its object is practical rather than speculative. It is rationally optimistic and thoroughly imbued with the scientific spirit in its treatment of the problems of our daily life. Our author finds hope and promise in the teachings of modern science and the doctrine of evolution that the religion of the future will be loftily theistic in its conception of the Infinite Power which is the life of the universe, and lend rational sanctions to the belief in personal continuance hereafter.

 Office, 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

The date opposite name on address slip shows to what time your subscription is paid. We do not send receipts for subscriptions unless the request is accompanied by stamp. The date on your address slip will be changed within two weeks, and that will show your remittance has been received. Remittances should be payable to Unity Publishing Company, and should be by express money order or postoffice money order, or by draft, check on Chicago bank, or registered letter. Postal notes are no more secure than cash, and are sent at remitter's risk.

Remember that, according to law, the publisher must be notified by letter when a subscriber wishes his paper stopped, and all arrears must be paid.

When change of address is desired, we must be informed of the old as well as the new address, in order that we may find your name on our mailing list.

Publisher's Notes

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

In the case of a weekly of which the annual price is so small as UNITY'S, it must be evident that we can have no margin, even where so much of the work is gratuitous; the expense of time, postage, and stationery used to remind delinquent subscribers is a heavy tax upon us, and we do not enjoy sending these reminders any more than our subscribers enjoy receiving them. UNITY must, however, make a strenuous effort to collect, even though it thereby loses a subscriber, or else go to the wall: and when we remind our subscribers of our need, they should not, we think, get angry and stop their subscription, as they sometimes do. Of course we know that they do not realize how much their inattention to this matter means to us, but that consideration will not pay our bills. Will not all who read this help us in this matter, and at least pay their subscriptions promptly?

UNITY PUBLISHING CO. have entered into an arrangement with the associate organizations represented at 175 Dearborn street to take charge of the book sales at the Headquarters. We are now prepared to furnish our readers with any books found in the market, at the regular retail prices and on short notice. The liberal religious publications of the American Unitarian Association, George H. Ellis and other publishers will be kept on hand. Orders solicited.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

*The aurs of heaven blow o'er me:
 A glory shines before me
 Of what mankind shall be.—
 Pure, generous, brave and free.*

*A dream of man and woman
 Diviner but still human,
 Solving the riddle old,
 Shaping the Age o' Gold!*

*I feel the earth move sunward,
 I join the great march onward,
 Fore-reach the good to be,
 And share the victory.*

—Whittier.

WITH our next issue we begin another half year volume. We have tried hard to increase our right to an increased subscription list. Have you done what you could from your end of the line to give us the increased list? We will continue our efforts at improvement and enlargement. Have you any duties in this direction? Together we may hardly do it, certainly without you it cannot be done.

**

THE ultimate lesson in religion, to the teaching of which all the activities of the day conspire, is the truth exemplified of old, that all provinces are overshadowed by the white wings of the Holy Ghost, that there are gospel accents in the speech of all helpers of men, that while forms change and dogmas die truth and love live on forever and everywhere.

**

WE print in another column an article on the "Union of Liberals" from the Universalist Monthly for August. No comment from us is necessary, as our attitude is well understood. We not only believe in the "Liberal" church but we are at present working for it and in it. The union must come, but good things never come by waiting for them. Somebody must work for them. This working is the ungracious, oftentimes thankless, but always indispensable, condition of progress.

**

ALL SOULS CHURCH, Chicago, is printing in pamphlet form the series of sermons which its pastor has been preaching on the "Seven Great Teachers of Religion." These sermons have been given to overcrowded houses, many being turned away for want of room. The church publishes them as a contribution to the work of the Parliament of Religions. Zoroaster, Confucius, and Buddha are already out. Moses, Socrates, Jesus, and Mohammed are in press. Any or all of them may be ordered from this office.

**

THE Christian Advocate tells of the sister of a high-church rector from America who was greatly shocked on hearing a low-church rector read the Scripture with becoming emphasis and accent. She thought it almost blasphemy to "impose his own interpretation on the word of God. The Scripture should be read in monotone." This is the problem of the day in a nutshell. Is religion to be a monotone, disconnected from human thought and feeling, or is it to be accentuated with human intelligence, with the loves and needs of men and women?

THE Parliament of Religions is fast approaching. We print again the Unitarian program and urge upon our readers the privileges and duties involved in the same. The Parliament begins on the eleventh of September, the Unitarian Congress on the sixteenth. Secure your accommodations early and come to stay as long as possible. The hospitalities of the Unitarian Headquarters, 175 Dearborn street, are cordially extended to all friends. UNITY, through its representatives, will count itself among those who are to "receive."

A PRESBYTERIAN minister in New York is reported as calling for the organization of a new church to be known as "The Church of the Heretics," a church that will give room for those "who believe in the spirit of the Christian religion, but do not believe in the forms it has assumed." But why rim this church with the word Christian? for surely there are noble and saintly heretics who exemplify the spirit of religion, who may not confess either the word Christian or religion. The Church of the Heretics must be the Church of the Aspirants—all those who reach after the good.

IN the money stringency which threatens the country we should be glad to consider such expedients as that of Mr. William C. Cornwell, of Buffalo, who proposes to have the local clearing houses issue to the respective banks composing them drafts upon New York, secured by clearing-house certificates, which drafts shall be in small denominations, $1, $2, $5 and $10, and redeemable at the counter of any local bank,—provisions which, it is believed, would adapt them to use as a circulating medium as long as the stringency continued, while the rate of interest paid upon the clearing-house certificates, upon which they are based, would insure their withdrawal as soon as the money market became easy. The Buffalo Express of Aug. 19 is authority for the statement that Secretary Carlisle approves of the plan.

THE great congresses continue to meet in such rapid succession that it is impossible for the daily press, with all its mighty machinery, to make note of them, still less possible it is for the weekly weaklings to even tell the names thereof. Last week was a most notable one when the electrical, psychical, chemical, and half a dozen other scientific congresses brought together a truly international company of eminent specialists. This week, by a somewhat violent but necessary transition, the halls of the Art Palace are thronged with the representatives of the more humble labor. The mere program is heart-opening and mind-quickenng. It covers a week filled with eminent names and burning subjects.

WE note that Rev. E. B. Payne, of the Unitarian Church, at Berkeley, Cal., has reopened his two-column department of the Saturday Berkeley Advocate. This church-column idea was followed by two other ministers (Baptist and Congregationalist, we believe); but all were suspended during part of the summer, and the other columns had not as yet been reopened. This business arrangement of Mr. Payne's, by which he secures a certain space in the local paper every week in which to set forth religious truth as he sees it, seems to us a very commendable way of preaching the gospel; and inasmuch as Mr. Payne often quotes from UNITY we are satisfied that his gospel is a sound one. Our brother has taken out no patent on his idea, and we hope that other pastors will adopt this method of reaching a larger parish than that with which they are officially connected.

DO WE WANT ANOTHER PROTESTANTISM?

Yes, a protestantism, not of one theology against another theology, but a protest against the dictatorial power of all theologies. Not of one form as against another form, but against the tyranny of all forms. A protestantism, not in the interest of doubt, but against the dogmatism that in the name of doubt and reason oftentimes becomes more dogmatic than the dogmas they would supplant. We want a protestantism, not to annihilate, but to right the sects, a protestantism that will prick the bubble of complacency that under the guise of Liberality and Culture turns deaf ears to those who in bad English and in dirty clothes are praying in various ways for companionship with man and communion with God. We want a protestantism that will eventually make a theological protestantism unnecessary by making righteousness the supreme test, love the only confession, and truth the adequate quest.

It is obvious that at the present time there is no movement before the public represented by any organization that does represent just this protestantism. It is equally obvious that thousands do feel underneath such a protestantism an ever deepening faith. Such a protestantism finds itself in practical variance with the genteel apathy, the "Christian"-without-definitive ambiguity, and the controversial spirit of historic Unitarianism, as with the don't-mention-the-creed spirit of the Presbyterians. To such a protestantism the bloodless little creed of the Universalists, used to circumscribe their universality, is as offensive as the Thirty-nine Articles, whose place in the church economy is determined by the churchman's skill in explaining them away. This protestantism has as great a protest to make against the class distinctions of society as against the thought-distinctions of the creeds. It has little in common with the somnolent church, with its upholstered pew and its high-art quartette choir that performs the worship for inactive spirits. This protestantism seeks to unite the millionaire and the day laborer upon the things they hold in common. It will be a church for the masses, a working church, a seven-day church, and not in one but in many ways. Not for all but for many it will be a worshipping church, tending more and more to devoutness. When the coercive element in worship is eliminated, the worshipping spirit, which is jealous of its freedom and which must always have a spontaneous element in it, will grow.

Now, as in the age of every protestantism, there is a hesitancy lest breadth should sacrifice depth. The old figure of the pond growing shallow as it grows broader is a tyrannical one largely disproved by both history and experience. In matters of the spirit breadth is depth. The open mind is a profound one. The free heart is the great heart. The lover of the light is the lover of God. It is not liberty but the lack of liberty that has made for license.

It is in some such a new protestantism as this that UNITY would lead or follow, as case may be. Such a protestantism has been to us an inspiration, calling ever for constructive, diligent, humble and devout lives.

"FOR THE POOR."

Stoutly denied by all those who think that the present industrial system is all right, the fact nevertheless forces itself upon everybody's attention that there is a permanent poor class. Individuals make their way up and down, ranging from poverty to wealth or contrariwise,—from the ranks of the poor some one continually emerging into affluence and power; men of vast possessions dropping in a day into absolute penury, when they have not hedged in time to save something from the general wreck. But the two classes—poor and rich—continue. And it seems pretty well established that these two classes are to be respectively labeled Capitalist and Laborist. It is not here inferred that the latter class is the class that alone labors,—the former class often undergoing a degree of toil and mental strain the so-called workingman is permitted only to dream of. But it is that, by virtue of its capital, the capitalist class is able to draw unto itself an income greatly in excess of that allotted to the labor class. The point is,—granting the two classes to be equally industrious and deserving,—that one class by virtue of its capital is able to seize on a proportion of the common wealth vastly in excess of that remaining to the other class, with the inevitable result of perpetuating the conditions described as poor and rich. The question arises,

Is this division a natural and equitable one or is it arbitrary and forced?

There is, it may be said, a general feeling that the working class should receive a larger return for its steady toll, that it also may have somewhat more to make existence comfortable as well as possible. In addition to its wage, public opinion accords it some benefaction or other, is continually devising some provision by means of which want and privation may be assuaged if not prevented. More and more is the capitalist class called on for generous contribution. To note one instance of this growing spirit of philanthropy: consider the widely discussed question of opening the gates of the Fair on Sunday and reducing the price of admission—for the benefit of the working class; and the further suggestion that the capitalist class donate to the working class either the half or the whole of each Saturday while the Fair is continued.

Now all such proposals must be regarded as a sort of confession that things are not quite as they should be, the industrial distribution is not exactly on the lines of equity; else there would be no such moral obligation either inferred or found to be necessary, the working class everywhere—the “industrious poor”—would be able to manage for itself and pay its own way. Now, if it were possible, would not that be by far the better way? Or is it impossible? If so, is it because capital arms the capitalist with an ethical right to profits and interests that keeps the working class forever poor, renders it always incapable of providing not only for urgent needs and culture, but for the pleasure of participating individually, by free assessment, in the public improvement and welfare? An intelligent workingman has remarked that “there is somewhat humiliating in all charitable institutions, the public school-house not excepted.”

There are many signs that go to swell the chorus of prophecy that we are approaching a new industrial regime that will mete out competence and independence for all toilers,—a democratic era that shall carry mankind up to the opportunities of successful industry, greatly limiting, if not abolishing altogether, the need—now so glaring—of doing something “for the poor.”

AUSTRALIA'S LESSON FOR AMERICA.

One of the most interesting and suggestive addresses that have been made in Chicago this summer was delivered Sunday evening, August 20, at All Souls Church, by Miss Catherine H. Spence, of Adelaide, South Australia, who spoke of the reforms already effected and now in process of accomplishment in that distant home of freedom. In beginning her address she stated that the colony of South Australia was founded by doctrinaires, and that it still retains the name of “the happy hunting ground of the faddist;” but she did not seem to feel that there was cause for deep humiliation in this designation, although admitting that it contained an element of truth. Starting out under the Wakefield land system,—in accordance with which no land was given to settlers, but all sold at a minimum price of £1 per acre, the income from which created a public fund which is found of great use to the colony,—South Australia has continued to be a very progressive community, and the pioneer of reform in Australia, which land has of late been the teacher of social betterment to the world. Among the improvements in public policy and public administration in which South Australia has met with success and been followed more or less perfectly by other Australian colonies and by distant countries, are:

First. The careful and very complete separation of church and state, in accordance with which no denominational institution, educational or charitable, is subsidized or receives any public assistance. And, further than this, a system of out-door relief, by means of which the pauperization of the people, and the expense of their relief, is lessened instead of being increased; notwithstanding the impression so prevalent in England and America that out-door relief is pernicious. In Adelaide, the capital of New South Wales, is a block of small wooden houses belonging to the government, known as Immigration Square, wherein immigrants are allowed to remain for ten days or two weeks after their arrival, during which stay public rations are issued to them. As they secure work and leave the Square other immigrants come to take their places; and generally some kind of employment is secured before the time of their public maintenance expires. The theory of South Australia is that orphan children and others incapable of taking care of themselves are entitled to maintenance and such education as shall fit them to do their part for the common weal, and that the assistance rendered them by the Government to this end is not charity, but justice. Accordingly, while a well woman with only one child is supposed to be able to care for it, a widow or deserted wife who has more than one child is given one ration (so much flour, meat, etc.) if she has two children under thirteen years of age to care for, two rations if she has four such children, etc.; so that she is able to keep them at home, give them a mother's care and affection, and yet not deprive them of the material needs of life. Similarly with superannuated men and women; they are left in their own or their children's homes if possible. Between the ages of six and thirteen school attendance is compulsory and the law is enforced. Children to whom the state thus stands in loco parentis are received at the schools without payment.

Second. The secret, or Australian, ballot is of South Australian origin.

Third. The Real Property Act, embodying the Australian system of land tenure and transfer, which makes title a matter of public record and renders the transfer of realty as easy and inexpensive as that of personal property, doing away with the servitude to the legal fraternity which exists elsewhere, where titles must be examined and certified by lawyers. The Australian system puts the small landholders in a far more secure position than that held by this rather unfortunate class in other parts of the world.

Fourth. The taking children out of institutions and putting them into homes, as is done in Pennsylvania and some other of the United States, and as it is hoped will be done in Illinois after the next legislature meets. In this system, which is now being widely adopted, South Australia was a pioneer, and Miss Spence set forth at some length the interesting history of the gradual progress of this idea, which is now fully carried out there. The only institution now in existence for destitute and dependent children who are not suffering from some peculiar disability, such as blindness or feeble-mindedness, is a receiving house, from which they are sent to private homes with a suitable outfit, which must be maintained by the foster parents, who are also under obligation to send them regularly to school and even to put certain small amounts in the bank for them. Official visitors, generally ladies, go to their homes at short intervals, and paid inspectors visit them several times a year. In addition to these safeguards, the school teachers of the district and, if memory serves your reporter aright, the foster parents also, must make periodical reports. Another feature of this system is that except in case of incorrigibly bad children whose mutual association would be detrimental to their moral well being, brothers and sisters are not separated, but all are put in the same home. This is sometimes a little difficult, but it has been successfully carried out. The foster parent receives a ration for each child he receives. The money value of the weekly ration—of which mention has previously been made—is near $1.50. After the age of thirteen, working places are found for the children, which are as home-like as possible, but the Government's care for them is not at an end. The control of all these matters is vested in a committee of ladies and gentlemen with a paid chairman and paid administrative officers, assisted by the large body of local "visitors." Miss Spence is a member of this committee, and she and Miss Clarke, the niece of Sir Rowland Hill, were the prime movers in this as in other Australian reforms. The children are encouraged to write freely to headquarters as to the treatment they receive and their happiness or unhappiness. The effort is not made to keep uncongenial people together, and a boy or girl is sometimes changed several times, but if the young person proves very unruly he is as a last resort committed to the reformatory.

Fifth. Unique provisions as to the mothers of illegitimate children. They used to leave the maternity homes very soon after the child's birth, but now unless they secure employment in a good place so that they can keep the child with them, they are required to remain in the home with the child for the first six months of its life. The result has been beneficial not only to the child but also to the mother.

Sixth. Taxation of unimproved land values is one of the great reforms in taxation upon which the South Australians felicitate themselves. A great number of them, like Miss Spence herself, feel that the colony made a mistake in parting with the fee of the land to private owners. The principle of the single tax on land values is widely understood and approved there today; but though they have it not, the taxation of land values, the early adoption of the Wakefield system and the large use of the income tax have made the economic system of South Australia peculiarly fortunate.

In the present grave financial difficulties in Australia, South Australia is of course somewhat involved, since the same banking houses have branches in all parts of Australia; but their condition is so much better than their neighbors that the colony feels perfectly confident of weathering the storm. New Zealand, which has a similar land and tax system, but which is not handicapped as South Australia is by close connection with the Australian banking houses, is at the present time, Miss Spence assures us, in a particularly prosperous condition despite the general business depression and financial uneasiness.

In addition to telling what had been done in Australia in the way of reform, and giving her testimony for the single tax, Miss Spence spoke warmly for the next great reform which South Australia hopes to accomplish, and for which she herself is working bravely,—proportional representation, whereby effective voting may be had and the power of the political machine be broken. This does not primarily mean minority representation; it means much more than this,—the representation of ideas. If a number of individuals believe in one idea, however much they may otherwise differ in politics, that idea will have adequate representation without the necessity of a political "party" being created to bring it into effect.

Just as young America, New England, has taught the old world much, so younger Australia, the newer England, has many lessons for America as well as Europe. It would be well if we were to adopt all the reforms which Miss Spence described, but surely there is nothing of which this party-ridden land stands in greater immediate need than this last-mentioned one, proportional representation. We must plead guilty to the serious charge that we Americans are not near so public-spirited a people as our young cousins of Australia. We know our political machinery is corrupt, and yet we leave the amelioration of our condition to venal and incompetent politicians. Let us remember the words of Greece's friend,

"Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow,"— for if we would make our future as great as our past is glorious, we cannot afford to forget that early warning,—"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty!" F. W. S.

Men and Things

It is said that the ragged palmetto that occupies so much of the apparently waste lands of the South promises to become very useful for tanning purposes. Emerson said that weeds were "plants whose uses are not yet found out." Here is another plant reclaimed. Let the work go on.

AMONG the architectural reproductions at the World's Fair is one from the portal of an old French cathedral in which the expulsion from Eden is portrayed. "The sculptor has shown God pushing Adam gently by the shoulder out of Paradise, while a too zealous angel has seized Adam by the beard and is dragging him forward. Meantime, Adam himself is not idle. He expresses very forcibly his idea concerning the true culprit. Keeping a large fig leaf in place with one hand he has the other in Eve's hair, which he is pulling viciously, and, in order to reinforce his lesson, he is kicking the Mother of Mankind with one foot while he tries to keep erect on the other."

AN illustration of the intolerable oppression of the Russian Government comes from Moscow. In 1887 consent was given to build a new Jewish temple. In 1890, when it was near completion, the removal of the cupola was ordered. The temple was opened, with full permission and public services, June 7, 1892, and the old synagogue was closed. Several weeks later the chief rabbi was notified that July 15 was the last day set for the removal of all Jews who had no right of residence in Moscow, and that so few would remain that they would not need a synagogue; and as "the existence of a synagogue is unbecoming in Moscow," the building must be turned into a benevolent institution or sold by Jan. 1, 1893. The president and chief rabbi replied, recounting the history of the case, and asking that the order be revoked; but the only answer was an imperial order for the expulsion of both men from the city. The building is closed, and the Jews are not allowed to meet in any place of worship. Those who admire such a government ought to go and live under it. —The Independent.

FATHERS OF OUR FAITH.

The fathers of our faith, good souls and brave,
 Recalled of God to join his host on high,
 All dearer grow as fleeting years go by,
 And rise immortal spirits from the grave!
 We picture them as citizens of light,
 As robed and crowned in Love's divine array,
 Tho' they the while are not so far away,
 But still abide our comfort and our might!
 We are beset with heroes great and grand,
 Exemplars of hope's deep devoted life:
 In all our care these conquering spirits stand,
 Inspiring us to manful be in strife,
 To follow where their feet on thorns have trod,
 Outcasts of men perhaps, but loved of God!
 We give all blessing to the hallowed name
 Of Channing, spirit pure and bright as star;
 To Parker, mighty leader in Truth's war:
 To Ware and Dewey, dear to love and fame:
 These in the dawn of hope were leal and true,
 They broke the way for feet that followed fast:
 They bore like oaks the winter's stormy blast;
 Their words well-sown, like grain around them grew!
 But time would fail to count the starry host,
 To note the flowers in the field abloom:
 Full oft they passed unseen, or known at most
 As lights that common pathways may illumine:
 Yet all as one were harbingers of day,
 When love and light the world of hearts shall sway!

UNION OF LIBERALS.

Words cannot be coined, invented or imposed. They grow. Liberal is the coming word for un-Orthodox religion. It has been abused, disliked, shunned, but it stays and increases. The Orthodox speakers at these World's Fair Congresses find themselves unconsciously using the term "The Liberal Churches" to define the aggregation of un-Orthodox worshippers. Liberal, like Orthodox, is a generic word. It includes Unitarians, Universalists, progressive Jews, Independents, untrammelled Spiritualists, reverent outsiders, hosts of advance thinkers in all the old denominations. The general distinction is that a Liberal finds God in nature and the human soul rather than in any miraculous history, accepts goodness without any creed-demand as God-service. The movement for a union of these scattered elements cannot be stayed. It is impossible that leading men of different names, but with the same great thoughts and purposes, can much longer work on in their isolation. They must and will find each other.

In the September Non-Sectarian will appear an article from Dr. Thomas advocating the combination of several papers and magazines into one great publication of The Liberal Church; said church to have its cohesive power not in a creed, not in a denominational organism, but in sympathy of thought and purpose, as the Y. M. C. A. has—a sort of Pan-Liberal unity as the Y. M. C. A. is a Pan-Orthodoxy.

The Non-Sectarian has already, in the July number, expressed its willingness thus to unite. Whether exactly that will be done the future must determine. The Monthly has long advocated the idea of Liberal union, and is ready at any time to become part of a larger unit in which or by which the agreements of Liberals can be furthered. We greatly need something that will be to us what the Y. M. C. A. and the Christian Endeavor are to the Orthodox world. Denominationalism, in the sense of supreme devotion to an "attitude," a creed, a tradition, an historic leader (as Wesley, Murray, Swendenborg), has run its course. For the Orthodox world it has become a weakness. For the Liberal Church it has always been a failure, and is now a calamity. It is state sovereignty. We need nationality. Our Liberal denominations need not disband any more than a State ceases existence by coming into the Union; but we should all together form this nationality of the Liberals.

Of course, there are some who would bitterly oppose the larger unity of endeavor. Let them stay out. Whoever cares more for Universalist traditions and attitudes than for human fellowship and the progress of truth is not a Liberal and has no place in any such union.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

It would be difficult to pack into a small space more fundamental fallacies than are contained in the few statements of conclusions drawn from Prof. Faussig's book on this subject, in UNITY of July 27. In those statements there is betrayal of gross ignorance of the nature of value, and consequent incapacity to deal with value-dynamics. The writer does not know that the same breath which states a general fall in prices affirms by necessary implication an appreciation in the value, or purchasing power, of the gold which, as he puts it, "marks that fall."

Nothing is more certain than that the "marking" tool, or, as I should say, the instrument of appraising or measuring out products,—for worthing everything that goes into commerce,—has gone wrong, has become an inequitable and extortionate pricing tool; for it measures out as a "dollar's worth" about 50 per cent. more in the aggregate of all commodities than it did in 1873, when silver shared with gold that "standard" or marking business. A man who puts his thinker to the question cannot fail to see that the value of 371.25 grains of silver to-day is more near the true traditional and equitable value a dollar should have than is 23.22 grains of gold, by all of the difference popularly known as the fall in the price of silver.

"Why do I say that?" Because prices in silver-standard countries have not fallen, but remain nominal, while the conceded fall of more than one-third in all prices in gold-standard countries is exactly the same fact as a more than 50 per cent. appreciation in the value of gold. It follows that had it not been for the act of 1873 our dollar must have remained with silver as a standard and there would have been no price-fall to "mark."

The professor is abused (?) by the notion that gold is more staple as a pricing tool because it has felt less the influence of varying increase in output and cost of digging. He is way off in his facts, in his inferences, and in his intellectual method. Never has silver experienced such vicissitudes in cost and quantity of production as has gold—never a tenth of it. In this country the gold output in 1847 was less than $890,000, while in 1855 it had become $65,000,000, an increase of more than seventy times in eight years. The annual output of both the metals combined has been much more unvarying than of either alone. But the professor's reasoning is more distressingly faulty still. Value in economics is not a muscular strain, a mental anxiety or labor of body or mind. Nor is labor the cause of value. Value is a market relation—a swapping rate—of things traded; and in order that any thing shall remain constant in value, all other things must remain so too. Constancy in the value of a dollar is the same fact as constancy in the general price range, and in order that there must be constancy in the relative quantity between money on one side and goods on the other; and therefore in order to keep constancy in prices money must increase pari passu with commodities, and the annual increase of silver output is none too much to keep pace with the money demand and the maintenance of normal prices.

There is error in fact regarding wages, but grosser error in employing the wage-rate as a criterion for estimating the value change in money. Cost of production does regulate value of anything; but aside from that, a day's work is no fit economic quantity for use in such a discussion. It is variable in character and incapable of definiteness. Of course, an hour is a definite unit of time, but an hour's labor is the vaguest of things in other respects, and can only be estimated by its output of product; while a bushel of wheat or corn, a pound of cotton or beef, a ton of iron or coal, a gallon of turpentine, molasses, oil, etc., are all precise economic quantities, constant in character, quality, and utility, the same now as they were fifty or twenty-five years ago. Therefore it is that all competent writers employ an aggregate or composite commodity unit, made of all the great staples, and get an "index number" whose variation becomes the criterion in such a quest.

If my strictures are flavored too highly with passion to suit a delicate literary taste, my apology is that once the intelligent reader comes to a full understanding of the subject he will marvel at my moderation. I have had a good deal to do with these professors.

E. D. STARK.

Cleveland, Ohio.

[Professor Taussig has a wide and well-deserved reputation for fairness in his statements and accuracy in his facts; and as my review was simply an exposition of his facts and statements, the above communication hardly seems to need any answer from me, especially since UNITY declines to allow the discussion to be continued. To refute Mr. Stark's position by facts and figures, when he had no opportunity of replying, would seem unfair. Therefore I leave his statements as they are. But the subject is of such vital importance for us all, that I venture to add one word more on the nature of money.

What we all want is obviously a stable standard to measure our earnings by. The day-laborer, who by hard work and thrift lays up a hundred dollars in the savings bank, wants to be able to draw out a hundred dollars, a year hence, just as the capitalist who loans a hundred thousand dollars wants to be sure of getting his money back. Now, if the present Congress should adopt the silver standard, the capitalist who had loaned his money would get back only about half of it, and the day-laborer would draw out only about half of his hundred dollars from the savings bank. He would indeed draw one hundred dollars, but they would buy only about half as much flour or sugar as the hundred dollars he put in. If he deposited money enough to buy twenty barrels of flour, he would draw out only enough to buy twelve barrels at the present price of silver. And if we had been using silver as our measure of value during the last three years, anyone can see what would have happened. Silver has fallen to one-half its value of three years ago, and with the silver standard, if we had lent a sum of money in 1890 we should get one half of it back now; if we had agreed to work for a certain salary we should be getting just half of it now. It would take two dollars now to buy what one would in 1890; just as it took two dollars of greenbacks during the war to buy what one would have bought before the war.

India had the silver standard up to this year, and it was afflicted by just such fluctuations in value as these; and it was expressly to avoid them that it took refuge in the gold standard of all other civilized countries. And because men fear that our own government may be forced upon the silver basis, they fear to loan money or put it in the banks, lest they receive back only a part of it next year. They do not care to give gold dollars with the prospect of being repaid in silver dollars. They prefer to lock up their money in gold or bonds payable in gold. Some of the silver advocates themselves, even, insist upon having all their loans payable in gold; and that is the only safe way to do, if there is any possibility of our changing to a fluctuating and falling standard like silver.—A. W. G.]

A PICTURE.

It neither hung in the collection of Fine Arts in the great Exposition, nor did it belong to some old collection gathered from some ancient chateau or palace of dead kings.

I, a stranger in the city, after days spent among the great exhibits out there at the Fair, out where I rubbed against princes and chiefs of the earth—there, where costly laces and jewels, robbing for the time the crowns and breasts of reigning kings and queens, displayed their rare beauty—where grand pictures in costly frames hung from the walls in that hall hallowed by the presence of the masterpieces of dead genius—where the roll of great inventions shook the earth with giant motion, and where noble architecture stretched its domes toward the blue heavens—out of it all I came on that bright Sunday morning with thoughts all confused.

I walked down the boulevard until I came to a queer little structure resembling a home more than a church edifice; but as I saw evident church-goers filing in I followed. It was there before and around me the picture lay, and I was permitted to be in that picture's part.

Simplicity, a simplicity that gathered within its folds all force, all power, all strength, all love, it was.

The chapel was built so that the congregation appeared, as it were, to be one household, one family, gathered around in a half circle.

In front, upon the modest platform, were dainty bouquets of roses and old-fashioned snap-dragon and huge bunches of golden-rod, out from which looked a bust of our transcendental spirit, Emerson, smiling out upon us as if to tell us by the gentle force of that smile that all is beautiful, all is good.

The breeze coming in at an open window stirred the flowers and sent their fragrant freshness to us all. Somehow the golden-rod—bright flower of light—led me to old country lanes where, as a child, I had in the bright early autumn days watched the yellow heads bend to the wind's wishes,—long ago, when what is now was then a dim dream veiled in mystery, and my spirit took on a sympathy that was again child-like.

The minister arose in those surroundings and prayed to the Father, lifting his heart in a sweet thanksgiving that was a bearing of the happiness and tranquillity of his soul to the eye of the Infinite, as a little one would lip the tenderness it felt to the loving father or mother heart.

He took for his subject that morning one of the lights of religious history, and dealt with it as only a soul could who looks into the heart and purpose of things; in truth, he dwelt upon the sincerity of the man particularly, and taught us that God looks to the honesty of a man's belief rather than to the belief itself, and that we are not to count a man's mistakes against him until we know the man and the purpose back of the mistake: and that from this very strength of sincerity comes all the grand things of earth; that one sincere heart helps to make for another a masterful mind, and stays the fast fleeing courage of the well nigh hopeless soul.

As I looked from the preacher to his flock gathered there, I saw a look of divine understanding on the faces of two or three aged saints; and an old man, with withered hands and face, smiled up at the speaker in a way that told me he had been at least honest in his faith.

I carried away with me the influence of that picture; it brightened all the day, and its sweetness is with me still.

HARRIET HAZELTON SINNARD.

MR. GLADSTONE, in an address at Oxford recently, affirmed Locke, Milton and Newton to be the three most eminent men intellectually in the period comprising the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It did not occur to Mr. Gladstone, but it is the fact, nevertheless, that all three were Unitarians.

TO THE misapprehension of the aim of punishment is due much of the misgovernment of children. We recognize the value of training the child by means of retributive punishment rather than by the arbitrary punishment too often used with children. The former appeals to the child's inborn instinct of justice.

HE who has in his own heart the life of faith and hope and love, and can rephrase it in these terms of nineteenth-century thinking, will neither find the minds of thoughtful men closed against his message, nor his message cast out by a conflicting scientific teaching. He who attempts to prove that modern science is atheistic, preaches irreligion. He best ministers to the religious life who succeeds in making science itself conduct to a larger reverence and a more catholic love.

Church-Door Pulpit

THE MINISTRY.*

BY REV. W. H. GOULD.

Two questions suggest themselves as I attempt to speak for the ministry. Why did our Committee of Arrangements ask me to respond to so important a subject when there are others who could speak so much more instructively out of longer and richer experience? Was it because of the completeness of knowledge which the young minister is so certain to possess of all great and important subjects? It seems better to think their intention may have been to see how the ministry appears as viewed through the eyes of the young minister.

The second question which suggests itself is why they gave me the whole of this subject? Had our good Dr. Safford, for instance, been asked to fill this place, he would have wanted only a piece of it, as the study, or pulpit, or pastoral aspect of the ministry, and he would have needed the entire evening to discuss one of these fragments. However, it seems good to see in this, also, the kind thoughtfulness of the committee, who would open the gate to a field sufficiently extensive so that even the young minister could find enough for a twenty minutes' talk. I hope, therefore, it will not be altogether without profit for me to speak of the Christian Ministry as a vocation,—a vocation worthy of the brightest and best of our young people. I shall speak more in the way of suggestions that have emphasized "themselves through personal experience, especially experience of personal deficiency" and failure. Please remember that we shall look at the ministry through the eyes of the young minister.

The 22d of this month I shall have served five years as an ordained minister of our church. Although I have to confess to many disturbing thoughts of ministerial mistakes and serious shortcomings, and begin to suspect that some of the failures of my short ministry have been due as much to the weakness and foolishness of the pastor as to the lack of appreciation and willingness to heartily cooperate on the part of the people,—in spite of these serious and oppressive personal misgivings, the few years of my service as a Christian minister have been very pleasant, happy, glad years. If some of the fanciful, school-day notions of the ministry have proved to be mere empty bubbles, to break and vanish as soon as they came in contact with the realities of the minister's life and work, the real meaning of that life and work grows more inviting with the increase of actual experience.

We want more ministers, is the call of our conventions, both State and general. I sometimes wonder if we all understand just what is wanted. Is it more students to receive diplomas from our schools? Is it more professional, hired preachers to draw their salaries? Is it more gentlemen to occupy positions of ease and opportunity to pursue congenial studies? Is it more of those who, to use the vulgar but expressive slang, are looking for a soft "snap?" In the presence of this convention we must answer—No; the call is for none of these. The call is for more ministers, and a minister is a servant, one who works and gives himself for others. The question, then, to be asked in looking to the ministry as a possible vocation is not, where and how will life serve me the best, give me the largest and pleasantest returns, but where and how can I serve life the best. It seems, therefore, that the first thing to be urged upon those whom we would so gladly win to the sacred calling is the fact that the Christian ministry is a life of service. Whosoever would aspire to the minister's holy office let him first become your servant.

A mistaken conception here is likely, sooner or later, to cause the would-be minister the greatest trouble and keenest disappointment. If he begin the work of a minister, which he has elected for his life's vocation, with the secret expectation, be it ever so well disguised, that his pleasure and his happiness and his well-being are to be ministered unto, and fails to recognize that the great inspiring motive of his calling is that he may serve the pleasure and happiness and true well-being of others, he will very soon find himself in the midst of hard trials and disappointments. In the presence of those who have grown strong and happy and full of blessing in a true and successful ministry it may seem almost out of place to press this particular point. And yet may it not be possible that those whose ministry has been thus successful and happy, in urging it as a vocation upon their young friends, as they point out the things in which they have found great satisfaction and joy, may fail to make sufficiently plain the indispensable condition of that satisfaction and joy? It has become such a natural, spontaneous force in their own life and ministry that perhaps unconsciously they assume its presence already in the young man or woman whom they would attract to the ministry.

Of the minister surely must it be required that unless he is willing to forsake all else for the sake of serving his fellows he is not worthy to be a disciple of the Christ. Nor does it seem to me we should hesitate to make this characteristic of the ministerial calling perfectly plain, for fear it may deter some who might be enlisted in the service of the church.

Recalling my own experience in school and college, young men have been deterred from the ministry, not so much because the conditions were too hard as because they were made to appear too easy. Some unwise friend whispers that one can get started in the ministry much more easily and quickly than in medicine or law or business; that the minister is more readily admitted to places of social influence and prominence,—all of which may be very true, but the young man who is really bright and ambitious and eager to test the strength and spirit he feels within him, at once decides that the ministry is too easy for him; he wants to measure his ability by something in which the honors are honorable because of what they cost. As a matter of fact, although certain incidental results may appear more quickly and with less effort in the ministry than in some other vocations, the conditions of real and largest success are as exacting—it would be nearer the truth to say they are more exacting than in any other work to which a young man can give himself.

In the opinion of your five-years-old minister, there is no one thing which hinders the increase of the ministry so much as the notion, so prevalent in our parishes and in our colleges, that second and third rate men are good enough for the ministry; if there is a young man who is not likely to succeed at anything else, let him become a minister of the Gospel of Christ, of Paul, of Chrysostom, Savonarola, Luther, Calvin, Wesley, Robertson, Ballou, Channing, and Phillips Brooks! The best, those without spot or blemish in body, mind, heart and spirit, are none too good to be servants, ministers of the gospel. And surely the active service of the ministry to-day, the requirements for success in it, cannot be satisfied by anything short of the best. Holding in mind the great motive of the minister, which is to serve and help his people in every possible way, to encourage, to teach, to lead, to comfort and to save, we may now consider some of the special qualifications.

(1.) Of the physical qualifications least, perhaps, needs to be said. Physical health and strength are not to be overlooked. If the minister is to do his work as he ought to do it, the tax upon the mere bodily forces will be constant and severe. Away with the idea that the youth who has physical disabilities which debar him from other pursuits has in consequence a providential escape in the ministry! That may be, but it will not be because of his physical disability for some other calling, which he would rather choose if he had the needful health and strength. The instances of Kingsley, Robertson, Channing, and our own Dr. Thayer of beloved memory, show what a mighty mental and spiritual strength may do to compensate for physical weakness, but they furnish no proof that physical health and strength are not a very important consideration for the ministry. There is no special call to the ministry for the physically halt and blind and diseased. Christianity should be muscular as well as intellectual and spiritual.

(2.) As we come to the next qualification the demand for the best grows more emphatic. If success in the law demands mental ability and the most thorough mental preparation and training, success in the ministry demands this the more. The influence of the minister is lamentably restricted, if not absolutely forfeited, who is not able to be intellectually the quickener of his people. Pious dignity and ministerial propriety are no substitute for the needed mental equipment. Perhaps the average congregation may not appreciate the full value of strong mental power and thorough scholarship in the pulpit, but it does not take it more than three years at the outside—twelve months are usually sufficient—to discover the lack, if the brain is weak and but poorly furnished. The minister is called to serve some of the brightest and brainiest men and women in the community. They will be very kind to him in the beginning, far more so than he has any right to expect; they will overlook the crudeness and inconsistencies of the immature mind, provided it is an active, vigorous, growing mind.

But these thoughtful people who are such a tower of strength when they can be bound to the minister by a strong, sensible, scholarly ministry, cannot be much helped, and will be apt to lose their respect and love for the minister whose intellectual resources are deficient. And surely the need of mental power is no less in our ministry to those who are less thoughtful. Indeed, is not the demand for mental fertility and ingenuity to adapt the great truths and encouragements and comforts of the gospel to their needs: even more urgent? Will not this call for greater intellectual power on the part of the minister who is awake to the greatness of his calling and opportunity? And still more the variety of service which opens before the Christian requires the best intellectual faculty and furnishing possible. In this regard, certainly, the requirements of the ministry must appeal to the brightest of our young men and women. We shall not keep any away who would be a real benefit to the church by holding the intellectual standard high, and we surely shall be more likely to appeal to those who will prove of greatest benefit and largest usefulness. When, a few years ago, a more urgent call for ministers was made by the authorities of our church, it was a wise act that, at the same time, the standard of requirement in our theological schools was raised; and the result already justifies the wisdom. If you have a boy who ever thinks of the ministry as a possible vocation, help him to see that in it he will have ample opportunity and constant incitement to use the choicest gifts of mind.

(3.) Important as is the intellectual qualification, the necessity of choicest moral qualities is not a whit less. Now and then and for a season one may possibly be a popular preacher, may attract crowds by his eloquence, whose life morally considered is not worthy of the highest respect. But no such person can be a minister; such a one cannot be a servant of real strength and comfort to his people. To-day he who would aspire to the noble office of the ministry must be a man in whose moral integrity, and habitual uprightness of life the people have the utmost confidence. He must be such in this respect that those whom he would serve can swear by his honesty and his honor. Let a man have never so much of physical grace and magnetism, let him be never so richly endowed intellectually, and be deficient here, and he will fail of the best results as a minister. While, on the other hand, he may be weak and unimposing in personal attraction, he may have been unavoidably deprived of the more thorough mental equipment of the schools, and yet, because, as a man among men, people recognize that his life is guided only by true, honorable, unselfish motives, his ministry may be fruitful, blessed with richest harvests. This is a positive, manly, womanly quality, not to be confounded with anything effeminate, artificial. We want no ministry that is good simply because it is removed from and so insensible to the cares and anxieties and temptations which press so hard upon those who sit in the pews. Your people want a minister whom they know would be good in whatever circumstances he might be placed. Here, again, the Christian ministry appeals and offers attraction to what is worthiest in the best young men and women.

So far I have briefly hinted at qualifications which might be urged with almost equal force in the choice of any life-work, and have only insisted that the ministry offers inducements in the way of physical, mental and moral requirements to the true, ambitious young person equal to the requirements of any other profession or business. Let me suggest two other qualifications which are possibly more peculiar to the ministry, although really they ought to enter with force into the choice of any other vocation.

(4.) In the case of the true minister spirituality must be added to the qualifications of body, mind and conscience. One cannot sustain himself for the fullest duty and privilege of the ministry from even the most abundant fountains of intellectual and moral attainments. The true minister who longs for the "Well done, good and faithful servant," who is all aglow to serve his day and generation, will grow strong and patient and persevering only as he draws constant refreshment from that higher life in which he lives and moves and has his being. If he is to carry comfort to others, he must first be comforted himself. If he is to carry encouragement or truth or life to others, he must first receive these himself. The simple, trustful, hopeful spirit, which instinctively looks up for light and strength, how indispensable this is in the minister! How quickly will our ministry become dry and barren, our tasks irksome, our duties drudgery, if our spirits are not kindled by the divine impulse. The minister must have deep and real acquaintance with the life to which he invites others. He must interpret, in some degree, through his own experience, those wonderful words of his Master, "I and my Father are one."

(5.) And equally imperative with the clear understanding of what the ministry is, and the qualifications of body, mind, conscience and spirit for it, must be the call of God to it. Let the young man come to it only as he feels consciously and definitely that this is the thing which God would have him do. It must be because of the grace that was given him of God that he should be a minister of Christ Jesus. The beginning and the end of my talk must be joined together as the two prime considerations in deciding upon the Christian ministry for one's life-vocation. To see clearly what the ministry is, that it is a strong, intellectual, conscientious, spiritual service for others, that no nobler, more honorable enterprise can engage the best gifts and abilities of the best young men and women, than to aim, through the opportunities of the Christian ministry, to serve and help their fellows: and then to feel that there is a divine drawing of them to this ministry, that they cannot be quite true to themselves, quite faithful in the use of their talent in any other vocation,—these are the young men and women we want to answer the call for more ministers; they are the ones who ought to answer it. If the call could be interpreted to them so they could understand it, they would answer it as Isaiah and Paul answered it. Are there not, at least, fifteen such young men and women in the parishes of this convention to-day? There certainly are twice that number of places in our State waiting for just such ministers as these young people would make.

Having a sensible, true idea of what the ministry is, seeing in it the opportunity for the highest exercise of the choicest gifts of mind, conscience and spirit with which they have been endowed, and the Holy Spirit inviting and urging them to it, they would be the ministers to establish upon the firmest foundation fifteen new parishes within the borders of our convention. May it be that this convention needs these ministers as much as it needs the money for which its opportunity calls so urgently? May it be that we need the ministers first, and if we had them that the money would come more quickly and more easily? I would not magnify the ministry at the expense of any other legitimate life-calling. But I would insist that as a vocation it is worthy of earnest, thoughtful consideration by the brightest and best of our young men and women. And then, if its qualifications have been as well met, its rewards, though perhaps not exactly the same in kind, will be as rich and abundant and honorable.

World's Fair Notes

Around the base of the monument on the Lake Front on which a Columbus stands eagerly peering, his hands clutching as though a new world was within grasp, idle workmen were grouped, no whit less eager than the great discoverer, who seemed to be still leader, so well did the mute statue fit into the picture. It was an impressive scene to one standing aloof, viewing also the ground round about strewn with weary, discouraged mortals. A spectacle suggestive to art, and instructive—shall I say—to ethics.

I had gone thither purposely to mingle with the crowd, to catch, if I could, its temper and gauge the intelligence prevailing. As I turned on Michigan avenue I gazed unexpectedly on the now famous statue, concerning which I had heard few commendatory words. This first impression was wholly favorable. The thing is alive, anyway, I said to myself. I do not see why Columbus, nearing the new world, expectant, certain, tremulous with the excitement, should not have stood just so. Nor does it appear to me that the pedestal is too small. It is unmonumental, but why is that a fault? Perched there as on an eminence, unmindful, taking no thought of all else, looking only for the new land, what idea better? You may be told that a man as a work of art should pose in accord with certain rules of dignity and grace. There is no rule genius may not snap in two, so the great idea be let loose to win its own way. The sculptor has endowed his work with the spirit of the navigator. His Columbus is not on land—he is aboard ship and sailing!

The Lake Front—with due deference to contrary opinions—is, in my opinion, well “statued”—borrowing the phrase.

Must I now keep to art and take the “Whaleback”—for to go overland were now a profanity—to the Fair grounds?

I decide to draw nearer to the scene I have viewed with approval from afar, and keep to my original intention of “overhearing” if not of taking part in the conversations, debates, gesticulations that seem more pronounced and intelligible at shorter distances.

It does not take long to discover for one thing that the Labor Congress has already convened. There are two speakers, one on either side of the monument, and groups innumerable, where excited debates are in progress, with everybody entitled to the floor—if he can get it.

In the middle of a circle, so packed together that I can but just see his hat, sits (apparently he is sitting, but I cannot discover whether it is on a camp-stool which he carries about with him) a “single-taxer”—so he is described. I overhear him say: “What a man produces is his own; a tax on that is robbery.”

“But if the government is to be run, it’s got to be supported.”

“But don’t you see,” the “Taxerman”—as he is called by another listener—responds; “don’t you see, a tax on land will do that.”

“No, it’s no clearer ‘n mud. But what I do see is if we’re goin’ to have government, why don’t we stand up like men and say, ‘Here, take so much of what we produce.’ That’s the square way.”

“But—”

“But let me finish”—it is a lank, intellectual-looking fellow who has been speaking—“if you deny the right of government to tax, you deny the right of government to exist.”

The crowd surges. It is difficult to maintain one’s footing. I leave the “taxer” to his task, and turn to be accosted by a young man of twenty-five or thirty years—hard to tell, he is so begrimed.

“What do you think?” he demands.

“I came to listen,” I reply.

“Well, I can give you my opinion. There is too much faith in Man. It’s opening the World’s Fair Sundays that’s brought it all. These Fair people think they can run the universe. They forget there is an Almighty. They’re making the judgment day now.”

“But the Fair is prospering,” I ventured, “more than ever.”

“Oh, yes; the Fair gains, but the world outside don’t, and many a mouth that has drank Java coffee there will, in my opinion, go hungry for bread before God is done with them. The Fair ought to close tonight. Then the judgment of insulted heaven might be arrested.”

Many a raving as bad as that has been heard during the hot weather in pulpits, so I made no doubt but the fellow was sane enough on other topics.

“What do you work at—when you have work?” I asked.

“I’m a plasterer. But when there’s no building, of course there’s no plastering. But the Lord provides for those that fear Him. I’ve a friend.” etc.

My ear catches the German accent of some one speaking from the monument. The burden of his complaint is the threatened interference of the police with their meetings and parades. He is undoubtedly right. The law is on their side. But the Chief says, “We know that, but we are considering whether it is policy to permit this disturbance.” “Policy!” cries the speaker, “Oh, you see, the law is nothing; the police is everything. When they ope their mouths the law steps aside. Is that America? No! America is liberty secured by law, and that is despotism. They call us law breakers, anarchists! Judge ye between us!”

Now a silver-bearded old man mounts with difficulty to the platform of stone. “For God’s sake,” he cries, speaking deliberately, solemnly, “whatever you do, don’t breed a disturbance and spoil all.”

“He’s paid for saying that,” shouts a voice from the crowd.

Now a volunteer—a genuine capitalist, as he announces himself—and he is made bold to address labor because he believes “Capital and Labor are friends.”

“Friends!” growls a burly fellow, “and capital turns labor out to starve. Why don’t capital come round now and divvy if we’re such friends?”

The capitalist says something about patience, and assures his fellow-laborers that all is being done that can be done. “Ten days more and you go to work.”

“Yes, we’ll go in wagons and never work any more—before that time.”

Another group is listening to (when not commenting on) a letter in a daily paper that tells of a woman who has “no pity for the idle, for they can all get employment on farms.”

“That woman ought to go on exhibition,” quoth one, “as a curiosity. Such ignorance—such dense ignorance!”

“You’re right, she had. Suppose there is work somewhere for some of us, who knows where it is? Suppose you and I set out to find it, how long ‘fore we’d be nabbed up as tramps? Suppose we got into a house, got work, and got to bed? Ten to one, the woman would sit up all night, or sleep with one eye open, for fearin’ we git up and murder ‘em all, or run off with the house or a yoke of oxen.”

Another quietly: “It’s all very well to talk about laborers forsaking the country for the city. Laborers, like other people, go where they think there’s the most chance of steady and well-paid work. Besides, who of us, come down to the practical point, could go on a farm and be of any earthly good, except to pull weeds.”

“And we might not know a weed when we saw it,” facetiously said some one else.

“I know one weed when it’s rolled into shape—wish I had one now.”

The procession is decided on, following the American flag. About one third moves off with a heavy tread.

“I’d rather do two days’ work than walk about the city once like that,” one said, looking on thoughtfully.

"I'd cut my throat before I'll do it again—march through the muddy streets with the aristocracy looking at us from the upper windows."

"You're all right there," cries another. "Why, yesterday, nobody noticed us. Big crowd gaping at us on the City Hall steps, not a cheer, not a hoot, not a yell. What kind of a reception was that for honest workmen starving? It was like marching by a cemetery."

"I will tell you what I think, men," began a man with a fine, intelligent face. "If we should gather our largest procession and march quietly, without banners, and without saying one word, that might have some good effect. It would be self-respectful, and win us more of the kind of sympathy we need."

"There's some people as can't keep shut anyhow, and I guess I'm one of 'em," responded the man who craved even a "hoot." Just then the tally-ho coach went by blaring its trumpet. "There go the 'ristocrats," he cried.

And now my young man who "put not faith in man but in high heaven" pulled at my coat sleeve.

"It's the Fair, you see."

The Study Table

LIFE OF REV. SAMUEL WILLARD, D. D., of Deerfield, Mass. Edited by his Daughter. Boston, Geo. H. Ellis, 1892. $1.50. — For three braveries this good man was remarkable. He was probably the very first minister to whom a faithful Evangelical "Council" refused ordination on account of his Unitarian proclivities. This was in 1807, some years before the dreaded name was accepted by the heretics or the set debate began which split the church of the Puritans in two. Deerfield had suffered much as a frontier town during the French and Indian wars, and—"should I be settled here, it will again become a frontier town, the frontier of liberal principles," the young man predicted. And for many years it was so. He was the leper preacher of the beautiful river valley, from whom the "sound" ministers kept far aloof. But the deeper heroism of the man came out in a more personal experience. After a few years of service he was stricken with partial, which presently became total, blindness. During the forty years of it his daughter recollects no murmur and no melancholy over the privation. After a while it obliged him to resign his pulpit, but he preached more or less all his long life. He became our first "blind preacher," our "Parson Milburn,"—extemporizing his sermons, committing to memory his Bible chapters, and gradually learning, not the hymns, but the hymn-book, by heart! Not only this: he walked hundreds of miles, he gardened, he climbed his apple trees to prune them, he sawed and split his wood. No wonder the daughter writes: "I think no member of his family had sufficient nerve to watch him while engaged in splitting wood, though he never met with injury but once in this way." A blind man's verdict on disaster is worth remembering: "A great part of the evils which befall these frail bodies of ours may be traced not to outward dangers, but to want of caution. For thirty-eight years I have had no clear vision, and for twenty-four have been in total darkness, and still have scarcely had one fall that gave me even a moment's pain." Thus he conquered his conqueror. His third bravery was perhaps even more remarkable: it was a deliberate, systematic experiment at the age of seventy-four to prove the truth of Cicero's word that "aged people need not lose their faculties as they do if they would continue to use them." So he now increased his stock of Bible chapters to one hundred learnt verbatim, mastered the rest of that hymn-book, with 518 hymns in it, locked into himself four books of Euclid's theorems and problems, and, attacking the old catalogues of seven leading colleges of New England, presently could tell the college degree and the public honors of all the graduates who attained distinction. A necrology incarnate! And on his eighty-first birthday he passed an almost perfect examination in his quaint study courses. He was a year older when he said, "I have mental work laid out for ten years more." The dear companion of this long night of blindness died only a year or two before him, and she helped him begin what he probably considered his best contribution to the world's progress,—a "Family Psalter," containing 457 hymns of his own composing, fifty or more being written in his eighty-second year. But we suspect the brave old singer was better than his songs. W. C. G.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION has recently issued as Nos. 21 and 22 of the second volume of their penny series of "Tracts for the Times," Rev. R. A. Armstrong's recently delivered essay on "The New Orthodoxy," and Rev. William Gaskell's "Strong Points of Unitarian Christianity." As the former was published in UNITY Church-Door Pulpit about a fortnight after it was first read, and UNITY's high appreciation of its value then expressed, we need say nothing more of it now. Mr. Gaskell's exposition is manifestly addressed to the orthodox, and seems designed to lead them to the truth by very easy stages, the three points enumerated being (1) that Unitarian Christianity has the advantage over opposing systems in that its fundamental principles are "set forth in the very words of Scripture"; (2) that it is "the faith of the universal church"; and (3) that its "principles have their root in human nature."

PUTNAM'S series of the "Story of the Nations" is being translated into the Marathi and Gujarati languages, the volumes on "Egypt," "Persia," and "Turkey" having already been published. The work has been undertaken by the tutor to H. R. H. the Prince Gaikwar of Baroda, British India, at the national expense. The companion series of "Heroes of the Nations" is now under consideration for a similar translation.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE NEW WORLD, for the last quarter, dated June, 1893, seems to the writer the strongest number of this very able review. Professor Morgan's "Evolution—A Restatement," and Dr. Peters' "Development of the Psalter" are the most powerful of the contributed articles as regards depth and scholarship. The former contains a great deal packed in small compass, and is of interest to every thinker of our day; the latter is a very valuable contribution to one of the most difficult problems in Old Testament criticism. Besides these there is an article by one of the editors, Professor Everett, whose fine poetic instincts fit him particularly well to discuss "Tennyson and Browning as Spiritual Forces," and articles on "Modern Explanation of Religion," by Hermann Schultz, of Goettingen; "The Social Movement in French Protestantism," by Elisee Bost,—an interesting account of the Christian Socialism movement in that country; "The Triple Standard in Ethics," by George Batchelor; "The Congregational Polity," by J. H. Crooker; and an appreciative estimate of the late Andrew Preston Peabody by the liberal Baptist divine, Dr. Moxom. But the great value of this Review is in its sixty pages of book reviews—careful examinations, by competent scholars, of the important recent publications treating of religion, ethics and theology, and kindred fields of thought, embracing twenty-two works, ranging from Bosanquet's "History of Aesthetic," through Rodolfo Lanciani's "Pagan and Christian Rome," to Prof. Mitchell's exegesis of "Amos." In Prof. Peabody's review of Jacob Riis' "Children of the Poor," he specially commends the author for his protest against institutionalism as applied to the care of unfortunate children. "Against the whole tendency," says the professor, "Mr. Riis, in common with most skilled observers, makes his protest."

IN THE COSMOPOLITAN for August, the leading article is "The Intercontinental Railway," by W. D. Kelly, the engineer in charge of the surveying corps sent out under the auspices of the International American Conference to survey a line south from Quito, Ecuador. The country through which Mr. Kelly passed is for the most part terra incognita to civilization; and partly on this account, partly because of the greatness of the undertaking he was engaged upon, his paper is of absorbing interest. The great variety in climate and peoples found in this area, the great natural wealth, vegetable and mineral, of portions of it, and the historic and anthropological interest associated with the region of the Incas' Peruvian civilization, where today, in the interior, thousands of natives preserve their own partial civilization regardless of the changes wrought by the Spanish-American civilization on their borders,—all combine to present a most inviting field for students of all kinds in this land. Other contributions to this number are Prof. Boyesen's "Conversations with Bjornson," the concluding paper of Camille Flammarion's "Last Days of the World," a very interesting description by Poultney Bigelow of Berlin's method of cleaning the city and utilizing the sewage in the transformation of sandy barrens into rich farms, and many other good things.

THE fourth number of Employer and Employed, the Boston quarterly devoted to profit-sharing, contains the second paper by F. H. Giddings on "The Relation of Recent Economic Theory to Profit-Sharing," a helpful presentation of the subject; a discussion by Mr. R. H. Towne, of the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Company, of the specific method of co-operation which he designates gain-sharing, in which the effort is made to give to each employe just such share of the gain as is directly affected by his particular efforts; a review of Mr. T. W. Bushill's book on profit-sharing (Mr. Bushill being an English profit-sharing employer); and other matter on the general subject. The subscription price is only forty cents a year, and the magazine may be obtained by all interested from Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin street. We wish the number interested in the subject were larger than it is.

DEMAREST'S FAMILY MAGAZINE for September is a beautiful number, devoting some thirty-odd pages, profusely and very handsomely illustrated, to the Columbian Exposition. It is the best Exposition number of its kind that we have yet seen, notwithstanding that most of the illustrated magazines are now full of the Exposition. As with the other publications of this date, much space is given to pictures of distinguished Orientals who are to take part in the Parliament of Religions.

IN THE ADVANCE for August 17 is an admirable article by Rev. J. W. Sutherland on "Some Simple Means of Increasing a Pastor's Efficiency," in which he urges the importance of putting the laymen to work on committees, etc., even though it be somewhat easier in the first instance for the minister to do everything himself.

THE REFORM ADVOCATE for August 12 contains an interesting and scholarly article on the "Economic Aspect of the Persecution of the Jews in Russia," it being a paper read by Charles S. Bernheimer before the post-graduate seminary in political economy at the University of Pennsylvania.

INFORMATION WANTED.

EDITOR UNITY:

Can any of your readers tell me the author of the poem in which are found the words: "For all the boundless universe is Life—there are no dead (or, there is no Death)"?

S. ELSBY.

Milwaukee, Wis.

It Isn't "The Same As" and it isn't "as good as," no matter what any grocer may tell you about any imitation of Pearline. He makes more money on it—but do you want to ruin your clothes for his profit? The imitations of Pearlina are sold at a lower price, naturally, for they're not as good. Some are dangerous, and would be dear at any price.

There's nothing equal to Pearlina, the original washing compound, which saves the most work in washing and cleaning, and doesn't do harm. Pearlina is never peddled, and offers no prizes. Every package is a prize in itself. Beware of imitations. 374 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

THROWING KISSES.

Dorothy, whose winsome ways
 All who know her can but praise,
 Has completely won my heart
 By this simple little art—
 Throwing kisses when she passes.

Dorothy is quite complete
 In her childish art so sweet;
 If, walking out, we chance to meet,
 Me she never fails to greet,
 Throwing kisses when she passes—
 Throwing kisses straight at me,
 Laughing in her baby glee.

Dorothy, oh, sweetest maiden!
 Oft my heart is heavy laden,
 But the gloom has vanished, quite,
 Let Dorothy but come in sight,
 Throwing kisses when she passes.

All the darkness of the day
 By her sweet smile's chased away,
 All the earth has grown more gay
 When Dorothy has chanced this way,
 Throwing kisses when she passes—
 Throwing kisses straight at me,
 Laughing in her baby glee.

COUNTRY SKETCHES.

"Verdantly let Shamrocks keep their sainted dust;
 The bad man's death it well becomes to mourn,
 Not so the just. —Father Prout.

"Peace"—with the word come two pictures. An autumn day with hills stretching away into infinity, their boundary line only hidden by the deep blue haze which seems dropped to shut off earthly vision from glories too great for mortal eyes.

The meadows which but lately waved with wheat present from a distance an unbroken surface of faintest gold. The woods beyond seem the birthplace of the brooding spirit of stillness which has enwrapped this sweet country town on this long past day. In their depths one can hear the tinkle of a dropped nut from the overhanging tree to the placid brook below, or the drowsy drone of the grasshopper; and the insistent whirring of the reaper in some far off field might be heard, though it has become part of the silence, so regularly does its beat fall on the ear, like the ticking of the unnoticed family clock.

Peace everywhere—and at sunset, down the long lane which stretches from the meadow, come two figures in the autumn of life. Peace embodied is before you. They have grown old together, these brothers, and age has touched them both with tranquil beauty, placing her crown of silver on their heads and etching their faces with the delicate hand of an artist. The pasture lies behind them, breathing too of quiet and rest. The cows chewing their evening cud of contentment with half-shut eyes, the waving shadows of the dipping boughs, brocading the fence corners, the ghosts of dead flowers floating past, all suggest that night is creeping toward them with her poppy draught. And carrying the swinging pail of milk on a staff between them, these two bent figures pass serenely on their downward path, mutually supported. It was always so with these two loving hearts. When they were young they wiped childish tears from each other's eyes with their brown pinafores, and as this abiding love grew with years, together their names were placed in the father's will, joint heirs of their double portion.

Love came to them, but while to one the sweet boon was not denied, from the other death snatched the tender form and spilled the cup of ecstasy. Together again they bore this grief, and the healing touch to the aching heart was a brother's. So it came to pass that manhood found them still together: one with a home and wife and children; the other forgetting his own sorrow in self-sacrificing devotion. Sometimes my childish fancy saw on that aged and resigned face a look of yearning sorrow. There came to him visions of what might have been. A sweet young face looked at him from the stars. A face with wide, gray eyes and misty hair, never old, but eternally young, while he sat there bent and gray. It was then that a hand clasped his. It, too, was old with heavy veins, but its touch was full of healing.

"Brother," he would murmur, "we have each other. Be not cast down. There is one greater that does what is right." And on the silence which followed there breathed consolation.

In all perfectly sincere natures there seems to run a vein of simplicity—a love for the natural pleasures of this bountiful earth. One of the sunny pictures of these lives is their enjoyment of simple things, their long tramps together, sometimes bringing home luscious blackberries, dewy and ripe—never since have any tasted so sweet; or again brown nuts, bearing with them the atmosphere of the spicy woods. They were nature lovers, and did Nature ever "betray the heart that loved her?"

With deeply religious natures and belonging to a small community where orthodoxy was held strictly to its most narrow meaning, they did not "join the church,"—a most necessary act in their neighbors' opinion,—but in their great simplicity feeling unworthy, and holding the conviction that they could not take upon themselves vows so deep and awful as those which were unthinkingly responded to by childish voices, they lived up to the highest interpretation of the divine law and found peace.

In the quaint old church one might see every Sunday these two devout faces, and if a deeper note vibrated through the old songs that wailed up to the great Father, I always knew what voices were swelling the thanksgiving. How many Sundays when, with weary little brain, I have alternated between counting the thousand tiny panes of glass which decorated the window, each elaborately retouched with a coat of varnish to keep curious eyes from straying to diverting subjects outside, and wondering why the dear old minister was put way up in that little wooden box, or whether Mrs. Smith felt happy to think she was going to heaven when her wild boy, who died unrepentant, would be suffering in torment, I have gained instant faith that all would be right in glancing at these two noble heads, serene and undismayed.

But there came a day when the old bell tolled deeply and long, when down the narrow aisles of the old church filed a sad procession, and as the wheezy old organ once more responded to the player's touch and "Jerusalem the Golden" chimed in with the bell's notes no rich voice rolled forth its sustaining harmony; for one voice was silenced in death and the other in sorrow. Outside the world was palpitating with life. A robin was singing its sad sweet refrain in the locust tree by the window, the bees were buzzing their staggering way homeward, and the scent of the budding flowers was wafted in with every breeze. Life, life everywhere, and life immortal for the soul which had fled from that silent form. But to the loving heart pierced by that severing sword of death, what consolation? One look at the rapt face answered the question. Exalted sorrow held a place there, but not blind despair.

"He won't live through this," said the garrulous but kindly tongue of a neighbor; "they've allus stuck side by side; where one went t'other followed. It beats the world."

But he lived his allotted time, as we all shall, and one May day, when the earth seemed touched by the finger of God, and clouds sailed across the sky like heavenly chariots for released souls, he broke the chain which bound him to the earth, and, breathing "My brother, my savior," he crossed the boundary line.

A LITTLE GIRL'S PHILOSOPHY.

"Spell toes," said the mother, who was teaching her little daughter, seven years old, to spell.

"T-o-z-e," answered the child.

"No, dear, that is not right. T-o-e-s spells toes."

"But it sounds like t-o-z-e."

"I know it, but you cannot go by the scund."

Then, in order to enforce this proposition, the mother called on her daughter to spell froze.

"F-r-o-e-s," said the child.

"No, you're wrong again. This time we do use the z and spell the word f-r-o-z-e."

"Huh!" gouted the child.

"Now spell rose," said the mother.

The child hesitated. Finally she said: "I don't know whether to say r-o-z-e or r-o-e-s, and really I don't know that either way would be right."

"Spell it r-o-s-e," said the mother, "though there is another word pronounced just like it that's spelled r-o-e-s. That word is the name of the spaw of fishes."

The poor little child looked very miserable.

"Just one more word," said the mother. "Tell me how you spell blows."

"Well," said the child, who had had quite enough nonsense, as she viewed it, from her mother, and had suddenly made up her mind to pay back in kind. "I spell it three ways. I spell it b-l-o-s-e for breakfast, b-l-o-e-s for dinner, and b-l-o-z-e for supper."

"I spell it b-l-o-w-s all the time," said the mother.

The child said nothing for a minute or two. Then, looking up, she solemnly remarked:

"I think, mamma, that the English language was made for persons very well educated."

Notes from the Field

Pacific Coast.—Rev. C. W. Wendte, Superintendent of the American Unitarian Association for the Pacific Coast, will leave Oakland, Cal., on the 21st of August, visit points in Oregon and Washington requiring attention, preach on August 27 at Olympia, and on September 3 take part in the installation of Rev. E. M. Fairfield at Spokane. After a lecture at Helena, Mont., he will journey direct to Boston, where he will remain five days in consultation on Pacific coast church business, and meet any brethren desiring to confer with him from September 10 to 16. Thence to Chicago and the Parliament of Religions for a week, returning to California via Arizona points in time to help dedicate the new Unitarian Church at Pomona. During his six weeks' absence Rev. Mrs. U. G. B. Pierce will be in charge of the parish at Oakland.

—Christian Register.

Detroit, Minn.—Although this lake region is over the line, we learn from the Universalist that the North Dakota State Union of Universalists held its meetings there the last of July. State Superintendent F. A. Jenkins, of Fargo, N. D., opened the meeting. Rev. J. N. Parker, of the same place, made the prayer, and Rev. L. F. Porter, of Anoka, Minn., preached the sermon. At 4 p. m., Rev. Miss Helen G. Putnam made a very well-received address, which was followed by short addresses from Rev. Mrs. Porter, Rev. Mr. Parker, and Superintendent Jenkins. On the following Sunday morning the Unitarian missionary again addressed the Union, the subject of Miss Putnam's sermon being "Social Purity and Temperance." At 3 p. m. Rev. Mr. Porter preached, and at 8 p. m. his wife conducted the final services.

Jewish Department of Chautauqua.—Dr. Henry Berkowitz, of Philadelphia, has in hand the incorporation into the Chautauquan work of the future a department for Jewish studies, and it is pleasing to learn that Dr. Vincent and the other Evangelical Christians who control Chautauqua University are heartily co-operating with the Rabbis, and propose to so modify the requirements of their course as to adapt it to Jewish students. In the Reform Advocate of August 19 is a paper by Dr. Berkowitz on the subject.

A Visitor from India.—The following postal card, received from the Rev. Robert Spear, of London, will be of interest to the readers of UNITY: "The Rev. Bazarka, of Bombay, a minister of the Brahmo Samaj of Bombay, has been preaching for many of us in England. He will visit Chicago in September. Please interest yourself in him and find him some pulpit work for a few weeks. He is worthy of all kindness."

Chicago, Ill.—Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Allen is in Chicago on his way east from San Diego, and the Rev. Wm. J. Potter, President of the Free Religious Association, and Rev. N. M. Mann, of Omaha, Neb., are in the city. Mr. Potter is here to attend the Parliament of Religions, and will remain about a month. Miss Susan B. Anthony made a call at the Unitarian headquarters at 175 Dearborn street, in company with Rev. Ida Hultin, last week. For church services in the city we refer our readers to our Announcement column.

Announcements

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AT THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

FROM THE PRELIMINARY ANNOUNCEMENT.

Inasmuch as the Free Religious Association of America was really the first to inaugurate on its platform, twenty-six years ago, the idea of a "World's Parliament of Religions," it will be eminently proper, and in accordance with the fitness of things, for it to take part in this larger Parliament to be held in Chicago as a part of the World's Fair, recognizing as it does in its projected convening a "consummation devoutly to be wished;" for it is one of the most significant events of the age, and it may be productive of vast results to the future development of religion. The full significance of that assembly of delegates from all the leading religions of the world will not be manifest, however, nor the logical results of the event be deduced in their completeness, without the meeting of the Free Religious Association to point to what lies beyond a temporary Parliament of Religions. It is very much to have the religions of the world thus brought together on the same platform for a presentation of their beliefs and aims by their own representatives, without controversy or debate. But are the representatives of the religions, there amicably gathered, to separate for their respective countries with the same controversial aggressiveness against each other which they have hitherto manifested, and with the same mutually antagonistic claims to exclusive supernatural inspiration and guidance? The Free Religious Association is the one general religious body in this land which, following the inevitable logical trend of the scientific study of the religions of mankind, has publicly proclaimed the possibility of a new and permanent religious fellowship and cooperation on the basis of the "scientific study of religion and ethics," free reason and of a common humanity,—in lieu of the old theological bases, which, however stringent or attenuated the Dogma, were laid in alleged revelations through miraculous books or persons. We urge, therefore, the members and friends of the Association to rally at this gathering in full numbers. And we cordially invite all who are in sympathy with the general aim and purpose of the Association, whether they have heretofore acted with us or not, to be present at the twenty-sixth Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association, which will be held in Hall No. 31,

Art Palace, World's Fair, Chicago, Ill., on Wednesday, September 20th, 1893.

WM. J. POTTER, Pres.
D. G. CRANDON, Sec'y.

THE MORNING SESSION,
 beginning at 10 o'clock, will be presided over by Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, one of the Vice President and founders of the Association, who will make the introductory address. By request of the Directors, the President, William J. Potter, will then give a written address entitled: "The Free Religious Association,—its Twenty-six Years and their Meaning." Dr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot will follow, on "The Scientific Method in the Study of Religion." Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, of Providence, R. I., on "The Free Religious Association as the expounder of the Natural History of Religion," and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, on "Religious Progress." Other speakers have been invited and will be announced later.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION
 will begin at 2:30 o'clock, and will be devoted to the subject, "Unity in Religion." Minot J. Savage, of Boston, will open the subject, followed by Dr. Edward McGlynn of New York, Mangasar Mangasarian of Chicago, Rabbi Hirsch of Chicago, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney of Boston, and others yet to be announced.

THE FESTIVAL,
 with supper, speeches, music, and social opportunities, will be held in one of the large hotels of Chicago, or at the Union League Club (the place to be definitely announced in the Chicago daily press). Col. T. W. Higginson will preside and welcome the guests, and Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, M. J. Savage, Francis E. Abbot, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, William J. Potter, Paul K. Frothingham, Mangasar Mangasarian, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. McGlynn, and others are expected to speak. Reception from 6 to 7 o'clock. Supper at 7 o'clock. Tickets for the supper to be procured at the convention, and of Secretary D. G. Crandon.

Editorial

If men and women would wake with to-morrow's sun to will the good which now lies like a half-formed vision in their minds, the wide earth might be a scene of Justice, and every city of our land transformed into a City of Light.
—W. M. Salter.

THIS is Labor week. Monday was Labor day, and for a week back the Labor Congresses have been in session. We trust that the sermon we publish this week will help some to realize the value of the common people, and wish with all our heart that something may come from this Columbian year, with its congresses and other broadening influences, to teach the world how to be just to those who, bearing the brunt of the world's work, enjoy so little of its prosperity.

It is encouraging to find that with few exceptions the religious denominational press is hardly less warm than the secular press in its commendation of the several recent instances of substantial exchanges of brotherly services between such far-removed bodies as the Roman Catholic and the Evangelical Protestant churches. Many of the old barriers must be down when a Baptist congregation offers the use of its church to an unfortunate Roman Catholic parish, and when the latter's priest gracefully accepts.

THE assertions of the conservative Universalists that their brethren who advocated co-operation with Unitarians were humiliating their own body, because the Unitarians did not wish it, alleging that all overtures had come from Universalists, have recently been answered by members of both denominations, who, by citing official utterances of Unitarian bodies, have shown the falsity of this contention. The last reply of this kind is from Rev. J. T. Sunderland, editor of the Unitarian, in a letter to the (Universalist) Gospel Banner. It is worth noticing that several writers have disproved the erroneous assertions, each citing different facts.

It is pleasant to find the American press and people acquiescing so frankly and good-naturedly in the just decision of the chief questions submitted in the Behring Sea controversy, notwithstanding that that decision runs counter to the selfish interests and official contention of the United States. It seems to us that the American judge who served on the committee and voted faithfully for international justice regardless of the national interest and prejudice is especially deserving of honor, and we believe that our people are prouder of him and better pleased with him than if he had followed the popular clamor.

WE have given considerable space in this week's paper to the preliminary program of the Parliament of Religions, for we know that our readers are deeply interested in it. We have received so many inquiries about it that we are confident our friends will not complain because much they would like to see has been omitted to make room for this. We hope that they will preserve this issue of UNITY, as we shall probably not be able to republish in full the various programs which appear this week, although we shall endeavor to note such modifications as may be announced from time to time. The full program of the Parliament of Religions, containing the programs of the several denominational congresses, will be published next week, and will contain not less than two hundred pages. UNITY readers will appreciate, therefore, that it is impossible for us to lay it before them.

TWO BUDDHIST priests, wearing the yellow mantle which makes holy the abnegation of the mendicant in the eyes of many millions, recently sat in a Chicago church and listened to a sermon in which the minister tried to fit Moses and his message into universal religion. One of the priests was venerable, the other youthful; both tried hard to appropriate something of that strange service in a foreign tongue. It was little enough, doubtless, that they got from the words of the preacher. "Too deep and too far, but I like to be here," was the confession of the elder. The occasion was significant in this to other than these representatives of Asiatic piety,—the best thing in that and every service was not dependent upon Saxon syllables. The preacher may have talked English, but the "service," whatever it was, was in a common language, with which the Japanese, Australian, and American present were all more or less conversant. The great words are the same in all speech, the language of the heart is one, as "The lovers of the light are one."

We regret that we did not receive the interesting program of the Jewish Denominational Congress, held last week, in time to lay it before our readers. The program of the Jewish Women's Congress, to be held Sept. 3 et seq., was published in our notes from the field some weeks ago, and by request we repeat it in this issue in our announcement column.

In the early discussions that led to the organization of the Parliament of Religions, it was facetiously characterized as an "interplanetary conclave of prophets." The squib has gone around the world, across the seas and back again, and now, as we are approaching such realization as it is possible for mortals to know of their divinest dreams, we would like to lift this bit of humor in philosophy, overlook the wit, and find in it profound philosophy. The conclave is not only interplanetary but interstellar. The remotest star is allied to this thirst after fellowship that is now crossing the seas from all climes and traveling toward Chicago, and soon to send its flashes of love around the world. Whatever may be the outcome, the parliament will be the noblest suggestion yet born out of the heart of man, the divinest dream that ever left the human soul toward a realization. And unless there is some world peopled with conscious souls more expert in commerce, more enamored of science, more imbued with love, less distracted by selfishness, less befooled and befogged by bigotry, than we are here on the earth, this parliament of religions will be the very biggest thing in God's universe up to date. And through it we are to pass into still greater things beyond. Once more and for the last time we appeal to our readers to welcome and appropriate this festival of love with befitting appreciation.

We talk much of faith and duty, but with most of us it is difficult to have faith that if we do the right in the first thing that comes to us we shall not prejudice our chances to accomplish what seems to us a greater good in a more distant field. This perhaps accounts for the neglect of President Cleveland's administration to act in the spirit of the civil service reform. We believe that our executive desires and seeks the highest welfare of the nation: and it is not wonderful that in such troublous times he should feel that he cannot devote his attention to such a question as the civil service reform, when such great questions of industrial and financial policy are demanding solution. While these considerations may justify him in giving less attention to the matter than he would in more happy and prosperous times, it does not excuse him from deviating from the principles of a pure, business-like, non-partisan civil service administration whenever the question is brought to his attention. The Civil Service Chronicle is doing a valuable service to the republic in ventilating the abuses of which Secretaries Carlisle and Quincy are guilty, and in keeping this important question before the public. May that day be not far distant when magistrates and people shall realize that justice and righteousness are the truest expediency, and that our whole duty is to take the next step forward aright. Ours is the present, not the future. This is the meaning of "Take no thought for the morrow." We must live up to the highest we know. If we are thus true to ourselves to-day, we need have no fear as to the future.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS.

UNITY does not deal much in personalities. Its limited space excludes the notices of the births, deaths and marriages, which, after all, represent far more pivotal interests in life than do the church dedications, ministerial settlements, conferences, etc., which go under the heading of "Religious Intelligence" in the denominational papers. There is something wrong in the perspective that relates church gossip, theological bickerings, and the politics of conferences more to the realities and interests of religion than those things that are related to the woes and joys of the hearthstone,—the hopes and joys of parentage, the solemn perplexities of home-making.

Perhaps the reticence of the newspaper columns concerning these matters is to be accounted for by an unconscious recognition of this law of pre-eminence. The profound things are not the things about which newspapers and society drop into easy gossip. Theology deals with matters of opinion, that which touches the outer rim of being, and hence it can be reported. Love and the anxieties and hopes that spring therefrom are central; of these it is hard to speak.

Whether this silence is wise or otherwise, we venture to depart from our custom long enough to join in the silver wedding congratulations which were extended on Sunday evening, Aug. 27, to Mr. and Mrs. Myron Leonard in their pleasant home at 6600 Ellis avenue, Chicago. The greetings of the friends and relatives who were able to be present were augmented by the written word which came from a wide circle of friends, many of them well known to our UNITY readers.

Mrs. Ellen T. Leonard, who for the last twelve years has had charge of the Home Department in our paper, and before that was editor of LITTLE UNITY, that excellent dream, as long as it existed, has given such an amount of quiet diligence and loving thought in this and other obscure ways of helpfulness to our little paper that we are glad of an opportunity to mention her name and to confess our editorial indebtedness for many services rendered. But her direct touch in UNITY has been but a small portion of her contribution to our cause. For many years she was secretary of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society, during most of which time she was home-keeper and care-taker at the Western headquarters. Under her shaping hand the Sunday School Institute came into being. In all these ways and many more she has been the Mother Faithful and the Sister Competent, unappreciated because we have had so few opportunities of knowing how hard it would be to get along without her. Others have found home duties, aches and ailments, personal ambitions and neighborly interferences excuses for an occasional neglect of duty and absence from their posts. But Mrs. Leonard, carrying a large measure of all of these, has become the inevitable and the unfailing. Of her the boy's definition of salt is applicable: "It is what makes the potato taste bad when it isn't there."

If one is at a loss to know how all this efficiency and service has been possible in the home, in All Souls Church, for UNITY and the causes represented at the Western Unitarian Headquarters, in spite of frail and failing health, a part of the explanation is found in the "Helps to High Living," which heads the Home Department in UNITY, and which, as we have reason to know, is to some of our readers—probably our best—the most valuable help found in our weekly visit. These helps are compiled by Mrs. Leonard, and they show the bee-like instinct that gathers honey, stores it, and in time of need lives on the same.

There is no reason for confining the anniversary congratulations to the bride, for the groom has not only consented to and participated in all this service, but he has himself been a valiant and vigilant servant of the cause. For four or more years he was Treasurer of the Western Unitarian Conference, and that during the darkest and most tempestuous years of its life and the fact that it weathered the storm is due in great measure to his efficiency.

Having taken so many liberties, we venture on still another by printing the following lines, to which UNITY and its readers would pronounce a hearty Amen!

Together down life's road, O friends,
Just five and twenty years
You've walked; sometimes the way was bright,
Sometimes 'twas wet with tears.

And, backward looking, mountain peaks
Above the valley's mists,
Touched by the light of tender deeds,
Shine out like amethysts.

The little graves that scattered lie
Like milestones on the way,
Are sacred spots marked by Love's cross,
Where Hope still stops to pray.

O love that lightens, grief that binds,
And peace through pain made sweet,
Thou shalt through coming years
make smooth
The way for these dear feet!

A MAN WHO "TRUTHED IT IN LOVE."*

The memoir of Rufus Ellis, a book now nearly two years old, is before us. The two mottoes on the title-page are perfect for this man: "Gone into the world of light," and "Truthing in love,"—this last in the Greek. The one hints his quality of life, and the other the method of his mind. "Light" was what one always felt when looking at his clear face,—a light that seemed to strike through from some spotless source within. When such persons "go into a world" of it, the going is rather the vanishing of a partition between a lesser and a larger world already one. Yet was he both in and of this earth of ours, a manful worker in it, a very real and vital force of it. The work he chose, or the work that chose him, was ministry. First he ministered in Rochester, N. Y., for a year, where he established the Unitarian Church in 1842; then in Northampton, Massachusetts, where his ten years left a blessed memory; and then in the First Church of Boston, whither he was called in 1853, solely on his record, preaching not a single sermon as a candidate, but stipulating for independent utterance, since he knew—had not the retiring pastor told him?—he was going to "a church and people who prefer not to be shaken."

Of the three types of minister—pastor, preacher, public worker,—he best made real the pastor's ideal, that which takes most self-surrender, least self-assertion. Homes welcomed him, the bed-side knew him, the heart already chastened watched for him. But he was organizer, too; under his lead First Church became a fountain of refreshing charities amid the tightening city. And for his preaching, the fact that Edward Everett (twice in his seat each Sunday), Charles Francis Adams, Prescott the historian, and Rev. Nathaniel Frothingham sat listening in the pews, is voucher that it must have been of some high order, though not of the "shaking" sort. But this brings us to the other motto,— "truthing it in love." He was under small temptation to preach the shaking sermons; for it is application of principle rather than the principles themselves that startle and disturb, and Mr. Ellis, by instinct moderate, gentle and discreet, dealt with the general rather than the concrete.

For instance, he hated slavery, but was no abolitionist; so, though he said his word upon this subject now and then, and manfully insisted that he should, when one who deemed discussion of it in the pulpit dangerous to "pure religion and morality" threatened to quit his pew, yet probably under him no pew-door ever twitched upon its hinges in that church. He "truthed it in love." Was it so much in love that he under-truthed? Whatever the answer be, his method certainly made him a man of the charities, not a man of the reforms.

His real force and independence were better shown in his theological position,—a position that made him at last an interesting, if not an influential, figure in Unitarian history. Beginning his ministry in the midst of the "Transcendental" excitement, he belonged neither to the old Unitarianism nor the new. To speak roundly, he accepted the negations of the one without its affirmations, and the affirmations of the other without its negations; that is to say, he was no Trinitarian and no Calvinist, but the miracle-proved deism and revelation of the earlier Unitarians by no means satisfied his spiritual sense; on the other hand the denial of miracle and the seeming patronage of Christ by the Transcendentalists, their "Christianity without Christ," greatly offended him, but their theory of direct contact, spirit with Spirit, soul with Over-Soul, was nearly his very own. Add to the higher Transcendentalism a mystic reverence for the historic Christ as the unique expression of the Divine within the limits of the Human, and we have his mind-horizon. He wrote a friend in 1857, "We think of getting up a new denomination, the fundamental doctrine being the incarnation of the Divine Word in the man Jesus,—this the great Article. I believe it would unite multitudes of many sects who are divided by the old technics." Then he much loved "the dear churchly things and ways." In other words, he occupied nearly the position of advanced orthodoxy to-day. He was Unitarian by accident of start, but never cared for the denomination. Had he been Episcopalian or Evangelical by start, he would probably have remained so without caring much for the denomination then. His hope, his aim, was higher than denominational; it was, to see all liberal Christians united in one fold,—only they must be "Christians." All this made him, among the Unitarians of his generation, a conservative among liberals; he counted among the stationary rather than the progressive elements. Had the accident of start been on the other side, he would have been a liberal among conservatives; and then his gifts of spirit, mind and business faculty might possibly have made him a leader, and certainly an element of progress. Did his friend at the Divinity School, Frederic D. Huntington, now Bishop of Central

New York, do better by becoming Episcopalian? Doubtless each was loyal to his own best self, one in going, the other in staying. As it was, Mr. Ellis did his good by meeting more than half way the liberal spirits among his evangelical brethren. He had—few Unitarians beside him have had—orthodox exchanges; among all his friends such men as Dr. Drinan of Providence and George MacDonald seem to have been most at one with him in thought; and it was Yale, not Harvard, that gave him his "D. D."

To the radicals among his Unitarian brethren he never seemed able to do justice—except that he always "truthed it in love" to them—until nearly the end of his life. Then apparently there came a broadening in his mind. And such broadening of mind, combined with his spiritual quality,—an ability to rise in spirit and in truth still higher than he above denominations, till "Christianity" itself, in any confined "Christ of history" sense whatever, is seen to be itself denominationalism,—this, we trust, is prophetic of the Unitarians to be. Never as a major prophet certainly, but it may well be, five and twenty years from now, that Rufus Ellis, for his consistent indifference to Unitarianism, will be recognized as one of their minor prophets by Unitarians themselves.

A word about the "Memoir" itself. It is but a slight sketch, much of it made up from letters and journals, and the letters are largely his correspondence with a single friend. They are so playful on the surface and so thoughtful underneath, that we wish for more,—for what he must have written other friends. We wish, too, that the work could have been treated more as an artist treats his picture, who aims to make it as complete a unit as he can. In reading the "Life" of a man, it is disappointing to be referred to books of his or articles about him to fill out omissions. Still the sketch is vivid and the good man stands before us. With it, and the book of sermons and the book of prayers by Rufus Ellis, whoever will may know him well. W. C. G.

Two little Quaker children were one day playing together and some little differences arose. One grew quite angry and said passionately, "If thee doesn't take care I'll swear at thee!" "Oh, oh," cried the other, too much shocked to say more. "I will!" exclaimed the other. "Oh, thee little you, thee!"

WOMAN'S SONG TO LABOR.

Guild song of the New Century Guild of Working Women, in Philadelphia.

BY MRS. E. S. TURNER.

Tune: "Vive la Compagnie."

Sing we no more of our slavery past,
But of happier times to be;
Work with a soul in it rises at last,
And knowledge shall make us free.
Never a needle shall carry its thread,
Never a housewife mix her bread,
But thought takes part; the trade is an art.

And labor is dignity.

CHORUS.

Halting no more forlorn, alone,
Moving together, and all as one,
Women, arise, loving and wise,
And help these times to be.

Whom will you have for your ladies and lords,

And whom for your low degree?

Who does the best deeds, and who says
the best words,

The king of us all is he.

The new aristocracy's latest plan

Will have no use for a lazy man.

Wealth cannot brave, birth cannot save;

Down to the ranks goes he.

CHORUS.

Marching together in storm, in
shine,
Striving together for yours, for
mine;
Women, arise, loving and wise,
And help these times to be.

No one need marry for station or pelf,
Or want or crime to flee;

For every girl can take care of herself,
In the skillful time to be.

All to gain and nothing to lose;

Choice will govern and love will choose.

Love will come to every home

In the woman's century.

CHORUS.

Marching together in storm, in
shine,
Striving together for yours, for
mine;
Women, arise, loving and wise,
And help these times to be.

How do you reckon, O feeble and poor,
Yourselves and your kind to free?

Knowledge is power, and God, He is sure,

And both on our side will be.

Labor shall think, and wealth shall feel,

And both join hands for the world's best weal;

And Christian creed come down into trade

In the strange new times to be.

CHORUS.

Marching together in storm, in
shine,
Striving together for yours, for
mine;

Women, arise, loving and wise,
And help these times to be.

THE SELF-CULTURE CLUB OF ST. LOUIS.

AN INSTITUTION FOR HIGHER EDUCATION AND SELF-CULTURE AMONG WAGE-EARNERS.

The most important business houses and manufacturing establishments in the world are those which have been started in a small way, and have gradually assumed colossal size and magnitude of extent. They have grown as the circumstances, location, and times have demanded. They have developed with the progress of the age. Public institutions, philanthropic undertakings, and university extension have been most successful when started in the same way. It is scarcely necessary to call attention to the People's Palace in London, or Girard College in Pennsylvania, to show the folly of starting new monuments on too grand a scale. We are not to be understood as calling either of these institutions a failure, but the amount of money and energy has been sadly wasted, for if they had been used in a practical way ten times as much might have been accomplished. We know of other worthy institutions which have been partial or complete failures because they were started on too extensive a scale. It is by a very slow process that people are diverted from their accustomed ways and the habits of their lives. It matters not how lowly their condition or how poorly directed their leisure, it matters not what inducements or advantages are offered, it is only by a slow process that they may be induced to tread better paths and rise to something higher; the change must come about gradually to be permanent.

The fact that Hull House in Chicago and Self-Culture Hall in St. Louis were started in a small way is the most fortunate thing in their history. That they have existed for five or six years and have gradually developed and expanded is the best indication that they are successful and are doing good, practical work. Patrons will not continue to subscribe, and beneficiaries will not continue to attend, unless a work of this character is progressive and useful.

The most unique feature of the Self-Culture Club of St. Louis is that they have always maintained, during seven months of the year, a course of weekly lectures. For four years at each of the headquarters they have had two lectures each week, one for young women, one for men and their families. When we consider that they have been, in the main, well attended, and have often had crowded houses,—when we consider that the members of the club are all wage-earners, the majority being mechanics and factory workers,—it speaks well for the movement.

A well-known student and practical organizer of similar institutions who visited Self-Culture Hall last fall, seeing the spring course of public lectures, which included four lectures on physiology by a professor of the St. Louis Medical College, five lectures on noted characters of the Elizabethan age by the director of Self-Culture Hall, and four on natural philosophy by one of the professors from Washington University,—remarked that we would kill the people of St. Louis by giving them such stupendous subjects. The secret was that the Self-Culture Clubs have been educated up to this standard. The first program of six years ago was not so weighty. It consisted largely of entertainments, humorous and dramatic readings, and talks on travel illustrated by stereopticon views. The change in the character of the lecture courses indicates the demand interest. It is not the plan to give the people just what they want, but to lead them gradually to something higher and to educate their taste and ability to listen.

The Self-Culture Clubs have been fortunate in having Washington University in their midst, and the professors have been very generous in their assistance during the six years' existence of the institution. Besides the weekly lecture courses there have been educational classes of various kinds and debating clubs. They have always maintained free reading-rooms, which are open to the public and are supplied with the local daily papers, the leading illustrated weeklies, and monthly magazines. They have a good circulating library of over one thousand volumes at each place, consisting of standard novels and works on travel, science, history, etc.

Amusements have been a secondary feature. Excursions have been given from time to time, but they have been given mainly for instruction. The clubs have annually visited the Observatory of Washington University to gaze at the heavens through the large telescope; they have also visited the Art Museum and have had the principal works of art explained to them. They have a special day at the Missouri Botanical Gardens, and some one connected with the gardens goes about with them and points out and explains the most interesting features. Occasionally, in the summer time, steamboat and railroad excursions have been given.

The most important trip of the club has been an excursion to the World's Fair. A party of thirty left St. Louis Saturday evening, July 29th, for a week at the Fair. The party was conducted by the director of Self-Culture Hall, who had previously been to Chicago to make arrangements and to familiarize himself with the Exposition. The excursion was conducted on the co-operative plan, each paying his portion of the expense and receiving his share of all reductions obtained by co-operation. They went in a special car, stopped at the same hotel, had all meals together, and were conducted in a systematic manner through the Exposition.

The Self-Culture Clubs have grown from two small rooms opened in March, 1887, to two distinct headquarters; one at 2004½ South Broadway and the other in the central part of the city, at 1730 Washington street. The Washington street institution is known as Self-Culture Hall. It was opened last October, several of the workers taking up their residence there. They have for the use of their club premises consisting of a large three-story building, with basement and adjoining yard, 60 feet by 150. These premises were purchased by the Self-Culture Hall Association last June, so that they will remain as permanent headquarters for many years. The building is provided with a lecture-hall, class-room library, gymnasium, baths, room for housekeeping classes for young girls, and rooms for the residents.

Besides these two places they have two other branches, organized chiefly for lecture-courses. These have their own meeting rooms. One is called the Stationary Engineers' Branch, the other is at Leclaire, Ill., among the employes of the N. O. Nelson Manufacturing Company.

The Self-Culture movement in St. Louis was inaugurated by Mr. W. L. Sheldon, lecturer of the Ethical Society. The clubs are not directly connected with the Ethical Society, but they are its offspring, and it is true ethical work. The prime movers and leaders of the Ethical Society are also at the head of the Self-Culture movement. The institution stands on a broad and liberal basis. It preserves strict neutrality on religious, political and social questions. It endeavors to stimulate thought and investigation, without trying to teach what to think. It represents no class, creed or "ism," but is open to all wage-earners, whether they be employed in housework, factory, store or office.

It is supported by voluntary contributions from various classes of business men, and by dues from the various clubs.

Mr. N. O. Nelson, a well-known business man of the city, has been the faithful and efficient treasurer during most of the time of its existence. The club owes much of its success to his practical advice and assistance. The institution has been long enough in existence to see the practical results of its work, and its leaders feel sanguine of its future usefulness. E. N. PLANK, JR.

Who can afford to go through life without especial friends on whom he may bestow especial care and love? When old age comes, that man is poor indeed—in heart—compared with what he might have been, if he has loved no life-long friend. Select your friends without regard to what they may perform for you. That is not friendship which forever seeks itself, but that which gives itself for others. And having given once my love to any man, I never will recall it. Hearts that once were warmed and welded may not be safely severed. When the whirlwind of disaster comes and sweeps his wordly goods away, I will still be his friend. When the brand and blaze of scandal come and ruin reputation, I will remain his friend. And if he meet disaster worse than these, and if temptation hurl him down to direst deep's defile, his fair fame ruined, his good soul soiled by sin, I still will be—and all the more—his friend. If in that moment of his moral overthrow I prove that I am not a friend indeed, but join the hooting crowd of foes, what can I say if he do never rise again, when nothing less than love had power, perchance, to rescue him?

FROM A DRAMA FROM LIFE.

A FRAGMENT.

VAGRANT (soliloquizing). What is this shadow on the open street? God's temple? Aye: I will go in and find
The shelter man denies me.—Nay, not so!
The door is locked. Fears God that I may steal
The cup wherein men pledge their love to men,
The plate whereon they break the bread of truth?
Truth! what is truth? Something to read in books,
And prate about within the altar rails?
If truth be not the Lord made manifest
In mercy, love, and justice, what is it
But empty breath that stirreth up a strife
And setteth man against his brother man?
Oh, barren faith, that rears these walls of stone
In sign of worship, when the life—the life
Is the sole temple of the only God,
Wherein to show forth praise and holiness!
Yet—even here how shall God enter in
When man's own selfhood blocks and bars the door,
And builds without a house to which the Lord
Is bid one day in seven?—Vain I knock.
In the Lord's House the Lord is not at home.

Church-Door Pulpit

THE COMMON PEOPLE.*

BY REV. CHARLES G. AMES.

"The common people heard him gladly."—
MARK XII: 37.

They were drawn toward Jesus because he was drawn toward them. He could see in them something they could not see in themselves. The sight of the multitude filled him with compassion, because they fainted, and were as sheep having no shepherd. They strayed on barren mountains and over desert sands; he called them to feed in green pastures and to drink from waters of quietness. Some of their religious leaders were hirelings, caring more for the fleece than for the flock, and leaving them to the havoc of wolves, who often came in sheep's clothing. He was the good shepherd, ready to give his life for the sheep. Sheep are very silly, yet they do not readily trust a stranger; some instinct fills them with alarm. But they know the friendly voice; they listen and follow where it leads.

If the common people gladly heard the new prophet, it surely must have been because his voice, strange as it was to the ear, had a familiar sound to the soul. Have we not all been startled and delighted when we heard from some speaker or found in some book the plain statement of a truth we had often thought or felt, but had never put into words? So it was with those simple Galileans, coming out of their villages and country homes. They thronged around the teacher who seemed to speak as never man spake before; who spake with authority, because he said plainly just what their own reason and conscience had always been saying not so plainly. "Look not here nor there," he said, "the true kingdom is within. The main thing is not to be found in the far past, or waited for in the far future; it is nigh at hand. Neither to the temple of Jerusalem nor to that other temple on the mountain of Samaria need we go to offer worship; the Father asks only the child-like heart. Love Him; love each other; love the least of these, my brethren and yours. Forgive just as you would be forgiven; and be like the impartial One who sends sun and rain on the evil and the good. Live like the birds; grow like the lilies; be anxious for nothing but to live in the righteous order." It was all so new and fresh; yet was it not old as the song of the morning stars? And the common people, the multitude—as we should say, "the masses"—heard him gladly.

It is like a broad flash of light from the sky, letting us look into the heart of mankind, into the heart of Jesus, into the heart of God. I can see those sun-browned Hebrew faces, full of eagerness, all turned toward the teacher; I can feel the applause they give him with their heart-beats; I can hear the gracious words that proceed out of the young man's mouth, as his own features kindle with light and love. Was it more than eighteen hundred years ago, far off in another land, under Syrian skies, and in a language which has long since ceased to be spoken on earth? Heaven and earth may pass away, but those words, are sounding down the ages, and every man of every nation hears them in the tongue wherein he was born, as if they rolled out of the heart of nature and the heart of humanity.

The response of the multitude to the word of Jesus does not differ from the response which all human souls give to truth when that truth is spoken in love, and when those human souls are unprejudiced and receptive. There has been something of this in every age and among all people. It is illustrated whenever an open-minded child takes trustingly the counsels of a mother; whenever a pupil profits by the instructions of a teacher; whenever a reader draws wisdom from a book; whenever a man or woman welcomes the entrance of light as a guide of life. If the masses of mankind are still unenlightened, it is not because they choose the darkness; it must be because their eyes have never opened, or because they dwell in moral twilight; and often because they are blind followers of blind guides. I must think indeed that the low intellectual development of many tribes would make it difficult for them to receive the most advanced spiritual teaching; and that there are deep-seated evils, coarse, selfish and sensual passions, and stupid superstitions and irrational traditions, which close the mind against truth and goodness. But I must also think that the vast majority in every land would welcome truth spoken in love, if it were so spoken as to be adapted to their capacity and their actual state. Perhaps, as a matter of fact, the heathen and half-civilized people of Asia, Africa and the islands are living in obedience to all they know of moral law and spiritual life quite as faithfully as those whose culture is more advanced. And as Channing remarks, "We are judged not by the degree of our light, but by our fidelity to the light we have."

But the common people of Palestine, to whom Jesus preached, were not in a state of ignorance and low development; they were not without knowledge of their own literature and laws; and probably they were more familiar with the Old Testament than the majority of our people are with the New. Their range of intelligence was narrow; they knew little of the arts and sciences as we have learned them; and there were no such means of familiar acquaintance with the rest of the world as we enjoy. But neither were they distracted and demoralized by all sorts of unsettling and contradictory creeds and theories, nor were their brains addled by too many books and papers. They knew the commandments; they believed in the God of Israel; and they were quite prepared to expect that he would raise up prophets to lead his people in ways of righteousness and salvation. They were teachable.

The simplicity and receptivity of childhood is best represented by the common people. The more cultivated are more apt to be preoccupied by theories, proud of their self-intelligence, and tenacious of their own conclusions. And if they are of the ambitious and official class, they are likely to be selfishly interested in maintaining the existing state of things, and averse to changes or reforms that lessen their own importance. They are like traders who have in stock an old pattern of goods, and who do not want anybody meddling with their monopoly of the market.

We can see why the priests and the scribes, or learned class, hated Jesus. He was not one of their set, yet he was more popular than they; and this was hard to bear. He not only undermined their influence: he exposed their pretensions, their usurpations, their hypocrisy. The more he insisted on pure and spiritual religion, the more they felt that their occupation was slipping away. The higher he raised the standard of character or of righteousness, the less sincere seemed their professions and the more ridiculous their ceremonies. If the common people heard him gladly, it was all the more necessary to shut his mouth.

The rich and prosperous could not hear him gladly; for he rebuked their unbrotherly selfishness and disturbed their comfortable worldliness and self-complacency. What a wild radical was this country mechanic, holding out-of-door meetings and turning things upside down! Did you hear him? He described a miserable beggar, dying among the dogs of the street and carried by angels to Abraham's bosom; while the respectable rich man, who was clothed with purple and fared sumptuously every day, dies in his mansion, and finds himself in hell, where he turns beggar for a drop of water! "Woe unto you that are rich! Blessed are ye that are poor!" Could that be called a gospel? Yes, to the multitude, it was like great and good news, to be told, not, indeed, that their well-to-do neighbors were going to perdition, but that their own standing in this universe of God did not depend on gold and silver, which are "hard to get and heavy to hold," nor on houses and lands, which no man can carry with him; and that it is possible for one to be rich toward God when he has not where to lay his head. Yet if the man of great possessions would only count nothing as his own, but hold and use all as a trust for humanity, he, too, became one of the blessed poor. But this was like the camel passing through the eye of a needle.

The same story runs through the gospels and epistles. The gospel was welcome to the common people, while it made slow progress with the upper classes. "Ye see your calling, brethren," says Paul to the Corinthian believers; "how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty; and base things of the world, and things that are despised, hath God chosen: yea, and things that are not, to bring to naught things that are; that no flesh should glory in his presence." Not only the common people, but the nobodies, the wretchedly poor and ignorant, and the despised slave—these heard a voice out of heaven saying, "Ye are sons of God! Come up higher. He offers you crowns and thrones!"

Here in America we are all the common people. The theory of free society makes us many members of one body. We are not equals in intelligence, in attainments, in external or internal conditions; but we are equals before the laws of the land as before the laws of heaven. If an uncommon man appears, if any one rises above the rest in genius, in scholarship, in wealth, or in any line of achievement, the theory of American life makes him all the more a servant. He does not separate himself from the masses; he merges his life in theirs for enrichment and blessing. He is bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. This is republicanism; this is democracy; this is civilization; and if Christianity means anything, this is Christianity. Its motto is to "level upward"; its method is to keep all doors of opportunity wide open.

Is the average of intelligence and character low? Does mediocrity cover in "vast glooms" of ignorance, coarse manners, greed, animalism, disorder, and spiritual poverty? Are the multitudes too easily content with "bread and a circus"? Are the masses of our countrymen, native and foreign born, white and black, poorly qualified for self-guidance and self-government? Is heavenly wisdom rare, and heavenly virtue rarer still? All the more precious and helpful is that Christ-spirit which sees in the common people what they cannot see in themselves. All the more urgent is the need of respect for humanity—the need of justice, generosity, and good-will.

What a rebuke is here to the inhuman spirit of exclusiveness and caste which has spread its vulgar influence so widely in what are called the upper circles of American society! Nowhere on earth could social pretension seem so ludicrous. Sometimes it appears as scorn of the common people; more generally as indifference, or as charitable condescension, which is still more odious. Our own would-be aristocracy can feel the sting when a titled Englishman on the steamship turns away from the other first-class cabin passengers as "a beastly crowd;" and there are the same affectations of dignity in the slums, where "in the lowest deep a lower deep" is recognized, and women in dirt and rags refuse to associate with some more dirty and ragged still. In any social condition, so far as this means a genuine aspiration for excellence, and an unwillingness to be kept down, let us give it all praise; but so far as it means a willingness to keep others down, let it be anathema. "They only are of the 'baser sort,'" said Horace Mann, "who do nothing for the good of humanity."

But the example of Jesus offers us something better than rebuke; it is full of divine encouragement; it proclaims the nobility of all souls, and makes that great Son of God pre-eminent in the universal brotherhood of humanity. From his power to reach the common people let us infer that spiritual truth is suited to the nature and needs of all men. For if some of every class rejected his message, some of every class accepted it. Not with equal heartiness, not with equal appreciation. At a symphony concert some are carried up to the seventh heaven of musical ecstasy; others experience but a milder satisfaction. But those without musical culture may have a musical sense, and nearly all the human race are moved by "the concord of sweet sounds." And the spirit of man everywhere responds, however faintly, to the spirit of God.

The parable of the sower proves that Jesus recognized these different degrees of receptivity, as well as the sad hindrances that come in with "the lusts of other things." He never flattered his hearers, nor was he blind to the mixture of heavenly and earthly motives among his followers. The multitude cared for the loaves and fishes more than for the bread of God. He looked over the world. All its kingdoms and tribes were asking, "What shall we eat? What shall we drink? Wherewithal shall we be clothed?" Yet he knew that at the call of truth and the touch of love, a higher passion and a deeper hunger would awaken in human souls; therefore he said, "Preach the good news to every creature!"

I think we learn also that the power of truth depends on a sympathetic presentation. The most successful preacher is not he who can make the clearest intellectual statement; it is he who can speak the truth in love; he whose word persuades while it convinces. The two must go together—light and heat. If we preachers fail, I think we must generally blame ourselves for some defect in our way of presenting the truth. Either our thinking is muddy—we have not ourselves a clear vision of divine realities—or we speak over the people's heads, using the language which is familiar only to a few; or our love runs low, so that what is spoken only from the head never reaches the heart. I think all true preaching penetrates; it is a living word, and it carries life, it wakens life. It is always personal, it comes home to each heart as a message to himself. It is an impulse passing from one mind to another, as lightning flashes from cloud to cloud. The Christian gospel seems to me like a vibration from the heart of God, transmitted through some human hearts to others; a movement of life, like waves of light and heat, from the center outward to the utmost bounds of his creation, as if he thus imparted something of himself to us all and through us all.

If the truths of spiritual life can be adapted to all sorts and conditions of men, it does not seem creditable to us that we should hold them as suitable only for the educated or the cultured few. Of course some ways of putting things can only be understood by a philosopher, some lessons can only be taught to advanced classes, and babies must be fed with milk. But when I think of the discourses Jesus gave to the country people and the fisher-folk, and how they heard him gladly, or when I read of his deep spiritual talk with an ignorant woman by the well of Samaria, and the tender adaptation of his ministry to the blind and the crippled, I am ashamed to hear it said that we must turn over the spiritual instruction of the poor and the ignorant to the Salvation Army. How has the church of the living God lost the sweet secret of Jesus!

I believe that the common people, the masses of mankind, offer to the true church the most hopeful material for instruction, persuasion and spiritual improvement. Their capacity is as real as their need; and their responsiveness to sincere appeal can be taken for granted. Nothing is too good for them; nothing too high; if only they hear it in their own language, which must also be the language of the heart, and not merely the language of the books and the schools. For the common people get through their experience, not the same forms of expression, but the same results, which uncommon people arrive at through profound study. Let them see the reality of life on the stage, let them hear it in the songs of Burns, or let it be spoken to them in plain, homespun talk, and they know it as the student knows his books.

The truth is not lowered or vulgarized when it is spoken in the dialect of the home, the shop, and the street—the dialect of the common people. If Jesus reaches them better than Plato or Aristotle, it is because he translates the higher truths into the terms of everyday speech. He adapts the lesson to the state of his pupils. He quotes to them the familiar old Scriptures; he constructs a familiar dialect out of fishing tackle and farming tools, out of birds and flowers, grass and trees, clouds and sunsets, scenes in the market-place and at weddings, the woman with her broom, and the shepherd bringing home the lost sheep.

Most of all, he reached the common people because he cared for them, and they felt that he cared for them. This is why so many men, nowadays, find it easy to love Jesus and believe in him, when they cannot make anything of "the Christ" nor of the creeds. They know the man as a friend and a brother; they do not recognize him behind an official mask, or dressed up in a doctrinal robe and a theological wig. In a working men's meeting, they cheered at the name of Jesus, and hissed the mention of the church! They will cheer the church as well, when the church cheers them; as some day it will, when it learns its true business, and catches more of the spirit of the Carpenter's Son.

George Eliot makes one of her characters say, "The love that's betwixt human beings and the help that's betwixt them, that ought to come first!" Yes, and love must open the door to truth. Scolding never converts; and censorious self-righteousness may be more sinful than the publicans and harlots whom it despises. We must give up Luke Honeythunder's method of trying to "seize people by the scruff of the neck, and bump them into the path of virtue." We must go back to the method of the man whom Emerson calls "the blessed Jew"—the man who never once talked down, as if he despised or disdained, who never ridiculed or censured, who came not to condemn but to save. It is by this divine sympathy that truth itself is made effective; for sympathy in the world of souls, which we all inhabit, is like that universal ether which gives wings to the light of sun and stars. Sympathy is love on its travels; love opening communication between spirit and spirit; love going out to service; love descending from God to man; love ascending from man to God; love weaving ties between man and man, and between man and nature; love as the circulating life of the universe.

"Honor to sacred sympathy
All ye within creation's ring!
Up to yon star-pavilions, she Leads to the unknown King!"

Back of our morality is our religion; back of our religion is our common humanity; back of morality, religion, and humanity is our share of the infinite Life, which is given us to enjoy and to impart. May we so proclaim that Life, in true words and right works, as to make it glad tidings of great joy to all people!

World's Fair Notes

After all in the Anthropological building you come on sculpture, broken and defaced though it be, that compels a deference and admiration you do not so much feel in any part of the Fine Arts building. Ancient Greece meets you there—Praxiteles quietly challenging comparison with Dubois, St. Gaudens and Trench. The Frenchman is good, but the Greek is great. It is noticeable that visitors go about among these busts, statues, reliefs with that unmistakable shading of reverence and interest which testifies to the powers of the art they behold.

Nowhere else have I seen, except in the Grand Court, this same power to command respect. The scene there impresses you as being something more than human genius could have fashioned—temples not made with hands—as though it must have been fashioned in some far upper region by the perfect gods who could in no wise go amiss in sublimating visions of grandeur and beauty, and then, through some morning mist, let down into Jackson Park. The expression, "It is all divine," has been heard from many lips.

What is it that lends this exceptional charm? It is not simply that the work contemplated has been wrought with exceptional ability, its architectural and artistic features showing masterly treatment. The query arises, was there any "treatment," masterly or otherwise? Did any being or association of beings do it? There is a sense of its having grown as flowers grow, or the stately California trees, and so having a certain organic life of its own which it will be a thousand pities to slay.

The only solution of the perfection attained in giving these magnificent works their living power to so impress and awe, is that the loyal workers have one and all in great sincerity of purpose kept themselves in abeyance, the ideal of a harmonious and beautiful creation dominating and controlling all effect. It was the display of individuality set free from outward constraint or limitation, obedient only to the high behest within—each worker, so obedient, meeting his brothers in reverence to that which is cherished beyond any taint of private ambition; the self-surrender to the eternal order of beauty that establishes without enactment or ordinance the world's harmony and glory.

The old Greeks knew this religion and lived in it, and their "works do follow them" as testimonial and enduring praise. S. H. M.

EVERY INCH A MAN.

She sat on the porch in the sunshine
As I went down the street,
A woman whose hair was silver,
But whose face was a blossom sweet,
Making me think of a garden
Where, in spite of the frost and snow
Of bleak November weather,
Late fragrant lilies blow.

I heard a footstep behind me,
And the sound of a merry laugh;
And I knew the heart it came from
Would be like a comforting staff
In the time and the hour of trouble,
Hopeful and brave and strong—
One of the hearts to lean on,
When we think all things go wrong.

I turned at the click of the gate-latch,
And met his manly look—
A face like his gives me pleasure,
Like the page of a pleasant book—
It told of a steadfast purpose,
Of a brave and daring will;
A face with a promise in it,
That God grant the years fulfill!

He went up the pathway, singing:
I saw the woman's eyes
Grow bright with a wordless welcome,
As sunshine warms the skies:
"Back again, sweetheart mother,"
He cried, and bent to kiss
The loving face that was lifted
For what some mothers miss.

That boy will do to depend on;
I hold that this is true—
From lads in love with their mothers
Our bravest heroes grew;
Earth's grandest hearts have been loving hearts
Since time and earth began:
And the boy who kisses his mother
Is every inch a man!

THE FOX FAMILY.

Through the wild woods there wandered, unfettered and free, a family of foxes, until, one day, the old ones were shot and the young ones snared by an Indian trapper. He took them all to a fur-trader, who, seeing that they were of good stock, put them in a warm room, the walls of which were lined with zinc, that the fine downy fur of the little creatures might not be rubbed.

Silver-grey, the eldest, grew to be a superb-looking queen of her race, but was sleepy, selfish, and vain. When she stretched herself, or rose to her full height, the points of her thick rich coat glistened like silver sheen, her bushy tail bristled, and her brothers looked upon her with awe. Jet, the next in age, was also a handsome fox, proud of his birth, and scornful of those beneath him, but not a bad fox, as foxes go. Criss-cross* was the third, a fox of moods and fancies, a dual nature; his tastes were sometimes high, at other times quite low. Sandy, the youngest, weakest, and poorest of all, was despised by Silver-grey and Jet, sometimes petted though oftener snubbed by Criss-cross. Having no mother to coddle him, knowing that he was disliked by his brothers and sister, poor Sandy slunk as far away as possible, and rubbed his forlorn little nose on the cold zinc for comfort. The trader fed them on warm milk and bread, and did all in his power to make them happy, but how could he understand the hunger of a little fox's heart?

"Such a plebeian coat!" sneered Silver-grey. "How did you ever come into our family? You must be a changeling."

"Horrid color," said Jet, complacently stroking his long white whiskers.

"It is really dreadful," sighed Silver-grey, "and Criss-cross is almost as bad."

"But he has some good points," said Jet.

Sandy crept up to Criss-cross and licked his paw to show his sympathy, but Criss-cross was in a bad mood, and did not respond.

One day a stranger came in with the trader.

"What a beauty," he exclaimed, pointing to Silver-grey, who, resenting the intrusion, had risen to her feet, and was glaring at him with her fierce eyes. She little knew what was in store for her. That day she was sold, killed, and skinned. Then her skin was dressed, cleaned, stretched, nalled, and sewed into a boa for a beautiful lady. But the lady was not happy, and if Silver-grey could feel, she must often have felt the sob rise under the white throat around which she nestled. Jet soon went through the same process as his sister. He was cut into strips to trim an opera cloak. Criss-cross formed the center piece for a carriage robe. This was bought by a doctor, with whom Criss-cross made many journeys to the sick, and in this way did more good than while living. A poor man on his way home from work one wintry night saw Sandy (in the shape of a rug) hanging in a window, marked "Only two dollars." He thought, "How nice that would be for my little girl." So he bought it. When Baby saw it she crowed with delight. It lay on her little crib that night and many nights; when taken out for an airing she was wrapped in its warm folds, she rolled on it indoors, she pressed her soft cheek against its shaggy head, and loved poor Sandy more than he was ever loved before.

THE USE OF MONEY.

The teachable mind of childhood will easily grasp the distinction between a noble and an ignoble use of money; and in the instruction which may be given on this point the daughters of the household should share equally with the sons. A part of this instruction will consist in the experimental spending of a proper allowance, and in this all children should receive the needed guidance; they should also, as they become able, be associated in such of the household expenditures as may safely be intrusted to them. Children should be taught to consider what outlays are necessary, which are useful, which demanded by charity, which superfluous. The Scripture saying is that "Every wise woman buildeth her house," while "the foolish plucketh it down with her hands." It is a serious thought that the little girls on the school bench, using or misusing their weekly allowance, are learning either to build their future house or to pluck it down. And I pause sadly here to reflect how these little girls who are preparing to pull the family down will also pull the state down with it. For this no evil intention is necessary, only an ignorance, common enough, of the true relation of the individual, male or female, to the race and the state.

AN IMPORTANT COMMERCIAL EVENT.

The opening of the new retail building of Marshall Field & Company on Wabash avenue last month was an event of unusual commercial interest and importance. The Chicago dailies devoted considerable space to the event, and said many kind and complimentary things of the largest firm of dry goods dealers in the world.

that time the great throng that is to be found daily in this establishment has been sensibly augmented. The store is very properly regarded as one of the sights of the city. Strangers, especially ladies, feel that they can not afford to go away without having spent some time within its walls. Chicago ladies especially enjoy taking their lady friends into Marshall Field & Company's and have them admit, as they do whether from the East or from abroad, that "We have rooms, retiring-rooms, waiting-rooms, writing-tables supplied with the stationery of the house for the free use of the public, check and parcel rooms for leaving without expense to owner little bundles, umbrellas and the like, and several telephones that are always at the service of the public.

A beautiful feature of the store is its show windows, which, on all sides—State street, Wabash avenue and Washington street—are always handsomely trimmed, and at night are lighted with a peculiarly soft, rich glow supplied by electric lamps that are concealed from view.

While a great deal might be written in detail about the contents of this vast store and about the organized system under which its 3,000 or more employes conduct its operations, we can only add to what we have already said that it is one of the chief points of interest in Chicago. In the world of dry goods it is an "exposition in itself" of all that is best and most desirable at the World's Fair in its line.

All visitors are received in this establishment in the spirit of true Chicago hospitality, whether wishing to buy or to inspect. To facilitate intercourse interpreters are employed speaking German, French, Italian, Spanish, Swedish, Norwegian, Russian, Bohemian and Japanese. Educated foreigners are among the most enthusiastic and amazed visitors.

It is characteristic of Marshall Field & Company that they are modest, and the firm attributes all its success and its unexampled growth not to its equipments, however perfect they may be, nor the size of the business, which is without a parallel, but wholly and strictly to the facts that merchandise purchased of Marshall Field & Company is to be depended on in quality as represented, and that the price is always the lowest.

The growth of the house in the future bids fair to outrun its marvelous record in the past. It seems destined to establish a high-water mark in the record of commercial development hitherto unattained in the world's history. It is such growth as this which gives us faith to believe that Chicago is surely to become the metropolis of the United States within the comparatively near future.

EACH manufacturer of cigarettes has his own formula of poisons, which he adds to the cheap tobacco from which his cigarettes are manufactured, so that the user of a particular brand soon finds himself wedded to it through the contraction of a drug habit, thus making him a steady customer. It would seem that nothing could be more fiendish than such a scheme for creating business. Every boy who smokes cigarettes may be regarded as a prospective drunkard, or, if not to be a drunkard, certainly an opium slave or a lunatic. No man can indulge long in this fascinating and pernicious habit without becoming wrecked in mind and body thereby. —Good Health.

MARSHALL FIELD & COMPANY—RETAIL.

State, Washington and Wabash Av. (new building to the right)

Four or five years ago the selling space of the retail store was increased by one third, but since that time the sales have doubled, and shopping became too much crowded for comfort. In casting about for more room Marshall Field & Company added more room to the north on State street toward Randolph street, in which direction the store has been growing for a number of years. Store room after store room had been annexed from time to time until in May last the limit of progress in that direction was reached at the Central Music Hall Building.

The firm had anticipated this, however, and having acquired sole ownership of the corner on Wabash avenue and Washington street had already begun the erection of what has proved to be the finest retail store building ever constructed. This statement is thoughtfully made. There is no building that is its equal in style, taste, wealth of equipment, and adaptability to the purpose intended, in New York, London, Vienna, Paris, or elsewhere.

The architecture is especially appropriate for a retail business—the Italian renaissance—infinite in detail and beautiful in effect. The cost of this building has been a round one million dollars.

Marshall Field & Company, with characteristic modesty refer to it as an "Annex" to the retail store. It was formally thrown open to the public early in August, and it was this event which called out the articles in the daily press already alluded to. Since never seen the equal of this anywhere."

Marshall Field & Company now occupy in their retail establishment 260 feet on State street, the entire distance from State to Wabash avenue, being 340 feet on Washington street and 108 feet on Wabash avenue.

Counting all the floors as though upon one level, the aggregate of floor space is about nine acres.

The stocks of merchandise are divided into more than one hundred departments, and most of these departments have their subdivisions. In arranging these stocks the plan followed is to place associated lines of goods in close proximity. For instance, if a lady purchases a piece of dress goods she finds that everything in the way of trimmings and "findings" required to make up the suit are in departments close at hand.

The tea-room in the new building is elegant in its appointments, and is excelled by no high-class restaurant in the city in popularity and patronage.

Everything has been done looking to the comfort of the public and in the direction of expeditious shopping. Thirteen high-pressure hydraulic elevators have been placed in the new building alone, and there are twenty-three elevators in all in the entire store. The store also contains several wide stairways leading from floor to floor, located in different parts of the building.

In the line of public comfort and convenience besides the tea-room already alluded to there are resting-

Western Unitarian Conference.—Rev. Arthur M. Judy, after a conscientious and careful consideration of the matter, has declined the Secretaryship of the Conference, to which office he was elected at the meeting of the Directors August 18. This announcement will cause great disappointment within the Conference; but it will easily be understood how the claims of the church in Davenport and the work there, to which Mr. Judy has given the past twelve years, weighed in the scales of duty and finally turned the balance. His note of reply bore witness to his interest in the Conference and his appreciation of the confidence his election implied.

The Chicago Ethical School will resume its work on Sunday, Sept. 3, 1893, at 10 o'clock a. m., in the Masonic Hall, on third floor of Masonic Temple, State and Randolph streets. Pupils and teachers will please not postpone date of entering.—JUNIATA STAFFORD, Superintendent.

Chicago, Ills.—The Fourth Annual Conference of American Rabbis, representing American Reformed Judaism, has been in session during the latter part of August, having convened Aug. 23. It was the largest and most successful of the meetings so far held, having representatives from all parts of the country except the Pacific coast. The principal work accomplished was the adoption of the program for the Jewish Denominational Congress at the Parliament of Religions, and the decision to apply the profit from the Union Prayer Book, just prepared, to the fund for the maintenance of superannuated rabbis.

At the Unitarian headquarters at 175 Dearborn street Revs. N. P. Gilman and Loren B. Macdonald, of Boston, and F. W. Holden, of Bernardston, Mass., registered last week; also Mr. Robt. C. AT THE THIRD UNITARIAN CHURCH services began September 3, the subject of Mr. Blake's sermon being "The World." The Sunday school meets at 9:55 a. m. The art section of the Unity Club will be held at 2 p. m., Sept. 16 and 30, at the residence of Mrs. Mahoney, 720 Congress street. The King's Daughters will meet at 4:15 p. m., Wednesday, Sept. 13, at the church. The Sunday school teachers' meetings will be held at the study in the church Mondays, beginning in October. The Sunday morning conversation lectures (10:15 sharp) on the Seven Great Teachers will be resumed in October, the first subject being Mohammed.

The Jane Club, one of the outcomes of the Hull House Settlement in Chicago, a co-operative home for single women, is now nearly a year and a half old, and has about forty members. Miss Addams, for whom the club is named, secured and furnished the premises, which are at 253 Ewing street, and the women run it at an expense of very little more than $3 a week for each member. The cook and housemaids are the only paid employees, the officers of the club, including the steward, serving without compensation.

New York, N. Y.—Our New York contemporary, The Independent, is doing good work in publishing accounts of the philanthropic and charitable institutions of that city. We learn from it that at the second free loan exhibition of the UNIVERSITY SETTLEMENT SOCIETY at the Neighborhood Guild on Delancey street, held from June 17 to July 29, the total attendance was nearly 20,000 in excess of the attendance at the first. About 8,000 of this year's attendance had attended last year. In all, 56,266 attended, of whom 29,209 were adults and 27,057 children. On a representative week, during which the attendance at the Metropolitan Museum of Arts was 8,851, that at the Delancey street exhibition was 12,907,—which certainly speaks well for the undertaking. The Independent also gives considerable information as to the organizations housed in the United Charities Building, Fourth avenue and 22d street. First of these is New York's most general organization, the "Charity Organization Society," which, in addition to such branches as the woodyard for men and laundry for women, is now erecting a brick building at the woodyard, fully equipped with baths, dormitories, and other needed accommodations for 200 men each night. The laundry last year gave employment to 122 women, and its expenses were $7,746.18, the receipts, less contributions, being not very much less, $6,297.53. Chas. D. Kellogg is the general secretary of the society. Another institution housed at the same place is the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of which the general agent is Francis S. Longworth. It has six departments, Finance, Temporary Relief, Dwellings, Food Supply, Schools and Institutions, and Hygiene. The institutions referred to above are all non-sectarian.

THE EAST SIDE HOUSE is now erecting a building for a free circulating library, which is also to accommodate a kindergarten and contain rooms for residents. It is hoped that it will be ready for occupation by Christmas.

Peoria, Ill.—The People's Church held meetings during the summer at Sylvan Park, a summer opera house. The attendance was good, the interest very encouraging. September 3 services began in the Swedenborgian Church, which has been rented as a permanent place of meeting. The minister, Mr. Marsh, has been called upon to officiate at many funerals in the city and neighboring towns. The people seem anxious to hear the good news of the larger hope. The Sunday school has met every week, and sociables and grove meetings have kept the interest up to a most hopeful degree. The dull times will be felt among us, as the People's Church rejoices in that many of its members are numbered among the laboring masses.

Bloomington, Ill.—It is a source of great satisfaction to the friends of liberal religion that the Rev. J. H. Muller, the Unitarian pastor in this college town, has been able to exert so much influence on the students. Mr. Muller began his ministry in the Orthodox Congregational Church, and since he came to this place last December and in the six months which followed his congregations increased from about sixty to nearly two hundred and fifty.

Everett, Wash.—Rev. W. E. Copeland, of Salem, Ore., during the month of August spent two Sundays here preaching to and organizing the liberal people of this place. It is not expected to employ a minister for some time to come, but a satisfactory little circle of earnest people has been formed, and the prospects for growth are promising.

Christmas all in counterpart.*

W. C. Gannett.

Picture—The Holy Night, by Correggio, [1494-1534]. The Picture shows nearly all the details that are mentioned in the Golden Verse.

"The angels sing on high." The reference in the poem is to the song which the shepherds heard as they watched their flocks (Lk. ii. 8-14). The picture has the same idea, that angels were interested in the birth of Jesus.

"The bearded men draw nigh." In the Matthew account there has been preserved a legend that three Magi, or wise men, astrologers, from the far East, came all the way to Palestine to worship the child of Joseph and Mary (Mat. ii. 1-12). The bearded man in our picture, however, is one of the shepherds who has come, with the younger man at his side, to see the child of whom the angels sang. Our hearts warm to the artist who shows us the shepherd-dog that has accompanied his master and shares in the light streaming from the child.

"Baby-glory in the place." Except the cloud of light about the angels and the suggestion of day on the distant hills, all the light in the picture comes from the babe in Mary's arms. In the Apocryphal Gospels, from which many of the older painters derived the details of their pictures, it is said that the cave in which Jesus was born, although it could not receive the light of day, was "filled with lights more beautiful than the glittering of lamps and candles and brighter than the light of the sun" (Gospel of Pseudo Matthew, ch. xlii). The "star-look on the mother's face" is shown poorly in the picture (read, however, Gannett's poem "Recognitions"), and the "psalm within the mother's heart" refers probably to the song which is said to have been on her lips when she visited her kinswoman Elisabeth (Lk. i. 46-55). And the best of all is that whatever was true of Jesus might have been true of every child that has ever been born, and has been true of a great many—"Christmas all in counterpart."

We notice in the picture also that in the background Joseph is represented holding an ass, and in the farther background are two persons, one of whom is grasping the horn of an ox. These two animals—the ox and the ass—are found in most of the early pictures of the birth of Jesus, because some of the traditions, preserved in the Apocryphal Gospels, find in Isaiah i. 3, and in Habakkuk iii. 2 (where the Septuagint reads "in the midst of two lives," that is, of two living creatures), a prophecy of the Messiah. The ass is said to represent the Gentiles, and the ox the Jews, hence it may be that Correggio has represented the ass as trying to look toward Jesus, but pulled away by Joseph, while in the distance the two figures that cannot be clearly made out are endeavoring to make the ox raise his head that he may see the "baby-glory in the place."

The young woman who is shading her eyes as if dazzled by the brilliancy, has a basket in which are two doves. The dove is often associated with Mary as a symbol of her character, but since two are depicted here, the probability is that reference is made to the offering in Luke ii. 24. That Mary is represented as in full health and vigor so soon after the birth of her child is due to a theological prejudice which deemed it "little less than heretical to portray Mary reclining on a couch as one exhausted by the pains of childbirth." (Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Madonna, Pt. II., Sec. 4). The rim of light on the horizon betokens that for the world "the night is far spent, the day is at hand."

When was Jesus born?—In the last years of Herod the Great, who died about 4 B. C.—Our common chronology dates the birth of Jesus at least four years too late.

That Jesus was put to death during the administration of Pilate (26-36 A. D.) is certain, but the date of his birth cannot be ascertained with any approach to certainty. According to Matthew's account he was born just before the death of Herod. Josephus states that Herod died shortly after the burning of Matthias, an insurgent, on the night after whose execution there was an eclipse of the moon (Antiqq. xvii. 6, 4), and also that Herod's death was immediately before a Passover. Astronomers say that the eclipse must have occurred on the night of March 12-13, B. C. 4, and consequently Herod must have died between that date and the Passover (March-April) of the same year. If, then, Herod died in the spring of B. C. 4 and Jesus was born before the death of Herod, we have a fixed date later than which the birth cannot have occurred.

Luke seems to give more chronological data. He puts the birth of Jesus at the time of a certain taxing by Cyrenius, governor of Syria. In this, however, he contradicts Matthew, for at the time of Herod's death Varus was governor of Syria (B. C. 6-4) and Saturninus (B. C. 9-6) was his predecessor. Therefore, if Jesus was born just before the death of Herod, as Matthew relates, Luke must be in error in placing his birth while Cyrenius was governor of Syria. Furthermore, from the silence of the Roman historians, the relation in which Judæa stood to Rome during Herod's lifetime, and particularly the fact that during the governorship of Cyrenius (A. D. 6ff) a census was taken in Judæa, we may be sure that in this indication of time Luke has blundered. There was no Roman census under Cyrenius till at least ten years after the death of Herod. That Luke did not think that Jesus was born so late as A. D. 6 appears from III. 1, in which John's baptism, at which time Jesus was about 30 years old, is assigned to the fifteenth year of Tiberius; that is, either 29 A.

D. or, if we date the years of Tiberius from his association with Augustus as colleague, and not from his succeeding to the throne, about 27 A. D.

The only chronological datum in John is in II. 20, where the Jews say that the temple has been forty-six years in building. The temple of which they spoke was begun about the year 20 B. C., and forty-six years would bring us to 46 A. D. But it may be that work was not then going on upon the temple, so that the forty-six years would have ended with the cessation of work, and we are not told how old Jesus himself was at the time of his first Passover. Hence the passage gives no certain note of time. On the whole, it may be said that Jesus was born probably not later than the spring of 4 B. C.

Where was Jesus born?—Probably in Nazareth, possibly in Bethlehem of Zebulun, a little town about six miles from Nazareth.

In the Gospels Jesus is spoken of as from Nazareth, and the natural inference from Jno. vii. 42, is that he was not born in Bethlehem of Judæa, the city of David. According to Matthew, his parents were residents of Bethlehem, who fled to Egypt soon after his birth, and after their return went to Nazareth instead of to their former home, because Archelaus was reigning in Judæa. Luke, however, supposes that Joseph and Mary lived in Nazareth and came to Bethlehem on account of a census which actually did not occur. It was expected that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem of Judæa, hence, it was natural that those who supposed Jesus to be the Messiah should think that he must have fulfilled expectation in the place of his birth as in other respects—hence the appropriateness of the Bethlehem legend. Since there was a little town named Bethlehem only a few miles from Nazareth, it may be that Jesus was born there, and that, partly through ignorance and partly by the influence of the Messianic prophecy, the two Bethlehems were confounded.

In the class, the birth stories and poems in Matthew and Luke should be read as legends and poems. Some of the apocryphal stories should also be read (they can be found in "The Apocryphal Gospels," B. H. Cowper, London) and the prodigies attending the birth of other heroes of antiquity should be referred to. Above all, it should be made clear that a sense of poetic fitness and a desire to find in Jesus a perfect fulfillment of all the prophecies supposed to relate to the Messiah have done much to modify and color the actual facts.

The following books will be found useful in the lessons for this year:

1. First, and foremost, the Revised Version of the New Testament.
2. Life of Our Lord in Art..... Mrs. Jameson
3. The Apocryphal Gospels..... B. H. Cowper
4. The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ..... Schuerer
Especially Div. II., Vols. 1 and 2.
5. The Gospel and Its Earliest Interpretations..... Orello Cone
6. Organization of the Early Christian Church.

7. Influence of Greek Ideas Upon Christianity..... Hatch

For a verse-by-verse commentary none is more likely to prove serviceable than "Broadus' Commentary on Matthew," issued by the Baptist Publication Society. Other books whose use may be presupposed are not mentioned.

THE SIX YEARS' COURSE.

In the New Testament lessons for this year three things will be attempted: First, to study a few good pictures; second, to present by the pictures, arranged in chronological order, the chief events in New Testament history; third, to show, by the aid of the pictures, leading New Testament ideas, which may be regarded as the flowering of the Hebrew religion. The pictures selected are the following:

1. THE HOLY NIGHT..... Correggio
2. IN NAZARETH..... Hofmann
3. JESUS IN THE TEMPLE... Hofmann
4. THE BAPTISM..... Dore
5. THE TEMPTATION..... Cornecelius
6. THE SOWER..... Millet
7. CHRIST PREACHING FROM A BOAT

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION AT THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

FROM THE PRELIMINARY ANNOUNCEMENT.

Inasmuch as the Free Religious Association of America was really the first to inaugurate on its platform, twenty-six years ago, the idea of a "World's Parliament of Religions," it will be eminently proper, and in accordance with the fitness of things, for it to take part in this larger Parliament to be held in Chicago as a part of the World's Fair, recognizing as it does in its projected convening a "consummation devoutly to be wished;" for it is one of the most significant events of the age, and it may be productive of vast results to the future development of religion. The full significance of that assembly of delegates from all the leading religions of the world will not be manifest, however, nor the logical results of the event be deduced in their completeness, without the meeting of the Free Religious Association to point to what lies beyond a temporary Parliament of Religions. It is very much to have the religions of the world thus brought together on the same platform for a presentation of their beliefs and aims by their own representatives, without controversy or debate. But are the representatives of the religions, there amicably gathered, to separate for their respective countries with the same controversial aggressiveness against each other which they have hitherto manifested, and with the same mutually antagonistic claims to exclusive supernatural inspiration and guidance? The Free Religious Association is the one general religious body in this land which, following the inevitable logical trend of the scientific study of the religions of mankind, has publicly proclaimed the possibility of a new and permanent religious fellowship and cooperation on the basis of the "scientific study of religion and ethics," free reason and of a common humanity,—in lieu of the old theological bases, which, however stringent or attenuated the Dogma, were laid in alleged revelations through miraculous books or persons. We urge, therefore, the members and friends of the Association to rally at this gathering in full numbers. And we cordially invite all who are in sympathy with the general aim and purpose of the Association, whether they have heretofore acted with us or not, to be present at the twenty-sixth Annual Convention of the Free Religious Association, which will be held in Hall No. 31, Art Palace, World's Fair, Chicago, Ill., on Wednesday, September 30th, 1893.

WM. J. POTTER, Pres.
D. G. CRANDON, Sec'y.

THE MORNING SESSION.

beginning at 10 o'clock, will be presided over by Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, one of the Vice President and founders of the Association, who will make the introductory address. By request of the Directors, the President, William J. Potter, will then give a written address entitled: "The Free Religious Association—its Twenty-six Years and their Meaning." Dr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot will follow, on "The Scientific Method in the Study of Religion." Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, of Providence, R. I., on "The Free Religious Association as the expounder of the Natural History of Religion," and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, on "Religious Progress." Other speakers have been invited and will be announced later.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION

will begin at 2:30 o'clock, and will be devoted to the subject, "Unity in Religion." Minot J. Savage, of Boston, will open the subject, followed by Dr. Edward McGlynn of New York, Mangasar Mangasarian of Chicago, Rabbi Hirsch of Chicago, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney of Boston, and others yet to be announced.

THE FESTIVAL.

with supper, speeches, music, and social opportunities, will be held in one of the large hotels of Chicago, or at the Union League Club (the place to be definitely announced in the Chicago daily press). Col. T. W. Higginson will preside and welcome the guests, and Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, M. J. Savage, Francis E. Abbot, Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer, William J. Potter, Paul H. Frothingham, Mangasar Mangasarian, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. McGlynn, and others are expected to speak. Reception from 6 to 7 o'clock. Supper at 7 o'clock. Tickets for the supper to be procured at the convention, and of Secretary D. G. Crandon.

THE JEWISH WOMAN'S RELIGIOUS CONGRESS

Evening Session.—RELIGION: How it is affected by the doctrine of Evolution. Spiritual implications in all progress. Materialistic speculations untenable. The immanent and transcendent Power that makes for Beauty, Order and Righteousness.

THE FRATERNITY OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES IN CHICAGO.

The bracketed words in the list below indicate the special fellowship with which the societies have been identified; but for all local, ethical and spiritual purposes the words are growing less and less in importance, when used to differentiate the one from the other. The pastors and societies named below have a growing sense of community of work and interest, viz.: The liberation of the human mind from superstition and bigotry, the consecration of the life that now is, and the ennobling of our city, our country and the world.

UNITY WILL BE GLAD TO PUBLISH, IN THIS COLUMN, SUNDAY ANNOUNCEMENTS, OR ANY OTHER NOTICE OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH ANY OF THESE SOCIETIES, FREE OF CHARGE. COPY MUST BE SENT TO UNITY OFFICE NO LATER THAN TUESDAY MORNING OF EACH WEEK.

THAT they may all be in one place. it has been decided to hold the congresses of all the denominations at the "Art Palace," rather than resort to better halls at a distance from the headquarters of the Parliament of Religions. Attention is called to the changes in the Unitarian and Free Religious programs.

LAST week was Catholic week at the Auxilliary Congress, and it was a notable one. Eminent prelates and enthusiastic laymen and laywomen filled the corridors of the Art Palace on the Lake Front, and the utterances were, with scarcely an exception, progressive, hopeful, and oftentimes radical. The Congress concerned itself in the main with the pressing questions of the day,—labor, social and political reform.

"INDUSTRIAL AMERICA" is the title of a series of articles being written for The Outlook by one of its editorial staff, who is traveling through the country in order to get first-hand impressions. Up to date the most valuable is that in the issue of September 9, wherein the writer discusses the situation in Kansas, the stronghold of the "People's Party." From the picture drawn it would seem that the People's party is really bringing about a better condition of affairs in that agricultural commonwealth.

THE long-looked for book—"Beginnings," just published by the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society,—is now on hand, and for sale at Headquarters, 175 Dearborn street. This book has been carefully edited by the president of the society, Allen W. Gould, from notes originally made by Henry Doty Maxson. To all who have become interested in the Six Years' Course this book will especially appeal. To those who have never used the Course it will prove a delightful introduction, and we believe it will prove an incentive to the use of the Course. The book is sold for 25 cents a copy, a dozen for $2.50.

FOUR HUNDRED years ago the life of Europe was much more agitated over the banishment of the Jews from Spain and their extermination in other parts of the world than over the discoveries of Columbus. Last week Dr. Hirsch, a Jewish rabbi, was welcomed with cheers onto the platform of the Catholic Congress. Archbishop Ireland was welcomed with equal heartiness by the Jewish women in Congress assembled. And at the great Welsh Elsteddfod the Mormon chorus choir from Salt Lake City carried off the second highest prize of the musical conclave with their chorus singing of two hundred and fifty voices. Surely these are prophetic times in which we live.

WE publish this week, in our Study Table department, the prospectus of a new quarterly designed for young people, which always means also the people who feel young. Mr. Morse is well known to our readers; a man versatile in many arts: skilled with pen, pencil, brush, and the sculptor's tools. He has put the lover of good things and high things under obligation to him in many ways, and for many years. If there is justification for his assuming the difficult and generally thankless task of launching a new magazine, it is justified in the present purpose of interesting young people in the permanent things of art and literature. It is a difficult problem to carry the High School boys and girls out of childhood into manhood and womanhood in the things of the spirit. This The Start undertakes to do. This, as many of our Unity clubs and churches throughout the West know, Mr. Morse can do in a very delightful fashion. And it would be a good way to start The Start in many of our parishes and Sunday schools, to send for Mr. Morse to give one or more of his always delightful crayon lectures.

DR. HENSON, of Chicago, has been treating the public, through the Baptist paper, to "some of his Theological Crotchets," one of which is a very ingenious way of getting infants into heaven without interfering with the doctrines of original sin on the one hand, or the dangers of the heresy of probation after death on the other hand. He admits that "the question is not free from difficulty," and also that the Scriptures do not address themselves to its solution. However, the Doctor plucks up courage and makes a venture. It is well to save to the loving heart of mother and father the darling little one by any means; but does it not seem like going a good way around in order to carry the little ones of whom Jesus said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," into the bosom of the infinite love and life? But this is the way a doctor of divinity of the nineteenth century manages to get a child into heaven:

May we not suspect, without being ourselves suspected of harboring the heresy of probation in a future state, that such an infant, awaking to consciousness in the presence of Christ, should be changed in the very first moment of seeing his face? Infants, atoned for by his blood, wake to behold his face in righteousness, and instantly are like him.

LAST Sunday, September 10, was the real opening of the Parliament of Religion. At least, it was a day to be long remembered by the attendants at one of the Chicago churches. In the morning, the eloquent Hindu, Protab Mozoomdar, the present leader of the simple Indian theism known as the Brahmo Somaj, delivered a most stirring address on Revelation to a congregation which filled All Souls Church to overflowing. Beginning very quietly, almost monotonously, he attained a pitch of eloquence which compelled the expression of the congregation's applause despite all scruples against such demonstrations in church. It was a flash of sunlight which went straight to the hearts of the audience, causing them to break out in sudden, heart-felt, reverent applause. In the evening the same church was filled to overflowing to witness the presentation of Buddhism by its distinguished Ceylonese representative, the white-robed Dharmapala, and its yellow-robed priests from Japan, and to hear the sweet singing of the ladies' choir from Cardiff, Wales. For two hours men and women gladly stood in the crowded church to listen to these foreign worshippers of the one great God, as they brought to the West their message of peace, and to hear the songs of praise and patriotism from our sisters across the sea.

WITH the consent and co-operation of the author a handsome special "Parliament of Religions Edition of the Sympathy of Religions," by T. W. Higginson, has been published in paper covers and with a preliminary note. The Unity Mission puts forth ten thousand copies, which they desire to give away to the representatives from distant lauds, and from as distant creeds and faiths, as a souvenir. No more beautiful memento of this great occasion could be carried home. For many years this essay has been a classic in the literature of the spirit, and now we know of nothing in print better calculated to enlarge the boundaries of human sympathy and to disintegrate the mountains of bigotry than this pamphlet. The committee is very desirous to give the entire edition away, not to throw it away, but to place it in the hands of those who will most appreciate it and are prepared to profit by it. In order to do this a special fund of about $175 will have to be raised, for the Unity Mission Committee always live from hand to mouth. Are there not many of our readers who would like to join in this communion service of thought, and help us distribute this morsel of bread that will nourish the spiritual life? Any contributions, big or small, may be sent either to Mr. Gannett, at Rochester, or to Mr. Jones at UNITY office.

THE spirit which vents itself in the oft-repeated command, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," is by no means dead. There is something refreshingly naive in the confidence of those who feel that they have made exactly the degree of progress that mankind should make, and that while those who stand behind them must hasten forward, those who are in front must hurry back, if they would have the full blessings of truth and salvation. This feeling of profound self-satisfaction, which is convinced that a step outside, whether to the right or left, of the charmed circle in which he who thus feels stands, will be a step into outer darkness, has had several somewhat prominent illustrations lately; but perhaps the best is contained in President Atwood's editorial comment in the Universalist and the Christian Leader on Professor Campbell's heresy, from which it would appear that the type of Universalism represented by Dr. Atwood is at the same time the perfect faith and the one genuine heresy. Says the Doctor:

If he is a heretic at all, he is not enough of a heretic to awaken sympathy for him among genuine heretics. As in the case of Dr. Briggs and Prof. Smith, the system Dr. Campbell adheres to is still ancient and musty to a degree that shuts him out of liberal fellowship.

We cannot believe that the good Doctor is quite devoid of sympathy for Prof. Campbell or that he would really be so cruel as to shut him out from liberal fellowship; certainly we are not disposed to act thus toward the Doctor, although much of the language which he applies to Prof. Campbell's doctrine seems to us admirably fitted to describe his own.

**

THE work of preparing the selection of universal hymns printed in connection with the programs of the Parliament of Religions finally fell into the hands of F. L. Hosmer, Mr. Gilder, the editor of the Century, Prof. Coppee of the Lehigh University, and Mr. Jones. In order to make the collection as rich and representative as possible several hundred letters were sent out asking for suggestions. Five or more favorite old hymns were asked for and contributions of original hymns solicited. The response to the first request was prompt and generous, and the answers were of great interest as showing the personal equation as well as the relative power of the classics of the soul. These suggestions were of great service to the committee. Some forty original contributions were made. These were copied by type-writer and sent anonymously to the members of the committee, and many of them approved themselves more or less strongly to different members of the committee. But inasmuch as none of the hymns succeeded in getting the majority vote of the committee, that is, three out of four, it was thought best to publish none of them in a collection whose merits have been proven by the test of time and approved by the consensus of the competent. The committee in this collection found much to commend in the way of religious poetry, but the creation of a great hymn is one of the most difficult as it is one of the most gracious tasks of the bard. In one way or another, in due time, the public will have access to the best of the material offered. Meanwhile, the committee desires to express through UNITY their thanks for the assistance furnished them by so many.

THE EISTEDDFOD.

It remained for the Welsh people to demonstrate for the first time the utility and necessity of making the great Festival Hall at Jackson Park, as large as it is. At last its splendid galleries were filled to overflowing. Last Friday was the last of a series of musical contests and bardic ovations which heretofore have been confined, in the main, to the principality of Wales: and on that day over 8,000 people were assembled within the walls. For four days this characteristic festival, which reaches back to time immemorial in the life of Britain, brought together not only the best intelligence of the Welsh people in this country, but very many representatives from the mother country. Three male choruses, numbering fifty or more voices, and the lady chorus of Cardiff crossed the sea to take part in this festival of harmony. And the Welshmen from over the seas carried off most of the prizes available to them. Prof. Tomlins, as chairman of the adjudicating board, in his decision upon the male chorus contest said: "All those who had the good fortune to be present must have felt that they were listening to a series of choral performances such as they would in all probability never hear again in the United States; that it was worthy of the occasion in connection with this stupendous World's Fair: and that it would be associated in our minds as one of the most striking features in the history of the great Eisteddfod. It was already felt that it would be so, as shown by the almost superhuman efforts made by most of the competing choirs to travel many thousands of miles in order to be present." The occasion closed with a most inspiring scene, when upward of fifteen hundred voices, trained and aglow with enthusiasm, joined in mass chorus in singing the "Hallelujah Chorus" under the leadership of the great Caradog, the hero of Welsh song, who some years ago led his chorus of Welsh yeomen to London and carried off the coveted silver cup presented by the Queen.

But this occasion was very much more than a musical festival. With much pomp and parade the ancient bardic rites, which it is claimed reached back into Druidic times and customs, were for the first time performed in the open air on American soil, and the old proclamation "THE TRUTH AGAINST THE WORLD," was declared "in the eye of light and in the face of the sun." And over the sheathed sword the message of PEACE was proclaimed. To most of our readers these rites and this conclave of bards and musicians mean nothing more than the curious enthusiasm of an unimportant clan among the nations of the earth. That it is, but it is much more than that. It is a splendid witness to the power of the gentler arts; another sign of the advancing spirit of peace. The great harmonies of last week lifted the occasion out of any geographical, national, or linguistic limitations. It was a part of that universality for which we labor, that unity of spirit we pray for. The bardic prayer read on this occasion has been handed down to us from the ancient Druids as they assembled under the oaks of Britain. It was as vital and applicable in modern Chicago as in ancient Mona. It runs thus in the literal English translation published in the program of the Eisteddfod, which program is an interesting souvenir that will have permanent value to the student of song and of races.

Render us, O God, Thy protection, and in that protection power: in that power wisdom: in that wisdom knowledge: in that knowledge, know the just: in knowing the just, love: and in love, love every attribute, and by loving every attribute love God.

A MINOR POET.

What should we do without the minor singers? It is they that fill the wood with bird-song and make glad the dawns, and they who, in the commons of human life, make the "local sibyls and seers." Their name is legion—fortunately. Lucy Smith reminds us that anyone of culture should be supposed to have the gift of versing. If not quite that be true, yet a world with only the Tennysons and Brownings and Lowells for poets in it would be a dreary world for most; so in between the many or the all of us that have more or less poetic feeling and these rare poets, come the host of minor singers, each one voicing the mute poetry of some neighborhood or circle. It is well they do not all print their verses in a book at last: yet well that many do, for repeatedly the minor poets have sung a few songs that put many hearts in debt.

Mrs. Caroline Mason was one of these minor poets, some of whose verses are likely to be remembered with long thankfulness. She was a shy citizen of Fitchburg, Mass. She had had her early dreams of fame, if certain of her poems betray her; but the dream, if dream it were, gave way to better self-knowledge and more earnest purpose. Still, however, she nursed her gift of versing. Her poems came easily, but carefully: now a song of friendship, now of nature, now of the nation in its war struggle; oftentime, perhaps, as songs of the inward life. Once or twice, at least, she touched the people far and wide, as in her simple "Do they Miss me at Home?" The liberal faith, the mood of Whittier, was sunny in her. Her best work was not in her longer poems,—such, for instance, as gave the name, "The Lost Ring," to the collection which her friends have issued since her death.* Even in her short poems there is little that is quaint or dainty in expression, and little of the lift and expansion of thought, of splendor breaking out, of far horizons glimpsed in a word or a line, which mark the power of the strong poet. Yet are not the poems quoted below something to be thankful for, if we could write them, and something to thank her for that we may read them? Take, first, this nook in a summer picture:

"How full the quiet spot of sweet perfumes,
Aromas of fresh grass and clover blooms!
How like a Sabbath stillness, or like prayer,
The cloistered calm of this sequestered air!
The very cattle, kneg-deep in the brooks,
Have lessons for us in their patient looks;
The silent hills, slow-stretching far away,
The shady hollow with the lambs at play,
In their cool bosoms, the rejoicing rills,
The sobbing of the lonely whip-poor-wills."

She ventured, what other poets have tried with less success, to string the twelve months in a rosary of sonnets. Here are those for August and November:

AUGUST.

We read of high-born dames, sick of life's glare,
Who in dim cloisters fain would end their days.
Exchanging pomp for pious prayer and praise:
Summer, is such thy role, that thou dost wear
This nun-like torpor in thine altered air?
We miss the sweet June freshness, and the ways
Of happy, hot July: this August haze
Is like a veil shrouding thy features fair;
This drowsy stillness is a convent-calm,
Oppressing us like sadness. Oh, sweet nun,
Is it for penance? What deed hast thou done,
That happy mirth should change to sob and psalm.

*THE LOST RING, and Other Poems. By Caroline A. Mason. With an introduction by Charles G. Ames. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.: Boston and New York. 1891.

And telling of thy beads against the pane
In the low patter of this August rain?

NOVEMBER.

Like a late watcher, tired and sleep-inclined,
Yet patient at her post and smiling still,
The year keeps vigil. Look you where you will,

In all her wide domain you shall not find
Her hand has lost its cunning: still the wind Plays its soft descants; still each rippling rill

Goes singing seaward: while on every hill
The sun pours benediction bland and kind
As blest the summer; still the crickets hide
In the warm grass,—and ever and anon,
A bee reels by, store-laden from the lawn
Where bloom late flowers, alert and open-eyed:

"How fair," they sigh with me, "and oh, how
dear,

This lingering sweetness of the dying year!"

How this next one—it comes from out some home—reaches to the inmost home in all of us!

"ONLY ME."

A little figure glided through the hall;
"Is that you, Pet?" the words came tenderly:
A sob—suppressed to let the answer fall—
"It isn't Pet, mamma; it's only me."

The quivering baby lips! they had not meant
To utter any word could plant a sting.
But to that mother-heart a strange pang went;
She heard, and stood like a convicted thing!

One instant, and a happy little face Thrilled 'neath unwonted kisses rained above:

And, from that moment, "Only Me" had place
And part with "Pet" in tender mother-love.

The following has appeared before in UNITY, perhaps, but it is worth reprint:

EN VOYAGE.

Whichever way the wind doth blow,
Some heart is glad to have it so:
Then blow it east or blow it west,
The wind that blows, that wind is best.

My little craft sails not alone;
A thousand fleets from every zone
Are out upon a thousand seas;
And what for me were frowning breeze
Might dash another, with the shock
Of doom, upon some hidden rock.
And so I do not dare to pray
For winds to waft me on my way.
But leave it to a Higher Will
To stay or speed me; trusting still
That all is well, and sure that He
Who launched my bark will sail with me
Through storm and calm, and will not fail,
Whatever breezes may prevail,
To land me, every peril past,
Within His sheltering heaven at last.

Then, whatsoever wind doth blow,
My heart is glad to have it so;
And blow it east or blow it west,
The wind that blows, that wind is best.

It may make some reader's soul
"unfurl its white flag of peace" to print what she calls

RECONCILIATION.

If thou wert lying cold and still and white
In death's embraces, O mine enemy!
I think that if I came and looked on thee,
I should forgive: that something in the sight
Of thy still face would conquer me, by right
Of death's sad impotence, and I should see How pitiful a thing it is to be
At feud with aught that's mortal.

So to-night,
My soul, unfurling her white flag of peace,
Foretelling that dread hour when we may meet.—

The dead face and the living,—fain would cry,

Across the years, "Oh, let our warfare cease!
Life is so short, and hatred is not sweet:
Let there be peace between us ere we die!"

And now for parts of two hymns.
The first has long been loved in "Unity Hymns and Chorals."

MATIN HYMN.

I lift the sash and gaze abroad
On the sweet earth so fair and bright;
I raise my heart to Thee, O God,
And cry, "I thank Thee for the light!"

O God, I thank Thee for each sight
Of beauty that Thy hand doth give:
For sunny skies and air and light;
O God, I thank Thee that I live!

That life I consecrate to Thee,
And ever, as the day is born,
On wings of joy my soul would flee
And thank Thee for another morn:

Another day in which to cast
Some silent deed of love abroad,
That, greating as it journeys past,
May do some earnest work for God.

Another day to do, to dare;
To tax anew my growing strength:
To arm my soul with faith and prayer:
And so reach heaven and Thee at length.

EVENTIDE.

At cool of day, with God I walk
My garden's grateful shade;
I hear his voice among the trees,
And I am not afraid.

I see His presence in the night,—
And, though my heart is awed,
I do not quail beneath the sight
Or nearness of my God.

His hand, that shuts the flowers to sleep
Each in its dewy fold,
Is strong my feeble life to keep,
And competent to hold.

I can not walk in darkness long,—
My light is by my side:
I cannot stumble or go wrong,
While following such a guide.

He is my stay and my defense,—
How shall I fall or fall?
My helper is Omnipotence!
My ruler ruleth all!

The powers below and powers above
Are subject to His care:
I cannot wander from His love
Who loves me everywhere.

What should we do without our "minor singers"? W. C. G.

THE FRIENDS OF LABOR.

Perhaps the most encouraging feature of the life of our day is the respectful attention given to those who propose to ameliorate our social conditions, whether the plans be merely opportunist and palliative or radical and far-reaching. Young men can remember the time when "Socialism," "Single Tax," "Salvation Army" work, even the milder forms of "co-operative industry," were impatiently and contemptuously scouted by the great world. But today a marked advance has been made in this respect.

The reception given to the Labor
Congress, which has recently adjourned, has done something to mark this change of sentiment. The old notion, that things are just about as they should be, or that, if they are not God himself will alter the condition of affairs in his own good time and wants no assistance from man,—the notion that he who seeks to alter the social order into which he is born is at once impious and the enemy of society,—has given place to a general acknowledgment that things are not as they should be and that man himself is the agent by whose instru-mentality a juster and happier condition is to be brought about.

In the church, which is in its nature a conservative institution,— preserving the moral achievements that men have made, rather than discovering new roads for human progress,—this condition of affairs is strongly reflected. Of course many churches—most perhaps—still deserve the reproach of being clubs for the accommodation of those engaged in the salvation of their individual souls;
but the vital churches, the earnest ministers,—Roman Catholic, Episcopal, Evangelical and Liberal,—are showing their sympathy with the questions of the day.

At the Labor congress, the Single Tax congress, and the Voluntary Cooperation congress which were held simultaneously, there were a number of ministers and editors in attendance, men whose position enables them to bring home to the great middle class the crying problems of the hour and the solutions proposed, and some of these have lost no time in bringing the matter before their hearers and readers. Besides the quite generous newspaper notices and reports of the congress addresses, we would call attention to the fact that in Chicago on the eve of Labor Day two Episcopal churches, St. James and Epiphany, held special labor services. "Call," i. e., the Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor, was the sponsor for these meetings, and they were helpful, educative. At St. James Mr. Tomkins urged his hearers to interest themselves in the problems of the day, and at least to treat respectfully those who were spending their lives in the earnest effort to grapple with the social evils that beset us, whether the solutions they proposed seemed to us wholly wise or not. He admitted that the church had been neglectful of its opportunities and duties in the past, but protested that it had begun to realize that moral and social questions were religious questions, and he sought to bring this truth home to his hearers. The collection taken up was for the benefit of the unemployed.

It may be suggested that such indications of sympathy with reform are of so general a character as to count for little; but that is not so. This general open-mindedness is of the utmost importance, it is the sine qua non without which the most clearly defined schemes of reform are impossible of achievement. For this reason primarily, and also because space forbids us to go into detail, we have dwelt especially upon the general sentiment exhibited; but it must not be supposed that the congresses have nothing else to show. On the contrary, the Labor Congress was a very rich one; it was both practical and scientific. It discussed the various conditions of child and female and adult male labor, as they exist to-day in city and country, here and abroad; pointed out the evils both patent and latent in the existing industrial system, as they appeared from various points of view,—that of the wage-earner, the employer and the various schools of social science, orthodox, nationalist, collectivist, single tax, etc.; discussed the questions of public administration, taxation, legislation, ballot reform, etc., and listened to expositions of the various solutions proposed for the several problems before it, from the tongues and pens of the most able representatives of these views. It was really a congress of social science, and no one could attend any considerable number of the meetings, however narrow his views had previously been, without feeling their broadening influence and at the same time learning much of a definite and positive character. We regard the Labor Congress as one of the marked successes of the Columbian Exposition, and we believe it will bear rich fruit.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New-Church Messenger speaks of the Unitarian exhibit at the Columbian Exposition as follows: "The Unitarians happen to come next, in a snow-white booth, with much literature and many small photographs of great men. Mrs. Humphrey Ward appears as a minister. The tracts are not self-congratulatory or openly aggressive as in other booths, but thoughtful essays of a decidedly critical and cautious tone. This exhibit is in charge of a lady, and is unique in this respect."

REVELATION.

A gleam of Truth, a flood of light!
And lo, the earth is glorified!
No longer dwell our souls in night,
For Love and Life are now allied.

I look into those speaking eyes,
Where faithful love finds eloquence,
And then into the starry skies,
With heart upraised in reverence,—

And see the self-same power there
That guides a soul or rules a star.
O blessed thought! O visions fair,
Of heaven, revealed, so near and far!

ATHEISM.

In accordance with a natural tendency to violent transitions I make it a rule when traveling abroad, whenever it is practicable to do so, to experience the great opposite extremes. I make religious worship no exception, and therefore attend the Roman Catholic church and the services of the Salvation Army and all the other denominations en route for the same purpose. It might be interesting and instructive to give the impressions created by the various illustrations of the Christian faith thus encountered, but it is not my purpose to start a polemical discussion, but simply to refer to one feature which I find is prominently discussed in all the churches I visit,—that is, the admission of the growing tendency to atheism. Not long since I listened to a very stirring sermon on the subject by the venerable Archbishop Ireland, and have heard similar utterances in various other denominations. Inasmuch, however, as it may be fairly assumed that atheism is seldom represented in a Christian congregation, it appears to me that any attempt to reach the atheist from the pulpit must necessarily prove futile. Therefore I should be glad if you would allow me to address him through your columns, in the hope that my argument may be brought to his notice and prove operative in convincing him of the fallacy of his views.

It seems to me to be unreasonable and unnatural that anyone endowed with the power of reflection can conceive that this universe exists without a creator or goes on without a great conductor. Every intelligent being is aware of a perfect design in nature. I will therefore ask the atheist and those having a tendency to atheism to follow me in a few sketches. First, we will take a little living plant and study its growth and functions of promulgation. First, this little plant possesses the power of absorbing compound substances, of decomposing them and recombining them in a different way; but no one can say where the decomposing leaves off and the recomposing begins. This little plant is in itself a living laboratory greater by far than that of the most skillful chemist that ever lived.

Secondly. The root, trunk and leaves have separate functions, though working in unison; the root serves to fix the plant firmly in the soil; it is also the organ by which plant food is collected and absorbed; the root sends out fibers in every direction in search of liquid food, which is sucked in and dispatched, as sap, to the upper parts of the tree; the chemical changes which the food plant has to undergo in the tree are beyond man's power to explain.

Thirdly. The tree sends out its leaves for the same purpose that the root sends out its fibers—in search of food—the only difference being that the root absorbs liquid food, and the leaves gaseous food. During the day the leaves are continually absorbing carbonic acid from the air and giving off oxygen gas. When night comes on the process is reversed. Now the air contains only one gallon of carbonic acid in 2,000 (a proportion just necessary for animal life), and to catch this small amount the tree sends out thousands of leaves by whose conjoined labors the substance of the plant is slowly drawn from the air. Cannot the atheist recognize an omnipotent designer in chemistry so wonderful?

Now let us turn to the beautiful and abstruse science of geology for further proof of a great Creator's forethought. Scattered all over the world we find deposits of coal suitable for domestic and steam consumption. Let us think for a moment how could the world's power of the present day be developed if it were not for these deposits. Could our great commerce over land and sea be maintained without coal? Coal is what remains to us of the carboniferous age. And then let us think of the enormous undertaking the carboniferous age represents. Millions and millions of trees drawing plant life from earth and air, and storing unknown power for future use. The chemical changes which that age involved thousands and thousands of years ago are now the motive power of the world, and the bottled-up sunlight the illumining power of gas. Could anything show more plainly that these deposits were designedly placed for future use; placed, too, in such positions that immense labor—a superabundance of which was anticipated—would be required to manipulate them for consumption, both in its original state as coal and as gas?

Now, apart from the carboniferous age, what has geology to teach us of the great Creator's will to produce a world fit for human beings and human beings fit for the world? In the silurian age lived millions and millions of beings that twisted and wriggled and knew not why, evidently unconscious of their own existence, each simply a mechanical feeding machine, yet possessing a cold, nervous system clearly discernible. They lived and died, these myriads, and the age departed, but the evolutionist has marked it and the geologist claimed it. The next age, the Devonian, produced a higher grade—a step higher in the contriver's ladder—a better developed system of nerve and activity. Fishes of enormous proportions lived and died in millions, and that age passed away, leaving unmistakable evidence of its duration for geologists to study. The next age, the carboniferous, I have already spoken of, and I will pass to the next in the scale of development, the reptilian, in which remarkable and stupendous progress is made in creation. Next, for the mightiest age of all—the mammalian, or age of man, for who will deny that man is the most perfectly organized being on earth? Carefully developed as he is out of the ages of the past, he is the acme of terrestrial production, a well-organized being, having a nervous system and brain power of the highest development, increasing in intensity as the race grows older, a logical thinker and reasoner, possessing memory and forethought, capable of planning for the future by the recollections of the past. Such is man of the present day, and as his development of the present age is as ten to one of the reptilian age, what may be the pleasure of the great Creator, what proportion shall the next age bear to man of to-day?

As we are gods to the reptiles, so may the next age be indeed gods to us.

The atheist, in common with others, looking at a very cleverly constructed machine, would be likely to put the question, "Who made it?" well knowing its component parts of rods, bolts, nuts, and wheels could not adjust themselves, but must have been placed together. Now if we glance at the starry system, of which we are a part, or study it minutely by maps or by a telescope, we become fully aware that this earth is one of a number of performing elliptics and a central attraction, and that it has been so for many thousands of years, and is likely to continue for thousands more; but with the future we will not deal; the past is sufficient to prove that its functions have been performed diurnally and annually without one false beat in its mighty course, and so confident are we of the future that we date an action forward for years without the least misgiving as to its duration. As we study this mighty machine with its profound workings we are naturally led to ask, "Who made it?" and with reverent humility are inevitably obliged to answer, "A great Creator."

Now, all these functions have been performed with a regularity that admits of no reproach: each revolution of the earth round the sun bringing changes of season to its inhabitants, thereby causing untold blessings to the agriculturist and to all people in general; the regularity of the moon's rotation proves a boon in the systematic rise and fall of the tides, preventing stagnancy of otherwise still waters and helping to change the whole outline of continents by its continual wash; the moving waters being thereby able to furnish subsistence to myriads of fishes which could not exist in stagnant waters. The precision with which all these functions are performed points necessarily to a great creator, who either developed them as necessity required or brought them into spontaneous existence. The study of astronomy, in fact, opens up the human mind to such an extent that we are bound to recognize the perfection of the universe, exactitude being everywhere apparent.

But we will not go further into the question now; it is enough to ponder over the everlasting method in which the water from the hill runs to the stream, the stream to the river, the river to the ocean, to be gathered up by continuous evaporation, the formation of clouds ensuing, and the ultimate discharge of rain drops as blessings on the earth. The systematic hand-in-hand process, the beautiful dove-tailed way in which all these performances are carried on so methodically and unerringly, are to me infallible proofs of a great creator and a great conductor under whose power they run. The attributes of all matter prove the universal law of similitude—the inertia—the attractive and the indestructibility, and open up channels for reflection which must result in the recognition of a great creator's power, whose chemistry is beyond us and in whose laboratory this earth is but a sample speck of dust.

I will now leave the atheist for the present to ponder over these facts, and will from time to time give him more matter to reflect on, in the meantime commending to him the beautiful lines of the poet:

There is a God, and that ye may see In the roar of the thunder, the hum of the bee.

* * * * *
Turn where ye will, from the sky to the sod.

Where can ye gaze that ye see not a God?

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

From Prof. John R. Commons' article in the Twentieth Century, we quote a few words explanatory of the reform on which our Australian friend, Miss Spence, lays the greatest stress. During the meetings held in connection with the World's Fair Suffrage Congress, after one of this enthusiastic liberal's addresses, an experimental ballot was taken. Fourteen candidates were nominated and six were to be elected. Slips of paper were circulated among the audience bearing the names of all the candidates. The voters were instructed to indicate the candidate who was their first choice by the figure 1, and to indicate their successive choices up to the sixth by the proper figures. One hundred and thirty-two ballots were cast and only four were defective. As a result of the election every shade of opinion in the audience was accurately represented in the list of the six successful candidates. There were two Republicans, Harrison and McKinley, two Democrats, Cleveland and Henry George (thus showing how successfully this method of voting allows differences within party lines, as well as between parties, to be freely and accurately represented), a Prohibitionist, Miss Frances E. Willard, and a Populist, James B. Weaver. The result of the vote had a most interesting effect on the apprehensions of the audience and the newspaper reporters.

An American Proportional Representation League was organized with Hon. William Dudley Foulke as President and Mr. Stoughton Cooley, of 22 Fifth avenue, Chicago, as Secretary, and the following suggestion was put forth:

OUTLINE OF A BILL FOR ELECTING MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ACCORDING TO PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

That the members of the House of Representatives shall be voted for at large in their respective States. That a ticket composed of any number of candidates may be nominated by any body of electors in any State which polled at the last preceding election one per cent. of the total vote for Congressmen, or by a petition of voters amounting to one per cent. of such total vote. These tickets shall be printed on the official ballot.

Each elector has as many votes as there are representatives to be elected, which he may distribute as he pleases among the candidates, giving not more than one vote to any one candidate. Should he not use the entire number of votes to which he is entitled his unexpressed votes to be counted for the ticket which he shall designate by title. The votes given to candidates shall count individually for the candidates as well as for the tickets to which the candidates belong. That the sum of all the votes cast in any State shall be divided by the number of seats to which such State is entitled, and the quotient to the nearest unit shall be known as the quota of representation. The sums of all the votes cast for the tickets of each party or political body nominating candidates shall be severally divided by the quota of representation, and the units of the quotients thus obtained will show the number of representatives to which each such body was entitled, and if the sum of such quotients be less than the number of seats to be filled the body of electors having the largest remainder after division of the sums of the votes cast by the quota of representation as herein specified shall be entitled to the first vacancy, and so on until all the vacancies are filled. That the candidates of each body of electors nominating candidates and found entitled to representation under the foregoing rules shall receive certificates of election in the order of the votes received, a candidate receiving the highest number of votes the first certificate, and so on; but in case of a tie, with but one vacancy to be filled, the matter shall be determined between the candidates so tied. That if a member of the House of Representatives shall die or resign, or his seat become vacant for any reason, the remainder of his term shall be served by the candidate having the next highest vote of the body of electors to which such member belongs.

"THERE IS NO DEATH."

EDITOR OF UNITY: In reply to your correspondent of last week who asks information regarding the author of the poem entitled "There Is No Death," I would say that a writer in the Religio-Philosophical Journal two or three years ago stated that the author is Mr. J. L. McCreery, and not E. Bulwer Lytton, to whom it has been erroneously credited. The writer of the article gives the facts as follows: The poem was published by Mr. McCreery in 1863. It was copied by one E. Bulmer and published later under his name. This was again copied by a Wisconsin paper, which changed the signature from Bulmer to Bulwer, supposing the former name to be a misprint. I give the poem below as found in Mr. McCreery's volume of poems, "Songs of Toil and Triumph."

THERE IS NO DEATH.

There is no death! the stars go down
To rise upon some other shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine for evermore.

There is no death! the forest leaves
Convert to life the viewless air:
The rocks disorganize to feed
The hungry moss they bear.

There is no death! the dust we tread
Shall change, beneath the summer
showers,
To golden grain, or mellow fruit,
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

There is no death! the leaves may fall,
The flowers may fade and pass away—
They only wait, through wintry hours,
The warm, sweet breath of May.

There is no death! the choicest gifts
That heaven hath kindly lent to earth
Are ever first to seek again
The country of their birth:

And all things that for growth or joy
Are worthy of our love or care,
Whose loss has left us desolate,
Are safely garnered there.

Though life become a desert waste,
We know its fairest, sweetest flowers,
Transplanted into paradise,
Adorn immortal bowers.

The voice of birdlike melody
That we have missed and mourned so long
Now mingles with the angel choir
In everlasting song.

There is no death! Although we grieve
When beautiful, familiar forms

That we have learned to love are torn
From our embracing arms,—

Although with bowed and breaking heart,

With sable garb and silent tread,
We bear their senseless dust to rest,
And say that they are "dead,"—

They are not dead! they have but passed

Beyond the mists that blind us here,
Into the new and larger life
Of that serener sphere.

They have but dropped their robe of clay

To put their shining raiment on;
They have not wandered far away,—
They are not "lost," nor "gone."

Though disenthralled and glorified,
They still are here and love us yet;
The dear ones they have left behind
They never can forget.

And sometimes, when our hearts grow faint

Amid temptations fierce and deep,
Or when the wildly raging waves
Of grief or passion sweep,

We feel upon our fevered brow
Their gentle touch, their breath of balm,

Their arms enfold us, and our hearts
Grow comforted and calm.

And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear, immortal spirits tread—
For all the boundless universe
Is Life—there are no dead!

Readers will notice that the poem as given above is not only longer but different in some of its verses from copies which are frequently seen. But as this comes from the author's own volume I suppose it may be relied on.

Notes from the Field

Iowa Conference.—The next session of the Iowa Unitarian Association will be held at Davenport, Oct. 10-12. We hope for many visitors from Illinois and neighboring States.

LEON A. HARVEY, Sec.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—On Sunday, Sept. 3, Rev. H. Digby Johnston was installed as minister of Unity Church. The services were held in the beautiful hall of the Ladies' Literary Club building, which has been secured for Sunday use during the coming year. The hall is centrally situated, on the first floor, and altogether a cheerful and attractive auditorium. The day was fair and the congregations, both morning and evening, unusually large. The music was in charge of a quartette choir and was well rendered in the special selections, while the hymns were congregational. In the morning service Dr. Jesselson, of the Jewish Temple, read the Scripture; Mr. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor, led in prayer; and Mr. Hosmer, late Secretary of the Western Conference, gave the right-hand of fellowship. Mr. Hosmer also preached the sermon, taking for his subject, "Hearsay and Vision." Mr. Sunderland gave the charge to the people. Preceding all these parts, save the prayer, was the reading of the call and letter of acceptance by the Secretary of the Board of Trustees, E. G. D. Holden, Esq. No part was more impressed or beautiful in its directness and simplicity than the "address of welcome" by Mrs. I. M. Turner, President of the Board of Trustees. The evening service continued the service of the morning. Mr. Hugenholz, of the Holland Unitarian Society, read the Scripture lesson. Mr. Hosmer offered prayer. Mr. Sunderland gave the charge to the new minister, and the latter closed the service with an address to the congregation. Mr. Johnson comes from the Episcopal Church, wherein he has had pastorates both in England and in this country. He brings enthusiasm and experience to his new work, and the society enters upon its new year with a quickened courage and faith. Rev. H. T. Root, of Grand Haven, who was upon the program of the morning service, was detained at home by illness.

Cleveland, O.—Unity Church was reopened for services on the first Sunday of September, the newly called ministers, Revs. Marion Murdoch and Florence Buck, occupying the pulpit for the first time. They were greeted by large congregations both morning and evening. Miss Murdoch preached in the morning upon "The Ideal," and Miss Buck in the evening upon "Church Unity," both taking a share in each service. In spirit and general thought their words sounded a fit inaugural note and met a hearty response from the well-filled pews. The church building has undergone a thorough cleaning and repair within, the main auditorium, chapel and parlors having been new-carpeted, and the walls and ceiling of the main room having been re-frescoed. The Unity Club, which is one of the strongest, both in the character of its work and in the cohesiveness it has shown since its organization in 1880, had its year's program in print some months ago. The first meeting will be held late in September.

London, Eng.—One enlargement of the social settlement idea has been emphasized in the name taken for the new establishment at Islington, which is called, not a college, but a Ladies' Settlement. Miss Magee, daughter of the late Archbishop of York, is to be the Superintendent, and, under a council, to be responsible for the management of the home and comfort of the workers. It is stated that the purpose is "to give training and opportunities for systematic work to ladies who desire to give themselves to the work of Christ among the poor." The Outlook states further that the Settlement will provide a home for those who are willing to work among the people under the direction of the parochial clergy.

A RELIGION OF SUNSHINE: AND SOME OF THE WAYS A LIBERAL CONTRIBUTES THERETO.

BY REV. ARTHUR M. JUDY, OF DAVENPORT, IA.

HEAVEN.

"My religion is sunshine," says Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage in one of his oft-repeated lectures. Good. But how get into every nook and corner of our souls the cheeriness which sunshine implies?

Religion is our response to the Universe: it is the state of heart and mind which the totality of things makes upon us, and if that is to be sunny, we must be able to look upon all that is now and is to be as altogether right and lovely.

Then there must be no hell. With a spot existing where torment goes on forever, where souls writhe in agony, and despair broods on every countenance, and blasphemy and torture and hatred and defiance and gloom make the sum total of sentience, the universe would be incapable of filling the soul with sunshine. Hell is a kill-joy. No sane man can fix his thoughts upon it and be cheerful. No merciful man can think of heaven with delight until he puts hell out of mind. And by no twisting and dodging can the universe be depicted as wholly right and lovely until hell's fabled fires are disbelieved. By all means let our religion be sunshine. As we look into the illimitable future let no spot appear which is to be forever terrible. The present, measured against the future, is but a speck. What that future offers is and always has been a chief factor in man's religion. Unless in that future men can form the realization of their noblest desires they cannot look upon it with unalloyed brightness. The religion which proclaims eternal progress, not the religion which predicts eternal torment, meets this requirement. He who believes that every mortal soul is to be saved; he who holds that the path of man is to trend forever upward, no matter how many temporary descensions it may undergo, can logically and justly have a religion of sunshine. Strict Calvinists cannot. A future which may carry child or friend or parent to eternal torment, may involve nations and eras of men in hopeless misery, can shed sunshine upon no soul which has not first lost or stunted the quality of mercy.

Until Calvinism began to lose its strictness the religion of America was prevalently gloomy. And vain is it to call upon men to cast out this gloom, unless first they be taught to cast out the cause of the gloom. So the Liberal churches have been and are teaching them, and every church-goer in America carries a brighter face to-day in consequence of that teaching, and will carry a still brighter one when the teaching has done its perfect work.

BIBLE.

But religion must have regard not only to the future of mankind but also to the present. Here is the world full of men and women. Only a few of its many billions have enjoyed or are likely to enjoy the benefits of the Christian Bible. If that Bible be the source of all true religion, can we be cheerful in thinking that the vast majority of men are and have been totally deprived of the truth? Surely not. Surely no compassionate man could be happy in believing that what is to him perhaps the highest source of happiness, his religion, has been utterly denied to untold millions of men. No, the happy man is he who feels that in every age "truth and right have been revealed;" that as men mount the steps of being the sun of truth and righteousness sheds its glad rays impartially upon all. I love my One Hundred and Third Psalm,— "Whither, O God, shall I flee from thy presence!" I love my Romans, Twelve,— "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds;" I love my beatitudes,— "Blessed are the pure in heart;" I love my Apocalypse with its vision of the "land of pure delight;" and I rejoice with exceeding joy to think of the millions of Christian lives upon whom these noble sculptures have poured celestial rays. But sadly would that joy be checked could I not believe that wheresoever there have been hearts ready to receive the light of these same high truths, there the light has shone,—on the templed hills of Greece, over the flowery homes of Japan, in the sacred groves of India, in the dateless sepulchers of Egypt, amid the rose gardens of Persia, within the massive walls of Babylon, upon the lone cottage of the Teuton, and over the prairies of primeval America,—yea, even here, where the red Indian "touched God's right hand in the darkness and was lifted up and strengthened." Friends, the happy student of religion is not he who pores over the pages of the Bible, seeking therein the one only light which lighteth the world, but he who catches that light streaming from a thousand books, and knows that every discovery which yields up to us a new literature is lifting a blind which has heretofore hidden from our sight pages which have for long ages shed sunshine upon devout and earnest hearts. Ah, 'tis the Liberal, 'tis the man who believes in universal, not special revelation, who can have sunshine in heart as he thinks of the countless races of men.

DUTY.

But there are yet other ways in which we are bound to think of these races of men. Not only must we ask has the light of celestial truths been shed upon them from the words of illumined leaders, but also must we ask,—Have they, the people, lived up to these truths? Have they done, do they now do justice, man to man? I said, a moment ago, that the shadow of hell necessarily casts a gloom over the heart of the strict Calvinist. I believe it. But I also believe that the strictly righteous lives which the best of the Calvinists sought, and yet seek to live, goes far to counteract that gloom. Our strictly pious ancestors were wont to "have joy at eventide because they had spent the day well." Christian love was in their hearts for wife and bairn. Christian mercy was there for the sorrowful and needy, Christian purity was there amid the social hour, Christian justice was there, filling the measure full to running over. Vain is it for either Liberal or Orthodox to imagine he can attain a religion of sunshine if he live not, as they sought to live, a righteous life. Think of the men and women about us one must,—think of the way we have hated them, think of what has come to them because of us,—and unless in the hour of recollection they rise up happier for what we have said and done, then, cheerful we cannot be.

Therefore a church which is to increase the sunshine of religion must be a church which makes mightily for righteousness. The Japanese are said to be a sunny people, and they have a religion which does make for righteousness. Buddhism supplemented by Confucianism, which constitutes the practical part of their religion, would, if lived up to, go a great way toward making any man happy in so far as his happiness springs from relation to his fellow men. And Christianity, as epitomized in the Sermon on the Mount, or the twelfth chapter of Romans, would do for the American people more than Buddhism and Confucianism have done for the Japanese, if only our daily walk and conversation were molded into harmony with its glorious ideals. If our love were without dissimulation; if we were given to hospitality; if we overcame evil with good; if we rejoiced with those who rejoice, wept with those who weep; if we lived peaceably with all men, thought no more highly of ourselves than we ought to think; if we were fervent in spirit, patient in tribulation, instant in prayer; if we were affectionate to one another, in honor preferred one another, and were not wise in our own conceit; if we avenged not ourselves, blessed them that persecuted us, blessed and cursed not; and if we overcame evil with good, feeding the enemy who hungered, giving drink to him who thirsted,—then indeed, by this glorious renewing of our minds, would we learn what is the good and perfect and acceptable will of God, and sunshine—rich, golden, abounding sunshine—would fill our hearts to overflowing, and every day our lives would be a song of praise, beloved of men, and dear to the heart of the Eternal.

Now, friends, we of the Liberal ranks are accounted a cheery folk, or we wish so to be accounted. If our wish is to be in any large measure realized we must be a people who, in our daily walk and conversation, conspicuously live up to the highest ideas of the Christian parent, child, friend, neighbor, citizen, workman.

In this world there are vast wrongs. Think of these wrongs, men must; see them they must; and only in so far as a man is conscious that he has sought to avoid and undo them will he be cheery.

The condition of happiness, remember, is love; such love as cherishes, protects, forgives and helps the beloved of one's own family; and only in so far as we exercise that love in the whole circle of our human relations can we attain happiness, or add sunshine to the world. Not by theology only, but by sociology also is brightness to be gained for religion.

BEAUTY.

Another great cause of sunshine in religion is beauty. Our Puritan forefathers, in their extreme earnestness for right theology and right conduct, foolishly scorned and anathematized beauty. In their vindication I will say, as Thackeray says in effect, that if there were no other way to knock the nonsense and wickedness out of an established church except by knocking the nose off its cathedral saint, then off the nose should go. Men, no matter in what direction they get headed, need constantly to be restored to sanity by iconoclastic blows; and I am not here so much to blame the actions of our religious forefathers, as to regret the necessities which turned them so far from the pathway of beauty. But whatever the occasion which justified them in depriving themselves of the æsthetic source of sunshine in religion, no such occasion exists for us, and the sooner we lift beauty once more to its co-ordinate place with truth and goodness, the better for the world. The house of God, beautiful in every curve and line, we ought once more to have. And service gladdened by every exalting strain that music can let fall, we ought also to have. Ours, too, ought to be every scripture wherein the things of the soul have been voiced in phrases of undying eloquence. And ours the sermon which not only declares truth and right but also reveals delicacy and proportion and grace,—those elements of form and color whereby space is rendered attractive. The harsh earnestness of the fanatic preacher is powerless to the extent that it is beautyless. It makes no appeal to one of the best seeds of human nature. It ignores the approach to men's hearts which Jesus made use of when he bade men "behold the lilies of the field," or the Psalmists when they imbedded their thoughts in the untarnishable gold of beautiful metaphor. Let us, therefore, if we would give the services of our churches their utmost power, seek once more to clothe them in beauty.

But the beauty we make use of must be genuine and pertinent, suited to our age and expressive of our highest æsthetics. The old discrimination between sacred and secular beauty is as uncalled for and as injurious as was the old discrimination between sacred and secular scriptures or sacred and secular men. "All is of God," exclaims the poet, and the Liberal, believing this declaration in its full bearing, holds that every beautiful thing which can inspire gentleness or deepen trust is sacred and should become part of that religion which seeks sunshine wherever it may be found. Therefore the altar candle and flower, the prescribed vestment, the regulated genuflection, the canonical phrases—right enough and helpful enough though they may be for some people—are a pitifully small quota of the beauty whereby sunshine is to be infused into religion, and a pitifully stilted part to bear the distinction, sacred. Not to making much of such beauty is the church of the future especially called, but to opening men's eyes to the beauty of land and sea, to sending them forth to walk at eventide in their gardens that the witchery of the sunset may possess their hearts, to training them to revel in the form of a tree-top outlined against a dark-blue sky, to fashioning their ears to catch the subtle charms when birds of spring "waken melody," to persuading them that ever present fields of golden grain are more delightful than the golden streets of New Jerusalem, and the flash of our majestic rivers a more eloquent symbol of the splendor of God than walls of chrysolite and gates of pearl.

Yes, friends, "there's beauty all around us," and I know no more certain way by which religion can be filled with sunshine than by persuading men that through and in this beauty God is evermore speaking to the hearts of his children and revealing the ineffable glory of his being. To lead men to find God in the rose; to make them heedful of its call to faith and holiness, is the peculiar opportunity of the Liberal churches and insures them a marvelous future. Oh, that they be, leader and follower, duly consecrated to this glad labor of cheer and delight.

KNOWLEDGE.

In the field of knowledge also the Liberal church has a great opportunity for adding joyousness to religion. On the whole, taken the world over, the church is friendly to knowledge, but its friendship is too often conditional. It has a way of saying thus far and no farther. It has a still worse way of assuming that its own traditional and sanctified theories are the best obtainable. Because of this unsupportable assumption the churches, the world over, are shutting the sunshine out of religion. In so far as they show extraordinary zeal in supporting schools, are eager to have children educated, and recognize that morality and religion prosper in proportion as knowledge flourishes, they do indeed let in the sunshine. But that fatal theory of revelation and that still more fatal bondage to creedal statements to which they are committed—these accidents not essence of their religion—lead them to look upon truth too much as if it were something given and done in times past, not as it is, something to be forever advancing and never done. This larger and more joyous view the Liberal churches hold with greatest clearness. To their thinking revelation is going on now more than it has ever gone on. They believe that the same forces—observation, reflection, inference, the natural processes of the mind which produced the sublime pages of the prophets and the tender verses of the evangelists—are at work now producing and yet to produce pages of inspiration and love which, while differing in form, will subserve the same high ends that the great words of the great past have subserved.

Liberals may, indeed, tremble at the new discovery or the new interpretation which strikes at the foundation of some cherished belief; they may be, nay, have been and will be, impatient and unfair in dealing with this peace-disturbing innovation; for that is human; but driven onward by their fundamental conviction that no statement of truth can be final, no honest doubt wicked, no established fact dangerous, they ever have been and ever must be friendly even toward him who digs down to the very roots of their faith and probes to its very heart to see whether or not it be rotten.

And this, friends, must be the attitude of the church or the man who would enjoy a sunny religion. Fear is gloom; it is cloud and darkness, and there is to-day no more pathetic sight in the religious world than to see preachers and deacons, together with parents and teachers, advising the faithful not to read the new thought of the new world, admonishing them not to endanger their faith by bringing it to the touchstone of the great discoveries and theories of modern times. This action cannot put sunshine, has not put it, into the religion of the churches so acting. It has taken sunshine out of their religion, set a specter of fear over it, and transformed it into a cloud, darkening the horizon of thought.

But such a course is altogether needless. The new knowledge of the new day does not take away but adds to the food upon which religion feeds. Never was there stronger and more earnest faith than many of the world's foremost scholars enjoy to-day. Tennyson, for one, feared not over modern science and philosophy, searched deeply into it, greatly mastered it, and yet in the full maturity of his years and powers, and after all his long-searching, could write:

Will my tiny spark of being wholly vanish in your deeps and heights?
Must my day be dark by reason, O ye heavens, of your boundless nights,
Rush of suns and roll of systems, and your fiery clash of meteorites?
"Spirit nearing yon dark portal at the limit of thy human state.
Fear not thou the hidden purpose of that power which alone is great,
Nor the myriad world, his shadow, nor the silent opener of the gate."

When ten thousand thousand sermons, filed with fear of science, and casting the shadow of their fear into the timid minds of their hearers, shall have gone down to dust, these verses of a poet who gave ready welcome to every enlargement of thought will lend a ray of sunshine to the religion of coming years. They proclaim a faith not to be daunted by roll of systems, clash of fiery meteorites; they declare that after our human state we may trust to find another day beyond the boundless nights of heaven; that, as to the prophets of old their little world appeared but the garment of God, so to this, our later prophet, the myriads worlds he knew were but the shadow of Him who alone is great, of Him whose hidden purpose none should fear. Is there not sunshine in his thought? Is it not certain that only they can re-enforce the sunshine of religion who, casting off all fear, all trammels, all prejudices, master the utmost which science reveals, and still "fear not the hidden purpose," "nor the silent opener of the gate"?

A FORECAST.

It is hazardous to prophesy, friends, yet despite the hazard I cannot keep back the assurance with which my heart is filled. I foresee a bright day for religion, a sunny day. I foresee it spread and deepen. I foresee thronged churches, mighty preachers, loyal disciples. I foresee the old reproaches done away, the old stagnation overcome. From the eager tongue to the eager heart, I know that stirring words will leap and joy be made to abound.

When the nations believe that "all is of God," when truth is their authority, and science their revelation, when beauty is felt to be holy, and care for the rights of others esteemed the highest worship, when the religions of every age and nation which have guided the conscience and reason of men are respected, and for all men, in all ages of being, eternal progress is proclaimed, then will that joy abound, then the stirring word be spoken, then with consistency will every man be able to say "My religion is sunshine." But not until then. Be it ours to speed the coming of that day

It is to see an infant suffering from the lack of proper food. It is entirely unnecessary, as a reliable food can always be obtained; we refer to the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk—sold by grocers and druggists everywhere.

World's Fair Notes

Going the rounds of the State buildings one finds a great deal that lends decided interest to the Fair. Some are very modest and offer little more than their hospitality. But that goes far to insure the general enjoyment. And the amount of information concerning the productive resources and general advantages of the State you chance to pay your respects to, which one may carry away if he will, is so considerable that he feels anew how wondrously beautiful Nature is in supplying these States and Territories with natural wealth, opportunities of enjoyment and comfort that are seemingly inexhaustible. That a people thrice blessed in this way should get panicky and go starving is passing strange. There must be some trick at the bottom of it all which somebody knows well how to play, by which the common intelligence is juggled with and made to believe some strange and horrible doctrine of "finance" or "trade"—a sort of "now you see it, and now you don't"—ending every twenty years. It is said, in "loss of confidence" and ruin.

But what a commentary on all this the States present as in their unique homes at the Fair they greet you and display their illimitable resources and confidence. And how interesting is the history lying back of them in the years, few or many. Some boasting, too, but with a pleasant flavor to it. "Texas, sir, is the paragon of States. Big enough to put within its limits the whole German Empire and the State of Vermont thrown in. For climate, this world nowhere else can rival it. You have a foretaste of what you may find in some future heavenly sphere, if you chance to wander in that direction."

A very cordial welcome in Louisiana's home, with invitations to come that way and "make us a visit, if nothing more."

The latch-string of old Kentucky is always out.

Ohio, with her "jewels"—and certainly they are men of exceptional note, though it is to be observed that they are all statesmen or soldiers; her philosophers, scientists, poets, men of letters not appearing. It will mark the period of a higher evolution when her "jewels" are made up, in good part, at least, of men and women charged with other functions than those which save a State from the armed foe or govern it. The fine fibers of a people's life are woven into a truer glory by other hands.

Pennsylvania, with her "Liberty bell," ever guarded by a stalwart, cherry-blossom, polite policeman at the entrance, has a building and accommodations that do the successors of Penn and Franklin, whose statues are conspicuous over the door, great credit. And within is ample room for rest and luncheon, and a reading-room with all the leading dailies of the country at your convenience. The Pennsylvanians are a proud race and evidently enjoy the impression they make with their building at the Fair.

To Wisconsin and Indiana belongs the honor of having led in the hospitality of providing space for the hungry to empty their lunch boxes with comfort and cheer. Gov. Peck may not be much of a character, politically speaking (or he may; I don't know), but when he walked into the building and tore down the placards, "No lunches here," he showed that he comprehended the true significance of these stable institutions. They are not (primarily) shows, but abodes of welcome and comfort. By this act of vandalism on his part the Wisconsin building, closely followed by Indiana, obtained at once exceptional popularity. A good idea travels as fast as anything else does, and soon the fashion of having a good time in State buildings became universal.

To go upstairs and peek into the "exact reproduction" of an old-time Connecticut bed-chamber, with its "quilt a hundred years old," in the Connecticut building, was to me very like going back to boyhood days—so precisely like the old originals were curtain, bureau, washstand, bowl and pitcher, feather bed and all. But a feather bed now! One would as lief settle down into a bed of hot ashes. However, what that feather bed did not mean in other days, when the winters lasted six months and Jack Frost was greedy and eager for youthful toes, no one can briefly tell.

California, who celebrates to-day, is perhaps the most ambitious in her displays. Two or three county fairs are packed in her inclosure. With her "Civilization has gone steadily on since '49," I was told; "till now she is up with the most advanced, and is to lead in the near future." The "near future" was Kearney's pet phrase when he led his onslaught against the Chinese. "They must go," he cried. And the whole country has at last (by its laws) adopted his motto. What greater proof could the Golden State now offer of its lead in civilization than by turning square in its tracks and escaping as soon as possible from this false trail after these "heathen Chinese"? If the State is so big and so rich in all resources, can't it do a little missionary work of the true American sort, and learn to let live as well as live itself?

The thought in mind when I began these notes was simply the common one every mind entertains—how vast, how great, how rich these United States be! If only they knew how wisely and honorably to distribute things—what added glory would be theirs.

LOST AND FOUND.

"I don't care! you can go home as soon as you like—so there."
Slam went the door.
I confess I was surprised and grieved to hear the angry voice of the Princess. "Poor child!" I thought, "how unhappy she must be!" If she had not been a princess, you know, it would not have been so hard. Princesses suffer dreadfully when they are angry.
While I was thinking I wrote a little note and pinned it on my study door. Here it is:
"Lost—An article of great value to the owner, at about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of January 25, 1892. The finder will receive a liberal reward on returning the same to
"THE LITTLE PRINCESS."
Pretty soon she came in with a bright pink spot on each cheek. She was going to tell me all about it, when the notice caught her eye. She read it through, then glanced at the clock and looked puzzled.
"I know you want me to advertise it, dear," I observed, as if it was all quite a matter of course.
"What do you mean, please?"

"Why, of course, you are hunting for it now."

"Hunting for what?"
"Princess," said I, glad to notice that her eyes were brighter, and her cheeks of quieter color than they were when she came in, "oblige me by looking up a word in the dictionary: 'T-E—have you found it so far? —M-F-E-R. What is the definition, please?"

"'Calmness or soundness of mind,'" read the Princess, slowly.

"Now, if you please; read this verse: Prov. xvi. 32."

That she read to herself.

"Once more, dear: Ps. xiv. 13, the first half of the verse. You see, your highness, it is a pretty serious thing for The King's Daughter to lose her temper, so I thought you'd like to have me help you find it."

The brown curls drooped upon my coat sleeve for a moment, and I am not sure that her eyelashes were not wet when they were lifted again.

The Princess bestowed a dainty little kiss upon me, and, pausing only to say, with a dimpling smile through her tears, "That's your liberal reward, sir!" hurried from the room. A moment afterward I heard the outer door close once more, softly this time.

Fully ten minutes later it opened again, but it let in the sound of light footsteps and happy young voices chatting and laughing gayly.

I took down my notice and threw it into the fire. —The Silver Cross.

A SENTENCE FOR MOTHERS TO READ.

When I see women stay indoors the entire forenoon because their morning dresses trail the ground, and indoors all afternoon because there comes up a shower, and the walking dress would soak and drabble; or when I see the "working woman" standing at the counter or at the teacher's desk from day to day, in the drenched boots and damp stockings, which her muddy skirts, flapping from side to side, have compelled her to endure; when I see her, a few weeks thereafter, going to Dr. Clark for treatment as a consequence; when I find, after the most patient experiment, that in spite of stout rubbers, waterproof gaiters, and dress skirt three or four inches from the ground, an "out-of-door" girl is compelled to a general change of clothing each individual time that she returns from her daily walks in the summer rain; when I see a woman climbing upstairs with her baby in one arm and its bowl of bread and milk in the other, and see her tripping on her dress at every step (if, indeed, baby, bowl, bread, milk, and mother do not go down in universal chaos, it is only from the efforts of long skill and experience on the part of the mother in performing that acrobatic feat); when physicians tell me what fearful jars and strains these sudden jerks of the body from stumbling on the dress imposes upon a woman's intricate organism, how much less injurious to her a direct fall would be than the start and rebound of nerve and muscle, and how the strongest man would suffer from such accidents; when they further assure me of the amount of calculable injury wrought upon our sex by the weight of skirting brought upon the hips, and by thus making the seat of all the vital energies the pivot of motion and the center of endurance; when I see women's skirts, the shortest of them, lying (when they sit down) inches deep along the foul floors, which man, in delicate appreciation of our concessions to his fancy in such respects, has inundated with tobacco juice, and from which she sweeps up and carries to her home the germs of stealthy pestilences; when I see a ruddy, romping school girl in her first long dress, beginning to avoid coasting on her double-runner, or afraid of the stone walls in the blueberry fields, or standing aloof from the game of ball, or turning sadly away from the ladder which her brother is climbing to the cherry tree, or begging him to assist her over the gunwale of a boat; when I read of the sinking of steamers at sea, with nearly all the women and children on board, and the accompanying comments, "Every effort was made to assist the women up the masts and out of danger till help arrived, but they could not climb, and we were forced to leave them to their fate;" or when I hear the wail with which a million lips take up the light words of the loafer on the Portland wharf when the survivors of the Atlantic fled past him, "Not a woman among them all! My God,"—when I consider these things, I feel that I have ceased to deal with blunders in dress, and have entered the category of crimes.

LESSON II.

THE HOME ENVIRONMENT OF JESUS.

Is not this the carpenter's son?

Matt. xiii, 55.

I must be about my father's business.

Lk. ii, 49.

"In light things

Evolve thou the arms thou long'st to glorify,

Nor fear to work up from the lowest ranks

Whence came great Nature's captains."
Arthur Hugh Clough.

Picture—"In Nazareth," by Heinrich Hofmann (1824-).

Who were the parents of Jesus?—Joseph, a carpenter of Nazareth, and Mary, his wife.

In the opening chapters of Matthew and Luke we have traditions which relate a miraculous birth of Jesus. That Mary was his mother all accounts agree, but the legends referred to declare that he had no human father, but was begotten by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary. These accounts must be rejected, however, for reasons which may be briefly stated.

(a) Inherent improbability. A miracle has been defined as something which no one would believe if it were not in the Bible. When similar stories are told of other great heroes and religious leaders,—of the Buddha, for instance,—we never think of believing them, simply because they are so improbable. Why, then, should we believe such a story when told of our religious leader? Is there evidence enough in favor of the account to overcome its inherent improbability?

(b) There is no clear intimation of the miraculous birth anywhere else in the New Testament. Jesus is called the son of Joseph, and Mary says, "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing."

(c) The genealogies given in Matthew and Luke contradict the accounts of the virginal birth, for they prove the Davidic lineage of Jesus by tracing descent through Joseph. But if Joseph was not the father of Jesus how could his descent from David prove that Jesus was son of David?

(d) It is possible to see how the story arose in the case of Jesus.

(1) There was a growing tendency among those who believed him the Messiah to lift him out of the ranks of humanity, to ascribe to him pre-existence and supernatural origin. Hence, there was a natural disposition to think that his coming into the earthly life must have differed from that of other men. The same laws of legend-making governed the traditions about Jesus that were operative in the case of Buddha.

(2) This tendency was aided also by the misinterpretation of a passage in Isaiah (vii. 14, quoted in Matt. i. 23) concerning which Prof. Toy says: "The rendering 'virgin' is inadmissible." [The Septuagint mistranslated the Hebrew word.] One passage occurs in the section Isa. vii. 1; ix. 7, which belongs to the period of the Syro-Israelitish invasion (about B. C. 734). During the war, when the royal house of David was trembling with apprehension, Isaiah goes to King Ahaz, announces that the hostile combination [between Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Syria] will fail, and exhorts the King to ask a sign from Yahwe. This Ahaz refuses to do, and the prophet then declares that Yahwe will nevertheless give him a sign: "The young woman shall bear a son; and before the child shall reach years of discretion the land of the hostile kings shall be deserted." Clearly that could be no sign to Ahaz in 734 which did not come to pass till B. C. 4. This passage in Isaiah doubtless commended the story of the virginal birth to Jewish Christians (although there were some of them who never accepted it), but the Jewish ideals of God and of womanhood seem to make it impossible that such a belief should have sprung up out of Jewish soil. We must seek its origin elsewhere.

(3) The idea probably grew up among the Gentile Christians. Jesus called himself Son of God in exactly the same sense that he taught his disciples to pray "Our Father." The Greeks, too, had their heroes who were sons of God, children, that is, of a god and a mortal, demi-gods. Thus it was easy when they heard of the exalted, mysteriously supernatural Christ, who was called Son of God, to think of him as like one of their own heroes. In some such way as this, probably, the story of the virginal birth arose.

It is clear, therefore, that we have no reason for accepting this story of the miraculous birth of Jesus. The whole account must be rejected. There is no reason to doubt that Jesus was the first, and lawful, son of Joseph and Mary.

What do we know about his home life? His folks and mother were poor working people. He had four brothers whose names are given as James, Joseph, Judas and Simon, and at least two sisters.

The picture shows us the sort of house in which Jesus may have lived. Limestone was abundant, and the houses when built of stone were white or grayish, as portrayed in the picture. We see no windows, only the opening of the door. Doves were often found about Jewish houses. The hen with her chickens, together with the shape of the cross into which the square and rule that Jesus is carrying have accidentally fallen, suggests his lament over Jerusalem (Mt. xxiii. 37). Joseph and Mary are both at work. Joseph was a carpenter, and if the accounts in the Apocrypha have any basis of fact, he was not a skillful workman. In the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy (ch. xxxviii.) it is written:

Now Joseph went about through all the city and took with him the Lord Jesus, since men sent for him on account of his craft, to make for them doors and milk-pails and couches and boxes. And the Lord Jesus was with him wherever he went. Therefore so often as Joseph had to make any of his work a cubit or a span larger or shorter, wider or narrower, the Lord Jesus used to stretch out his hand toward it, and when this was done it became such as Joseph wished, and there was no need for him to do anything with his own hand, for Joseph was not very skillful as a carpenter.

In the apocryphal gospel, Mary is represented as very skillful in wood-work, and this tradition Hofmann has followed in the picture (cf., e. g., gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, chap. vi.). All the family are at work.

With the exception of James, who became prominent in the church at Jerusalem, although sharing none of his brother's genius, we know nothing of the other children besides Jesus. The sisters have been given various names by different writers. Among the names found are Anna, Esther, Lydia, Mary, Salome, Thamar.

In what sort of town did Jesus live?

—Nazareth was a town of bad reputation and character, but the neighborhood was rich in historical and poetic associations.

If we could look over the wall seen in the background of the picture, near which trees, shrubbery, and a single flower are growing, we should have a view of the village of Nazareth. The town was on the side of a hill (cf. Luke iv. 29), not far from the caravan road, between Egypt and Syria. Although it had a bad reputation (John i. 46), which the treatment accorded Jesus by his townsmen seems to justify (Luke iv. 28), it was in a region which, next to the country about Jerusalem, was the richest part of Palestine in history and poetry. Near by was the plain of Jezreel, where the battle bow of Israel was often bent and sometimes broken. Through the plain flowed the ancient river, the river Kishon which swept away the hosts of Sisera (Judges v.); not far off was Carmel, where Elijah had put to shame the priests of Baal. The boy Jesus walked over historic ground. But his immediate surroundings were commonplace; he made no disciples in Nazareth, and even the members of his own family did not believe in him. So he was thrown back upon himself and upon God.

In teaching this lesson constant reference should be made to Gannett's admirable "Childhood of Jesus." It is well to lay stress upon the fact that there came out of Palestine despised by the Romans, out of Galilee despised by Judæans, out of Nazareth despised by Galileans, a young man who, with everything against him, and in spite of the tyranny of environment has become the great religious leader of the world. Besides the environment of Nazareth he was sensitive to the environment of God.

The Study Table

NEW BOOKS.

SEEING AND BEING, and Other Sermons. By John W. Chadwick. Boston: George H. Ellis. Cloth, 12mo., pp. 122. $1.—These sixteen sermons, through the generosity of the congregation to whom they were first preached, have already had wide circulation in pamphlet form through the Post-office Mission; and they are now deservedly gathered and bound in a double sheaf, forming the "seventeenth and eighteenth series" of Mr. Chadwick's published discourses. They begin with "Great Hopes for Great Souls" and end with the sermon whose title fitly names the volume. The variety of the subjects is indicated by the following: The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism. Orthodoxy, What Is It? The Fullness of Time. The Unbridled Tongue. Immortality. A Mere Man. There is a discourse commemorative of the late Samuel Longfellow, the first minister of the church over which Mr. Chadwick has now been settled for more than a quarter century,—a very interesting and just tribute to that member of an elect group of souls who fired the hearts and winged the thought of the younger ministers of their time. The sermons all show the qualities which have marked the author's previous volumes,—a free and reverent spirit, wide range of reading, vigorous thought, apt quotations and ready reference in illustration, and a style free and fluent, with no sacrifice of force and dignity. One does not ordinarily take a volume of sermons on a summer holiday; but these discourses chimed with the music of cleft waters as we sailed on a July Sunday down Lake Michigan, and were as tonic and wholesome spiritually as the pine woods and air of North Michigan were physically. We observed, moreover, that when we left the book in our deck chair for a promenade, it seemed never to lack a reader. F. L. H.

FACTS AND FICTIONS OF LIFE. By Helen H. Gardener. Chicago: C. H. Kerr & Co. 12 mo., pp., 270. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.—Though containing several essays of only ordinary worth, this book must nevertheless be pronounced one of real importance and of exceedingly great interest, on account of the papers on "The Moral Responsibility of Woman in Heredity" and "Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals," both read before the Woman's Congress last May. Even those who were not fortunate enough to hear the eloquent author read them must feel the intensity of the tragic note with which Mrs. Gardener describes the awful consequences of "sex mania" and its hereditary transmission. Whether approving or not of Mrs. Gardener's novels as vehicles for her message to society, we cannot deny that it is a needed message, and no objection can be made to its treatment in this form. Indeed I wish that these two essays might be read by every married man and woman. Perhaps if the fathers and mothers should read them, there would be no need of putting them into the hands of young men and women—except those in danger either of falling into dissolute habits or of marrying unworthy persons. Indeed, there would, we hope, be less of that most painful sacrifice of purity to impurity in society, by which young men who have sown their wild oats are allowed to marry pure young women.

But no review can give an adequate idea of the originality, courage and power which are shown in the two essays named above. There is a vital horror in the theme, yet it is better to think on these themes before sad experience brings them to our knowledge—often too late. F. G. B.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE. By Anson Uriel Hancock. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Cloth.—We have here a dozen sketches of life in the backwoods of Michigan and on the prairies of Nebraska. The author of "John Auburntop, Novelist," and "Old Abraham Jackson" has evidently turned to his portfolio for these: they seem to us much like remnants. There are touches of humor here and there, and a few attempts at pathos. The dialect may be characteristic of parts of the West, but it suggests simply the every-day town talk as one hears it, mingled with slang, from Maine to California. And the point of the sketch does not as a rule redeem the weakness of the dialect. "The 'Swamp Angel's' Yarn" and "How the Horse-Thief Escaped" are the best things in the book. H. B. L.

NUMBER II. of the "The Book of the Fair," published by the Bancroft Co., Chicago and San Francisco, is before us. A beautiful folio of forty pages, profusely illustrated, with most admirably executed pictures taken from the most characteristic scenes, architectural and otherwise, that delight the eyes of the visitor. This number contains in part or in whole the chapters on the site, the plan, and the artificers of the World's Fair, and on the personnel of the management. We have already spoken of number one and continue to commend the venture to all those who desire to preserve as much as possible of this great vision of beauty which is soon to pass away and "leave not a wrack behind." The office of publication is in the Auditorium Building, Chicago.

THE MAGAZINES.

IN THE NON-SECTARIAN for September, Rev. W. D. Simonds' opening article on the "Origin of Religious Liberty in America," although short, is meaty, showing, by a review of the situation and quotations from the words of the great men of that day, the intimate relation between civil and religious liberty. Dr. Hiram W. Thomas' article on "The Independent Churches" approaches the same subject from a different direction, pointing out that our political freedom naturally leads to the free church, and advocating the union of the several broad-fellowship religious papers into one strong periodical which could adequately represent the free church movement,—a suggestion which has been warmly received by the Non-Sectarian, Universalist Monthly, UNITY, and other liberal publications. Mr. W. L. Sheldon has a comparison between Socrates, Thomas a Kempis and Saint Francis of Assisi. His conclusion in favor of Saint Francis, as compared with Socrates, is the more noteworthy as coming not from a Christian but from an ethical culturist. The selected paper is Rev. J. H. Ecob's sermon on "The Preaching for To-day," from the Christian Union. "The Bible is here," says he, "to point us to the living God in Christ. When the guide-board has pointed out your road its work is done. You are not expected to take it on your shoulder and carry it home and set it up in a shrine." The leading editorial is a manly explanation of the editor's use of the word Christian, in reply to a criticism in the Jewish Voice.

THERE comes to our table a quarterly magazine for beginners entitled The Start, "a young people's magazine of art, science and literature." It is conducted by Sidney Henry Morse, is published quarterly, in October, January, April and July, is illustrated, and costs 50 cents a year. The Start is for those who desire to improve their spare moments in gaining a knowledge of and practice in modeling, drawing, painting, carving, designing, and composition. Other general features of the magazine are indicated by the contents for October: 1. Dudley Lambert, the Sculptor Boy; 2. The Art of the White City; 3. Sculpture and Architecture; 4. East and West; 5. Chips of My Studio; 6. Contributors' Basket—What Electricity Will Do, R. L. J.; Homing Pigeons, W. T. Innes; Iron Moulding and Finishing, G. W. What Shall a Boy who Has Nothing to Do, Do? W. B. G.; A Girl's Idea, G. H.; The First Engine that Went Out of Chicago, H. F.; 7. Sara Tooms, 74, and Lost at the Fair; 8. Drawing and Modeling, first lessons, explained, illustrated; 9. One Thing or Another; 10. Books, New and Old; 11. Retouched Sketches. Professor William P. Wilson, of the University of Pennsylvania, will contribute a series of articles on "Habits of Plants." It has been said of him that "he makes one think plants are almost human." The story of Dudley Lambert gives the experience of a boy who has engineered his own way to success, and is now (represented by several boys and girls) "doing the Fair." He will make his report in the January number. The Contributors' Basket is respectfully dedicated to young subscribers, and is to the extent of its capacity for their special use. Retouched Sketches will show first attempts in drawing faces sent for the editor's opinion, which he will give by additional touches. This department will be amusing and instructive. Every boy and girl in America is invited to read this young people's magazine, and take some part in conducting it.

IN THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS for September the most valuable feature is the discussion of the silver question in its relation to the monetary situation. Besides the thoughtful editorial, there are papers on the subject by Professors Bemis, Von Holtz and Laughlin, of Chicago University.

THE OUTLOOK has been doing admirable service of late by its temperate and instructive discussion of the money question. It is encouraging to see that Eastern writers are being aroused to the justice of many of the contentions of the silver men. By doing full justice to their good points they will the better be able to combat the errors of the silverites.

THE ALTRUISTIC REVIEW, of which we have only seen the second (August) number, is a new venture in the periodical field, which has hardly yet made clear its style and purpose. Hazlitt Alva Cuppy is the editor. The magazine has a good name, and if it lives up to it, cannot but win the approbation of the reading public.

believe, all at once, that there was anything better. Just so with every improvement. The old way always has some benighted ones who cling to it to the last.

Too Fast in ruining clothes, un-making them—that's the trouble with the washboard. But it's going now and going fast, to join the spinning-wheel. Women find it doesn't pay to rub their clothes to pieces over it. They can wash better with Pearlina. Less work, less wear, no ruinous rub, rub, rub.

That's the modern way of washing—safe, easy, quick, cheap. No wonder that many women have thrown away the washboard. Beware of imitations. 378 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.
